By converting exemptions into tax credits and by lowering the tax levels this change will mean that the vast majority of Canadians will pay less income tax. Indeed, 250,000 more senior citizens will no longer pay any federal income tax.

That is fairness. That is equity. That is what the actions of this Government mean for the senior citizens of Canada.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—REPORTED REPLACEMENT OF INSIDE WORKERS IN HAMILTON

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the very problem with this budget and the very problem with this Government as stated by the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) is that they talk about a "typical" elderly couple earning $25,000 a year. Well, I do not know how many typical elderly couples in Capilano are earning $25,000 per year, but it is certainly not the typical picture of an elderly couple in Hamilton. I cannot believe that the Government would introduce such a budget.

However, I wanted to speak today on the issue of the postal strike, in particular the fact that the Minister responsible for superboxes suggested last week that if there were any violation of a collective agreement, it should be brought immediately to his attention.

I should like to bring to his attention a violation of the collective agreement in Hamilton where the Post Office is bringing in Kelly girls to replace inside workers and telling those inside workers that, if they do not like it, they can file a grievance or they can walk out.

It is direct provocation. It is an attempt by the Government, through the corporation, actually to create a situation which is going to lead to increased violence.

I ask the Minister to investigate this violation of the collective agreement of inside workers in the city of Hamilton.

FINANCE

MAINTENANCE OF FLOW-THROUGH SHARES SYSTEM

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in Canada's new tax reform, the flow-through shares system has been retained, which is very important for Abitibi—Témiscamingue and Québec.

On December 16, 1986, Members of the New Democratic Party and their leader (Mr. Broadbent) tabled motions in this House to do away with flow-through shares in this country. However, the Government of Canada listened to representations made by President Régis Labeaume and members of the Association des prospecteurs du Québec and by all intervenors from the mining sector, mayors, the CRDAT and federal Members for Abitibi—Témiscamingue.

I am proud of the decision made by the Minister of Finance of Canada (Mr. Wilson) and the work done by the Minister of State (Forestry and Mines) (Mr. Merrithew). I have been defending the flow-through shares system for many months, and this is a victory we have all won together, and I am particularly thankful to those who were willing to find a solution.

The New Democratic Party moved a motion aimed at doing away with the concept of flow-through shares, a vital one for the mining industry in Abitibi—Témiscamingue, and if the Government of Canada had listened to the New Democratic Party, this would have caused considerable harm to the mining industry.

I want to tell the Members of the NDP that they have lost and that Abitibi—Témiscamingue is ready for them this year, because they haven't been seen since 1984.

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—REPORTED SUSPENSION OF WORKERS IN HALIFAX AND TORONTO

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make, and I am glad to see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) in the House.

In Halifax yesterday, Canada Post suspended 70 workers for refusing to do the work normally done by letter carriers. In addition, over 10 employees in Toronto were suspended for refusing to do the work normally done by letter carriers.

Let us consider Section 184(3)(c) of the Canada Labour Code, which reads as follows:

> No employer and no person acting on behalf of an employer shall suspend, discharge or impose any financial or other penalty on an employee or take any other disciplinary action against an employee by reason of his refusal to perform all or some of the duties and responsibilities of another employee who is participating in a strike or subjected to a lock-out.

I call upon the Minister of Labour to investigate the situation immediately and to make sure that Canada Post is living up to the provisions of the Canada Labour Code.

TAX REFORM

IMPACT

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, once again the Mulroney Government has revealed its genius by tabling its White Paper on Tax Reform.

Canadians are impressed by this dynamic initiative. Social interest groups are speechless before the courage and sense of equity of the Conservatives. We have paid particular attention to the most destitute in our society. Henceforth, 850,000 people will no longer pay income taxes. Where did the money come from? Quite simple: the rich will pay their fair share, profit-making corporations will now pay taxes, and tax havens have been eliminated.

You know what we did with the money, Mr. Speaker? No need to look very far. Nine out of ten elderly Canadians over 65 will pay fewer taxes and, on average, eight out of ten households with an income ranging from $30,000 to $50,000 will pay $470 less. This has to be a black day for Opposition Parties. The Liberals were unable to get Quebec to join the rest of Canada, the socialists wanted to destroy our country's economy.

This Government has created 840,000 jobs, Mr. Speaker. Thanks to the Prime Minister's leadership, this figure will soon reach 1,000,000.

This is extraordinary news for my constituents of Argenteuil—Papineau because a good many of them are elderly and destitute.

I sincerely believe we have lived up to the challenge.

TAX REFORM

TEN PER CENT TAX ON COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in his Budget the Minister of Finance told us he intends to levy a 10 per cent tax on communications, excluding basic service. This tax on long distance calls strikes unfairly at all Canadians residing in rural areas, be they from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Argenteuil—Papineau or elsewhere.

S. O. 21

Telephone subscribers in urban areas can get in touch with hundreds of thousands of other people without paying long distance charges. But in such rural areas as mine, that of Argenteuil—Papineau and others, even calling neighbours generally entails long distance charges.

This morning I was talking to constituents of mine, Claudette and Gérald Laplante of Sarsfield, who told me their monthly phone bill amounts to $80, $5 for basic service plus $75 in additional charges.

Residents of rural areas were held up to ridicule by the Minister of Finance yesterday, and they are not about to forget it. The people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Argenteuil—Papineau do not like these measures, Mr. Speaker, and they will say so to the Minister of Finance.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—EFFECT ON WESTERN CANADIANS

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it was quite interesting last night to watch opposition Members and other government critics try to turn good news into bad.

Tax reform means fairness in the taxation system for Canadians, and western Canadians in particular.

A quarter million western Canadians will be relieved of federal income tax and over three million western Canadian taxpayers will enjoy an income tax reduction. As well, the forestry and fisheries and agriculture sectors will have the lowest average tax rates in the Canadian economy under our tax reform package.

How dare the NDP and the Liberals attack a plan that brings fairness to our taxation system! After spending the last 20 years spending more than they took in and clogging up our economy, they have decided to blame the roto-rooter man.

The fact of the matter is that interest rates are down, the deficit is down, inflation is down, and now taxes are going down. The Canadian economy is booming.

As a matter of fact, last night one British Columbian I spoke with suggested that we have a new national bird—not the Canada Goose the Liberals were flying across our television screens, not the left-wing loon, but the crane, as in construction crane, to show what good government does for the Canadian economy.

HUMAN RIGHTS

EL SALVADOR—RE-EMERGENCE OF DEATH SQUADS

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in El Salvador the death squads have openly and brazenly re-emerged. They have written to 14 professors and students of the National University, threatening to kill them if they do not leave the country at once.

The Duarte Government has, throughout its term of office, completely failed to prosecute any of the murders or disappearances conducted by the death squads with military participation.

Although the Canadian Government has claimed that human rights are being restored in El Salvador, the increasing attacks on trade unionists, academics, and human rights spokespersons prove that the Canadian Government is mistaken in this regard.

Now that the death squads have re-emerged with open, brazen threats, I call upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to denounce this open breach of human rights, to denounce the failure of the Duarte Government to correct it, and to withdraw Canada's support from the Duarte Government.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—SUPPORT FOR PROVISIONS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Government's tax reform is a comprehensive package with all parts working together. It comes in two stages. Personal and corporate reform takes effect in 1988. Sales taxes will proceed after consultation with the provinces and Canadians.

It means lower rates for individuals and businesses, as well as a simplified rate structure, and it is a fairer system.

Tax deductions are converted to tax credits; 850,000 more Canadians will pay no federal tax, and some will receive refunds; 8 out of 10 households will pay less tax, on an average of $475 less; and 9 out of 10 senior citizens will pay less tax. Corporate and sales tax changes will help to fund these changes. The agriculture, logging, and fishing sectors, after tax reform, will have the lowest tax rates.

All in all, it is a good package for all Canadians by a good Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson).

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

WHITE PAPER—WAYS AND MEANS MOTION—PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister said that he did not have to fire the Minister of Finance because the leaked information on tax reform was only in a White Paper. To use his exact words, he said that tax reform "is not a budget in the sense that it does not, per se, take effect the very same day pursuant to a Ways and Means motion".

Those were the Prime Minister's words. I have in my hand, of course, the Ways and Means motion which the Prime Minister said did not exist. I say to the Prime Minister that he misled the House of Commons and that he misled the people of Canada. According to the official documents produced by the Minister of Finance last night, tax changes did take effect immediately. Referring to the Ways and Means motion, I count up to 13 tax changes that took effect immediately on the presentation of the budget and two prior to the presentation of the budget.

Why is it that the Prime Minister chose to mislead the House yesterday? Now that the facts are known by the House, will he now fire the Minister of Finance for leaking information to 31 privileged tax accountants and lawyers?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has made the point that because there are some elements of a Ways and Means motion that this is a budget. Let me ask him to cast his mind back to something which occurred after he left the House, so he may not be totally clear on this. On October 20, 1977, Jean Chrétien, then Minister of Finance, had a notice of Ways and Means containing 95 different elements as part of an economic and fiscal statement which was not a budget.

Let me draw the Right Hon. Leader's attention to what was contained therein. Capital losses were increased from $1,000 to $2,000. The employment expense deduction was increased to $250. Advertising expenses were changed. Guaranteed capital gains were identified.

TAX SPECIALISTS' ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is not facing the issue. The Prime Minister said that there would not be a Ways and Means motion and said that there would be no tax changes. Those were the words of the Prime Minister. If I did not have the deepest and greatest of respect for this institution, I know what I would call the Prime Minister.

Thirty-one citizens, so-called experts in taxation, were given a privileged 24-hour head start on the budget. They were given the budget in advance. What could have happened in those 24 hours we will never know. These people were co-opted to sell the message on behalf of the Minister of Finance across the country and the payoff was a 24-hour head start on a budget.

Because we are dealing with the Prime Minister's words spoken in the House yesterday, I ask the Prime Minister why he does not now fire the Minister of Finance. Where are the ethics of the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because I do have a profound respect for this House, I shall say what I have considered about the Leader of the Opposition in light of what he has been saying: weak and confused and unprincipled. What he has been saying is a sham and a fraud.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: The position set forward by—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: There is clearly a profound difference of views between the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Both have expressed their high regard for this place and I know that both are trying very hard to maintain that. I would ask that the Right Hon. Prime Minister complete his answer and I would ask that other Hon. Members give him the courtesy of allowing him to complete that answer.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance was perfectly consistent with the conventions of this House and the proprieties of matters of this nature. The Minister of Finance has given another illustration of that this morning. Nothing that was said or done by the Minister of Finance was at variance with any of the fundamental requirements of the preparation of documents in this regard.

The result was a White Paper which dealt with the concept of fairness and equalization of opportunity, a White Paper which was designed to strengthen and render more fair the tax system. That is the thrust of the White Paper that was set forward by the Minister of Finance.

It is not unusual, nor did I say anything at variance with this yesterday or at any other time, for tax measures, however modest in number, to accompany a statement. There is a total segregation, as the Minister has indicated. The proprieties were observed at all times. I know that my right hon. friend, who is concerned with tax policy and who leads a Party that is apparently interested in tax reform, will now want to deal with the substance rather than the personalities because Canadians want to know where the Liberal Party stands on this fundamental issue.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NEWSPAPERS' FORECASTS OF WHITE PAPER CONTENTS—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not my words that are at issue before the House of Commons, it is the Prime Minister's words to this House. That is the issue. I will say to the Prime Minister that the truth and the Prime Minister are not on easy terms.

Yesterday morning's Globe and Mail contained a front-page story entitled "What to Expect in Tax Reform". On the vast majority of items, the article was right. It was right, right down to the last nickel. The Ottawa Citizen carried the same story and it was right almost to the last nickel. How could they have known so accurately? What kind of games are being played here? What kind of advance notice has been given to try to sell the message of the Minister? Who has been co-opted and who is benefiting? That is the question we want to put.

If the Prime Minister does not want to mislead the House, then on the facts as we know them, which are that we had a budget, we had tax changes and we had a Ways and Means motion, he should fire the Minister of Finance. I have respect for that Minister. Under the circumstances as have now been revealed to the House, will he have the dignity to resign his office in view of what happened last night?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is pointing out that a number of the media and a number of individuals from the private sector who have been involved in the consultation process have understood the directions that we are going in tax reform and the objectives that we had in tax reform so that they have been able to anticipate some but not all of the things. That is exactly what we are trying to do. That is exactly why, at my breakfast meeting this morning, members of the private sector who have been involved in this consultation process were very complimentary. They asked me to please make sure that I keep this consultation process as open and productive as it has been because it has made for a better product. That is why we have been able to get eight out of 10 people off the tax rolls.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is exactly why we have been able to identify those tax preferences of upper-income Canadians that should be reduced. That is why we have been able to identify those ways that profitable corporations which are not paying taxes should have the situation changed. That is why we have been able to get 850,000 taxpayers off the rolls. These are the objectives of tax reform.

INFORMATION GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the same suject and direct my question to the Prime Minister, since he failed to answer the question put by the Leader of the Opposition. Yesterday in the House, in responding to a question by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, he informed Hon. Members that what was about to be tabled was not a Budget but a White Paper, and I will quote his own words in this respect: He said it was not a budget in the sense it did not per se take effect the very same day pursuant to a Ways and Means Motion.

Mr. Speaker, it was this Ways and Means Motion that was used by the Minister of Finance to lay certain tax changes on the Table of the House and inform all elected representatives of the Canadian people of these changes and the date on which they became effective. Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the Prime Minister said yesterday in the House, a Ways and Means Motion was tabled containing no less than thirteen tax changes. What we have here is a case of false information given by the Prime Minister to the House, and I would like to ask him why he failed to tell Hon. Members the truth yesterday during Oral Question Period.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the statement I made in the House and the statements made the Minister of Finance are entirely in line, not only with our tradition and custom—after all, since he is a former Minister of Finance—but with the tradition of parliamentary democracy which is the system by which we are governed, and also entirely in line with the facts that were published subsequently. We are talking about a White Paper that was tabled in circumstances that were perfectly acceptable on the basis of our custom and tradition. There have been many examples, and I know the Hon. Member will end up agreeing with me on that.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say what I am going to say. However, the Minister lied in the House yesterday. Since the Prime Minister lied yesterday in the House, since according to his remarks . . .

• (1130)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I know the Hon. Member understands the rules of this place. I ask him to indicate that he recognizes he went too far, and put the question in a more appropriate way.

[Translation]

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is not making things very easy for us. Out of respect for the Chair I will withdraw my remarks, but the fact remains that the Prime Minister informed us yesterday in the House that no Motion of Ways and Means would be tabled last night, announcing tax changes becoming effective that day. Nevertheless, a motion was tabled. Someone is not telling the truth, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to know why.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting spectacle. Here we have a tax reform proposal of vital interest to every Canadian and because the Liberal Party is unable to get its act together and, understand its position on this White Paper, all it can do is attack the process and personalities. The respect of Canadians for that Party is slipping very fast.

WHITE PAPER'S EFFECT ON RICH TAXPAYERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I happen to agree with the issue raised by the Official Opposition, but fundamentally the people of Canada are interested right now in the document presented last night.

In 1984 in the Leaders' debate the Prime Minister promised the people of Canada that if they voted Conservative there would be tax fairness. Last night on television the Minister of Finance admitted that after three years of Conservative Government, and after this paper is implemented, a majority of Canadians will pay more in taxes than when the Conservatives were elected. According to the document itself, Canadians earning $100,000 or more, 175,000 rich families, will actually pay $4,365 less. Is this the Conservative concept of justice? After three years of Conservative Government only the rich pay less?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me draw to the attention of the Leader of the NDP that we have to look at what has happened in total since 1984. Some 840,000 jobs have been created. Interest rates are at their lowest level in about 10 years.

Mr. Broadbent: I am talking about tax reform.

Miss MacDonald: Income has something to do with taxes.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The unemployment rate dropped from 11.7 per cent to 9.1 per cent. Job creation over the last 12 months has helped all regions. We have a boom in housing starts which we have not seen for about 10 years. Those are the things that have happened since September 4, 1984, when this Government came into office with this Prime Minister leading the way to a better Canada. That is what we stand for.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister left out one salient fact. There is only one category of Canadian that is richer after three years of Tory Government and it is that group of 175,000 rich families who get a tax break. The rich get richer, that is what happens with the Tories.

FAIRNESS OF TAX MEASURES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my question to the Prime Minister because it is his reliability on the record here. He promised in 1984 a fairer tax system. I ask him the question and will he answer it? Does he think it is fair that after three years of Tory Government the average Canadian should be paying much more, and rich Canadians alone should be paying less? Is that Tory justice?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will give my hon. friend full marks. He has been consistent in his claims in this regard for many years. He has been asking for a greater degree of tax fairness. This has come up in debates in the House over a number of years. This document reduces taxes for eight out of 10 Canadians. Some 90 per cent of Canadians over 65 will pay less taxes. Some 850,000 Canadians will be removed from the federal tax rolls completely. This is an instrument of very considerable fairness for ordinary Canadians.

I ask my hon. friend, if he is disinclined to accept the larger picture of economic growth, to consider the various tax fairness measures introduced on various budget nights by the Minister of Finance, including a minimum tax, tax fairness for the disabled, and so on. I think my hon. friend will agree that this is a continuation of an historic initiative towards tax fairness and equality of opportunity for Canadians. I think it is generally accepted that the prime beneficiaries of these initiatives have been those low-income Canadians who need tax relief most.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister just said 850,000 Canadians were taken off the tax rolls. What he forgot to admit is that during the past three years, because of his Minister's tax policies, 850,000 Canadians were put on the tax rolls.

Miss MacDonald: Those people were unemployed.

Mr. Broadbent: The Government is making up only partially for the injustice it has created. At the same time the truth holds, and it has not yet been denied by the Minister of Finance that the only Canadians paying less taxes after three years of Tory Government are the richest 175,000 families.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE MINIMUM TAX FOR CORPORATIONS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has been preaching about corporate tax reform for a year and a half now. He has sounded like, if I may use the term, a veritable socialist. Since we have 60,000 corporations, according to the Minister's own documents, that will continue to make profits and not pay taxes, why did he not at least do what Ronald Reagan did—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —which was to bring in a minimum tax on corporations—

Miss MacDonald: Stand up and cheer!

• (1140)

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Oshawa has the floor.

Mr. Broadbent: Even Ronald Reagan, a conservative man in the United States, brought in corporate tax which included within its ambit all companies making profits. Why did the Tory Government, which promised corporate tax reform, not at least have the decency to copy that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was afraid that I would not be able to get up and answer this question because God might have struck me dead on the spot, twice. The New Democratic Leader said I was talking like a veritable socialist and then started talking about Ronald Reagan's policies. I do not know what is happening to this place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Work on it.

Mr. Riis: Figure it out.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I am sure that the Leader of the New Democratic Party, whom I compliment on talking far more about policy than have his friends to the right, is going to be very complimentary of the directions we are following on changing exemptions to tax credits which will lead to a greater degree of fairness and a greater degree of progressivity in the tax system. He will also compliment me on the fact that we have taken 850,000 people off the tax rolls.

Mr. Broadbent: Come off it. You put them on.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I appreciate the point he has made. He said that we put these people on the tax rolls. He is quite right. They got a job.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Now answer the question.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance whose budget last night made it clear that for middle-income Canadians so-called tax reform means no relief from the tax grabs of his previous Budgets.

Since taking office three years ago the Conservative Government has raised personal taxes by $22 billion. The Minister claims he will reduce personal taxes by half that amount, $11 billion, over the next five years. However, in his presentation he did not say that that $11 billion would be eroded to $5 billion because of new sales tax grabs.

Can the Minister honestly say he is being frank with Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can honestly say that I am being frank with Canadians when I say that 840,000 jobs have been created since we came into office.

I will draw the Hon. Member's attention to an article which was in The Ottawa Citizen only five days ago which says that the after tax incomes of Canadians were up in 1985. That tells me that there is more economic activity in the country as a result of the policies of the Government which is easily offsetting any of the negative factors about which she speaks. We are making progress.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCESS—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, last night's performance was a budget in everything but name. There were more tax proposals than in the so-called Budget presented in February of this year. There was a Ways and Means motion and a blatant breach of convention and propriety on the part of the Minister in deliberately revealing its contents ahead of the scheduled release time.

Does the Minister not consider that this abuse of parliamentary process requires his resignation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is six questions out of seven on process while millions of Canadians are concerned about the impact on their taxes of this tax reform paper. When is the Liberal Party going to get up out of the mire and understand what is important to Canadians?

Mr. Axworthy: Parliament is important.

Ms. Copps: Honesty is what is important.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I would challenge that Hon. Member to honesty any time.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—EFFECT ON CORPORATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated that he appreciated questions of substance. We would like to request some answers of substance at this time.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. We waited for three years for tax reform. There has been a great deal of consultation and a great deal of talk about fairness.

Today 60,000 corporate presidents are dancing in the street because they found out that in spite of the Minister's repeated assurance that there would be fairness, his own documents tell us that 60,000 profitable corporations in Canada will not pay any federal or provincial income tax as a result of his tax reform.

Is it his idea of fairness to have 60,000 corporations not paying any income tax in spite of their profits? Why did he not bring in a minimum corporate tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member will find that the small business community, to mention only one group, has been pretty pleased with the direction in which we are going.

Mr. Riis: Deal with the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Those are the companies which create jobs.

The Hon. Member asked a specific question and I will give him a specific answer. A corporate minimum tax would lead to a tremendous amount of complexity in the tax system. In place of that we have removed or cut back on a number of the preferences which have led to those corporations not paying tax. We have also introduced some very strong anti-avoidance measures to stop companies from bending the rules to allow them to avoid paying taxes.

This is the direction in which we are going which I believe makes much more sense than imposing an arbitrary, complex, and administratively very difficult tax to deal with. That is the way we have chosen to deal with this and it will be far fairer than a corporate minimum tax.

EFFECT ON WEALTHIEST TAXPAYERS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister who, as I said, has indicated an interest in questions of substance. I would appreciate an answer of substance.

Will the Prime Minister explain whether it is his notion of fairness that after three years of Progressive Conservative government the only people in Canada who will actually see a decrease in their taxes are those whose incomes are in excess of $100,000? Is this his idea of fairness? Why, as a result of his Government's tax policies, will only the wealthiest in Canada see their taxes decline?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, 2,315,000 Canadians earning under $15,000 will see their taxes go down. Of those Canadians earning between $15,000 and $30,000, 2,910,000 will see their taxes go down. Of those earning $30,000 to $50,000, 2,090,000 Canadians will see their taxes go down. Of those earning $50,000 to $100,000, 1,360,000 Canadians will see their taxes go down. Of those earning over $100,000, 175,000 will see their taxes go down. That adds up to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Answer the question.

WAYS AND MEANS MOTION—PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Last night the Minister of Finance made budgetary changes through a Ways and Means motion through such things as lease expenses, restrictions on various automobile expenses, and 11 other budgetary matters.

Will the Prime Minister explain how he can justify keeping the Minister of Finance in Cabinet when the Prime Minister said yesterday:

> —it is not a Budget in the sense that it does not, per se, take effect the very same day pursuant to a Ways and Means Motion.

Is that not untruthful? Is that not a Ways and Means motion? Is that not a breach of what the Prime Minister said yesterday? Will he now remove the Minister of Finance?

• (1150)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope I do not have to watch this performance later on when they rerun Question Period on television. This is pathetic. Seven out of eight questions have been on procedural matters.

I do not know whether the Hon. Members have read this paper. There is some very good information, some of which I know the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides would agree with.

Mr. Garneau: We will when we get a new Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that all Hon. Members will want to read the material. The Hon. Member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I tell him that it may take even more questions to get to the truth, but we will get to the truth with regard to the contradictions made by the Minister of Finance about the tabling of a budget last night.

Is the Prime Minister now denying his words of yesterday that there are no Ways and Means motions tabled in the Minister's budget yesterday? On behalf of all Canadians, will the Prime Minister please be truthful for a change?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is eight out of nine. What was tabled yesterday was a White Paper on Tax Reform 1987 which sets out the fact that 850,000 Canadians are off the tax rolls, that eight out of ten Canadians will be paying less tax, that nine out of ten Canadians over age 65 will be paying less tax.

We have removed a number of tax preferences of which only those people in upper-income brackets have been able to take advantage. There are a number of preferences that corporations have been able to use to reduce their taxes payable. Those are the things we have changed as a result of tax reform and that is what Canadians are interested in.

Mr. Dingwall: You didn't answer the question.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT GIVES REDUCTIONS TO RICHEST TAXPAYERS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my question is to defend the average Canadian, and my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Average Canadians are wondering why the Minister has given tax reductions to 175,000 of our richest taxpayers, reductions averaging $4,365 annually. They are also wondering why the Minister refuses to levy a minimum tax on 60,000 corporations that, although profitable, will not be paying any taxes at all.

Furthermore, could the Minister confirm that both taxes would have resulted in $3 billion in revenues for the federal Government and inform the House why he is refusing to collect this revenue and at the same time is threatening to impose a tax on life's necessities, including the food purchased by average Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should draw attention to the fact that the Hon. Member is taking things somewhat out of context, which is not unusual for that Hon. Member. Sixty-five thousand households with an income of $100,000 and over will pay an increase in tax of $6,140. That is not an insignificant amount of money.

I think I have answered the Hon. Member's question with regard to corporate minimum tax. His Party has always been in favour of a greater degree of simplicity in the tax system. We have tried to deal with that problem in a way that is not arbitrary and temporary, but does it once and for all by fully taking out a number of those tax preferences which have resulted in Canadian companies not paying tax, and to make the changes on an ongoing basis rather than in an arbitrary way through a minimum tax. That is the permanent solution to the problem he has addressed.

Mr. Cassidy: The Minister of Finance is talking about simplicity in the tax system for the rich while ordinary Canadians pay tax in the same old way.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Why will three out of four wealthy Canadians see this big tax reduction? Why will 60,000 corporations that are profitable not pay any tax at all? Why has the Minister forgone $3 billion worth of revenue which could have been used to keep ordinary Canadians from having to pay a sales tax on food?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member would take the time to read this document he would see that we have been introducing through it a great degree of fairness into the tax system. Eight hundred and fifty thousand Canadians will no longer pay tax, according to this document.

The reason is that we have moved from exemptions to tax credits, which I know that the Hon. Member will agree in his heart is the right way to proceed. That is particularly fairer for those people in low-income brackets. That is why the tax system would be more progressive after tax reform than it is today before tax reform.

IMPACT ON ECONOMY

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism).

Yesterday, this Government sent an excellent and very significant message to the dynamic entrepreneurs in this country by making risk and business ventures more attractive. He sent this message to the people with whom we created 70 per cent of 840, 000 new jobs. However, considering the confusing statements made by the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides and his socialist colleague from Ottawa Centre, I think the Minister should inform Canadians today about the positive impact this Budget will have on job creation and business development, by letting entrepreneurs keep a little more of their profits.

L'hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the tax reform proposals tabled yesterday by the Minister of Finance are a clear and accurate example of this Government's desire to promote entrepreneurship in this country. Out of 840,000 jobs created, 70 per cent were created by small business, and we all know that yesterday, neither the Leader of the socialist party nor the Liberal Party mentioned the small business people across Canada who will benefit from this Budget. There will be more investment and more risk-taking, and in return, more revenue will flow to the Government's treasury. More jobs will be created, and that is what counts.

FUTURE OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and it relates directly to the statement just made by the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism), namely that indeed the Minister announced a Budget.

I should remind the Prime Minister that 4.9 million Canadians did not pay a cent in taxes in 1984. Unfortunately, in 1987, as a result of the three famous Budgets of this Conservative Government, one million poor have been forced to pay taxes, yet last night the Government tried to make people believe that in future 850,000 people would no longer pay taxes.

I should like to know from the Prime Minister, after misleading the elderly, after misleading families about family allowances, after misleading sick people with the tax on drugs, I should like to know how much longer he will let his Minister of Finance mislead Canadians generally and the House, considering what he did last night in his Budget.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Hon. Member cleared the question with his Leader. It is the second question out of ten that deals with substance and I congratulate him for it.

Clearly there is an increased degree of fairness in the tax system as a result of the changes from tax exemptions and deductions to tax credits. There is also increased fairness in the system because we are taxing corporations $5 billion more as a result of tax reform. That $5 billion will be used directly in reducing the taxes of Canadians, particularly Canadians in low-income brackets.

I know the Hon. Member has always shown a great deal of concern for senior citizens. Nine out of ten senior citizens will see their taxes reduced. I think that is the positive way to proceed and I am sure the Hon. Member will congratulate me for it.

OLD AGE EXEMPTION—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, again the Minister is trying to mislead elderly people. The tax credit is not refundable and he knows full well that 1,400,000 elderly Canadians do not pay taxes and will not get any increase at all. I would like the Minister to tell us why he did not replace the old age tax exemption by a refundable tax credit to make sure that all elderly Canadians are entitled to this tax credit, instead of again favouring the wealthy?

• (1200)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me respond to that question in two ways. First, we have increased the refundable sales tax credit. That is clearly in the White Paper itself. The second point I would make is that in the second stage of tax reform we want to expand in a major way on the principle of a refundable sales tax credit by paying it not only in advance but paying it regularly, so that people who are in low-income brackets will have the benefit of this tax credit on a refundable basis, on an ongoing basis, and that is a very major increase in the fairness of the tax system.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF MINIMUM CORPORATE TAX

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance, or as he is now known, "The Houdini of the Hill", the master of smoke and mirrors. Last night the Minister spoke often of fairness, of restoring equity to Canada's tax system, but the woeful tax package of the Minister of Finance leaves low and middle-income Canadians holding the tax bag again, while 60,000 profitable Canadian corporations get off scot-free and wealthy Canadians enjoy a $1 billion tax holiday.

Why does the Minister not say yes to a minimum corporate tax? Why does he not say yes to a minimum tax which would generate around $2 billion extra in revenue and lessen the tax burden on low and middle-income Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to spell this out a little more clearly for the Hon. Member. We have taken a different approach and I make no excuses for that. The approach we have taken is to solve the problem, not put a band-aid over it.

What we are doing by this tax White Paper is to reduce preferences, depletion, capital cost allowances, revenue reductions for financial institutions, a wide range of provisions which are already in the tax system, which have resulted in a number of corporations not paying tax. We have decided it is wrong to introduce a major degree of complexity and arbitrariness into the tax system.

We have also said that we recognize clearly that there has been a good degree of tax avoidance in the system which should not be there. We are taking important measures to reduce that tax avoidance by giving my colleagues, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Justice, the ability to attack these attempts head on and solve the problem in a real way, not with a typical NDP band-aid solution.

Mr. de Jong: I do not think Canadians are going to be impressed by the way the Government will be handling the problem of stopping the tax abuse by large corporations when they realize that, after all the smoke and mirrors, there will still be 60,000 corporations not paying a cent of tax. Canadians are not going to be impressed by the method the Government has chosen to stop tax abuse.

Privilege—Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques)

EFFECT OF WHITE PAPER ON RICH TAXPAYERS AND CORPORATIONS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Given the fact that 175,000 high-income Canadians will be getting a tax break of over $4,000 a year, and given the fact that there are 60,000 profitable corporations which will not be paying one cent of tax because of the measures introduced last night, how in heaven's name can the Minister face the Canadian people and claim that this is fairness and equity?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are treating this on a broad basis, being fair to everyone. What we are saying is that there are clear reasons why companies are profitable but not paying tax after tax reform. These are companies which have incurred losses, hard dollar cash losses. The provisions under the Tax Act now are that they can carry these forward for a few years. That will not be changed.

The other basis for companies not paying tax, again as part of long-standing tax policy, is that if a company here makes money, pays a dividend to another corporation which pays a dividend to a third corporation, we should not tax that same income two or three times along the chain. A number of those corporations are still not going to be paying tax. That is the right way to do it. If the Hon. Member disagrees with that, I would like to hear the reasons why.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise Hon. Members that the time for Question Period has expired.

Some Hon. Members: More, more!

Mr. Speaker: I have notice of a question of privilege from the Hon. Member for Saint Jacques (Mr. Guilbault).

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege today arising from the misleading and inaccurate information given at Question Period yesterday by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) of this country. It regards the nature and circumstances surrounding the budgetary announcements which were made last night.

While the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is leaving, I would like to point out that the privileges of all the Members of this House have been diminished and abused by spurious statements made in this very House by these two Ministers.

Mr. Speaker, when issues as important as taxation are involved, Members of this House have a duty to represent their constituents, especially as, under our old traditions, there should not be any taxation without representation. The Members of this House were unable to prepare adequately for what was coming as they were given false information about what the Minister would announce yesterday evening.

Members of this House who had prepared papers and assembled groups to advise them on probable taxation measures and options open to the Minister, made incorrect assumptions. Canadians are now faced with measures of which several have already been implemented and which cannot be discussed, but can only be accepted.

[English]

It is perfectly clear today that the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Finance gave the House misleading information in response to questions in the House on Wednesday of this week, and yesterday. Such misleading assertions are grounds for a question of privilege. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance asserted unequivocally that the tax reform provisions announced last night were not a budget, but a White Paper. The evidence is now perfectly clear that the announcement of the provisions was in exactly the same form as a budget, with immediate consequences taking effect at midnight last night.

I have never heard of a White Paper having important measures taking effect immediately with a Ways and Means motion annexed. The White Paper, as all Members are well aware, is a document supposedly containing a series of policy proposals to be discussed by Members of the House of Commons, by its committees and eventually by the people at large who are being called upon to give the Government their advice on various policy options. Is this what we received last night? I say no. There are in the kind of budget that was handed down last night several provisions to take effect immediately. So these are not policy proposals to be discussed but policy directives already decided. They are not open to scrutiny or debate but are there to be understood and accepted by the Canadian public.

[Translation]

The Ways and Means Motion tabled yesterday evening by the Minister, which I have here, contains many tax measures which have even now been implemented. I have identified 13 in the little time I have had at my disposal. Let me give you some examples. First, there will be a——revised definition for qualified farm property acquired after—

—and the date is quite clear—

—June 17, 1987—

This means that this proposal is in effect at this very moment.

—for the purposes of the special $500,000 capital gains exemption.

There will be:

—restriction of deductible capital cost allowances, lease expenses and carrying costs for passenger automobiles—

—and so on—

—after June 17, 1987—

There will be:

—rules relating to dividends on preferred shares paid—

—which will be amended—

—after June 18, 1987.

This means that these rules apply immediately. Mr. Speaker, I know that you are a patient man, for which I thank you, and I do not intend to read each of the 13 measures which are in effect at this very moment.

Mr. Speaker, the worst of the matter is that we were told the exact opposite yesterday. There is no need to repeat the words of the Prime Minister as recorded in Hansard when he clearly stated that there would be no Ways and Means Motion accompanying yesterday evening's documents. Yet, such a motion was tabled, contrary to what he said in reply to a question asked by the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) also added:

• (1210)

[English]

The White Paper is not a budget. It is something entirely different from a budget, as White Papers have traditionally been since this country was founded. brev'

The Minister of Finance said in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner):

Mr. Speaker, I want to draw one single fact to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition. This is not a Budget. It is a White Paper. It is a proposal on tax reform.

I would now like to cite another answer that the Minister gave, and this one is very funny. He said:

—so they can understand the technical impact of these proposals to make sure that when the proposals are brought in in the form of either a White Paper or a Budget—

So at this particular point in time the Minister is not sure anymore. He says "either a White Paper or a Budget".

I submit that all of the Members of the House were mislead by declarations made yesterday, including yourself, Mr. Speaker. You were called upon at one time to make a ruling on a question of privilege raised by the Leader of the Opposition concerning the gang of 20 which we now know was a gang of 31 who had privileged information. One of the items upon which Your Honour based his judgment was that you yourself, as I will quote, thought that we were dealing with a White Paper. Your Honour even quoted the Minister to buttress his judgment. You said:

The Hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) made the point that the White Paper was not a Budget—

I think that Your Honour was right in saying that because that is what we all thought after what we were told.

Your Honour then rendered a ruling which only goes to prove that the Chair also was co-opted, just as all the rest of us in the House were co-opted, as was everyone in Canada who thought that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister were true when they said that there would be no Ways and Means motion, that this was not a budget but simply a White Paper.

It is not possible for Members of the House of Commons, who have a duty to perform to represent their people back home, to operate under false premises, to get ready for very important events, very important announcements and not to know exactly what is going to happen—as a matter of fact, to be fed information that is completely contrary to what later proved to be the case.

In that sense I would say that this is one of the most blatant examples of the rights and privileges of each and every Member of the House being trampled upon.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is why I am asking you to examine this question and to make a ruling. If, as I believe, you find that there is a prima facie question of privilege, I shall be ready to move the necessary motion to refer this whole matter to an appropriate committee of this House.

[English]

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the privileges of Members have been seriously compromised. As a tax practitioner for many years and as a Member of this House since 1978 I can say standing here in my place that we have been subjected to a budgetary process in all but name.

Going back to the time of James I we know the significance that is attached to budgetary measures which are the privilege of the House of Commons. One of those privileges is that we have a debate on a Budget. The question I raise, Your Honour, is this. Are we now in a position in the governing of this country where our Government is entitled to bootleg a budget in as a White Paper and remove the very significant privilege of a full six-day debate in the House?

In terms of Your Honour addressing this question of a violation of Members' privileges, I would like to add an additional point which I think is very significant. Drawing upon some of my own expertise, and I know of your own, Mr. Speaker, when I look at this paper, when I look at the Notice of Ways and Means, I see the changes in capital cost allowance and I see the imposition of sales tax. I see the changes that are taking place both under the regulations and through additional impositions of tax. I say that this has all the constituent elements of a budget. Not only does it have all the constituent elements of a budget legally, but the whole ambiance which we witnessed yesterday, the procedure with respect to a lock-up and the entire proceeding, has been that of a budget in all but name.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the privileges of Hon. Members here in the House are very seriously compromised if we accept this procedure, if we accept that a Government might present a real Budget and say simply that it is a white paper.

I, for one, Mr. Speaker, find this procedure totally unacceptable, and I should like to add the comment that if you should concede here that we do have a Budget, then we have the right, and I emphasize this point, we have the right to debate this Budget for six days here in the House.

• (1220)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the question that has been raised is extremely serious. As to whether it does constitute a serious question of privilege, there are three points that need to be stressed. The first point, of course, is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), in yesterday's Question Period, said with respect to last night's presentation that it "sets forth the general thrust of government thinking". He also said that "it does not, per se, take effect the very same day pursuant to a Ways and Means Motion". The words uttered were very clear and specific. Despite that, it is quite clear that very specific Ways and Means motions were in fact put before the House, some to take effect starting yesterday and others to take effect if the legislation is passed.

I think that, in itself, is a very clear indication that what we had was at least a falsehood stated by the Prime Minister yesterday. I think also it demonstrates to us that what was presented to the House was something quite different from what had been suggested to us, as a Chamber, by way of an excuse in respect of whether or not this was a group of 31 individuals or otherwise that had the chance to have that privileged access, and to justify that before the House.

There are two further points, Mr. Speaker, that have to be kept very much in mind in assessing this suggested question of privilege. The first is that with the package handed down last night came an "Economic and Fiscal Outlook". An economic and fiscal outlook document traditionally forms a part of a budget package. I have found that to be the case with every budget I have examined, both as an economic historian and as a Member of Parliament. It is not something that is part of a statement of general philosophy, as the Prime Minister has suggested this was. That is an important ingredient in the package that needs to be examined.

For me, Mr. Speaker, the thing which is most crucial, the fact which, frankly, bites most strongly at the integrity of this Government, is that the Ways and Means motions which took effect yesterday had a profound and direct effect on the economy of this country. There were certain tax changes which came into effect, certain changes which affected some sectors and which didn't affect others. And despite that reality, there were certain private individuals, individuals who were not part of the government bureaucracy of this country, individuals who were not part of the lock-up procedure, who were given the chance to have access to that information—information about tax changes and about changes which had to do with how different sectors would be treated—before that information was given either to the House or to the public.

Mr. Lewis: That was dealt with yesterday. You should have been here yesterday.

Mr. Langdon: The fact that such a step was taken is totally unprecedented, totally unacceptable. It is the type of thing that has led, as far as I have seen, to resignation. If a Minister of Finance gets into a position whereby he has let that kind of information out—

Mr. Lewis: Name one.

Mr. Langdon: That has happened in Great Britain, where only a single reporter saw the Budget documentation in advance. We have here a situation where a significant number of individuals across this country had information which no one else in this country had, private individuals, and as a result of having that information they had the chance to make adjustments in their portfolios of stocks and shares—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) has been addressing the point of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), and I am indebted to the Hon. Member for his contribution. However, for the last minute or two, the Hon. Member has been dealing with another matter. While that other matter has obviously attracted the attention of many Members of the Chamber and is in itself important, it is not the matter that the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques has raised.

The point of the question of privilege now raised relates to whether statements made by representatives of the Government in this Chamber were misleading; and if they were, did that impinge on the privileges of Hon. Members. That is the issue.

As to the question of some people outside of this place, albeit under oath, having information which other Canadians and Hon. Members did not have, I have of course already ruled.

The Hon. Member may have something to add, though I think I do have the gist of his remarks now. If he wishes to add something in closing, I shall be more than pleased to hear him.

Mr. Langdon: Just very briefly, Mr. Speaker. I was, of course, aware of your earlier ruling. What I suggested that made a difference is that we are now in a position where we can see that, contrary to statements which were made in the House yesterday, this clearly was a document which brought forth immediate Ways and Means motions which came into effect right away and which also will come into effect through legislation over a longer period of time.

The final point that I make, Mr. Speaker, is simply that this issue is, I think, a very serious question of privilege because of the very clear statements which had been made by the Prime Minister, as recorded in yesterday's Hansard. I would very much hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will be prepared to rule favourably in respect of this issue.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the question of privilege drew attention to the things which you outlined. However, the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) also pointed out that this is a matter which also impinges upon our ability to debate what really turned out to be a budget.

There is a great distinction between what is supposed to be a White Paper and a budget. It has such an impact that the difference can mean whether or not we will be able, on behalf of our constituents, to deal with something as fundamental as taxation in a budget debate or whether we are simply looking at a White Paper and having a discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the Hon. Member that I am listening carefully to his representations. I am also observing, with some interest, a ruling which I made.

Since I have risen, I just might remind Hon. Members, so that they need not labour the point—and perhaps the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) will be assisted in this—that I am very aware of what I said in my ruling yesterday, which is this:

> The Hon. Minister of Finance made the point that the White Paper was not a budget, that it is nothing more than a proposal and that it does not even represent budgetary policy. While I appreciate the distinction, I feel that the White Paper nevertheless has very important budgetary implications.

I think that pretty well sums up the substance of the complaint of the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques. I just draw it to the attention of Hon. Members because the Chair is very aware of it.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I believe it was the Hon. Member for Madawaska—Victoria (Mr. Valcourt) in Question Period today—and Your Honour can check the "blues"—who referred to it as a budget in answer to a question.

In any case, what I would like to bring to Your Honour's attention is that when the issue came up yesterday about whether or not our privileges were being violated by the 31 people having access, it was not merely a question of them being able to know, as Your Honour will recall, something ahead of time while they were under oath, it was also that they were being acquainted with facts, and this was an advantage, something apart from whether or not they were going to discuss it outside the lock-up. They were able to have advance knowledge about this budget, and this knowledge gave them a head start on their colleagues because they were given a chance ahead of time—

Mr. Speaker: I understand very well the point which the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence is making. It was of course argued extensively the other day. As Hon. Members know, I had to consider that and brought down a ruling yesterday in which I said that, while I was not commenting at all, one way or other, about the propriety of what was done, it was not a question of privilege.

The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques has raised a specific question of privilege, and I know the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence would want to address that specific point.

Mr. de Corneille: I quite understand that. I am not imputing anything in terms of these people saying something outside their oath. I am simply pointing out, Your Honour, that it is a case that these 31 people had more time to study it. Thus, when the deadline ended and the time was freed, they has then had access—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the Hon. Member, but I have heard argument on that exact point. I have already rendered a ruling in which I have said, whether they did or whether they did not, it is not a question of privilege. As I said in that ruling, whether it was appropriate that they did or did not is another question entirely.

However, the question of privilege raised here is whether or not statements were made by the Government yesterday which were not correct and, as a consequence, have created a situation in which the privilege of Hon. Members has been breached. Of course we know that privilege has been breached if something is done in this place that diminishes the capacity of other Hon. Members to do their duty. I would ask the Hon. Member to stay right on the point.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I would like simply to clarify the point I was making, that is, that Your Honour made a decision on that question of privilege yesterday based upon this information, namely, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had said: "it is not a Budget in the sense that it does not, per se, take effect the very same day pursuant to a Ways and Means Motion."

I was simply trying to observe that I think that particular subject was decided upon on the basis of Your Honour being convinced that this was not a budget. Even if this in effect is acceptable to you, it indeed has all the signs of a budget, not only legally in terms of the present House of Commons but also in terms of the fact that the entire situation was covered by the media as if it were a budget; it was covered by them in a major way. This means that I will not have the opportunity as a Member of Parliament, as I ought to if it is a budget, to debate this budget with my colleagues, to hear from my constituents what are their reactions to this situation, and to try to persuade the Government to withdraw this motion. That is my position.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity—and it will be reasonably brief—to address the question of privilege of the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault). The essence of his argument was that this is a budget and therefore his privileges have been breached. I would like to deal with this briefly, because I know my colleagues on the other side want to get on with the capital punishment debate. They do not want to see it delayed any further.

The question is this. Was it a White Paper or was it a budget? A budget is an annual financial statement. It is a one-year accounting of expenses and revenues. That was presented in February of this year. The White Paper does not bring any fundamental change to this year's budgetary policy as presented in the House in February. It does not seek any new borrowing authority. It does not reflect any new Supplementary Estimates.

Many times in the past—and for my friend's elucidation I will give him chapter and verse—Liberal Governments, of which my friend from Saint-Jacques was a member, have delivered major economic statements, some of which were accompanied by major Ways and Means motions. However, it was never in doubt that there was a difference between a budget and a financial statement.

We have examined the House rules, we have examined the parliamentary commentaries, and there is no question about it. A budget presentation is not a condition precedent to the introduction of a Ways and Means motion.

Citation 515 at page 174 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition reads as follows:

> There is no necessity to have a budget presentation before the introduction of Ways and Means legislation.

Because of the change to the Standing Orders, I may not have the up-to-date numbers. However, there are Standing Orders which allow the Minister of Finance to table a Ways and Means motion at any time without going through the normal budget process, in particular a budget debate.

For my friend's elucidation, I refer him to examples during recent Liberal administrations where Ways and Means motions were tabled which were not founded on a budget. I refer him specifically to the 95-paragraph Ways and Means motion tabled by Jean Chrétien on October 20, 1977 that followed his economic and fiscal statement.

I also refer him to the motions tabled by the Hon. Marc Lalonde following his October 27, 1982 economic statement which related to tax dividend, tax treatment of professionals, and in working progress.

It is evident that statements relating to the economy as well as statements containing proposals relating to the taxation system can be made in Parliament outside the formal budget presentation. In the last two decades, there have been six major presentations made in the House of Commons on economic or financial matters by Ministers of Finance. None of them, as in the case of the presentation last evening, constituted the budgetary policy of the then Government for the year in question.

We then must ask ourselves, what is a budget? I refer the Chair to Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Nineteenth Edition, at page 786 where Budget is defined:

> This statement, familiarly known as, "the Budget," is made when the Minister has completed his estimate of the probable income and expenditure for the financial year. In it the Chancellor of the Exchequer develops his views of the resources of the country, communicates his calculations of probable income and expenditure, and declares whether the burdens upon the people are to be increased or diminished.

Hence, Supplementary Estimates and Borrowing Authority. It goes on:

> The economic aspect of the Budget is important and taxes are imposed for their economic effects as well as for raising revenue to meet the expenditure for the year. The annual Financial Statement and Budget Report is made available immediately at the conclusion of the Budget Speech, as are the terms of the budget resolutions.

The elements of a Budget are as follows: views as to the resources of the country, calculations of probable income and expenditure and declarations as to whether or not the burdens upon the people are to be increased or decreased.

The House will know that during the time of this Government, there has been considerable study of the budgetary process. My hon. friend from Saint-Jacques will know that the first Budget presented by this Government was presented in June of 1985. The second Budget came after the review of the budgetary process wherein the committee encouraged the Government to present Budgets on a regular basis after consultation and to meld if possible the Estimates process with the budget process. That Budget came in February of 1986. The second time that happened was in February, 1987. I warrant that if my friend from Saint-Jacques is patient, the next time he sees a true Budget will be in February, 1988.

The principle is annuality. Each year, the Government says: "Here are our expenses, here are our revenues, do we need to borrow or not?"

I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the 1977 statement of the Hon. Jean Chrétien. It contained expenditure measures as well as taxation measures. Indeed, the Notice of Ways and Means motion had 95 paragraphs containing some very significant taxation proposals. Nevertheless, the budgetary process for that year had already been established. Therefore, it was not called a Budget.

We were all here on October 27, 1982, when the Hon. Marc Lalonde brought down the economic outlook and financial position of the Government of Canada. At that point, he was not ready to present a Budget for the period and he did not present it as a Budget but merely as an economic statement of certain measures. At that time, I did not hear the cry from the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques for a budget debate. At that time, it suited his purposes not to do so.

In conclusion, I say to the House that my hon. friend's point of privilege is based on the theory that last night's speech was a Budget. It is very clear that we have already had the Budget for the financial year of April 1, 1987, to March 31, 1988. We have had a budget debate. We are in the process of finalizing the legislation. I believe that there is no prima facie case of privilege, there is no actual case of privilege and I would ask that you rule accordingly.

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I know that you have been very patient to listen to most of the Members who made interventions, but I should like to make a very brief remark. When I put my case earlier there was a document I did not have with me but which I have now and from which I would like to quote. The quotation is not very long, four lines. At the same time it will show that the Parliamentary Secretary on the Government side does not seem to have understood the point I want to raise.

I do not want to discuss whether this is a Budget or not, although it is an interesting question. What is written in the notice I sent you is that I submit that there were misleading statements made in the House which affect the privileges of Hon. Members. And the most significant statement—there were a few which I pointed out earlier—appears at the bottom of page 7318 of yesterday's Hansard, right-hand column. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was answering a question put to him by the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I just want to read the last four lines because they are the most important part and what I would ask the Chair to consider. The Prime Minister described the exercise that was to take place last night as follows:

> It sets forth the general thrust of government thinking, but it is not a Budget in a sense that it does not, per se, take effect the very same day pursuant to a Way and Means Motion.

That is the whole problem. The Prime Minister told us that "it does not, per se, take effect the very same day," and he told us there would be no Ways and Means Motion. And that is what I would like the Chair to consider.

I shall refrain from using unparliamentary langage, but I must say, however politely, that this statement is certainly at variance with what actually happened later, at about 8 p.m., when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) rose in the House and made his statement—a Budget to some, a White Paper to others. In any event, there is certainly a problem when we compare the facts with the remarks made by the Prime Minister, which I just quoted.

My point is, that considering these obvious differences between the real situation and what was said by the Prime Minister, the Members of this House were misled and, as a result, were not adequately prepared to perform their role of responding to the measures tabled by the Minister of Finance. That is the main point of my argument, and I see no relevance in the reply given by the Parliamentary House Leader who is trying to establish that various kinds of economic statements have, on occasion, included the tabling of Ways and Means Motions. That I agree, but that is not the point I am trying to make. My point is that the Prime Minister failed to inform the House accurately. In fact, the information he gave was the direct opposite of what actually happened a few hours later.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with great care to the comments of the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary and others. I think that Hon. Members would approve if I reserved my decision because I want to look very carefully at the text, both in French and in English.

As I indicated in reading a short excerpt from my ruling of yesterday, the Chair may indeed have had some difficulty with the facts, if I can put it that way, whatever they were. Again I thank all Hon. Members and I shall return to the Chamber with a ruling as soon as I can.

I might also say that due to some pressing matters I would ask that you excuse me from the Chamber, and that is no disrespect to Members on a Friday afternoon. The Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) has a matter to raise in a few minutes and the Deputy Speaker will deal with that.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages, the Government's response to petitions, Nos. 332-2110 and 332-2426.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

PRESENTATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as vice-chairman of the committee I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans in both official languages. This report deals with the Small Craft Harbours Program and urges the Government to fund that program more properly.

Pursuant to Standing Order 99(2), the committee requests that the Government table a comprehensive response to this report.

HOLIDAYS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-260, and Act respecting Sir John A. Macdonald Day.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Members have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to introduce an amendment to the Holidays Act that would declare a national holiday on the second Monday in February entitled Sir John A. Macdonald Day. Canada's first Prime Minister, more than any other single individual, is responsible for the creation of the Canadian Confederation and a day set aside to honour him is long overdue. A holiday in February would be welcomed, I believe, by Canadians coming as it would between New Year's Day and Easter. I call on all Members, indeed all Canadians, who believe we should honour Sir John A. Macdonald, to support this Bill.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

OPPOSITION TO RESTORATION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a large number of residents of Elora and Fergus, Ontario, who believe that to kill people who kill people to show that killing people is wrong is morally indefensible. They share the belief that returning evil for evil contributes to the disintegration of the moral integrity and social well-being of the society in which it is introduced. They suggest that as a member in good standing of the United Nations Canada should be supporting the UN in its efforts to eradicate the death penalty in all nations of the world. They call upon Parliament to defeat the motion introduced in this House on February 13 supporting in principle the restoration of the death penalty.

SUPPORT FOR RESTORATION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of citizens of Calgary East and Canadians from all across our country the signatures of 1,991 people calling upon this Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment. These signatures, now totalling 14,000, represent the strong will of the Canadian people on this important issue.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of the citizens of my province and my riding, and Canadians from all across the country, a petition bearing 1,958 signatures calling upon this Parliament to pass the motion favouring the return of capital punishment.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Canadians from my riding of Grey—Simcoe and across our country, I am pleased to present a petition containing a further 2,018 signatures calling upon Parliament to pass the motion favouring the return of capital punishment for certain acts of planned and deliberate murder, and for the killing of police officers and prison guards. I do believe this is a continued reflection of the will of the Canadian people.

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry and Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a petition to present to the House on capital punishment. Citizens in British Columbia, particularly in my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin, indeed from across the country, 2,022 signatures in all, call upon this Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment. That brings the total to in excess of 18,000 signature on petitions presented to this House on this subject.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have the honour to present some 2,028 signatures on petitions sent to Parliament asking us to restore capital punishment. This brings the total to some 20,250.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS AT ARMED FORCES BASE GOOSE BAY

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of the City of Toronto concerned over NATO flight training at Goose Bay, disruption of the life of the people there, and the provocative and aggressive war-fighting action which it constitutes. They ask Parliament to ensure that the Prime Minister ends all low-level flight training at Goose Bay Canadian Forces Base and cease negotiations with NATO for the establishment of a larger base there.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): I also have a petition from a number of residents in Toronto concerned about the situation of refugees approaching Canada for protection. They say we need a system that will better protect them. They point out that such a system was proposed by the standing committee with support from all Parties as well as from the churches, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, and many other groups and individuals.

• (1300)

They call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada, and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

PROTECTION OF AUTO PACT SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have yet another petition to present with respect to the Auto Pact and the safeguards which are such a crucial part of that trade agreement with the United States. This petition is signed by workers from Windsor, Amherstburg, Woodslee, Essex, Oldcastle, Kingsville, Stoney Point, Cottam, Belle River, McGregor, and Tilbury. They call upon Parliament to make certain that in any free trade negotiations with the United States the safeguards in the Auto Pact are protected because they see this as crucial to thousands of jobs in the Essex—Windsor area.

This brings the total of petitioners on the subject from my constituency to nearly 8,000.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, question No. 127 will be answered today.

[Text]

TERM EMPLOYEES

Question No. 127—Mr. Attewell:

In 1985 and 1986, did the Public Service Commission employ any persons hired on a short-term basis under six months and, if so, by year (a) how many (b) what was the total cost?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): The distribution of term employees, subject to PSSRA 1-1, hired for a duration of six months or less and the salary cost are as follows:

Fiscal Year	Number of Hirings	Total Equivalent Annual Salary Cost at Time of Hiring

Equivalent annual salary is defined as the employee's rate of pay expressed as an annual amount. In other words, it is the amount an employee would receive over a month period.

*This amount represents the cost based on the assumption that employees are employed for the maximum six months.

[Translation]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 29

TAX REFORM STATEMENT—ALLEGED ABUSE OF PARLIAMENTARY PROCESS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose, pursuant to Standing Order 29, a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the abuse of the parliamentary process by the Government in misleading the House with regard to the nature of and circumstances surrounding its tax reform announcement yesterday which amounted to a Budget in every sense except in the recognition of the proprieties, both in the House and in the preparation.

If this had been presented, as it should have been, as a Budget, Members would have been entitled to a six-day debate. The method of presentation has deprived Members of a careful and public examination of these tax measures which were, however, carefully explained to 31 individuals who were not elected representatives of the people.

My proposal is that in view of the importance of the matter it deserves a full debate in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for her representations. The Chair has indeed received a notice pursuant to Standing Order 29. However, the Chair believes that the matter does not meet the requirements necessary for the Chair to approve a debate under Standing Order 29. Therefore, the Chair rejects the motion.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, before Question Period I had the opportunity to present what I hoped would be a case, not only for continuing debate on this issue but for ensuring that the large number of Canadians who are troubled by this issue would see the choices and options they have for coming to grips with this matter of violence in our society.

I want to spend the few minutes remaining addressing an issue which may trouble all Members of Parliament, as it does myself, and that is the responsibility Members of Parliament have in debate. I have heard other Members say that they have conducted public opinion polls in their riding and are, therefore, compelled to vote as those public opinion polls dictate. I believe that is an abdication of the role and responsibility of a Member of Parliament.

We recognize that while there is unquestionably an important responsibility to have dialogue, to consult, and to engage in the most active of exchange with one's constituents, there is certainly nothing in the traditions of Parliament which says that we must act as delegates of our constituents. We are, rather, representatives.

I find that argument troubling because it assumes that on certain preferred issues the role of a Member of Parliament is nothing more than a computer or video screen which records the instantaneous photograph of opinion as it may be. There is no responsibility for leadership, direction, or to try to open up to public purview the issues and elaborations of them which must necessarily be brought about.

There is a curious logic at work which says that we should accept statements of Members of the House who advocate capital punishment simply because they reflect public opinion. If that is the belief of members of the Conservative Party, I suggest that they should respond to Canadian public opinion, 75 per cent of which wants to get rid of the Government.

I presume Conservative Members are not ready to initiate that particular voluntary form of resignation. They say that over time they will change public opinion, over time they will show Canadians that they know what they are doing. However, with regard to capital punishment they say that they cannot do that. They deny that logic. They reject that position saying that they must respond to public opinion.

I do not think public opinion is overwhelmingly one-sided on this issue. I am receiving a large volume of correspondence in my constituency which is approximately two-thirds against capital punishment based upon reason. In the few minutes I have remaining I would like to cite some examples for Members to take into account.

In some ways the correspondence which has impressed me most is that which I received from a group of twelve year olds in grade 6 at the Brock-Corydon School in the French immersion program. I received 50 or 60 letters from those young people. Reading their letters makes me understand that capital punishment is a fundamental issue for them because it demonstrates to them what society might represent to them. Overwhelmingly they tell me to vote against it, that they do not want to live in a society which says that revenge is a rightful motive for the state.

I would like to quote a very distinguished member of my constituency, the Reverend Bernard Pinet from the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate who has worked for many years with prison reform in our community. He said:

The real issue in the death penalty debate is the question of values upon which we want to build our society. If killing is wrong, then the state should not adopt the very immoral act it is repudiating.

Since the state would be killing on my behalf, an execution would make me an accomplice in a premeditated and deliberate murder.

I do not want the state to kill in my name. I do not want to teach children that violence is an acceptable solution to human conflict.

I do not want to live in a society that responds to evil with evil, to violence with violence. Human life is sacred. No one's life is expendable.

I could spend the rest of the afternoon reading from those views, which I believe clearly demonstrate why public opinion polls should not be a matter that is taken into account in this debate as we each answer to our own conscience. We must determine what is really the proper stand to take.

• (1310)

Let me conclude by recalling the play Elmer Gantry.

I remember Elmer Gantry, the great evangelist, preaching hell, fire and damnation and someone standing aside saying: "That man is so busy preaching what is right he forgets what is good". I hope Members of the House will not forget what is good, which is to vote against this motion.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, the Member said that the response in two-thirds of his mail is against capital punishment. The situation in my riding is the opposite, yet I have been against capital punishment from the beginning, when 88 per cent of the Canadian population seemed to be for capital punishment. The numbers are declining, perhaps because people are beginning to think twice about what it means. I am pleased that the Hon. Member pointed out the difference between representing a riding and simply following the wishes of people in the riding who perhaps may have drawn a conclusion as a result of lack of information or by reacting emotionally.

However, I disagree with the Hon. Member who seemed to put all members of the Government in the same category, when he said that we are trying to limit debate. I would prefer that rather than put it in such a partisan political manner, he should remember that there are a significant number of Members on this side of the House who are against capital punishment but who also realize that in this parliamentary system when business goes through slowly there are certain Standing Orders available for the Government to use. I agree with the Hon. Member that we do not want them abused, but we should not be too hasty in saying they are being abused at the moment.

I want to refer to Hansard of April 4, 1966, to a speech by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker who was quoting John Donne, the great English poet. He said:

Any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind.

[English]

He went on to quote John Bright, who was a parliamentarian from a previous century who said:

A deep respect for human life has much more value to prevent a murder than a thousand executions. It in fact can provide the greatest security to human life. Capital punishment, while feigning to show respect, tends in fact to suppress it.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) both for her comments and her questions. I pay tribute to her stand, particularly in light of the representations that are being made.

I believe she represents exactly the kind of Member of Parliament I was describing, who comes to a decision and uses this debate as an opportunity to broaden the understanding of this very crucial issue among constituents. I compliment her not just because of her stand but in the way she approaches it.

The reason I was somewhat harsh in my statement about the motion of closure is that it was put forward by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), and we learn from experience that the Deputy Prime Minister takes such action on the part of the Government. I certainly recognize that there are many members of the Conservative Party who have spoken.

Let me say that I was very moved several weeks ago after listening to the speech by my Manitoba colleague, the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), who dramatically stated that after reviewing the evidence he changed his mind.

My remarks were certainly not meant to be partisan in that sense. I was attempting to say that members of the Conservative Party in the government caucus have their own ability to influence the Deputy Prime Minister and others in the executive who will be making decisions about time allocation. They have an opportunity to use that influence to persuade the Government into ensuring that this Parliament does not hastily make a judgment before the right moment arrives when this Parliament, in its manner of debate, is ready to make that decision. I trust the good judgment of the Hon. Member for Gatineau and I know she will be able to use her own persuasive talents in that respect. I apologize if it seemed that I was explicitly referring to those Members. I was suggesting that it was the Deputy Prime Minister who made that motion and I was making a general appeal in that respect.

In response to her last comment, I wish that in some ways we had the eloquence of a John Diefenbaker these days to make the case. There was probably no finer parliamentarian and I know of his incredible commitment to this issue. He was, in effect, one of the pioneers in this country in the last few decades who set in motion the evolution of the debate to the point where capital punishment was abolished in 1976.

He was able to capture that argument in his quotes from John Donne and John Bright. Incidentally, John Bright was a Grit Member of the British Parliament at the time. He was a non-conformist, protesting Member in the tradition of the Grit Party. It is a tradition in which I still strongly believe and perhaps have demonstrated by recent examples. The point they were making is that the purpose of a legislature or parliament is to show a basic respect for the sanctity of rules and laws. If we revert to the kind of system that has been practised in Iran, Chile or in the Soviet Union, it will not provide the enlightened example that will provide a model for our children.

That is why it is so important we speak out in this debate. I only hope and trust that the views of the Hon. Member for Gatineau, as she speaks from her side of the House, will be taken into account by her colleagues. The arguments of the John Diefenbakers, John Brights and John Dunns of this world are in a very great tradition which I hope we will not break by supporting this resolution.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I would have a question for my colleague. I would like to tell him that I also am against capital punishment, but I am quoting Andrei Sakharov, a very well known Soviet dissident, who said:

> I consider capital punishment as a savage, immoral institution. If a state, through its officials, usurps the right to commit the most horrible and irreparable act—the deprivation of life, such a state cannot expect an improvement in the nation's moral environment.

As a responsible politician of this country—because all Members, whatever their party, are responsible for managing the country and for making legislation—does the Hon. Member think that supporting capital punishment then transferring that supreme power of life and death to civil servants—since the House is never involved in the actual sentencing of murderers—is in fact an improvement or a regression for society?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I am once more in agreement with the Hon. Member, but his statements about symbols relating to amendments in the Bill are quite important for the understanding of what society would have for itself.

• (1320)

I want to point out the importance of the decision we take in this House because the debate will not stop here. One of the most grinding and excruciatingly painful results of the restoration of a capital punishment motion would be the transfer in part of the same kind of debate time and time again to the Cabinet of Canada to exercise its so-called royal prerogative for clemency. The history of this country has shown over time, from statements of members of the Cabinets of past years, just what a deep and incredibly gut-wrenching responsibility that was for Cabinet repeated over and over again, to say nothing of all the other people in the system. I think it debilitates the system after a while. It begins to erode the sense that if there is a law, there is a law, and if there are all kinds of ways of getting around the law by clemency or by finding other ways of sentencing, then the value of what they are proposing would be lost over time.

On the other hand, I would say, like Zakharov, that the fact the Government itself stands up against it, is a step forward. I use the example of my Leader that it was only a 100 years ago that some 200 crimes were punishable by death. The fact that we have now eliminated that is perhaps the best example of the progress this society has made. That is why in a way for Canada to become the first country which abolished capital punishment and then gone back to it would be a terrible statement to make for future generations.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my position on the resolution before this House arises out of a very careful consideration of the various issues surrounding this most difficult and divisive subject. During the past few months, I have made particular effort to make myself available to the constituents of Kitchener, participating in four debates and attending some 15 different meetings. Additionally, I have conducted an admittedly unscientific sampling of my constituency through a household questionnaire. Of approximately 2,600 respondents, 55 per cent are in favour of the resolution before this House and 45 per cent are opposed.

While I have learned much from these very sincere people on both sides of this debate, I must now cast my vote with a simple "yes" or "no". Briefly stated, I am convinced that there are compelling theological legal and social reasons for providing the state with the option of exercising capital punishment in cases of first-degree murder, with judicial discretion for mercy where circumstances warrant.

Section 212 to Section 215 of the Criminal Code defines first-degree murder as, first, all planned or premeditated murder; second, the killing of a police officer; third, the killing of a prison guard; and, four, the killing of one or more persons while committing another offence such as rape or theft. I am not in favour of capital punishment for second-degree murder or manslaughter.

I should now like to elaborate on my position by responding, within the limited time available to me, to those concerns invariably raised in any discussion of capital punishment. It is often argued that capital punishment is state-endorsed murder and that all murder is wrong. This viewpoint is expressed by the popular slogan: "Why kill people who kill people to prove that killing people is wrong?" However, I would submit that this position rests on the false premise that all killing is murder. It is a premise which is simply not true. Historically, a clear distinction has been made between killing in situations such as accidental death, self-defence, war, the killing of a policeman in the line of duty, on the one hand, and a planned and deliberate murder on the other.

All killing, I would submit, is not murder, any more than all sexual intercourse is rape. On the contrary, just as rape is the violent rejection of, and a rebellion against, the dignity of the person and the institution of marriage, murder is a violent rejection of, and rebellion against, the sanctity of human life and the state's legitimate interest in law and order.

I will say more concerning a Biblical perspective, but it is worth noting here that the best scriptural manuscripts render the sixth commandment: "You shall not commit murder". This is important because it helps us to avoid an erroneous scriptural justification for the invalid premise that all killing is murder. Second, the claim is sometimes made that capital punishment is the violent act of a barbaric and uncivilized society and as such debases every member of that society. This viewpoint rests on the false premise that all killing is uncivilized and barbaric.

As I have just argued, historically and at present, killing is allowed in many instances, just to name one for example, that of self-defence. This cannot be construed as violent, barbaric or uncivilized. Indeed, to assert that judicial execution on grounds of premeditated murder is an act of violence or barbarism is to deny society the right to impose a just penalty for the ultimate violation of laws designed to uphold civilized order. Further, it is to invert completely the very meaning and process of civilization itself.

Often underlying these two concerns is the belief that capital punishment cannot be reconciled with Christian love and mercy. While a detailed Biblical and theological analysis is beyond the scope of these brief remarks, nevertheless I feel I am bound to make some effort to outline my position on this important matter. I believe the Bible clearly provides for capital punishment as an option for the state in cases of premeditated murder. There is no disagreement that this is the case in the Old Testament where at least three principles may be found: first, there is a clear delineation between accidental and premeditated murder: second, the death sentence can only be applied if the murder is substantiated by two or more witnesses: and, third, failure to execute is disobedience to God.

In the New Testament, Romans 13:1-7 and I Peter 2:13-15 are two of the clearest scriptural expressions of God's will regarding his mandate for the state. In Romans 12:19 we read personal vengeance is prohibited and we are instructed to leave room for God's wrath. Just five verses later, in Romans 13:3 and 4, it is clear that one way in which God may exercise his wrath is through the civil authority which "does not bear the sword for nothing" and is "God's servant, an agent of his wrath, to bring punishment on the wrongdoer". The Apostle Paul explicitly recognized this authority in according the state the right to exercise capital punishment upon himself should he be found "guilty of doing anything deserving death", (Acts 25:10-11).

In spite of the foregoing, some Christians have summoned other New Testament texts to argue against capital punishment. I am particularly concerned by attempts to apply the Sermon on the Mount in this regard. Certainly the words of Jesus concern the conduct expected from the Christian even when victimized. However, they neither preclude nor contradict the fact that God, true to his character, will exercise his judgment upon the guilty offender. As I stated earlier, one means by which his judgment upon crime may take place is through the state, instituted by God for law, order and the protection of life.

Additionally, to suggest that Jesus takes a position on capital punishment in John 8:l-11, is to bypass completely the fundamental significance of this encounter recorded by John. The explicit intent of the Pharisees' question was to trap and thereby accuse Jesus. If he said "no", he violated the Mosaic law. If he said "yes", he violated Roman law, which prohibited the Jews from executing anyone, a right reserved for Roman authorities alone, according to John 18:31. Therefore, given the express nature of the question, the words of Jesus are directed at the sin of the Pharisees and the adulterous woman. They are not a comment on capital punishment.

We all know that God is love. But God is also holy, just and righteous. The position we take on capital punishment must be scripturally faithful and theologically orthodox with respect to the doctrines of God, man, sin, salvation and judgment.

As we seek to interpret Scripture and have Scripture interpret us, it is evident that the presuppositions that we bring to Scripture our textual analysis and our application on personal, ecclesiastical, social or political levels, or on a topic such as this, must be guided by all of Scripture according to II Timothy 3:16 and not just a verse taken out of context here or there. To do otherwise is to leave oneself vulnerable to positions which are neither biblical nor Christian. Indeed, I fear that much of the so-called Christian love and mercy which is cited as an argument against capital punishment has unwittingly fallen captive to the permissiveness of liberal humanism.

Four, some argue that capital punishment is not a deterrent. Proponents of this position often seek to support their case by pointing to the fact that since the abolition of capital punishment in 1976, the annual total homicide rate has gone down from 711 in 1977 to 561 by the end of 1986, a decline of 21 per cent. We must remember that approximately two-thirds of these murders are second-degree and therefore would not be subject to the death sentence in any case. However, first-degree murder statistics actually increased during those very same years from 202 in 1977 to 260 in 1986, an increase of 29 per cent. Those are the real statistics for this debate.

I do not understand why abolitionists always use the total murder rates focusing upon the total murder statistics only. It appears to me that they are being very highly selective in their use of statistics.

What is an acceptable murder statistic in any case? Surely, when we look at how many murders are acceptable in any one year the answer has to be that one is too many.

To suggest that capital punishment does not deter is to call into question the deterrence effectiveness of all penalties, be they for murder, rape, theft or speeding. Permit me to use an illustration, that of driving a car beyond the speed limit. It is easy to find out how many people were killed by speeding, but we will never know how many were saved by speed limits, by radar traps, by fines, or by earning demerit points and therefore having slowed down. Since we cannot prove the deterrence effects of these measures, does that mean we should discard them? If we must abolish the death penalty because it does not eliminate murder, surely we must abolish prison terms because they do not eliminate bank robberies or whatever criminal example one wants to use.

Five, abolitionists maintain that the ever-present possibility that one innocent person could be executed is reason enough to exclude all capital punishment. I can sympathize with that concern. However, if we were to govern all of our decision-making according to the logic of this particular law of probability, then all penalties for all crimes would have to be removed because there is always some possibility of an erroneous conviction. Abolitionists, nevertheless, argue that there is a unique irrevocability to the death penalty which ought to exempt it from such logic.

However, there is no record of any innocent Canadian having been executed since Confederation. The Marshall case is inadmissible since he was convicted of second-degree murder. There is a much greater risk that some innocent victims will be murdered by convicted murderers who murder once again. According to the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, since 1970 alone, at least six murders fall into this category. Therefore, six Canadians would be alive today had their murderers been executed the first time they murdered.

Therefore, I submit that this particular objection is more properly addressed with respect to the administration of justice, not capital punishment per se.

A sixth area of concern of some abolitionists is that capital punishment may be arbitrarily and inconsistently applied with a racial and/or socio-economic bias. Again, if this is a problem, it is a problem in the administration of justice and not with capital punishment per se. Once it is decided that, in and of itself, capital punishment is a just and reasonable response to first-degree murder, then it must be administered without regard to race, colour or socio-economic status.

While the foregoing comprise some of the major objections that have been raised against capital punishment, others have also been raised. Some abolitionists argue that support for capital punishment is incompatible with a pro-life stance on abortion. To be pro-life with regard to abortion is to be in favour of the protection of all innocent life. To be in favour of capital punishment is to affirm the protection of all innocent life and to say: "If you carry out a pre-meditated murder, you forfeit your right to life".

What is contradictory is that so many abolitionists are pro-abortion. What is in fact hypocritical of some in the NDP is that they enlist the support of some Roman Catholic spokesmen for their abolitionist position and yet they then turn a deaf ear to the Roman Catholic unequivocal condemnation of abortion.

It is also argued that the Charter affirms the right to life. This is true, but all rights upheld in the Charter are subject "to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". Additionally, "everyone has the right to life . . . and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

Some abolitionists maintain that the proponents of capital punishment should be prepared to execute. I respectfully submit that such an argument is no more logical than insisting that all proponents of law and order must be prepared to become prison guards and policemen. Further, any suggestion that all proponents of law and order somehow take pleasure at an individual being fined or imprisoned is nonsensical.

Further, it is argued that acceptance of capital punishment would align Canada with such countries as Libya, Iran and South Africa. This guilt-by-association argument is only valid if acceptance of capital punishment, of necessity, means Canada thereby accepts in total the principles and the policies of all of those countries which also have capital punishment. This is clearly absurd.

Some abolitionists say that capital punishment is the easy way out, we should find other solutions to the problems of law and order, including murder. I agree that the ongoing battle of maintaining law and order must be fought on many fronts. That is why, for example, I applaud the Government's tough pornography legislation. Pornography desensitizes, dehumanizes and treats humans as things to be selfishly used and discarded, and thereby contributes to violence. However, while there may be many other solutions to social disorder, such as stricter hand-gun controls, this does not preclude the fact that the death penalty should be one such solution as a justifiable and necessary response to first-degree murder.

Further, some abolitionists claim that every murder represents a failure of society and that society must acknowledge its guilt. I reject that assumption. As a Conservative, I also do not believe in the liberal or socialist assumptions about the innate goodness of man, of progress toward some utopian concept of society, or of the causes of crime as primarily environmental, sociological, economic or due to a lack of reason. Rather, I believe that each person must be held responsible for his actions and must be willing to suffer the consequences, albeit sometimes tempered by mercy.

The increase in violent crime since 1962 is alarming. The facts are very clear. We are witnessing an increase in the first-degree murder rate up 29 per cent since 1967 and up two and a half times since 1962, the last year of any executions in Canada, while the total population has increased by only 11 per cent. According to the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, the annual incidence of crimes of violence rose by 498 per cent since 1962. Over the same period of time, the annual incidence of attempted murder rose from 83 to 890, an increase of 1,012 per cent. Additionally, according to Metropolitan Toronto Police Officer, Staff Sargeant Frank Craddock, the murders he has investigated since 1982 were the most violent and vicious he had ever seen. Recent evidence also suggests that the number of victims who are total strangers to the murderer is on the rise.

Therefore, I support capital punishment as one means of restoring harmony within society and in order to re-establish respect for life, by requiring the life of the murderer who ignored the sanctity of life.

My conviction is based upon the assumption that society has the God given responsibility to protect the sanctity of life, to establish clear boundaries for human behaviour, and to maintain justice, peace, law and order.

Historically, Mr. Speaker, we have portrayed justice as a blindfolded lady, seated and holding a pair of balance scales in exact equilibrium. Premeditated murder does violence to that equilibrium, throwing it off balance. The death penalty restores that equilibrium and offers society the assurance, at least to a degree, that harmony and balance will be restored.

I shall vote in favour of the resolution because there are occasions when capital punishment is the only just response to the premeditated murder of another human being.

Permit me to conclude, Mr. Speaker, with a quotation from Carl F. Henry's book entitled The Christian Mindset in a Secular Society, at page 134, as follows:

> Legislation that professes to be humanitarian while it lightens the seriousness of criminal offenses is a service neither to God nor to man. The primary purpose of punishment is not the reform of the offender but the vindication of the right and the peace and safety of society. A society that finds no basis for capital punishment retains only a shadow of biblical sensitivities to the worth of human life and readily elevates the value of the survival of criminals above that of their victims.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) has mentioned the Bible, and he relies heavily on the Holy Scriptures to justify his arguments in favour of capital punishment. Let me read for him this statement of the Canadian Episcopate. "We feel that it is improper to use biblical quotations, especially from the Old Testament, as justifications for upholding the death penalty. Those biblical texts, which support death penalty, should be considered against the background of historical conditions when they were written. They cannot be transposed litterally to the present situation in Canada". This quotation, Mr. Speaker, is taken from the Bishop's Council, volume 6, no. 3, page 67, dated February 26 1973.

My Hon. colleague for Kitchener mentioned the Marshall case, and we say: The Marshall case has nothing to do with it. In that case, whether he was condemned for second or first degree murder, there was a miscarriage of justice. Justice is not infallible. What he implies is that because it is a first degree murder, we will always be assured that no mistake is to be made in sentencing the individual because the judges handing the sentence as well as the jurors in the case will be infallible and because he himself is infallible in deciding in this House that no mistake could possibly be made.

I would like to have his views on these words written by Victor Hugo, and I quote: "Three things belong to God and not to man: the irrevocable, the irreparable, and the indissoluble". Irreparable punishment implies an infallible judge. And I would like to know if my hon. colleague agrees with me that for a judge to be able to sentence a human being, however dreadful his crime, whether he agrees with me that that individual, that judge, that jury have to be infallible.

[English]

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to try to respond, through you, to my colleague's questions.

The first point he makes is that the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops has made the statement that, during the course of this debate, we should not be making as much reference to the Old Testament as we are.

If my colleague will check the notes of my speech later, he will find that my references to the Old Testament comprise only about ten lines, with my references to the New Testament comprising about two pages.

So, I submit that I have not over-emphasized the Old Testament.

The Hon. Member went on to speak of the administration of justice and the possibility of error. I agree that there is the possibility of error. We are fallible human beings. I accept that possibility of error. However, I make the point that we have to look at what might cause an error. Some of the cause of the problem is in the administration of justice. That is something that we have to work at improving. We always have, and we always will.

That is one of the responses. It is a problem more for the administration of justice as opposed to what the penalty should or should not be.

I readily agree that there is the possibility of error; but, I point out that since Confederation there is no record of any innocent Canadian ever being executed for first-degree murder. So, thus far we have had no such error, though I do admit that the possibility exists. The need to uphold the sanctity of life demands that the option of capital punishment be available. With all of the safeguards built into the system, it is something that I would support.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from Hansard of February 18, 1960 when the great jurist and then Member for Parkdale, Mr. Arthur Maloney, said: "The death penalty is out of date; it is not an answer, nor will it ever be. The slow march of civilization has brought us to a point in our history where we should be ready here and now to vote in favour of its abolition."

And along the same line, the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker was recalling the progress of our civilization when he said: "Throughout the western world, it was in Canada that slavery was abolished for the first time in 1803. It is a prodigious record, coming as it did 40 years before slavery was abolished in the United Kingdom, and even longer before the date of its abolition in the United States."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have the tradition of an advanced civilization, and I fail to see how my colleague can claim that reinstating capital punishment spells further progress for this civilization which is already headed in the right direction.

[English]

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, both Mr. Maloney and Mr. Diefenbaker expressed their opinions on this issue, as they were entitled to do. They had every right to make their case as best they could, as do each of us have the right to make our case as best we can.

Arthur Maloney may have said that it is never right to apply the death penalty, and he had that right. To my mind, in order to re-establish respect for life, it is necessary to have the option of capital punishment. In that way, the death penalty can be invoked where the circumstances warrant. That is what I am speaking in favour of.

The Hon. Member referred to the fact that we as a society were well ahead of others when it came to the question of slavery, and she wishes to compare that to the issue of capital punishment. I say that they are two different issues. If she wishes to compare capital punishment with another topic, let me ask her why it is that so many of those on the abolitionist side are in favour of abortion. I could submit to her that we should be the first nation to come to grips with the facts surrounding abortion and deal with that issue.

Mrs. Mailly: We have.

Mr. Reimer: By doing so, we would start to uphold the sanctity of life. I would like to see Canada lead the way on the whole question of abortion, and I would like to have the Hon. Member's support for that.

To compare slavery to capital punishment is to compare apples and oranges. The two do not compare.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata), on a question or comment.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, regardless of what the Hon. Member may say, capital punishment, in my view, is the mark of an uncivilized and immoral society.

I find it difficult to follow his logic, his reasoning. It appears obvious that his logic is somewhat flawed. One would question the hon. gentleman's credibility when on one hand he supports capital punishment and on the other hand he is opposed to abortion. In his submissions he suggested that members of the New Democratic Party were hypocritical because they are generally abolitionists and they are generally in favour of abortion on demand.

I would suggest to the Hon. Member that he is just as hypocritical as those members of the New Democratic Party who believe on one hand that human life is sacred and on the other hand that it is not.

I just cannot accept the Hon. Member's submission that on one hand life is sacred. If life is sacred, it is sacred, which means that it should not be taken regardless of how miserable that life may be.

He said with regard to abortion that we were talking about innocent life and therefore we should not be able to take innocent life, and he said with regard to capital punishment that somehow the person's life is not innocent. Who are we as mortals to determine the guilt of another human being resulting in the death penalty?

The Hon. Member seems to favour retribution as the basis of our criminal justice system. In effect what he is saying to the House is that he favours our criminal justice system being based on an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. We have progressed tremendously over the last—

Mrs. Mailly: Two thousand years.

Mr. Nunziata: —two thousand years, as the Hon. Member is suggesting. However, the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) is suggesting that we should return to the law of the jungle and in fact take an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

Would the Hon. Member explain the apparent hypocrisy in his position in that he argues human life is sacred, he says abortion is wrong, and he says capital punishment is right?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, in response to the comments of the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata), let me say that he quoted my use of the word "hypocritical" but he misapplied it. I am going to give it back to him the way I said it, not the way he misapplied it. What in fact is hypocritical by some in the NDP is that they enlist the support of some Roman Catholic spokesmen for their abolitionist position. That is what I said.

Then I went on to say that they turn a deaf ear to that same source, the Roman Catholic Church, which is unequivocal in its condemnation of abortion. That is what I meant by "hypocritical".

If anybody is hypocritical in here, maybe it is in his mind. I think my comments stand and they are very clear.

Further, he went on to say other things such as favouring revenge or retribution. I never used the word. It was not in my speech. I do not know from where he is getting it. It is in his mind. If he could not follow the logic, maybe the problem is in his mind, in his flawed logic. Perhaps that is where the problem resides.

What I am trying to say is that there is a time when the crime of premeditated murder requires a just response. To me the only just response to a premeditated murder is to take the person's life who ignored the sanctity of life and thereby restore the value of life.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the preceding speaker has quoted certain verses from the Bible which he believes justify the execution of those who commit first degree murder. Although I respect his attention to the Scripture and to the detail of the argument which he and the associates in his riding to whom he referred have developed, I will not be trading verse for verse argument with him, because I also live and work within the context of my church, the Anglican Church, in which we study the Bible thoroughly.

The Anglican Church, like the United Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and most Christian bodies, finds that the Christian tradition including the Bible opposes the death penalty, and I oppose it.

I would add also, by the way, that at least two police chiefs oppose it. I do not know what their religious views may be. One of them is responsible for Quebec City; the other is responsible for the City of Montreal. I hardly think that one can accuse either of them of being naive about the problems associated with murder, and they oppose the death penalty.

What I find quite curious about this debate is that in the middle of March an Angus Reid poll showed that Canadians were asked to indicate the most important issues facing Canada. Only 5 per cent of those who responded cited capital punishment as the most important issue. They placed capital punishment at the bottom, after unemployment, after the economy, after refugees and immigration, after the deficit, after disarmament, and after the question of government honesty. I think it is unfortunate that at a time when we are pressed for time to accomplish government business, the Government has chosen to enforce that this shall be debated ahead of many of those urgent subjects.

However, since the Government has so ordered, I wish to make my comments within the time left to me now, and I hope I will be able to pick up my remaining time on Monday morning.

Although I regret the fact that this debate is happening because I think it is unnecessary in the basic sense, nevertheless there may be some good result coming out of it. It may be that we have to ask ourselves: Why does this come up again and again?

As the debate has moved along inside and outside Parliament, I can see that many people are being forced to examine not just the theoretical subject but their own feelings and approaches to the subject. We can all be enabled to examine ourselves on the question of why this question has arisen again.

Three years ago, when I spoke against a Private Member's Bill which would have restored the death penalty, I spoke about anger as a motivation. We know that anger may be justified by events. It may be natural and necessary to feel anger as a response to some evil action. However, what we do with that anger, what action we take arising out of it, is something else.

Personally I know that too often in the last half century I have not handled my feelings of anger very well. Some Hon. Members of course have heard me say things in anger that I then regretted. I regretted it not only if someone hit back at me, but even if they did not; sometimes more so if they did not. In other words, there are times when I know I have done more harm to myself personally by my anger than to anyone else.

I also spoke about the anger of people who are upset that people are killed in auto accidents partly caused by booze, partly caused sometimes by automobiles negligently built in an unsafe way. They are upset by people who are killed by safety hazards at work that were known to the employer before the accidents happened and could have been corrected but were left unsafe in order to save money. We have yet to hear in our country of an employer being appropriately prosecuted, certainly an employer accused of manslaughter, let alone murder, in cases like that.

That sort of anger left unremedied, unanswered, unsatisfied, can affect a whole society. It can embitter working relations. It can embitter our social relations. It can even skew the administration of justice itself. That sort of anger, when we do not deal with it in some remedial way—and that is the important point I want to stress—can express itself in a violent spirit that looks for a scapegoat. Find someone, punish him and that will make us all feel better for the moment. Find anyone, preferably someone without friends and hurt him, kill him, hang him, nuke him, nuke all of them. That is the situation that must be remedied and I hope to go on with that subject on Monday morning because I believe it is now 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock, pursuant to order made June 12, 1987, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SOIL EROSION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a coherent, comprehensive policy and plan of action to respond to the threat of soil erosion posed to Canada's agricultural land, as described in "Soil at Risk" and "Soil Degradation in Canada".

He said: I would like to offer some brief historical background to this motion because it is important to put it in an historical context. Some three years ago, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry undertook to examine soil and water conservation in Canada and reported in June of 1984.

It is interesting to note what Senator Sparrow, the Chairman of that committee, said at the time. He concluded:

The Committee's major purpose in this report is to take the reader on the equivalent of an airplane ride over Canada to make clear what soil degradation is and how serious it is in all regions of the country. By increasing the awareness of this situation the committee hopes to make soil conservation a national issue. Our soils are at risk. Our future is eroding.

He ended with this very important statement:

It is time for action.

Some of the conclusions of the report were that soil conservation cannot be dealt with in isolation from related issues such as water quality, land use in particular, wildlife management or fisheries and forestry. Second, it concluded that existing policies not necessarily directed at soils can have the effect of discouraging good soil management. Third, there is a need for further basic research on the causes and effects of soil degradation. Finally, while information has been and is now available on soil conservation, the transfer of this information and the accompanying technology to the farmer is the real key to a successful conservation effort.

Last year, the Science Council of Canada produced a report with the intent of drawing to Canada's attention the fact that soil degradation is a serious problem. Although the subject requires further research, the Science Council commented, the evidence and opinions collected in all parts of the country indicate that soil degradation endangers Canada's agricultural competitiveness and capability. The economic costs of leaving the problem unresolved, the Science Council concluded, will be high. The problem therefore is not just one for farmers, it affects the wellbeing of all Canadians.

The Science Council went on to point out that its recommendations should be implemented within the context of an integrated land-management program and a national soils policy, both of which are essential if the damage caused by soil degradation throughout Canada's farmlands is to be reversed. The report of the Council which I would dearly like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, elaborates further on the concept of a national soils policy. It suggests that it is required to provide a framework for evaluating other policy initiatives and to ensure that all government policies foster soil conservation.

The experts tell us that there are five major types of soil degradation: erosion caused by wind and water, soil salinization, the process of acidification of soil, compaction and finally the loss of organic matter. The economics of this process are staggering. Experts are telling us that soil degradation is an insidious problem that occurs in all parts of Canada and that the cost has been estimated at over $3 million per day or some $1.3 billion annually, something like 38 per cent of net farm income. As Hon. Members know, for many farmers the cost of soil degradation represents the difference between profit and loss.

The Science Council reports further by saying that the losses from soil degradation on the Prairies now exceed $1 billion annually and 20 years from now could exceed $2.7 billion. It says that by the year 2005, the cumulative cost to the Canadian economy could exceed some $42 billion. This would be the cost to the Canadian economy if we do not put into place a plan of action as called for in my motion.

These losses represent as well the cumulative impact of losses in productivity due to soil degradation and the expenditures by farmers in response to the deterioration of their land by the use of fertilizers, pesticides, drainage, irrigation and so on.

The question that then arises is where are we now? Following the release of these two reports by the Science Council and by the Senate Committee, reports entitled "Soil at Risk" and "The Growing Concern" respectively, there has been some progress in raising public awareness. For example, National Soil Conservation Week which began on April 13 of this year was a useful tool in developing awareness, but only a few concrete actions. For instance, there has been a soil and water environment enhancement program signed by the Province of Ontario with Canada in May of last year. This agreement allocated $30 million under the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement to reducing phosphorous loading into Lake Erie from farm run-off. Soil and water conservation subagreements were written into the agreements between the Government of Canada and the Governments of Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. I welcome these developments because evidently the fact that soil erosion found its way into ERDA agreements is a good sign.

By and large, these agreements have not included large amounts of money or new programs. The National Agricultural Strategy released in November of this year by the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and his provincial counterpart devotes one page to soil conservation. If one looks at that document, one must conclude that its three recommendations to establish programs, improve federal-provincial coordination and establish local water and soil conservation are beautifully written but where is the political will behind this general statement of intent? Where is the support and funds badly needed? Until funds are earmarked for this specific purpose, this will remain simply a statement of intent. I wonder whether anything has been done since that statement of intent was expressed by the federal-provincial Ministers of Agriculture. I am told that they are still living in the world of good intentions.

The present policies that are pursued by Departments federally and provincially are often at odds with the principles of soil and water conservation and tend also to work against the remedial action that is needed to correct soil erosion and soil damage. For instance, in many provinces there are drainage incentive programs which do accelerate run-off and soil losses. We have a situation whereby marketing agencies are encouraging farmers to produce greater quantities of agricultural products on a fixed or even shrinking land base. We also have a tax assessment process in most provinces where no distinction is made between productive and non-productive land. That distinction was drawn by the Senate committee and it recommended remedial action.

In addition to all those factors, what plays against the badly needed corrective measures to deal with soil erosion is the fact that successive Governments and their departments have, since the late 1940s, endorsed the use of chemicals without providing adequate research into economic alternatives to chemical weed and pest control.

What emerges is a picture requiring a plan of action as indicated in the motion before you today. What is emerging from the Senate and Science Council reports can be summarized as follows. Governments at both levels should increase basic research into soil and its growing capacity. Second, Governments should increase applied research on conservation techniques and appropriate technology. Governments should pay attention to the need for increasing the number of field personnel working on soil conservation. Governments ought to create a better method for technology and information transfer from the researcher to the farmer. Finally, there is an absolute necessity for harmonizing policies between various jurisdictions and among departments within the same jurisdiction as to make soil and water conservation a real and top priority.

Experts also point to the need for farmers to move away from monocultures. They ought to increase crop rotation. They ought to use fall cover crops and persist in contour plowing. They should use conservation tillage, reduce summer fallow and excessive use of fertilizers to prevent acidification of soil. Finally, they should reduce where possible dependence upon the use of heavy machinery.

In answer to these preoccupations on the part of farmers, one month ago, more precisely May 19, the Soil Conservation Canada Organization was founded. Its president, Senator Sparrow, spelled out in a very concise brochure the aims of this organization. Inevitably the question arises as to what the Government of Canada, through its research facilities and agricultural programs, is doing to assist this organization to carry out the mandate it so fully defined at its inception.

What is the Government planning to do in order to restore research to the level it ought to be in order to face this major catastrophe? At this point, if you look at the research facilities available, one has to conclude that due to inflation alone the Government of Canada, in the field of agriculture, lost some $20 million over the past five years. It has also lost some 140 person-years by way of budget reduction or attrition and the like.

The Liberal task force, under the auspices of the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), carried out extensive hearings in the West in late 1985 and 1986 and produced an excellent report which I highly recommend to your attention because it attempts to convey to Parliament the signals of distress that farmers registered on this very question of soil erosion and degradation. The farmers who appeared before the task force called for an increase in research and development related to soil conservation and for more field testing on soil and water conserving crop production methods. Despite that, and despite the efforts by the Hon. Member for Algoma to register this need, to the best of my knowledge government action has been invisible. Hence the reason for raising this matter in the House today.

The National Farmers Union, which appeared through its president, Wayne Easter, almost 13 months ago before the World Commission on Environment and Development had something very interesting to say about the general problem in agriculture, which includes this question of soil degradation and erosion, as well as economic losses to our farming community. He said:

> The problem in agriculture is not faceless. I as a farmer am a potential victim of the system that we now operate under. Why are approximately a quarter of Canadian farmers facing the immediate prospects of farm bankruptcy? It is directly related to the general concept of a cheap food policy that has constituted a cornerstone of federal agricultural policy since the beginning of settlement.
> We regard the current cheap food policy as a form of economic violence that is contributing towards soil exploitation and the growing impersonal relationship between farmers and the soil for economic survival. It is a policy of industrialization that can lead only towards disaster economically—for us as farmers, and environmentally for us all as Canadians and as world citizens.

Those words will be remembered for a long time to come because they point to a general issue, namely that of finding ways of developing our agricultural resources in a stable manner, one with which farmers can live for generations to come rather than being driven by the objective of maximum production, which sooner or later has to be paid for as we are now beginning to face by way of soil erosion and degradation. That is why the World Commission on Environment and Development has raised in its recent report the profound importance for the global community of coming to grips with the question of stable development. That is, a development with which we can look in confidence to the future rather than continue taking from our natural resources, the soil, the fishery, and forests, without putting back.

Evidently the question of soil erosion and degradation is just one important but very profound example that indicates to us as Canadians the necessity for coming to grips with the need to proceed with exploiting our environment in the manner implied by the words "sustainable development". That is, a manner which ensures for future generations the ability to exploit these resources without bringing about the kind of crisis we are experiencing today and which brings this motion to the floor of the House for your attention.

Recommendations on how to deal with this matter and the action plan have been spelled out by the Science Council and the Senate Committee. We now need the political will to implement it for the sake of present and future generations of farmers who are on the front lines facing soil degradation. They are sending signals of distress to governments at all levels and asking that we rearrange our priorities in order to ensure that they and future generations have the ability to sustain the productivity of the land on which we will depend for many, many years.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, before I start to deal with the main points of the Member's motion, I must say that the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), who comes from Toronto, would not know a great deal about soil degradation in Canada without doing a lot of studying. In fact, the urban sprawl which has been occasioned by the expansion of cities such as Toronto has probably taken away more good farm land than all of the causes about which he has spoken.

Having teased him a little bit about that, I must say that I do not have a lot of trouble with his motion. In fact, if the motion had said: "That, in the opinion of this House, the Government has considered the advisability of introducing", et cetera, et cetera, and is being complimented on it, I could support it 100 per cent. The fact is that the Government has done a great deal in this area given that the area of soil conservation is basically a provincial reserve.

I disagree with the Member entirely when he says that the work done by the federal Government has been invisible. In fact, as I will point out in a few moments, the federal Government has done a great deal through co-operation with the provincial Governments.

In the County of Prince Edward which I represent there is a very fine staff, the members of which I happen to know personally, which works with dedication toward soil conservation. In that area the problem is caused more by water erosion than wind erosion.

In passing, I would ask whether the Member for Davenport happened to see on public television emanating from the United States one evening about a week ago an excellent program on soil conservation and the methods used by natural farmers in the United States. I have asked for a copy of the program to send to the farmers in my area because I know many of them are interested in it.

The points I want to make have to do with the current efforts of the Government of Canada. The Government of Canada does recognize the serious nature of soil conservation and the threat which such degradation causes to the continued viability of our soil resource. This is one of the many agricultural problems facing farmers today.

As some of my colleagues will point out, Agriculture Canada is in the process of developing a comprehensive approach to this problem as well as other issues related to soil and water conservation. However, there are a number of activities currently under way which address this particular problem. In the few minutes available to me I intend to cover as many of them as I can.

In the Prairie region, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Agency has taken significant steps to address soil degradation through federal-provincial ERDA agreements in Manitoba and Saskatchewan and by interim working agreements with the Alberta Department of Agriculture.

During the period 1984-89 over $14 million will be spent in the Prairies on activities directly promoting and assisting improved soil conservation. As part of these initiatives soil conservation groups have become major partners of the federal Government in PFRA soil conservation activities over the past two years.

The groups vary in size and structure. In some cases farmers have organized as co-ops, others operate as non-profit societies, and still others participate in government programs through their agricultural extension boards. In Manitoba some PFRA "partners" are bona fide conservation districts under provincial legislation.

Under the ERDA agreements in Manitoba and Saskatchewan there are over 40 farmer groups. In Alberta programs are offered through municipal agriculture service boards. The combined membership of farmers allied for conservation in the three prairie provinces now approaches 2,000.

The problems they are tackling cover the entire range of degradation issues. In Manitoba wind and water erosion are high priorities. In Saskatchewan major concerns range from salinity in the southwest to acid soils in the northwest to solonetzic soils and salinity in the southeast.

To digress briefly, Mr. Speaker, as you and my colleagues will understand, notes for addresses in reply to a motion such as that of my friend are prepared by experts. When I came across the word "solonetzic" I started looking in the dictionary. Coming from an agricultural area I have been familiar with agriculture and agricultural terms for many years. We could not find the word in the first two dictionaries we tried. However, thanks to the perseverance of the Member for Carleton—Charlotte (Mr. McCain) we found that solonetzic soils are basic soils containing carbonates and sulphates which are erodable and found in arid areas. Therefore, we are talking about the southern part of Saskatchewan where, as my friend said, the problems are particularly bad.

In both Alberta and Saskatchewan erosion by wind is a pervasive problem. Farmers in all areas of the Prairies are interested in conservation tillage, extended cropping, and residue management as tools to cope with erosion, salinity, loss of organic matter, and declining soil fertility.

With PFRA assistance these groups enable farmers to confront degradation issues in a number of ways; through local meetings, tours and visits to other regions of the Prairies, co-operative use of specialized machinery, and on-farm demonstrations. That same type of co-operation is used in other parts of Canada as well.

The farmers and PFRA share a common purpose—to maintain a healthy land resource and a sustainable agricultural industry. These are also the objectives contained in a recent federal-provincial strategy on agriculture approved by the First Ministers of Canada. A key element of that strategy and future federal-provincial soil and water accords is a reliance on a partnership between governments and farmers. Our Government, in consultation with provincial prairie governments, is actively seeking ways to expand our present efforts into a long-term bulwark against soil degradation.

In Ontario, as I said a moment ago, the Soil and Water Environmental Enhancement Program, commonly known as SWEEP, is a $30 million federal-provincial agreement designed to improve soil and water quality in southwestern Ontario over the next five years. The financing is being provided by Agriculture Canada through an ERDA subsidiary agreement. Environment Canada is involved with monitoring the activities on selected watersheds. ERDA subsidiary agreements on agricultural development with the Provinces of British Columbia, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have resource conservation elements.

Agriculture Canada's Research Branch continues to place a high priority on soil conservation research. In a time of shrinking budgets, this is one area where the current effort will be sustained and increased. I hope my friend, the Member for Davenport, is listening because that is one area in which I disagree with him. The fact is that Agriculture Canada is indeed well aware of the subject and is putting money toward the development of the transfer of technologies, which is an integral part of most of the ERDA subagreements.

These activities show that the Government is responding to the threat of soil erosion across the nation. However, I agree with my hon. friend that more effort is needed and we must continue to increase resources aimed at solving erosion problems.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for bringing this subject before the House as a Private Member's Motion. The Hon. Member who just spoke suggests that all is in hand and there is no urgency to give much more attention to this question of soil conservation. I believe that suggestion was far too apologetic and unaware of the difficulties facing many farmers individually, and farming throughout the country.

The excellent report of the Senate Committee stressed this problem via a number of statistics that I believe we should not forget when addressing this urgent question. For instance, in southwestern Ontario the erosion problem has caused a loss of corn yields of some 30 per cent to 40 per cent. It is very difficult for my farmers in Essex County, farmers in Kent County, and farmers elsewhere in southwestern Ontario to cope with those losses.

The 1982 estimates were that the prairie farmer would have had to pay $239 million in fertilizer costs to fully recover the present loss in grain production from wind and water erosion. The report suggests that it is more difficult to put a dollar figure on the equally serious matter of the permanent loss of rich agricultural land to urban use. This point was raised incidentally by the Member who just spoke but is, in fact, a very serious part of the soil erosion reality in this country. The expansion of our cities without taking into account the importance of maintaining fertile parts of our farmland can be devastating.

This report found that between 1961 and 1976, Canada lost 3.5 million acres of farmland, an area equivalent to the Province of Prince Edward Island. This question requires urgent attention.

The concern that farmers feel about this problem became evident recently during a farm forum that we held in my constituency for a wide range of farm groups from across Essex County. One of those who testified to the New Democratic Members of Parliament who made up that Farm Forum was the President of the Essex Soil and Crop Improvement Association. That association has more than 350 members from Essex County. It aims to promote and encourage good soil and crop management practices.

Although there are people in the country who are attempting to respond to the concern, they definitely need a sense of leadership and attention from the Government. The directors of this particular soil and crop improvement association made a number of points. First, they told us that the abundance of grain crops in the world and the declining returns on much of the land may provide an opportunity to remove some less productive land. They would encourage government incentive programs for the diversion of poorer class and less productive soils from grain crops to conservation crops, such as legumes, or tree cover.

They also suggested that this must be tied to the question of price, which has been a serious problem in Essex County. Price constraints have forced them to try to enhance their output by using pesticides and fertilizers which have had the effect of increasing erosion and ultimately reducing the quality of our soils.

They also suggest that the Senate Report has drawn attention to the soil degradation situation in Canada. Their association would like more government effort and funding for research and education efforts in regard to soil preservation and conservation.

They go on to say that to be more competitive in the world, farmers need new crop varieties, improved cultural practices, better insect, disease and weed control and must look to Agriculture Canada to fund research and provide research facilities.

The association states that pesticides play a very important role on today's farms. Farmers want to ensure their safety and the future viability of their land and therefore strongly urge the Government to put in place a better system of testing and assessing the benefits and risks of pesticides before they are registered.

This issue is not confined to Canada. When I worked in Africa trying to help Third World farmers in that part of the world, much of their effort was to try to deal with the soil erosion problem. In fact, it may well be the case where we will see some of the breakthroughs in terms of intercropping of different crops, of new varieties being developed, where some of the support which we give to research in African agriculture will come back and benefit Canadian agriculturists.

The key point, and the reason I am so pleased to be able to support this motion of the Hon. Member for Davenport, despite his urban location, is to stress what we had stressed to us in our rural constituencies, that is, the sense of urgency which must be brought to bear by this Government, and any future Government, with respect to this issue. It is an urgency which is of importance not just from a broad environmental point of view, which I think was stressed by the Hon. Member for Davenport, but an urgency which is important from the point of view of the future economic viability of the farm community in this country.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Hon. Member for Davenport has brought to our attention a very important and critical problem which faces Canada and other nations of the world, and it has for a long time. When I reflect on agriculture, I always reflect back to a panel of paintings in the Railway Committee Room which tells in five paintings the history of the early development of Canada. It shows a mid European village in the middle of winter in the first panel. The second panel shows a ship approaching the shores of Canada in the Gulf of St. Lawrence with immigrants lining the railings of the ship. The third panel shows the immigrants with a small clearing in the aspen poplar fields of timber in the Prairies Provinces as yet uncleared. The next panel shows the clearing and the work to develop the land. The final panel shows the field ripe with wheat and the farmer looking at the end product. That really is the early history of the development of a proud history of agriculture in Canada. Yet here we are today worried about the affect of what has gone on in the past and which continues today. In the past, of course, the processes were quite different. Today, we have the addition of chemicals, pesticides, herbicides, the overcropping of soil, and so on. It is a very serious issue.

Land degradation is purely and simply the destruction of our resource base. It occurs all across Canada and impacts upon agriculture, forestry, wildlife, recreation and a host of other activities. In fact, land degradation affects every Canadian. The importance of the environment to the Canadian economy may not be fully appreciated. Over 40 per cent of the gross product, 33 per cent of the labour force and 52 per cent of our exports are directly related to economic activities which are dependent on the environment. Canadian forests provide $29 billion worth of wood products, $13 billion in exports and 265,000 directly related jobs. Wetlands support economic activities valued in excess of $4.6 billion per year. Yet we see our wetlands diminishing and intrusions into our forests by good management and by bad management. It is not difficult on site to tell the difference between good and bad forest management and practices.

The agri-food industry contributes $8.4 billion to the gross domestic product, employs over one million Canadians and shows a trade surplus of $4 billion. Nevertheless, there are clear signs that we have been harming the physical base of all these activities. In agriculture the signs are obvious. For example, some estimates indicated that at least one third of New Brunswick's potato land is severely affected by erosion and up to 12 centimetres of topsoil have been lost from some fields in the past 20 years. It is an old saw that they are just not making land anymore. What we have is all we have and what we lose through our own folly is an ultimate loss which will take anywhere from one hundred to one thousand years to replace, just in part.

In the Prairies, wind erosion is a serious problem. The wind-blown soil loss from one storm in southern Manitoba was calculated at 160 tonnes per hectare, which is 14 times the annual soil loss considered "tolerable" by soil conservationists. What future is there for land which has been degradated in that fashion? What practices contributed to that circumstance which would see that volume of topsoil disappear into atmosphere only to be distributed across the northern part of the United States.

Taken collectively, wind and water erosion, salinization, acidification, compaction, nutrient loss and contamination of farm lands in Canada costs our farmers $1 billion annually in lost revenue. Soil degradation does not stop at the farm fence. Soil, nutrients and chemicals lost from farm fields because of wind and water erosion travel downwind or downstream. Water quality for wildlife, recreation, fishing and industrial use may be affected to the extent of eliminating these uses. So we end up with not only an agricultural and environmental problem, but with a very serious economic problem.

In that context, I would like to make reference to two or three examples of the practices we have engaged in which have had a very negative impact. I take you back, Mr. Speaker, to the land grab at Pickering for the so-called Pickering Airport. It took land out of productivity without adequate reward for the owners. The same thing happened at Mirabel. Land which could have been productive was taken out of production. Then I think of the policies of some municipalities to pave over good farm land, most particularly in Ontario, but not exclusively. Certainly, we have seen it in the Fraser Valley of British Columbia. In fact, a piece of legislation which was introduced by Dave Barrett's Government back in, I believe, 1973, addressed the problem of greenbelts and of retaining land for agricultural purposes rather than having it abused for residential zoning or industrial zoning. Zoning regulations were brought in and they attempted to classify the land of British Columbia according to its quality. What it did, however, was create other serious problems of dislocation. A field, for example, could qualify as a class 4, or be labelled as class 4, yet be very productive. The tax department would say it is not productive land because it is class 4 land. Someone would want to build on it and they would say it is class 2 land and could not be built on, yet it would be a rock pile. So there were anomalies and a lot of problems.

I think it is important to recognize that that legislation is still in effect, although it has been modified and adjusted. I think it responds to concerns of the public in British Columbia.

In summary, we have to think as to what we are going to do with the future. A recent poll has indicated that 70 per cent of Canadians believe that pollution is becoming worse. Another survey found two-thirds of respondents rank protection of the natural environment as first or second priority. Through the voices of individual citizens, lobby groups, professional organizations and NGOs, Canadians are concerned about the maintenance and enhancement of their environment. Canadians feel that the Government and industry are responsible for pollution and environmental degradation. Therefore they are looking to the senior level of government for leadership in combating these problems.

We know from the reports that have been introduced by the Senate and in the House of Commons that this is a very critical issue. Thus in December of last year the federal Cabinet adopted an environmental quality policy framework to strengthen and streamline federal environmental quality action. A fundamental principle is that environmental quality is essential for the protection of Canadian resource-based economies. An important element of this policy is environment-economy integration.

It is in the direction that I think every Member should urge the Government to proceed, and to proceed with the kind of rapidity and urgency that has been stressed by all my colleagues who have spoken on this issue thus far today.

Soil Erosion

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, soil erosion is a question that has my particular concern. As a Member of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, I have, on several occasions, had an opportunity to question officials from the Department and witnesses appearing before the Committee to testify on various issues, mostly on the farm input costs.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from the Minister, or rather the Deputy Minister, who was responding to one of the concerns I raised in committee about the use of chemical fertilizers. In fact, I wondered whether the use of chemical fertilizers and pesticides could have some connection with soil erosion.

Apparently not, according to his answer. Personally, I know some people in the riding of Argenteuil—Papineau, Mr. Speaker, at Notre-Dame-de-la-Paix, who are potato producers, and who in recent years, have had a problem with soil erosion.

Mr. Speaker, soil erosion is a problem that exists throughout the world, not only in developing countries but in industrialized countries as well. The Government of Canada is aware of the situation and has demonstrated its awareness through its contribution to the world conservation strategy. The strategy is aimed at better management of resources to put economic and social development on a durable basis. It concentrates on the main obstacles to conservation objectives and how these obstacles can be overcome.

Environment Canada coordinates activities throughout the country in cooperation with the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers. During Environment Week in 1986, the federal Government hosted the Conservation World Strategy Conference, at which Environment Canada played a major role.

Mr. Speaker, our colleague opposite, who used to be Minister of the Environment, I believe, must certainly be more familiar with environment matters than most of us. However, I do not believe, and he will be the first to admit this, that the previous Government did such great things for the environment. He must agree with this statement as a former minister. In any case, he cannot be very proud of what the previous Government achieved in environmental matters.

Mr. Speaker, the discussions at the Conference to which I have already referred dealt with the effects of economic growth on the environment. The federal Government considers this a very important issue and is concerned about the impact of aggressions against the environment, soil degradation, the rate of flow of our waters, the atmosphere, our forests and our economic future.

There is no need to repeat, as others have already mentioned this, that the Government has allocated hundreds of millions of dollars to the environment. The Minister of Environment with his colleague and people from the American Department and officials from the Government of Canada and the Department of Environment have held these last two years discussions and a number of meetings to try and resolve the environment problem, one aspect of which more specifically was soil degradation.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, we must tell ourselves that Canadian society is faced with difficulties such as the loss of prime farmland, the increasing need for industrial land, the protection of wildlife, or again soil erosion. Land erosion affects all provinces. Each year, farm revenue loss from that cause is estimated at more than $1 billion. As you know, it was believed that land erosion only affected underdeveloped nations. But Canada, as I said in a statement I made in the House, over these last 20 years lost approximately 20 per cent of its farmland, the equivalent of some 1 per cent a year. This in my view is a matter we must look at with much interest, and the motion put forward by the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) in particular seems to tackle the problem. But, Mr. Speaker, this should be taken within the general context rather than simply as one aspect, as the Hon. Member for Davenport seems to be doing.

Water sedimentation and pollution caused by inadequate farming methods increase that problem, involving agriculture, forestry, recreation and wildlife.

The Canadian Government recognizes that the implementation of national goals is based on sound use and management of this nation's land. Mr. Speaker, I was quite impressed by a corporation—I do not quite remember its name—which appeared before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, but in Western Canada, several farmers have formed an organization which favours the use of organic rather than chemical fertilizers and which practices crop rotation. I think that rotating crops is the solution to the soil erosion problem. It is clear that the farmer who plants potatoes year after year in the same piece of land will experience soil erosion, while if he uses crop rotation, planting potatoes one year, wheat the next, etc., he should experience no soil erosion problem. I feel this is a problem with which all Canadian farmers are faced and I think the Federal Government would be ill advised to tell farmers: Next year, you are going to plant wheat in this soil rather than potatoes or other crops.

I am grateful to the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) who, by raising this issue, provided us with an opportunity to consider again the threat of soil erosion and advise our farmers to take very good care of their soils and use fertilizers with extreme caution.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the time at my disposal has elapsed. I should like to tell my friend, the Hon. Member for Davenport, that I will follow this issue with utmost interest and that he can count on my support when he tries to convince the Government and all interested parties to be very careful, because our agricultural land is one of our greatest wealth and we must do collectively whatever is necessary to protect it.

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS INFORMATION REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act, and to amend other Acts in relation thereto.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-261, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (abortion).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce this amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada dealing with abortion. This Bill would restrict abortions to situations where the physical health of the mother is threatened. If adopted by the House of Commons, it will afford greater protection to the innocent unborn.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-262, an Act to amend the Auditor General Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is another attempt to make the Auditor General report more useful to Members of Parliament and, at the same time, the Government and people of Canada. It would allow the Auditor General to report his audit when it is completed rather than waiting until the end of the year when he makes his final report.

This Bill has had all-Party support, including that of successive Standing Committees on Public Accounts as well as the general membership of the House.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS AT ARMED FORCES BASE GOOSE BAY

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and pleasure to present a petition from some 100 residents of Toronto who are concerned that the low-level flight training at Goose Bay, Labrador, will disrupt the ancient way of life of the local people there. They say also that this is an aggressive war-fighting principle.

Therefore, they request that Parliament ensure that the Prime Minister end all low-level flight training at the Goose Bay Canadian Forces Base and cease negotiations with NATO for the establishment of a larger base there.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from an equal number of residents of Toronto who are concerned about Canada's laws governing the admission into Canada of people seeking refugee status. Since our system was overloaded a new system was proposed by the standing committee a year and a half ago which has the support of the churches, the Jewish Congress, and many other groups in Canada.

Therefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will embody the principles of fair and complete oral hearings of claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada, and a fair chance to arrive in Canada to present their claim. As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO CORPORATE PLAN

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition with regard to the Post Office. These several thousand petitioners from across the country indicate that the federal Government's proposal to seek financial self-sufficiency by 1988 for the Canada Post Corporation will result in cutbacks and deterioration in service at the Post Office which will consequently be at the expense of service for Canadian consumers.

The proposed measures have already resulted in the closure of many rural post offices and cancellation of routes in rural communities and mean a drastic reduction in service for many Canadians. Postal rate increases affect all Canadians while basic services are being cut. The federal Government has not enabled the Canada Post Corporation to pursue revenue-generating activities such as electronic mail and parcel delivery.

The undersigned call on Parliament to instruct the Government to make improved service the highest priority of the Canada Post Corporation and to instruct the Government to abandon the policy of closing rural post offices and cancelling rural postal routes.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of 40 petitioners from the community of Parson, B.C., who have particular concerns about the quality of service of the Post Office. They ask the House of Commons to try to improve service as well as change the policy of closing rural post offices and cancelling rural postal routes.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 29

FREE TRADE—INCLUSION OF CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT IN NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 29 I ask leave to propose a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the discovery of information that the Government, despite assurances to the contrary, is, in the course of its free trade negotiations with the United States, including the likely dismemberment of the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact and has already agreed to drop our auto tariffs which are vital to the enforcement of the Canadian content provisions of the pact.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor West has raised a matter which is, of course, of importance to all Members of the Chamber, as has been evidenced over a long period of time as the subject of some discussion in the Chamber. However, without minimizing to any degree the importance of the matter, the Chair feels that, at least for the moment, the application ought not to be granted. As I say, that is for the moment.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later then three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendation on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business", and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provide that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members from any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, after my speech last Friday, I was given an article published Tuesday, May 26, in the newspaper Le Soleil, of Quebec City. According to the Director of the Quebec City Police Force, we have to stop talking about the death penalty. Mr. Bergeron, who took part in the debate on the death penalty held yesterday by the Council of Churches for Justice and Criminology, said that the respect of human life is the main reason for opposing reinstatement of the death penalty. According to him, why should society itself commit the very same barbarian act it is condemning? He also said that an increasing number of senior police officers object to reinstatement of the death penalty.

[English]

Further to that, I wish to point out recent research which throws some light on the matter on which I have previously expressed great curiosity, that is, why there is so much insistence on the return of the death penalty. I have suggested that I think it is because of anger.

In this connection perhaps most people have noticed the study done recently by Professor Kenneth Avio of the University of Victoria which found that, all other things being equal, native Indians, Ukrainians and French Canadians, in that descending order, were more likely to be executed than English Canadians while the death penalty was in effect in Canada.

Beginning shortly after Confederation and until Parliament abolished capital punishment in 1976 all capital cases were referred to the federal Cabinet where a decision was made either to let the death sentence stand or to commute the sentence.

The results of Professor Avio's study indicate that cabinet decisions were not arbitrary but were influenced by the membership of the accused in particular ethnic groups. Non-white offenders who killed whites were more likely to be executed than other offenders. Native persons, Ukrainian-speaking Canadians of east European origin, French Canadians and Anglo-Canadians faced different risks of execution for similar crimes, in descending order. Native Canadians would be the highest risk and Anglo-Canadians would be the lowest risk. Of course, consideration of ethnicity when making a decision on execution is illegal. It was then; it is now. Yet, Cabinet appears to have been influenced, however unconsciously, by these ethnic factors.

Professor Avio also notes that the evidence of discrimination found here is at the cabinet level only. That is to say, it is in addition to any similar discrimination exercised at earlier stages of the criminal justice proceedings, including treatment by police and the courts.

A thoughtful article in today's The Globe and Mail describes the process of unconscious bias that may creep into the system to the disadvantage of the accused.

Professor Avio has also provided us with evidence of discrimination against ethnic minorities in Canada when the choice is being made at the Cabinet level whether or not to execute. Similar studies illustrate a similar discrimination in the United States against blacks.

I am concerned that if capital punishment were reintroduced in Canada the danger exists that we might continue to discriminate against ethnic minorities or some other identifiable group of Canadians, such as the non-wealthy or uneducated, in the same fashion. I ask whether there is any evidence that such discrimination is still at work in the Canadian justice system? While it is difficult to get a complete answer, there is reason to be concerned.

There is evidence here in our prisons. Currently, 12,122 people are serving time in federal prisons. Of these prisoners, 9.1 per cent—nearly one in ten—are members of the group we refer to as native Canadian, including Inuit, Métis, status or non-status Indian. Only one Canadian in 50 is a native

Canadian. What are we to assume from such over-representation in our prisons? Are we expected to believe that native Canadians are more prone to criminality than non-natives? Would one be justified in fearing that we have not yet rid our justice system of discrimination that has been so carefully documented by Professor Avio?

When native women are considered in isolation the discrepancy is much larger. Nearly 15 per cent of the women in the Kingston Prison for Women are native women, but only 2 per cent of Canadian women are native women. These women are over-represented in our prisons by a factor of over seven.

It is not only with native Canadians that such over-representation occurs in our prisons. Black Canadians are also over-represented by a factor of over two for male and over three for females. In general, non-Caucasians are over-represented in Canadian federal prisons by a factor of at least two.

Again, what are we to assume from such facts? Are we to assume that Canadians who are non-Caucasian are more prone to criminal activity, or must we fear that somewhere in our system of justice an injustice is continuing to occur?

I am afraid that our Charter of Rights and Freedoms embodying as a fundamental principle that all people are of morally equal value is placed in some doubt by this de facto racial inequality in our prisons.

This seems to be the message that we have received recently from the Native Indian Brotherhood, the Assembly of First Nations, in a letter dated June 19, which states in part:

> There is further evidence that First Nations citizens have been and are being punished by the Canadian State in disproportionate numbers and could be the most victims of a restored death penalty.
> In our First Nations philosophies human life is held to be sacred, flowing as it does in common with all life from the Great Spirit, Creator of all life. Our forefathers traditionally practised a system of banishment rather than execution as the punishment for the grievous offence of wrongful killing. In our traditional philosophies the ultimate decision about the fate of human beings lies with the Great Spirit, Creator of all life.

Our debate today is specifically whether or not Canada should consider reinstating the death penalty. As I have stated, while there are no sufficient reasons to reintroduce this penalty, and many good reasons not to, the reason that concerns me in particular is this unconscious bias of the anger of our society directed against some of the weakest people in our society in the form of imprisonment now, and in the form of the death penalty in the past and in the future if it is restored.

In a sense, particularly at a distance, I believe it is easy to use capital punishment and to decide to kill. The job is quickly done. We can feel that we are doing something to preserve justice in our society, but we must ask ourselves whether that is true. In fact, would we be venting our anger, and even bringing in other angers that have nothing to do with the particular crime by executing people selectively, by executing someone unpopular and defenceless?

I want to share with the House the words of an American woman whose mother-in-law was murdered in 1972. She said:

> From the night Penny was murdered until today, people have asked us why we did not feel the same anger and need to vengeance so many murder victims' families seem to feel. They imply that we are either saints or emotional freaks. We are neither. We did feel anger and horror and pain and an almost overwhelming sense of loss.
> But perhaps our most intense feeling was a desperate need to understand "why?"—we wanted to know why there is so much violence among us, why we are so good at passing on violence and so poor at passing on love.

This woman's search to understand the why of violent crimes took her to death row where she worked with 200 death-sentenced prisoners. She said:

> The details of their stories are different, but it is in the similarities that reasons are found. They are all poor. They are disproportionately made up of minorities. All but a few were abused, molested, neglected or institutionalized as children or youths. They turned to drugs and alcohol to numb the pain of their own brutal lives. More than half appear to be mentally ill to some degree.
> In many cases their families sought help again and again.
> They gave out clear signals that they were in trouble. They were society's throw-aways long before they murdered. We did not help them. They ended up committing murder, and now we will murder them back. It is an American way of death.

Those are the words of a loyal, sensitive American. I urge that we not let this become a Canadian way of death.

I also want to quote from a professor at Queen's University, Professor H. R. S. Ryan, who has studied criminal law and justice throughout his life. He considers the death penalty as a ritual sacrifice. He means that we as a society focus our anger and our fear on a few individuals, in the hope that their execution will provide us with an illusion of justice.

As he says:

> The ritual execution of even a few of our most notorious killers gives the pacifying impression that something is being done, that we have struck back at those who threaten us, that the scales of justice have been balanced.

Professor Ryan's conclusion, with which I agree, is that it is not justice if we vent our anger selectively. If we execute because we are angry, and we choose to execute those who already have suffered and continue to suffer much discrimination in our society, can we really say that justice is being served? It is a strange kind of justice.

It is easy to execute people but it is not easy to teach ourselves why people kill, and how we are to address that fact.

Let me describe recent research that shows that throughout the world in ancient times, and even in modern times in some parts of the world, people had a system of sanctuary. It is reflected in the Mosaic Law in our Bible where there were the cities of refuge. A person could go there to negotiate with his pursuers or persecutors. This continued into the Middle Ages in Europe, with the church as a place of refuge. If there was a blood feud and someone killed another because that person had killed his brother, another relative would have to be killed and so on, to the point where it could escalate to a civil war. The city of refuge, or the church of refuge, was a way to let things cool down so that people could negotiate some kind of resolution of the conflict.

• (1130)

Rather than returning to the blood feud, to the killing, I believe we should be looking for ways to resolve these conflicts, to rehabilitate even killers—it has been done—and to mend and heal the conflicts which erupt in killing in our society rather than trying to hide them by destroying one life at a time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? Debate.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I speak today against the amendment and in favour of the principle of reinstatement of capital punishment. Many of my constituents have written requesting information both pro and con concerning this topic. It is interesting to note that there is a considerable amount of abolitionist material put out by a number of well-organized and well-funded groups. On the other hand, pro capital punishment material is difficult to find. The reason for that, I believe, is that, as in many other issues, there is a silent majority out there which is unorganized. As my constituent, Mrs. Ruth Lee Knight points out:

> Many who oppose the return of the death penalty are the same people who have lobbied so successfully over the years for the rights of offenders and they are well organized in their efforts.
> Many operate on Government funds and our concern is that, because of their resources, the Canadian public will be presented with only one side of the issue as they have in the past.

In considering this matter I propose to deal with a number of the arguments against capital punishment in order to better explain my position. We are first told it is cheaper to keep murderers in prison than to execute them. Some have suggested that execution would save costs of prolonged incarceration while others say the threat of the death penalty would lead to endless appeals and legal manoeuvres which could cost even more. I would prefer to reject both approaches. I believe there is a matter of principle here about the value of human life and the validity and integrity of our justice system. I believe the question is one which is beyond monetary considerations.

The second argument put forward is that capital punishment is barbaric. Some abolitionist material tells very graphically of lingering death at the end of a rope, the faulty electric chair and of agony in the gas chamber. But no matter the method, it is clearly the death itself which opponents of capital punishment consider barbaric.

One does not have to like the death penalty in order to support it, anymore than one has to like radiation or radical surgery or chemotherapy in order to treat cancer. We are faced with letting the cancer spread or trying to cure it using the methods available today, methods which one day may be viewed as barbaric. In the context of capital punishment, the disease, of course, is injustice. We may not like the death penalty, but it must be available to punish the most heinous crimes of murder, cases in which any other form of punishment would be inadequate and, therefore, unjust.

In this context I cannot help but think of the 11 individuals who have killed six or more times over the past 20 years in this country, those who would assassinate their political enemies on our soil or those who would place bombs in airplanes, thus intentionally taking hundreds of lives. If we create a society in which injustice is not tolerated, then incidents of murder, surely the most flagrant injustice of all, will diminish.

A third point put forward by those opposing the death penalty is that no other civilized country has it. Obviously, the laws of each country will differ according to conditions and traditions, but the fact is there are only 28 countries in the world which do not have capital punishment at all. These countries have less than 10 per cent of world population. The death penalty in fact is available in Ireland, Belgium, China, Japan, the United States and in 123 other countries for ordinary crimes and in another 18 countries, including Canada, under conditions of military law.

A fourth argument is that capital punishment cheapens the value of human life. Surely, for example, if the penalty for rape were lowered, it would signal a lessened regard for the victim's suffering and humiliation. It would cheapen their horrible experience and expose them to an increased danger of recurrence.

What does lowering the penalty for murder do? It displays a lessened regard for life, the victim's life. It is by exacting the highest penalty for the wanton and inexcusable taking of human life that the state reaffirms the highest value of life. I say that those who support the death penalty are no less human, no less compassionate, no less concerned and no less Christian than those who oppose it.

Another argument is that the death penalty somehow discriminates against the poor and disadvantaged. With the greatest respect, I do not believe this is so at all. We have in Canada a system of justice wherein all Canadians are entitled to counsel and to the full protection of the law. It is a system which is second to none.

A number of opponents of capital punishment put forward the Biblical admonition, "Thou shalt not kill". Others translate that as "Thou shalt not murder". In this debate it seems, and I say this with the utmost respect, that the problem with a number of the Biblical points of view is that the passages taken from scripture are often pulled out of context. I have received many letters and representations from constituents and others quoting scripture, some offered in support of abolition and just as many offered in support of reinstatement. Many of the great philosophers including Kant, Locke, Hobbes, Rousseau, Montesque and Mill, agreed that natural law properly authorized a sovereign to take life in order to vindicate justice. Indeed, the Constitution of the United States, which is widely admired as a model, condemns cruel and inhuman punishment, but does not condemn capital punishment.

I think it is important at this stage to point out that the rights and duties of the state are different from those of the individual. Jack McIntosh, a Member of Parliament for Swift Current—Maple Creek in the 1966 debate, said:

> We have one duty as individuals and because we are Members of Parliament we have another duty so far as the state and its laws are concerned for we are members of that state. If such an interpretation is not correct, than in my view there is no Christian justification for pride in being a member of the Armed Service and no Christian justification for asking anyone to join the Armed Services.
> As an individual you cannot kill, but if you are a member of the Armed Forces of the Government, you must repel an aggressor.

Another popular argument is that the death penalty is nothing more than state sanctioned murder. To say that the state should not under any circumstances have the right to kill is simply nonsense. The state has a duty to protect its citizens from threats and violence, externally and internally. Every November 11 we honour the hundreds of thousands of Canadian men and women who served in three wars and who gave so much that we might enjoy the freedoms of today. Some of them killed the enemy in order that we might be free to assemble and debate in this House. Their actions, far from cheapening the value of life, strengthened it. Those who killed did so as instruments and representatives of the state. Their actions were justifiable because they were done as part of, and on behalf of the Armed Forces of Canada in time of war. They did not murder, they killed, and there is a difference.

There is a duty on the state to protect its citizens against the enemy in peacetime as well as in war, whether through defence expenditures to provide a deterrent against would be aggressors, or through the kind of justice system which provides the appropriate penalties to punish those who offend against society by breaking its laws.

The murderer who says "You are no better than I am", seeks to bring law abiding society down to his level. This is a false argument. Clearly the state has rights the individual citizen does not. In a democracy, these rights are given to the state by the electorate. The execution of a lawfully condemned killer is no more an act of murder than is legal imprisonment an act of kidnapping. If an individual forces his neighbour to pay money under threat of punishment, that is extortion. If the state does it, that is taxation. The rights and responsibilities surrendered by the individual are what gives the state its power to govern. This contract constitutes the very foundation of civilization itself.

Some say the death penalty creates an atmosphere which breeds violence. It appears that not everyone wants the responsibilities, especially the difficult ones which come with law enforcement.

Back in the early 1960s a woman was assaulted and murdered on a New York street. Bystanders looked the other way. The neighbours who heard her cries for help did nothing. They did not even call the police. In such a climate, surely, the criminal must inevitably grow bolder. In the words of Ed Koch, the Mayor of New York City:

> The death of anyone—even a convicted murderer—diminishes us all. But we are diminished even more by a justice system that fails to function. It is an illusion to let ourselves believe that doing away with capital punishment removes the murderer's deed from our conscience. The rights of society are paramount.
> When we protect guilty lives we give up innocent lives in exchange. When opponents of capital punishment say to the state: I will not let you kill in my name, they are also saying to murderers: You can kill in your own name as long as I have an excuse for not getting involved".

Abolitionists also suggest that capital punishment brings out the negative side of humanity—bloodthirstiness, vengeance and so on. With respect, this says to me that our society is indicating more concern for the murderer than for the victim. I question this dismissal of the victim with a shrug saying that he or she cannot be brought back to life and therefore let us help the murderer, let us rehabilitate him.

Protection of the criminal appears to become the primary objective of punishment. The rights of the victim have been forgotten. Surely, our society must first provide resources for the victims of crime. The state must get its priorities in order. It is wrong, it is indefensible, it is irresponsible to endanger the lives of law-abiding Canadians by sparing a homicidal sex offender with a previous record of murder.

If we have priorities in Canada I would place the rehabilitation of murderers way down the list. A much more positive approach would involve the reform of our corrections and parole system, a system under which over the past 10 years 95 inmates released under mandatory supervision committed homicide, a system wherein 37 inmates on parole committed murder.

In this context I welcome the remarks made earlier in the debate by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney), whose Justice Committee will be looking at the parole system. I urge him to tighten up bail procedures and all forms of early release for violent offenders.

Again, I quote Mrs. Lee-Knight who said:

> But if common sense prevails the innocent will have a better chance.
> If a "life" sentence becomes "Actual Life" and-or if the death penalty is reinstated so judges have some scope of sentencing to choose from, then your life may be spared, your daughter has a better chance of living, your friends and relatives could feel safer. A lot of good it will do to society if you are murdered before you've had a long enough life to establish the Utopia you concentrate on so single mindedly.

Opponents of the death penalty say that an innocent person might be executed by mistake. Our system of criminal justice has evolved over hundreds of years. It is a system which provides every safeguard to an accused, one under which I would consider execution of an innocent person to be virtually an impossibility. Indeed, Adam Bedau, one of the most resolute opponents of capital punishment in the United States, said:

It is false sentimentality to argue that the death penalty should be abolished because of the abstract possibility that an innocent person might be executed.

But the main point is this. If government functioned only where the possibility of error did not exist, then government would not function at all. I am prepared to accept that risk, especially when I weigh it against the sure knowledge that some murderers murder again.

The other side of this innocent person argument is the repeat killer situation. While we know of no cases in this country where an innocent person has been executed, we know for certain that there are numerous cases wherein convicted murderers have, upon release or while on parole, murdered again. Human life deserves special protection. One of the best ways to guarantee that protection is to ensure that convicted murderers do not murder again. It can be argued that only the death penalty will accomplish this end.

Another point put forward by abolitionists is that capital punishment is not a deterrent. Obviously, many statistics have been put forward by both sides, and they are viewed as conclusive or insufficient, depending on the viewpoint of the presenter or the viewer. How could one ever measure the numbers of those in our society who have contemplated taking someone else's life for whatever reason? Some hopefully discard the idea as a result of realizing its repugnancy. Nevertheless, there must still be some in our society who are deterred by the consequences of imprisonment. I suggest there are still others who do that dreadful act but who, were they to face the ultimate penalty of death, might not.

Common sense tells me that there is an incremental group who are deterred. We are not here talking about a crime of passion done on the sudden, under provocation, or where the person is mentally imbalanced or is swayed by alcohol or drugs. Those are circumstances, of course, which result in a lesser offence. We are talking about a considered, deliberate, conscious act. I believe the penalties prescribed in the Criminal Code concerning, say, impaired driving or theft, do act as deterrents. I likewise believe that the penalty of execution is a deterrent for some.

Statistics can be paraded out ad nauseam. But the deterrence issue boils down to a personal belief. Either you believe in your heart or in your guts that capital punishment is a deterrent or you do not. My sense tells me that it is, that it has to be deterrent to some would-be murderers.

If we could assume that everyone committing murder were of unsound mind and lacked the required intent, then our decision would be easy. But despite all the rules of law providing defences, the mitigating circumstances of alcohol, drugs, provocation and so on, there are still those who, after every safeguard provided by our system of justice, are found guilty beyond any reasonable doubt, by a jury, of intentionally taking the life of another person. Some of those murderers may be worthy of mercy with a provision of imprisonment. But I submit that there are some acts of murder, some acts toward civilized society that must carry with them the maximum penalty. These may be situations of mass murder, hijacking, terrorism, air piracy, or hired killing. These must be situations of cold-blooded, premeditated murder proven beyond any reasonable doubt in the absence of any extenuating circumstances. Where there are no redeeming circumstances at all, I believe the state should make provision for the death penalty.

Surely, the circumstances of a Clifford Olson, who murdered 11 young people, the Air India bombers who cost over 300 lives, or the Hindawi human bomb case in England, had it been successful, are crimes so dastardly and so inhuman as to be deserving of the ultimate penalty. I believe that no system of justice is complete unless it contains the ultimate penalty for the ultimate crime. The failure to provide capital punishment for premeditated murder causes sentencing for all other crimes to be reduced. This in turn leads to diminished respect for the law, a lack of respect which must be evident to all Canadians.

In conclusion, this is clearly an issue on which there are significant numbers of thoughtful and deeply moral people who disagree fundamentally with each other, who disagree as to the means to achieve a less violent society, a society in which law-abiding Canadians can feel secure. At my nomination in 1983, and in the campaign of 1984, I pledged to support the reinstatement of capital punishment and the reform of the parole system. After hearing and earnestly considering the submissions, the expressions of deeply-held belief put to me by constituents and others on both sides of this issue, I remain convinced that our society provides the accused murderer with every safeguard that he has denied his victim. Should that accused be proven guilty beyond reasonable doubt, then I believe the state should provide the death penalty as a sentencing option.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Oostrom).

Mr. Oostrom: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson) so eloquently expressed the opinion of the majority of Canadians, including myself, and the majority of constituents of Willowdale who support a death penalty for premeditated murder. I may not be able to speak on this important topic at this stage of the debate due to time constraints. However, I would like to ask the Hon. Member why there are so many—I believe he said 123—countries in the world which still have the death penalty enforced by law. I would like to know more about that specific aspect.

• (1150)

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Sure, all of those great shiny examples of public morality, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Iraq, Afghanistan—

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) is busily quoting a number of socialist countries which retain the death penalty. I am not sure what his point is.

In answer to the Hon. Member's question, my concern is that many speakers in this debate have put forward the notion that because certain other countries do not have the death penalty, that they are somehow more civilized and in some way have a better system of justice than those countries which have retained the death penalty for certain crimes.

I simply want to point out, as I did earlier, that according to Amnesty International there are 28 countries which do not provide for the death penalty for any crimes at all, with another 18 countries which have the death penalty under conditions of military law, and another 129 countries which carry the death penalty for ordinary crimes.

I note that among the 28 countries which do not have the death penalty under any circumstance are countries such as Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, Panama, Kiribati, Tuvalu, and Vanuatu. So we have here a number of interesting countries—

Mr. Gauthier: England, France—

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): I can draw no conclusion from it other than that there clearly is a sovereign power in each of these countries and they will pass their laws in accordance with the circumstances of their respective societies.

I believe that in Canada, as in many other countries, we have a problem with violent crime, and I do not think that the answer to dealing with violent crime is to take the easy way out, to turn our backs on it. I believe we have to have a system of justice which carries a suitable punishment for the most heinous crime, and it is for that reason that I reject the argument about other countries, whether pro or con, and suggest that in this country, we should have the option of capital punishment under some circumstances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), on a question or comment.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the Hon. Member, although I disagree fundamentally with him.

He has said that the "silent majority" is in favour of the death penalty. However, the most recent polling by Decima Research, a firm which is well known to his Party, indicates that the number supporting or leaning toward capital punishment has now fallen to 61 per cent, and it has been falling steadily through the course of this debate. Of those, 37 per cent said that they were convinced about the death penalty, and 24 per cent said that they were only leaning toward that view.

We in Parliament, Mr. Speaker, have to make tough decisions, difficult decisions on matters on which the public may have some views. I think it is significant that as we get closer to a decision on this matter, the public support for the death penalty is wavering, and certainly the intensity of opposition to its reinstatement is strengthening. In my constituency, the mail is running 12 to 1 against the death penalty and for continued abolition.

The Hon. Member has cited the scriptures. Perhaps he could explain to the House why it is that every major church denomination in this country has come out against capital punishment. These are not government-financed bodies; rather, they are the Catholics, the Anglicans, the Jews, the Quakers, the Baptist Conference, and the list goes on. Why is it that all of the major churches, which provide leadership for Canadians on matters of conscience, are asking Parliament, in the strongest possible terms, not to reinstate the death penalty? I think we should listen very carefully to the leadership which is coming from the churches, and the unanimity with which it is coming. They are the people who do interpret the scriptures in their work, in their preaching, and they say, "Do not do it."

Should we, as parliamentarians, not give very careful consideration to that advice on a matter of conscience, given that it is advice coming from those who are charged with issues of conscience in our society?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention. Certainly, I agree with him that this is a tough decision, and a difficult one.

I have heard a number of speakers in this debate suggest that we ought not to have reference to the polls and what they may say today in regard to this matter.

In my speech, I carefully resisted referring to the polling information or, indeed, to the feelings of my constituents, because I understand that this is a matter of individual conscience for Members of Parliament.

However, I will say that I perceive that a clear majority of the constituents of Swift Current—Maple Creek have indicated to me that they favour the restoration of the death penalty, and I have certainly listened to those representations in arriving at my decision.

I note the Hon. Member's remarks about his mail. While that may be so, I must say that my mail at this point is running about 50-50—and I do not find that surprising, given the tremendous amount of organized agitation in favour of the retention of the abolitionist position.

There are a number of groups who are very well organized, and I am not being critical of them in any way. They have their point to make, and they are out there working very strongly toward achieving it.

As I said earlier, there is no organized movement for the restoration of capital punishment, though it is clearly a view that the majority of Canadians hold.

The final point raised by the Hon. Member related to the position of the clergy and the organized churches of the country on this issue. Again, I respect their viewpoints. Clearly, we have heard what they have had to say. It is my opinion, however, that the view expressed does not represent the opinion of the members of the respective churches. I hear various church groups putting forward opinions on free trade and other economic matters, and while I listen to those opinions, I do not take them as gospel, if I may put it that way.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I listen attentively to the church groups, to the Bishops; but, I pay attention to my constituents.

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) on a point of order.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, each time a Conservative Member speaks for twenty minutes, the Chair recognizes members of the same party during the period for questions and comments. According to our customs, the Opposition should also have the opportunity to express its views. I am sorry, but I have noticed this on many occasions, even though the Chair may deny it. This does happen!

Mr. Cassidy: I am not a Conservative.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am alternating on the basis of a Progressive Conservative, NDP, Progressive Conservative—and if the Hon. Member wishes to wait, he will get his turn, too.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, as I shall be speaking myself this morning about capital punishment, I shall be happy to let my colleague for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) ask questions in my place. Go ahead!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson).

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be pleased to respond to any question the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) has. I think we should—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. I recognized the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Oostrom) first, as he was the first to indicate that he wished to put a question. I then recognized the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), following which I was willing to recognize the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) and then the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi).

I think the Chair has been very fair, and I would ask that we get on with the debate.

If the Hon. Member for Portneuf has a question or comment, he may proceed, and following his intervention, I shall recognize the Hon. Member for Bourassa.

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. My colleague for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson) said in his speech that the state has the right to take away the life of an individual who has himself taken another life and had been found guilty of that crime. He also said that the abolitionists are much more concerned with the criminals than with the victim. First, as the state does not give life, I do not see why it should be able to take it away. Second, I would like him to explain to me how this can help the victim come back to life. After being killed, the victim is also dead. I do not think that killing someone else will bring the victim back to life. I would like the Hon. Member to go a bit further and provide weightier arguments as he has failed to convince me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson).

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I think the best way to respond to the question by the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) is to quote again Mrs. Lee-Knight who has suffered this sort of experience. She says:

> Such thinking apparently does not take into account those lives of victims that are being lept over. The victims are gone and cannot speak—easy to leap over them even piled as high as they are. The majority of families of victims are too heartsick to place themselves in an even more vulnerable position than they already are in by going public. The daily encounter, heartbreaking reminders as it is—they are subjected to cruel unthinking remarks—they have to keep trying to live and they are weakened and ineffective with the constant pain and continual trying. It's easy to leap over their heads, just disregard them and get on with idealistic (though not realistic) propaganda. They won't get in the way. Eventually abolitionists will convince themselves they—> —aren't real—don't really exist—not in their town, not in their neighbourhood.

She is referring to the victims, and continues:

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I was very glad to hear the Hon. Member say at the end of his speech—

"When I was elected to Parliament my first promise was to work on the reform of the penitentiary system and on capital punishment".

Here is my first question: Why does he not get seriously to work to develop a better penal system? Having been myself, as many Hon. Members will probably know, a lieutenant-detective in the armed robbery and homicide division in Montreal for thirty-one years, I can honestly say that his first suggestion that we apply our penal code to the letter would perhaps be a better solution than his second suggestion that we reinstate capital punishment. He may have promised to support reinstatement of the death penalty, but I would strongly advise that we first improve our penal system, because

I can tell the Hon. Member that many criminals who are arrested after one, two or three hold-ups may receive sentences of ten years of imprisonment, but are often out on the streets after two or three years.

What happens then? When they get out after two or three years, they are told that if they are caught committing another hold-up, they will finish their ten-year sentence and receive an additional sentence of perhaps eight or ten years. The criminal therefore sees to it that, if he commits another hold-up, he will not get caught. What is the result of this comedy? It can lead to murder.

As the Hon. Member said, Mr. Speaker, the first thing should be to reform our penal system. He was also right when he said that we are all human beings and that those who are in favour of the death penalty are not any less so than those who are against it. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I started off by being in favour of the death penalty, but it is very easy outside this place to say that you are for or against the death penalty. However, when you are elected to this place and you have to vote and say: Yes, I support the death penalty in this beautiful country of Canada, I want us to hire executioners to kill other human beings . . .

I am therefore asking the Hon. Member: Should we not improve our penal system first? As we are all human beings, if you were asked tomorrow to serve as executioner, would you do it?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, when I rose earlier I simply wanted to make the point to the Hon. Member for Bourassa that I thought this was a non-partisan, non-party issue and therefore it would obviously be up to Mr. Speaker to choose individual Members in terms of questioning, not with a view to switching back and forth from one Party to another. I think that is really the essence of this debate.

The Hon. Member suggested that capital punishment was the number one item on my agenda back in the campaign. That is certainly not so, far from it. My basic interest was to try to get the economy of the country working again. Indeed, that is what the Government has been trying to do.

There was a commitment to air the matter of capital punishment. A great many other items had to come ahead of it. It is now finally being given its expression, and I think it is an important fulfilment of a commitment.

I appreciate where the Hon. Member is coming from on the matter. I did, in my remarks, refer to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, under the chairmanship of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa West, which I understand will be undertaking a review of the parole and release system. I think that it is a very important initiative.

In the meantime, I also believe that the return of capital punishment for certain circumstances is necessary in order to beef up our system of justice and in order that law-abiding Canadian citizens may feel free to walk the streets of the country in safety.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Before recognizing the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), I believe there is a point of order from the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon).

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the tabling of petitions again. This morning the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) tabled a petition which he stated quite clearly contained several thousand names. He may have wished that it contained several thousand names, and they certainly went to a lot of effort to collect these across the country. The petitions all have at the bottom "please return postage free to" and it names the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre, NDP Postal Critic, House of Commons, Ottawa.

Instead of several thousand names, there are 607 names. I wonder how long we have to put up with this distortion, this exaggeration, to try to make the case which they do not have, to try to make the people watching think that there are many thousand or several thousand signatures when in fact the best effort they could come up with was 607.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper).

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to reply to my hon. colleague. I want to make it clear to him that I still have another stack sitting on my desk which I did not have enough time to sign this morning and which I will sign and table—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is debate—

Mr. Keeper: Allow me—you allowed him, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is debate, and it has no place at this time. The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier—

Mr. Keeper: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, you allowed him to get away with it; when it comes to the Opposition, you sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have already listened to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Keeper: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have listened to the Hon. Member for Victoria. I don't consider it to be a point of order, and I do not consider yours to be a point of order. On debate, the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier—

Mr. Keeper: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Keeper: A point of order, Mr. Speaker; I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You are favouring the Government, Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Keeper: You can't even hear the Opposition.

Miss MacDonald: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry we had this outburst. I will try to resume debate where we left off.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to make it clear that I consider the death penalty is useless, and I will try to prove this in the few minutes at my disposal.

Like any good citizen, I think murder is a horrible thing. I am emphatically against crime as such, but especially against murder.

Of all criminal offences, murder is the very worst. It is the ultimate crime against the individual. It deprives the individual of everything he has. It is the ultimate act of aggression. Murder is reprehensible in every way, both in moral and religious terms, both in the way it affects society and the way it affects the individual.

It is our duty and the duty of government authorities to use every means necessary to fight murder and to prevent it. As a society and as legislators, we have a moral obligation to strive for a better judicial system, a better corrections system, a better life and a better society, and we hope, Mr. Speaker, to be able to put an end to these heinous and anti-social crimes. We hope to put an end to the unnatural act of murder.

Mr. Speaker, politicians are not often given a chance to decide on issues that are so clear-cut. More often, they are asked to judge situations where grey areas prevail, where there are pros and cons, where there are several ways of looking at things, and where politics play a role.

In the question before the House today, which is capital punishment, there are no grey areas. There is only black or white. One is for or one is against capital punishment. Just like abortion, where one is either for or against. These are two moral issues that we politicians have to deal with. We have been asked to deal with them as individuals, to deal with them according to our own judgment and our own conscience, and that is what I intend to do.

Mr. Speaker, we debated this question in 1976. We made our case at the time, and capital punishment was abolished in this country. Today, it is up to the proponents of capital punishment, to those who truly believe that this measure can be restored and re-instated, to make their case. They not only have an obligation to do so, they will have to provide arguments that justify a return to capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, it is not enough to say we are for or against. We must provide arguments to support our stand. And that is why, in the few minutes remaining, I want to try and argue my case. I may not do so very convincingly, at least not convincingly enough to persuade the hardliners. However, these are my personal convictions, born of my own experience, and I stand by those convictions.

Mr. Speaker, in 1976 I voted against capital punishment, after a long period of reflection. The debate was a very difficult one. It was a very long debate, and public opinion in Canada was very much divided on the issue.

Today I just signed about thirty letters in reply to letters I received from my constituents, most of whom said: We do not want a return to capital punishment. However, there are still people who argue in favour of capital punishment. And they get an answer. I respect their opinions, but I tell them: I am sorry but we have a representative, democracy not a poll or push-button democracy with, in every Canadian home, one button "for" and one button "against", one black and one white. Canada's 282 elected representatives have been asked to vote according to their own enlightened judgment, after examining the issues, and as representatives of their ridings. And that is what I intend to do. And that is what I think all Members should do.

This morning, some people told me: Your vote should reflect the will of your constituents. Mr. Speaker, I can hardly vote so as to reflect the will of my constituents, because they are probably divided 50-50 on the issue. So I will do what I was elected to do. I will vote according to my own judgment, and I hope that those who do not share my views will realize that they are genuine and that I hold them because I have thought and read a lot about this question and have frequently discussed the issue in my riding.

And I know that young people—for instance, in schools I visited again recently—express views which differ from those we hear in senior citizens' homes. One factor is security. Older Canadians are more worried, so more of them would like to reinstate capital punishment. Nearly eight out of ten among young people are opposed to the death penalty. Indeed views differ from one generation to the next, and this is good because it goes to show that people are beginning to think about, reflect upon and read up on the issue, and this is important.

Mr. Speaker, let us deal with the arguments. My decision is prompted by a number of reasons and I will try to explain some of them. In light of representations which have been made, I happen to know for example that quite a few people do not share my opinion with respect to the deterrent impact of capital punishment. The argument we hear is that the death penalty is a deterrent since the fact that a murderer has been executed is bound to discourage others from committing the same crime. One only needs to read an article published recently in the daily newspaper La Presse which sums up the argument of Quebec's Association professionnelle des criminologues, and I quote word for word: "Death penalty proponents maintain that it has a deterrent effect, but the facts do not substantiate this statement. Five factors really contribute to effective deterrence: punishment severity, certainty, publicity, swiftness and frequency. Facts demonstrate that only the first criterion—" meaning the severity of the punishment—"relates to the death penalty. The certainty of capital punishment is more than dubious. Execution is carried out behind closed doors. It takes a very long time before it is applied—" I will get back to that—and it is ever less frequent. Therefore capital punishment has no deterrent effect."

I agree, Mr. Speaker. Capital punishment has no deterrent effect. For some people the death penalty is a case of conscience. Personally, for moral reasons and after lengthy reflection, it was in my soul and conscience that I arrived at a judgment. I have a sacred respect for every form of life and, for moral reasons, for personal moral reasons, I cannot condone the act of killing either by the state of by individuals. Of course there are circumstantial exceptions: legitimate defence by the state in case of war, or individual self-defence, the only two exceptions I can see which might warrant killing.

Given these premises, my judgment does not rest only on a moral question but also on a number of rational arguments. For one thing, there is the basic philosophy underlying this debate. Since time immemorial humankind has been seeking to achieve what we call civilization. As it happens, one of the characteristic feature of progress made by our societies in their evolution is the progressive repudiation of violence. I remember the debate when the Hon. Gérard Pelletier said, and I quote: "For ever indeed the road to civilization has been charted by the gradual refusal to kill one's fellow human being."

Mr. Speaker, history tells us that from the primitive society—where the old and the sick were killed, where the master had the right of life or death over his slave—to the most enlightened societies, there has been ever diminishing recourse to execution. For example, only 150 years ago people in England were still hanged for such minor infractions as shoplifting, a punishment which nobody would accept these days. This movement towards the abolition of capital punishement in contemporary societies is historic and unavoidable. This is why I sincerely deplore that a country as civilized as ours should revive this debate on an issue which, I suggest, was put to rest in 1976.

I understand the reasons and concerns that may have led some people to urge the Prime Minister to do such a thing. There is widespread coverage of murders taking place in Canada in the media, both in the newspapers and on television, so that people are aware of such atrocities. However, violence has now become commonplace on T.V. In fact, a child can see more violent crimes including murders, slayings and others by just watching televison for a few days than someone else will ever see in a whole lifetime. I tried 10 or 12 years ago to table in the House a bill that would have helped parents choose the type of programs that their children could watch by warning them when programs might have a harmful mental impact on children. However, that bill was not passed because, they said, it meant moral direction, and they did not want that. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I believe that enlightened parents should control those programs which display violence and sometimes feature a society in which mutual relationships are positively atrocious. Children watch those programs and no one is concerned. I believe it is a very sad situation.

As they watch that display of violence, people get increasingly concerned and tend to conclude that the crime rate is also on the rise. Indeed, it was shown in a 1982 Gallup poll that those television programs largely accounted for the fact that the people overestimate the phenomenon of violence by a wide margin. According to that poll, 75 percent of the people interviewed believed than more than 50 percent of criminal actions involve violence, whereas the real percentage is only 8 percent. Moreover, two people out of three in Canada believe that the number of murders has increased since 1976, whereas it has in fact remained relatively stable.

People are also very misinformed on the circumstances of murders, in spite of vociferous media coverage. For instance, very few people know that three out of four people who are murdered get killed by someone they know: a relative, a neighbour, a friend. We should have told people the real facts instead of stirring up passions that had cooled down since 1976. For instance, according to the official legal statistics of Statistics Canada, in 1976, the number of manslaughters had gone down by 20 percent, from 704 in 1985 to 561 in 1986. Since 1986, when capital punishment was abolished, the number of manslaughters has remained fairly constant, at around 650 per year. I grant that it is a lot and it is too much. That is why our prison system will have to be changed. Our parole system will have to be much more stringent and controlled. I wish to insist, Mr. Speaker, that those are 650 murders are too many. I do not think the restoration of capital punishment has any influence over those figures. The argument of capital punishment as a deterrent against crime which I heard earlier is difficult to defend logically, if one looks at statistics and reflects upon the various kinds of murders.

Mr. Speaker, on the statistics side, between 1962 and 1976, at a time the dealth penalty existed, we saw the number of murders increase constantly, from 265 in 1962 to 701 in 1975. The death penalty was abolished in 1976. Since then, the number of homicides declined from 701 in 1975, the year before abolition, to 561 in 1986, and as I said earlier, it is holding at a more or less constant level. Were capital punishment the deterrent it is said to be, we should have witnessed the opposite trend, that is to say that since murderers could be executed for their crimes before 1976 and if the deterrent effect worked, then the number of crimes should have increased or at least remained constant. That has not been the case. After 1976, since murderers no longer had to fear for their life, we could have expected a rise in crimes. That did not occur. Some might say those statistics are questionable. There is undoubtedly another logical way of refuting the argument that the death penalty is a deterrent. Let us examine for a moment the various types of crimes that are divided into three categories. First, there are crimes of passion. They account for fifty per cent of the crimes committed in Canada. Those are crimes committed in a state of anger and, by definition, not premeditated by their authors. Therefore, the deterrent effect cannot act in that case.

Then, there are murders committed by the mob, which can be said to have a form of death penalty for settling accounts. Who hasn't heard of bloody wars between rival factions fighting for territories, criminal activities? So, even though mobsters can be killed as reprisals by opposing factions, this does not prevent them from killing. Therefore, the deterrent effect does not come into play in those cases and would not either if the State intervened.

Finally, in the remaining cases where individuals commit sordid crimes, the majority of those crimes are committed by individuals with very acute personality problems. Therefore, if the individual is not fit for trial, it must be concluded that the deterrent effect does not apply, or again if the murderer suffers from mental illness, he cannot be convicted for his crime. Therefore, capital punishment again is useless.

Some would say that capital punishment must be reinstated for second-time offenders, people who have already been convicted and who, after being paroled or simply having done their time, commit a crime when they get out of prison. On the other hand, it must be noted that, according to statistics from the Professional Association of Criminologists, and I quote:

> Second offences (new murders) are very few in numbers when the individuals involved are paroled—less than six cases since 1963.

According to other sources, there would be 22 such cases. Whatever statistics we look at, I agree that if it be 22 cases, this is 22 cases too many, but in my view, drawing attention to the second offence problem is sidetracking the debate to important but secondary considerations. Those subsequent offence cases cannot be construed as pleas in favour of reinstating capital punishment, but rather as eloquent pleas in favour of a reshaping of our penal and judicial system, including parole. Because finally, Mr. Speaker, even if we had capital punishment, it remains that the major losers in that are the victims' families. And I find it deplorable that this House spends so much time debating the reinstatement of capital punishment, when we should have used all that time to try and find solutions to compensate relatives and victims of crimes.

Those victims need help, both financial and psychological, or just consolation. We should direct our action to them. And we would do much better by finding a solution for those people than by simply attempting to avenge them.

Indeed, on May 28, 1987, it was reported in the media that the federal and provincial Governments supported the establishment of a system allowing victims of criminal acts to get compensation from their aggressors. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) announced that discussions were well-advanced with his provincial counterparts for the setting up of a system that would force convicted criminals to pay a fine into a fund for compensating their victims. I commend the Minister for that initiative. This is something productive, constructive.

Such retaliatory measures as taking away from criminals their unlawfully acquired monies, either in the drug trade or otherwise, to give them to the victims seems to me to be much more progressive and civilized than the cruel and barbaric gesture of ordering the death of a human being. We advocate the indemnification and compensation of the victim rather than retribution.

Retribution, Mr. Speaker, is the other argument frequently heard to justify the reinstatement of the death penalty. However, I will not insist on that argument because I do not find it valid.

Retribution, the law of retaliation, is a sociological and judicial concept which is outdated in our civilized societies. Its logic is questionable and I think unjustifiable. Because someone strikes somebody else with a stick does not mean we should strike back likewise.

• (1230)

Other advocates of the death penalty, Mr. Speaker, base their case on economic grounds. I have heard that argument in my constituency. To keep prisoners in jail is costly. It is true that it is very costly. The detention of an inmate is a heavy burden for the State. Indeed, it represents about $110 per inmate per day in federal prisons and an average of about $85 in provincial jails. Admittedly, that is a lot of money. However, the death penalty will not change that. Indeed, to reduce the financial burden, all murderers would have to be put to death, that is some 650 per year. It is absolutely impossible to empty a jail and put all inmates to death. However, the legal proceedings which could extend the numerous appeals before the courts could be even more costly than imprisonment.

Moreover, I wrote on March 25 last to the Minister of Justice to try to obtain some statistics on the costs of legal proceedings leading to the death sentence. The Minister indicated in his reply that the relevant information was not available and had never been collected.

What we can do is estimate these costs by looking at those in the United States. A study which appeared in the October 15, 1986 issue of the Wall Street Journal established the costs of a trial ending in a death sentence at $4.5 million in California and $7.3 million in New York State. To institute proceedings and reach a conviction for murder. It could be argued, therefore, that it would be more expensive to obtain an execution, but I will not rely on this type of argument, Mr. Speaker. I wish to put forward other information.

On top of the economic arguments, a recent study recently showed that if the death penalty had existed these past few years in most Canadian provinces, at least one juror would have changed his or her verdict so as not to feel responsible for the accused being sentenced to death. As jury unanimity is required in this type of trials, this means that the accused would have been either sentenced to a lesser penalty, or acquitted or sent to a new trial. In any event, this means that the death penalty would have had the opposite effect, the murderer being released earlier than otherwise, and the whole exercise costing a lot more.

But there is another economic consideration, Mr. Speaker, and the most important at that. I have just mentioned the legal proceedings which are long and expensive. In view of this phenomenon and the clogging of the courts, a new process has developed, the so-called plea bargaining, which results in reduced sentences. Here is how it works, Mr. Speaker. In view of possible contestations, a Crown prosecutor will suggest to the Counsel for the defence to reduce the charge. For instance, by reducing the charge from first degree murder to second degree murder, on condition that the defence will not contest it during the proceedings. The result is that murderers can end up back on the street rather than in prison.

The instatement of the death penalty would not in any way change anything to this situation. In fact, the situation could be even worse, for there would be more proceedings involved. The frequency of plea bargaining would increase. But this plea bargaining system can work only if the accused has the ability to pay. If he is poor and destitute, I doubt really that a Crown prosecutor would suggest plea bargaining. Knowing that the client cannot pay, chances are that proceedings will end rather quickly. When the accused is poor, it goes very quickly and most of the time, he is found guilty.

Murderers are not all equal when faced with the death penalty, Mr. Speaker. There are those who can afford good lawyers and those who cannot. Unfortunately, society will treat them differently. The have-nots are penalized more heavily, as demonstrated by the U.S. statistics which I have examined. In the United States, out of 1,874 prisoners on death row, there are now 944 whites and 777 blacks, representing 50 percent and 41 percent respectively, while blacks represent only 12 percent of the population as a whole, Mr. Speaker. The have-nots and the poor are those who are affected most. Of course, the remaining 9 per cent are made up of minorities Hispanic or Puerto Rican minorities. Such minorities are heavily victimized by this plea bargaining system.

For all those reasons, I am against the death penalty. I admit that a problem exists, for the number of homicides is much too high. The solution can only be found through a thorough review of our judicial system, an economic impact review so as to reduce social inequalities and injustices. We need also to enhance our formal and vocational training systems, as well as adopt anti-poverty social measures. Let us not accept the institutionalization of the cruel, barbarous and unacceptable act that the death penalty is. If killing is the worst crime, I do not believe that the State should kill to convince people not to kill, either out of vengeance or for any other reason.

I sincerely doubt that the Right Hon. Prime Minister of this country, who is to take part in the debate, would want to make his mark as the one who reinstated the death penalty. I am sure that all the other Prime Ministers after him will not be proud to represent the first civilized country which instated the death penalty, after having abolished it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) has the floor.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier on being so straightforward and on the way he presented his speech, given the sensitive nature of the issue.

I would like to remind my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, as well as all the other Hon. Members in passing, that 11 years ago, on June 22 1976, at 11 o'clock, at about this time of day exactly 11 years ago, abolition of the death penalty was adopted in principle. At that time, Mr. Speaker, 133 Members had cast their vote in favour of Bill C-84 while 125 Members who were in favour of retaining capital punishment voted against it.

Mr. Speaker, after 11 years, after much debate . . . and you will recall that it was on July 14 that the bill came back to the House for third reading, at which time the result of the vote was 130 in favour of doing away with capital punishement and 124 against abolition.

I would like to ask my colleague, given that we are now here 11 years later, day for day, and almost hour for hour since the vote took place at 11 and it is now 12:35, I would like to ask him how he feels as a parliamentarian to see that we are taking a step backward. Eleven years ago, the House of commons, the people, took a stand against capital punishment. Eleven years later, why is it that we are not discussing positive measures, as my colleague the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier has mentioned, to eliminate juvenile delinquency, to prevent people from living in poverty and provide them a better education, better training as well as a more adequate parole and penitentiary system?

How does my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier feel eleven years later, as the House goes over the same debate? A debate which is useless, since it simply deals with a motion providing for consultations.

Does the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier have any comment to make to the effect that what we needed was a constructive debate to find specific solutions to the problems we are having with our prisons?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, the situation was different. In 1976, we had a Government Bill. That Government showed some leadership, it presented a Bill and was backing it. The entire Cabinet had approved the resolution.

Today, we have a motion before us which is not supposed to reinstate capital punishment, but once it is passed, it will be a fact. It is perfectly clear: This House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and—then we come to something I did not mention before, because I find it inappropriate for an abolitionist like myself—directs a special committee to report on the methods to be used to kill and who is going to be killed. Therefore, I cannot talk about the motion, I will only talk about the amendment. I reject the motion, because I feel it is a bad one. That motion does not invite Canadians to reflect on the principle of the death penalty, because that principle will already be adopted, we will have approved it. This is not the way it happened in 1976. Not because it was a Bill then, but because we have here the principle of reinstatement.

Then a committee will tour the country for "three months", or "six months" if the amendment ot the New Democratic Party is passed. I should mention that "six months" have been used to make the amendment acceptable to the Chair, it is a technical necessity.

Why should we have a committee going around the country for consultations on who to kill and how, when we are against the principle of killing?

In 1976, I voted with a full knowledge of the facts, I knew I was voting against capital punishment, because I did not believe in it. We won by six votes, but I think we are going to lose this time, Mr. Speaker. I feel very sad about that, as we are using a procedure here that I believe is absolutely disgraceful.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

• (1240)

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, for a junior Member like myself—I was elected to the House of Commons only thirty months ago—taking part in a debate on such a serious issue, the reinstatement of capital punishment in Canada, is quite a challenge. I do not lay claim to the verve or eloquence of many of my colleagues in the House. Nevertheless, I will try to explain to the people, to Canadians listening to us today, why I am an abolitionist, why I do not believe in restoring capital punishment in this country, and why the Government has reopened the debate on this issue.

It is not just because of a promise made during the election campaign. It was a fact that, in general, Canadians were in favour of reinstating capital punishment in Canada, especially if we look at the results of certain polls a few months ago, where 72 to 75 percent were in favour.

Since we started this debate in the House, Mr. Speaker, and now Canadians have heard both sides of the story, the views of those in favour and the views of those against capital punishment, the same percentage of Canadians who favoured the return of capital punishment is now against capital punishment. The Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson) said that in his riding, it was about 50-50, and I think that is how things actually stand today.

But why raise the issue again in the House of Commons? I think that in a democratic society like the one we have here in Canada, it is possible to question some of our fundamental principles from time to time. In a democracy like Canada, Mr. Speaker, we can afford to question the fundamental tenets of our society. Another thing that surprised me, Mr. Speaker, is the response of young Canadians who came to see me in my office and who are very concerned about the reinstatement of the death penalty in Canada. We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is still a young country. Confederation has existed for 120 years. Canadian citizenship only goes back to 40 years. In 1947, we were the first Commonwealth country to have its own citizenship. During five years, since I am 45 years old, I was a British citizen, although I was born in Canada. For the past 40 years, however, Canada always strived to improve the quality of life in this country, and to make its law better.

Mr. John Diefenbaker, who was a great Prime Minister and who took part in a few debates on death penalty, in 1966, was against the ultimate punishment. Why did Mr. John Diefenbaker become an abolitionist? I will quote part of what he said on April 4, 1966: "Some people claim that death penalty acts as a deterrent, but history has not proved it. Who could say that we abandoned that infamous punishment out of weakness? It is rather because juries started to look for reasons to acquit criminals." And I could draw a parallel between what Mr. John Diefenbaker said in 1966 and the words of Mr. Andrei Sakharov, a distinguished Soviet dissident who said: "I consider death penalty a brutal and immoral institution. A state, through its public servants, takes it upon itself to commit the most terrible and most irreparable act: to take away someone's life. Such a state cannot expect an improvement in the moral climate of its country. Those very similar statements were made by two men living in two totally different countries, under different political regimes.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, if you look at the judicial system as a whole, and if you look at the responsibility of parliamentarians in this House, they exercice the power of the state and some supporters of the return to death penalty claim that the state has the right to end someone's life. But you and I, Mr. Speaker, both detain 1/282 of that power. And I tell you that I will never yield that tiny part of power to restore death penalty. Some supporters of capital punishment say that they are obliged to do so in their riding. They are obliged to vote for it and they are afraid they will lose the next election if they do otherwise. This is in no way a valid argument. As for me, and my constituents know it, the people of the riding of Portneuf know my position, and I told them the following: Even if that was to cost me my re-election to Parliament, I will not support capital punishment. I will not cast a ballot that would send this country back to the lex talionis, because there is nothing that can force me to have even the worst criminal sent to the gallows for the most horrible crime imaginable—there is nothing that can force me to delegate my power. Because basically, what am I doing when voting the re-instatement of capital punishment?

I am delegating to officials the power to rule on matters of life and death. I am delegating to the judicial system, to judges, to average citizens that are selected to a jury and have no other choice than to sit on that jury. We will be delegating that power to them. We will be delegating to lawyers, police officers who will have a duty, as is their responsibility, to make honest and sincere investigations and to prove that an individual is guilty of something. It has been proven on a number of occasions that errors were made, perjuries committed. There have been all sort of things. Not that police officers did not do their jobs well! Quite the opposite! They had done an excellent job. But in the judicial system errors were made in the past. Those who support capital punishment say no. The system is so perfect, so safe there is no way an error can be made in cases of first degree murders.

On the other hand, we have examples of errors on second degree murders— just recently, a young man was sentenced to 11 years in penitenciary—11 years—he was deprived of his freedom because of a judicial error. But there is no way it can happen on first degree murders. An error can be made on second-degree murders, but not on first-degree murders. That is false.

There is a quote from Victor Hugo where he wrote something that is truly very real in my view, that I find very touching anyway. Victor Hugo said:

> There are three things that are God's own and that belong to no man: the irrevocable, the irreparable, and the indissoluble.
> Irreparable punishment implies infallible judges.

I believe that Victor Hugo was right in saying that. Because in fact nobody is perfect in this Parliament, even though he may have ben elected with a majority of 25,000 votes in his riding, anyone can make a mistake. Any government can be mistaken, but the mistake is not irrepairable. But any individual sentenced to death and executed simply cannot be revived by the state. If the state has made a mistake there is no way it can atone for it. Some people would argue that abolitionists defend criminals rather than victims. Mr. Speaker, even if the state chooses to execute a criminal, the worst possible option, it will not bring the victim back to life. The victim will remain dead, nobody will bring life back, that is impossible.

Mr. Speaker, young Canadians under age 25 have never known the death penalty. Unless I am mistaken, the last hanging took place in Toronto 25 years ago. All youths, boys and girls born in this country, have never known the death penalty. The immigrants from every corner of the world who chose Canada as their new homeland probably came here because ours is a different country. There was no death penalty in Canada, it was legally abolished in 1976. And over the past 25 years, people who were born in this country or who chose it have never heard of a state execution. There has been none.

Mr. Speaker, are we so lacking in ideas and hope in the people of Canada and its young people that we have to resort again to an eye for an eye to solve a problem which commands a far wider-ranging approach? A previous speaker alluded to violence which can be seen on television day in and day out. Not long ago I spent about an hour an a half watching television: 36 dead, 36 people killed on the TV screen.

While we speak about violence and the fact that there is a problem, have the Canadian society and this Parliament done everything possible to prevent crime? If we put as much effort and money into crime prevention as in our penal institutions and police forces, would we now have to discuss reinstatement of the death penalty?

As for me, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if this Parliament votes for this, if one single Member of this House votes for reinstatement of the death penalty, we are capitulating in the face of a problem.

As for me, I am not a man to capitulate. There is a problem to solve in our society. There is a serious problem of delinquency and criminality. But why does such a problem exit? Nothing much has been said about that. Those who are for reinstatement of the death penalty have not spoken of this real problem which is at the source of criminality.

I would like to say something else, Mr. Speaker. What difference is there between a violent mental defective locked up in a psychiatric hospital and a criminal condemned to twenty-five or thirty-five years in prison? I can tell you the difference. One of them has had the misfortune of killing someone. If we reinstate the death penalty, if we agree to euthenasia in Canada, we shall start with criminals and the resolution says that we shall choose the type of criminals who will be euthenized. But how far will this go? I challenge anyone to find me a single normal human being who is able to commit a murder in cold blood.

I asked several psychologists and psychiatrists a number of questions. I have been considering this issue for quite a long time. Those who are in favour of euthanasia will say: keeping in prison these people who are beyond rehabilitation costs a lot of money. It would be like saying that we should get rid of all chronic mental patients because they cost a lot of money to society? Why not do the same with terminal cancer patients? We might as well finish them off, for they cost society a lot of money. These are unacceptable arguments. We cannot use them.

To those who rely on both the Old and New Testaments to support their position, I can say that I found in the Bible all the evidence I would need to support both sides of the issue.

We cannot base our position on this and say: I am for or against the death penalty. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the message of the Holy Scriptures is this: You will follow the direction of your conscience and you yourself will decide. You can choose either position A or position B. It is up to you. My decision is clear and final. I am not going to let anybody kill on my behalf. I will not give the power of life or death to any administration or civil servants. I will not want to return to a situation where a juror, for fear of making a mistake, would strive to let someone who is guilty and deserve a severe punishment go free. We need to review our penal code. We must work in this direction, but not demand an eye for an eye as we used to. It is not an argument to say that the State should have the right of life or death over its citizens. The State does not give life. But it must see to it that life is protected.

Very often, Mr. Speaker, you will find that many of those who are in favour of reestablishing capital punishment are against abortion. I just cannot understand how they can be against abortion on the one hand and for capital punishment on the other. In both cases, a life is involved.

Of course, they could claim that an unborn child is not guilty of anything. The murderer, on the other hand, is a despicable person. But what made him the way he is, Mr. Speaker? At what age did the child become contemptible? Very young, Mr. Speaker, when he was in kindergarten. When a boy is rather unruly, the child of a divorced family in many cases who has been through a dozen of foster homes . . . I met a young man in my own municipality. He had lived, Mr. Speaker, in 14 foster homes in seven years.

How long did it take us to get used to our new life as members of Parliament? We are not very young any longer. Some children of 8, 10, 12, 15 years of age are asked to adjust themselves to many successive foster homes. That is the starting point. He is boisterous at school. The teacher says: "He is my scatterbrain pupil. Go in the corner. You cannot listen." He will grow up and reach high school. He is a scatterbrain. He cannot be good. He cannot go out with a nice girl. He is a good-for-nothing, so it out of the question. He loiters at the corner restaurant. He bums around. This is what he will do till the day where a judge will rap his gavel and tell him: "You are sentenced to two years in jail because you are a scatterbrain and a misfit." And then, we will try to cast him in our mould. Is our mould really used to try and help rehabilitate those young people? No.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that our mould is far from being perfect. Our rehabilitation system for criminals in Canada is far from being satisfactory, because insufficient funds are available. We should put into crime prevention as much money as we put into our jails and our police forces. This is what should be done, Mr. Speaker, and we should not return to the law of retaliation. It makes no sense.

I have read about horrible cases. Imagine! In 1803, a 13 year-old boy was hanged because he had stolen a cow. It is terrible! We would say that no such thing could happen in 1987. Such were the times. We have progressed in Canada with the passage of time. In 1861, there was a riot in Montreal because two people were scheduled to be hanged that day and one of them had been amnestied the day before. There was a riot. They changed methods. They hanged them secretly thereafter. But that did not change the problem, it did not solve the situation. It did not improve the system in Canada. They did not really solve the real difficulty, which is prevention, the modernizing of our judicial systems in Canada.

How many times did I hear police officers tell me: We arrest an individual for drug trafficking, and before we have time to fill in all the forms he is already back on the street. We arrest a guy caught in the act for armed robbery. Two years later he is already out of prison. Is that normal, Mr. Speaker?

But at some point there will be an accident. There will be a murder. A human life will be spent. And I do not support legalizing murder in Canada. No, I am against crime. But crime must be prevented. That is the beginning, the starting point. When we see horrible films on T.V., how is it possible that young children four, five, six years old will not have a tendency to violence? If we try to fight violence with violence, Mr. Speaker, we will get nowhere. Because if the State becomes as violent as the worst murderers in society, I do not believe we will solve the problem. We will not be setting an example. The role of the State, the role of the Canadian Government is to set an example.

If capital punishment had been reinstated, Mr. Speaker, do you think I would have been able to vote for Bill C-28 presented by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn)? The main objective of that Bill was:

> This Act would implement the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted by the United Nations on December 5, 1984 and signed by Canada on August 23, 1985.

How would it have been possible, Mr. Speaker, for Parliamentarians, Members of this House with 1/282 of the life and death power in this country, to vote for a Bill against torture, and cruel and inhuman treatment?

Mr. Speaker, if capital punishment is not a cruel and inhuman punishment, I wonder what it is. You can read what has been written on the subject, and I am glad that journalists have reported abundantly on the reality of death row. What about the fact that light stays on 23 hours a day, to prevent suicide. Justice must be served and the accused must be kept alive. That is justice for society.

NATIONAL PARKS

SOUTH MORESBY—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the issue of South Moresby demonstrates that, when we come right down to it, the provinces place their own objectives above national objectives. So much for the new spirit of co-operative federalism.

The federal Government is perceived as a pushover at the negotiating table. The Premier of British Columbia has proven he wants to exploit the situation to the limit, a form of "environmental hostage taking" as so aptly described by Margaret Atwood today. Where is the "spirit of partnership" the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) proclaimed on May 1? Canada's Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) has called for public support to put pressure on the Premier of British Columbia. I support that call.

In addition, Environment Canada and the Minister should become ardent advocates for the protection of South Moresby and generate the public pressure necessary to bring the Premier of British Columbia to reason. I call upon every Member of this House to help in building up such pressure. South Moresby should not be held for ransom and the Premier of B.C. should not be allowed to make a mockery of the new co-operative federalism proclaimed on May 1 by the Prime Minister.

OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Hon. Suzanne Blais-Grenier (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, our Government wants to limit the debate on the death penalty and hold the vote immediately.

First, we resumed a discussion which many found quite needless. Now, the Government wants to close the debate right away, before the summer adjournment. Where is the logic in this?

The issue with which we are dealing goes beyond the death penalty; it has to do with how we view civilization, with what kind of society we are. It is therefore important for all parliamentarians to be able to express their views. This is a matter of democracy. Otherwise, Canadians would be quite justified in accusing us of political opportunism.

Either this debate was necessary and should be carried out fully, or else it was frivolous and therefore unwarranted.

[English]

It is essential that every Member of this House states his position, if he so wishes. It is a matter of right and democracy. What we need here is the understanding of what freedom of speech means. What we do not need is a closure or a vote hastily called.

REFUGEES

BILL C-55—ALLEGED VIOLATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Government has been officially accused of proposing to violate international law with Bill C-55 on refugees. In 1948 Canada signed the U.N. Declaration of Human Rights which states in Article 14: "Everyone has the right to seek and enjoy another country's asylum from persecution". This was the first international treaty aimed at protecting the rights of individuals.

As the United Nations High Commission for Refugees wrote to the Minister on June 12, Bill C-55 would violate both that treaty and the U.N. Convention and Protocol for Protection of Refugees which we signed in 1967.

Bill C-55 would violate these laws by, first, screening out applicants because of their country of origin or a so-called "safe" country they pass through, denying them a chance to make an individual claim, second, by refusing rejected claimants the right to have an appeal or review by a central body and, three, worst of all, by sending real refugees back, directly or indirectly, to the country they fled.

I call upon the Government to honour Canada's legal obligations to the United Nations by withdrawing Bill C-55.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—PROVISIONS WELCOMED

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I met several hundred constituents in Nepean—Carleton during the weekend. All welcomed those aspects of tax reform which related to agriculture, small business, and high technology which are so fundamental to the economy of that riding.

The reform initiatives were welcomed because they provide stability and incentives which are so important to the business sector because it has created 80 per cent of all jobs, not only in Nepean—Carleton, but nationally.

The local community was also estatic during the weekend because Carleton University, Ottawa University, and 13 high technology companies, together with the Ottawa-Carleton Research Institute, were selected to establish a world-class telecommunications centre.

This decision will bring industry and universities closer together to conduct leading-edge research and to provide job opportunities for young scientists and engineers. It also reinforces Ottawa-Carleton's position as the high technology centre for Canada. Most important, it is part of a pathway to the future for all Canadians.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN BANDS—FUNDING SOUGHT TO FIGHT COURT CASE

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Alliance of Tribal Councils representing 36 Indian bands in British Columbia has been patiently waiting for almost a year for the Government of Canada to fulfil its promise to provide funding for its court case with CN Rail.

The Indian bands represented by the Alliance have been forced into court because the federal Government has failed to protect their rights, because the Province of British Columbia does not acknowledge their rights, and because Canadian National refuses to negotiate in good faith.

• (1405)

Both the Province of B.C. and the federal Government are defendants in this case. Both Governments and CN have the resources they require for the legal action. To deny the Alliance the funding it needs to protect its rights and to participate on an equal footing with all the other parties would be a travesty of justice. At issue are aboriginal rights to fish and rights to cultural and economic survival.

Therefore I urge the Government to meet its obligations and to keep its promise—approve this funding before the summer recess of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

PROPORTION OF WORKERS SUPPORTING SYSTEM

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, when the coming senior citizen population explosion first dawned on us, Canadians suddenly realized that soon there would be a decreasing number of workers to help pay for our social security system, particularly pensions.

Today there are six people between the ages of 18 and 64 for every person 65 years of age and over. Before too long, however, there will be only two people of working age for each senior citizen. All of this could change in the next few years if our productivity substantially increases, or if more seniors continue to work, or if our birth rate goes up, or if we increase immigration. One thing is clear—if we try to maintain our current six-to-one portion of working-age Canadians to seniors we will have to increase our population to 54 million people, more than doubling it over the next 40 years.

Our present immigration level of 125,000 people per year will maintain and stabilize our present 25 million population, but it will not produce the number of workers we will need to pay for our social security system. The time to start planning is now.

NATIONAL PARKS

SOUTH MORESBY—REQUEST PRIME MINISTER COMMUNICATE WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA PREMIER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on May 14 the House unanimously passed a motion calling for the co-operation of the B.C. Government in setting aside South Moresby as a national park reserve. Two weeks ago Ottawa offered $106 million. A week ago British Columbia turned that down. Last Wednesday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised to use every lever to persuade B.C. He has not used one yet.

The B.C. Cabinet meets on Wednesday to decide the fate of the area. Canadians from coast to coast have risen to the moment and in unprecedented numbers are calling, writing, and sending telegrams to Victoria and Ottawa. At $106 million Ottawa is offering to pay more for South Moresby than it cost for all 32 national parks in Canada.

The B.C. Premier says it's just a bunch of easterners who want South Moresby preserved. Well, I just returned from B.C. last night and support for South Moresby is everywhere. British Columbia's 28 MPs are unanimous in our support and do not take kindly to being called easterners by the man from Fantasy Gardens.

I trust that the Prime Minister will use the right lever on this issue and remember that he is Canada's Prime Minister in British Columbia and should not hesitate to go to British Columbia between now and Wednesday to find a fair and just settlement for all Canadians and all British Columbians.

EMPLOYMENT

COMMUNITY FUTURES PROGRAM—CREATION OF JOBS

Mr. Elliott Hardey (Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is time this House recognized and applauded the Government's initiative in offering assistance to hundreds of communities across Canada by way of the Community Futures Program.

My riding of Kent in southwestern Ontario has now moved into the final stages of the Community Futures initiative. The excitement that comes with successful, locally administered assistance is overwhelming. New businesses that bring permanent jobs is only the beginning. We estimate $1.6 million of federal money will be pumped into Kent as new ideas to improve the local economy are considered each month by the operating committee. At that point the program will likely fly on its own as it continues to create new jobs and self-respect for my constituents.

As well, there have been megaprojects approved in communities across Canada under this program which have accessed funds up to $5 million. With this kind of incentive, and people helping people, existing businesses will expand and welfare rolls will begin to diminish. The five-point program of the Community Futures initiative covers all these areas.

To the Government, and especially to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard), the riding of Kent says: "Thank you!" This is one government job-creation program that works.

HARBOURS AND PORTS

REPAIRS NEEDED FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND WHARFS

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to bring attention to the worsening state of our harbours and wharfs. The Conservative Government has already slashed some $10 million from its Small Craft Harbours budget. In fact, on May 12, 1987, the Deputy Minister of Fisheries and Oceans informed the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans that over the next five years some 150 wharfs and harbours in Canada could be closed due to a shortage of funds. This includes some 13 fishing ports in Prince Edward Island.

In Tignish, many fishermen have requested the federal Government to undertake some badly needed wharf repairs at Tignish Run. Both the north side and the south side wharfs are in deplorable shape. The old wooden structures have rotted and the concrete decks have collapsed. We cannot ignore this urgent request.

Dependable and well-maintained wharfs are absolutely essential to our communities. We must not only avoid disruption in fishing time but, more important, we must not jeopardize the health and safety of our fishermen.

I urge the Government to allocate these funds immediately.

CANADIAN JOBS STRATEGY

PROGRAM TO HELP NORTHWEST TERRITORIES SOCIAL ASSISTANCE RECIPIENTS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is shameful that a large proportion of welfare recipients are employable people. Individuals suffer from lack of both income and self-esteem, and the nation from loss of productivity.

To address this problem, the federal, provincial and territorial Ministers, in September of 1985, reached the Agreement on Enhancing the Employability of Social Assistance Recipients.

The Governments of Canada and the Northwest Territories are to be complimented on putting into effect this year one of the first accords reached under that master agreement.

The diversion of Canada Assistance Plan funds into job training and development under the Canadian Jobs Strategy is something that we expect to pay dividends by permanently reducing the welfare rolls and creating a better life for hundreds of former welfare recipients.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TREATMENT OF PREFERRED SHARES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) promised Canadians a fair tax system. However, financial holding companies, such as Brascan, which was created to minimize the tax liabilities of the Bronfman empire, have created paper corporate structures for the purpose of issuing preferred shares on whose dividends there are no taxes payable.

Surely this kind of corporate tax avoidance should have been a perfect target for tax reform by the Minister of Finance. But did the Minister consider the dangerous levels of corporate concentration financed by tax-free preferred shares? No.

Did he crack down on Brascan and Hees International for using the public purse to create paper companies to avoid taxation? No.

Instead, tax reform for preferred shares starts on December 31 and only for shares created after June 18.

Why the double standard? Why will Bronfman shares, among others, continue to be tax exempt?

To explain, The Globe and Mail on Saturday quoted an investment expert, who said that Brascan and Hees are "too close to the Government".

So much for Progressive Conservative tax reform.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

LAY-OFFS—CALL FOR PRESIDENT'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to lend support to District No. 26, United Mine Workers of America, in their fight against the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and in particular against the Government of Canada with regard to the down-sizing of the coal industry in Cape Breton.

On December 16, 1986, the Vice-President of Human Resources of the Cape Breton Development Corporation wrote to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux), advising him of terminations which were to take place on April 13, 1987, and subsequently in April of 1988 whereby some 480 individuals would be terminated, and that, notwithstanding the commitment to employment made by the Government in view of the high unemployment in Cape Breton, which is, in some areas, as high as 50 per cent.

The Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Côté) wrote me on May 11 last and said the following:

> As you may be aware, I recently reviewed these issues with the Corporation and am pleased by the more socially sensitive direction which has been taken.

I wish to inform the House, Mr. Speaker, that this so-called "socially sensitive direction" that the corporation is now taking has led to 170 individuals being terminated at the Cape Breton Development Corporation, with additional terminations to follow.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the Government is going to be true to its commitment made in December of 1984 to the coal mining communities of Cape Breton, it change this regressive policy, a policy headed by a regressive management at the Cape Breton Development Corporation. And, Mr. Speaker, I call once again for the resignation of the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, effective immediately.

DANYLO SHUMUK—FORTHCOMING APPEARANCE BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Andrew Witer (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, after spending 34 years of his life in prison in Soviet gulags, Ukrainian dissident Danylo Shumuk, whose unflagging efforts on behalf of human rights are well known, joins us here today in Ottawa.

In May of this year, the Soviet authorities at long last provided Shumuk with an exit visa, allowing him to join his family in Canada. This was a direct result of years of protest by Members of this House and the personal intervention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark).

Through his unbending will and personal sacrifice, Shumuk has become a symbol to freedom-lovers everywhere in their struggle for the cause of freedom and liberty for people of all nations.

Tomorrow, Shumuk will become a full participant in our democratic process as he testifies before the Standing Committee on Human Rights, giving testimony of human rights violations in Ukraine.

Today, as he gazes down from the gallery, he finally has the opportunity to observe first-hand, real democracy in action.

TAX REFORM

SITUATION OF CERTAINS PERSONS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, this weekend, I met with senior citizens, families, young people, workers and business people. All of them denounced the tax reform Budget announced by the Minister of Finance and expressed their disappointment in this document.

These people would like to know why the Government has decided, unfairly and illegally, to grant $1,600 in rebates to people with an income of $100,000 or more and only $90 in to those with an income of $15,000 or more.

The poor would also like to know why this Government is allowing them only $20 a year in tax credits while high income Canadians are getting all the breaks.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, all these people were unanimous to in saying: No, no and no to the tax on food and the sales tax!

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—SUPPORT FOR PROVISIONS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, after extensive consultation with Canadians from coast to coast, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has launched the most comprehensive tax reform in Canada's history. The theme and thrust of the reform are greater fairness.

Through the progressive conversion of exemptions and deductions to tax credits, an additional 850,000 Canadians will not need to file a tax form again. Nine out of ten Canadians, aged 65 or older, will pay less tax. Eight out of ten Canadian households will pay less tax. Over the next five years personal income tax revenue will decrease by $11 billion.

Corporate income tax will be increased by $5 billion by shutting down or reducing certain preferences. Most Canadians agree that the corporate sector, particularly banks and other financial services corporations, should be carrying more of the tax load.

The initial reaction of Canadians has been favourable. We had a breakfast meeting in Don Valley East last Friday which was chaired by Ken Stephen. Our panel of tax experts included Maureen Pappin, of Deloitte, Haskins and Sells; David Hughes of Blake, Cassels and Graydon; and Ian Young of CIL Inc. With almost 150 people in attendance, most agreed that the Government is on the right track.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—FUTURE OF AUTO PACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade. Only last week the Government, through the mouth of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade, again insisted that the Auto Pact was not on the free trade negotiating table.

Now we learn from a confidential memorandum, setting out what U.S. deputy negotiator Merkin told congressional staff, that the Government has in fact been negotiating the Auto Pact all along during the free trade negotiations and has in fact agreed to end Canadian auto tariffs, the only lever the Government has to ensure that Canadian automotive production and job safeguards can be met.

I want to ask the Minister how can Canadians believe anything the Government says on this or any other matter after this information from Ambassador Merkin? I ask the Minister will she be honest with Canadians? Will she tell the truth to Canadians just this once and admit that the Auto Pact is on the table, that the auto tariffs are gone, and that 200,000 automotive jobs are at risk? Will she tell the truth on this for the Government just this once?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the problem with the question as put is that it is based upon something which is not true. I have repeatedly told this House—and it is still true today—that the Auto Pact has not been discussed in these negotiations. It has not been discussed in any form in these negotiations.

Canada does not intend to put the Auto Pact on the table. We believe, as I have told the House, that it is working well. If the Americans wish to make any proposals, which they have not yet done, we will look at them. If they increase employment, increase production, and increase investment in Canada, we will look at them.

AUTO PACT'S FUTURE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): The Minister is saying that Mr. Merkin is not telling the truth. Is the Minister not prepared to accept that Mr. Merkin said the Government is prepared to turn the Auto Pact into a skueleton, an empty shell?

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, has the Government agreed with the United States to end Canadian automotive tariffs? Will the Minister answer this with a clear yes or no? Canadians deserve to have an answer on whether the Government intends to sell them out once again and put at risk, if not lose, 200,000 Canadian jobs. Give a straight answer. Has the Government agreed to end Canadian automotive tariffs?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am really shocked at the ignorance—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Resign then.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): She is shell shocked.

Miss Carney: I am shocked at the ignorance of the Hon. Member. He, above all, should know that there are no tariffs in effect on trade within the Auto Pact. He should know that. There haven't been any tariffs for about 25 years. I am shocked that the Member stands in this House and suggests that there are tariffs on trade in the Auto Pact that apply on automobile trade between these two countries.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if this is the Minister's level of knowledge of the Auto Pact, she ought to resign on the spot.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Minister should know that the tariffs are there unless North American automotive companies meet Canadian job and production standards in Canada. If they do not, they have to pay the tariffs.

Speaking of ignorance, Mr. Speaker, the Minister has given an example unparalleled in this House by any Minister.

CONTENT OF U.S. OFFICIAL'S MEMORANDUM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, will the Government, as has been reported by Mr. Merkin, be attempting to get the provinces to agree to dismantling the Auto Pact by threatening to withhold federal revenues? If so, what are they for, medicare, housing, or day care? Why is the Government ready to make the seniors, the elderly, and the children of this country hostages to its blind, misguided desire to have a free trade pact with the United States?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the last question, is the federal Government threatening the provinces, is ridiculous. There is nothing to threaten them with. This Government has done more for national reconciliation than any Government in our history.

Second, the Hon. Member talks about the implementation of tariffs in the Auto Pact. I am shocked that he does not understand that the Auto Pact is operating way over the safeguard levels, 600,000 vehicles over the safeguard level—

Mr. Broadbent: That is a different question.

Miss Carney: —where those tariffs would kick in. Forty thousand more jobs are involved with the Auto Pact as it is functioning now than in the disastrous scenario which the Hon. Member predicts.

The Auto Pact is not on the table. It has not been put on the table. Canada will not put it on the table, and why won't the Opposition accept that?

REDUCTION OF TARIFFS—EFFECT OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up with the Minister on the answers that she has just given. The Hon. Minister has said that the question of the Auto Pact is not being negotiated.

An Hon. Member: That is not it.

Mr. Axworthy: Whatever the question may be, let's go back to the statements by the Minister. Is it not true that the Government of Canada today, with the two negotiators in town, is negotiating a total reduction of tariffs between our two countries down to zero levels? Is it not also true that if that tariff reduction to zero applies to the Auto Pact then all the conditions, guarantees and safeguards that apply to the Auto Pact will no longer be in existence? Therefore, the Auto Pact does not exist. Is that not a logical and necessary consequence of this Government negotiating away the tariffs on this matter and on all other matters? Will the Minister at least not agree to that simple and very common sense conclusion of what the Government is now doing?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member's question I can point out that the negotiators are talking about a hypothetical model of taking all tariffs on everything on a broad basis, except those areas that have been identified as sensitive, to zero. Can I also point out that automotive trade under the Auto Pact now operates effectively at zero?

• (1425)

Can I repeat the answer I gave in the House on March 16 about the safeguards? I said then and I say now that I want to assure the Hon. Member that the automobile industry in Canada is working well above the level of safeguards. If production ever fell to the safeguard level in the Auto Pact, this country and the Province of Ontario and that Hon. Member would be in trouble. That is what I said on March 16 and that is what I can repeat today.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to point out to the Hon. Minister that there is nothing hypothetical about negotiating away the jobs of hundreds of thousands of auto workers, of agricultural workers and of workers in the food processing industry. There is nothing hypothetical about having only two and a half months to go until a trade deal has to be signed.

Is the Government basically saying that it is negotiating in the common room and not negotiating in realistic terms about what kind of trade deal we will have with the United States? Is it not time the Government quit being hypothetical and got down to practical realities? Canadian workers' jobs are at stake. We would like to know, and I want to ask specifically—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is true that jobs are at stake in these negotiations. If we do not succeed, we could lose half a million jobs because of the protectionist trends in the U.S. and elsewhere. May I point out to the Hon. Member that all of the studies we have seen indicate that there will be an increase in jobs if we are successful in bilateral free trade with the U.S., and there will be a decrease in jobs if we fail.

AUTO PACT—TARIFF PROVISIONS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same Minister. I say to the Minister as a preface that the people of Canada do not trust the Government in general and in particular they do not trust the Government to negotiate with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members know that argumentative and pejorative questions invite long and argumentative and pejorative answers. I would ask the Hon. Member to put his question, build his preface on facts and stay as far away as he can from pejorative comments.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that the Minister either misstated reality completely or revealed a scandalous ignorance for a Minister conducting international trade when she said that for the past 25 years there have been no tariffs on automobiles—

Miss Carney: Effective tariffs.

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister said that there have been no tariffs for the past 25 years. Will she clarify that and admit she was wrong? Will she say that the Auto Pact requires that unless certain investment requirements are made in Canada, the automotive companies do in fact have to pay duty related to those tariffs and that is what the Auto Pact is all about? Will she admit that she was wrong right now?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not admit that I am wrong. I said that automotive trade under the Auto Pact right now operates tariff-free. The Hon. Member is referring to the fact that a nominal tariff, the most-favoured-nation tariff, does kick in under the Auto Pact if the safeguards are not met. I can only repeat that the safeguards have been met for years. If we ever operated at that level, we would be in deep trouble.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO U.S. OFFICIAL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons the safeguards have been met for years and why there are jobs in Quebec and Ontario and related jobs elsewhere is that we have a duty and a tariff structure as a carrot or a stick. The Government should understand that and keep those duties in place.

A key American negotiator, not just anyone, has said categorically that the Canadian Government has agreed to drop tariffs and, second, that the Canadian Government has agreed to get other concessions from other provinces, and this is of particular interest to the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Is the Minister now saying that Mr. Merkin is lying, or is the Government of Canada misleading the people of Canada once again?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is talking about a memo allegedly written by an American, dealing with Americans. I suggest that he ask that question of the Americans.

I can only say that when I was in Washington on my last trip I met with Mr. Yeutter, the U.S. trade representative, and we agreed that over the course of the summer there would be garbled press reports, there would be leaked memos, there would be all sorts of garbled information, and we both agreed we would not comment on such misinformation as the Hon. Member has presented in this House.

• (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: If I were an American Senator I would go to an American for the answer. Just for once I thought I could go to a Canadian Minister and get the truth.

AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR GUARANTEES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Considering that a good many jobs in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario would be affected by Government decisions concerning the Auto Pact, can the Minister assure Canadians, Quebecers and Ontarians particularly, that the Government has not decided to abolish tariffs in the automotive sector?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is simply restating his question. My answer is the same. There are no effective tariffs on auto trade as it is now. If we ever fell to the level of the safeguards where you do kick in a nominal tariff we would have lost 40,000 jobs in Ontario and Quebec. We want to ensure that we have an over-all free trade agreement that creates jobs.

The Hon. Member is still raising the Auto Pact issue. I am telling him and this House that the Auto Pact is not on the table. Canada will not put it on the table. If the Americans want to put it on their side of the table, if they bring proposals forward that enhance investment, production and jobs in Canada, we will look at it.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CODE OF CONDUCT—STOCK HOLDINGS OF MINISTER FOR PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the so-called blind trust of the Minister of Public Works which appears to have 20/20 vision.

We know the Minister received at his home monthly statements of his stock portfolio, contrary to the conflict of interest guidelines. We know the Minister's friend and fund raiser was managing his portfolio contrary to the guidelines. How can the Deputy Prime Minister say that the Minister's assets were in a blind trust when he was receiving stock portfolio information on a monthly basis, and when his best friend and fund raiser was managing that portfolio? Would he not agree that is a blatant breach of the guidelines?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, once again the Hon. Member is casting aspersions and making insinuations about a Minister. I want to inform him and the House that the Minister is in the process of putting all the facts together and he will be making a statement to the House, either later today or tomorrow, which hopefully will clarify the issue.

Mr. Nunziata: The Minister should be here today to defend himself.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, we have documents which show that monthly stock portfolio statements were sent to the Minister's home. We know as well that the Minister's so-called blind trustee is his friend and fund raiser. We know this is another case of a Tory Minister showing contempt for the conflict of interest guidelines. The Minister's blind trust is an absolute sham.

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Nunziata: In view of the facts as we know them will the Deputy Prime Minister, on behalf of the Government, refer this whole matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure so we can conduct a full and complete investigation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I just want to advise the Hon. Member and the House that the Minister will defend himself. He will make a statement. May I simply remind the Hon. Member that not too long ago we had similar aspersions and insinuations about the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. They were somewhat less than in accordance with the facts. Perhaps the Hon. Member may want to reflect and wait until he hears what the Minister has to say.

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—FUTURE OF AUTO PACT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. How can she say that the Auto Pact is not on the table when we have seen the pressure applied by the Governor of Michigan? I now have a letter here from the Governor of Wisconsin making precisely the same points and stressing that the Auto Pact "leans heavily in favour of Canada and the U.S. must improve this imbalance in the free trade talks". Why is the Government trying to con the people of Canada?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made it clear that the reason I can say the Auto Pact is not on the table is because it is not on the table. The negotiators are meeting now and I am advised by them that the Auto Pact is not being discussed. The Auto Pact has not been discussed. As I said, we do not propose to put it on the table. If the Americans want to do so, we will look at their proposals. If they are good for employment, production and investment in Canada, we will look at them.

The only people who are trying to put the Auto Pact on the table are the opposition Members. They are putting thousands of jobs and billions of dollars in investment on the table with these red herring scare tactics.

Mr. Langdon: The Minister knows perfectly well that Mr. Merkin heads a working group on automotive products which is dealing with precisely this issue. A memo that reports his statements is bound to have much more truth in it than anything the Minister says.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Langdon: I suggest that the Minister owes an explanation to workers right across this country, in Boisbriand, St. Catharines, Windsor—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member will put his question, please.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister give an explanation about why there is so much evidence emerging in the U.S. and Canada that the Auto Pact is being discussed and thousands of jobs are at definite risk?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered that question. I can only point out that if the Americans wish to put forward any proposals detrimental to our automotive trade the Opposition is their best ally and friend in achieving that aim. I think I have made our position very clear. The Hon. Member refers to a working group on automotive trade. I can tell the House and the Hon. Member that was an information group to discuss how the trade worked now and it has not met since last November.

Mr. St. Germain: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Mission—Port Moody.

POSITION OF OPPOSITION

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission—Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, we have sat in this House and listened to the false—

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lewis: You get a preamble.

Mr. St. Germain: —rhetoric of the Opposition. In view of the fact that the Minister has pointed out, as stated by Mr.

Murphy, that the Opposition are the American's best allies, are any other Canadian industries being jeopardized by this irresponsible rhetoric on the part of the Opposition?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CODE OF CONDUCT—STOCK HOLDINGS OF MINISTER FOR PUBLIC WORKS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the representative of the Prime Minister. We have seen seven Ministers in this Government go down under a cloud, so much so that the Prime Minister himself has stated in the House that he is responsible for the conflict of interest guidelines.

I was told this morning by the Acting Deputy Registrar General: "The matter is no longer in my hands. It is in the hands of the Government".

Given that the ADRG does not have the power to investigate, given that the ADRG admitted this morning that he did not have all the facts, and given that he said further this morning that he had not even been able to speak to the Minister in question, will the representative of the Prime Minister tell us whether the Prime Minister is prepared to conduct a full investigation and to turn that investigation over to a body of the House of Commons?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I indicated earlier that the Minister would be making a statement in the House, either later this afternoon or tomorrow, with regard to the issues the Hon. Member has raised. Perhaps she would like to wait for that statement to be made because it may enlighten her a little bit.

At the same time she may want to reflect upon the code that her own Leader has imposed upon all members of her caucus, namely, that in dealing with issues of this nature one should first get the facts, know the facts, know when you have made your case, and remember that you are not only affecting the Government but all elected Members and, indeed, the institution of Parliament. One should also remember that there are important issues to deal with rather than the sleaze and innuendo which the Hon. Member is—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to let the Deputy Prime Minister know that we have the facts, so much so that I am sure that is one of the reasons the Minister himself did not have the courage to come into the House and answer questions and why the Prime Minister is not here in the House today.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. When is the Prime Minister of Canada—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Miss MacDonald: That is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will please put her question.

Ms. Copps: When is the Prime Minister going to take his responsibility as the Leader of the Government which has seen seven Ministers fall under a cloud with the potential now of the eighth? When is he going to take his responsibility and start ensuring that his Ministers are respecting the conflict of interest guidelines which he claims they adhere to? We do not think it is happening. We want an answer from the Prime Minister.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, the Minister will be in the House and will be perfectly prepared to defend himself in the Chamber and outside the Chamber.

Ms. Copps: I will too, believe me.

Mr. Mazankowski: I know the Hon. Member alleges that she always has the facts. I hope she is accurate in her comments today because she may want to reflect upon them after she hears the details of this particular case.

Mrs. Finestone: Oh, you already know the answers?

Ms. Copps: You know the details, do you?

Mr. Mazankowski: This would not be the first time that charges, insinuations and allegations were hurled across the floor, and found to be unfounded upon reflection and further examination.

Mr. Boudria: With your reputation I wouldn't lecture.

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—REQUEST THAT MEDIATOR BE APPOINTED

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. The Post Office has called for a mediator in the postal dispute. The union also wants a mediator. Why is the Government hesitating? Will the Minister be appointing a mediator? When will he be appointing a mediator? What is he waiting for?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if I understood correctly, the Member asked a number of questions. I will answer at least one. Yes, I have received a formal request from the Post Office to appoint a mediator and I am considering it.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister prepared to indicate to this House that he is willing to appoint a mediator in this dispute? Is he looking for a mediator? Is he willing to make a commitment that he is going to appoint a mediator?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): As I have just indicated, Mr. Speaker, I am considering it. My hon. colleague may be assured that as soon as I make a decision this House will be informed.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—FUTURE OF AGRICULTURAL MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Last February 9 the Minister told this House that the free trade negotiations were not about marketing boards and that our system of marketing wheat was not subject to discussion in the free trade negotiations.

We now learn from the memo of Mr. Merkin, the deputy chief negotiator for the United States, that the free trade negotiations are addressing dairy and poultry quotas and the practices of the Canadian Wheat Board.

How can Canadian farmers believe the assurances of the Minister that the marketing boards and the Canadian Wheat Board are not included in the free trade negotiations when the United States administrator says that they are?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can give the Hon. Member much the same answer as I have given in this House earlier today. He is commenting on press reports on a memo which is allegedly being circulated in the U.S. I have no idea what stories are circulating on the U.S. side of the border. I can only assure the Hon. Member of what is happening on our side of the border.

On our side of the border we are not discussing measures which will undercut our supply management system. I met with our SAGIT on agriculture last Friday when that position was again put forward.

COMMITMENT TO FARMERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister simply give a commitment today to Canadian farmers that the Government will walk away from any free trade negotiation which eliminates the quotas and border tariffs for our marketing boards? Can the Minister give Canadian farmers that commitment today?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe the commitment to Canadian farmers was made in the motion which was presented to this House, fully debated, and passed by this House. That is the commitment to Canadian farmers.

Mr. Foster: Answer the question, Pat.

QUERY CONCERNING JUSTICE IN POLICY OF REDUCING TAXES ONLY FOR THE VERY RICH

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the impact of his tax reform and of all the other tax changes imposed by the Conservative Government since its election.

Mr. Speaker, our examination of the impact of these changes reveals that 98 per cent of Canadian families will be paying more sales taxes and income taxes in 1988 than was the case on a similar income in 1984, and that the only group of people who will be paying less are those with an annual income in excess of $100,000.

I am asking the Minister where is justice in a Conservative tax policy which reduces taxes only for the very rich and which raises them for 98 per cent of the people?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what is fair about Conservative tax policy is what was brought in through the White Paper on tax reform on Thursday evening. Eight out of ten Canadians will be paying less tax. Eight hundred and fifty thousand Canadians will be paying no more tax after tax reform. Nine out of ten Canadians over the age of 65 will be paying less tax.

There are other elements of tax reform which I could repeat to the Hon. Member to underscore that point. I expect he will be reading the documents and finding out exactly what is happening with regard to tax reform. I am sure he will agree with my position.

EFFECT OF PROPOSALS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have read the documents. I have also considered the Minister's tax reform proposals in light of the $1,300 of tax increases which he has imposed on the average Canadian family since 1984. He is now giving $300 back and asking people to feel grateful when he is keeping $1,000 of the increases which are already in place.

Would the Minister explain the double standard? Ninety-eight per cent of Canadian families earning a given income will be paying more in 1988 than they were paying in 1984. The only families that will be better off will be wealthy Canadians earning over $100,000. What kind of justice is that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, families under age 65 will find that the threshold level at which they begin paying taxes will be higher after tax reform than it was prior to our taking office in 1984. The same is true for senior citizens. The threshold at which they start paying tax will also be higher under tax reform than it was in 1984. These are two elements of tax reform that I think the Hon. Member has missed.

INQUIRY WHY RICH WILL RECEIVE MORE ADVANTAGE THAN POOR

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance and concerns tax reform.

On the weekend, many experts, journalists and parliamentarians did some arithmetic to find out whether the reform proposed by the Minister was fair and equitable. Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the analysis made by Marjorie Nichols in today's Ottawa Citizen, and ask the Minister to explain why his tax reform, which was supposed to be fair and equitable, gives Canadian families earning an income in excess of $100,000 a year a tax saving of $1,520, which is nearly $30 per week, while families earning $15,000 or less will have a tax saving of only $99. Why $1,520 for the rich and only $99 for the poor?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member checks with the tax reform papers he will see that those earning $55,000 or more will be paying more tax as a share of our total revenues after tax reform than is the case before tax reform. Those who earn less than $27,500 will be paying less tax as a percentage of our total revenues after tax reform. We have increased the progressivity of the tax system.

FOOD TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is saying that the figures published by Ms. Nichols are wrong. Well, I can inform the Minister that I did some figuring of my own, and while I did not come up with exactly the same results, the overall effect was the same.

If the Minister doesn't want to answer any questions about income tax, I would like to ask him a question about sales tax.

Mr. Speaker, when we look at the figures given by the Minister on page 47 of his White Paper, his Economic and Fiscal Outlook, we see that sales tax has provided the federal Government with a 94 per cent increase, in other words, the resulting revenues have increased by 94 per cent under this Government.

I want to ask the Minister: After a 94 per cent increase in sales tax revenues over five years, does it make sense for the Government to further increase those revenues by adding to the tax burden on consumers, and especially by adding a tax on food, on the bread and butter of Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, others have done these calculations as well. If the Hon. Member wishes to look at The Ottawa Citizen, The Toronto Star, and The Globe and Mail, he will see that they have gone to accountant firms to ask them to check some of the figures in the tax reform paper. They have found that the tax savings that we have set out in the personal income tax brochure, which is available at all supermarkets and shopping centres for Canadians in all parts of Canada to see, are correct.

The Hon. Member says that sales taxes have increased since 1984. As well, there has been an increase of 840,000 jobs since 1984. That is part of the reason for the increase in sales tax, the increase in economic activity. But it also a reason why we are going to a new sales tax system. I know that the Hon. Member agrees we should go to a new sales tax system. That is the purpose of the second stage of tax reform.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—CANCELLATION OF MEETING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Considering that France has decided to pull out of negotiations on the fishing dispute between our two countries for the time being, and considering that the Government claimed that those negotiations were a victory for Canada, will the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister responsible explain to fishermen in Atlantic Canada how the Government is standing up for their rights?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, France has not said that it is pulling out of the negotiations between Canada and France, either on the boundary issue or on the question of fish quotas for France in Canadian waters. France has said that it does not wish to meet on June 24 and June 25 this week because apparently it is peeved that Canada has taken a position that French fishing vessels will not be allowed to use Canadian ports until such time as France agrees to observe proper and reasonable fishing quotas in Zone 3PS, the disputed zone off the south coast of Newfoundland.

When we took that action, opposition Members said that it was hypocritical and ineffective, and members of the New Democratic Party said that we should be sending out the fleet to give the French a lesson. That suggestion was made by the Hon. Rambo Broadbent.

The step we have taken has obviously been extremely effective because since then the French have been attempting to have us change our minds. We will not do so until France ceases its over-fishing off the south coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. Murphy: The Government said that it achieved the meeting as a result of successful pressure on the French Government. This is the only Government that would now say it is successful because the meeting was cancelled.

CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, we already know from scientific study that the French over-fishing is hurting our stocks and the livelihood of our fisherpersons. What will the Government finally do to stand up for those Canadian fishermen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would recommend to the hon. gentleman that he use the word "fisher" if he wants to describe both female fisherpersons and male fisherpersons.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: This is a compromise strongly recommended by my colleague, the former Minister of Employment and Immigration.

It appears to me now that the NDP are suggesting that we should surrender to the French and readmit their vessels to Canadian ports. We will not do that. We are staying steady on the course we have taken. We will negotiate with France and come to a conclusion that is good for the fishermen of Newfoundland, the fishermen of eastern Canada, and good for everyone but the NDP who are trying to sneak in in a by-election in St. John's East.

INCOME TAX—COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs. He announced earlier today that the committee will be meeting with finance officials. When does he plan to meet with Canadians from coast to coast who will be very interested and have comments to improve that document where it should be improved?

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs has called on Canadians to submit, for August 18, briefs and suggestions with respect to tax reform concerning the income tax portion of the White Paper. We will then commence detailed hearings in Ottawa, in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada throughout September. Hopefully we will be able to report to the House with respect to the income tax side of the tax reform by November 6. We would appreciate if Canadians would give us their views in order to have the House and Members on all sides of the House understand fully the import of the tax change.

SALES TAXES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance whose tax reform proposals continue his practice of assaulting the pocketbooks of middle and low-income Canadians, all in the name of fairness. Will the Minister explain to those Canadians whom he has burdened with the load of new, unreformed sales taxes, where is the fairness for them in a system whereby any reduction in income tax is followed by an increase in sales tax?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I presume from the Hon. Member's question that she is referring to the sales tax reforms which, I understand, her Party feels are necessary because of the bad tax system we have in the existing federal sales tax. The fairness comes in because there will be a significantly enlarged refundable sales tax credit paid to low and lower middle-income Canadians in advance and on a regular basis. In addition, the surtaxes for all Canadians will be removed and there will be further income tax reductions for middle-income earners. So there is a good deal of fairness in this package which will be part of Phase Two.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has said that as a result of last Thursday's budget 850,000 low-income people will be removed from the tax rolls, but he failed to say that since 1985 his policies have added nearly a million Canadians to the tax rolls. According to the Minister's own figures, now a couple with two children will begin paying tax at well below $20,000 a year annual income and a single person begins paying income tax at $6,400. Will the Minister not admit that his policies are designed to keep the poor, poor?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, that is why we made these changes, to remove 850,000 Canadians from the tax rolls. The Hon. Member has missed one key point. One of the reasons there are more taxpayers today is because there are 840,000 people in a better position to pay tax. They have a job which they did not have in 1984.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise Hon. Members that this will be the last question before the end of Question Period.

NATIONAL PARKS

SOUTH MORESBY—COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND BRITISH COLUMBIA PREMIER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for national parks. Last Wednesday here in the House the Prime Minister promised to use every possible lever to obtain the co-operation of the Government of British Columbia in setting aside South Moresby as a national park reserve. As of an hour ago, the Premier of British Columbia has publicly indicated that he has had no contact with the Government of Canada regarding South Moresby. Could the Minister bring the House up to date as to why there has not been any contact between the Government of Canada or between the Prime Minister and the Government of British Columbia to this point?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Skeena is correct in saying that it was the intent of the Prime Minister of Canada to call the Premier of British Columbia about the South Moresby question. I can confirm that the Prime Minister intends to do so. He may well have made his call even as I speak.

I will be talking to the Prime Minister later today to check whether the call has been made—and I expect it will have been made—after which I will brief the Hon. Member and any other interested Member on the results which may flow from the conversation if it has taken place.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT INITIATIVE FUND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary question is directed to Deputy the Prime Minister. It was reported earlier today as well that because there is no new money in the Western Development Initiative Fund that may be a part of the reason there is a delay in getting the co-operation of the Province of British Columbia. Could the Deputy Prime Minister advise the House whether or not linkage has been made between the Western Development Fund and the $106 million proposed for the national park reserve in South Moresby?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to comment on speculative reports at this particular of time.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise Hon. Members that I have received from the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) notice of a question of privilege which may take a few minutes. I have also just received a note from the Hon. Minister of Public Works that he wishes to rise on a point of personal privilege. I understand it would be acceptable to the House if we heard the Minister first.

PRIVILEGE

CODE OF CONDUCT—ALLEGED BREACH

Hon. Stewart McInnes (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on my appointment to the Cabinet in August 1985, I established a blind trust and appointed McLeod Young Weir as my trustee. Ross Montgomery was its agent in Halifax on this matter at the time. In March of this year the trust was transferred to Nesbitt, Thomson and Deacon Inc. where Mr. Montgomery continues to act as agent for the firm.

Since establishing my blind trust, there have been a few instances where statements or certificates were copied to me inadvertently by the brokerage firms. I notified my trustee of the error and asked that corrective action be taken. My trustee conducted my accounts absolutely independently and without involvement or direction by me.

I refer to Mr. Montgomery's statement:

I have been Stewart McInnes' investment advisor and broker for five years. When Stewart McInnes became subject to the federal Conflict of Interest guidelines, I opened a blind trust account with my previous employer. When I changed employers, a new blind trust was opened at Nesbitt Thomson. I have not, at any time, consulted with Stewart McInnes relative to the investments for the blind trust since they were opened. I am aware of a U.S. broker who was given responsibility to manage a small portion of the blind trust account. Inadvertently, after the fact, monthly statements were sent to Stewart McInnes but this practice was stopped when discovered. I am satisfied the Conflict of Interest guidelines for the blind trust account have been met.

I am disturbed by the insidious manner in which this matter has been dealt with by certain members of the Opposition. I categorically reject the innuendo and insinuations which have emerged. Everything I have done has been in full compliance with the conflict of interest guidelines. I immediately answered any and all questions with the facts at my disposal.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I realize the Minister is rising on a point of privilege and, given that the privileges of all Members of the House relate to the question of honesty, I would like to be able to respond. I realize I cannot put a question to the Minister, but the Minister has stated in the House that in fact he had a blind trust under the direction of McLeod Young Weir which was managed by one Ross T. Montgomery. He should be aware that in fact Ross T. Montgomery has never been an official, nor has ever had any signing authority for McLeod Young Weir and therefore it would be impossible for him to individually process any transaction on behalf of McLeod Young Weir.

In fact, with respect to the Paine Webber statement, the Minister has stated that his so-called trustee asked that the statements, the secret documents coming from the United States, not go to his house when he became aware of it. In fact, we know from press reports that his so-called trustee, Mr. Montgomery—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Come on.

Mr. Mazankowski: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask Hon. Members to leave the matter to the Chair. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), who has raised questions in the House on this particular matter, has listened to the Minister. It may very well be that the Hon. Member for Hamilton East and other Members, in view of what the Minister has said, may want to ask questions which are deemed to be appropriate with respect to conflict of interests at another time, and there is, of course, procedures for doing so. However, the Chair feels it would not be appropriate to continue comments by Members at this time.

As I say, that does not preclude the Hon. Member or other Hon. Members from asking legitimate questions about the conflict of interest guidelines. But given the circumstances, and in keeping with the appropriate tradition of this place, the Minister made a public statement quickly after the matter became the subject of public discussion and immediately following questions in the Question Period, so I think it would not be appropriate to continue it now on either points of order or other points. The Hon. Member will have adequate opportunity to pursue the question of conflict of interest at another time.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, given that the Minister has said in the House that he is prepared to be completely open and to provide full disclosure on all matters surrounding his trust agreement, would it be appropriate, through the Chair, to seek the unanimous consent of the House to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: That is always something that can be done. There are, of course, appropriate ways of doing it.

As Hon. Members know, if there is a unanimous disposition in the House to make a move of that kind, or any other, it is sometimes helpful if there is discussion between House Leaders before that takes place.

I think that I will exercise the prerogative of the Chair and close off discussion on this issue at this time. As I have said, I leave it quite open to Hon. Members to raise the matter again. If there are questions that Members still have, there is of course Question Period tomorrow. Given that the questions are addressed to conflict of interest and to comments which the Minister may or may not have made, I will consider those questions when and if they are asked.

Mr. Nunziata: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I wish to ask the co-operation of all Hon. Members. The Chair has decided not to hear further points of order on this particular matter. I think that is in the interest of order and decorum at this time.

As I said, no Member will be closed off if there are appropriate questions asked at the appropriate time. We are getting into debate here and this is not the time for it.

The Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) rises on a question of privilege.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) rises on a question of privilege. I will hear him, but I have indicated that I will hear the Hon. Member for Oshawa on his question of privilege of which I do have notice. I now have notice of another one, and I will keep the Hon. Member in mind.

The Hon. Member for Oshawa.

PRIVILEGE

CANADA-U.S. TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—ALLEGED CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to you earlier this day concerning my interpretation of a possibility of a question of privilege. I pointed out, Your Honour, in a letter to you, that certain statements made in the House of Commons by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. McDermid) were in flat contradiction to statements that have been attributed to a senior trade official in the United States, specifically about an agreement that is alleged to have been made about the abolition of tariffs in the automotive sector in trade between Canada and the United States.

On the one hand the Parliamentary Secretary said on June 17 in the House that the subject matter has never even been discussed. On the other hand a senior American official has said something that is in flat contradiction to that, namely, not only has there been discussion but there has been an agreement reached.

If you should agree, Your Honour, that there is a prima facie case of privilege I am prepared to move the appropriate motion to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which does in fact touch upon the privileges of all Members of the House. It is very important that we be in a position to obtain clear, definite and correct statements from Ministers in answer to our questions.

I think it is a serious matter when a Minister of the Crown says, in effect, that a senior official of a friendly government, in this case the Deputy U.S. Trade Commissioner, is providing inaccurate information to the staff of the legislative body to which this U.S. official is ultimately responsible. That would be serious enough in any event, but when we are talking as we are here of what the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) should be saying in a clear and accurate way to Members of this House, then we have before us a very serious matter. This is so especially when it is clear that the Minister did not make a correct statement regarding the reality with respect to tariffs on automobile parts and finished automobiles coming from the United States.

I also wish to say in that regard that the House should know that it is the obligation of each individual auto company doing business in Canada pursuant to the Auto Pact to achieve the safeguard levels set for that company. Even if the over-all levels of production for the industry are far above what is required in total, if an individual company does not meet the safeguard levels then the duties are payable by that company. This has happened a number of times even though during those times the over-all safeguard levels had been met.

I think we have issues here which touch on the ability of all Members of the House to do their work properly, based on full and accurate information from the Government. Therefore I think we have an issue which creates a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have two points which I would like to contribute to what I think is an extremely important point that has been raised by my Leader. The first is with respect to a statement which was made by the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) on March 16, 1987. This is a statement reported at page 4178 of Hansard in which the Minister said:

> Tariffs are on the table because experience has shown that the Canadian economy has prospered through tariff reduction. This is so even with the Auto Pact which the Opposition keeps bringing up.

My clear interpretation of that statement is that the Auto Pact and reduction of tariffs affecting the Auto Pact are very much under discussion. That would seem to represent a clear contradiction to the statement made by the Minister's Parliamentary Secretary last week.

The second point which has to be stressed very strongly is that the memorandum, which could be tabled in the House if it were useful, is a memorandum which we ourselves checked through our office this morning in order to determine its authenticity. We checked with the organization which represents the coalition of over 200 American Congressmen and 38 American Senators who represent the Midwest and the northeastern United States. It was clear from the conversation with staff representatives of the organization that, indeed, the briefing which is reported in the memorandum did take place. It was carried out by Mr. Merkin and dealt with the precise points which the memorandum itself outlines in an abbreviated form for purposes of congressional offices.

I think that on those grounds and on the grounds of contradiction between the Minister and her Parliamentary Secretary there is a serious case here of confusion and, certainly, an attempt to avoid giving a clear picture to the House of Commons and to its Members of what is taking place. As one Member who represents a constituency which includes thousands of automotive workers, I think this question of privilege should be allowed. My Leader, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), should be allowed to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the question of privilege, it arises out of an alleged contradiction in the comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. McDermid) on June 17, wherein he stated:

> This Government has not requested that the Auto Pact be on the table for negotiation. To date, neither has the American side requested that it be part of the negotiations.

I am having a little difficulty piecing this together, Mr. Speaker, but as nearly as I can figure it out, I understand the issue to be that there is an alleged contradiction between the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary and a statement in a memo by a U.S. congressional staff member "who was part of a group briefed earlier this month by Deputy U.S. Trade Negotiator Phil Murphy". I could comment at length, Mr. Speaker, as to how excited we should get about just exactly where this congressional staff member is in the scheme of things, but I do not think I need do that.

The question of privilege fails on two grounds. First of all, you have already ruled on this when you ruled earlier today that there should not be an emergency debate on this matter. Failing that, I refer you to precedent.

There are several decisions and much commentary on what is a question of privilege. I refer you to the decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of March 21, 1974, in relation to a claim that contradictory statements had been made by a Minister in the House, in committee, and in letters.

The issue in that case was whether or not allegedly contradictory statements of a Minister constituted sufficient cause to raise a question of privilege. The Speaker found at that time that there was not a prima facie case of privilege. I quote from the decision:

> The Speaker has no other responsibility than determining whether there is a prima facie question of privilege which later on could be submitted to the House in the form of a motion.

He went on to say that while the Hon. Member may have a grievance against the Minister, there are more appropriate avenues available, either in the House or in committee.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the House were to set aside time for debate every time there is a contradictory statement between Members of this House, or between Members of this House and other Canadians, and even other congressional staff members, all we would be doing would be examining contradictory statements.

I suggest that the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, fails on two grounds: first, that you have already ruled on it in ruling out an emergency debate on the subject; and second, that it is a matter of contradictory statements, something which has been ruled in the past, by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux and others, as not being appropriate for a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon), in reply.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, just one brief comment in reply. The contradiction in this case is a contradiction within the Government itself, between the Parliamentary Secretary, whose statement last week indicated one thing, and the Minister, whose statement on March 16 said quite a different thing. That kind of a contradiction within the Government itself is something which has not been addressed by the Deputy House Leader.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I perhaps should have read more completely the case to which I referred.

Rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Caouette, the Member for Charlevoix, objected to what he claimed were contradictory statements made by Mr. MacDonald, the then Minister of Veterans Affairs, in relation to the possible extension of the deadline applicable to the Veterans' Land Act. The remarks cited by Mr. Caouette in his presentation were made by the Minister on various occasions in the House, before a committee, and in letter to him. By way of privilege, Mr. Caouette sought to learn from the Minister exactly what he intended to do on this issue.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a parallel between that case and this. The complaint in that instance related to alleged contradictory statements made by one person, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that alleging contradiction between two members of the Government, a Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary, amounts to the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) for bringing this matter to the attention of the Chair. As well, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon), and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis) for their contributions.

Given that this is a serious matter, I think it would be appropriate that the Chair reserve decision on it until later this day.

The allegation is that there are contradictions not only between what is set out in a memo written by someone in the U.S. and something said by a Minister of the Government, but also an alleged contradiction between what the Minister has said and what others speaking on behalf of the Government have said on the same issue.

Hon. Members will be aware that that makes it somewhat difficult for the Chair. While the contradictions may be very serious indeed, the question the Chair has to decide is whether the contradictions are such that they make it more difficult for Members of Parliament to carry out their duties; in other words, that their privilege has been breached.

I shall return to the Chamber as quickly as possible to render a decision on this particular matter.

I know that the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) had indicated his intention to move a question of privilege. No doubt the Hon. Member has been called away on important business. I do have notice of his intention to raise a matter, and perhaps it could be dealt with at another time.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

TABLING OF SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT OF THE COMMISSION REPORT FOR 1987—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to the provisions of the Representation Act, 1985, to lay upon the table a certified copy of the supplementary report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the 1987 report for the Province of British Columbia.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House recessed, the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) had one minute remaining in the allocated time for his speech, to be followed by 10 minutes for questions or comments.

The Hon. Member for Portneuf.

Mr. Ferland: If I may, Mr. Speaker, after you interrupted me this morning, pursuant to our rules of course—people who are following the debate certainly must have difficulty understanding how a speech can be stopped right in the middle, and then you wait for two and a half hours before resuming it. So I just received the blues, and for a better understanding of the speech I would like if I may to complete a sentence, the last one, and it reads: Justice must be served and the accused must be kept awake, he must be kept alive. That is justice for society. I should say: that is retribution for society. Because as far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, re-instating capital punishment in this country is merely vengeance, it is abdicating before a reality, abdicating before the basic problem.

I mentioned earlier in my speech the efforts Parliament should make, the real efforts each Member in this House should make to reform our criminal system, our youth assistance system and our crime prevention system. As long as we do not get to the root of crime in Canada, we may discuss death penalty for years, because we simply have no real desire to get to the root of the problem, which is prevention.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this debate is useless. It is a democratic debate. People were wondering, nearly 75 per cent of Canadian citizens have been wondering for years whether we should not revert to capital punishment. But the longer this debate goes on in this House, the longer we speak, the better we are trying to inform Canadians, and the less Canadians want us to revert to capital punishment. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker I would simply like to state that to a degree I am thankful to the Prime Minister for having allowed this democratic debate, and above all to have allowed a free vote on the matter.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) because he started his speech by saying, I remember it very well, that he did not claim to be one of the best speakers in this House. I will tell you that I have listened to every word the Hon. Member spoke and I must praise his ability to bring up the most essential points in a debate such as this. He did speak about prevention and the need for overhanding the penitentiary system; and I think he is perfectly right. I was also very much impressed by the fact, and I mention it because I share his view and everybody here knows that I was for capital punishment, that he refused to be influenced by the polls. Although it is reported that more than 70 per cent of the people are in favour of capital punishment, he spoke according to his conscience after quite a bit of soul-searching. I believe that if all those involved in this debate were to do the same, that is to decide according to their conscience, it would be almost impossible to say yes to capital punishment. Having said that, I do want to ask the Member for Portneuf, that I congratulate once again, whether in his view before calling for capital punishment, we should not think in terms of overhauling the penitentiary system and its effect upon criminals. There is one thing he mentioned I really liked and of which I spoke often when I was in charge of the Armed Robbery and Manslaughter Section in Montreal, that is crime prevention for young people 15 and 16 years old. Would he kindly develop this point?

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank my colleague, the Hon. Member for Bourassa, for his good words. I think he is absolutely right. I have had the pleasure to discuss with many police officers, people that work in the field where the criminals are. Even they were telling me that unfortunately, because of the way our judicial system works now—they often feel they work for nothing. One particular police officer told me he had arrested the same guy three times in the same weekend for drug trafficking. Isn't it something? Three times the same person on the same street in the same week-end. Why? Because we have a system that does not punish the real criminals. How many people are considered criminals and put into jail because they did not pay a parking ticket or whatever? How many people are in jail for as petty a crime as that while there is no room left in there for the real criminals? Because in fact one starts very young to live a criminal life.

As I have explained earlier this morning in my speech, the problems of the youth very often start at the kindergarden level. Often then they are already rejected by their family, even by society. I gave the example of a young boy who had been sent from foster home to foster home because he was supposedly very difficult to help or to raise, as we say. But that is where we have to work, that is where the problem lays, that is when a youth starts to become a criminal so that when he is 30 or 35, he will be a roughneck. How come?

The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) talked about teenagers who are fifteen or sixteen years old. In the beginning, a teenager will appear in juvenile court, and get a first warning, then a second and a third warning. A young lawyer next to him is going to tell him: "Whoop, do not talk, that policeman will try to do you in". Whereas in fact it is often the opposite, the policeman wants to try and help this person stay away from crime. And some day, the judge is going to be fed up, and he will say: Enough is enough, you get a two-year sentence. And then this teenager goes to jail for two years.

Mr. Rossi: The university of crime!

Mr. Ferland: It is indeed the university of crime. They are going to learn to become real criminals, and later in this House we will call for the reinstatement of death penalty. But I think that in the first place we should restructure our penitentiary system, our justice system, particularly in terms of crime prevention.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, on this same subject, I wish to congratulate my colleague both for his stand against the death penalty and for his approach in his speech. In the field of prevention, I would like my colleague to comment on the fact that statistics show that people who get hanged, who eventually become the victims of death penalty belong mostly to minorities, visible minorities, poor communities and so on. And in fact, a great expert in criminal law, Mr. Arthur Maloney, when he spoke in this House—he was the then Hon. Member for Parkdale—urged that we should insist on preventing the causes of crime rather than applying the death penalty after the fact. I would therefore like my Honourable colleague to comment on this aspect of statistics dealing with death penalty. According to those statistics, it is the poor, those who belong to minorities, who end up murdered by the State because they made a mistake.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, in reply to my colleague, I have here an article which I hope most Canadians have read. This article, which appeared on April 18, 1987, in Le Devoir, refers to a study carried out by Mr. Kenneth Avio, a researcher at the University of Vancouver, I believe, which establishes a relationship between the racial origins of people accused of murder, native Canadians, for instance, and the number who were hanged. If I may, I would like to quote a rather important passage:

"Mr. Kenneth Avio, 44, professor of economics at the University of Victoria, reported during an interview that he had discovered many memos from the Department of Indian Affairs recommending hanging for native murderers because, in the case of Indians, for instance, there was a special need for a deterrent. There is no doubt that if you had the misfortune to be a native Canadian, there was a greater risk of being executed, notes Professor Avio, adding that Ukrainians and Eastern Europeans ran the second greatest risk of being hanged if found guilty of murder."

I am not the one to say so. This study was carried out by Professor Avio. I have no reason to question his facts. This should tell us something. We have to remember that each of us has some racist feelings and some violent leanings, and that we each control these weaknesses differently and in various degrees.

When we are dealing with the justice of men, can we make certain that the men who administer this justice will be so perfect that they can put aside all such weaknesses?

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the Hon. Members for Bourassa and Gatineau in congratulating the Hon. Member for Portneuf for the quality and clarity of his speech. I know that he has consulted, like many Members of this House, various youth and senior citizens' organizations in his constituency and I congratulate him on his thoroughness.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member what he thinks about an argument much used by those who favour reinstatement, which argument can most effectively be described as the economic argument. According to this argument, a criminal who is in prison for twenty or twenty-five years costs the state a lot of money, and it is therefore better to eliminate or kill him to get rid of this burden on society.

I would like to know what my colleague thinks about this economic argument which we often hear to justify the killing of human beings by the state.

Mr. Ferland: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as my dear colleague is suggesting, the economic factor is raised very often and I heard it on many occasions. What is the use of spending $57,000 or $60,000 a year to keep a criminal behind bars? But the other side of the coin is the choice our society has to make: should we eliminate an individual because he is a financial burden on society?

We need only consider the many institutions where we keep the chronically ill, psychopaths, violent and extremely dangerous patients. We keep them in institutions. We do not call that a prison, we call that a psychiatric institution. Yet society is paying for this and we know these people are irrecuperable. Should we put a price on that? Are those people candidates for mercy killing?

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, there is a certain society, there was a war in 1939-44 when certain individuals attempted to set up a new order and solve problems through racism, where people were eliminated one way or another. They tried to eliminate people who were costing society some money. Then there was the Nuremberg trial. Sooner or later we get to the point where we ask ourselves: Are we prepared to go that far? Is Canadian society reaching the point where we consider doing away with people who are costing us money? I would not think so, Mr. Speaker. What Canadians want and look forward to is something other than that.

I do not think that the monetary aspect should be taken into account in the choice our society has to make.

Mrs. Bourgault: Just a couple of questions, Mr. Speaker. My colleague from Portneuf is known to be a very convinced and often very convincing man.

Now could my colleague from Portneuf tell me whether in his study of capital punishment he has given any consideration to compensation for the victims? You know, compensation is an aspect which comes up now and then and is the subject of many discussions. In my riding, for example, I often hear people talking about it and I am sure other Members have had similar experiences. Mr. Speaker, our constituents do not understand why an inmate sentenced to life imprisonment should be set free after seven years. People have the impression that our judiciary system is unduly permissive.

So could my colleague tell me whether he has given this matter any thought? Has he considered the possibility of finding a way to compensate the victims?

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Argenteuil—Papineau. Indeed, we must look at the matter of compensation for victims.

But when we bring in capital punishment to compensate for the murder of an innocent, I do not think that will solve the problem of victim compensation. Because I do not believe the State can revive someone after he has been murdered. That is not the direction we should be taking.

If we are considering compensating people who are the victims of crime, this is something we might have to look at. Yes, I agree we should look at that. And that is the direction we should be looking at. We should be looking in the direction of "Crime does not pay". We should have a fair justice. But not a kind of justice that will eliminate an individual, that will kill. The 282 Members in this House, the 282 individuals who share the power of life and death in this country should not imagine that by re-establishing capital punishment, man's vengeance onto man, we will be re-establishing fairness where a crime has been committed. That is not true, Mr. Speaker, it is not the solution, we should be looking at. Quite the opposite, we must work at reforming the Canadian criminal system, our judicial system in Canada. But we must never go into the opposite direction and say that we will re-establish the law of retaliation in Canada to try and solve a problem the solution of which we have not yet found.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that in view of that, all of us in this House should be working much harder at crime prevention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) for a short supplementary.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question, but rather a brief comment I would like to make, since I have an opportunity.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I was certainly in support, I repeat in support of capital punishment, and after a very serious self-examination, I am now against capital punishment.

I commend the Hon. Member for Portneuf for voting the way his conscience tells him.

In a last submission, I would like to urge Hon. Members, the 282 Members in this House to stop wondering about surveys. Let us make a self-examination and put surveys aside. Surveys will not provide us with a reason to kill human beings through capital punishment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The period for questions and comments is over. Debate. The Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon).

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the greatest philosopher of our age said, "After the first death, there is no other". I think that captures the sense of significance, the sense of importance, the sense of very grave responsibility which faces the Members of this House of Commons as they face the question of whether to turn back the clock, of whether to change pace on the forward progress made by our civilized society and establish once more the death penalty.

I think that on many grounds, on grounds that could take us from statistics to the grounds of morality discussed by our churches similar to the excellent presentation by the previous speaker concerning alternatives to the death penalty, we can make our arguments. We can make our presentations, but fundamentally when it comes right down to it, I think what faces us and what faces this House of Commons is a question of whether we are committed to trying to place before the country our view of the sanctity of human life and that we as a Parliament, as a judicial system, should not have the right to be able to take the life of a human being. That, for me, is at the heart of what this debate is all about, Mr. Speaker.

I want to go through some of the statistics, some of the arguments and some of the alternatives, but I want to stress at the start that what motivates me as I think of my children, as I think of a society which their children and their children will ultimately inherit, is that we must look to build, as one of the great historians of Canada said, the peaceful kingdom in this country. We cannot do that if we take this step to start, through the state, systematically killing individuals.

There are realities which face us. These realities are the homicide rates which exist in Canada. In 1975, the last year before capital punishment was eliminated in Canada, there were 3.09 homicides per hundred thousand population. Our latest statistics show that under abolition, the rate of homicide has actually shrunk in 1985 to 2.78. That is one reality.

Another reality we must face is what lies south of us. We do not live in a country that is insulated from what takes place in the rest of the world. We can look at what exists elsewhere in the world, we can learn lessons from that and we can make wiser choices on the basis of those lessons.

There are 18 states in the United States in which the death penalty does not exist. Figures for 1983 show 5.91 homicides per hundred thousand population in those states. If we compare that with those states which have the death penalty, we find that the figure is 7.66 per hundred thousand population. In other words, those states with the death penalty have a higher rate of homicide. That is a reality.

Perhaps the reality which is strongest and most powerful, the reality which we as Members of Parliament must face, is the fact that if the death penalty had been in effect in Canada since 1976, the chances are great that people would have been executed by mistake. There can surely be nothing more devastating to the humanity and civilization of a society than to wrongly execute people, for crimes they did not commit.

In February of 1977, Kenneth Roberts was convicted of murder. Just three years later, a new trial was ordered and Roberts was acquitted. Derek Cole was convicted of first-degree murder in 1978. In 1981, after a new trial, Cole was acquitted.

In 1985, John Wildman was found not guilty of murder by the Ontario Supreme Court but had been in prison for seven years for a crime he had not committed. Donald Marshall, a native Indian from Nova Scotia, had served 11 years in prison after being convicted of murder. He too was found to be innocent.

I point out to Hon. Members what they will have received from the Assembly of First Nations which has written to each of us to make the case against capital punishment. The Assembly has said that there is evidence as it sees it that First Nations citizens have been and are being punished by the Canadian state in disproportionate numbers and could be in disproportionate numbers the victims of a restored death penalty.

Canada is a relatively peaceful country, but there have been such cases outside this country. Antonio Rivera and Merla Walpole of San Bernadino, California, were convicted of murdering their two-year-old daughter. Nearly two years after the conviction the daughter was found to be alive in San Francisco. That occurred in 1974. In 1934, there was the case of Louis Berrett and Clement Molway, identified by eight eyewitnesses as the men who had killed a theatre employee. Some Hon. Members say that we will keep capital punishment for only those cases which are clear. Surely a case with eight eyewitnesses must be as clear a case as one could ask for. Yet just before the final arguments at the trial, the actual killers confessed. The jury foreman in that 1934 case was later quoted as saying, "This trial has taught me one thing. Before it I was a firm believer in capital punishment. I'm not now".

In 1922, Maurice Mays, a black man, was executed for murdering a white woman. Four years later, a white woman confessed in a written statement that she had disguised herself as a black man to kill the woman with whom her husband was having an affair. That is the responsibility carried by Members of the House of Commons if we vote to put capital punishment back into effect. We carry the responsibility of putting to death not just those who might have been guilty but of wrongly putting to death people who were not guilty. That is a reality that is very important for us to keep in mind.

I would like to talk very briefly about the way I will vote in this debate. Before I was elected in 1984, a great many people asked me about my stand on capital punishment. I told them that if the question came up in a new House of Commons, I would vote against the restoration of the death penalty. That was one promise I made at that time to my constituents. I also promised that in any debate that did take place, I would report the feedback I had heard from my constituents and I am quite pleased and willing to do that.

We sent to the households of Essex—Windsor a Householder in which, as there often is, there were questions permitting my constituents to write back telling us if they agree or disagree with the stands I take. So we asked them if they disagreed with my stand on capital punishment. Some 49 per cent of those who replied said they did. Some 46 per cent agreed. Some 5 per cent were undecided. It is quite clear that in my constituency a split exists, with a small majority who want to see the death penalty restored. However, I think that is not the issue. The issue is that we were elected to make an informed choice based on a degree of reading, listening, and consultation which the average citizen, I am certain, has not had an opportunity to devote to this question.

There are two things which have to be stressed in that informed choice. The first part has to be to recognize the concern across this country over the increase in violent crime even though that has not been evident in homicide statistics themselves. We have to do something serious in response to that concern. For example, our probation system is grossly underfunded and undersupported. I have friends working in that system and they are simply unable to carry with any kind of effectiveness the case-load they are forced to carry. We need to have a parole system with sufficient resources to see to it that those who leave prison are given a serious opportunity to make the transition to society.

We have to deal also with sentencing and with our penal institutions. As the Hon. Member who spoke previously said, far too often our penal institutions become universities of crime. They are not rehabilitating people. We have to work at that. We have to recognize it is not just the responsibility of Members of Parliament. It is not just the responsibility of our police. It is the responsibility of communities right across this country through institutions like Neighbourhood Watch and Crime Stoppers to try and do something about the development of crime. It cannot be done from the top, it has to be done from the ground up in our communities.

Although those things are important in considering our vote on this issue, far, far more important, overwhelmingly important, so much so that it has to dominate the thinking of everyone who makes a choice on this issue, has to be reverence for human life. Obviously capital punishment subverts that reference. You cannot have a society where both respect for human life and capital punishment exist. Capital punishment in its very essence undercuts that respect for life which lies at the heart of a civilized society. That is why I will be very proud when the day actually comes to stand and vote against capital punishment. That is a commitment I believe in not just for myself but for my children and all those I love. It is a commitment I hope will be shared on that day by a majority of this House of Commons.

PRIVILEGE

CANADA-U.S. TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—ALLEGED CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS—RULING OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to Hon. Members and the watching and listening public that it is not normal practice for the Speaker to interrupt this important debate, especially after hearing those speeches which expressed with great emphasis some sincerely held views. I ask the indulgence of the House to interrupt at this time to return to the matter of the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Hon. Leader of the NDP.

In the interests of ensuring that all Hon. Members and the public know exactly what this is about, I am going to read into my reasons the letter I received from the Hon. Member for Oshawa because I think it puts very, very succinctly the concern expressed by the Hon. Member as well as the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray). This is what the Hon. Member for Oshawa wrote to the Speaker:

The Question of Privilege arises from the complete contradiction between what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of International Trade said in the House on June 17, 1987, about the Canada-U.S. Automotive Agreement not being a matter for discussion with the representatives of the U.S. government and what a senior official of the United States is revealed to have asserted according to a Canadian Press story which appeared on the weekend.

He continues:

According to the Canadian Press story, Mr. Bill Merkin, Deputy Chief U.S. Negotiator for the U.S.-Canada trade agreement, in a briefing provided for United States Congressional staff, declared that there have been discussions on the Autopact taking place in the free trade talks. Specifically, he said that auto tariffs would be dropped and that the Canadian government believes that the provinces would agree to removing duty remissions and could get the provinces to make other requested changes in the Autopact.

The letter of the Hon. Member for Oshawa continues as follows:

This claim by Mr. Merkin on June 4, 1987, was flatly contradicted on June 17th by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade when he said in the House: "This Government has not requested that the Auto Pact be on the table for negotiations. To date, neither has the American side requested that it be part of the negotiations".

The Hon. Member for Oshawa, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, closes off his application in writing by saying:

It it clear that if the briefing of the U.S. Congressional staff took place in the manner described by Mr. Merkin, the Parliamentary Secretary has misinformed the House.

I draw to the attention of Hon. Members that the Hon. Member for Oshawa has not said that there was any deliberate misleading or that misinformation was deliberately given. However, I thought that in the interests of clarity it was appropriate to read the entire written application of the Hon. Member for Oshawa because, in my view, it puts forward very succinctly the complaint and, I suppose to some degree, the dilemma which the Hon. Member and other Hon. Members feel they are in.

My response is to say, first, that the issue of the Auto Pact is a very serious one, not only to the Province of Ontario but, naturally, to all of Canada. I am sure there are Members on all sides of the House who are extremely concerned about any suggestions made, whether accurate or inaccurate, which lead to public discussion creating concern or anxiety with regard to the future of the Auto Pact.

I do not, therefore, minimize in any way the seriousness of the matter raised by the Hon. Member for Oshawa and others. My task, of course, is to decide whether, as important as the issue is, under the laws of procedure of this place it amounts to a breach of privilege.

The question of the issues which are or which are not subject to negotiation in the course of the free trade discussions currently taking place with the United States is one of very great importance. Questions have regularly been asked in this House on this fundamental point and Ministers have answered these questions within the context of a negotiating situation.

I stress that it is a legitimate matter for parliamentary questions, for debate, and for the expression of anxieties which may arise as a consequence of what may appear in the press, what may be said by different parties to the negotiations, or what may be said in this Chamber.

With regard to anxieties, I know that Hon. Members will have noted that in the continuing debate on free trade, and especially on the Auto Pact, both sides of the House have expressed anxieties with regard to what others in this House and in other places have either said or been reported to have said.

When negotiating an issue of this magnitude varying reports have to be anticipated, some well founded and some less well founded. Some, naturally, are no more than speculation. Some reflect a particular point of view. Reports emanating from the other side which appear to contradict assurances given by Ministers are clearly the subject of legitimate debate and questions in the House.

However, parliamentary privilege exists to protect Hon. Members from obstruction or intimidation in the fulfilment of their duties. The publication of contradictory statements, it would seem to the Chair, does not in itself provide justifiable grounds for a case of privilege. The privileges of Members are not infringed by the existence of controversy, disagreement, contradiction or any of the multifarious elements which enter into political issues.

I must add, however, that if those contradictions took such a form that there was a serious allegation that there was an intent to mislead, under those circumstances the difficulty in deciding whether there was a breach of privilege would give the Chair a great deal of concern indeed.

I say that because if, for instance, there was a deliberate tactic on one side or another to put forward misleading information, it might well be that it could amount to obstruction in the fulfilment of the duties of Hon. Members because of the material put forward and the motivation which lay behind it. However, as I say, that is not the allegation before us. The allegation is that there have been contradictions. As I pointed out, the Hon. Member for Oshawa was very careful to confine the question of privilege to those contradictions.

As I have said, any action which prevented full debate or the free expression of views on such issues could violate parliamentary privilege. However, in this case, at least at present, there is no evidence of that kind of action and I cannot, therefore, accord this matter precedence over all other business.

I point out to the Hon. Member for Oshawa and others that this ruling is, of course, strictly a procedural one on the narrow grounds of what constitutes a breach of privilege of the Members of this place and does not in any way minimize the very great importance of the issue. I want to thank Hon. Members again for their interventions and the attention all Hon. Members have paid to them.

In closing, I want to reiterate how much the Chair has appreciated the very clear and succinct terms in which the Hon. Member for Oshawa put forth the facts and the complaint in his written application to the Chair on this question of privilege.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom, (P. 7307).

Mr. Oostrom: Mr. Speaker, I would like to applaud the Member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Langdon) for the eloquence with which he presented his views and his argument. However, I do not think the Hon. Member is very consistent in his argument for preserving life at any cost. He used the very laudable words "life is sacred", and I commend him for that. However, although he pleads for the lives of the guilty, I have never heard him speak or vote in this House for the lives of the innocent. I speak not only of protecting the lives of innocent victims from serial and repeat murderers by advocating life imprisonment without parole, I am also speaking for the innocent babies about to be born. The Member, his Party, and his Leader, advocate their abortion on demand. There are over 60,000 innocent victims a year.

Will the Hon. Member at least say a few words on behalf of those babies who are innocent victims being murdered each year? Will he also say a few words in support of a life sentence without parole for those premeditated murderers?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I certainly take the issue of innocent victims very seriously. It is very difficult for a family member, whether a wife or child, to deal with someone's murder. It is very difficult for a parent to face the viciousness of a murder, perhaps even a sexual murder of a daughter. One recognizes the grimness which is involved. This is not an issue on which certain people in the House have a monopoly. It is something for which all of us share a very human feeling and, therefore, I believe we have to talk about serious punishment.

We cannot talk about parole after seven years in a case where innocent victims have been badly hurt and expect them to support our justice system.

I believe with the Hon. Member that some serious change in the sentencing structure and the parole system in this country is very much required. I have made these points in my own constituency and I do not disagree with the Hon. Member in that respect.

However, I disagree with respect to the description of the New Democratic Party position as one of supporting abortion on demand. I recognize that this is not a debate about this subject, but let me briefly say that our view is that this too is such a crucial issue of life that it is inappropriate to be in the Criminal Code.

Instead, it is an issue in which the choices they face should be decided upon between a woman and her physician. I am not certain how recently the Member has gone to his physician. However, if his physician is anything like the ones I visit, I suspect that if he demands certain treatment from his physician the situation will be discussed before any action is taken.

I believe the issue of abortion does not belong in the Criminal Code. It is clear that some of us are opposed to abortion and some of us are in favour of abortion, but as I look around the House, very few of us are forced to face that choice. The Hon. Member and myself will never have to face that choice, and I think it is a question that should not be in the Criminal Code. In my opinion, that is not saying that abortion on demand is the policy of our Party.

Mr. Elliott Hardey (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak against the amendment before the House and in support of the original motion. The issue of the restoration of capital punishment in Canada has caused us all to search deep into our hearts and feelings. We must then try to reach a decision based on honesty and common sense.

I know that I have spent countless hours studying and researching this subject, and more hours in discussing it with my wife and family and close friends. As a Member of Parliament, I have received hundreds of letters and had many discussions with constituents. I have attended and participated in many forums in my riding, as I am sure have all Members in the House.

I have listened to arguments in the House and I recognize that there is an honest argument both for and against the motion. I listened with extreme and intense interest.

Some of my colleagues insist that where there is life there is, in fact, hope and that reform should always be considered a possibility even in the case of first degree murder.

I also recognize that this issue is one of conscience. I will respect those Members who present arguments against the restoration of capital punishment, knowing full well that the majority of their constituents probably do not agree with them. I want to defend my colleagues who debate this issue in an honest fashion, based on conscience, regardless of which side of the issue on which they stand.

I ask the people of Canada to realize that while it is the duty and the honour of a Member of Parliament to represent the people, indeed to be servants of the people, on matters of conscience we cannot dismiss the fact that a Member is more than a delegate. When a motion or Bill is declared to be one on which there is a free vote, a Member is expected to vote according to his or her feelings after discussing the issue properly.

I am sure there is no exception that at election time all of us were asked at every candidate's meeting and in every interview our position on capital punishment. None of us should feel uncomfortable when we vote on the motion in this debate, as long as Members are being honest with themselves and with their constituents.

What bothers me the most and what has disappointed me in this debate recently is some of the cheap political shots that creep into the debate, especially from one side of the House. This is not a political issue. No one should be ranting about politics as some of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party have done.

On the first day of the debate, the Member from Regina made an argument about conscience with which I fully agreed. However, the Member went on, as did the Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) and nearly every Member from the socialist Party, to rant about how the barbaric Tories want Canada to go back to hanging children for stealing a loaf of bread and that the Tories dreamed up this motion for political reasons.

I am disappointed in that approach. We should be dealing in truth and paying attention to the fact that in 1984 every candidate, regardless of political connection, was asked by the people to bring a free vote to this House of Commons on the capital punishment issue. We should not speak about irrelevancies which create confusion in order to gain political points. We should have a free vote and not to play "Follow the Leader" or a partisan game.

The Hon. Member from Regina presented a conscience approach. By attempting to move this free motion into the political arena, even though the other two Parties are absolutely free on the issue, is a detriment to the cause he claims to promote. How can anyone take a Member of Parliament seriously when he or she debates a free motion in a partisan manner?

The motion simply asks if we believe that capital punishment can be justified under any circumstances. In my view, I justify capital punishment as a symbolic act. In the case of the most heinous crimes, society should be prepared to effect retribution by taking the life of the perpetrator. The death penalty would be a warning like a lighthouse throwing its beams out to sea. I do not feel we should allow misguided compassion to erase our concern for the hundreds of unfortunate victims of bestial crimes.

There are those who fear that the state might execute the wrong person someday and to some extent that could possibly happen. However, as far as I have been able to research the subject, although we have put innocent people in prison, we have not as yet mistakenly executed someone accused of the type of murder about which we are speaking today. We are not talking about murders of passion. We are not talking about an emotionally deranged person convicted of murder. In this debate Members continually lump all homicides into statistics instead of dealing with what we are really concerned with, and that is capital punishment for first degree premeditated murders. We are concerned with killers of policemen, prison guards or serial killers. In our Canadian history we have recorded the cases of dozens of murderers who have been released or paroled after being convicted and sentenced of first-degree murder. Surely we do not have the right to expose the innocent to this type of danger. Some Members have indicated that we can fix that problem by changing our parole system. I agree that that possibility should be examined.

This motion would trigger a change in the system, and I will come back to that point later in my remarks. First, I want to talk a little about the deterrent factor. There are many ways to discuss deterrence when considering capital punishment. We have already heard many times in previous hours of debate statistics and numbers used to prove practically all points both for and against, so I do not really intend to get caught up in that exercise. I do agree with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson), that one either feels that capital punishment is a deterrent or one feels it is not. J. Edgar Hoover wrote this regarding deterrents: "Experience clearly demonstrates deterrents to crime are, first, sure detection, second, swift apprehension and, third, proper punishment". Each is a necessary ingredient.

We have the right to expect that the efforts of law enforcement officers will be followed by realistic punishment. Enforcement officers in fact have certainly proven to be very efficient as far as sure detection and swift apprehension are concerned. Many times the criminal is apprehended within minutes or hours after the crime has been committed.

Surely the accusation that no one has the right to take a human life, that a person who executes a criminal is as guilty as the one he executes, must be discussed further. I also do not want to get into the exercise of quoting the Scriptures, but I am certainly aware that capital punishment cannot be rejected on the grounds of being morally wrong in the light of the Scriptures. There are dozens of verses to support capital punishment. Surely we must realize that all law and order would soon end if this objection were carried through to its logical conclusion. It would make it wrong for a nation to defend itself against an aggressor. It would be come wrong for a city or state to maintain a police force. Logic and common sense must prevail in considering the statement that he who implies the death penalty, and in this case we are talking about the state, is actually a murderer himself.

I do want to come back to the changes needed in the judicial system. Over and over again statements have been made in this debate that we must overhaul the judicial system. I think all of us must agree with that because it keeps coming up over and over again. The people have lost their faith in the system. Dangerous loopholes, discovered by clever lawyers over time, have set precedents. This has meant repeated failure to demonstrate justice in our courts. Every forum on capital punishment I have attended in the last several months within minutes moves into a discussion about the lack of faith Canadians have in the system. They repeat over and over again that victims of crime must have the same rights as the accused and the convicted criminals. They do not feel that this is the case today. I have been on record in this House as voicing that concern. I am also very concerned that vigilante action is condoned by a large segment of our society.

I am sure this debate and the passing of this motion will trigger an overhaul of our judicial system. That is probably the most important point I want to make here in my contribution to the issue we will be voting on shortly. If this motion passes, a special committee will travel across the country talking to people. It will hear what the people have to say. I am absolutely positive that Canadians will continue to voice the concerns I have just described. They will present briefs and opinions that something must be done to overhaul our judicial system. Certainly the committee would be obligated to react in its report to this House and we will be obligated to move in that direction with new legislation.

I fear that if this motion is rejected, all action in this regard will cease. In the many opinions and concerns all Hon. Members have expressed in this House on the overhauling of the judicial system, no one has really presented a way to get it started. This motion will start that process. I feel very confident about that.

I stated that I view capital punishment as a symbolic act for cases of the most heinous of crimes. The system bends over backwards to give the accused the benefit of the doubt, and it is important that that benefit continues to be part of our judicial system in order to ensure fairness to the accused.

I believe the system which would have the best chance of succeeding would be what is known as the double jury system. I will give a short description of what I mean by that. First, there must be a unanimous vote by the jury to convict. Second, the jury would then consider whether or not to impose a death sentence. A very high proportion, such as 10 out of 12 jurors, would be required to make that decision.

Records show that the most heinous types of murderers, serial killers, killers of hostages, et cetera, would likely be the ones upon whom the death penalty would be imposed. Surely, one can readily accept that the possibility of making a mistake in that type of system is very remote.

I invite all Hon. Members to consider the motion before the House very carefully. So much depends on its outcome. I particularly invite my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to participate in debate in a free fashion and to take the politics out of it. It is too important an issue to be approached in that manner.

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion for reinstatement of the death penalty, because I have an obligation to explain my position to my constituents and to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that in MacLean's my name was mentioned among the undecided. In fact, if this debate had taken place in 1979, when I was first elected to this honourable House, I would probably have voted in favour of the death penalty. At the time, I had made a survey of my constituents in the riding of Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic, and as in the response to recent polls today, the majority spoke out in favour of a return to capital punishment.

I must admit that growing up in a police family—my father was a member of the police force and was wounded on duty, my brother is retired from the police force, my son is now also a member of the police force, and I have several brothers-in-law and nephews who belong to the force as well—I often heard stories about the wrongs and suffering experienced by the families of victims. I also share the profound concern of Canadians and of my constituents about the increasing number of violent murders being committed today.

Mr. Speaker, I was rather ambivalent about the subject for quite some time. I consulted, I listened, I read many letters and I read many papers on the subject. I prayed, I examined with my conscience, and after much thought and reflection, I have now decided to speak out against the death penalty.

I am now very comfortable with my decision, but I want to explain my change of heart.

Several serious considerations were a factor in bringing about my decision. One of the most important was a passage in a statement by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops on the death penalty. The statement appeared under the heading: Escalating Violence. In this document, the author asked: Who is the master of life? He gave the following answer, and I quote: "If as citizens we recognize the sacred character of human life, and if, according to our faith, we believe we were created in the image and likeness of God and that God is the sole master of life, we must realize we can hardly dispose of another person's life."

I have been an active member of the Pro-Life movement for many years. I believe in the sanctity of human life from the moment of conception. How could I speak out today in favour of destroying human life through the death penalty, when I demand that we respect and protect the right of the foetus to be born? I firmly believe that human life is a gift of God and that we have a responsbility to protect it from its inception until its end. I believe violence breeds violence. How can we, as a society, claim that to avenge unlawful murder, the State should resort to a second, lawful murder?

The debate on the death penalty is part of a problem we inherited from the past. In former times, the death penalty was applied without any problem. At the time, the principle of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, was strictly adhered to. And to better camouflage this act of collective retribution, the death penalty was said to fulfil a four-fold purpose. The first purpose is atonement for the crime; the second purpose is social example; the third purpose is deterrence; and the fourth one is the protection of society. Nowadays, we acknowledge that those aims can no longer be the basis of a moral judgement. We know that is some corners of the world, there are still people and individuals who perpetrate ancient acts of cruelty and have barbarian behaviours. However, we note that throughout the centuries and more especially since the Second World War, there is a deeper understanding of the dignity of the human being. This leads us to say as a society that behaviours who used to be considered as humane, natural and fair and even necessary to the social order have now been proven to be entirely unfair and inhuman.

It is obvious that the idea of retribution easily comes to the mind of each and everyone of us. We all have a strong urge which drives us not only to defend ourselves but also to avenge ourselves. We have to consider ralistically our present problemes, the problemes experienced in 1987 to find effective solutions for 1987 and develop preventive measures which will give greater hope to the community in the year 2000.

I should like to examine one by one the four purposes aimed at in previous centuries and which justified the death penalty. The first was the atonement for crime. I should like to remind the House the generous gesture of Our Holy Father John Paul II who, as you will remember, forgave his assailant and even visited him in jail. More recently, when she was in Ottawa, Mrs. Coretta King, the widow of the lamented Martin Luther King spoke in strong terms against the death penalty. I quote her comments before the Standing Committee on Human Rights.

[English]

"I just don't see how people can say they're Christian and murder people".

In answer to a question from the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) Mrs. King said that she regrets her fellow Americans are moving backward, rather than forward on the issue. She also said: "I certainly think it's barbaric for a civilized nation such as the United States. I certainly hope Canada won't fall into that".

Like many other Members of Parliament I have received a letter from Lesley C. Parrott of Summerhill Avenue in Toronto who is begging us to consider her deeply-felt views and vote no to the return of the death penalty. Hon. Members will recall that although her own lovely 11-year-old daughter, Alison, was murdered at the hands of a criminal, Mrs. Parrott states in her letter:

> I do not want to be part of a society that brings up future generations with the belief that killing can be legitimized under certain circumstances. Let the message be clear and unconditional: human life is sacred; killing is always wrong.

This letter weighs heavily in my decision to vote against capital punishment. I want to publicly commend Mrs. Parrott for her courage and her forgiveness.

The second purpose was the social example. The people who demand capital penalty believe that violent crime is worse than it actually is.

In a recent study by the Department of Justice of Canada, it was found that Canadians believed that violent crime was seven times as frequent as it actually is. According to a study by the Centre of Criminology of the University of Toronto carried out in 1982, almost 75 per cent of Canadians believed that at least 30 per cent of all crimes were of a violent nature. Actually, Mr. Speaker, only 5.7 per cent fall into that category.

Another erroneous perception of the problem is the following: Two-thirds of Canadians believe that the murder rate in Canada has increased since the death penalty was abolished, while in fact, a study carried out in 1985 by the Solicitor General's Office proved there was no significant change.

The third purpose was deterrence. Figures from Statistics Canada show that the death penalty is not a deterrent for criminals. In 1975, the last year in which the death penalty was still in effect, there were 3.09 homicides per 100,000 inhabitants, while ten years later, in 1985, the number had dropped to 2.75 homicides per 100,000 inhabitants.

Like other Members, I also received a letter from the Police Association of Ontario last March, signed by its President, Mr. Neal W. Jessop, which said, and this is a partial quote:

• (1650)

[English]

Abolitionists continually refer to their belief that there is no evidence to prove capital punishment is a deterrent. Our simple response to that position is that there is no concrete evidence to prove that it is or it is not a deterrent and indeed it is quite likely that we will never know with certainty if capital punishment deters one who is contemplating murder. It is futile therefore to base any argument on abolition or reinstatement on the grounds of deterrence.

Finally, I would say that if the death penalty is not a deterrent, all we have left is the desire for retribution. Then we get back to the principle of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, with which, as I said earlier, I do not agree.

The fourth purpose was to protect society. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, no one in this House would question this principle. So it is not the principle itself that is so controversial but the question whether the execution of murderers by the State is the appropriate way to go about it.

What happens in case of error? We will never know how many people have been executed by mistake. I would like to recall two cases in our history where Canadians were the victims of a miscarriage of justice. Members will recall that in 1985, John Wildman was found not guilty of a murder for which he had already spent seven years in prison. The House will also recall that Donald Marshall, after being erroneously convicted of murder in 1971, spent eleven years of his life in a penitentiary in New Brunswick, until he was finally released in 1982.

I would like to add a new element to the debate, an argument against the death penalty, and I do so on behalf of those who are unable to obtain an adequate defence before the Courts. I am referring to the illiterate, the mentally handicapped, the deaf, the poor, the emotionally handicapped and minorities. During her visit to Ottawa, Mrs. Coretta King said an American study had shown that Blacks were three times as likely to be executed as Whites.

It is a fact that, in the United States, the poor, the Black and the uneducated run a greater risk of being executed than the wealthy and influential, who usually get lighter sentences. Here in Canada, six times as many Indians as white people are convicted. If the death penalty were reinstated, a greater number would be condemned to death.

The solution to our social problems does not reside in the death penalty, but rather in identifying the causes of certain behaviours in some people. Many of them are living through events beyond their control. For instance, we certainly do not consider the mental defective as being responsible for their condition. Yet, increasingly, they are being sent out in our society without the necessary resources to head an independent life.

Many other Canadians are in good mental health, but live in a hostile environment. This can be poverty, a broken home, sexual degredations or an environment where it is hard to get education or affection.

We have to remember that these are the individuals who make up the majority of our criminal classes. Someone who suffers from a psychosis is sick. He is not reponsible for his condition.

In looking for answers to the problems which lead individuals to murder, the Government should think about these figures: In 1982, 83 per cent of all murders in Canada were committed by spouses or friends. That same year, in only 2.2 per cent of cases was there no direct relationship between the victim and the accused.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Government should consider the basic needs of the poor, the unemployed, the sick and the homeless and ask the following question: Can we afford not to offer rehabilitation programs to family violence agressors? What will an uneducated individual do in society on his release from prision? Probably commit another crime. Why are young first-time offenders not separated from professionnal criminals? They should not be put in prison to learn crime from hardened criminals. Why is our judicial system so ineffective? Why is there plea bargaining? Why plea bargain with criminals? Why urge a criminal to plead guilty on a lesser charge? Is it to speed up matters? The result of this is that dangerous individuals are put back on the streets when they should still be in prison.

It is against such aberrations that police officers object. They do their job conscientiously, but our judiciary system releases dangerous individuals, not to mention the fact that in too many instances the guilty are given minimum sentences by overly indulgent judges.

The entire prison system should be revamped. Too often dangerous criminals escape, and far too many paroles are granted without due consideration for the protection of society. The state must protect its citizens. The state has the responsibility of meting out punishment. If a crime goes unpunished or if the punishment does not fit the crime, the law or its enforcement loses credibility in the mind of reasonable people. Too often the punishment is not severe enough for the crime involved. In murder cases I think the state must impose life imprisonment, and the state must also restrict the right to parole.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that killing a person only for the sake of punishment is nothing more or less than vengeance. I believe the state should have the political will to identify the causes of our society's malaises and evils, and seek preventive, non-violent solutions to new problems.

Lastly I should like to quote from a letter I received from Denise and Pierre Thériault of Péloquin Street in my riding and with which I agree. Here is what it says:

I am firmly opposed to capital punishment for the following reasons:

(1) Capital punishment has no deterrent value, therefore it does not protect society.

(2) It hides the real causes of criminality.

(3) It is inequitable, unfair and the only irreversible punishment.

(4) Its application reinforces disdain for life . . . which I consider sacred.

In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, such are the reasons which prompt me to vote against the death penalty, and I urge my colleagues on both sides of the House to vote against the restoration of capital punishment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments.

Questions and comments are over. Debate. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—St. James (Mr. Minaker).

• (1700)

[English]

Mr. George Minaker (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this historic debate. It is probably the most serious and historic debate in which I have had the opportunity to take part in my 20 years in politics in different levels of government. I should like to say from the start that I am speaking against the amendment to the amendment and in support of the return of capital punishment.

My decision was not an easy one. I gave it much thought and carefully considered all aspects of my decision on this serious subject. As I suggested, it was not taken lightly.

In spite of the differences we may have as Members of the House on this subject, I respect the position of Members who have taken the opposite point of view in the debate. I am aware of the difficulty they may have had in reaching this decision. It was even more difficult for them because of the fact that the majority of Canadian citizens would like the return of capital punishment to our justice system. I recognize the difficulties faced by some of my caucus colleagues at this time.

In this debate we have heard statistics on both sides of the issue, dealing with crime rates, homicide rates, and many others. I know that to many they are just numbers; that is what they are—numbers. However, figures cannot begin to tell us about the pain, the horror, or the suffering which even one murder represents when it takes place.

I should like to cite the case of two-time murderer, Eli Guay, who was convicted in 1956 for murdering a Sudbury area man. He beat him to death during a robbery, and he was committed to prison for it. He was paroled four years later. In 1981, in front of witnesses, he threw his common-law wife out of a picture window, retrieved a knife and proceeded to slice open her throat. That is the reality of first degree murder—senseless brutality. In 1981 Guay's homicide was just one of 648 such offences.

We can put these criminals in prison, hopefully to rehabilitate them. However, what happens when they are paroled? I believe there are some 11 instances where first-time murderers have been paroled and have gone out to commit murder again.

It is wrong to imply that our system works just fine the way it is. I believe a return to capital punishment is a step in the right direction.

I want to be clear. I wish to state that my support for the death penalty is in its application to certain specific crimes of first degree, planned, and premeditated murder. These cases would include serial killers such as Clifford Olson, contract killers who gain personally from the crimes they commit, hostage killers such as terrorists, kidnap killers, and killers of police officers and prison guards.

There could be instances where the jury may want to find the person innocent. An example might be where a spouse has suffered mental cruelty through the years and suddenly, through pressures and so on, may decide to go out and get a weapon to eliminate or kill the spouse who caused the mental cruelty. There must be some leeway for the jury to decide whether or not the person is innocent. If it were just premeditated murder, the jury would have to find the person guilty. This is why I am specific in the particular areas where I believe first degree murder would justify the deterrent of capital punishment.

In the main motion we are proposing putting together a committee of the House of Commons to go across Canada to get the feelings of the majority of people and to find out their reaction on when they would like to see the return of capital punishment or what form of capital punishment. I believe this is the correct approach on a major decision which the Government and the House of Commons must make.

In the debate in which we are involved at this time, I do not plan on getting into the statistics, the moral insults, the religious arguments, or the"what ifs" which supply the basis of the abolitionist argument. My support for capital punishment is grounded in principles which stand on their own, regardless of statistical evidence one way or another.

First and foremost, my support for capital punishment is grounded in a belief in my democratic responsibility to respond to the will of the people. I stated my position on the issue when I ran during the election campaign, and my position remains consistent. The voters in my riding of Winnipeg—St. James and indeed across Canada have consistently supported reinstatement with a considerable majority. As their representative I feel proud to be able to respond to their demands.

I have conducted two surveys on capital punishment in my constituency during the past two years. The first survey, which was done in April, 1985, revealed that 76 per cent supported the return of capital punishment, 18 per cent were opposed, and 6 per cent were undecided in the Winnipeg—St. James constituency. The last survey was completed several weeks ago. I might say that there is still the odd return coming in when mail is allowed to go through. The last survey was conducted in April, 1987. The results indicate that 73 per cent favour the return and reinstatement of capital punishment, 24 per cent are opposed, and 3 per cent are undecided. Basically, the majority of our area still wants the return of capital punishment to the justice system.

I intend to uphold the representation of my constituency and the voters' demands. To ignore the will of the people on this issue is to tell the majority of Canadians that their opinions do not count. I believe their opinions count, and I intend to make them count when I vote on this issue.

I also believe there is a serious imbalance in our justice system in favour of criminals. Let us consider the murderer. If arrested, he is not only informed of his rights and taken into police protection, but he is also given the counsel of a defence lawyer who protects his client's interest before a court comprised of a judge and a jury to ensure that everything is fair and proper. In addition, the defendant in the case also has the right of appeal to a higher court. Society makes a great effort to protect the rights of the accused.

Now let us consider the victim. A person, through no wish of his or her own, is arbitrarily deprived of the most basic human right—life, the right to live. There is no jury, no lawyer, no appeal; just the decision of the individual who set out to premeditate how to eliminate a life. The murderer's decision is singular and final. The penalty of capital punishment goes far in redressing the imbalance by imposing a penalty as final as the one of the murderer.

Our citizens are expecting this justice. They are taking the law into their own hands. During November and December, 1986 in Ontario, Quebec, and Alberta small store owners were arming themselves—and we saw what happened—against would-be thieves and potential killers.

In a matter of five weeks there were five attempted or successful armed robberies, two deaths had occurred, and three thieves were recovering from wounds. Are these citizens crying out for the right to be protected from the potential killer who seems to have no fear of the law or a serious penalty for his dastardly deeds?

As Members of the Parliament of Canada we cannot condone such behaviour. We have sworn to uphold the laws of the country and to make new laws. Surely we can return their confidence in our system of justice. If we cannot condone this action, we should at least return their confidence in our system of justice.

The fundamental questions of capital punishment are, is it deserved and is it appropriate? I believe that capital punishment vindicates the moral standard that it is wrong to murder and that the murderer deserves to die for his crime. I believe the only moral justification for capital punishment is that it is deserved and it is a just penalty. Either it is or it is not. Capital punishment is necessary to protect society and social order and should be available as an option in sentencing. As the situation currently stands, we are not adequately protected. The killer who has been jailed for life has one option to prison, that is, escape.

As a former Minister of Corrections in the Province of Manitoba, I knew of the difficulties in our prisons and penal system. Those people who argue that a term of life imprisonment is an appropriate alternative to the death penalty should recognize what is happening in our penal system. The crime rate in our prisons across Canada has risen by some 400 per cent since the abolition of capital punishment in 1976. There is an average of some 11 murders every year in our penal system. What we are doing is transferring the problem into our penal system. In the environment existing within our institutions, the convicted murderer has nothing to lose if he kills again. Will a longer sentence really make a difference to someone already serving a life sentence? Do we really want the Clifford Olsons out on the street again? That is a question we must ask ourselves. Do we really want an individual like that walking around in society knowing what he had done to his 11 victims some years ago?

Those are my reasons for supporting capital punishment. I believe that we, as part of the parliamentary system, have to recognize that the reality of first degree murder is senseless and it is brutal. Where there is no question that an individual has committed the ultimate crime, give the jury the opportunity to decide whether capital punishment should be imposed on that individual so that we can protect society and bring reality back into our justice.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a brief question to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—St. James (Mr. Minaker). In the course of his remarks he listed a number of types of murders which he believed warranted the use of the death penalty. Let me point out to him that all those types of murders occur in Great Britain. Not only that but Britain is faced very frequently with murders created by terrorists of various types. Yet, just a few years ago, the British House of Commons with a large majority of Conservative Members of Parliament in which the Prime Minister, no shrinking violet, is a strong supporter of capital punishment, voted by a substantial majority against a proposal to reintroduce capital punishment.

That situation is not peculiar to Great Britain. Virtually every democratic country in the world, with the exception of the United States, has now done away with capital punishment, and countries in which capital punishment is found are the communist countries, without exception, and most of the right-wing military dictatorships.

Why does the Hon. Member prefer to associate himself and this country with the communist countries and the right-wing military dictatorships and not take an example and lesson from the democratic countries which, as I have pointed out, with the exception of the United States, have all done away with capital punishment?

Mr. Minaker: Mr. Speaker, let me reply through you to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). First, I am not familiar with the resolution that was before the British Parliament but I understand that the last resolution which was defeated was confusing. I think it said basically, "Are you in favour of the return of capital punishment for murder?" Obviously I am not in favour of capital punishment returning just for murder, but for specific crimes, premeditated homicidal crimes.

I might throw the question back at the Hon. Member. Why would I vote like a communist country or like the United States? Why would the Hon. Member not vote like the majority of his constituency wants him to? Why will he not do what the people of Canada want? Is the Hon. Member against democracy?

Mr. Benjamin: Read Sir Edmund Burke.

Mr. Minaker: In my riding, 73 per cent of the people in the last survey wanted the return of capital punishment. Let the juries decide whether they want to apply it. Why would the Hon. Member go against the wishes of his constituents? I told the people of my riding how I was going to vote on the question of capital punishment during the campaign. I stayed with that decision. I believe in it. It is something that is just and will help deter homicidal crimes.

The Hon. Member says statistics do not apply. Let us go back to 1962 when we actually had the last hanging. That is when statistics should start. People do not pay attention when something is passed by legislation. They read in the newspaper how many people were or were not hanged when crime rates go up. You have to look at the year 1962, not the year 1976 when using statistics. We can throw statistics back and forth. I know what I believe in and I think that is what the majority of people of Canada believe in. I am proud that I will be able to vote on their behalf here in this House. I hope the Hon. Member will consider that when he casts his vote.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—St. James (Mr. Minaker) said that in his riding the majority of people said that they wanted capital punishment and that he is now going to follow the wishes of his constituents. He said he wanted to be consistent and represent the people. If that is the case, will he be consistent and resign and call upon his Party to resign since according to the last Gallup poll 76 per cent of Canadians said that they did not want the Conservative Party as the Government of Canada?

Mr. Benjamin: Obey the wishes of your constituents.

Mr. Minaker: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member throws out something that has nothing to do with the issue with which we are dealing.

Mr. Keeper: It has to do with democracy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I realize this is a very emotional debate.

An Hon. Member: He walked into this by himself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope that the Hon. Member will have an opportunity to rebut whatever statements other Members may make. We still have another few minutes for questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—St. James (Mr. Minaker) has the floor.

Mr. Minaker: Mr. Speaker, when the Hon. Member talks about the most recent poll, that poll will change, and it is changing right now. One of our mandates was to bring forward the debate on capital punishment. We are doing that. Another was to deal with pornography. We are dealing with that. Another one was free trade. We can go on and on. Those are the mandates our Government was given and we are going to provide them for the people of Canada. When they see where the New Democratic Party is on these issues, then we will see where the popularity of the New Democrats is. You can only straddle the line so long. When they have to make decisions and vote in the House, the people of Canada will see where members of the New Democratic Party stand on these issues. The Canadian people will see where those Members stand and then they will decide who they want for government. I am confident that they will decide they want the Progressive Conservatives returned.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member just mentioned that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) decided to bring the issue of capital punishment back in 1984 because capital punishment was actually abolished in 1976. I would like the Hon. Member to explain why the Prime Minister brought back the issue of the reinstatement of capital punishment as promised but today is against it. Why did he do that?

Mr. Minaker: Mr. Speaker, I guess the Hon. Member was not listening very carefully. I said that one of the promises made was that we would bring back the debate on capital punishment. I think it was very clearly understood that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is opposed to capital punishment but he is a Prime Minister who will allow the Parliament of Canada to debate the issue. He believes in democracy, so there will be a free vote on this issue and I am proud we have a Prime Minister who will allow that. The promise that was made during the 1984 election campaign was to bring back the debate on capital punishment, not to return capital punishment. It was to let the House of Commons decide that issue, not that we will decide it right now.

Obviously members of the New Democratic Party do not believe in democracy. I do not know if they have free votes over there on that side. I do not think they have free votes on any issues. The Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) depends on free trade. The majority of the workers, 7,500 workers in Churchill, depend upon mining and export, but the Hon. Member cannot vote for free trade. He must oppose it. That is the kind of democracy they have in that Party. When members of the New Democratic Party talk about democracy, we know where they stand on a free vote on any issue.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise my hon. friend that free votes originated in our caucus in 1933. I heard the Hon. Member say that the people of Canada have a right to feel protected from murderers. I do not want to put words in my hon. friend's mouth, but—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I do have difficulty hearing the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) because there seems to be a crossfire exchange going on. The Hon. Member for Regina West has the floor.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, is the Hon. Member saying that every citizen of this country would then automatically become suspect as a potential murderer? I believe I heard the Hon. Member say, and I believe I heard him correctly, that the people of Canada want to be protected from murderers. Therefore, every citizen of Canada is suspect because it could happen to any one of us. The hon. gentleman could snap and he might kill somebody tomorrow, who knows. Does he want to have all of us examined and watched? That is the logical result of what he said. I wonder if he could enlarge upon that statement.

As well, could the Hon. Member tell me if he has ever read Edmund Burke's address to his constituents—

Mr. Nystrom: A good Conservative.

Mr. Benjamin: He was a good Conservative, by the way. He spoke of a Member of Parliament owing his constituents diligence, the fullest consideration of his constituents' opinions and maximum work on their behalf, but he is not their delegate but their representative and does not owe them his conscience. Has the Hon. Member ever thought of that?

Mr. Minaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Hon. Member's logic comes from. I do not know if he was sitting in the House or he was in the lobby watching me on television or what, but I cannot follow the logic of what he has suggested about what I said.

I said that naturally people want to be protected from murderers, but the reference I was making was that I believe that the return of capital punishment will be a deterrent. I firmly believe that. In that way, there will be some protection from first degree premeditated murder.

I would suggest that the Hon. Member read the statement of Edmund Burke to his constituents because I would think that in Regina—

Mr. Benjamin: I did.

Mr. Minaker: The Hon. Member has said that he did. I think he had better keep reading it—

Mr. Benjamin: When they were mad at me.

Mr. Minaker: He knows that the majority of his constituents want the return of capital punishment in order to let a jury decide if it wants to apply it. That is the key. Perhaps juries will not apply it but at least, if we follow through on this, we have said that if a crime is committed that deserves this punishment, a jury can use it. That is what we should provide to the citizens of Canada. That is what they want in our justice system.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I heard the Hon. Member from the "PCP" Party talking about consistency. Let us rephrase the question and steer it away from the matter of free votes, although I am puzzled as to why he should have raised the issue of free votes. There has been no clear demonstration on the government side that they have any particular commitment to free votes. After the shenanigans of the last couple of weeks, it is entirely doubtful.

Having committed himself to follow the dictates of the majority of his constituents, will the Hon. Member always do that? That is question number one. Question number two is a little different from others he might anticipate.

Among those of us opposed to capital punishment, there are those who are concerned about the problem of judicial error. The Hon. Member may remember an occasion on which someone was made a victim of capital punishment as a result of judicial error. That victim said: "Forgive them, Father, for they not what they do".

I wonder if the Hon. Member would not see some inconsistency between that statement made by an historic victim of erroneous capital punishment and his own position on capital punishment.

Mr. Minaker: Mr. Speaker, I could read a number of lines from the Bible indicating that capital punishment is correct, if he wants to get into that type of debate. Perhaps the Hon. Member heard me say earlier that I did not wish to get into religion when debating this issue. I said that that is what I believe in and what a majority of people in Canada believe in. I believe that it is right for that type of crime.

The Hon. Member asked if I have always done what a majority of my constituents want. No, I have not always done that but I am fortunate in this instance. I am on the side of the majority.

I will be looking forward to seeing how members of the New Democratic Party vote on this. I cannot understand why my good friend and colleague from Winnipeg Centre is voting the way he is. I am sure the majority of his constituents are in favour of the return of capital punishment. If they are not, they are living in a pocket in the middle of no-man's land. I know that the majority of Winnipegers support capital punishment. It will be interesting to see how the Hon. Member votes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I will vote as I will always vote on any resolution before the House to restore capital punishment. I will vote against such a resolution or motion.

I will not be guided by polls. I will attempt to follow logic and principle. If you follow polls you are in great danger. A Decima poll published in Maclean's today indicates that the percentage of Canadians in favour of capital punishment has dropped from 72 per cent to 61 per cent, with only 38 per cent absolutely convinced of its necessity. There is a lesson there. Polls should not be the final determining factor in the actions we take in this House. Parliamentarians have an obligation to consider an issue of this sort with great care.

There are people paying a great deal of attention to what we say. That is an argument against any notion the Government may have in this free vote to impose closure on this House in order to stop debate and thus deny the Canadian people the opportunity to consider this question with great care.

The essential question in this debate is why Canada should be poised, in the view of many in this House, to be the first civilized western nation to restore capital punishment having once abolished it. Is it because Canada is overwhelmed with the violence which characterizes the televised portrayal of America? Is it because ours like U.S. cities are under seige by criminals? Is it because Canada is so overwhelmed with poverty that there is no alternative to crime, for which this measure is seen as a solution to the problem in the U.S? Is it because we have found, after years without capital punishment, that the deterrent effect has been lost and there is a great upsurge in the homicide rate? Is it because we have a system of justice so perfect that there can never be an error? Or is it because we have absolute equality with no possibility of discrimination which would deny to the Indian, the black, the Ukrainian and the Francophone equal treatment under the law? Or is it because we have a Government under seige and looking for an easy way to enhance its popularity and is intent on doing so by resorting to the views of its most primitive Members who seek simplistic answers to the fundamental and complex questions facing this land?

I have listened with attention to the declarations of those who advocate the restoration of capital punishment, and I am not convinced. It seems to me we are listening to many people with simple answers to everything. It also seems to me that if we restore the most absolute and irrevocable of punishments, we had better be prepared to advance the most absolute and irrefutable arguments in support of it. We may make those arguments on rational and intellectual grounds. We may seek to demonstrate that the existence of the threat of capital punishment deters the murderer. We may seek to demonstrate that it deters the husband who, in a fit of anger, kills his wife. Or the person playing cards with friends or relatives who, in a fit of passionate anger, decides to attack someone and as a consequence kills him or her. Or that it deters the person who, in the process of robbing a corner store, becomes momentarily frightened and shoots someone. All of those people, I am sure, are standing or sitting there carefully considering the consequences of such an act.

Do we see in statistics some justification for capital punishment where it exists as opposed to where it does not? If one examines those countries without capital punishment we see no evidence that its absence has led to an increase in homicide. We do not see that murder is deterred in the U.S. as compared to Canada. We have not seen in the last 10 years a vast increase in the rate of homicide in Canada.

The fact that in Illinois they kill people who kill people has not made Illinois a safer place with a lower homicide rate than Michigan where they do not kill people who kill people. If you look at the 13 states with capital punishment you will find they have a higher rate of homicide than in the 37 states which do not kill those who kill. Furthermore, we have the interesting statistics from Florida and Georgia which show that immediately after the restoration of capital punishment the rate of homicide increased. We have to agree with the president of a police association who said that to try to win the argument for capital punishment on the basis of its deterrent effect is futile. It is indeed.

It seems to me that if we are going to resort to capital punishment we must be convinced that our system of justice is infallible. It can never be in error. I would simply ask the ordinary citizen out there, when he or she is stopped for a traffic offence, whether they would want their lives to depend on the infallibility and fairness of the system which confronts them on the street when they receive that ticket. The evidence is abundant that unless we have infallible people we will not have an infallible system of justice. That system of justice is least infallible when it affects the poor, the racial minority, or a man as opposed to a woman. One has to assume infallibility in a system which mirrors our society and all of its frailties. We have to assume a system each stage of which will ensure that justice is done. Yet we know justice is not always done. We know that in the last century at least 25 innocent people were executed in the U.S. for murder. There is a legion of reports about those who came within moments of losing their lives for crimes they did not commit.

One particularly relevant example of that is the case of Donald Marshall. I know that his was not a capital offence, but it was murder and it is a sufficiently dramatic example to bring forth as an illustration. An error was made and was compounded by the fact that we were not dealing with one of the winners in society, one of the well-to-do whose chances of dying for a capital offence in the United States are very slight as compared to those of the poor. He had one other characteristic which condemned him. He was an Indian in Canada.

I refer those who think that the unequal application of justice to those who are racially or nationally different is unique to the United States and cannot happen in Canada to the studies of Dr. Avio which demonstrate that even in Canada if you were a Ukrainian, a Francophone, black, or a poor person, your chances were far greater than those of your fellow citizens, if you were found guilty of murder, to be killed for such.

In the arguments of those who advocate capital punishment we cannot see an intellectual or rational basis in the infallibility of our law and the prospect that the application of that law would be error-free. I suppose that if you were looking for nice, neat, rational, intelligent and intellectually-based arguments for capital punishment, you might resort to the ultimate, that it is a lot cheaper to kill them. Never mind that you might make a mistake and kill an innocent person, thus causing our nation to become guilty of murder. Surely it is a potent argument that we could relieve the burden upon our prisons of having to incarcerate so many of those who are guilty of homicides and save the taxpayers some money.

The fact is that in New York State at least the cost of the judicial process necessary to bring about the death of a murderer would be equal to the cost of keeping that individual in prison for almost 100 years. Therefore, the argument of getting off cheap is not one for the restoration of capital punishment.

I suppose one would have to resort to the essentially emotional, moral, or ethical argument that the punishment must fit the crime. That is the familiar argument of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. The Member was talking earlier about consistency. If this most extreme form of violent crime must be met by the most extreme form of violent action by the state, it follows, therefore, that all violent crimes should be punished by violent action.

I have not heard that argument advanced so far, although I am sure that those who advocate capital punishment may be tempted by the simplicity, clarity and logic of it. It has been pointed out by a number of commentators that this is the primitive solution of a more primitive society, that there must be some standard to limit the punishment or there would be no way of keeping control over the populace as they attempted retribution.

Does that make it appropriate? Should we return to the state of the Old Testament and before? Or should we listen to that great historic victim of capital punishment administered as a result of judicial error? Should we take an eye for an eye and and a tooth for a tooth, or shall we listen to that early victim and say, "Forgive them"?

God said, "Vengeance is mine". God said that because only the absolute could understand all of the conditions, all of the factors, and all of the environmental influences on someone who kills. There can be no justice if we do not know all of those things which led to an event. I know that some of the more simplistic advocates of capital punishment believe that they have a closer alliance with God than the rest of us, but most of us think that we are by our nature limited in our capacity to understand, to bring about symmetry in the administration of justice, and to ensure that justice does fit the crime. This requires the weighing of factors which only God, only an absolute intelligence, could ever understand. Yet we would advance ourselves as final judges on something so absolute in its consequences.

No, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to see Canada revert to a primitive state. Canada abolished capital punishment as a sign that it had become an advanced civilized nation. This is something that de Tocqueville recognized many years ago. He said that the severity of a nation's punishment is least when its sense of social equality is greatest. It is a measure of the maturity of its democracy, the level of its civilization. The same man who is full of humanity toward his fellow creatures when they are at the same time his equals becomes insensitive to their affliction as soon as that equality ceases.

One hundred and fifty years ago de Tocqueville recognized what is evident now. It is in the least democratic and most regressive nations of the world that capital punishment exists—the U.S.S.R., Iran, Saudi Arabia and South Africa. Those who look at America will see that it is the contempt for equality that underpins capital punishment there.

It is no accident that it is the southern states of that nation which have rushed so quickly to capital punishment. In the southern states a black has about 10 times the chance of being a victim of capital punishment that a white does. Only in that nation, and I hope never in this country, would a Supreme Court argue that while there is discrimination in the application of capital punishment it is of no judicial relevance.

No, Mr. Speaker, I do not want this country to revert to that model of nationhood. From the message of de Tocqueville from many years ago one inevitably reaches the conclusion that those who advocate capital punishment have a considerably greater sympathy for the kind of nation which he portrayed than the kind of nation that we have become. As I said before, those are the people who see the simple answers. They have the simple answers on abortion, drugs and the poor. They look back on almost everything. They are the ones who would seek to return to gallons while the rest of the world is going to litres. They do not represent the best in this nation. They do not represent our regard for social equality.

The records of those who most strongly advocate capital punishment will show that their vision is flawed compared to our vision of a country in which equality is the imperative.

I am not prepared to engage in a debate on whether the punishment should be hanging and whether we can tolerate that some people may survive hanging, with the only certitude being if their heads are ripped off. I am not prepared to consider someone being injected with a fatal fluid knowing that they are about to die in agonizing pain before witnesses. I am not prepared to argue whether the electric chair which burns the flesh is better.

I am only prepared to respond to irrefutable arguments which would support absolutely this absolute punishment. Without that, free vote or not, New Democrat or not, I will vote against capital punishment now and forever.

Mr. Hudon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Hon. Member, whom I respect very much for the positions he takes.

What I always find disappointing in this noble Assembly is that, when we take difficult positions for or against something, people generally try to make those who hold different views from their own feel guilty, and this is happening now as abolitionists are falling in exactly the same trap as those who are in favour of the death penalty.

In my opinion, my hon. colleague made some good points, but his weakest argument was to criticize those who are opposed to his own views.

First, Mr. Speaker, there is something on which the Hon. Member might not have insisted enough. The criminals we do not want to see out on the streets are not necessarily those who have committed a first premeditated murder, because such murderers are generally kept in prison for a very long time. Those who are the most dangerous and who really destroy our society are those who have certain criminal activities, such as drug trafficking, and who are sentenced to five, six or seven years in prison and find themselves out on the streets two years later with an urgent need for money. They got used to a comfortable way of life and they are the ones who are dangerous.

However, what we are now discussing is imposing the death penalty to those who have killed. We might not be targeting the right people.

According to the figures, of 140 individuals found guilty of premeditated murder who obtained their parole between 1920 and 1975, that is over a fifty-five year period, only eight committed a second murder.

Saying that we want to kill people because they have killed is therefore besides the point. This should be our first argument.

Second, people always say that the death penalty will give the criminals a lesson. In my opinion, this is not the way to go about it. If we really want to give people a lesson, executions should be televised. As we do not want this because we are a civilized nation, then we should simply not have any executions.

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to forgive those who disagree with me on this issue because it is obvious that they do not know what they are doing. Beyond that, however, I believe the rest of what the Member says weighs heavily upon all of us.

There is a great deal of concern among people that the justice system does not deliver, that punishment is not sure and swift, and that some are released from prison too soon. All of that is true. If the Hon. Member wishes to pursue that matter, there is the report of the Canadian Sentencing Commission.

Unquestionably, this is the single most important concern among the people. It is a concern which causes some to see relief in capital punishment. I was engaged in a debate about capital punishment.

We gauged that about two-thirds or three-quarters of the audience favoured the restoration of capital punishment. As we argued the issue, we decided collectively that the two most significant problems were the treatment of victims and the certainty and speed of punishment. If those concerns were met, then capital punishment was not supported.

In fact, after addressing that issue, at the end of the discussion, 100 per cent of the audience and 100 per cent of those participating in the discussion, including those who initially advocated capital punishment, agreed that it should not be restored.

Mr. Hamelin: As indicated by my colleague, Mr. Speaker, I was impressed not by the first part of the speech of the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville but rather by his other arguments which he put forth brilliantly. He refers in particular to this image of a modern society, of an evolved society, so I should like to direct two questions to my colleague concerning his vibrant discourse on the need for an evolved and modern society. Would he be able to sell this line to the wife of the convenience store who has just been murdered? Would he be able to sell the same line to the parents of the young girl who was raped in a moment of madness, and then killed to hide the first crime? Would he be able to sell the same line that we in Canada are an enlightened society—are we not?—where our prisons are nothing short of sieves, where indeed we no longer kill anybody, right? Can you decently sell this line of Canada's enlightened society to these people? For me personally it is not a matter of exemplary nature, I know that capital punishment scares people like you and I, criminals could not really care much less. But the point is a matter of responsibility. Indeed, are you in a position to utter the same remarks? And you said briefly, Mr. Speaker, that one cannot render justice because God alone knows the facts—God alone, you said, knows the facts. If we were to carry your argument to its logical conclusion, since we never know all the facts we should also close down our prisons. That is the question I want to ask the Hon. Member.

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: First, Mr. Speaker, I must pose a corresponding question to the hon. gentleman. Is he willing to be a participant in the application of the death penalty to someone who is innocent? Is he willing to share in that guilt? Is he willing to play God?

In addressing the issue of capital punishment, I have already indicated that the logic of the Hon. Member's argument must inevitably lead to the imposing of corporal punishment in all cases of violence. In each of those cases of violence one would have to face the victim and justify how that person is sitting in jail eating meals and so on. The depth of the tragedy that anyone might experience as a result of the murder of a husband or child is not going to be addressed by killing the murderer. That does not solve the problem. What will solve the problem is for the guilty to be brought to trial quickly, the punishment a certainty and proportionate to the crime, but not irrevocable, as execution certainly would be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has now terminated.

It being 6 p.m., pursuant to order made Friday, June 12, 1987, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

ADVISABILITY OF FEDERAL SALES TAX REDUCTION

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for the reduction of the federal sale tax for disabled persons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted this evening to rise in my place and share with the House some thoughts about Motion M-72, that in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for the elimination of the federal sales tax for disabled persons.

I have been interested in the welfare of the handicapped community for a long time. I am not alone in that objective. As I have come to know my colleagues here in the House of Commons and beyond, I have found many share this interest. I believe that our objective is to provide mechanisms which will allow all handicapped persons to enter as fully as possible into the mainstream of Canadian society. That is my objective and I am confident that it is the objective of this House. What I have to say this evening is with that in mind.

Some 14 per cent of all Canadians are handicapped. In Canada that amounts of some 3.5 million persons. For reasons which are not clear, the rate of disability tends to be higher in rural areas than in urban areas. Tragically, the rate also seems to be higher among females than among males, and dramatically, tragically, about 80 per cent of the handicapped persons in Canada are not in the workplace. Of the 20 per cent who are working, most are employed by Government, federal, provincial, municipal and their agencies. Not all that many are really employed in the private sector. Furthermore, some 54 per cent of disabled persons who are in the workplace earn less than $10,000 per year.

I could go into a long process this afternoon, telling Hon. Members everything about the handicapped, where they come from, what their handicaps are, and about the difficulties they have in facing life. However, I will forego that. They are indeed an underprivileged group in educational achievement, in their earning power and by the numbers who are in the workforce. Their opportunities in life are highly restricted. There has been a great deal written about the handicapped in Canada. Perhaps the best outline available to me is entitled Profile of Disabled Persons in Canada. It was written by the Department of the Secretary of State and published in November of 1986. I commend it to all Hon. Members to gain some insight into the handicaps of the disabled.

At the same time, I know that much has been done for disabled persons in Canada by this House and by other jurisdictions. The funding for the Disabled Persons Participation program has been increased to $16 million for the coming four or five years. These moneys will be used for a variety of projects to help disabled persons meet their objectives. In addition, the housing renovation program has been changed so that a subsidy of $5,000 is available per unit to upgrade and modify housing units for the handicapped. There has been improved access to federal and other Government buildings and to the universities. Employment opportunities for the handicapped have also been enhanced.

As a part of tax reform, the special deduction for disabled persons will be replaced by a federal tax credit of $550 starting in 1988. The disability tax credit is not to be refunded to the taxpayer, but the unused portion will be transferable to the disabled person's spouse, supporting parent or grandparent. I think that is a welcome initiative.

Furthermore, the present law provides for a deduction of nearly $2,900 in 1987 for disabled persons whose impairment is markedly restricted or is expected to restrict their activities on a daily basis and for a continuous period of some 12 months. The amount of the disability deduction has recently been increased and the deduction was extended to a much larger segment of the population. As a result, the tax assistance now benefits approximately 250,000 persons in Canada.

However, more needs to be done, and more can be done. I originally took an interest in one particular aspect of the motion I put before the House. That relates to the purchase of motorized transportation by handicapped people. I found that a significant number of my constituents were confronted with the need to buy specialized transportation equipment. The more I looked into it, the more I found that a wide-spread aspect of the handicapped community across Canada had the same problem. For instance, you and I, Mr. Speaker, could probably go out and purchase an excellent automobile for $15,000 or less. However, my information would suggest that the handicapped person is required to purchase a specialized vehicle, perhaps a van, with equipment for egress and entry into the vehicle and for special equipment which would allow that person to drive the vehicle in a safe and secure manner. When the original cost of the special vehicle, plus the cost of the special equipment, is totalled, one can see the handicapped person is confronted with an extraordinary expense, and these persons are much more financially deprived than you or I, Mr. Speaker.

In fact, as I pointed out earlier, 80 per cent of the disabled are not in the workforce at all and are dependent on society or on their family for support. So we can see how difficult it is for handicapped persons to make expensive specialized purchases. In all fairness, I must bring to the attention of Hon. Members that there are provisions in the Excise Tax Act for the disabled. For instance, chapter E-13, Schedule III of the Excise Act, item 13 has exempt provisions for invalid chairs, commode chairs, walkers, wheelchair lifts and similar aids to locomotion, with or without wheels, including batteries especially designed for the use thereof. Another tax exempt item is found in Section 5.1 in chapter E-13, and I quote:

> Buses or vans specifically equipped for transporting handicapped persons when for use by public organizations or institutions exclusively for providing transportation to the handicapped, and that would have been capable of carrying 12 or more passengers if equipped in the normal manner.

In bringing that to your attention, Mr. Speaker, I do so only to point out that the House and other governments have already recognized the problem. I would also like to bring to the attention of Hon. Members this evening the report Towards Equality with which many Members will be familiar. Recommendation No. 69 of the report states:

> That the Income Tax Act be amended so that disabled persons are entitled to a deduction for the cost of special aids and devices, including extra transportation costs incurred because of their disability and necessary for their employment.

That is the problem I am trying to address this evening. In conjunction with that, but quite separate from it, I need to share with Hon. Members that there is now a move in progress by the Disabled Council of Canada to approach all provinces toward the reduction of provincial sales tax on items that would relate to the handicapped. I share this with Hon. Members because it is dramatically important that this approach is gathering momentum across the country and that there will be initiatives taking place in the next while in each provincial legislature.

I point this out to Hon. Members because it is quite independent of what I am attempting to do here this evening. Although the two are related and have a common goal, my own initiative started before I was aware of the initiative of the Disabled Council of Canada.

I have had substantial correspondence with the Department of Finance over the past year and a half in which I have tried to convince the Department, through normal powers of persuasion, argument and, hopefully, with appropriate evidence, that what I was attempting to do was something for which it could provide the lead. I have not been successful in that endeavour. Thus I have turned to the venue of Private Members' Business, hoping to find a solution here in Parliament and to have a thoughtful debate on the topic with my colleagues.

The principal objection raised by the Department of Finance at the time I focused in on correspondence with it was as follows. I was told by the Department that all of the items accorded relief as aids to the disabled are goods designated for or capable of use only by those persons. It was made clear to me that no relief has ever been provided for goods such as automobiles which are capable of use both by the disabled and by able-bodied persons. The arguments go on but, effectively, that is the point the Department made with me.

I have to confess and share with all here this evening that when I started my research into this matter my intent was, let us say by way of example of specialized automobiles for the handicapped, that the tax relief would apply to both the automobile and to the specialized equipment that would be attached or affiliated with it for the handicapped person. However, in discussions with representatives of the Department of Finance and with my colleagues in the House, I have changed my stance now so that the reduction relative to my motion would only apply to the accessories that are required by the handicapped person, only to those materials that are essential to the handicapped person and not to the routine things in that person's daily life.

I have spoken to many of my colleagues in the past three or four weeks about this motion. I was delighted to see how concerned they were for handicapped persons in Canada. They expressed a deep and sincere concern. I very much hope that that concern tonight will translate itself into the adoption of my motion.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate this evening, and I would like to start by stating that the tax relief with respect to sales tax requested by the Hon. Member in his motion is already in place. Furthermore, recent proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) on tax reform will, as you know, Mr. Speaker, benefit the disabled, especially those on low incomes. Finally, since 1984, the present Conservative Government has made substantial improvements in programs designed for the disabled. Perhaps I may expand on each of these points in my response to the Hon. Member's motion.

The disabled presently enjoy a measure of tax relief in that certain products for their exclusive consumption are exempted from federal sales tax. To that end, a broad spectrum of medical goods for the exclusive use and sole benefit of the disabled is already exempt from federal sales tax. Such goods include, for instance, hearing aids, wheelchairs, artificial limbs, pharmaceutical products and all goods purchased by public hospitals or institutions for the use of the disabled. The list is much longer, but these examples should suffice to demonstrate that the disabled already enjoy a measure of tax relief.

However, the list itself already indicates a major problem inherent to the exemption method. As medical technology progresses, new equipment to help the disabled is developed and must be added to the list of tax exempt goods. This ad hoc method was criticized in the recently published document on federal sales tax reform because of its complexity and its arbitrary nature. As mentioned in the document, it is often hard to draw the line between what goods should be taxable and what goods should be exempt. For instance, Mr. Speaker, we have a court ruling on fluoridated toothpaste which, according to the Department should not be exempt and which according to the courts should be exempt because it has therapeutic benefits and should not be taxed as a cosmetic.

The fact remains that despite their short comings, exemptions are in place to provide tax relief from sales tax for the disabled. Furthermore, financial assistance is not restricted to sales tax exemptions. The disabled also receive assistance through the income tax system.

This disability deduction, which is $2,890 in 1987, is available to individuals who are seriously incapacitated for an extended period. The disability deduction recognizes that a handicap implies fixed costs, and this is generally taken into account. The deduction is transferrable to the spouse or supporting parent. And as you know, Mr. Speaker, it benefits some 250,000 individuals who are seriously handicapped.

Medical expenses cover certain products and medical services and certain items designed to help the handicapped lead a normal life. Generally, those items are clearly identified as reserved to the exclusive use of the handicapped individuals. The expenses include allowable medical expenses incurred by the taxpayer or a spouse on behalf of a dependent handicapped individual where the amount is more than 3 per cent of the taxpayer's net income. In 1985, some 4.4 million taxpayers claimed such expenses, for a total of about $2 billion.

On the occasion of tax reform, the needs of the handicapped have not been overlooked, quite the opposite. For that reason, tax reform will bring significant benefits to the handicapped. Generally speaking, by converting deductions to credits we are able to direct increased help to low-income taxpayers. Since the handicapped in general are low-income people, they will benefit significantly from that provision.

In the case of the disability deduction, it is proposed not only that the deduction be converted to a credit, but also that the tax benefit be significantly increased. The conversion from a deduction to a tax credit meets the main concerns of handicapped groups concerning the deduction. The tax benefit provided by a deduction favours higher income taxpayers, even though low-income handicapped people, who have greater need of tax assistance, may have incurred equivalent expenses. The $2,890 disability deduction is being converted to a $491 tax credit for a 17 percent tax rate. However, it is proposed to set that rate at $550. The unused part of the credit will be transferrable to the handicapped person's spouse or supporting parent or grandparent. That improvement helps handicapped individuals buy the goods and services they need by reason of their handicap, and is the second similar improvement in two years. In 1986, the deduction was increased by $250.

The second major component of tax relief granted to the disabled, the deduction for medical expenses, has also been converted into a tax credit for expenses in excess of three per cent of net income. On the whole, the tax reform has solved one of the problems of providing tax relief for the disabled: the regressive distribution of benefits under the present system. The new disability credit provides the same tax relief for all disabled persons, whatever their income. The credit has also been increased to provide a greater measure of tax relief to all persons benefitting under the system.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to draw the attention of Hon. Members to the many measures that have been introduced since 1984 to benefit the disabled. The most important measure is undoubtedly the decision to expand the definition of a disabled person, effective as of the 1986 tax year. All taxpayers with a serious disability are now entitled to claim the deduction, and, of course, to take advantage of the improved disability credit in 1988. This is a break with the previous, more restrictive definition under which the disability deduction was granted only to the blind or to persons who were bedridden or confined to a wheelchair. By expanding the definition, tax relief can be granted to 180,000 more disabled persons or their spouse or parent or grandparent who provides for their care; in 1988, Mr. Speaker, it is expected that 250,000 persons will be able to take advantage of this provision.

Furthermore, as of the 1987 tax year, which is this year, Mr. Speaker, the list of goods eligible under the heading of medical expenses has been expanded to include: van conversion accessories enabling persons confined to a wheelchair to enter and drive such vehicles unassisted; Braille printers and large-print devices enabling persons with severe visual handicaps to use home computers; speech synthesizers enabling the deaf to speak with the help of a portable keyboard, TV closed-caption decoders for the deaf; monitoring devices to be attached to babies identified as being susceptible to the crib death syndrome.

Furthermore, since 1986 the federal Government has increased amounts paid to individuals receiving disability benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. In 1986, the maximum disability pension was $455.64 per month; in 1987, it will go up to $634.09, an increase of $178.45 per month, or 39 per cent. Some 15,000 people will be able to take advantage of this increase in the Canada Pension Plan disability benefits.

Veterans' pensions and allowances have also been increased. Once more, nearly 150,000 pensioners will benefit.

These measures clearly show that the Government is concerned about the ability of the disabled and those on whom they depend for financial support to pay taxes.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, devices for the specific and exclusive use of the disabled are now exempt from the sales tax. In addition, medical expenses are now deductable and will be the subject of a tax credit after the reform. Finally, the disability deduction, which will be transformed into a tax credit, has been considerably improved. Taken together, these measures are of considerable benefit to the disabled. The initiatives taken since 1984 to improve these benefits show that this Conservative Government is concerned about the needs of the disabled. This commitment is also reflected in the tax reform proposals. While other improvements may be necessary, those are achievements of which all Canadians can be very proud.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express general support and even sympathy for the resolution of the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper). However, with all respect, I think he is attacking the problem in the wrong way.

Whether it is people who are disabled, war veterans, or old age pensioners who are eligible for the guaranteed income supplement, surely our tax laws should provide that they have an exemption. I realize that it is difficult to keep track of; I mean, we do not want to be handing out special identification cards like the KGB and the SS used to do.

I recall the last Budget of the present Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) which implemented a 10-cent per gallon excise tax on gasoline. In committee of the whole I moved amendments to exempt senior citizens who were eligible for the guaranteed income supplement, war veterans, and the disabled from that tax. The then Minister of Finance, the present Leader of the Official Opposition, was kind enough to send me a note across the floor asking me to resubmit an amendment providing for a rebate of the 10-cents per gallon gasoline tax for the disabled.

Like my hon. friend, I have a number of constituents who have specially equipped cars. The municipality or charitable organizations run buses, vans, or specially equipped station wagons. It provided them with an opportunity to make application for a full refund of that 10 cents per gallon excise tax on gasoline.

It worked during 1977 and 1978. I wish my hon. friend—and I really think he has a good idea in his motion—would talk to his own colleagues first. The 1979 Budget of the then Minister of Finance, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), cancelled the 10 per cent rebate of the excise tax on gasoline for the disabled.

We have done enough playing around with this sort of thing. Even the tax reform announcements of last Thursday did not cover old age pensioners who are eligible for GIS—and surely they must be the poorest of our elderly—those on war veteran's pensions, and those who are disabled, in any so-called sales tax reform. I do not think there is any disagreement about it among all Parties in this place. There should be no argument. It should not require a motion from a member of any Party. It should not require a Private Member's Bill or a Private Member's Motion.

I point this out, not to be vindictive, not to try to make political points, or anything else. It seems to me that there should be no argument or question about the matter. It should be automatic in the head space of Ministers of Finance and those guys in the nether regions of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue. No discussion should be necessary.

In part my hon. friend's motion says that "the Government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure". I do not think anyone in this place would argue against that. However, why should we be required to present it? It should be a matter of course, no matter what political Party is in power.

I hope my hon. friend's motion passes because it carries the weight of all Members of this place. I hope that he and his colleagues can have some influence on the people who advise and do White Papers et cetera, et cetera for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). The real test of any society is how well it treats its sick, its old, its veterans and its disabled.

If you examine countries all around the world, you will find that Canada does not do too bad a job, Mr. Speaker. In fact, we do fairly well. But what about this sitting around resting on our laurels with paltry sums? What about those who are maimed from birth, maimed by accident, those who have occupied hospital beds since the Second World War and/or those who have earned their retirement and who only get the Old Age Pension and the Guaranteed Income Supplement?

Surely no civilized society, and I think no Party in this place, will plead it is so hard up for dollars that it has to chisel on them. It is just not necessary. It does not amount to enough to upset or cause outrage or do violence to a Government's fiscal or monetary policy.

It means that this Parliament says that they are special people. That is all. They are special and they will receive special consideration. If we unanimously have to argue in favour of that special consideration, fine. But I make my point again that it should not be necessary. There need not be any debate or argument about it. I would urge that there be a unanimous voice vote now to pass this motion. We can then go out, have a sandwich, resume the debate at seven o'clock, and maybe have a 25 minute break. I want to assure my hon. friend if he wants to speak—

Mr. Boudria: Yes, I do.

Mr. Benjamin: Bless his heart. I hope he does not take any longer than I do. I think this question could be put. It could pass unanimously and then it would be on the Government's head. We have had this kind of discussion every year since I have been here. It is neither necessary nor needed. I urge the House to accept this motion as quickly as possible and then let us see what happens with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure today to take part in this debate on Motion 72 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper).

[English]

The motion presented to us is indeed very worthy of our support. I am quite pleased, as one Member, to give it my full endorsation. The motion to provide a reduction in sales tax for disabled persons is something which governments should have done quite some time ago as suggested to us by our colleague, the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin).

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) does not read the Orders of the Day, because if he did, he would have known that his colleague, the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton, wanted to move such a motion, and he would presumably have taken into account the suggestions of his own colleague in preparing the pile of documents which were tabled last week supposedly as a tax reform and which we all recognized as a Budget of the Conservative Party.

[English]

One of the elements introduced in this budget of last week, which is called a White Paper by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), is yet new taxes that affect a large number of Canadians, including the disabled. I give you an example of what I am referring to, Mr. Speaker. There is a tax proposed in last week's budget called tax reform which will affect in a very particular and dramatic way rural Canadians. It is, in fact, a tax on rural Canada. I say to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper), who I respect very much, that the tax proposed by the Minister of Finance on telecommunications is having a serious effect on rural and disabled people. This new telecommunications tax which has been brought forward is a tax on rural Canada. Here is why, Mr. Speaker.

The tax presented by the Minister of Finance is outlined in the little paper I have here in my hand which says:

> Extending the sales tax to telecommunications services at a rate of 10 per cent; the basic service charge for a private residential line will be exempt from this 10 per cent tax.

If you live in a rural area, the basic service is about $5 or $6 a month—somewhere in that neighborhood—depending on the area in which you live. If you live in an urban area, you pay approximately $15 or $20 for the basic telephone service. If you live in an urban area, say greater Ottawa or Montreal, you can phone approximately one million Canadian citizens without paying any long distance charges at all. For handicapped people who cannot get out, there is a method of access which is not there for others. But what if you live in the rural part of my riding or in the rural part of the riding of the Member for Nepean—Carleton? I think it would be the same in his case as it is in my riding.

Let me use the example of a farmer, which example could also apply to a handicapped person. The farmer may have a telephone in his home and one in the barn. Because only the basic service is tax exempt, the extra line in the barn is taxed. If he has a private line, which is extra in a rural area, that too is taxed. In a rural area you have to pay an additional amount of money. I believe it is in the order of $2 for every quarter mile from the nearest village to where you live if you have a private line. The cost of that private line is taxed under the measure introduced last week.

I was speaking with a group of farmers last weekend and they told me that their telephone bills are in the order of $75 per month in rural areas. Of that, $5 will be tax exempt and the other $70 will be taxed. This tax applies only to rural Canadians, and it applies in a most unfortunate way.

Mr. James: Seventy-five-dollar telephone bill?

Mr. Boudria: I think a Tory is heckling from across the way, but it is probably irrelevant. The Hon. Member across the way says that farmers do not pay $75 monthly telephone bills. I would like the record to show that the Hon. Member indicates that that is not so and that is fine. All rural Canadians who have to pay those fees will know the view of the Government. If government Members want rural Canadians to be taxed to death, that is fine. That is their opinion, but it is not mine.

Mr. James: I'm a farmer and I know what farmers pay.

Mr. Boudria: If he is a farmer, he should know better than to make the ridiculous statements he has been making in the House.

People living in rural areas phone long distance regularly. Even the Hon. Member opposite who is heckling should know that it is sometimes long distance to phone to the nearest village. If a handicapped person who lives in St. Isidore de Prescott has to phone a doctor in Rockland, Hawkesbury or any other community, he has to pay a long distance charge because that is the way it is. There is no choice in the matter. I am sure you know that, Mr. Speaker. It is too bad some Hon. Members opposite do not. I will speak a little slower so that they will understand.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I want my friend the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton to know that I wish him every success with his motion, but I must say that at the very moment when he moved this motion in the House, his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) had himself taken a big step backward, and imposed a heavier tax burden on those who are least able to pay, I mean the disadvantaged, the handicapped and all Canadians residing in rural areas. In my opinion, it is because of this ill-advised tax on communications which was introduced last week and should be withdrawn.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to say again that I support the motion moved by my friend the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton. I know that if the Minister of Finance does not understand anything, at least the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton understands that a taxation measure should be fair and honest. It is quite unfortunate that his colleague the Minister of Finance does not seem to understand anything, while the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton understands everything so well. I wish him every success with his motion and I dare hope that the House will adopt it and especially that the Minister of Finance will listen to him.

[English]

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to join in debate in private Members' hour and to speak in favour of the motion put forward by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper), to the effect that the House should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for the reduction of the federal sales tax for disabled persons.

If I understand correctly the thrust of the motion, it has been proposed because my colleague has a long-standing interest, as many Hon. Members do, in the welfare of the handicapped and disabled. He is seeking to secure the removal of federal sales tax on certain aids to the disabled and handicapped which, to my surprise, indeed do bear sales tax.

I have noticed that over the past several years the Government has taken a number of initiatives for the disabled, particularly from a taxation point of view. The disability deduction has been increased to the point where $2,610 in the last taxation year was the amount that was allowed to the handicapped in computing taxable income.

The May 1985 Budget enlarged and extended this deduction. In effect, it widened the definition of handicapped under the Income Tax Act to include individuals with severe cardio-respiratory failure, mental retardation, profound bilateral deafness and a range of other severe disabilities. Indeed, that deduction was increased by $250 in the 1986 taxation year. Those changes raised the number of persons who would qualify for a disability deduction to about 185,000, an increase of some 60,000 over previous years.

I would certainly like to concur in the direction the Government has taken. I notice also that very recently the Department of Finance and the Minister released a communiqué indicating that certain new devices would qualify as tax deductible medical expenses. Five recently developed devices designed to assist individuals with physical disabilities and other medical impairments now qualify for the medical expense deduction under the Income Tax Act.

Those items that will qualify as eligible medical expenses that will be deductible when total medical expenses exceed 3 per cent of net income in a year are conversion kits to modify family vans to permit persons confined to wheelchairs to gain independent access to vehicles and to drive them, synthetic speech systems, Braille printers and large-print devices that enable persons with severe sight impairment to utilize personal computers; electronic speech synthesizers that enable non-speaking individuals to speak using a portable keyboard; television closed-caption decoder for the deaf which deciphers special television transmissions and shows on television screens a script of the program; and monitors attached to babies identified as being prone to Sudden Infant Death Syndrome, commonly known as crib death, which sound an alarm when babies stop breathing.

It is my understanding that these measures are being taken to ensure that people who require these devices are treated fairly and equitably. Quite frankly, I was not aware of the fact that sales tax applied to any or all such items. If it does, I am certainly in complete agreement with my colleague from Nepean—Carleton that devices of this nature or similar ones which assist the disabled and handicapped should certainly be free of sales tax. I think we should move in that direction.

I believe it is important, however, that we view the matter in the context of the over-all tax reform White Paper which was released just last week. In phase two of that reform, the sales tax will be examined in great detail. Regardless of which of the three choices is made after consultation with all Canadians, it is apparent that decisions will have to be taken on the application of the tax. Will it apply to all goods, services and devices of this nature or will there be certain exemptions?

It is the opinion of some and, I believe, of Finance Department officials that for a sales tax to be as equitable, fair and reasonable as possible, it should apply to virtually all goods and services within the economy. Having a base as wide as that would then permit the lowest possible sales tax rate to be applied to items in order to generate the amount of revenue required as part of the comprehensive tax reform system.

If on the other hand we are to have exemptions within the system, that would have the effect of narrowing the base. The result of that would be that the rate of the sales tax would have to be increased because the higher rate of tax would apply to fewer products. That of course creates the kind of distortions and unfairness we have seen in our sales tax system in the past, something which tax reform is trying to get away from.

I would like to say that I find myself in complete agreement with the sentiment and thrust of the motion put forward by my hon. colleague. I might also compliment the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). His heart is in the right place on this matter. We have to look seriously at it. I believe if we are going to have any exemptions at all under the new sales tax, one of the first should be items of assistance to the disabled and handicapped. I want to compliment my colleague for bringing this matter to our attention.

As a member of the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs which will be involved in detailed hearings on all aspects of tax reform, I undertake that this matter will be raised in those hearings. If exemptions are to be allowed under a comprehensive sales tax, I will bear in mind what my colleague has said. It is a sensible and reasonable suggestion.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the floor this evening in this important debate which involves both the social situation and the financial situation.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to review briefly the main components of what we call the Canada Assistance Plan implemented pursuant to agreements concluded with the provinces and the territories. And, as of 15 days ago, we can say all the provinces of Canada, Quebec included. We are very proud, our federal Government now shares 50 per cent of expenditures incurred by all provinces and municipalities to provide the following through the Canada Assistance Plan:

—assistance to the needy;

—the plan helps provinces and municipalities provide social welfare services for the needy or others who would probably need them if they had no access to such services;

—in addition, Mr. Speaker, the plan offers work activity projects designed to improve the working skills of people who experience unusual difficulties to find or keep jobs or undergo training leading to employment.

This is now available in all ridings throughout Canada, including the beautiful constituency of LaSalle—Émard.

Mr. Rossi: Make the best of it, you are not going to be there much longer.

Mr. Lanthier: Notwithstanding the untimely jeers of the Opposition, we are still in good humour. Mr. Speaker, the Canada Assistance Plan offers help to the needy as follows:

—items to meet such basic needs as food, housing, clothing, heating fuel, public services, household equipment, and services for personal needs;

—in addition, the plan provides assistance to the needy to obtain items required for a trade or other employment: operating permits; tools and equipment; items required for the safety, well-being and rehabilitation of a needy person, for instance, necessary home upgrading and repairs, as well as essential items which the handicapped cannot do without;

—the plan also helps the needy obtain certain welfare services such as day care as authorized by an organization or at the request of an organization approved by a province;

—the plan helps the needy obtain care in special homes, for instance, senior citizens' homes, rest homes, child care institutions, and shelter homes for battered children and women.

Mr. Speaker, since April 1st, 1977, most of the federal costs related to long term care of adults in institutions are paid out of the Extended Health Care Services Program under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977.

I appreciate particularly the interest of the opposition for that question. All this to say that the Canada Assistance Plan provides help to needy persons and pays for costs, for example drugs and dental care, neither covered by the universal health care programs of the provinces, nor paid through general financing under the Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1977, between Canada and the provinces, which also provides for postsecondary education and health care.

Mr. Speaker, that same Canada Assistance Plan, still in force and unaffected by the white paper, helps needy persons to pay for children in foster homes. In Canada, what is meant by "needy person"? Under Canada Assistance Plan provisions, a person in need is defined as someone who, regardless of the cause of his needs, is deemed to be unable to provide adequately for himself and his dependants. Eligibility for social assistance is determined on the basis of a special needs and means test administered by the province. This tests takes into account the material needs of the applicant, as well as the income and resources he has to meet these same basic needs.

Mr. Speaker, a "person in need" is also defined in the Canada Asssitance Plan as a child who is the ward of an authority responsible for his social welfare. A person in need in Canada can also include all children in foster homes.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan Agreement, each province has agreed not to require a period of residence in the province or in Canada as a condition of eligibility for assistance. The agreement also requires that each province shall provide, by law, for a procedure for appeals from decisions made with respect to applications for assistance and the granting of benefits.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that our Government has recently set aside a budget of $4 billion for the Canada Assistance Plan Program, of which $1.2 billion is directly paid out in the form of direct or indirect assistance to the disabled. I therefore welcome this opportunity to help explain the principle that has led our Government both in the recent White Paper and its usual programs, which is that of giving more to those who need it. There are two ways to do this: first, by not giving to those who do not need it and second, possibly by getting the money from people with a larger disposable income as the recent White Paper suggested and reducing the tax burden on those who are not in need, so as to provide a better service through our Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a progressive measure, and one that all Canadians will be prepared to accept once they look at the White Paper. It is understood that the disabled, those who are in need, and all those people about whom we and the Minister of Finance are concerned, whatever the Hon. Member opposite, who just a minute ago was trying to establish a contradiction between the mover of the motion and our valiant Minister of Finance it is understood, Mr. Speaker, that our Government is going to produce a White Paper that will ensure that the disabled and the needy in this country receive their rightful share.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

• (1900)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the motion on the reinstatement of capital punishment. I want to say to the House, without reservation and without qualification, that I do not support the motion to reinstate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I will be voting against capital punishment on moral and logical grounds. I believe that it is wrong. This is a subject on which Canadians hold strong views and speak from very deep conviction. It is an issue on which a periodic review of public policy should be undertaken in the public interest.

That was the commitment that I made in the last election campaign, namely, that a free vote would be held on capital punishment during the course of our present mandate. That is the intent of this motion, to permit debate and a free vote on the question of capital punishment.

For obvious reasons, none more important than the participation of everyone in this House today, this is a debate that should be conducted on the highest level and with genuine respect for opposing views. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I enter the debate today with that sentiment.

This is more than a matter of conscience, although it is that indeed. It is a matter of how we see ourselves as a nation and how others see us among the nations of the world. It is a matter of seeking justice, not revenge.

All of us share in the tragedy and sorrow of the taking of a human life, whether criminally inspired or from anger or passion. All of us want justice in full and swift measure. A society without respect for the law and acceptance of order is a society at risk.

We must be vigilant and firm in applying the law and in dealing at all times with those who violate that law. The legal system, the judiciary, the law enforcement agencies constitute a cornerstone of freedom, a guarantee of our liberty. Without them and the values that they represent, our democratic concepts would, in my judgment, be quickly and irreversibly eroded. There must be law and there must, in a civilized society, be respect at all times for that law.

But for those who would change the law in such a fundamental manner, the onus is upon them to make a compelling case. For myself, Mr. Speaker, I am not persuaded. I am not persuaded the death penalty works as a deterrent. Nor am I persuaded it is appropriate as a punishment. On the contrary, I believe it is repugnant, and and I believe it is profoundly unacceptable. It is wrong to take life, and I can think of no circumstance excepting self-defence to justify it. I have held these views since I was a young student and I still hold them today.

More than quarter of a century ago, a great Canadian lawyer, Arthur Maloney, stood in this House and defined the issue for all parliamentartians of all parties:

"There is no question, he said, of revenge or retribution that enters into the thinking of any of us in this House . . . the only question we are called upon to decide is this: Is the penalty of death the only effective deterrent available to stamp out the crime of murder or is there another alternative penalty that is equally effective and less drastic?"

These speeches by Arthur Maloney, a man of great dignity and compassion, are still vivid in my mind and remain an enduring appeal for reason before passion, for justice rather than revenge, and for an enlightened society whose criminal justice system admits both the possibility of error on the one hand, and forgiveness on the other.

We begin in this country from a legal system that combines two of the world's enduring legal traditions—British common law and French civil law. By these traditions, we are a nation of laws, not individuals. And we hold for the sanctity of human life.

That remains a responsibility of the state that must not be set aside even in judging those who disregard human life.

We often hear from those who would limit the power of the State.

[English]

The effect of this resolution, if enacted, Mr. Speaker, would be to confer upon the state the ultimate power, that of executioner. Moreover, if this motion were carried, the state, in the exercise of that responsibility, could indeed put to death an innocent man or an innocent woman. I refuse to contemplate such a possibility, much less support a resolution which would strengthen the likelihood of such an occurrence.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We must admit to the possibility of error, of executing an innocent person wrongly accused and wrongly convicted.

John Diefenbaker spoke in this House in a memorable address on this issue on April 4, 1966. In addition to political experience, Mr. Diefenbaker, one of our greatest Canadians, had vast experience before the criminal bar throughout Canada, and particularly western Canada.

He said:

From my experience at the bar I say that anyone who says an innocent man cannot go to the gallows is wrong, because I know differently. It is a frightful thing when a man you believe to be innocent and whose attitude is, Don't worry about me, God will not allow it, walks to the gallows and months later the truth comes out.

Mr. Diefenbaker was speaking from personal experience and his knowledge of cases heard before the courts of Canada. Imagine the unspeakable horror of this happening to the relative of a Member of this House, a child, a nephew, a brother, a friend, or a neighbour.

As Mr. Diefenbaker said, because laws and systems are made of human beings, they are essentially, by their very nature, susceptible to error. If that error had that result, imagine the overwhelming horror that would be felt by every Member of this House.

We know, regrettably, that our judicial system can indeed be imperfect. We know also, unless we are wilfully blind to certain realities, that the scales of justice can weigh more heavily on the poor and the disadvantaged. These imperfections would loom large indeed when human life is at stake.

Mr. Speaker, while acknowledging the imperfections in our criminal justice system, we are constantly striving to improve it and to enhance the public's confidence in it.

In this regard, the Law Reform Commission and the Canadian Sentencing Commission have been doing important work to improve the quality and administration of justice.

• (1910)

[English]

But before all else, we uphold one simple principle: the inherent dignity of a human being, the inherent worth of a human life. I will resist with all of my strength, all of my life, any action that would diminish that reality and would lessen that value.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I realize that there are many arguments and many considerations. One, of course, deals with the empirical evidence. Let us deal briefly with that empirical evidence.

No executions have been carried out in this country for a quarter of a century. The death penalty was legally abolished more than a decade ago, in 1976. Ten years later, in 1986, the homicide rate in Canada reached a 15-year low. Last year the murder rate declined by 20 per cent. First degree murder charges have declined by nearly 25 per cent in the last two years.

What about the argument that the fear of execution will deter would-be murderers? That goes to the fundamental notion of those whom I respect but hold views different from mine. When one sees the incredible crimes that are inflicted upon young people and the elderly across this country, other Members articulate that concern of the deterrent. In the United States, the highest murder rates are in states such as Texas or Florida where capital punishment is enforced. In the State of Florida, the murder rate has increased by 30 per cent since the restoration of capital punishment.

As Lord Parker, the Lord Chief Justice of Britain said at Westminster in 1965:

> The great deterrent to crime is not severity of punishment but certainty of conviction . . . I have agreed with John Bright when he said, "a deep reverence for human life is worth more than a thousand executions in the prevention of murder".

I am not persuaded by this argument of deterrent. The burden of proof for the restoration of the death penalty must rest, and must rest very heavily, on those in favour of it.

Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons frequently advanced for the reinstatement of capital punishment is the supposedly high cost of keeping a prisoner incarcerated for life.

But in Canada, we do not and should not engage in a "cost benefit analysis" when it comes to questions concerning the value of a human life.

No matter how it is administered, capital punishment terminates human life. No matter how thorough the evidence, the possibility of executing an innocent person remains.

Mr. Speaker and dear colleagues in this House, for me, this is unacceptable and abhorrent in a civilized society.

[English]

Let there be absolutely no doubt about what this resolution is all about. If it is adopted, the House will be voting in principle for reinstatement of the death penalty. This debate is in and of itself an instrument of democracy in which the voices of the people are heard through their elected representatives. I commend the thoughtfulness with which people have intervened on all sides of this issue in terms of the parliamentary debate.

The views of our constituents are, of course, very important, but in the final analysis, the most demanding constituency of all in this regard must remain our consciences. This is a matter on which the House of Commons owes the country its independent judgment and this is a matter on which each Member owes the House of Commons his or her moral leadership.

For all of these reasons, I shall be voting against the resolution, against restoration, against capital punishment. But most of all, I shall be voting against it because I believe it is wrong.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Every Member who speaks on this resolution is subject to being questioned by other Members of the House after he concludes his remarks. I realize that under the rules the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is exempted from that requirement. However, he is participating in this debate, which is not a government measure and which requires a free vote. He is participating as a Private Member.

Therefore, I wonder if he might agree and there may be unanimous consent to have the normal question and answer period that has applied to all other Members?

Some Hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I also want to ask whether the Prime Minister would be willing to answer a few questions with the unanimous consent of the House. In passing, I must congratulate the Prime Minister for his eloquent speech. What I want to ask the Prime Minister is this: When this debate concludes, will the Government make a commitment to bring in Bills and programs to reform our penal system so that we might discuss practical means of improving the situation and preventing crime?

[English]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Members of the Liberal Opposition are seeking to have extended to the Leader of the Government a practice that I understand did not extend to the Leaders of the two other Parties. The Member who has just put a question in the context of a point of order has, in effect, tried to have things two ways. He seeks to have the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) respond to comments and questions because he is a Private Member but then, using that excuse, he raises questions concerning government policy.

The Hon. Member cannot have things both ways. I submit with the greatest respect that the rules that were agreed to should be respected.

Mr. Speaker: I think in the interests of informing all Hon. Members and the public which is watching and listening to this debate, that it should be made very clear that under the rules, for Party Leaders and the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), there is no mandatory provision whereby the usual following 10 minutes of questions and comments would be directed at the Right Hon. Prime Minister, unless of course it was with the unanimous consent of the House. I think it is quite clear that there is not unanimous consent. Resuming debate.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, first I want to take this occasion to express my gratitude to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) for his helpful observations and his excellent speech on the subject of capital punishment. We all listened to him intently and find his reasoning to be most helpful to us.

I also want to commend the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) for his contribution, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. In this case, all three Leaders gave us the same leadership and word, so I wish to commend them in this regard. Even though it is true that we come here as Members of Parliament to speak as individuals, nonetheless, as Leaders of their Parties, they have certainly given to us the direction in which we may look.

One principle in this debate on capital punishment on which all Members of Parliament can unite is our abhorrence of murder. We all agree it is the worst of all crimes and it is especially heinous if it is premeditated, if it is planned ahead of time and then carried out. We all feel horror, anguish and revulsion when multiple deaths are involved or when children are victims of murder. We all share the anguish for the innocent victims and for their bereaved families. This unites us all. But where this House is divided, and many people of Canada are divided as well, is on whether the death penalty should be restored. Should we kill someone who is convicted of having committed murder of whatever kind, and perhaps kill someone who might in fact be innocent?

What I hope and pray is that through my thoughts and words I may be used by God to speak to at least one Member of Parliament, or one Senator, who is presently in favour of capital punishment and speak in such a way that they will hesitate and give the matter further renewed consideration. Since the debate began in the House of Commons on April 27, public opinion has moved in the direction of being less and less in favour of the death penalty. This is not just because the debates have taken place in this House. After all, up until last week, only some 20 people had a chance to speak. Rather, I suggest, the reason that opinion is shifting is because we have been seeing through the media and through our discussions the facts, realities and truth being brought more and more to the attention of the public. Then, too, almost all of the experts and opinion makers are lined up against capital punishment.

It is said there is still a majority of Canadians who favour it in one or another special circumstance, but this majority is dwindling. Surveys of opinions of Members of Parliament definitely show that their views are also changing. I suggest again the reason is the same. Great leaders and parliamentarians of the past have struggled and agonized over this issue. They have weighed the evidence and have eventually concluded that capital punishment in all its forms must be totally abolished.

We have more reasons than ever before to come to the same conclusion. However, I suggest that one of the most persuasive reasons for our leaders in the past and, indeed, for our present parliamentarians is that every country in Europe, except Turkey, has voted out the death penalty in totality is because they realize that being concerned about the potential victims of murder and their families is the most important of all priorities and that capital punishment in fact distracts us from getting at the root problems of violence.

It is because I believe that everyone of us is, or should be, most concerned about how to prevent murders, that I think we can all unite and vote against capital punishment and deal with these real issues. We know the death penalty does not prevent murder. As long ago as 1966, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker said: "The argument is that hanging is a deterrent but history does not support that argument". I quote Mr. Diefenbaker because he is a former leader of the Conservative Party. I hope his opinions, and the opinions of succeeding leaders of the Conservative Party, will have their influence on Members of that Party, as indeed have the words of the various leaders of the Liberal and NDP Parties upon their constituents.

The statistics in Canada, in the United States and elsewhere, support the idea that capital punishment will not deter, discourage or prevent the number of murders which take place. Simply put, capital punishment does not prevent murders. What we do know is that killing the alleged killer can serve only one purpose. It satisfies the hunger for revenge, of vengeance, of making the victim's relatives, friends or society feel that something was done about it. Of course, we find that this is not always the case. In fact, some of the most publicized cases of people who have spoken against capital punishment are those whose relatives were in fact victims of murder. I remember that Pauline Maitland was quoted in this Parliament by Andrew Brewin in 1976 as having pleaded as the wife and widow of a policeman who was murdered that the capital punishment of his alleged murderer should not be carried out. In the case of Lesley Parrott, whose daughter Alison was abducted and murdered last year, her plea was the same. One could go on with any number of cases both in this country and throughout history where the relatives of the victims have realized the futility of such an act and have not wanted revenge in that form.

By killing in revenge, one can perhaps feel something was done to get rid of the existing anger, frustration and feeling of loss, but it is a primitive way of dealing with murder and murderers and a very ineffective way. It only provides an emotional quick fix. That is what militant advocates of the death penalty want to give to their constituents who are frustrated, a quick fix, a solution which appeals to a shallow politician. However, parliamentarians I know in this House would not find that an appealing conception. Real parliamentarians will look for a real solution and make decisions because he or she is wise and moral rather than because they look for what is popular and momentarily satisfying.

I said we should join together to vote against restoring capital punishment. What I mean is that restoring capital punishment is a quick fix. The real challenge is to come to the real issue. The real concern should be to prevent murder and to provide greater safety for the enforcement officers and all those who have to deal with the social work in the community. It is misleading, distracting and a primitive diversion to beat the drums for capital punishment or to try to buy off a society by giving it revenge. It is a backward and regressive move which delays us from the tough demanding issues we must face.

All of us, I suggest, are truly outraged at violence and murder. Instead of having a group of Members of Parliament travelling around the country to ask for opinions on how to kill a human being, as this motion which is before us suggests, what about having a committee which deals with asking how to prevent murder? What if we were to replace a committee which goes around the country asking which one shall we kill and how are we going to put them to death with one which seriously addresses the real issue and asks how to deal with the matter of preventing murder? Should we not be taking another look at how we are sentencing people who commit their first crimes and what we can do more effectively to rehabilitate and to redirect them? Should we not take another look at what we do with people who repeatedly commit violent crimes?

What about our sentencing and parole system? Is it fair? Is it adequate? Is it effective? What about our halfway houses, probationary assessment, psychiatric assessment and care for the violent and mentally ill? Is it adequate? Do we really seriously feel we have done an adequate job in this area? Instead of talking about capital punishment, should we not ask whether or not the courts are overcrowded and whether justice is too long delayed? A quick fix of having capital punishment after a murder is not even as good as locking the barn after the horse is stolen.

What about our justice system? Is it adequate? Do police have enough latitude in cases of doubt to protect themselves? Do police and law enforcement officers and those who work in penal institutions and in halfway houses have enough staff and enough safety? Do they receive enough respect, appreciation and rewards from the community? Will capital punishment solve that or will it not in fact provide us with a false sense of security and, by revenge, a feeling of satisfaction which will distract us from these our real problems?

What about the problems associated with drugs, poverty, alienation, unemployment, mental illness, child and wife abuse, of hunger in slums and illiteracy, all of which make certain small pockets in our country the major breeding grounds for most of the homicides that do take place? Will capital punishment prevent those violent crimes from occurring? We know it will not.

What about the entire phenomenon of violence in our society, the way our media deals with it, its commercialization and mystique? It is not only government that has a responsibility, not only the House of Commons and politicians, it is the people of our country. Do they tolerate perhaps and even encourage violence in sports and entertainment and in relation to our environment? Will the quick fix of capital punishment not distract us as Canadians from dealing with the violence which is the breeding ground of murder and so many other tragic criminal acts?

To kill an alleged killer is to provide a scapegoat instead of dealing with the issues. We know that it is not a deterrent, that it will not save lives, that it will not prevent murder. Morally, we know that capital punishment is absolutely wrong. It brings to risk the possibility of killing an absolutely innocent person. Even if the person is guilty it is still, in any case, immoral.

While the evangelical Baptist churches and a number of some of the independent churches have indicated their support for capital punishment, and I would be inaccurate not to mention this fact, the overwhelming opinion of all the major religious communities in the country and throughout the world condemns capital punishment. Within the Christian community in Canada I only need to point to the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Anglican Church, the United Church, the Presbyterian Church, the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, the Canadian Unitarian Council, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Mennonite Central Committee, the Reformed Church of America, the Religious Society of Friends, the Salvation Army, and so on. These institutions, these churches, these leaders have absolutely and completely condemned capital punishment as being immoral and cruel.

I go on to point out that not only are these Christian organizations expressing their views against capital punishment but a multitude of religious communities throughout the world that are not Christian, and which are also in this country, are also expressing their views. They include, for example, the World Jewish Congress, the World Muslim Congress and other organizations that are involved in human concerns on behalf of religious people such as the World Young Women's Christian Association, the World Student Christian Federation, the World Federation of United Nations Associations, the World International Zionist Organization, the Union of Arab Jurists, Amnesty International, and the list goes on and on.

The world community of people who work in the area of religion and in terms of alleviation of human suffering understand and explain that capital punishment is not acceptable. So do all the organizations of social workers. So do most lawyers working with criminals because they know of the fallibility of the trial system. So do all human rights organizations here and throughout the world.

Of course, there are other reasons to reject the death penalty other than that religious communities are against it. I would very rapidly like to cite just a few of them.

First, we know that juries and judges are less likely to convict a person if they know that the consequence is to condemn that person to death. They would hesitate because they would not be completely and totally certain that their decision would be entirely and certainly right. So they might withhold what might normally be a judgment to imprison the person because it looks as if he has committed a crime, and rather than condemn that person, they might dismiss that person if we have capital punishment. One danger of bringing back capital punishment is that there will be a failure to bring about what would normally be a correct conviction.

Second, we know that the tragedy of torturing a prisoner on death row with a verdict of death which is often delayed, sometimes commuted and even reversed by acquittal sometimes on the basis of new evidence, is another reason we should be very strongly hesitating to pass a motion for the return of capital punishment. We also know that the poor are more likely to be executed than are the rich. The visible minorities are more likely to be executed than are others.

Because of these and many other reasons we know that the only use capital punishment serves is to provide a scapegoat and a distraction from dealing with the real problems in our society, in our country and in our world, problems that are crying out for difficult and soul-searching solutions.

As one who is working in the field of human rights, I want to remind Hon. Members as effectively as I can that only in nations such as the Soviet Union, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and certain other non-democratic African and Asian countries does the death penalty still survive. The one anomaly in democratic countries is the United States where some states still have capital punishment.

Because the death penalty is still used for purposes in the world other than murder in those nations, such as theft, adultery, black marketing and disagreeing with the government, every effort is being made, with some success, by human rights organizations and by the United Nations to eradicate the death penalty. Canada's example until now has been salutary and most helpful.

In the name of God and for the credibility of human rights abroad as well as at home, let us vote against capital punishment. Let us strengthen Canada's hand in bringing justice to other countries, rededicating ourselves to dealing with the real issues that lead to violence and murder.

Jesus Christ taught: "You have heard that it hath been said 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth' but I say unto you that you resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also". Saint Paul said: "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord'."

To my fellow Christians I say, please look upon the face of a man who was charged, properly and legally tried, and executed; look at the face of Jesus and look at the Cross; think of what it might mean if you vote for capital punishment because He from the Cross asks us, as we risk again and again the execution of an innocent person, "Would you crucify me again because inasmuch as you do it unto the least of these my brethren you do it unto me".

I would maintain that the only excuse for taking a life is self-defence for oneself or on behalf of others about to be killed. That is the usual justification for war—self-defence on behalf of one's nation or of others in another nation.

It seems strange to me that some who would advocate capital punishment would demand of our soldiers a higher discipline during war than they would of themselves in our country in peacetime.

For this reason I should like to conclude by reading part of a letter written by a 53-year old Dutch Canadian, living in Guelph, Ontario, whose name is H. J. Dyckman. Mr. Dyckman recounts September of 1949 when the Netherlands was liberated and says:

> I was 11 years old when Canadian infantry men stormed the house I lived in on April 4, 1945, after a three day battle. It has been a tremendous pleasure for me over the last two years to locate, to meet with and to talk to those members of the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders Regiment, who liberated us. Sharing stories has brought us close. I have gained a much better picture of the life of a foot soldier in war time through them. How much they suffered!
> One of the hardest things for the men who had to deal with the enemy face to face was to accept that as soon as a Nazi soldier dropped his rifle and raised his hands, he had to be spared, no matter what had happened minutes or even seconds before that. No soldier was allowed to shoot or torture a prisoner of war, an unarmed man, no matter how cruel an enemy he had been.
> I was told of an infantry man being spat in the face by a young Nazi fanatic. I was told of a soldier taking captive a gun crew, which had just blown up his own brother.
> Even in times of war, in such horrendous times of anger and pain, the law was strict: no unarmed man was to be killed! How strange, now, in peacetime, it might happen again, sanctioned by the law. Something is going wrong.
> Canadians fought and died, that democracy might be maintained and civilization restored in the Netherlands, in Canada, in the world. Are we remembering our soldiers well, if we return to the practice of deliberately killing defenceless human beings, in the name of justice?
> "But those people are not human beings", I hear some people say. "They are monsters, to kill them is justice".
> I do believe I understand the rage we all feel when monstrous atrocities are committed. It is that helpless, powerless rage we experience when confronted with a senseless and brutal act of violence. As a child I lived in a nation that was ruled by monsters. Yet I am firmly convinced that it is not justice, to put such a so-called monster to death because by doing that I would commit a senseless and brutal act and I would become a monster also.

If the death penalty returns to Canada, I will no longer live in a civilized nation. I chose to come to Canada, I married one of its daughters, I have learned to love this country and I will continue to do so whatever Parliament decides.

But returning the death penalty is turning back the clock of civilization and in my opinion it is doing a dishonour to the memory of the men who died for that civilization. Please, Members of Parliament in Ottawa, do not force me to commit premeditated murder against my will.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I have somewhat of a comment to make. It is a known fact that we have democracies in the world and that we have dictatorships. One of the functions of the state is to defend its own people against dictatorship. This is why we have wars. People in the Second World War fought against the Nazis because they wanted to preserve liberty.

Article VII of our Constitution guarantees legal rights to life, liberty, and security of person. The state has an obligation to preserve the security of the individual. If we have a war, the armed forces go out to defend the security of the state. When they go out they fight and they kill to preserve democracy, to preserve the security of persons, to preserve it from tyranny.

The Hon. Member talked about Nazi Germany and about the Jewish people. I think Canada and other free countries were involved to destroy Naziism because it was killing people.

Mr. Oostrom: Six million.

Mr. Kindy: Yes, six million Jews, and I am not counting the 20 million in eastern Europe who were killed. The state has an obligation to preserve life and to preserve liberty.

On the other hand, we have terrorists that work within the country, so the state has its obligation. It has a police force to preserve liberty of the individual so that terrorists do not take over. We have the mafia and we have the criminal killer.

If we follow the logic of the Hon. Member, we should disarm the police forces; we should disarm the army and just give up or succumb to dictatorship and to anarchy inside the country. This logic is difficult to follow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope the Hon. Member would come to his question. This is questions and comment period.

Mr. Kindy: It was a comment, but my question is: Would he propose complete disarmament so that nobody would be killed? That is my question.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to reply to my colleague. I am glad he is asking questions, as we all should ask one another, on a matter as serious as this one.

First, the quotation I took was from a man whose name is Reverend H. J. Dyckman, a Christian clergyman living in Canada, who is recounting his experiences in the Netherlands as a child.

The objective of his letter was to point out that when we send out our men to fight against an enemy, we tell them that when the enemy throws down his arms, no matter what they have done until that point, we must not then kill them, we must not then torture them. At that moment they must obey that understanding. He said that if we follow that, even with the atrocious killers as took place with some of the Nazi soldiers in some of the Nazi activities, if we tell our soldiers to do that, can we do any less for ourselves as parliamentarians? I think that was the first question, and I think that is what he was asking about.

Second, my colleague also raised the question of war. I think I indicated that we use war, that in fact we kill in self-defence. Self-defence is the only kind of action which I think people in civilized countries and civilized societies would hold to be the time when they would take up arms to kill someone.

Of course when Canada went to war with the Germans, with the Italians, and with the Japanese, it was a war to prevent murder, a war in self-defence. Canada sought no aggrandizement of territory. Canada sought no plain ordinary war just to fight. Canada fought in self-defence with other nations that they might survive. It was not a war of aggression. It was a war of defence. I hope Canada will never undertake any wars of aggression. It is not in our interest to do so. We enter into war only to defend ourselves and other people throughout the world from the horrors of dictatorship, to which my colleague quite rightly pointed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the statement of the Hon. Member from Calgary who reminded us that six million Jews were slaughtered by the Nazis before and during World War II. I would like the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) to confirm my understanding that the State of Israel, where so many of the Jews who survived the Holocaust have settled, has abolished capital punishment and that when Israel wanted to put Adolf Eichmann, who was responsible for the killing of so many Jews, to death it passed a special law for just that case. There is no death penalty for any other murderers, including terrorists who are so active killing people in Israel.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I would confirm what my hon. friend has pointed out. Not only is this true in the case of Israel, but as Reverend H. J. Dyckman from the Netherlands, who has lived and worked in Canada all these years and is now a Canadian pointed out:

Reinstatement of the death penalty happened in the Netherlands in 1940, about 60 years after it had been abolished. It was a Nazi Government which restored state executions after a brutal invasion. Civilization ended in the lowlands then, barbarism returned for five long years.

In the spring of 1945 my country of birth was liberated. In September of that year a new, democratically elected parliament in a free nation voted to abolish the death penalty again.

In other words in the Netherlands it was only during the era of Nazi brutality that in the last nearly 100 years we saw capital punishment in that land. It was with the driving out of the Nazis from that country and the restoration of civilization that capital punishment was eliminated.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment in terms of the discussion of the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) concerning prisoners of war. It is quite true that once an enemy was unarmed the general rule was that you would take no action and you would treat that life as sacred until—and this is the important thing—you found out whether that person had taken any action which, even under the rules of war, was considered an atrocity. If under the rules of war, that person had committed an atrocity, that person was liable to execution and sometimes was executed.

I think we have to remember that one was dealing with the same kind of thing, the same kind of freedom, liberty and respect as soon as that unarmed soldier appeared, but he had to go through a trial if it was thought that something had been done wrongly, even under those conditions.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the observations of my colleague in terms of the way in which people who were convicted of military offences were dealt with.

What is important in this context is that in our country, as I have pointed out, we have the responsibility to deal with all of the problems to which I have referred in trying to prevent murder. I suggest that bringing in capital punishment will not direct our minds as much to the correction, the elimination and prevention of murder, as it will to having felt that we have dealt with the subject. But far from dealing with the subject, the matter of violence is so rooted in our society that it seems to me that we have a lot to deal with that should occupy the minds of this House if we really care about the victims of murder and crime.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, as has been remarked so many times, this is a painful question. It is a question which has been probed during these many hours of debate very thoroughly. I rise to state my view on the issue and to give some indication as to how I have arrived at that view and to give for those who elected me intentions as to how I will vote.

My own involvement with this issue began in 1959 when, as a young delegate to a national convention of my Party, I presented a motion calling for the abolition of capital punishment in Canada and calling for the appropriate amendments to the Criminal Code in order to see that carried out. I presented it with all of the conviction that I could summon. When I had completed my presentation to the resolutions committee, I was congratulated by one or two people. They said that I obviously felt that point of view very strongly. I am not making light of what then happened, Mr. Speaker. I must tell you that I was not in favour of the resolution that I was presenting although I saw it as my duty to present it with all of the conviction that I could muster.

In the election of 1984 most of us, if not all of us, were called upon to give our views on this issue. Some of us have altered our views. Others, I suppose, are listening attentively to this debate, praying for the wisdom that will give them guidance as to how they will ultimately vote.

As I think all Members have, I have done my utmost to inform myself, to study the issue, and to be aware not only of the facts but of what thinkers have said on the matter, including a number of thinkers who are Members of this House and who have been Members of this House. This involved considerable reading and study. It involved discussion and consultation with Members of the clergy. In the course of my preparation, I met with representatives of most if not all of the major denominations of the Christian clergy, with Jewish clergy and with others of less widely held persuasion. I met with a panel of criminologists from the University of Alberta who put together what I think is one of the best and most cogent positions opposing the death penalty.

I have heard, as we all have, from a great number of constituents on the issue and, indeed, others who are not constituents but who are caring Canadian citizens. I wish to quote very briefly from two of those letters just to dramatize the intensity of the views. These were both received in my office within the last week, and are both from constituents of mine.

Dear Sir:

I am writing to voice my concern over the possibility that the Canadian Government may reinstate the death penalty.

I object to the death penalty because I do not feel that it serves any useful purpose. Extensive studies of the deterrent effect of the death penalty indicate that it does not serve as a deterrent; in fact, in Canada in the ten years after the death penalty was abolished in 1976, the homicide rate actually dropped.

I do not feel that the death penalty can be justified on the grounds that it would prevent murderers from murdering again because in the history of Canada only four people have been paroled for murder and then murdered again. Furthermore, assuming that a person will repeat an offence also contradicts one of the basics of the Canadian justice system, namely, that people are innocent until proven guilty.

I feel that our money and efforts would be better spent trying to discover why people murder and cycles of violence can be stopped instead of debating whether or not we, as a nation, should return to the barbaric practice of state-sanctioned violence.

The only issue that I would take with that letter at this point is that this resolution is not a resolution of the Canadian Government. It is not the Canadian Government which is proposing to reinstate the death penalty.

On the other side of the issue, I just received another letter from a constituent, and it reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Edwards:

As the debate on capital punishment drags on I think so often of a young friend of ours who was murdered in cold blood.

Our friend whom I will call "Rick" was in his early 30's. He had been a gold medalist at U. of A. and had his own consulting firm.

He and his wife and three small children were asleep in their beds in a good area of Calgary when Rick awoke about midnight to realize that there was an intruder, armed with a knife, in the bedroom. Rick told his wife to run for help; as she passed the assailant, he slashed her. Rick struggled with him and was stabbed to death. If you had seen your wife wounded and knew your three small children were also in danger, how would you have reacted?

The murderer was apprehended and given 13-1/2 years imprisonment. He had entered that home quite prepared to kill. I maintain that the death penalty would have caused him to think twice before committing the crime.

Rick's mother has lost her only son, his wife has lost her husband, the three children have lost their father. Yet in a few years the murderer will be free; even now he sees the sunrise and the sunset, the greening grass, and hears the birdsong. Is this fair?

Please vote 'yes' for capital punishment. Lethal injection would be my choice.

In the course of the examination of these issues, because there are many sub-issues in this very fundamental one, I have received some interesting proposals. I have heard variations on conventional thought. One of them was that when a person has been convicted of murder, then a panel of distinguished legislators of all people should examine the record of that person's life and should determine whether he or she has been a good person, whether or not there was, I suppose, an extended life-long mens rea. I received the following idea from Liverpool, Nova Scotia under the heading "Capital Punishment, A Middle Position".

I advocate the death penalty on the Second Capital Crime by the same person separated from the First Crime by time and distance.

This position would:

1. Eliminate the danger of punishing by death the wrong person.

2. Allows us as God fearing people to forgive the first crime after suitable punishment.

3. Strengthen our prison guards positions in dealing with first time convicted murderers.

In order to try to get some kind of focus on what my constituents thought of this issue, I held a town hall meeting on May 16 which went on for three and a half hours. Our objective was to shed as much light and to radiate as little heat as possible. I think in that ambition we succeeded.

There were four panelists present, a chaplain from the University of Alberta, a criminologist, the founder of Victims of Violence who happens to be the stepfather of one of the child victims of Clifford Olson, and the Acting Chief of Police of the City of Edmonton. There were many views expressed during that three and a half hours. There were statements from individuals who had lost loved ones through crimes of violence. There were statements, passionately felt statements, that it is not up to the state to take a life. However, the one common denominator emerging from the day's deliberations was that we must, whether or not we have the death penalty, improve the criminal justice system so that those who are to be set free in society at some point will be at the least risk of repeating their crimes or indeed of harming others.

There have been numerous references to statistics through the course of this debate. The criminologists to whom I referred earlier have drawn up a chart entitled "Homicide and First Degree Murder Rates per 100,000 Population, 1961 to 1985, Source, Statistics Canada". The chart clearly shows that the rate of homicide or deaths caused by others deliberately increased dramatically from 1961 to 1976 when it began to gradually decline. However, the same chart also shows that the rate of first degree murder has been on the steady increase since 1976 to the present.

There is the question of religious objection to the death penalty. Does capital punishment violate the law of love? Believers are admonished to love their enemies, to turn the other cheek. I submit, though, that to use this argument against capital punishment is to overlook the fact that two different matters are under consideration. One is personal, the other is official. The judge functions as an officer of society and has a different relationship with the criminal than does the individual who has been wronged by the criminal.

Another objection to capital punishment that is sometimes held is that no one has the right to take human life except God. This idea is related to the belief that the person who executes a criminal is as guilty of murder as the one he executes. It is, I know, not always constructive to quote at random from the Scriptures, but I would cite Romans 13:1-7 and I Peter 2:13-17 to indicate that God does approve of certain individuals being his instruments of justice on the earth.

So the question comes up, does the state have the right to put aside the duty? Does the state have the right to inflict the death penalty? A noted theologian has said:

I do not think one can deny to the state, as the moral person responsible for the common good of society, the right to exact the death penalty if it is deemed necessary for the common good, just as anyone has the right to self-defense and the state has the right to engage in defensive war.

When then should the state intervene, if at all? After giving this question considerable thought and after examining the views of others, I have come to the conclusion that the state should reserve the right to intervene in the most extreme cases. In just a moment, Sir, I will cite those cases.

Finally, in my research, I went to the views of the public in my own city. Last year, in 1986, 82.9 per cent of the adult population of Edmonton said that they favoured capital punishment. That in itself, Sir, is not the principal reason why I would vote for this motion because I do believe that there are certain issues on which we as elected Members should reserve the right to go by our own consciences, and this is one of those issues.

I want to be fair and so I will give a brief breakdown of that 82.9 per cent. When it is analysed, this apparently strong position fractures somewhat.

Four questions were posed. First: I am opposed to the death penalty under any circumstances. Some 6.9 per cent responded yes. Second: I am opposed to the death penalty except in a few cases where it may be appropriate. Some 24.1 per cent responded yes. Third: I am generally in favour of the death penalty except in a few cases where it may not be appropriate. Some 40.1 per cent responded yes. Fourth: I am strongly in favour of the death penalty as an appropriate measure. Some 28.9 per cent responded yes.

This whole process is beginning to cause Canadians to think more profoundly about the issue and indeed to use the light rather than generate the heat. However, there are certain situations when society demands that the state take the most extreme action. I quote Simma Holt, a former Member of this House, who said:

> Five of us—myself, two ex-Mounties, and two lawyers—fought to save a very bright but notorious western safecracker/bank robber charged with a Seattle holdup-murder we knew he did not commit. As a result, he was acquitted. Subsequently, he became my "adviser" on the justice system from his perspective. When capital punishment was taken from the books he told me: "We never carried bullets in our guns in our holdups because we knew if someone got killed we would hang . . . I tell you, Simma, capital punishment kept a lot of us from firing real bullets.
> I predict loaded guns will appear in robberies now."

In conclusion, I believe imposition of the death penalty can best serve justice in the most extreme cases. I believe the case of greatest degree is when the entire nation is threatened. That would be treason committed in time of war. Second is first degree murder. Third is murder while committing an indictable offence.

Thank you for this opportunity, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I think everyone in this House respects the right of each individual to his or her own opinion. Certainly I have great respect for my hon. colleague. However, he made a statement which raises a question in my mind.

I listened very carefully to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) speech a little while ago. He said that the rate of first degree murder had declined by 25 per cent over the last 25 years. In particular, 1986 was a 15-year low. I wonder if the Hon. Member could reconcile that with his statement that the rate of first degree murder has gone up.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for my hon. friend from Mount Royal. I also have great respect for the Prime Minister's research. My statistics are taken from a study compiled by five criminologists at the Centre for Criminology, Research Centre of Sociology, at the University of Alberta, who to a man, and they are all men, opposed capital punishment.

I listened, as did my friend, to the Prime Minister's remarks. The statistics I have indicate there has been a rather steady increase since 1976 in the incidence of first degree murder in Canada. From 1984 to 1985 there was a levelling off, not a decline, a levelling off. I stand by my statistics, which as I say were derived by these noted criminologists from StatsCan figures.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, in his excellent and even-handed presentation my colleague from Edmonton referred to polls and the opinions of Canadians taken over a period of time, particularly those expressed by his constituents. The point I want to make to Members of the House, indeed to all Canadians, is that this is as much an exercise in democracy as it is an exercise in decision-making on a given subject. We in Canada believe that the will of the majority governs, and it is very difficult to deny that will when it is so clearly expressed by so many people who have a right to express a view on a subject like capital punishment. This is not a question dealing with monetary policy which requires expert knowledge and experience. It is a subject on which any Canadian can rightly express his or her view. I compliment the Hon. Member for recognizing the importance of the view of his constituents and the general public on this subject.

In expressing that view in the House of Commons does he not recognize, as I have said, that this is an exercise in democracy as much as an exercise in decision-making? What does he think about those in the House of Commons who would deny the Canadian people an opportunity to express their views to a parliamentary committee? They would deny the House of Commons the opportunity to send a parliamentary committee across this country to elicit the views of Canadians so that we can develop a consensus, not the elite view of sociologists, or a view that denies the right of other Canadians to express their views.

We have a motion before us which would construct a parliamentary committee to give Canadians the opportunity to express their views. We are not making a decision here and now on the issue of capital punishment. We are not voting to execute anyone. We are simply voting to decide on a process. I would like the Hon. Member to comment on the process involved here.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to clarify my views on that. In the first instance, I hope I made it sufficiently clear to the House and my hon. friend that there are certain, very few but certain, very fundamental issues on which I think we would all, certainly I would, respect the right, indeed the duty, of individual Members to go against what they perceive to be the opinion of their constituents. On this issue I do not believe I have that difficulty, although I have many, many constituents who feel at odds with me on this issue and whom I love dearly and whose judgment I respect. I have great empathy for my colleagues in this House who will be voting with their conscience when they know it goes against the strong majority view in their constituency.

To get to the process, my friend raises a very significant point. The resolution put before this House provides for a joint committee of the two Houses to travel the country to ascertain the view of Canadians on this fundamental issue. I think it is put in such a way that we would learn rather than be inflamed and we would be enlightened rather than antagonized one against the other. I think that is a healthy part of the process. I listened with great care to what the Prime Minister said on that subject. While he and I disagree on the basic issue, it is an important part of Canadian democracy to review these very fundamental questions from time to time. The Canadian people demanded that in 1984. I am pleased that the Government is permitting, although not initiating, the process which will discharge that commitment.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I have both a question and a comment. I think this kind of debate and dialogue is very helpful. My hope is, of course, that I would be able to persuade my colleagues about some of these issues.

The questioner and the speaker have said that this allows us to discuss the subject of capital punishment and that the public is given access to that opportunity. If we vote upon and pass this resolution, will we not be saying that this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment? In other words, our decision will then be made. We will not wait for the committee to go across the country and report back. When we vote on this motion we will be voting in principle.

Second, the committee is not being asked to listen to people's opinions on capital punishment but, rather, will be sent across the country "to provide recommendations on (a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances; (b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death". Those are the words in the actual motion we are debating.

If, as the Hon. Member suggested, this committee would be able to travel across the country and, for example, have the benefit of hearing those criminologists in Alberta of which the Hon. Member was talking and explore the statistics further as a committee, that would be one thing. However, I understand that if this motion were to pass, God forbid, the committee will not be going to discuss capital punishment but, rather, how to do it and when. Would the speaker like to clarify his views on that?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend opposite is missing the essential point of the resolution. The essential point is that this committee would determine under what circumstances, if any, capital punishment should be brought back. That does not mean, as I suggest my hon. friend might be implying, that an affirmative vote will mean the reinstitution of capital punishment. The Member, who has infinitely more experience than I, knows that the process is much more laborious than that.

There would first be the activity of the committee, the reporting back of the committee, and the formulation of a Bill which, I imagine, would be a Bill to amend the Criminal Code of Canada. That Bill, like any Bill in this House, would be subject to a majority vote for approval. I understand very clearly that the vote at that final stage would be a vote permitting amendments and all the other privileges that are available to this House and its Members. Finally, that would be a free vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this will be the fifth time since I became a Member of Parliament that I will be voting on this question. As I have on the four previous occasions, I intend again to vote for abolition and against the reimposition of capital punishment.

While it is the fifth time I will be voting, it is the first time I will have participated in the debate. A substantial part of the reason I am participating in the debate is that I am appalled by the threats which have been made to impose a form of closure on the Members of this House. If I remember correctly, in the debate in 1976 there were over 100 speakers. If this question is as important as those who are so passionately committed to the reimposition of capital punishment believe, then surely they ought to be the first to accept the idea that every Member of Parliament who wishes to put his or her position on the record should have the opportunity to speak.

The Government decides the order of business. It could have brought this proposal forth a long time ago and provided sufficient time for every Member who wished to speak to do so. We ought not be rushed into making a decision because we are coming close to the summer adjournment.

The view which I have just expressed was supported in the 1976 debate by the former Member of Parliament for Yukon, the former Deputy Prime Minister, Erik Nielsen, with whom I very seldom, if ever, agreed. During that debate he said: "I do not endorse the point of view expressed in one of the newspaper editorials tonight that closure should be imposed. I believe Members should have an opportunity to speak". I too, Mr. Speaker, believe that Members should have an opportunity to speak.

I have not taken a poll of my constituents but I am willing to accept the reality that the majority of them, like the majority in every constituency in Canada I think, support the imposition of capital punishment. I did not come here to vote because a poll on any particular subject has been taken and tells me what to do. I told the people of my constituency my beliefs on the major issues with which we would probably have to deal. I have reported to them regularly on the position I have taken. They have known that after each debate on this subject I have voted for abolition. That has not affected me adversely at all.

I have told my constituents who believe very strongly in capital punishment that when deciding who to vote for I would like them to look at the record of how I had voted and what I had said on all the issues which come before Parliament. If they believe in capital punishment and believe that I was wrong to vote against it, they have the democratic right to vote for someone else, to elect another person to be their Member of Parliament. I have survived four of those votes and am confident that I will survive a fifth.

I remind those Members who say that they are going to vote for capital punishment because their electors tell them that that is what they should do, that the last four Leaders of the Progressive Conservative Party have been abolitionists. John Diefenbaker, Robert Stanfield, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) were and/or are abolitionists. In voting against the reimposition of capital punishment they will be ignoring the views of their constituents because they believe that the principle is so important that they have the duty not to follow the views of their constituents.

I listened to recent arguments of some Members who support the imposition of capital punishment and base their position on their readings from the Bible. I respect their right to express their views, but I remind them that the leaders of all the major churches in Canada, including the Roman Catholic bishops; the former Primate of the Anglican Church, Ted Scott, the Moderator of the United Church; the leaders of the Presbyterian, Lutheran, Baptist and some of the Mennonite Churches, and the Canadian Jewish Congress in its convention, all have opposed the reimposition of capital punishment.

What are the reasons for supporting the reimposition of capital punishment? I suppose the major reason is the belief of some people that capital punishment acts as a deterrent to murder. The record is clear. The facts are there for anyone who wants to see them. Since capital punishment was abolished in 1976, the incidents of murder or manslaughter per 100,000 people in Canada has declined. It was 2.9 per 100,000 in 1976 and went down to 2.6 per 100,000 in 1977, to 2.4 in 1978 and in 1982, the last year for which we have figures, it was 2.4 per 100,000.

If capital punishment does not act as a deterrent, why should we even be discussing whether it should be reimposed as part of our justice system? We are told that we should permit capital punishment for the killing of police officers or prison guards. The Hon. Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) received a letter from a member of the Ontario Police Force, Richard Bagley. He said in part:

—I am a resident of your riding, I am a police officer with the Ontario Provincial Police, and I am also against the restoration of the death penalty.

He went on to say that a silent majority of the police officers agree with him.

The Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards) quoted from a letter in which it was claimed that a murderer was released from prison after thirteen and a half years. The fact is that for first degree murder in Canada the penalty is 25 years of incarceration before parole can even be considered.

If I heard the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosbie) correctly, it seems he suggested that for monetary matters Canadians need the advice of experts and implied that on the question of the taking of a life we do not need that expert advice. That seems a strange approach, if I heard him correctly, that money is more important than life. It is certainly not a view that I could support.

I ask Members to consider what happens in other countries in light of a question asked by the Hon. Member for Edmonton South about whether the state has the right to impose capital punishment. Let us look at what happens in other countries.

Capital punishment has been abolished in all the democratic countries except the United States, which I believe to be a special case. Capital punishment has been abolished in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, West Germany, Spain, Portugal, Australia, New Zealand and Israel.

I want to talk about two countries in particular. Great Britain is a country that frequently faces murder as a result of terrorist activities. In the last couple of years, they again debated and voted on the question of capital punishment. Despite the fact that there was a substantial majority of Conservative Members in the British Parliament and Prime Minister Thatcher is a strong believer in capital punishment, the House of Commons rejected reimposition of capital punishment by a substantial majority.

Mention was made of the State of Israel. I remind Hon. Members that the State of Israel, if not daily, certainly faces almost weekly terrorist attacks which result in the murder of some of its citizens. It has abolished capital punishment, and when it tried Adolph Eichmann, who was responsible for the murder of tens of thousands of Jewish people in concentration camps controlled by Nazi Germany, it had to pass a special law which permitted it to execute him.

I ask Hon. Members to consider which countries still use capital punishment. Essentially, there are two types of countries: the first is communist countries such as China and the Soviet Union, and the second is the military dictatorships of Africa, Asia and South America. There are too many such dictatorships even for me to try to list.

If I have to make a choice of an example of the right way to proceed on this question, I want to associate myself with the democratic countries rather than the communist countries and those with military dictatorships.

I want to conclude by relating an experience I had in 1976 when we last debated and voted on this question. One day I came out of the union centre in Winnipeg on Portage Avenue and Main Street. I was confronted by an executive member of my constituency NDP association who was also the president of his local union. This man, who had been a strong supporter of mine, challenged me as he was completely committed to the idea that this country needed capital punishment. We discussed the question for an hour and a half as he tried to convince me that I was wrong and should support the imposition of capital punishment, and I tried to explain to him why I was against it and would vote for abolition.

It became obvious that there was no way in which we would change our opinions, and so I sought a graceful way to end the conversation before I would lose my temper and begin to shout at my old friend.

The thought I expressed to him, and which I commend to Members of the House, is that there was one thing on which we could agree, that this was a great country. One of my constituents could harangue and harass me for an hour and a half, telling me in so many words that I was wrong and stupid, while knowing that he could go home that afternoon and not be arrested for expressing his views which were so contrary to mine. He would not be evicted from his house. He would not lose his job. These things would have happened to him in many countries which do not permit democratic views to be expressed and do not permit the challenge of authority. I knew that the worst that could happen to me because he and I disagreed was that in the next election, if he so desired, he could vote for a candidate from another Party.

I told him that if my record and the position I have taken on issues such as unemployment, housing, inflation and all the other questions parliamentarians deal with, a position with which that person agreed, were less important than the single question of capital punishment about which we disagreed, he should exercise his democratic right and vote for another candidate, one who believed in capital punishment.

I do not know whether he took my advice, and voted for or against me. I do know that I was re-elected and I have been re-elected several times since then. So I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to vote for abolition and against the reimposition of capital punishment.

I have been pleased with the debate to which I listened today. The arguments presented by Members who have spoken on both sides of the question have been thoughtful and conciliatory, not like some of the debate I heard in earlier days. I say again that I intend to vote for abolition and against capital punishment on this occasion as I have on previous occasions.

Mr. Mantha: Mr. Speaker, I respect the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for his comments on the question of capital punishment. However I would like to ask him a question. Given that we now have better high-tech in medicine and all the life-saving devices, would the Hon. Member not feel in his heart that the lower statistics on death per population from stabbings, shootings and so on, are possibly because we have better equipment and knowledge now than, say, 10 or 15 years ago? Is that not the reason why the figures are down?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I have not researched the reasons. I do know that one reason we have a fantastically lower rate in Canada than in the United States is that we have not adopted the insane idea that every person should be entitled to carry and implicitly to use a gun. I think we have fewer murders in the whole of Canada than there are in the Cities of New York and Detroit. I am quite happy that this is a fact. I certainly hope that direction will continue.

I cannot say categorically why we have fewer deaths than before, but I can say that it certainly proves that we do not need capital punishment as a deterrent to murder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) has the floor, and then I will recognize the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment, then a question for my colleague. We were looking previously at the fact that there is a need for the Canadian public to be able to debate not only capital punishment but, it would seem to me, the causes of murder, which is really part of this whole question of deterrence. One of the reasons people have expressed for wanting to adopt capital punishment is that it is a deterrent to murder. They are also concerned about people getting out of prison too soon. Would it not seem wise for the Government to allow the people of Canada, through a committee, to discuss whether or not they believe in capital punishment? Most clearly we would vote only in principle for the reinstatement of capital punishment, and we would only be discussing the terms of reference of the committee, which are strictly limited to what offences carry the death penalty and what methods should be used. It is commanded on the basis of that to prepare a Bill to carry it out. It is not recommended here to discuss the subject of capital punishment.

Would it not be more democratic to ask the Government to consider amending this resolution so that it would have as its first principal clause that the committee discuss with the Canadian people whether or not there should be capital punishment, and if so what offence would carry the death penalty and then what methods would be used? That probably would have received more sympathy.

Second, I ask my colleague, would it not be helpful if in fact we were able to discuss in that same committee, and hear the views of the Canadian people, on how we would be able to improve the things they are concerned about, the sentencing, the violence and all those things which would lead to capital punishment?

Mr. Orlikow: The Hon. Member asked a good question but he is asking it of the wrong Member. The suggestion he made was contained precisely in the amendment proposed by my friend and colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). Unfortunately, the House voted against that amendment.

Yes, we ought to give a great deal more thought and study to the reasons for violence, the reasons for murder. We ought to look very carefully at the one democratic country in which some states have brought back capital punishment, namely, the United States. If we did, we would see that the vast majority of the people who have suffered the penalty of the death sentence in those states are people who are poor, non-white and poorly educated. It is my belief and my fear that if we were to reimpose capital punishment in this country, we would have a very similar situation. Of those who committed murders, the poor, the uneducated and the non-white might suffer the final penalty.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the Hon. Member for Burnaby, and then the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby).

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I know my colleague, the Hon. Member for Halifax West, wants to speak as well. My colleague, as he has indicated, has participated in four previous debates on this issue. I would like him to comment on an event which occurred last week when the national leaders of the youth wings of Canada's three major political Parties issued a joint statement urging the Parliament of Canada to vote against the reinstatement of the death penalty. I, as a Member, was not present in this House in 1976 and during previous votes on the death penalty, but to the best of my knowledge, this kind of statement in which the youth wings of the national political Parties speak out in unison, calling upon this Parliament not to take this step backwards as a society, is unprecedented. The statement was signed by Elaine Fox, the chairperson of the Youth Steering Committee of the New Democratic Party, Jonathan Schneiderman, President of the Young Liberals of Canada, and Irene Porter, President of the Progressive Conservative Youth Federation.

To the best of my colleague's knowledge, does this extraordinary statement from the leaders of all three of Canada's political Party youth wings not represent a very fundamental and profound statement, which indeed is unprecedented in the history of debate on this very important question?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Burnaby is correct. This is indeed a profound change and a very significant statement coming as it does from the leaders of the youth wings of the three political Parties. I want to say to the Hon. Member that I was not only impressed by that, but I was impressed by statements made by the leaders of all the major churches, to whom I referred earlier, and profoundly impressed by the large number of letters from individuals and individual congregations of all churches. I am referring not just to the leaders of those churches who are speaking out, but to a broadly based coalition of local residents speaking through their churches. Certainly, we have seen what I believe is the beginning of a major change in the thinking of Canadian people on the subject.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, fortunately for us all the official report Hansard records our remarks, and they are there to be read by all. My remarks stand on their own merits.

Let me explain to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) what exactly I said and what exactly I meant when I drew comparisons between capital punishment and the International Monetary Fund, since the result is the exact opposite of what he indicated in his remarks.

The International Monetary Fund is not something on which most Canadians are knowledgeable. It can be left to experts. We can rely on the expert opinions to form the basis for our decisions. But capital punishment is an issue that belongs to each and every Canadian. It is not for an elite few to decide what to do with capital punishment. It is not for sociologists, the clergy or professionals—it is for every Canadian. We ought to regard the view of every Canadian on this issue. That is what I meant.

The Hon. Member is totally wrong if he frames those remarks in any other way. What is at issue here is the opinion of all Canadians on a matter on which all Canadians have an opinion.

I simply want to say this to the Hon. Member. Although the point is made about voting in principle, if the motion passes, then all Canadians will have an opportunity to express their views. In that process a consensus can be formed on the issue of capital punishment.

Because the Hon. Member does not agree with capital punishment and because he has decided for himself that he is against it, does he not want that process to take place, a process that can bring about a consensus on the issue that may result in a negative vote in the House of Commons against capital punishment, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, first, let me say that if I misunderstood the Hon. Member's comments earlier then, of course, I apologize. I have no intention, nor have I ever had any intention or desire, to misinterpret any Member's statements.

On the question of the views of the Canadian people let me say this. There are countries, and I will use the example of Switzerland, which have built into their democratic systems a procedure whereby if a certain percentage of the people want to have a referendum on any question, then they prepare a petition and obtain enough signatures so that that question goes on the ballot at the time of the next election. That is a part of the democratic system in Switzerland, and I respect it. If we had that in our system, then I would accept it. But we do not have that. We have a system in which Members of Parliament are elected to do and to say what they believe and to vote the way they think is correct. The penalty for them, if their electors think that they did wrong, is that they will not be re-elected.

I ask the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) why he and his friends say that we should follow the views of the people of Canada on this particular question because it is what the polls state. Why have they not said—and I am not saying that they should—that Members of Parliament should vote on the question of abortion or on the question of price and wage controls which we had imposed some years ago, or on any other question because the polls say it?

I say to the Hon. Member that I am not prepared to have him or anybody else choose the subject on which I or any other Member must follow the dictates or advice of the Canadian people because there is a poll.

What was the question asked in the poll? Who decided that that was the question to which every Member had to pay attention and had to follow? I say to the Hon. Member that if he really believes that the views of the people as expressed in polls should be followed by Members of Parliament, then let him propose a fundamental change to our system of representative democracy, such as in place in Switzerland. If we debate that topic, approve of it and put it into our system of democracy, then and only then would I be prepared to follow the views as expressed in polls. But I am not prepared to let the Hon. Member for Halifax West, or any other Member, or the general public, say to me that because on one subject or another the polls state that I must do this or I must not do that I should be prepared to accept that as a valid reason for voting for or against any question.

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate and in speaking against the motion on the restoration of capital punishment I would like to say that I do so this evening speaking in concurrence and, indeed, in support of the position outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in his speech in this debate a few moments ago. I come to this decision because I believe that the right to life is the most fundamental human right. I believe it is a gift of God. I strongly believe that it is the state's foremost duty to protect this right for all citizens, not to take it.

I do not believe that men and women have the right to decide who should live and who should die. As the Anglican Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Donald Coggan, said in 1975: "—there is an ultimate sense in which justice must be left to God". I oppose capital punishment not because I do not recognize the monstrousness of murder and the need to mete out appropriate punishment but because I believe in the absolute sanctity of life.

I know that my colleagues who have spoken so eloquently against capital punishment share the same abhorrence for all crime, and murder in particular. But let me emphasize that no one has gone soft on crime. I was particularly encouraged a few weeks ago, in fact on May 15, to see in The Globe and Mail that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney), outlined very succinctly five points to consider in rejecting the death penalty. He laid before the Canadian public some of the importance to the moral fabric of our country behind this debate.

He asked questions and invited us to consider whether the death penalty is a genuine deterrent to murder; the effects on juries; the brutalization effect; the risk of executing the innocent; and the matter of retribution. I think that what the Hon. Member for Ottawa West was underlining as he wrote and spoke of his growing convictions and those of an increasing number of Canadians is that a 20th century society such as ours cannot seek solutions to social problems by returning to past history but rather should do so by looking to today and on to tomorrow. I cannot accept the logic of a morality that teaches that the state should commit murder to demonstrate that murder is wrong.

Clearly, I believe that restoring capital punishment would be a retrogressive step. By performing such an act I believe we become less than human, proclaiming not only the worthlessness of the offender but of ourselves as well. Capital punishment debases and brutalizes all society, in my experience.

Executions draw the interest of the morbid and can have a criminogenic effect on unbalanced minds. I believe the goal of a civilized society should be to reform and to deter criminals, not to cry out for vengeance.

Sociologists, psychologists, and other experts have suggested that the causes of murder lie in a multiplicity of factors. They tell us they lie in the slums, broken homes, poverty, drug addiction, and drunkenness, along with the lack of opportunity and education. The effects of these backgrounds on individuals are heightened by the general affluence of our society and by television depictions of violence as being acceptable.

As those who are watching by way of television switch their channels in the evenings, they can ask themselves tonight how many people they have seen blown out of the water or blown off the streets. How acceptable are the pictures across our channels of violence? Such explosive combinations of course produce cataclysmic results for our society.

The vast power and resources of the Canadian state should be utilized to find ways and means of dealing with the fundamental issues of social dislocation. Canada's Catholic Bishops, in reaffirming their opposition to capital punishment, have called for an improvement of our correctional systems. They have called for an attack upon the social factors which spawn delinquency and crime. The Bishops, Canadians will have noticed, rejected the four reasons which are often given as a justification for capital punishment—retribution, an example to society, deterrence, and protection of society.

According to the Bishops, and I quote:

> It is now recognized that these reasons are problematic and cannot serve as a basis for moral judgment. Solutions that people once considered natural, just, and even necessary for social order, have thus come to be seen as radically unjust and inhumane.

The Bishops recognized the following:

> The death of a murderer cannot make good the suffering that crime brings, as it destroys lives, ruins families, and crushes the hopes of innocent people.

Many churches—and this has been alluded to by many Members who spoke in the debate today—including my own Presbyterian Church have adopted a similar position. I believe we should listen to them.

In leafing through information materials which were sent to all Members of Parliament, I came across a poster which has the picture of a hand with a stone in it. Interestingly enough, the poster, sent by the Mennonite Canada Victim Offender Ministries in Kitchener, has this thought-provoking caption for those who would use scripture pro or con in their debate: "Jesus was once asked for his support of the death penalty. His reply was: "Let one who is without sin cast the first stone".

For some of us capital punishment has a horrifying reality. It evokes memories that we wish to forget. However, in these circumstances I wish for a moment to share with the House my experiences, because as I have listened and monitored the debate, to date it has been largely theoretical.

I lived in Nigeria, West Africa from 1962 to 1967. I returned to Nigeria in March, 1976. At that time 34 very senior military officers who had been accused of plotting the assassination of the head of state were sentenced to death by firing squad. I should explain that the head of state in question, General Murtala Mohammed, was a popular leader indeed.

His assassination in a botched up coup attempt touched a raw nerve in the country. The death sentences quickly passed on the accused were designed not only as a fitting punishment but to serve as a deterrent. The executions became a public spectacle. People were invited to Bar Beach near Lagos where the executions took place. There was full press and television coverage of the event.

I can still see in my mind's eye the clergy giving the last rites, then the shooting of the firing squad, and the bodies as they lay slumped against the poles to which they were tied. An officer went about poking the bodies to finish off those who were not dead. I said to myself then, as I say it today: What a cruel waste. It achieves nothing. It is the wrong medicine for societal illnesses. It satisfies only animal instincts of humankind.

Yes, the Nigerian State had exacted revenge, but it had also alienated many people. The families, the friends, the extended families, and the relations of the executed persons suddenly became enemies of the state, not friends. The violence had achieved nothing. It had not stopped people from employing violent means to win power.

Those who support a return to capital punishment suggest a public consultation about the method of execution. Somehow it is a very antiseptic and far from personal experience. We will be asked to weigh firing squads versus the noose, the electric chair against lethal injections or perhaps stoning, as is done in some societies. While we are at it, they will probably decide, in order that it should be an effective deterrent, that executions should be held in public for all to see. To follow this logic, why not here on Parliament Hill? After all, if we are to look at the past record, executions were staged publicly before Confederation.

I find dehumanizing all this discussion about the best way to kill a man or woman. The whole idea is that we are somehow here to find a humane way of doing the inhumane. There is nothing humane about killing. Indeed a humane society, which is what we claim to be, will not consciously kill a human being. It will affirm the sanctity of life. Capital punishment is, I suggest, against our Canadian way of life. It is against the very principles of our existence as a free, a caring, and a civilized society.

One issue which to my mind the proponents of capital punishment have not adequately addressed is what happens if the system makes a mistake and we execute a completely innocent person. According to Amnesty International, there have been 28 cases of mistaken executions in the United States since 1900. Who, I ask, takes the blame for such monumental injustice? I have heard the argument that Canada has never recorded one such case of mistaken execution since Confederation. I am happy to hear that our record is so unblemished, but that is as far as it goes.

Tonight in his speech the Prime Minister was reminding us of the grave reservations of Prime Minister Diefenbaker about this whole matter in his criminal legal experience. The fact that we have not made such a mistake in the past does not mean that we cannot make it in the future. What if it does happen? Can anyone imagine the consequences of such an act?

I received in my mail today a letter dated June 19 from a Douglas E. Moore living in Thornhill, Ontario. In his letter he outlined his own experience and he described the horrifying circumstance when it was determined that a mix-up had occurred at the hospital and that the bullet fragments were found in the tissue samples from another unrelated case after two and a half years of his life being upside down.

Let me emphasize that other speakers before me addressed the several arguments against capital punishment. I fully endorse these arguments. However, even for those of us who strongly oppose capital punishment, there are legitimate public concerns about crime and our penal system which must be acknowledged and with which we must deal.

There is no doubt that ordinary citizens are terrified by rising crime and violence in our North American society. They are perplexed by what they see as the condoning of crime by the criminal justice system. There is a real fear in our streets and in too many of our homes. The rising tide of vigilante-ism and the public support for capital punishment are the manifestations of this fear. This has not come just out of a vacuum.

People come to me from across Kitchener—Waterloo and ask why the law appears to favour criminals and not the victims. There is a perception that law-abiding citizens are not receiving adequate protection from the law. It seems that the law is more interested in the rights of criminals than it is in victims. These are legitimate fears and questions to be addressed. I perceive that these are questions of which people on both sides of this debate are seized as Members of Parliament in Canada.

There was, for example, a report on the television program 60 Minutes recently about a notorious murderer known as Austin Choker who murdered a string of women by choking and then beating them mercilessly. He was caught and sentenced to a term totalling 123 years. After eight years, a parole board released him on a two to one decision. He went to Houston and immediately resumed his trade. He attacked two women. Fortunately, he was caught and is now back behind bars. In interviews, the two victims expressed horror that such a notorious killer could be paroled after eight years. Their conclusion was that the law did not care about them as law-abiding citizens. This happened in the United States, but people in Canada relate to these things and worry about them.

The only way to assure people that the law is on their side is by example. Those on the front line in the fight against crime—police officers, prison officers and others—must be given adequate protection, even it means changing the law. Training techniques need to be vastly improved. We are lucky to be a nation of great scientific and technological achievement. We can avail our law enforcement agencies of the latest techniques in crime fighting.

I hope that this debate will underline the fact that our criminal justice system needs to be improved. But we need not become an inhumane society in the process. Criminals can be dealt with firmly and effectively. And, if need be, our parole system should be strengthened. Those who have expertise in the field can study this system and bring us the necessary changes. We should not encourage types like Austin Choker. Perhaps it may be in our interest to have judges or representatives from the Justice Department sit on parole boards.

The range of new ideas is limitless. I suggest that we explore them, that we use the scientific and social resources of our fast developing nation, of this vast knowledge explosion, that we begin to understand how much we have moved in behaviour modification and in the whole understanding of our society in the last decade, to say nothing of the last quarter century.

It is interesting, and Canadians will be aware of this, that as this debate has gone on through the media and here in Parliament through many months, polls are changing. I find again and again that men and women in conversation agree on what is the problem and what is the medicine. Because of this fear, concern and anxiety, capital punishment has suddenly become the cure-all. I plead that out of this debate we may have a renewed resolve to use the technological and the sociological tools available to us to support those who seek to bring law and order into our community and to maintain it. I, with others who will vote against this motion, obviously wish to be on the side with all parliamentarians in building a better Canada, in seeking to light a candle rather than to curse the darkness.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively and with great interest to the Hon. Member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), for whom I have the greatest respect. I was taken with his comments, particularly about his ideas of strengthening the criminal justice system as an alternative to capital punishment.

I too am one who believes that this is an important objective and one that we should not only be investigating wholeheartedly, but turning into something positive so that we can reassure the people to whom the Hon. Member was referring, those who are afraid, who have concerns, who are perhaps terrorized by the reports that they receive when reading about violent crime, particularly murder. I must say, however, that I have become very discouraged about the potential of reassuring people by strengthening the criminal justice system in other ways.

I would like to refer the Hon. Member to a situation which occurred a very few weeks ago in Canada, not in the United States. This is not the case of an Austin Choker, this is the case of a Rheal Chartrand.

As the Hon. Member will recall, Rheal Chartrand was convicted of first degree murder of a police officer at a time when capital punishment was the penalty for first degree murder of a police officer in Canada. Of course, capital punishment was repealed while Mr. Chartrand was awaiting the ultimate penalty. He was then sentenced to serve the full penalty for first degree murder under the present law, namely, 25 years imprisonment. Recently as the Hon. Member is aware, Mr. Chartrand applied through his lawyers to a jury in the community where the murder had taken place to ask for the right to apply for parole after serving some 15 years of his sentence. The jury, which knew all the facts relating to this man awaiting execution, who had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment, decided that he should be eligible for parole and granted him the right to apply. We do not know whether that parole will be granted by the National Parole Board, but we know now that he has that right to do it.

Does the Hon. Member agree with that process? Does he believe that someone convicted of first degree murder of a police officer in those circumstances should be entitled to parole after 15 years? If he does, does the Member think that that is the way we will reassure the citizens of Canada and return their faith in our criminal justice system?

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) for his very helpful question and illustration. One of the obvious needs is the question of confidence building measures in the population. The question of strengthening criminal prevention has to do not only with the perpetrator of crime and the victim, but also with the community.

I have been particularly impressed in the community in which I live with the work which has been done largely by the leadership of the Mennonite community on victim-offender reconciliation and the question of beginning to build across communities an understanding of what is the societal part in anti-social behaviour and what is the appropriate and necessary restraint, the necessary prevention required.

In my comments I had thought that such a question might arise. I suggested that since each case would need to be looked at on its own merits that we might well want to begin to move to having people from parole boards, the judiciary, the Departments of Justice as well as communities and others represented so that when these decisions are made, they are not sudden and offensive to those who have been victims of crime, but rather some sense of participation in the decisions will have been experienced.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I was astounded to hear the Hon. Member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) say that he was pro-life. It is nice to be pro-life. I looked up Hansard for June 2, the day we voted on the motion of the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) which read as follows:

> Everyone including a human foetus or unborn being has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Looking further to the record of the vote, I note that the Hon. Member for Waterloo voted against that motion. I find it astounding, not to use a stronger word, that he would say that he is pro-life.

I believe that whether one is unborn or is living, one has the right to life. As it was so well stated, this is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. I believe an unborn child has the right to life. However, as I said earlier this evening, the state has the right too to protect its citizens against forces outside the country during war, and that is why we have the Armed Forces, and forces inside the country, and that is why the police carry guns. If someone murders someone else in a way that is detrimental to the interests of the entire community, the state has the right to take that person's life.

My question is simple. How can the Hon. Member explain that he says he is pro-life but voted against the motion of the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe?

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I understood that the motion this evening was on capital punishment. I have been seeking to address that and I will be quite happy on another occasion to address that other matter with the Hon. Member.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was impressed with the speech made by the Hon. Member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and I would like to commend him for it. I think he made the argument very well that capital punishment is not really a deterrent to murder. We need only look at the statistics down through the years and certainly those since 1976 to realize that in that 10-year period, the removal of capital punishment did nothing to increase the number of murders in Canada and that in fact they have dropped quite dramatically. When one looks around the world, one sees that there are more homicides in the City of Detroit, for instance, than there are in the entire country of Canada.

Likewise, another point that it is important to make is that people who are convicted and hanged if capital punishment is utilized are always the poor, the weak and the minorities. Clearly on death row in a State of the United States which has capital punishment, it tends to be the poor, the weak, minorities, blacks and members of other groups. Rich men seldom if ever are convicted of murder.

I believe the most important point the Hon. Member made was that there is tremendous concern in Canada over public safety and this point was made very forcefully to me by the police association in my riding. It was pointed out that we need a reform and improvement in the parole system, the sentencing system, crisis intervention centres and family assault centres because the prevention of murder and violence is more important. Unless we address that, I do not think that this debate can really accomplish very much. I certainly hope the Government will look into those aspects of public safety because that is what we are trying to achieve.

We may disagree about whether or not capital punishment is a useful mechanism for achieving that goal, but I do not think anyone disagrees that improving the sentencing, plea bargaining and parole systems and our systems for assisting young people with drug and alcohol problems and families suffering from violence is very important in preventing violent acts such as murder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I suppose that that was just a comment. Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the issue of capital punishment is a subject on which I have done a great deal of soul-searching. I do not support capital punishment and I vigorously oppose this resolution. I intend to vote against capital punishment.

The issue is an important one to all of us. It is not important simply because Canadians say it is important but because it deals with the sanctity of human life. I am opposed to capital punishment out of moral conviction and out of a deep reverence for human life. In my view, human life is sacred. It is my belief that no person other than the Creator should determine the life of an individual.

Second, I am not in agreement with those who say that the reintroduction of the death penalty for selected Canadian citizens would give additional safety to police officers, prison officials or private citizens. It is simply not a fact that the death penalty acts as a deterrent. When the death penalty was abolished in Canada, the murder rate actually declined. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) pointed that out earlier this evening in his address.

Third, the interlinking between social and economic factors in Canada as well as the administration of our criminal justice system needs to be more closely understood, defined and applied. Most particularly, we need to revise, review and find creative answers to our systems of sentencing, plea bargaining and parole.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repeating the comments of Members who have already taken part in this debate, I wish to add my voice to all those in this House and throughout Canada who are vigorously opposed to reinstatement of the death penalty. I must say that I am in good company as, apart from the civilized nations which voted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, including this country, which declaration recognizes in article 3 that—

Everyone has the right to life—

—there are also many abolitionists in Canada, including the Coalition Against the Return of the Death Penalty, which includes thirty-two different organizations, such as the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Association of Social Workers and Amnesty International.

[English]

The leaders of our three political Parties have taken a strong position against capital punishment. As well, there is the most unique situation of the three presidents of the youth wings of our three political Parties, the Liberal, Conservative and NDP youth presidents, who jointly expressed their ongoing concern and, in a vote of solidarity, their wish not to see this motion carry.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think I should say from the start that many ordinary Canadians have wanted to express their views on this issue, as shown by the great number of open letters to the newspapers. With very few exceptions, including the noteworthy one of Guy Brouillette, professor of philosophy at the Collège Maisonneuve in Montreal, they are vigourously opposed to the reinstatement of the death penalty. Many editorial writers, both francophone and anglophone, have also taken a stand against the old principle of an eye for an eye and questioned the use of resuming a debate which seemed to have been concluded once and for all in 1976. They have also expressed surprise at the fact that the Prime Minister did not see fit until the last moment to take part himself in this debate to express his abolitionist views, that he did not see fit to join personally in a debate which he will surely describe as being historic, as he does everything from an annual meeting with the President of the United States to a Constitutional Conference.

• (2130)

Editorial writers, along with Members of this House, will not easily forget the mean spirit of the Conservative Government which promised an open and full parliamentary debate followed by a free vote, only to then try and choke off debate by calling for closure. The Government tried that trick not once but twice. This is a matter of life and death. The motion calls for the return of capital punishment and the very act of trying to force closure shows how the majority Government is trying to suppress what it considers to be minority opinion on this very sensitive matter. The Government proposed the motion and it should have better managed its legislative calendar. The Prime Minister, who gave a very moving address this evening, talked about genuine respect for opposing views. He said we need periodic review of public policy and that this debate is the instrument of democracy. I do not call it democracy when you try and choke off the debate. When you use the threat of closure on a motion of this kind, that cannot be called straightforward.

Neither is the motion itself straightforward. It does not call for the death penalty, it calls for a decision that this House supports in principle the reinstatement of capital punishment and then directs that a committee be formed to deal with the issue. If the Government calls for the reintroduction of capital punishment, then it has taken a position even though its Leader and other Ministers are against it. I suggest that is not a very strong way to lead. Normally the Government would introduce a Bill for debate, send it to committee for amendment, and then pass it. The method the Government is using in this case is not very democratic. This is not leadership. This is hiding behind the skirts of a committee which is supposed to go out and find out what people want. I am not interested in how people wish to kill and I think the Government should have taken its responsibility a little more seriously.

[Translation]

Admittedly polls report that a majority of Canadians favour restoring the death penalty. What does that mean exactly? In an excellent article published in the May 1987 issue of L'Actualité magazine, Mr. Jean Paré expressed serious doubts about a poll in which 78 per cent of our fellow citizens said they were for capital punishment. That poll, he wrote, needs much finer interpretation. Moreover, he said, and I quote: "That opinion is volatile as is shown in the experience made in 1975 by two sociologists, one from Massachusetts and one from Ontario." In their samples, the support for capital punishment fell from 51 to 38 per cent, after the reading of a report offering factual arguments against the death penalty. When moral and social arguments were added, the support fell from 72 per cent to 42 per cent. Quoting one of the authors, Mr. Paré adds the following: "Most people are badly informed on the issue. When they know the facts, they tend to take a stand against."

Results of a survey published on May 7 last in several newspapers of this country confirm that statement.

[English]

Proponents of capital punishment are often reported as proclaiming that the people should be allowed to decide. Over the last few months people from my riding, indeed from all over Canada, have spoken to me about this issue. I have heard from them by letter, telephone, and postcard. They have sent me speeches, news clippings, and have even come to see me in person. These people have been doing a lot of soul searching and I would like to take a few moments to share with this House the sentiments of a few who have had a strong impact on me.

First I heard from Mr. Edwards of Toronto who said "Let us not demean ourselves or our nation by resorting to violence to control violence". Then there is a Mr. Epp, the former chief keeper at a Saskatchewan prison who in 1965 had in his prison an inmate who was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by hanging. He asked at that time why we were killing this man. Presumably it was to teach people that killing is wrong. That seemed very strange to him since we do not steal from thieves to teach that stealing is wrong. We do not assault violent people to teach that assaulting people is wrong. We do not rape people who have raped in order to teach them that raping is wrong. The Reverend Charles Eddis of the Unitarian Church of Montreal wrote to protest against capital punishment. He said it only brutalizes us all and cheapens the value of human life itself. Then there was the father of a young Ottawa girl, Celia Rygrok, who was a murder victim. He said nothing can give him his daughter back. Killing another person would not make him any happier. I have had hundreds and hundreds of postcards from across this country telling me that they oppose the death penalty. They say: "Don't kill for me". We have been told continually that the majority of Canadians favour capital punishment. The hundreds of people who have contacted me are not giving me that message.

It remains however, that in the bottom of their hearts, many Hon. Members across the way, many fellow citizens and even constituents support the reinstatement of capital punishment. To those people, whose views I respect but I totally oppose, I would like to point out three specific reasons why I am an abolitionist.

First, a societal reason. We are fortunate in being a democratic nation that finds violence totally abhorrent and immoral. The situation is different in totalitarian states, where torture is an inherent feature. By reinstating capital punishment, we meet violence with violence in a spirit of retribution. We will join the ranks of countries such as South Africa, most Iron Curtain nations, a few Third-World countries, Iran and Saudi Arabia, where a human being is a negligeable quantity whose life is subject to the State's pleasure. This would be a major step backward that would bring dishonour to this civilized society.

It is time we knew where Canada stands and where it wants to stand. Around which banner do we want to rally? As an answer. I am reminded of a very pertinent comment a member of the National Coalition Against Capital Punishment, Mr. Pierre Beauregard, recently shared with readers of Le Devoir.

And I quote:

"Contemporary history provides good examples of the relationship between capital punishment and power. In 1934, General Franco reinstated capital punishment in Spain for certain terrorist crimes. In 1938, the range of crimes punishable by death was widened. That was a sure way of eliminating political opponents. After the dictator's death, the new democratic government in Spain abolished capital punishment in 1978.

In Argentina, the very day it came to power in 1976, the military junta reinstated capital punishment that had been abolished in 1972. And it is the civilian government that abolished it once more as soon as it returned to power in 1984."

I shall not insist on the conclusion I draw from those comments.

A second reason is discrimination. The restoration of capital punishment would bring back in the country a cause of discrimination on two grounds: race and economic status.

Race: Several surveys made in the United States since over 15 years have shown that the legislation on capital punishment is often applied in a discriminatory fashion to black people. In a report published in February last in London, Amnesty International agrees. In our country, this kind of discrimination would affect another group. A recent study shows that in this country native people would be put to death more frequently that the white.

• (2140)

[English]

Like the American statistics on race and class which bear out the fact that them without the capital get the punishment, a recently completed survey of state executions in Canada between 1926 and 1957 by University of Victoria Economics Professor Kenneth Avio, found that while 17 out of 21 non-whites found guilty of murdering a white person were executed, only one out of five English Canadians was executed for the murder of a native Canadian. Using a model based on 440 capital murder cases, he further found that there was a 21 per cent chance of an English Canadian being executed for the same factual situation. As a Liberal I cannot tolerate this injustice and inequality. The scales of justice are unequally balanced.

From an economic perspective—

Economic status: The poor can also be the victims of discrimination in our legal system. Good lawyers are costly and some accused cannot afford distinguished criminal lawyers.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to suggest that a legal aid lawyer is not efficient on the contrary. I also know distinguished criminal lawyers who made their services available to penniless accused.

However, if only one alleged murderer was condemned to death because his financial means did not permit an adequate defence, I think that it is already unacceptable in a civilized country such as ours.

The third and last reason is that it is not a deterrent. Over the years, the statistics have demonstrated many times that the death penalty is not a deterrent. In fact, since it was abolished in Canada, the number of murders has not increased, and the American States which have renounced capital punishment have the lowest homicide rates in the United States.

The Association of Canadian Criminologists, made up of over 500 lawyers, shares this view. It states that a murder is often the result of an unexpected event, that it is committed on the spur of the moment, while the murderer is being carried away by passion.

I share its view that capital punishment as a deterrent is quite secondary, not to say irrelevant in most cases.

[English]

Is the fear of punishment an act of deterrence? No, not in Canada where we have had no executions for the last 25 years and where in actual fact first degree murder has declined by 25 per cent based on the statistics we have just heard.

It goes without saying that I could go on for quite a while developing my reasons for opposing the reinstatement of capital punishment. I urge those who do not share my view to consider honestly the recent decision of my friend the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) and wonder with him whether we should not rather review our penal system.

Instead of advocating a solution as radical and final as capital punishment, should we not reconsider seriously the administration of justice? Should we not make sure that the sentences are fully respected? That parole is granted more sparingly? What is needed is a system before which all are equal, a system where judges make the most equitable rulings possible. This review of our judicial and penal system should take into account the motives leading to crime: frustrations, disillusionment, unemployment, poverty, discrimination, distress, etc., and should try to support and encourage all those who are desperate to the point of murdering their neighbours.

We should not overlook the prisoners about to reenter society. We should help them more while they return to their community by providing them with adequate supervision and the psychological or psychiatric treatment which are often necessary if not essential to a successful return to normal life and the labour force.

It is through constant prevention and rehabilitation efforts and not through capital punishment that we will reduce crimes in this country. This way, Justice, whether or not with a capital J, would be better served.

[English]

For me, Mr. Speaker, voting for capital punishment is not done out of a sense of justice but rather one of vengeance. A vote for premeditated state killing or state murder is odious and offensive as well as unacceptable. I have not been persuaded by any of the arguments. God forbid that this committee be formed, but if it is I say to it, do not kill for me.

Mr. Oostrom: Mr. Speaker, I commend the Member for a very fine speech. I have a few questions for her. She mentioned that there is not ample time to discuss this issue. The joint committee may find no circumstances in which capital punishment would be justified. After the committee reports, we will have months and months to debate the issue. I would like to hear the Member's comments on that.

The Member knows of the Nuremberg trials held in Germany for the atrocities committed during the Second World War. If such a thing were to happen again, would she not recommend another such trial and the death penalty for those who committed atrocities on innocent people during a war? Six million Jews were killed, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. Member may remember that at the Olympics in Germany a group of young Jewish athletes was killed. We are going to have the Olympics in Calgary next year. If such a thing were to happen here, would she not be in favour of the terrorists being killed for their actions?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has asked a series of questions. With regard to the kind of actions the state shall undertake if we pass this motion, the committee will not have to decide whether we will execute if the motion is passed. The question will be that of how we should execute and who we should execute.

I would like to bring to the attention of my friend and colleague remarks which were made by some students who were visiting here last week. I must say that it shook me to my roots. One of them said, "Mrs. Finestone, I understand that you are in the midst of a debate on capital punishment". "Yes", said I, "and what do you think?" "Well", he said, "I do not quite understand. You are supposed to be trying to decide whether you should fry, hang, or inject. What is the shake and bake all about?"

When I hear young people ask questions in that way, I know that it is time to ask questions about what we are doing about the organization of the education of our youth. Why are we not spending our time addressing the violence in this society and how we can promote a different lifestyle? Why are we not addressing poverty, lack of education, jobs and job-training? Why are we wasting our time on this silly kind of non-constructive approach to this problem?

Let me respond to the second question. I find it totally offensive and quite surprising, coming from that Member, that he would try to mix two such serious issues. One is a question of war and the other is a question of the comportment and decency of people during the course of war. One is a question of how society behaves when it has found itself in an uncivilized situation.

We are supposed to be addressing a civilized and mature Canada, a fine land that is allied with the western countries, not with nations of obscene character like the Nazis.

I am not only concerned about the six million who were killed to which the Hon. Member referred me, I am concerned about the 20 million, whether they were the gypsies, fighters for freedom, the French, Yugoslavs or any of the people who were murdered at that time in Russia, Ukraine and every part of that area. That was wartime and the Hon. Member should not mix those two issues. I find it totally offensive.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear the Hon. Member indicate that this is a silly debate.

Mrs. Finestone: I did not say silly.

Mr. Hawkes: I think if the Hon. Member carefully checks the record, she will find the word there. Perhaps she may not have intended to say silly, but when she looks at today's Hansard she will find the word there. It is not a silly debate, but a very important one.

It is important to recognize that it is the Opposition Parties that have determined that House time normally devoted to subjects like unemployment and other concerns shall be used for this debate. There has been plenty of opportunity to reach agreement in the House on such things as shorter speeches, longer hours and other ways of dealing with this debate outside of the normal flow.

I hope Hon. Members opposite reflect on the Hon. Member's comment and consider whether or not it is important to move outside of regular hours to allow more Members to be heard and whether restriction on the length of speeches might be in order due to the importance of the debate. However, I believe we share a common goal that we would like to reduce violence in the world, particularly murder. Essentially, we are saying that we would like to reduce killing in society.

It is my strongly held view that killing is reduced primarily because people have faith in their system and their laws. It seems to me that the retention of the right of the state to take a human life is an important building block in the development of the faith in the system. I believe that when we, as elected representatives, tell our citizens that we will not do what they believe is important, we are really promoting a certain lack of faith in the legal system. In the final analysis, we are really inviting killing in spite of the protections and processes which the law has to offer.

Perhaps I feel more strongly about that today because of the nature of a trial in Calgary where a druggist has been charged with murder for shooting a robber. He shot a robber because he lost faith in the system, bought a shotgun and decided that he had the responsibility of protecting his home and his family.

Has the Hon. Member considered that if the state does not retain the right to take a human life, it invites others to take some of those same lives and perhaps the lives of innocent people as a result of a lack of faith and trust in the judicial system? Are we likely to achieve our common goal if we, as Members of Parliament, go against the view of the general population and reduce their confidence in the law? Are we more likely to reduce the crime of killing when people are more comfortable with the law and what it achieves?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I wish I knew shorthand so that I would have been able to better answer the Hon. Member's question with the sincerity and concern it deserves. I know his questions were posed in good faith. If I used the word silly, it was inaccurate and I did not intend to use it in the context of this debate.

First, I do not intend to discuss the case in Calgary because it is presently before the courts. I am sure the Hon. Member would not expect me to do so. At a time when we are not addressing the issue of violence in a society that is becoming more violent, would it be wise to enable people to carry more guns? I suggest it would be a very unhealthy response to the situation that he presents.

Second, faith in the system is exactly what I was discussing. If there has been a diminution of the application of the intent of the law, which I alluded to in my speech, then we must redress the way the judicial system operates. This could include educational systems for our judges, a fairer system that does not consider whether or not one is rich or poor in our society, a sentencing system that is more even, or more effective and judicious decision-making by the parole boards. There could be a number of reasons for a loss of faith in our system.

Why was the Government not more straightforward and take its responsibility to present a Bill? The Government should not proceed by proposing this motion which was called for by its members but with which its Leader does not agree. It should have introduced a Bill on the death penalty on which there should have been proper debate and consultation throughout the country. Hearings throughout the country could have been based on constructive approaches. This motion is designed so that a number of Members can travel on a ghoulish mission to determine how people will be killed. The Government has not fulfilled its commitment and has been absolutely hypocritical.

This debate is a political ploy. The leader did not agree with the premise of the proposal and left it to the committee to decide. My Party and I disagree with this procedure and I do not believe Canadians like it when the Government tries to choke off debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being ten o'clock, pursuant to order made Friday, June 12, 1987, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

At 10 p.m. the House adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that my colleague, the Member for Guelph (Mr. Winegard), has a report to present. I ask that the House revert to presenting reports from committees at three o'clock because there is another committee report being translated. It is not ready now but will be ready at three o'clock.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is 11 o'clock. I would like to know what report and what committee we are talking about so that we can understand exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary could explain.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, it is the Committee on Government Operations.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. This is, of course, the same report as has been referred to this morning by the media before it has been tabled in the House. It is unfortunate that time and again reports of standing committees are being discussed by the media. Members are being asked to comment on them before they are tabled in the House and yet the media has full knowledge of their contents.

You know, of course, Mr. Speaker, that that is a breach of the Standing Orders of the House. I use this opportunity to bring that to your attention. That does not mean that we are not willing to give consent for the report to be tabled this afternoon. Now that it is leaked it is better that it be presented this afternoon than on a later day.

It is unfortunate that these reports get into the hands of the public before other members of this House have the opportunity to see them. I happen to know the contents of the report so my privileges were not breached, but the same does not apply to many of my colleagues in this Chamber.

As a final point, I find it particularly—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): A Liberal leak.

Mr. Boudria: That comment by the Member for Ottawa—Carleton (Mr. Turner) was unnecessary. I hope he takes the opportunity to apologize for it at the appropriate time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Excuse me, sonny.

Mr. Boudria: I raise my share of tough issues in this House. However, I do believe that it is unfair that all Members of Parliament are not permitted to see reports of standing committees simultaneously. This seems to happen again and again in the same committee, that being the Committee on Government Operations, of which I am a member.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) has raised a matter which has troubled the Chair and Hon. Members. It may well be that he will want to raise it more extensively at another time. If there is consent to present the report this afternoon, the Chair might observe that the report might not be exactly the same as that which has been commented upon elsewhere. Nonetheless, the point which the Hon. Member makes is an important one.

I take it that there is consent to introduce that report this afternoon? The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) indicates consent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PRESENTATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

• (1110)

This report is concerned with automotive manufacturing and trade in Canada. The Committee does not accept the suggestions of the North American manufacturers that the Government of Canada legislate Canadian content for Japanese and Korean manufacturers.

At the same time we urge that import restraints continue to be imposed and that the offshore manufacturers be urged and pushed, if necessary, to add Canadian content.

We are distressed at the lack of R and D done here in Canada by U.S. manufacturers.

CRIMINAL CODE, IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976 AND CITIZENSHIP ACT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) asked for leave to introduce Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Citizenship Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS INFORMATION REVIEW ACT

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are three motions which have been discussed among the Parties. I think you will find unanimous consent for them to be introduced and voted on immediately.

The first motion is with respect to Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act. I move:

> That, when Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act etc., is read a second time, it be referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT (NEWFOUNDLAND ACT)

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the second motion refers to an item on the Projected Order Paper today with respect to what is called the Pentecostal Assemblies Act of Newfoundland. There have been discussions among the Parties and I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to the following motion being introduced and passed. I move:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, when debate on the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice respecting an amendment to the Constitution of Canada on the matter of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland, Government Business No. 9, is concluded, the said debate shall be deemed adjourned and the motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General;
> That the motion shall remain on the Order Paper for resuming the adjourned debate;
> That the Standing Committee shall take up and consider the motion at its next meeting and shall report or shall be deemed to have reported same back to the House at the next sitting of the House, provided that if necessary the House shall revert to Presenting Reports from Committees for the purpose of receiving the report;
> That no Notice of Motion to concur in the Committee report shall be received by the House; and
> That notwithstanding the usual practices of the House, when debate on the motion is resumed whether or not the Committee has made a report to the House, Members may refer to the deliberations of the Committee in debate.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am certainly disposed to agree with this motion but I have a genuine question. It states at the middle of the motion that the committee shall be deemed to have reported the same back to the House at the next sitting of the House. Does that mean if the resolution proceeds today the next sitting of the House is Thursday?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary can assist the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think that is in the vernacular of this place. He will know that when Bills are introduced, the normal terminology is to ask, when shall the Bill be read a second time, at the next sitting of the House, and think that is what this means. It may or may not be Thursday.

Mr. Kaplan: If the resolution proceeds today, and the Government could choose to call the Bill on Thursday, unless the committee had met between today and Thursday there would be no opportunity for the committee to meet. I do not object to that, I just want to be clear if that is what might happen so that we would only have the rest of today to call a meeting?

I asked the question simply because we were wondering about possibly having witnesses from Newfoundland. However, if the resolution might be called at the next sitting of the House, Thursday, then it would not be possible for us to have witnesses.

Mr. Lewis: If that were to happen, I would object to it. Obviously, this is done after consultation with House Leader in order to facilitate a committee hearing and the calling of witnesses if that is the wish of the committee.

The Government would not be proceeding in any way which would derogate from the committee's ability, if deemed desirable, to have witnesses and hold as many meetings as it wants.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to have some clarification as to the Government's intent concerning the motion. Is the motion going to be passed? Is the Parliamentary Secretary saying that it will go to the committee, that the committee will hold its hearings, then it will come back to the House before it recesses for the summer? Is that what the Parliamentary Secretary is saying? This has come up in the House twice since 1971. It has to be passed.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) has some concerns about this.

Mr. Lewis: I wish to advise the Chair that we will not proceed with this motion.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair did not hear the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could stand this and return to it later this morning? I am sure that whatever misunderstandings there may be are inadvertent and could easily be clarified.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray). It was a suggestion I was hoping someone would make.

COMMEMORATIVE STATUES

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have a third motion which has been discussed among the Parties. I say to my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party that I discussed it with the Whip. This refers to what might be called the statue question.

I move:

Petitions

That the resolution adopted by the House on February 10, 1987, respecting the installation of a statue in honour of former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, and the document entitled "Report on Commemorative Statues to Canadian Prime Ministers and Commemoratives to other eminent Canadians", tabled in the House on Tuesday, February 10, 1987 (Sessional Paper No. 332-7/13), be referred to the Standing Committee on Government Operations.

• (1120)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that indeed there have been consultations. Our Party is very pleased with this initiative and we will certainly support it

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic caucus, we agree to this. We believe there really should be some comprehensive review by a standing committee on which significant Canadians will have statues placed in the parliamentary presence.

OPPOSITION TO RENTAL INCREASE FOR MAISON D'AMITIÉ

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House a petition from my constituents of Ottawa-Vanier who humbly state that according to a report made public by the Advisory council on the Status of Women, one woman out of eight will be the victim of psychological, economic, sexual or verbal violence from her spouse; that at a time when the Government should act rather than punish, the National Capital Commission intends to increase by more than $3,000 a month the rent of the Maison d'Amitié, the only French-speaking and voluntary organization in the region to help women and children in distress; that the Prime Minister recently stated in the House in reply to a question which I asked him that the problem of women victims of violence is one of the gravest social and legal challenges of the Maison d'Amitié to take up; wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to direct the National Capital Commission to reconsider its decision to increase the rent and continue as in the past to charge a nominal fee of $1.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO USE OF CHEMICAL PESTICIDES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 106. The petition is signed by petitioners from Hinton, Calgary, Olds, and Medicine Hat, Alberta, as well as Lillooet, Crescent Valley, Kootney Bay, Nelson, Castlegar, South Slocan, Winlaw, Silverton, Mayerthorpe and Rochford Bridge in British Columbia.

The petitioners are concerned about the increased number of chemicals being used as herbicides and insecticides. They believe it has been proven to be harmful to human health. They are also concerned that these chemicals produce short and long term harmful effects on non-target organisms such as soil and water.

The petitioners therefore humbly pray and call upon the House of Commons to initiate a full public inquiry into the safety, testing, registration and regulation of the use of pesticides and the examination of alternative ways of controlling pests such as biological control and plant derived pesticides.

FREE TRADE—EFFECT ON AUTO PACT SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present to the House which deals with the question of the Auto Pact and the concern that my constituents and constituents in other parts of the country have with respect to the safeguards in the Auto Pact. I am certain that many of those constituents will be pleased to see the report from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade which also supports those safeguards.

I would therefore table this petition because of the petitioners' concern with the many thousands of jobs which could be lost if the safeguards themselves are done away with.

FEDERAL CLEAN COAL TECHNOLOGY PROGRAM

Question No. 119—Mr. Caccia:

1. In 1985 was a federal clean coal technology program announced with a budget of $70 million and have the funds been allocated and, if so (a) in what manner (b) to whom (c) on what dates?

2. Are the projects cost-shared or wholly funded by the Government?

3. Have there been recent changes to the total value of funds committed under the program and, if so, is the commitment now greater than, or less than, the original $70 million?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. On March 6, 1985 the Government announced the unveiling of the federal acid rain control program. A press release, of the same date, stated "We are continuing our support of technology development for the cleaner and more efficient use of coal for power generation. Over $70 million has been budgeted".

This $70 million was a compilation of funds already committed by Energy, Mines and Resources for both coal research and development and for the Coal Utilization Demonstration Program to be spent between 1985/86 and 1988/89. For breakdown of expenditures, see below.

(a)—(c) The funds identified by CANMET were planned expenditures for the 1985/89 period for either in-house or contracted work.

The funds planned to be spent under the Coal Utilization Program were for projects already approved by Treasury Board with the exception of a coal beneficiation study for which several contracts have been let for various phases.

Allocations under the Coal Utilization Program which constitute a major part of the $70 million are as follows:

(I) CIRCULATING FLUID BED COMBUSTION DEMONSTRATION PROJECT, CHATHAM, NEW BRUNSWICK

Agreement made on December 19, 1983 between the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and Energy, Mines and Resources after approval from Treasury Board on September 13, 1983. Treasury Board gave authority to enter into Phase II of this agreement on August 1, 1984.

(II) COAL-WATER FUELS DEMONSTRATION PROJECT, CHARLOTTETOWN, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Agreement made with the Maritime Electric Company approved by Treasury Board February 13, 1985 and signed effective March 1, 1985.

(III) BUBBLING FLUID BED COMBUSTION MATERIALS TESTING PROGRAM, POINT TUPPER, NOVA SCOTIA

Agreement made on September 1, 1982 between Nova Scotia Power Corporation and Energy, Mines and Resources after Treasury Board approval on July 29, 1982.

(IV) SELECTION OF ENVIRONMENTAL CONTROL TECHNOLOGIES

Agreement made with the Canadian Electrical Association initially on January 1, 1982 after Treasury Board approval November 5, 1981. Subsequent releases of additional funds were approved by Treasury Board November 22, 1982; June 13, 1984; and July 23, 1986.

(V) COAL BENEFICIATION STUDY: CONTRACTS

Electric Power Research Institute, February 6, 1985. Atlantic Coal Institute, May 10, 1985. Coal Mining Research Company, September 1, 1985. SNC, September 23, 1985.

2. The projects funded by CANMET focus on contracts awarded to the private sector, many of which are cost-shared, but CANMET provides technical support to and complements the scope of these projects. In addition, CANMET provides substantial technical support to projects funded directly by the Coal Utilization Program.

The Coal Utilization Program projects are wholly funded by Government, although utilities have provided for some of their own staff services.

3. There are no changes to total funding under the Coal Utilization Program since the program officially terminated on March 31, 1986. There have been changes in cash flow since 1985 and a cost overrun on the Chatham circulating fluid bed project required additional expenditures which have been absorbed by EMR.

The amount of funds spent by CANMET on clean coal R and D has remained relatively constant.

Question No. 137—Mr. Grondin:

Did the Department of Employment and Immigration, under employment development programs for youth, for the fiscal year 1985-86, allocate $673,200,000, thus creating 253,400 jobs and, in 1986-87, allocate $720,300,000, thus creating 230,200 jobs and, if so, for what reasons were less jobs created in 1986-87 with a higher allocation of funds?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth)): The Department of Employment and Immigration does not allocate any specific funds for youth under the Canadian Jobs Strategy. In 1985-86, expenditures on youth are estimated at $673.2 million providing work opportunities and training to approximately 253,400 participants.

In 1986-87, based on budget allocation, youth expenditures are estimated at $736.3 million and will provide work experience and training to approximately 230,200 participants.

The 1985-86 figure is based on expenditures whereas 1986-87 figure is based on budget allocation. There are two reasons why less jobs were created with more money. Allowances and wages paid to participants have increased. In addition, the average days duration of Canadian Jobs Strategy activities is longer in 1986-87 than it was in 1985-86.

CRIMINAL CODE AND CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

The House proceeded with consideration of Bill C-15, an Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for Mr. Hnatyshyn), moved that Bill C-15 be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for Mr. Hnatyshyn), moved that Bill C-15 be read the third time and passed.

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to address the substance of Bill C-15, but first of all, I would like to acknowledge the important work done by members of the Legislative Committee.

I was also very impressed by the statements of the witnesses. Their testimony proved to be very useful in considering a Bill that is so important for Canada's children and young people. The Bill was well received by those who regularly care for children who have been victims of sexual assault, although proposals were made to amend some of the provisions of the Bill.

Indeed, we agreed to introduce some major amendments to improve certain aspects so that the Bill will more effectively protect children and young people against sexual assault. Furthermore, this Bill seeks to reinforce the rights of victims by facilitating access to the judicial system.

Another purpose of this Bill is to identify offenders and give them a chance to receive the support and treatment they need. On the whole, the Bill's structure is much the same as it was when the House decided to refer it to a legislative committee.

Basically, the Bill contains three important measures. First of all, in order to provide additional protection against sexual abuse, it creates three new offences relating to the sexual abuse of children and young people. Second, the Bill abolishes certain offences under the Criminal Code that have become obsolete and amends provisions relating to other offences to make the Criminal Code more effective and more attuned to today's society. Third, the Bill provides for ways to enable children to testify.

The Bill therefore contains three new offences. To protect children under fourteen years of age, it creates the offence of sexual interference. Every person who, for sexual purposes, touches a child under fourteen years of age is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years.

Children under fourteen years of age are also protected by a new offence which consists in inviting a child of that age to engage in sexual touching of others. This offence would also carry a maximum prison term of ten years.

The third new offence is aimed at protecting young people under eighteen years of age from sexual exploitation by any person who is in a situation of trust or authority towards these young people. In very serious cases, the offence would carry a maximum prison term of five years. Furthermore, each of these offences may be punishable on summary conviction.

Since for each offence, the legislation emphasizes the terms "for sexual purposes", the Crown will have to prove that those purposes are one of the essential components of the crime. In this way, parents, teachers and all persons involved in caring for children will be protected against frivolous charges.

Anyone who takes care of children knows that they have to be hugged and shown love and affection. The usual way we express love and affection, by touching the child in whatever way, is of course not what is meant by these new provisions.

Only the kind of contact or touching or invitation to touching that is aimed at awakening sexual desire or obtaining sexual satisfaction is covered by these offences. The Badgley Committee found that many sexual assaults against children and adolescents in Canada involve such touching. Liability may be attributed for each of these offences, even if there is an element of consent, or at least of non-opposition on the part of the victim. Of course, if there is no such consent to touching, the incident obviously constitutes a sexual assault. However, even if such consent exists, it cannot be used as a defence to a charge, except in a very few cases. It is necessary to provide for such an exception so as not to make criminal acts out of the normal sexual discovery activities of young people.

Under the Bill, if the accused is not in a position of trust or authority towards a child twelve years of age or more but under the age of sixteen and if he is not two years older than the complainant, consent can be used as a defence. I underline the fact that consent can be used as a defence in such cases. In fact, the Badgley Committee and the evidence given before the legislative committee both point out that young people who indulge in sexual touching with younger children can in fact be exploiting them.

The second major initiative contained in this Bill consists in amending existing sexual offences and eliminating some others. There is no need to explain why some outdated offences have been eliminated, such as those which deal with the seduction of young women or of female passengers by the crew of a ship. Such offences no longer lead to a charge. They have no place in a modern Criminal Code.

Other offences have been amended to reflect the evolution of our society and the changes required by the new provisions contained in the Bill. These changes include the addition of two new offences which also, aim at protecting children and adolescents. The first concerns a person who, in any place, for a sexual purpose, exposes his or her genital organs to a person under the age of fourteen. Such indecent exposure was already covered by the Criminal Code if committed in public. However, if committed in private, there had to be in addition an intent to insult or offend. These provisions were found to be inadequate in cases where people showed their genital organs to children for a sexual purpose. The new provision therefore makes this an offense punishable on summary conviction.

Once more, I emphasize the fact that such exposure must be for a sexual purpose. This means that the simple fact of going around the house without any clothes on in the presence of children, for instance, will not constitute an offence.

The second offence concerns the customers of young prostitutes. From now on, requesting the sexual services of a person under the age of eighteen will constitute an offence.

According to many comments, the problem of juvenile prostitution is getting increasingly serious. These young people must be protected against the consequences of such activities. The Badgley Committee recommended that, as a last resort, prostitution by young persons constitute an indictable offence, but such a solution does not seem acceptable. It would be better to target the customers who use young people for sexual services. Consequently, those who request the sexual services of prostitutes under the age of eighteen will be liable to five years in prison in the most serious cases. In addition, to ensure that those who live on the avails of prostitution of young people are not simply soliciting for the prostitutes, the penalty for living on the avails of juvenile prostitution is being increased to fourteen years of imprisonment.

Existing provisions which deal with the evidence given by children reflect outdated attitudes as concerns the reliability of such evidence. While Common Law rules originally provided that anyone could be a witness for the Crown, women and children were gradually judged to be less than reliable witnesses, especially when giving evidence about sexual assaults of which they had been the victims. A major detail of the evidence given by women and children had to be corroborated by a piece of compromising evidence against the accused. Because of the very nature of these offences, however, it was impossible in many cases to find corroborating evidence. This injustice against women was corrected in 1976, and Bill C-127, which came into effect in 1983, clarified the applicable provisions. We are now attempting to repair the injustice done to children who have witnessed criminal acts.

There is increasing, convincing evidence that children who have to report on facts they have experienced are truthful witnesses. The injustice in denying child victims of criminal acts the right to explain the facts to the court has been recognized by the Badgley Committee and the Fraser Committee. Both committees recommended repealing the rule requiring corroboration.

The corroboration rule prevented a child from obtaining justice. Moreover, the rules on child evidence often prevented children from explaining to the court what they had experienced. Even though a child was called to the witness box, seeing his alleged aggressor often disconcerted him to the point where he could not give coherent evidence.

The Bill would allow children to more easily report on acts they have been victims of, in keeping with the accused's rights. It would also allow a larger number of children to give evidence. Any child who could state the facts and promise to tell the truth could give evidence. Such evidence would be heard by a judge or jury, who would determine its credibility. So that he could give a full and truthful statement of the facts on which the charges are based, a provision could be used by the court to allow the child to testify without seeing the accused.

That goal could be reached by putting a screen in the courtroom or by having the child in another room. In the latter case, the other parties involved should be given an opportunity to attend the testimony on closed circuit television. The child no longer would be put under the obligation of repeating the recital of facts because the Bill includes a provision under which a videotape could be made within a reasonable period after the alleged offence has been commited.

The effect of that proposal could be to avoid the child having to repeat the same evidence, often a number of times. It would also enable the child to make in his own words a recent report of the facts while they are still fresh in his or her memory.

So that such a videotape could be allowed in evidence, the child would of course have to confirm the contents when testifying before the courts. The child could then be cross-examined, which cross-examination would clearly have to be led in light of the child's age and ability to understand if the court were to be able to take it into account.

Mr. Speaker, I only referred to the most significant aspects of the Bill, which is aimed at protecting children and youth against sexual aggressions by creating new offences, and to make it easier for children to access the criminal justice system.

On the other hand, the proposals are based on the principle that the rights of the accused also have to be respected. When such sweeping changes are being introduced into an area of the law that is of such tremendous importance, the impact of course has to be carefully reviewed. Steps have therefore been taken for such a review to be initiated immediately and for a report to be submitted to a committee four years from now. A complete review could then be made of the impact of the implementation of those legislative proprosals.

Clearly, amendments could be brought in sooner, if provisions in the legislation were to prove inefficient or lead to some unwanted consequences. However, I am certain that the main objectives of the legislation will be reached, and I have no hesitation in recommending it to all Members.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief, the reason being the decision of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to hold a press conference at this moment downstairs. Let me simply say that Bill C-15 is a Bill to which we devoted a considerable amount of attention. During committee hearings, Liberal Members, led by myself, proposed a number of amendments.

I want to confirm what the Parliamentary Secretary has just said.

[Translation]

Indeed, a lot of cooperation existed on that committee, and the Government genuinely accepted some of our suggestions, while of course rejecting others. We have decided not to push forward at the report stage our amendment proposals, because of the wide consensus that has indeed been reached during committee work.

[English]

The committee heard from a large number of witnesses, and I want on behalf of the Liberal Party to thank all of those who took the time and the trouble to appear before the committee. Some came from as far away as Vancouver to assist the committee in its work.

While the recommendations do not go as far as the Badgley Commission recommended, they are a tremendous improvement over the present law. Bill C-15 will result in more prosecutions than has been the case to date. Many of the obstacles to bringing cases forward have been disposed of as a result of the work of the committee.

I was hoping to hear the Parliamentary Secretary say that there would be an evaluation of the effect of the changes beginning from their implementation, such that within two or three years we might have some idea as to the impact of some of the measures introduced, through this legislation, into Canadian jurisprudence for the first time.

Some are extremely innovative; some undermine traditional safeguards—which we agreed to undermine for the sake of being able to bring cases forward in the interest of seeing justice done in more cases. However, for my part, I would want to be assured that the Government is watching the situation and that if it evolves to the point that simply being charged means one will be convicted, there would be another look at the law to ensure that there is a full opportunity for an accused to bring forward his defences and to have the opportunity of having those defences fairly considered by the court.

In conclusion, I want to say to the Parliamentary Secretary that I hope that the kind of co-operation we enjoyed in dealing with Bill C-15 will apply when it comes to considering Bill C-54, the pornography Bill. I and my Party have many more objections to Bill C-54 than we had in respect of the child abuse legislation. If we do get to the second reading stage of Bill C-54, you will hear the Liberal Party express the wish that the Bill be quickly referred to committee for detailed consideration.

Notwithstanding that there are parts of Bill C-54 with which we disagree fundamentally, we think that the pornography laws in this country, as with the child abuse laws, do need to be improved, and Bill C-54 represents a good vehicle for doing so.

We have a Minister who recognizes that the Government and those who serve the Government do not have all of the wisdom on the subject and that a parliamentary committee can do a good job, in the public interest, in making legislation better.

In that spirit, I offer our support for Bill C-15, notwithstanding that many of the amendments which we think should have been included have not been included.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to add the support also of our Party on Bill C-15. It is our intention to co-operate fully today to ensure the expeditious passage of the Bill.

This is legislation that all of us have been awaiting for many years. I know within our own caucus we spent probably 50 to 60 hours in discussions trying to find ways and means of fine-tuning this legislation, and toward that end we worked in co-operation with the committee, the Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary.

I know that most of us have received volumes of mail from people across the country drawing our attention to the very tragic situation that exists in society today in respect of child pornography and child abuse. If there is one form of pornography that is repulsive to all, if there is one form of pornography that raises the ire of sensitive and decent people everywhere, it is that which is attached to young people. For that reason, we are anxious to facilitate the passage of Bill C-15.

I want to compliment those who have worked on the Bill. In a sense, all of those who worked on it put aside partisan differences to come together in support of an issue that deserves support in all ways and with all means to ensure the bringing to an end of the tragic situation that exists, not only in our country, but around the world, in respect of child pornography and child abuse.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, we are pleased to see Bill C-15 coming to this point in its passage through Parliament. We look forward to significant changes flowing out of this legislation. We look forward to the kind of society that we all envision, where young people and children are nurtured and supported and allowed to develop their talents and their expertise, their abilities, in every way possible. A step toward this aim is the initiative taken in Bill C-15, to bring to an end the abuse of children. Anything that brings to an end child pornography is something that we can all rally around.

As Bill C-15 is a piece of legislation that our justice critic has been working on and concerned about for a great length of time, Mr. Speaker, he may want to say a word or two about it. However, as House Leader of my Party, I simply wanted to speak for the caucus and to say that we are pleased Bill C-15 has moved to this point. We want to see its rapid completion and passage through the House today.

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted the chance to add a couple of words in respect of Bill C-15 as a member of the legislative committee. We spent many months working on this piece of legislation. I have been in Parliament for almost three years, and I should like to say that it was probably the most constructive opportunity we have had to work together, as previous speakers have said, in a non-partisan way for the public good. In dealing with the vital issue of child sexual abuse, I think we have come forward with a piece of legislation which will be a very important first step.

I was particularly pleased that the Minister agreed to recommendations of the committee, particularly those in respect of the ability of children to testify based upon their ability to communicate. This certainly means that children will be able to bring forward evidence. As well, the other amendment to have a review after four years puts into perspective the concerns we heard from all sides. We tried to create a balance between protecting the accused and ensuring that young people will be able to come forward, those who have been abused.

We recognize that this piece of legislation is only one part of dealing with the problem. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has come forward with a $20 million program over a period of five years to help with the educational process. For example, the West Vancouver Police Association has been involved in this process, as have many others in British Columbia.

We need more public awareness. We need to view the issue of child sexual abuse within the broader framework of how we deal with violence in society.

I see this issue as a very positive step forward, one in which all Members have played a very constructive role. I hope in the years to come we in the House will deal with some fundamental issues in respect of how we will attack the problems of family violence and societal violence in a constructive way.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this important debate and to echo the comments which have been made by the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) who certainly played an important and constructive role in the work of the legislative committee on Bill C-15.

I have participated as the justice critic for my Party in many legislative committees and in many sittings of the justice committee on legislation. I can say without any hesitation whatsoever that I felt the work done in this committee, chaired I might add by Your Honour, was really outstanding.

The committee looked at a piece of legislation dealing with a very important, sensitive, and complex question. We heard from many witnesses from across Canada, such as groups representing the Child Welfare Community and the Canadian Council on Children and Youth, which had conducted its own extensive hearings and consultations in respect of the legislation. Many witnesses voiced their concerns about the legislation.

In a truly non-partisan spirit the legislative committee, after having heard from these witnesses, proposed some very significant amendments to the legislation. I see the Parliamentary Secretary in the House who spoke earlier on the debate representing the Minister. I can say that there were times when perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary was not entirely in agreement, as Your Honour will recall, with the spirit of some amendments proposed by members of the committee. Nevertheless, the committee as a whole, in a non-partisan approach, in fact made some very major and important improvements to the piece of legislation. I should like to touch upon some of the areas in which I believe the Bill has been significantly improved.

Before doing so, however, I should like to indicate my concern that while we are establishing a legislative framework today, it is an important and essential first step, but it is certainly not enough. We heard from a number of witnesses in the committee about the critical shortage of resources, both at the federal and provincial level, to deal with the concerns of the community, to deal with the sexual abuse of children.

It is one thing to establish a framework for prosecution of these offences, but it is quite another thing for us as a society, having done so, not to recognize that we are terribly underfunding programs to prevent child abuse, programs to deal with and to assist children to recover from the trauma of abuse, and programs to deal with those who offend.

Another area in which we received representations as a committee was in respect of the adult survivors of child abuse. This is an area in which further legislative action is clearly necessary. We must take steps to ensure that those adults who still bear the scars of abuse as children after, in some cases, many years must be in a position to come forward to tell their stories. There must be resources to ensure that they receive the kind of support they so desperately need.

I hope the Government will recognize that we have unfinished business here. Yes, we have taken important steps in respect of children who have been abused, and I welcome those steps. However, we must go further and deal with the very serious concerns which have been raised by adult survivors of abuse.

It is clear that in too many parts of Canada, including my own Province of British Columbia, Governments pay lip service to the importance of resources for dealing with abused children. They quite properly call for effective enforcement mechanisms, but those same Governments fail miserably when it comes to providing support for children in our communities.

In this regard I should like to quote from a report of the National Council of Welfare entitled "Poor Kids". In part it reads:

> Canadians like to believe that ours is a society in which all children are born with equal chances to rise as far as their abilities will carry them. Though they begin their lives in very disparate circumstances, we comfort ourselves with the belief that success is as attainable for the child of humblest origins as for the most affluent. The facts, however, are otherwise.
> To be born poor in Canada does not make it a certainty that you will live poor and die poor—but it makes it very likely . . . The tax system and the income security system together determine the patterns of income redistribution in this country. The changes that are made in these systems as a result of the present federal provincial review—

And I might add the tax reform proposals:

> —will affect the lives of every one of Canada's poor kids. New programs that are adequate to raise Canada's poverty families out of poverty will transform the futures of these poor kids. Inadequate programs will leave them facing the grim prospects that mark the landscape of their lives today.

It is essential that we as a society pay far more attention in terms of resources for these children. They do not have a vote. They cannot speak in the House. Surely it is incumbent upon each and every Member of the House to recognize our obligations to the children of the country.

I should like to make another point before turning to some of the changes made in the legislative committee. The Government announced over a year ago that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) would shortly be announcing the appointment of a special adviser on child sexual abuse to co-ordinate activities at the federal level. The Badgley Commission recommended strongly that there must be a high level co-ordinator—indeed, Badgley recommended a co-ordinator attached to the Prime Minister's Office—to co-ordinate government activities at the federal level in the area of child abuse. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that the special adviser would receive advice from a small committee of regional advisers who would bring forward ideas from different parts of the country and so on.

That commitment was made on January 10 of last year, over a year ago, and we are still waiting for the Government to live up to the promise it made to appoint that special adviser to take the kind of co-ordinating action so desperately needed across Canada.

The legislation before the House, Bill C-15, before the House was significantly improved by the work of the legislative committee that studied it. I would like to touch on two or three of the areas that I believe major changes were made to improve the Bill.

Perhaps the most important element of the legislation is the extent to which children are able to tell their stories in court and relate to the court in a manner in an and environment which is not threatening to them the experience they went through. The current provisions of the Criminal Code deny them that right. As the Canadian Council on Children and Youth stated, the fundamental and important element of the Bill is the degree to which victims of child sexual abuse have the opportunity to tell their stories in court. The original proposals did not clearly facilitate children telling their stories in court.

I am very pleased, Mr. Speaker, that the committee made important changes in this area of the legislation. Now, instead of there being a test of sufficient intelligence, which were the words used in the Bill, the sole test will be the ability of that child to communicate his or her story to the court. If necessary, the courts may want to use devices to assist children, anatomically correct dolls, for example. The courts may wish to use art work. The committee heard from a psychotherapist who demonstrated how children can tell their stories through art. That may be another avenue of approach.

Another important change made to the legislation was the change with respect to the actual giving of evidence. In the Bill as presented to the House there was provision for the accused to be removed from the courtroom. There was strong criticism of that and the committee came up with a compromise. We recognized that a child or a young witness can be intimidated by the presence of the person who is alleged to have abused them. We said we would not remove the accused from the courtroom, but we would allow for arrangements to be made for children to give their evidence in a manner in which they do not have to directly confront the accused. That compromise was important, and one which I am pleased the committee adopted.

The provisions with respect to the substantive offences, namely, the provisions with respect to the offences created for the sexual abuse of children were also significantly changed. What the committee had to wrestle with was, on the one hand, a clear concern that young children should be in any way exploited because of their age and exploited in a sexual way. On the other hand, we had to recognize the reality that teenagers do engage in sexual activity and do indeed engage in sexual exploration. The Bill as it was drafted did not recognize that reality.

The committee said that where teenagers are engaged in consensual activity, and there is an age difference of less than two years, that behaviour will not be the subject of criminal sanction. Again, I believe that was an important change to the legislation.

There does remain a weakness with respect to one element of the legislation, namely, the failure of the legislative committee to respond to virtually every witness who appeared before the committee, whether it be the Canadian Council on Children and Youth, the Canadian Psychological Association, the Teachers Federation or the Attorney General of the Conservative Province of Saskatchewan, who called upon the Government to establish a uniform age of consent for all sexual activity. That recommendation was made some time ago by the special committee on equality rights, recognizing that the current provisions of the Criminal Code and, indeed, this Bill as it has been reported, does discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

As well, and perhaps just as serious, is the fact that the Bill would subject teenagers to lengthy terms of imprisonment for engaging in consensual sexual activity, which is not the subject of criminal sanction elsewhere. It is regrettable that the legislative committee refused to recognize the concerns raised in this area by virtually every witness who appeared before the committee, and to move forward on amendments in this area of the legislation as well.

Finally, I am pleased to note that one of the amendments adopted was a provision building in a review mechanism. I believe it was the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) who proposed this amendment. It is one that we welcomed and supported. We are embarked in major changes in this area of the law. There is no question about that. To the extent that this review process is built into the Bill, it is essential that the Department of Justice carefully monitor the implementation of this legislation in order that we as parliamentarians may be in a position to conduct the review properly at the time it comes, some three or four years from now.

It is clear, beyond doubt, that we have significantly improved the law in Canada with respect to children who have been victims of sexual abuse. It is vitally important that we now turn our attention to the scandalous lack of resources to deal with children who are victims of child abuse, sexual abuse and with those who perpetrate these terrible acts, as well as the adult survivors of abuse. I would call upon this Parliament and this Government to work toward, as our next priority, an end to the scandalous underfunding in this area and to recognize that we have no greater obligation than to assure Canada's children that they will grow up in an environment free from all forms of abuse, including poverty, neglect, hunger, homelessness as well as that of physical and sexual abuse.

We in our Party welcome the proposals and we will be continuing to call, as my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) has called for for some time now, for effective action in the other areas that I have mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

• (1210)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the deputy government House Leader if he would now be prepared to deal with government Order No. 9, the amendment to the Constitution Act dealing with the Pentecostal Assemblies.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to deal with the motion which was suggested that we put to the House earlier today, but I believe that if we could deal expeditiously with Bill C-41 which I think there is a disposition to do, we could then move immediately to government Order No. 9 to which my friend refers.

JUDGES ACT, FEDERAL COURT ACT, TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-41, an Act to amend the Judges Act, the Federal Court Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for Mr. Hnatyshyn) moved that Bill C-41, as amended, be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for Mr. Hnatyshyn) moved that the Bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Briefly, if I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind Hon. Members of the main features of Bill C-41, an Act to amend the Judges Act, the Federal Court Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Bill C-41 makes four major amendments to these acts. First, it substitutes the industrial aggregate for the industrial composite with respect to the formula established under Section 19.1 of the Judges Act to calculate the annual indexation of the salary of judges. As Hon. Members would know, the industrial composite is no longer published and Statistics Canada officials have recommended that it be replaced by the industrial aggregate.

Second, it sets at 75 the retirement age of all federally appointed judges, in keeping with the requirements of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms Section 15. At the present time, county and district court judges as well as Federal Court and Tax Court judges must retire at 70, whereas all other federally appointed judges may continue to hold office until age 75.

Third, it makes a correlative amendment to the provisions concerning a judge who elects to be supernumerary. A judge who so decides may accept a lighter caseload and still be entitled to the same salary and the same benefits. Henceforth all judges will have two options: act as supernumeraries after having attained seventy years of age if they have held judicial office for at least ten years, or after having attained age 65 if they have held judicial office for at least fifteen years. The latter option is now the only one open to judges who must retire at age 70.

And, fourth, it provides that district and county court judges will hold office in the same capacity as their colleagues who sit on provincial superior courts, the Federal Court, or the Supreme Court of Canada. In future all these judges may be removed only by the Governor General on address of the Senate and the House of Commons. Pursuant to Charter Section 15, the Bill is intended to promote equality among federally appointed judges. It does not seem normal that people we have chosen to implement the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms on our behalf should continue to be subject to a different removal procedure and different rules concerning retirement. Mr. Speaker, these are the main amendments contained in this measure. Hopefully the Bill will now pass the third reading stage immediately.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the House that we were prepared to go through the three stages the first time this bill was introduced in the House. These are rather technical changes which are nevertheless important for judges.

First of all, we have adopted an indexation system for judges' salaries in line with the other types of indexation within the Public service, but independently.

Also, we had to chose between ages 70 and 75 as retirement age, because there were two before, one for a category of judges appointed by the Federal Government and the other for the other categories. We have chosen age 75 and, personally, I am quite satisfied, considering the possibility for earlier retirement and the supernumerary judges status which is also provided for in the legislation.

So, we are going to change . . .

[English]

There is an important change in the tenure of judges of the County and District Courts and Tax Courts to make for more similarity in the different categories of appointed federal judges. With all of these changes, we are in agreement.

I would like to use the occasion of a reference to the tenure and status of judges to remark on the commitment expressed by the Government to appoint more female judges. I would express my satisfaction at the recent appointment of the second female judge to the Supreme Court of Canada. We in the Official Opposition are very pleased with that and we look forward to having more women represented in the judiciary in Canada.

In general, we are in favour of all of the amendments and are looking forward to seeing the Bill passed today and sent to the Senate. We hope that it will be entered into before the summer break.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the occasion of the third reading of Bill C-41 to briefly indicate our support for the legislation and to take this opportunity to raise a couple of points that I believe are of concern, points with respect to the judiciary and the process of the appointment of judges in Canada.

Over a year ago, the then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), made a commitment. He recognized that the current system for the appointment of the judiciary in Canada was not satisfactory, was not good enough. The Canadian Bar Association had established a special committee which found that there were serious weaknesses in the judicial appointment process in Canada. It found that in a number of provinces partisan political considerations played a major role in the appointment of judges. Naturally, this tends to bring the judiciary and the process of the appointment of judges under a cloud, particularly in those provinces in which this is the case.

That commitment was made by the then Minister of Justice well over a year ago. The Government has still not moved on it. The Hon. Member for St. John's West, who is now the Minister of Transport, made that promise in February of 1986. His successor as Minister of Justice made a similar promise to the Canadian Bar Association in March of this year. He said that changes would be made to the judicial appointments process very soon.

Mr. Speaker, I see again in the House the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Gérin) and I know quite well that he will agree when I say that we need fundamental changes in the way Canadian judges are appointed. Mr. Speaker, I must recognize that the Hon. Member has used high pressure tactics with the Government and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to force the Government to keep its promises. Unfortunately, the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin) has not yet succeeded, together with his colleagues, in making sure that the Government will keep its promises.

Mr. Speaker, I know that there are a great many Quebec Conservative Members who want changes. There was an election quite recently, and the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) nearly won. He almost succeeded, but the forces of the Conservative establishment managed to overcome. But it sent a very serious message to the Government.

You should hear the voices of Quebec Conservative Members when they ask for basic changes for instance in political party contributions and especially the system for appointing judges.

• (1220)

I commend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Gérin), but I also ask him why the Government turned a deaf ear not only to him and his colleagues from Quebec, but to the Canadian Bar as well. They said it is about time we cleaned up the appointment system. I hope the Government will finally keep its promise and bring forward changes to that system.

I also want to take this opportunity to call upon the Government to move forward quickly with the establishment of a judicial education centre. Given the responsibilities of our judiciary with respect to the Charter of Rights, it is very important that they update their knowledge of how they impact on women, native people and minorities. Certainly a judicial education centre would go a long way towards fulfilling that important need.

It is also very important that the Government take further steps to ensure that our judiciary reflect the multicultural reality of Canada. There should be far more women, representatives of visible minorities and natives appointed as judges. Yes, the Government has taken some steps in this direction but it should be taking far more. It should do so by consultation with those individuals and groups who have knowledge and expertise in this area with respect to establishing a new system. That is the spirit in which I call upon the Government to make changes in the process.

Finally, a word about judges' salaries. The Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General recently adopted, by a split vote, a motion approving the recommendations made by the special committee struck to look into remuneration of judges. That special committee was chaired by Donald Guthrie. It recommended very substantial increases. We recognize that the judiciary must be well paid. But I said in committee, and I say again today, that the proposal was excessive. We are not prepared to co-operate in the passage of legislation that would dramatically increase judges' remuneration as proposed in that report. Judges' salaries were increased very significantly just recently and they are indexed to the cost of living. Each year they receive an increase, as do Members of Parliament. I do not believe a case has been made for the kind of lavish increases proposed.

We are told there are lawyers who actually turn down appointments to the Bench because they will not make enough money. The average salary of a federally-appointed judge is something like $105,000 a year. They have one of the most generous pension plans in the country. They have the prestige and status that comes with an appointment to the Bench. They do not have the pressures of operating a law practice. I think they are adequately compensated, certainly comparable to judges in countries like Britain, the U.S. and elsewhere. I do not want a judge on the Bench who is motivated solely by the desire for more money. If a lawyer is going to say he or she is not prepared to accept $105,000, he or she wants $120,000 or $130,000, I do not want that man or women on the Bench. I want judges there who will serve, having recognized the honour the appointment brings.

One other point with respect to judicial pensions. The current provisions of the judicial pension scheme do not provide for a partial pension after judges have served on the Bench for at least 10 years. One recommendation made by the Guthrie committee that we should look very closely at is that judges who have served for 10 or more years but fewer than 15 receive a retroactive pension. I believe this provision should be made retroactive so that those judges, such as former Justice Thomas Berger, who have performed such a distinguished service for the country on the Bench, will not be denied the pension they have rightly earned.

In conclusion, I am pleased to have had the opportunity on third reading of this legislation to raise these concerns, particularly with respect to the failure of the Government to move forward on changes to the appointment process. I would hope that before June 30 the Government will respond to the very strong representations made by the Bar Association and les réformistes dans le caucus conservateur du Québec, and that we will see the changes the Government promised.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982 (NEWFOUNDLAND ACT)

PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved:

April 27, 1987—The following proposed motion:

WHEREAS section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

NOW THEREFORE the House of Commons resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. (1) Section 3 of the Newfoundland Act is renumbered as subsection 3(1).

(2) Section 3 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) A reference to this Act, or a reference to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to this Act, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto."

The Constitution

2. (1) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is renumbered as Term 17(1).

(2) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following:

"(2) For the purposes of paragraph one of this Term, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland have in Newfoundland all the same rights and privileges with respect to denominational schools and denominational colleges as any other class or classes of persons had by law in Newfoundland at the date of Union, and the words "all such schools" in paragraph (a) of paragraph one of this Term and the words "all such colleges" in paragraph (b) of paragraph one of this Term include, respectively, the schools and the colleges of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland."

3. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, year of proclamation (Newfoundland Act).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of significant importance to the people of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and in particular the adherents of the Pentecostal faith in that province. According to StatsCan reports, there are 37,450 such adherents in my province. That could easily have doubled by this time because their number is expanding rapidly.

The purpose of this resolution is to enshrine the educational rights of the people of the Pentecostal faith in my province in the Constitution. In other words, to entrench in the Constitution the right of the Pentecostal Assemblies in Newfoundland and Labrador to operate schools and receive a share of public funds for that purpose. They have had that right in provincial legislation since I think 1954. However, that right was not enshrined in the Constitution because, of course, it had not been recognized in 1949 when we became part of Canada. It has not been covered by Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada.

The educational system of Newfoundland is denominational. This is based on our historic experience in Newfoundland. Education was first provided by various religious bodies. We have had a denominational educational system throughout our history and it continues today. I venture the opinion that this system is favoured by the vast majority of the people of Newfoundland.

At this time we have three educational systems. The first is the integrated system which is comprised primarily of the people of the Anglican faith, the United Church of Canada, and the Salvation Army. That system is operated by the Integrated Educational Council, the President of which is the Reverend Ian Wishart of St. John's. We have the Catholic Education Council which is headed by His Grace Archbishop Penney which looks after the schools of the Roman Catholic denomination in Newfoundland. Finally, we have the Pentecostal Educational Council, the head of which is Pastor Roy King, which looks after the Pentecostal schools in Newfoundland.

In the opinion of those who are knowledgeable in these matters, all three of these bodies are doing fine work in administering our schools. The funding, for the most part, is public funding from the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. In addition, as in all educational systems, a great deal of time and effort is expended free of charge by the ministers, priests and nuns of the churches which I have mentioned. I think they are all to be congratulated for this public service and they deserve our support.

If the House passes this resolution, as I am sure it will, this will be a very significant day for the people of the Pentecostal faith in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. The resolution would authorize Her Excellency the Governor General to issue a proclamation which will amend Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the Newfoundland Act.

It is a historic occasion also because this resolution proposes the adoption of the first amendment to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada. The resolution has been put forth at the request of the Government of Newfoundland, as you might well imagine, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada are part and parcel of the Canadian Constitution, but they apply only to the province of Newfoundland. So, under Section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada can only be amended by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate, the House of Commons and the Newfoundland Legislative Assembly.

[English]

This resolution affects the Canadian Constitution only as it applies to Newfoundland and it originates with the Government of Newfoundland. On April 10 the House of Assembly of Newfoundland adopted a resolution to amend Term 17 in terms identical to those now before the House.

The Government of Canada is happy to assist the Government of the Province of Newfoundland to achieve these objectives in a manner which basically falls within the jurisdiction of Newfoundland. Education is a matter under the jurisdiction of the Province. We are helping the Government of Newfoundland to rectify a situation which it considers inequitable.

Not only does the Government of Newfoundland consider it inequitable. I, Members of our Party and, I am sure, other Members in the House of Commons consider this situation to be inequitable and will be happy to join us in ensuring that Pentecostal people are treated in exactly the same manner as are those who belong to other denominations in the province. An inequality exists because the educational rights of the Pentecostal Assemblies are not yet constitutionally guaranteed. I mentioned the number of people who are affected by that. There are quite likely in excess of 37,400 at the present time.

Through this measure we are enshrining in the Constitution the equality of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland with the other recognized religious groups which enjoy status now on educational matters under Term 17 of the Terms of Union.

As a historical footnote, Mr. Speaker, at the time of union in 1949, there were seven denominations specifically authorized by the law of Newfoundland to operate denominational schools and entitled to share in public funds for that purpose. These were the Anglican, Roman Catholic, United, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, the Salvation Army and the Seventh Day Adventists. Term 17 entrenched these rights as they existed at the time of union and with respect to the denominations then enjoying those rights.

Term 17 of the Terms of Union was a substitute for Section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, as it ratified the adoption of the system of denominational schools in Newfoundland. I will not read that section. Anyone who wishes may look at Term 17 of the Terms of Union.

After union in 1954, the Pentecostal Assemblies were recognized under provincial law as being organized for educational purposes. They have been treated that way ever since but have not had the protection of Term 17 for the reasons I mentioned. There is a continuing desire by the Pentecostal Assemblies to be put in a position constitutionally similar to that of other recognized school-operating denominations, hence the resolution now before the House.

You will see that the main provision of the resolution aims at amending Term 17 and provides:

> (2) For the purposes of paragraph one of this Term, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland have in Newfoundland all the same rights and privileges with respect to denominational schools and denominational colleges as any other class or classes of persons had by law in Newfoundland at the date of Union, and the words "all such schools" in paragraph (a) of paragraph one of this Term and the words "all such colleges" in paragraph (b) of paragraph one of this Term include, respectively, the schools and the colleges of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland.

This will, of course, give them the same constitutional rights as now held by the other recognized denominations.

In order to take into account the proposed amendment, the resolution also proposes that Section 3 of the Newfoundland Act be amended to provide:

> (2) A reference to this Act, or a reference to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to this Act, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto.

The proposed amendment does not purport to create new rights for the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland, but to entrench those rights which they already have with respect to education under provincial law. Once again, the amendment does not alter the rights which students belonging to any unrecognized group have under the law of Newfoundland to attend Pentecostal schools.

I am sure that Members of the House, regardless of their political affiliation, will recognize the importance of this amendment requested by the Province of Newfoundland. I am also convinced that they will join forces with us in helping Newfoundland achieve its objectives in a matter which falls under its jurisdiction. I spoke to Premier Peckford this morning and told him that we would be debating this matter today. I believe that with the consent of the opposition Parties we will pass this resolution through all stages today.

It has been a distinct honour and privilege to move this on behalf of the Pentecostal people of Newfoundland. I see the Members for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), Bonavista—Trinity—Conception (Mr. Johnson) and Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) here to support this motion.

• (1240)

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and privilege for me to respond to the remarks of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie). Let me say at the outset that it is this Party's position that, while normally amendments to the Constitution would go through the House and to the committee, because this is an important measure and indeed has been before the public since 1971, we intend to dispense with those steps and pass this motion at all stages in the House today.

This is indeed an historic day for the Pentecostal Assemblies in Newfoundland and it is significant that we have with us in the galleries on this historic day the head of the Pentecostal Church in Newfoundland, Pastor Roy King.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: I know that on behalf of his people he is watching with interest this historic occasion.

As the Minister of Transport has said, churches in Newfoundland have operated schools from the beginning and continue to do so. We have a unique system of education in Canada, possibly in the world, as adequately documented by a distinguished colleague in the other place, Senator Fred Rowe.

At the time of Confederation in 1949 the denominational system of education was enshrined in the Terms of Union because Newfoundlanders wanted to retain a spiritual base to the kind of education that went on in our schools. We still believe that is very important.

We have lived close to the sea. Perhaps it is the sea and our experiences with the sea that have shown us that there is a higher power in this world and there is a spiritual force that we do not necessarily understand but feel. Our people have always believed very strongly in that and have indeed been a strongly religious people.

The Pentecostal schools began in 1954 in Newfoundland. Since then, they have grown and prospered as denominational schools in our province. I think today particularly of some pastors whom I have known who served in my constituency. I think of Pastor William Gillette, who stopped on the northern peninsula of Newfoundland to establish churches on his way to Labrador. He went to places like Postville, Charlottetown, and Port Hope Simpson not only to establish churches but to make sure there were schools for the children.

Today, the Pentecostal Assemblies operate some of the most modern, efficient and progressive schools in the province. Those men are to be congratulated because they took the Bible seriously when it said, "Go ye into all the world, even unto the remotest parts". They are to be congratulated for bringing to those remote places and all places in Newfoundland not only the three Rs but a spiritual context for education.

The largest Pentecostal Assembly in Newfoundland is in Windsor, in my riding. I know they will welcome this amendment today. I say in concert with all my Newfoundland colleagues in the House that today we owe the Pentecostal Assemblies not simply thanks but praise for the work they have done in the spiritual dimension of our province, and indeed in education in our province. It is an honour and privilege for me to say that I agree with the Minister of Transport that this is a historic day for them and that we should pass this motion very speedily.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when I made my intervention a few moments ago when the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis) read the motion concerning this resolution, I was quite frankly thinking about the previous attempts that have been made in this chamber and the Newfoundland House of Assembly to pass this resolution.

I can recall twenty years ago the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) being in the Newfoundland Legislature when the original resolution was passed. It came up again in the provincial legislature after the Minister of Transport had departed, I believe, in the form of a resolution to Ottawa.

It then came to the House of Commons in Ottawa some 17 years ago. Each time it died on the Order Paper. That is why I was a bit harsh with the Parliamentary Secretary when he read the motion. I do not believe anyone understood the motion he was reading and it sounded so complicated that I thought perhaps this resolution would leave the chamber, go to a committee, and probably never see the light of day again.

I understand that there is an agreement to put this resolution through today so that we will accomplish what so many people had tried before.

I can only reiterate what has already been said. The Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland have been left out of that aspect of recognition that is needed under the Constitution. They are probably the most active force in education today in Newfoundland. Vocational Bible school is in full swing in various parts of Newfoundland. Children from all denominations are attending VBS. Even when the school year is over, the Pentecostal Assemblies are still active in every part of Newfoundland and Labrador. As the Minister of Transport pointed out, they are becoming more active every day.

I do not want to delay this resolution any longer. I will be watching very carefully and will not leave the chamber until the Minister of Transport puts it through as he said he would. I do not know what the NDP will do, but they better not hold it up. I include the Official Opposition as well. In other words, there have been many attempts to put this through before. Let us settle it today. While that was not the original motion put forward, I imagine it was the intent of the motion put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader. I shall resume my seat and watch as the motion is put through the House. If any other item comes up, I will filibuster until we return to this motion and put it through.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, that is always a tough act to follow, but I want to say how pleased I am that we have been able to persuade the Liberal Members of Parliament to back down and allow this very important resolution to go through the House today. I know there was some initial reluctance on the part of the Liberals and that they perhaps wanted to talk for a couple of hours, but we in the New Democratic Party consulted with them and reminded the Liberals that it took their Government some 17 years to produce absolutely nothing.

I have consulted carefully with my colleagues in Newfoundland, including such eminent people as Jack Harris, the very distinguished labour lawyer from St. John's East, who incidentally happens to be our candidate in the federal by-election there. Mr. Harris has indicated to us that he very much regrets that for decades there was silence and inaction on this very important resolution on the part of the previous Liberal Government. I am glad we were able to persuade the Liberals to agree today to allow this motion to go through.

As another Member said, normally when dealing with a constitutional amendment, we would want to have some study, have it go to committee and allow witnesses to make their views known. That would be the normal course of action on a constitutional amendment. However, we have agreed in the spirit of non-partisan co-operation, after many years, that the resolution should go forth today.

I must confess some personal bias in this matter. I was adopted by a very distinguished elderly Haida woman who herself happens to be a loyal and faithful Pentecostal. She has tried hard to persuade me of the virtues of that particular religion.

Mr. Baker: It is never too late.

Mr. Robinson: And as my colleague from the Liberal Party says, it is never too late. At the time of the Union in 1949, seven denominations were specifically authorized by law to operate schools and to share in public funds. The Pentecostal Church has played a very active role in Newfoundland. I am told that Pentecostals in fact constitute some 10 per cent of the population of that province.

Obviously, we are not in a position to make any fundamental amendments with respect to the denominational school system itself. Certainly strong and powerful arguments can be made that in Canada today the school system should be a public school system from one ocean to the other, but we are not in a position today to make those arguments. We believe that the school boards in Newfoundland should be elected and accountable to the people and to the communities, and we hope that will come to pass as well.

I want to reiterate that, because this resolution is merely attempting to put in place a recognition of a historical reality, and the fact that there have been many years of Liberal neglect, a failure to move forward on this, we in the spirit of non-partisan co-operation agree to the adoption of this resolution today in all stages.

Mr. Morrissey Johnson (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise to support the amendments to Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada. I am sure we all realize that it is difficult when drafting legislation to draft it in such a manner as to take care of all the problems which might arise down through the years.

I believe we also realize that for some number of years since 1954, an inequality has existed with regard to the Pentecostal school system in Newfoundland. Although it has been granted rights by the Province of Newfoundland and has received equal treatment in funding from that province, it has not experienced the same constitutional rights as other denominations. With passage of the amendment to Term 17, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland will in fact come into the Canadian Constitution with the same equality in education as other denominations and will have its rights enshrined in the Constitution.

I realize that all Parties have consented to quick passage of this amendment. I want to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) for moving the resolution. Indeed, today will be a historic day for the people of the Pentecostal faith in the Province of Newfoundland. I am sure this is a time for them to be proud of being Canadians and it is time for all of us to realize how fortunate we are to live in a country which encourages freedom of religion and not religious discrimination.

I am pleased by the fact that all Parties represented in the House have agreed to give this resolution quick passage. It shows that we want to see the inequality corrected and to have enshrined in the Constitution of Canada the equal rights of the Pentecostal Assemblies with that of other denominations in the Province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the progress we have made this morning, I think you will find it agreeable to call it one o'clock.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 1 p.m., I do now leave the Chair until 2 p.m. this day.

At 12.57 p.m. the House took recess.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, La sexualité blessée, a study published by the provincial shelter association, makes a number of horrifying revelations on sexual abuse in the home. The results of this study clearly demonstrate the link between pornography and violent sexual behaviour.

Eighty-three per cent of the women interviewed admitted they had been sexually abused by their spouse or partner; 66.3 per cent said that sexual relations were never an occasion for love and affection, while 61 per cent talked about sexuality as a painful and humiliating experience.

The study also found that three out of four of the men who were the spouses or partners imitate certain situations shown in videos, magazines, and other pornographic material.

The study will help the staff of the shelters improve their assistance to these women, by taking all their needs into consideration. When people talk about violence, they think in terms of battered women, fractured arms and cheekbones. They will not admit this violence goes further to intrude on a couple's most intimate moments.

The Quebec Minister of Health and Social Services has taken a step in the right direction by allocating $7.4 million to help the shelters.

We are waiting to hear what the Conservative Government will do about the problem. It is time it took the lead instead of following the example set by others as is the case among certain provincial governments.

OPPOSITION TO ULTIMATE PENALTY

Mr. Fernand Ladouceur (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, in 1976 the Canadian Government wrote a major chapter in its history by abolishing the death penalty, thereby showing the whole world that ours was a very civilized country that wanted to use its intellect to find ways of combatting violence, and that it respected human life.

In a few days we will be informed of the outcome of this debate on capital punishment, and I sincerely hope it will be another step forward for Canada in its fight against inequity and violence.

Mr. Speaker, I am definitely opposed to the reinstatement of capital punishment. To me it constitutes a violation of our right to life. It is cruel, inhuman and, deprading punishment and a form of revenge. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it is against the principles by which I live.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

CALL FOR ENTRENCHMENT IN CONSTITUTION

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, shortly after the failure of the First Ministers' conference on aboriginal constitutional rights I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) what the Government of Canada intended to do about the "burden of failure", to quote the Prime Minister, which had been placed upon the first citizens of Canada.

The Prime Minister has since taken credit for a constitutional Accord which virtually ignores the aspirations of aboriginal people. He is reported as having said that this chapter in Canadian history is closed and that the Government will not be considering amendments.

The Prime Minister should indicate when the Government intends to start on the process of resolving the outstanding injustice of the exclusion of aboriginal self-government rights from the Constitution. After all, it was he who told the House that "this failure was a moral obligation that has been unfulfilled by Canada, by the federal Government".

The Prime Minister knows that his Government is allowing funding for aboriginal constitutional research to expire at the end of this month. Without such funding the experts will have to be laid off—indeed, many of them have now received their notices. It will be impossible for the national aboriginal organizations to provide not only the proper input to the hearings on the Meech Lake Accord but to continue the process of aboriginal constitutional development.

REINSTATEMENT SUPPORTED FOR FIRST DEGREE MURDER

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I support the death penalty for murderers convicted beyond the shadow of a doubt of deliberately planning and killing another human being.

Abolitionists who use Donald Marshall as an example of executing the wrong person are misleading the people as he was convicted on circumstantial evidence only. Under this motion he would in no way be executed. When they say a court is committing murder when a judge sentences a first degree murderer to die, is complete folly. It is tantamount to saying that a judge is a thief when he convicts a person of stealing. Such wild statements undermine our whole system of justice which is based on appropriate punishment for crimes committed.

Capital punishment is not a matter of revenge or statistics. Some can prove or disprove anything with figures. Executing a murderer like Olson, for example, is not half as repugnant as was the raping and clubbing to death of young boys and girls, or forcing a beautiful young girl like Kelly Cook to do "God knows what" and then chaining her to rocks and sinking her to the bottom of a lake.

If we claim to be civilized it is time to think more about the innocent people murdered, the victims and their loved ones, and less about the murderers. Christ showed compassion, but he did not stop the execution of a man whose crime was far less than that of a cold-blooded murderer.

URGENT NEED TO APPOINT MEDIATOR

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, this Conservative Government is stupidly destroying six years of efforts at reconciliation between the postal administration and the postal unions. The former Liberal Government had realized the need to trust employee representatives and postal administrators and to let them settle themselves their own labour disputes; the new Conservative Government has absolutely refused to go along with this.

The Conservative Government has kicked out the union officials who used to sit on the board of directors and replaced such top executives as Michael Warren and René Marin who knew Canada Post very well and who had a demonstrated capacity to administer this Crown Corporation effectively without any risk of strike action. This Conservative Government has introduced again the shadow of the Treasury Board in all administrative decisions involving Canada Post and especially in collective bargaining.

The responsible Minister allows PMO's assistants and a group of Conservative backbenchers to have more influence on Canada Post than the members of the board.

All of this is stupid, and the Government is reaping today what it has sown: it is responsible for this mess. It is therefore urgent for a mediator to be appointed as soon as possible to diffuse the situation. The Government is responsible for the violence, thereby demonstrating either its incompetence or its irresponsibility.

DEMAND THAT SCABS NOT BE USED IN ABITIBI DURING STRIKE

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): For the past several days, Mr. Speaker, the postal service in Canada has been severely perturbed by rotating strikes organized by the Letter Carriers' Union.

Postal workers and letter carriers are very popular in Abitibi, for they are reliable representatives and play a very important social role in this far away region. The letter carrier is often the only person who visits lonely people and senior citizens. And he or she will often intervene immediately when someone is ill or helpless.

Ever since the conflict started, Canada Post has treated its employees very badly. It has used scabs. Mr. Speaker, I warn the President of Canada Post and his officials not to use this kind of repulsive tactic in Abitibi, for it could cause the conflict to deteriorate even more and poison the working climate for quite a long time.

The Canada Post Corporation should honor the Quebec legislation which forbids the hiring of scabs in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to send this message today to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSION

REJECTION OF RECOMMENDATION THAT VANCOUVER RETAIN FIVE SEATS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the unanimous recommendations of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure, and the support of the Mayor and Council of Vancouver, the support of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) here, and in Victoria, the support of the Premiere of British Columbia and that of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), the Hon. Member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), and the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney), for five seats for the city of Vancouver, the Electoral Boundaries Commission rejected that recommendation, thus rejecting the views of the people of Vancouver.

The city of Vancouver is a growing city, not a city that is losing population.

Let me quote what the Electoral Boundaries Commission said:

> —members may more easily serve compact constituencies, where government services are readily available, than they can serve scattered and mountainous rural ridings.

Rural ridings have problems, but they are different from those of the urban riding. In my riding we had 2,600 new Canadians last year, compared to 200 in other ridings. There are problems in the inner cities for MPs. MPs have to be ombudsmen. They have to fight for the people of their ridings in such areas as health, prostitution, crime, government bureaucracy problems, immigration problems, and so on.

This is a wrong decision. It is a sloppy decision and is ill-conceived. It really does not serve the interests of the people of Vancouver.

EXTERNAL AID

THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES—HUMANITY FUND ESTABLISHED BY CANADIAN SECTION OF UNITED STEEL WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the Humanity Fund established recently by the Canadian section of the United Steel Workers of America is an innovative approach to providing humanitarian aid to people in poverty-stricken Third World countries.

Members can volunteer to have a one cent an hour check-off made from their pay cheques. If all 160,000 union members agree to this, about $3 million would be raised annually, and it is likely that these private funds would be matched on a three-to-one ratio by government agencies.

These steel workers deserve our appreciation for their initiative. It is noteworthy that other labour organizations, such as the Confederation of National Trade Unions in Quebec, are endorsing similar aid programs.

KOREA—PLEA FOR PRAYERS FOR PRISONERS OF CONSCIENCE

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, last week I received a letter from Shim Sang-Wan, a Korean student, whom I met four years ago in company with a number of clergy and professors of Korea who had been jailed for organizing unions.

When I heard he had been jailed in March, I wrote to him and received a letter back from him which reads in part:

> I would like to extend my gratitude to you for your warm concern and prayer about my imprisonment.
> I was imprisoned on March 3 on account of my participation in a rally protesting against a student's torture-death incident. But not so long, I was released on March 30 under suspension of prosecution, and resumed my work at the Christian Institute for the Study of Justice and Development. This is thanks to the solidarity actions and prayers of many friends in and abroad, I think.

DISASTERS

SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF AIR INDIA CRASH—PROSECUTION OF PERPETRATORS URGED

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians can all too readily remember the horrifying explosion which occurred on Air India flight 182 on June 23, 1985, two years ago today. Three hundred and twenty-nine innocent men, women, and children perished because some deranged person or persons placed a bomb on the plane before it left Canada.

I was in Ireland this time last year with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark). We participated in a benediction of a special memorial on the seaside of Dunmanus Bay, 200 miles from the site where flight 182 plunged into the cold, grey Atlantic Ocean.

I can still remember the grief in the eyes and the hearts of the more than 200 relatives from India and Canada who were at that extremely emotional service.

Many walked to the shores of Dunmanus Bay and waded into the sea, in a sense to be closer to their relatives. Some placed flower petals in the sea and watched the flowers drift outward toward the site of the crash.

Moments like this should galvanize the Government's resolve to find and prosecute the individuals responsible. Also, special studies such as the one initiated by Senator Kelly on terrorism may help to prevent soul destroying incidents like this in the future.

DISASTERS

SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF AIR INDIA CRASH—CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, today marks the second anniversary of one of the saddest moments in Canadian history. On June 23, 1985, 329 men, women, and children, most of whom were Canadian citizens, perished when flight 182 was blown out of the sky off the coast of Ireland by a terrorist bomb. It was the largest and most hideous mass murder ever in Canadian history. All Canadians were shocked by the unspeakable brutality of this terrorist act. We mourn the loss of so many of our fellow countrymen, and we share the sorrow of the surviving family members.

We owe it to the victims and relatives of the Air India tragedy to bring those responsible for this vicious crime to justice. It has been two years now, and charges have not yet been laid. All Canadians have a right to know why this investigation was so badly bungled by the RCMP, the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, and the Government itself.

The time for dithering has passed. We cannot tolerate any more excuses or delays. The Government of Canada has a moral responsibility to establish a royal commission of inquiry into the Air India disaster.

The Irish Government and the Indian Government have both had their public inquiries. We need a public inquiry here in Canada, not only to investigate this terrorist act but also to inquire into the conduct of the Government itself.

AIRPORTS

CONSTRUCTION OF THIRD TERMINAL AT LESTER B. PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, last week as a preamble to a question I attempted to tell the House how the great riding of Mississauga North had benefited under Conservative policies since 1984. Last year $1.1 billion in building permits were issued in Mississauga North. We have a 2 per cent unemployment rate, and we have 7,000 thriving businesses in the riding.

Now, to continue the saga, the announcement was made yesterday for the building of the third terminal at Lester B. Pearson International Airport. This project will cost $365 million and is financed by the private sector. Involving the private sector in the financing and operation of such a major airport capital project is a new approach for Transport Canada.

In 1963, when Terminal One was built, it was designed to accommodate 3.5 million passengers. In 1986 it handled 8.4 million passengers. This new facility is scheduled to be partially operational by 1989 and will include shopping plazas, office complexes, and a 500-room hotel.

It is just another Conservative success story. Mississauga North thanks the Government.

DISASTERS

SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF AIR INDIA CRASH—DELAYS IN INVESTIGATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, today, the second anniversary of the tragic death of 329 Canadians in the Air India crash, we in the New Democratic caucus join in extending to the families of these victims our very sincere condolences. At the same time we want to register our concern at the lengthy delays in the investigation of this matter. Surely we owe it to the families of these victims to ensure that justice is done speedily.

In this regard I want to note our concern that the RCMP officer who was responsible for the investigation in British Columbia has been given another assignment. It is not acceptable in an investigation of this importance that there should be this kind of stalling and delay.

As well, the failure to move forward quickly on this casts quite an unfair cloud over the Sikh community itself. The community is a law-abiding community with an honourable tradition in Canada. It is totally unacceptable that there should be the kinds of blanket accusations that have been made in some quarters concerning that community. The Sikh community itself in Canada joins with all Members of this House, I am sure, in calling upon the Government to renew its commitment to pursuing justice in this very important area.

We owe no less to the families of the victims than to ensure that at last action is taken with respect to this very serious matter.

> We, of La femme et la gestion de la ferme, are vigorously opposed to the proposal announced last week in the House by the Minister of Defence to spend $184 billion on submarines to kill people. If the Government has so much money to spend wastefully on means to destroy human beings, why not allocate more to agriculture? Do you realize everything that could be done in agriculture with only half this amount? We could feed all of Canada for nothing. I hope that you send a copy of this letter to Mr. Mulroney.

NEW TAX

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and concerns the tax reform.

Canadians are beginning to realize that the tax reform unveiled by the Minister last Thursday comes complete with a Trojan horse, that the Trojan horse bears bad news and is full of surprises. Among other things hidden in this Trojan horse there is the sales tax which might hit all Canadians in a way which has never been experienced before in this country.

So I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, for the time being, he is prepared to shelve this Machiavellian plan and tell us first when he intends to levy this new tax.

And since in his White Paper the Minister gave a number of examples calculated at 8 per cent, I would ask him just how much money does the federal Government expect to collect through this 8 per cent tax on all goods and services, as he stated last Thursday?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it surprises me to hear the negative comments of the Hon. Member. Twice during the course of the past week he has said specifically that the existing sales tax is not working and should be replaced.

We have put forward a specific proposal here for consultation. We want to consult with social policy groups, with the provinces, with the business sector and other interested Canadians. What we have decided must be a part of that sales tax proposal is a significantly enhanced—into the hundreds of dollars—refundable sales tax credit which will benefit low and middle-income earners. Part of it as well will be a removal of the surtaxes, and finally a change in income tax rates, a drop in those rates for some middle-income earners as well.

• (1420)

SALES TAX PROPOSALS—ESTIMATED REVENUE

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not answer the question. It was a very straightforward one. The Minister has certainly made calculations.

We were told by officials of the Department of Finance yesterday that the new business transfer tax, or a value-added tax, would have to raise enough revenue to cover the present federal sales tax, to replace the general 3 per cent surtax on personal and corporate taxes, to pay for the sales tax credit, to lower by 3 per cent the middle-bracket rate for personal income tax, and to cover the additional federal spending because of the sales tax. Why does the Minister not want to give us the total amount of money required? The Department has certainly made calculations. How much revenue will an 8 per cent sales tax on goods and services raise to cover all those items I have just mentioned?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I said in my answer to the first question, the different things that have to be covered by the new sales tax. I do not know the final design of the refundable sales tax credit. We have some ideas of how big that should be and how far up the income scale it should go, but until we have the final design of the sales tax credit which will be a major benefit to those in lower and lower-middle-income brackets it is not possible to give the precise amount of the tax.

INCOME TAX—EFFECT OF PROPOSED CHANGES

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, we worry about tax reform because we do not have the information which would be needed to bear judgment on it. The only thing we know now is that the rich will get richer and the poor will get poorer. Since the Minister did not want to answer my first two questions, I will try another subject.

One of the stated objectives of the tax reform was to simplify the tax form for individuals. However, yesterday a Tory Member of Parliament said to officials of the Department of Finance after examining the proposed tax change: "Why do you have to make it so hideously complicated?" In the words of the Conservative Finance Committee Chairman, why is the Minister driving people to H & R Block to complete their tax forms? Why was the Government not able to deliver on the Minister's promise to simplify the personal income tax form?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me state absolutely and categorically that the Hon. Member's statement that the rich will be getting richer and the poor will be getting poorer is simply false.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is proven, it is in the statement. If the Hon. Member would take the time to read the document he would see that the share of income taxes paid by those who earn over $55,000 is going up and the share of those who earn less than $27,500 will be going down. That is contrary to what the Hon. Member has just said and he knows that my way is the truth and his way is not the truth.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Contained in the White Paper as well is that most Canadians will be better off after the income tax reforms plus the impact of the sales tax reforms. That is set out in the document as well, and I would hope that the Hon. Member would repeat that when he is talking to his constituents and would not continue to leave these mistruths that he is trying to perpetrate hanging around.

OPPOSITION TO ANY FOOD TAX

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. the Prime Minister.

Since September 4, 1984, elderly Canadians remember the old age security pension deindexation trick, and families remember the family allowances and child tax credit deindexation tricks. The sick remember the 12 per cent prescription drugs sales tax trick. And people generally remember that, since September 4, 1984, this Government has saddled individuals with 25 new taxes or direct tax increases.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Now that senior citizens' associations are all ready for action, can the Prime Minister assure them that his Government will not slap a new tax on food such as bread and butter?

• (1425)

[English]

Will you not tax food, bread and butter, yes or no?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to be absolutely clear with the Hon. Member that senior citizens benefit from stage one of tax reform. They will benefit again in stage two. Nine out of 10 senior citizens will pay less income tax after tax reform. Some 850,000 Canadians will be off the tax rolls, and 250,000 of those are senior citizens. That is the direction we are taking in the first stage of tax reform.

In stage two many senior citizens will get full benefit of the refundable sales tax credit which will be paid regularly in advance to offset the impact of sales taxes.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance would rather not respond to this question because they once misled elderly Canadians about the old age security pensions de-indexation, and they intend to tax food.

INQUIRY WHY POOR FAMILIES DO NOT OBTAIN COMPLETE REIMBURSEMENT OF TAXES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. After his last five Budgets full of new taxes on drugs, food, telephone calls, the result of all these new taxes—the 25 new measures—is that a family of four with an income of $15,000 is paying $424 more in direct and indirect taxes, yet all they get from the Minister of Finance is a $210 tax credit on the sales tax.

Can the Minister tell us why he did not find a way to make sure that poor families in Canada would get a complete reimbursement of the taxes they have to pay? Why did he choose to levy 50 per cent of the new tax from poor families and the most destitute elderly Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it does not take a whole lot of courage to follow the scare-mongering tactics of the Hon. Member opposite.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There is nothing in the White Paper to tax food. There is nothing in the White Paper that says taxes of low-income Canadians are going to go up. Their taxes are going down. The Hon. Member seems to feel he has a monopoly on compassion for senior citizens. If he had any compassion for them he would not be trying to scare them now by talking about a tax on food.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—AUTO PACT—ONTARIO PREMIER'S INTEREST

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House the Minister for International Trade did nothing to assure Canadians that the automotive tariff policy would remain as the instrument for enforcing investment safeguards in the Auto Pact. Neither did Simon Reisman outside the House.

I understand from a news report that the Prime Minister got a telephone call yesterday from the Premier of Ontario. Will he confirm that he got such a call, and did he offer assurances to the Premier that tariffs would remain as the effective mechanism for enforcing the investment provisions of the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed I received a call from my friend, the Premier of Ontario, last evening. Among other things he inquired about the Auto Pact and I indicated, as I have in the past, that the Auto Pact was not placed on the table by the Government of Canada negotiators, nor by the U.S. Government negotiators.

REQUEST FOR RETENTION OF TARIFFS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I assume the Prime Minister is not interested in simply playing linguistic games so I will ask him to answer the question I put to him. Did he offer assurances to the Premier of Ontario, and will he do so to Members of the House, that the Government of Canada will keep in place tariffs on automotive trade between Canada and the U.S. as the effective instrument for enforcing the investment requirements in the agreement? Will he answer that question?

• (1430)

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Government sees very little benefit for Canada in keeping in place a mechanism which would cost us 40,000 jobs if it were ever employed.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE GOVERNMENT WILL RETAIN TARIFFS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, this Minister perpetually shocks the House with revelations of profound ignorance. Would she kindly explain the statement she just made? More basically, will she do today what she refused to do yesterday, in her perpetual attempt to mislead the people of Canada—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Oh, oh, oh. Oh, oh, Mr. Clark, it's true.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Withdraw.

Mr. Masse: Nonsense.

Mr. Broadbent: No, Joe, I won't withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Oshawa will no doubt have noticed that the suggestion that the Hon. Minister is "perpetually attempting to mislead" is equivalent to "intentionally misleading". I know the Hon. Member for Oshawa will want to withdraw that and rephrase the question.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Broadbent: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, totally and without hesitation I will take away the word "attempting". I accept that.

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Broadbent: Now, will the Minister be straightforward with the House and answer the question? Will she offer assurances to those thousands of Canadian families which are directly or indirectly dependent on jobs in this sector that the Government will maintain tariffs in the automotive sector in trade between Canada and the United States to enforce the investment requirements and the safeguards? Will she be clear and finally answer that question?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have continually told this House that the Auto Pact is not on the table. I have continually told this House that the very tariffs about which the Hon. Member talks would only be triggered if production fell by 600,000 units at the cost of 40,000 jobs. We do not think that is a very effective mechanism.

It is interesting to note that neither did the Hon. Member in debate in this House. In 1977 he called for changes in the safeguards in a renegotiated Auto Pact.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: To improve them. Do you understand that?

Mr. Mazankowski: Isn't that interesting?

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, we are not suggesting that. We have said that the Auto Pact will not be put on the table by Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Just the tariffs.

Miss Carney: The Americans could put it on the table if the NDP keeps inviting them to do so.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: In Hansard of 1977 the Hon. Member talked about the losses. He said:

> We have to change one of the safeguards in the pact, which is probably the best approach—

Mr. Broadbent: To make them better. Read the rest.

Miss Carney: Tampering with the Auto Pact is his idea, not ours.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Do you think that will wash?

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

MAINTENANCE OF SAFEGUARD LEVELS IN AUTO PACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade. Is the Minister not aware that the tariffs which will be triggered if safeguards are not met apply to the failure of individual companies to meet the safeguard levels and not simply to the fall to safeguard levels of the entire industry? If that is the case, the safeguards are relevant each and every day.

If she does not know that, why is she keeping her job? Why does she not admit now that if the Auto Pact, per se, is not on the free trade negotiating table, then the tariffs are? Come out and say that. Tell the truth.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I defer to your judgment as to whether the Hon. Member's allegation about telling the truth is unparliamentary or not. You may want to deal with that.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Answer the question.

Mr. Broadbent: Try telling the truth.

Miss Carney: I have said that the Auto Pact is not on the table. I have explained to this House that the so-called protection that they want to keep would, if ever triggered, cause a loss in production of $5.5 billion and a loss of 40,000 jobs.

Mr. Axworthy: She's crazy.

Miss Carney: I do not know why they keep asking for changes of this nature but it will be on their heads, not ours.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Prime Minister recognizes this admission of ignorance and incompetence of his Minister for International Trade. The safeguards being triggered do not cause the fall in production and jobs. It is the safeguards and the tariffs which protect them that prevent the jobs and production from falling.

Mr. Axworthy: That's right.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I hope the Minister realizes that. If she does not, I wonder why the Prime Minister is keeping her in her job.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Try that again in English.

REDUCTION OF TARIFFS TO ZERO—INQUIRY CONCERNING CARS AND PARTS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister said:

—I can point out that the negotiators are talking about a hypothetical model of taking all tariffs on everything on a broad basis, except those areas that have been identified as sensitive, to zero.

Are the tariffs on cars and parts coming into Canada from the United States included in that hypothetical model? Will she at least tell us that, even on a so-called hypothetical basis? If that is the case, the fact is that the auto tariffs are on the table and are about to go in a way that will gut the Auto Pact and harm the jobs involved.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have told this House that the Auto Pact has not been discussed at the table. A working group on automotive issues met twice in November. This scare tactic of the Opposition is ignoring—

Mr. Axworthy: Be serious.

Miss Carney: —the fact that we do not intend to alter the Auto Pact. We intend to take only those measures which will benefit Canadians and the automotive industry.

It is their continual harping and dragging the Auto Pact on the table, and dragging it back on the table, and suggesting it be reopened, and suggesting it be renegotiated, that will be of interest to those Americans with vested interest who would like to build their automobile industry at the expense of the industry in Ontario and Quebec.

IMPACT ON CANADIANS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who will be as interested as I am to know that the Liberal Party has now discovered that the tax system introduced by the Liberals has made the rich richer and the poor poorer, and that the Conservative Government is keeping up with the tradition.

Here is my question: If the Minister insists that most Canadians will be better off after the income tax reforms than before, will he also confirm that after the tax reform and after tax increases implemented by this Government since 1984, 88 per cent of Canadian families will be paying more taxes instead of less, and that the only ones who will be paying less are those wealthier Canadians with an income in excess of $100,000 per year?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure where the Hon. Member is finding his statistics. The per centage of taxes payable by those earning more than $55,000 will go up as a result of tax reform. The share of the personal income tax burden of those earning less than $27,500 will go down. I remind the Hon. Member that 6.3 per cent of taxpayers earn more than $50,000. Their share of the tax burden will go up to 36.2 per cent as a result of tax reform. We tried to find a balance. The balance has resulted in the wealthier Canadians paying a greater share of the burden and I would think that the Hon. Member, coming from that Party, would support us in that effort.

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF SALES TAX PROPOSALS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were looking for honesty from the Minister of Finance. That is why they do not understand the statements from the Minister of Finance when they also see that three out of four families earning over $100,000 will get a $4,000 tax cut and that the tax cut for those rich families will be 30 times the amount that is saved by families earning under $15,000 a year.

They ask what kind of justice is involved there and why the Minister is not prepared to be honest and tell them what they will pay in sales tax on items like food in 1989, after they get some kind of a tax cut in 1988?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asks what will be the impacts of stage two. I do not know what those impacts will be because we want to consult with the provinces, with the social policy groups, with the business groups, and with those industries that are going to be affected, to get a better understanding of the impact of the proposed tax change on them.

We consulted fully in the lead up to stage one. We have consulted fully on the development of a proposal which I think Canadians have said benefited from that consultation process. We will consult fully in the lead up to stage two and make sure that Canadians have a full opportunity. The Chairman of the Finance Committee has said that there will be full hearings on sales tax reform before his committee.

I think Hon. Members should realize that we are approaching this in good faith to ensure that we listen to the views of all Canadians before we take a decision.

Oral Questions

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—AUTO PACT TARIFFS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister for International Trade but she has disappeared for the moment, perhaps along with the Government's position. I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

On March 16, as reported at page 4178 of Hansard, the Minister for International Trade, in addressing what is being negotiated as part of the Canada-U.S. trade negotiations, said that tariffs are on the table because experience has shown the Canadian economy prospers, this is so even with the Auto Pact. She went on to say that: "We are reducing the tariffs for the Auto Pact down to zero". Those are the words of the Minister for International Trade herself as quoted in Hansard which I think quite definitely demonstrate that this issue is presently being negotiated.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Axworthy: Therefore I want to ask the Hon. Minister has she changed her position from what she stated on March 16 when she said that the tariffs as they relate to the automobile trade are being negotiated down to zero? If she has not changed her mind, does that not therefore mean that the whole basis of the Auto Pact is being negotiated away?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I was called out of the House briefly. I did not have the opportunity to find the reference about which the Hon. Member is talking and I have no opportunity to find out if, in fact, the Hon. Member is even quoting it correctly—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: Given the history of the Hon. Member, I doubt it.

Mr. Gauthier: Shame!

Miss Carney: Let me explain once more. For 22 years the Auto Pact has operated without any tariffs on automotive trade within the Auto Pact—22 years without tariffs. The Opposition wants to take us back to the level of production which existed 22 years ago.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): That is nonsense.

Miss Carney: This Government does not plan to do that.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, it is really not my fault that the Minister does not know what she said.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Try again, Lloyd.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON TARIFFS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can jog her memory by referring her to that wonderful day of March 16, to page 4178 of Hansard, where the Minister said explicitly that there is an existing tariff in the Auto Pact of 9.2 per cent and the intention of the Government is to reduce that down to zero. Those were her words on March 16. Are they still the basis of government policy today and, if so, does that not therefore mean that the Government is negotiating away the very basic safeguards and foundations of the Auto Pact system that provides jobs for hundreds of thousands of Canadians? Will the Minister at least admit her own words of some two months ago?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have answered that question many times. May I point out that I used the words "automotive trade", I am advised, and we will check that out. I have not talked about the Auto Pact.

May I remind him that when the Auto Pact was put in place tariffs were dropped from about 27 per cent to about 9.5 per cent, and that for 22 years it has operated without any tariffs on automotive trade within the Auto Pact. I see no purpose in trying to do something—I see no purpose in trying to operate this industry—

Mr. Axworthy: Because they met the conditions.

Mr. Broadbent: That is what the pact was about.

Mr. Rossi: Brian is looking at you. You are going to be in the next shuffle.

Mr. Speaker: When Hon. Members are asking questions which, by their very nature are complex, I am sure they would of course let the Hon. Minister reply in perhaps more detail than otherwise. A question that asks for detail and is argumentative is entitled to a lengthier reply. The Hon. Minister.

Miss Carney: I can only repeat what I have said. For 22 years there have been no tariffs on automotive trade within the Auto Pact.

Mr. Axworthy: You just said there are tariffs.

Miss Carney: There have been no tariffs in effect for 22 years. This Government does not intend to alter something which has worked very well for 22 years.

May I add that if the safeguards they are talking about were ever required, it would mean that the industry was operating with 40,000 fewer jobs than today, with $5.5 billion less production than today, and 600,000 less units than today. If that is what they want, that is what they would get if their policies were put into place.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister who seems surprised to find that telling the truth is not unparliamentary.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

An Hon. Member: Cheap shot.

Mr. McCurdy: On March 16 the Minister said that tariffs are on the table and: "We are seeking to reduce them to zero". I think the people of Canada deserve a straight answer.

An Hon. Member: What is your question?

Mr. McCurdy: Never mind all this obfuscation—

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Both questions and answers on this issue are becoming debate. I would ask Hon. Members to put their questions specifically and the Hon. Minister, if they are directed to the Hon. Minister, to answer as succinctly as possible. The Hon. Member.

Mr. McCurdy: Will the Hon. Minister maintain the threat of tariffs as a means of ensuring the application of content requirements and production requirements in the Auto Pact? Yes or no.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, may I repeat that the Auto Pact is not being discussed at the table. May I repeat that there have been no tariffs on automotive trade—

Mr. Broadbent: That is not so.

Miss Carney: —no tariffs in effect on automotive trade within the Auto Pact for 22 years.

Some Hon. Members: Wrong.

Miss Carney: There is a possibility of tariffs being applied at a level so low that the economy of the Province of Ontario would be destroyed were it ever required to put them into effect.

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has the Minister not demonstrated sufficient evidence of duplicity and incompetence as to require her resignation?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York South—Weston.

CODE OF CONDUCT—MINISTER'S STOCK HOLDINGS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the blind trust of the Minister of Public Works. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, who is responsible for the conflict of interest code, whether he himself has investigated this particular matter and whether he has satisfied himself that the Minister is in full compliance with the letter and spirit of the conflict of interest code?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works made a full statement to the House yesterday and outlined in a very succinct way the details surrounding this. I remind the Hon. Member that the Minister has engaged the services of two highly reputable firms to handle his blind trust, namely, McLeod Young Weir, and Nesbitt Thomson and Deacon. If the Hon. Member is suggesting that these two reputable firms have in some manner, shape or form, breached the spirit and technical guidelines of the conflict of interest guidelines I wish he would point it out to the House.

In his enthusiasm, perhaps the Hon. Member may want to slander people, and not engage in slandering the reputation of two highly respected national firms.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the two companies are not required to comply with the conflict of interest code. It is the Minister who must comply with the conflict of interest code.

MANAGEMENT OF STOCK PORTFOLIO

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): The conflict of interest code is quite clear. It says a trustee shall clearly be at arms length from the public office holder. It goes on to say that a Minister has an obligation to act in a manner which will bear the closest public scrutiny—

Mr. McDermid: Make your accusation.

Mr. Nunziata: —an obligation which is not fully discharged by simply acting within the law. How can it be said that the Minister of Public Works was within the letter and spirit of the conflict of interest guidelines—

Mr. McDermid: Make your accusation.

Mr. Nunziata: —when his public trustee, or his trustee, is his best friend and political fund raiser? How can it be said when that individual is managing the Minister's stock portfolio he is at arms length with the Minister and the Minister is acting according to the letter and spirit of the conflict of interest code? I would like the Prime Minister, who has said in the past in this House that he is the individual primarily responsible for compliance with the code, to answer.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the Hon. Member's attempt to mislead, he is suggesting that McLeod Young Weir, and Nesbitt Thomson and Deacon—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Riis: Order. Show some respect.

Mr. Speaker: I have earlier today had to suggest to another Hon. Member that the words "attempt to mislead" are, at least in the mind of the Speaker, equivalent to "intentionally misleading". I know the Hon. Minister would not have wanted that impression to be left.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to leave the wrong impression. I certainly want to comply with parliamentary tradition. However, I must tell the Hon. Member that his suggestion that this is not an arms length transaction is certainly not in accordance with the facts.

The Minister has engaged two reputable national firms to handle his trust. If the Hon. Member finds something offensive in that regard, let him state his case and clearly show it.

Mr. Crosbie: And put his seat on the line.

LETTER CARRIERS STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF A MEDIATOR—GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Letter carriers have now been on strike for one week. Picket line violence is on the rise as the Canada Post Corporation continues to use scabs to deliver the mail. The Canada Post Corporation has asked for a mediator. Will the Minister appoint a mediator today to end this strife?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have considered the request for mediation. I am indeed keeping the whole matter under close scrutiny. I wish to point out to the House that a conciliator and a commissionner have already reported that they had failed to reach an agreement in the present confrontation. As the parties involved have not shown sufficient flexibility, it would not be appropriate to appoint a mediator, since one would expect this to happen when a settlement is at hand.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the Minister cuts an ironic figure, fiddling while violence and injuries are taking place on the picket line, because Canada Post is hiring scabs to break the union.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): I want the Minister to stand up and tell us if he does not consider it now appropriate, in view of the confrontation and the heightened violence on the picket line, that both sides might very well be ready for mediation? Will the Minister accept his responsibility as the Minister of Labour and appoint a mediator?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is indeed because I am accepting my responsibility as the Minister of Labour that I have come to the conclusion that it was not appropriate at this stage to appoint a mediator.

As for violence, it has nothing to do with the process of collective bargaining, and I believe it is up to the parties involved to act in a responsible way, to get back to the table and to reach an agreement.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: But not hiring scabs.

USE OF STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister responsible for the postal strike.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): The Government should have known that using strike-breakers for the first time in a postal strike would invite the kind of escalating violence that Canadians are getting sick and tired of seeing on their news every night. Now the Minister of Labour, the slow moving Minister of Labour, is telling us—

Mr. Crosbie: Question.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): —that he has rejected the one solution which everyone knows has to be taken. Why will the Government not appoint this mediator—even Canada Post has been asking for it—and do it now before it is too late?

An Hon. Member: Hello? Anybody home?

Mr. Gauthier: Anybody home?

An Hon. Member: That question is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques.

Mr. Gauthier: No answer? What a bunch of goodies.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister is not willing to accept his responsibilities, maybe the Prime Minister will think of someone else to do the job.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault (St-Jacques): I want to turn to the Prime Minister and remind him that far from decreasing, violence is increasing daily. Canada Post just stated that the day is coming when it will have to lay off 40,000 people, which could stop the service completely.

LIBERAL PARTY'S THREE SUGGESTIONS TO END STRIKE

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister might accept—and this is my question to him—three suggestions from the Liberal party to put an end to the strike. First, appoint a mediator; second, stop using strike-breakers in order to stem violence; and third, give Canada Post the flexibility needed to make reasonable offers.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this House, I assume, deplores violence. As the Minister of Labour has indicated, we should all be encouraging parties to reach a negotiated settlement at the table.

I would remind the Hon. Member that the conciliation commissioner stated in his report that the Post Office has a social obligation to try to continue to deliver the mail. I have asked, and I have been instructed that it has sent out messages to all of its managers that they are to avoid confrontation if at all possible while fulfilling their social obligation of trying to deliver the mail. As the Hon. Member just pointed out, they may not be able to do that. They may have to lay off. I hope it does not come to that.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): You hired the strike-breakers. They are doing it.

Mr. Andre: In the meantime, it does no good to the process, no good to finding a resolution and restoring good service, and improved service to Canadians, for the Hon. Member continually to try to raise false issues—

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Andre: —false accusations, and bring the issues from the table to the floor of this House of Commons.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): And you are doing nothing meanwhile.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF POLLUTION CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Last December the Minister issued a draft Environmental Protection Act for discussion purposes. He indicated that this spring he would be introducing in the House tough new pollution control legislation. On Sunday last week spring turned into summer. Why has the Minister backed off? When are we going to throw the book at these guys?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as a result of a broadly-based consultation process all winter and all spring, the Environmental Protection Act, which I tabled in the House of Commons in December for consultation purposes, will have been substantially revised. I intend to table the proposed revised Act in the House of Commons for first reading on Friday, June 26. At the same time I will be releasing a major enforcement and compliance policy of the Government of Canada towards which end the Government will also be approving significant new funding for Environment Canada. In this way, not only in the statute books but also in the real world, we will have a truly effective instrument to throw at the polluters and at pollution.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

IMPORTATION OF WEAPONS-GRADE ENRICHED URANIUM

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Keeping in mind Canada's long-standing policy of not contributing to the proliferation of nuclear fuel and technology for military purposes and the Prime Minister's own commitment restated in Quebec City on May 23 to strengthen, not weaken, the non-proliferation regime, will the Prime Minister assure the House that Canada will not use, import, or produce weapons-grade enriched uranium for military purposes, including the fueling of military submarines?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Minister of National Defence has made clear in this House before, actions that we take and intend will continue to be consistent with the non-proliferation treaty.

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I deliberately used the words "non-proliferation regime", words which I know the Minister understands. Therefore is he saying that we will be the first non-nuclear weapons producing state to engage in highly enriched weapons-grade uranium to fuel our submarines?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when members of the New Democratic Party find that the treaties in place do not serve their ideological purposes they don't any longer talk about treaties, they talk instead about regimes.

Ms. Jewett: Well, it is a treaty, too. If you want a treaty, the treaty is right here.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I know that the Hon. Member does not like the non-proliferation treaty as it is written. Our obligation is to adhere to the treaties to which Canada is party.

Ms. Jewett: But you're not!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We are, and we intend to continue to adhere to the non-proliferation treaty which Canada has signed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Jewett: From you of all people that is shocking. You have just given up all your principles, that is what you have done.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CODE OF CONDUCT—TRUSTEE OF MINISTER'S BLIND TRUST

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we have now heard the Deputy Prime Minister confirm the statement of the Minister of Public Works that his blind trust was actually held by McLeod Young Weir. Yet I have in my hand a document authorizing the transfer of all securities and cash positions from McLeod Young Weir to Nesbitt Thomson. That particular document is signed by R. Montgomery, trustee.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister explain who was the real trustee, McLeod Young Weir, or the friend and fund raiser of the Minister, Ross Montgomery?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's allegations are false.

Mr. Nunziata: We have a document here.

INQUIRY CONCERNING TRUSTEE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have the document. Given that the Minister said in the House yesterday that he was prepared to be very open will he in fact table in the House any authorization for a trust account that he has specifically from the company McLeod Young Weir? Will he come forward with the documentation which he claims shows that the trust was held by McLeod Young Weir? Or is it in fact true that Mr. R. Montgomery, trustee, who signed this document authorizing the transfer, was in fact the non-arms length trustee of the Minister's so-called blind trust?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister made a clear statement yesterday. Today, I have tried to elaborate further. If the Hon. Member opposite wants to throw dirt she will be digging her own grave. That is all I can say.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Annapolis Valley—Hants will ask he last question.

1987 CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I see that Question Period is almost over and the Prime Minister is starting to leave the House.

In view of the surprising interview that the Right Hon. Prime Minister gave yesterday about Meech Lake and the status of the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, and in the more surprising absence of a question being asked by an opposition Leader on the subject today, I would like to ask the Prime Minister this. What will the status of the committee be in view of the very definite statement of the Prime Minister that he really does not care what the committee does, that he will not entertain any amendments on the Meech Lake Accord? Further, what will that do to the provincial hearings presumably to be held in Ontario and/or Manitoba?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is of course quite wrong.

An Hon. Member: He's one of yours!

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, indeed, he is a member of the government Party. I am just saying that he is quite wrong.

My undertaking as a First Minister pursuant to Meech Lake is in the 1987 Constitutional Accord which states:

> The Prime Minister of Canada will lay or cause to be laid before the Senate and House of Commons, and the first ministers of the provinces will lay or cause to be laid before their legislative assemblies, as soon as possible, a resolution, in the form appended hereto—

The resolution in the form appended thereto is the agreement agreed upon by all First Ministers.

In regard to the question yesterday which I was asked by a very distinguished member of the gallery, I said:

[Translation]

As far as I am concerned, I have no hesitation in suggesting that the Meech Lake Accord is an impressive document that tends to reaffirm Canadian unity. And I have no hesitation in recommending that document to the country and to Hon. Members in this House.

Now, our democratic, parliamentary usage provides for participation, something I approve entirely. And we will see what will come out of it, in terms of the Parliamentary Committee.

But as far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

My obligation pursuant to the Meech Lake Accord, undertaken and signed by all First Ministers, was to bring forward without hesitation and without change the Meech Lake document in which I believe very strongly, as do the other First Ministers, and to present it before the House of Commons. That is exactly what I have undertaken to do. There is nothing in the interview at variance at all with that undertaking on behalf of the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

PRESENTATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Selkirk—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 96(2), I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Government Operations. The report pertains to the operational plans of Canada Post and covers a range of issues such as postal disruptions, door-to-door mail delivery and third-class unaddressed mail.

I wish to note that we have examined the plans of Canada Post strictly from a consumer and user point of view. It is deemed that this was the most appropriate approach.

I would like to thank witnesses, Members of Parliament who participated in this report, and our hard working staff.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MEMBER

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on an urgent and important question of privilege. The actions of a Member of this House have seriously impaired my ability to discharge my duties and responsibilities as a Member of Parliament. I am referring, of course, to the despicable and irresponsible actions by the Leader of the New Democratic Party in calling me a liar a few feet outside this Chamber yesterday afternoon.

• (1530)

The facts are these. Yesterday, the Leader of the New Democratic Party rose on a question of privilege to claim this Government had misled him and the House on the matter of the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact being included in the present free trade negotiations. You will remember that, in your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, you ruled that the Member had no question of privilege.

Not content with that ruling, Mr. Speaker, and showing contempt for this House, the Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) walked a few feet outside the Chamber and said to reporters, and I quote, "I think she's lying to us about the Auto Pact", as reported in today's Ottawa Citizen. The Toronto Sun reported that the NDP Leader said I was, and I quote, "lying".

Of course, he must be aware of the fact that in making these charges without the protection of Parliament he is exposing himself to the possibility of legal action. In fact, the only person who has ever called for changes in the Auto Pact in this House is the Hon. Member.

I have been asked repeatedly in this House, Mr. Speaker, whether the Auto Pact is on the table, and I replied to the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray):

> Canada does not intend to put the Auto Pact on the table. We believe, as I have told the House, that it is working well. If the Americans wish to make any proposals, which they have not yet done, we will look at them. If they increase employment, increase production, and increase investment in Canada, we will look at them.

As you will recall from the rest of Question Period yesterday, Mr. Speaker, members of the opposition Parties continued to question me about the Auto Pact and whether or not it was being negotiated. They based their questions on a third-hand report, a press report of a memorandum written by a congressional staffer in Washington purporting to interpret an oral briefing by the Deputy Chief Negotiator for the United States. That report, Mr. Speaker, has been called into question by no less an authority than the Chief Negotiator for the U.S., who has publicly characterized it as containing "a lot of inaccuracies". Others at the same Washington briefing hold far different interpretations of what was said.

Despite that, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has put this forward as the etched-in-stone American position. The Chief U.S. Negotiator has backed up my statement that the Auto Pact is not on the table. Despite all of this evidence, and my word that the Pact is not on the table, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has damaged my ability to discharge my duties by calling me a liar.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there have been precedents when statements made outside the House have been determined not to constitute questions of privilege. However, I feel strongly in this case, and so suggest to you, that the behaviour of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, which would be unacceptable and certainly a question of privilege had it taken place in the Chamber, is just as obnoxious, just as despicable, and just as damaging in the lobby of the House.

If you find, Mr. Speaker, that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Minister's suggestion that there is a prima facie case of privilege, let me say right at the outset that she knows, of course, that there isn't the slightest case of privilege about something that occurs outside the House. She has—

Miss Carney: Except legal action.

Mr. Broadbent: Well, if the Minister wants to take legal action, I say to her right now, go ahead, lady, do it. If—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): "Go ahead, lady"! Sexism raises its head. The NDP and sexism.

Mr. McDermid: Well said, Ed.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member has called me "lady". While I certainly do not deny it, the rulings of this House indicate that when said of an Hon. Member it constitutes a sexist comment.

Mr. McDermid: The great Leader of the New Democratic Party, the socialist party! Gotcha, Ed. It gets the needle in a little bit. It hurts, doesn't it.

Mr. Broadbent: For a Progressive Conservative to talk about a sexist observation—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Get your cigar.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I gave them the courtesy of listening to what they had to say—

Mr. McDermid: You should, too.

An Hon. Member: Calm down.

Mr. McDermid: He is starting to believe the polls.

Mr. Speaker: As Hon. Members know, and as the public would be interested in knowing, there is an application before the Chair by the Hon. Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) to the effect that her privileges, her capacity to carry out her duties as a Member of Parliament, have been abridged by the fact that the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), has allegedly said of her outside of this Chamber, but within the precincts of Parliament, that she was lying or was a liar. That is the issue. Tempers, of course, are understandably frayed, and in that situation there is a tendency to use a lot of other language—language which, I hope, I shall not have to rule on.

The specific issue before the Chair is, first of all, whether or not those words were used of the Minister and whether their use just outside this Chamber constitutes a question of privilege.

I would ask the Hon. Member for Oshawa, who is a very experienced parliamentarian, to assist the Chair by addressing his comments to that specific point.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I take the matter raised by the Minister seriously. She has raised a couple of points that I think are only tangentially related, and I should like to pick up on those before I come to what I regard as the nub of the issue.

She has suggested, for example, that as Leader of my Party, as a man who represents an automotive community, I have talked about putting the safeguards of the Auto Pact up for negotiation. I want—

An Hon. Member: You have.

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister, having made her accusation, I note is leaving the House in a great huff.

An Hon. Member: She huffs and she puffs.

Mr. Broadbent: I listened to her point. I would have thought she would listen to the reply.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members do realize that there is a tradition not to refer to the presence or absence of Hon. Members. Hon. Members have many responsibilities in carrying out their duties and serving their constituents. It may be that the Hon. Minister has to leave for some other engagement. It is not for me to comment one way or the other. If in fact the Hon. Minister is leaving the Chamber, that should not be the subject of a deprecatory comment in arguing the question of privilege.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the fact of my departure from the Chamber has been raised, I should like the record to show that I am leaving to chair a cabinet committee before which will be appearing people from all across the country to discuss the very serious issue of free trade.

Mr. Ouellet: Then, why did you raise the question of privilege in the first place!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Oshawa. I assure the Hon. Member that I shall listen carefully to his intervention.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall simply continue. The Minister pointed out that I had in fact suggested that the conditions of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement be up for discussion. What she might have added, had she been interested in a comprehensive view of the truth, is that when these matters were raised by me I was talking about improving the safeguards from the Canadian point of view, not reducing them, which, to understate the matter considerably, is a little different from the impression the Hon. Minister tried to leave with the House.

Secondly, the Minister went on—and I say, in this context, not simply throughout yesterday's Question Period, but throughout many previous Question Periods, as indeed she has done outside of the House—to play what I call, without any hesitation, linguistic games. She has said that she was not interested in having the Auto Pact put on the negotiating table; that the Auto Pact was not on the negotiating table. Anyone who is familiar with the details of the Auto Pact—and I am not prepared to concede that in fact the Hon. Minister is, after listening to what she had to say on certain technical aspects—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You cannot rise above the cheap, can you!

Mr. Broadbent: I would ask the Hon. Member opposite to be quiet. We listened to his colleague when she was speaking, and I would ask him to extend to me the courtesy of—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Don't speak to me of courtesy.

Mr. Broadbent: —of listening to me—

Mr. Speaker: I know that Hon. Members will want to quietly listen to the comments of the Hon. Member for Oshawa.

An Hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Speaker: The quieter Hon. Members are, the easier it will be for the Chair to appreciate the points being made.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am replying, and intend to reply, only to the precise points the Minister raised.

She talked about putting the Auto Pact on the discussion table. I talked about that, pointing out that the impression she left was completely contrary to the purpose that I had in mind when I raised the subject. I said that the safeguards should be improved, not reduced, not removed, as the present Government seems clearly to be moving in the direction of doing. Second, I pointed out that this matter was very important, not just to the thousands of people in the country who depend directly and indirectly on those jobs, but that happens to be the case of those who voted for me in my community. They have a central concern, and I think all Members of Parliament have an understandable concern about the well-being of their constituents.

I was not interested in the Minister, either inside the House or outside the House, saying that she did not have the Auto Pact on the negotiating table when in fact what she had on the table were the tariff policies which are the guts and essence of the Auto Pact, and the Minister knows that.

In my very serious view it was the Minister—and I am not going to say deliberately; I am not going to use an adverb at all—inside this House and outside this House who has been misleading the people of Canada on this issue, not me. I believe that profoundly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is not what you said outside. Show a little courage.

Mr. Broadbent: I want to conclude with my point—

Mr. McDermid: Tell us what you said outside.

Mr. Broadbent: I want to conclude with the specific—

An Hon. Member: Be honest.

Mr. McDermid: Have the courage to repeat what you said outside.

An Hon. Member: You are gutless, Ed.

Mr. Riis: It is safe calling from your seats.

Mr. Speaker: I know there are some Hon. Members who would wish this particular matter was over. It will be over sooner if they would keep their comments to themselves.

Mr. Broadbent: I want to go to the very specific concern of the Minister about my use of the word "liar". I was asked a question outside the House when I was pointing out what I regard as abominable contradictions between what the Minister said, that she was involved in negotiations on the one hand, and the reality of tariff policies which pertain to the Auto Pact on the other hand. I was asked at that time, "Do you think the Minister is lying", and I said: "Yes". I want to be very clear what I mean by that. To lie is to deliberately mislead. Outside the House when I was asked the question, I believed then and I believe now that that was the case, that the Government has a policy of misleading the people of Canada on what they are really up to.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I also respect the traditions of the House in terms of the use of language in this regard inside or just outside. I accept those traditions, and I will withdraw the use of the term unequivocally.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Does the Leader of the New Democratic Party also withdraw the unparliamentary accusation he just made, that it is the policy of the Government to mislead the House?

Mr. Nystrom: That is common knowledge, Joe. That is Brian, and you know Brian, Joe.

Mr. Speaker: That is a question which at the moment needs not to be met in debate or answer or otherwise. It may well be pursued further at another time. The Hon. Member has absolutely withdrawn the statement—

Mr. Malone: No, he has not.

Mr. Nystrom: Respect the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has absolutely withdrawn the statement of which the Hon. Minister complained. So far as the Chair is concerned, that ends the matter.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MEMBER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

An Hon. Member: Up yours, Joe.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): In case the Hansard reporter missed the comments of the Hon. Member for Oshawa, as he walked out of the House he said, "Up yours, Joe", thus keeping himself consistent with the kind of leadership that he and his Party have been giving on matters relating to decorum in the House.

My question of privilege is very brief. The Hon. Member for Oshawa, before he left the House, made an accusation that it is the policy of this Government to mislead the people of Canada. As a member—

Some Hon. Members: That's right.

Mr. Fulton: That is your policy, Joe.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): As a member of this Government—

Mr. Riis: That is the truth, Joe.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the NDP is now trying—

Mr. Fulton: People are allowed to tell the truth in here, Joe. You might try to muzzle us—

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) has raised a question of privilege in respect of a comment made by another Hon. Member. Of course he is entitled to be heard, as were other Hon. Members during the last few minutes. The Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will try to complete my very brief question—

Mr. Riis: Watch it, John. He will storm the chair next.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —if the shouting will stop from the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Rodriguez: No wonder he is not the Leader any more.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I will wait for the socialists to stop shouting—

Mr. Fulton: Right, you are always very quiet, Joe! You yelled the whole time Ed was talking.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): My very brief—

Mr. Fulton: You are pathetic.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): My brief question of privilege is that that accusation is a breach of the language of the House and a breach of my privileges as a member of the Government.

I would like the Leader of the New Democratic Party to have the courage to come back into the House and to withdraw that statement in a forthright and direct way.

Mr. Nystrom: The Conservative Party misleads the Canadian people all the time.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, for the third time, the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) has referred to the absence of a Member, just a few moments after you reminded Members of the rule against that in the House.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that you did not apply the same rule to the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs that you did to the Leader of our Party.

Mr. Speaker: It may be that I did not have time.

The Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) very correctly points out that it is absolutely improper to refer to the absence of Members. The Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs has made his point. Are there other Members on this question of privilege?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to be guilty of any impropriety in the House, and I want to withdraw those references.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will consider carefully the representations that have been made and will deal with them, I hope, appropriately.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT ACT, 1986

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Crosbie that Bill C-19, an Act respecting motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I will continue from where I left off the other night.

Another issue worthy of elaboration concerns the equal treatment of truckers on both sides of the Canada-U.S. border. In 1982, the United States imposed a moratorium on the issuing of licences to Canadian truckers. The power to reimpose the moratorium remains in the United States law and, in addition, a Bill now before Congress would reinforce and extend this power.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) and this Government believe that if Canadian truckers are treated unfairly in the U.S.A., Canada should be able to reciprocate against American truckers in this country. Thanks to an amendment approved by the Standing Committee on Transport, Bill C-19 will provide the Governor in Council with this countervailing power.

Given the close economic relationship between the two countries, we do not anticipate that this power will ever need to be invoked, but we are enacting a regulatory regime that is meant to stand the test of time.

Thus, Bill C-19 represents good, responsive legislation. It has been improved through changes suggested by carrier and shipper consultations, by witnesses who appeared before the standing committee earlier this year, and by the provincial Governments.

When Bill C-19 is enacted, both shippers and carriers will benefit. There will be less economic regulation through the elimination of the public convenience and necessity entry test. The move to reverse onus by January 1, 1988 will mean that only those applications of major importance will go to a public hearing. This will result in less need for costly legal services and a considerable saving for truckers.

The remaining restrictions on rates and routes to be served will be gradually eliminated. This will give both shippers and carriers more flexibility to tailor price and service packages to meet their respective needs and circumstances. As a result of lower costs and innovation, Canadians will have a trucking system that achieves the best service at the best price. This is vital to our economic well being. Jobs—real, permanent jobs—will be created in every region of the country as our producers become more competitive.

The Government of Canada has demonstrated much flexibility in developing and modifying the economic reforms in Bill C-19, but its commitment to safety has never wavered. Safety is the first priority, and this Government has initiated major improvements in the regulation of safety in every mode of transportation. For the trucking industry, the federal and provincial Governments and industry representatives have co-operated to produce a uniform national safety code.

While this Bill was in the committee stage, the federal and provincial Governments reached an agreement on implementation and cost sharing. The code now has a concrete existence. All Governments are committed to implementing it and key components will be in place in federal regulations when this Bill comes into force on January 1, 1988.

The Government of Canada will assist in funding implementation of the National Safety Code to a maximum of $23.5 million over the next five years. We will contribute 100 per cent of the development costs for new initiatives under the Code and 100 per cent of the costs of the information exchange system. We will also contribute up to $250,000 per year per province toward additional operating costs for the first five years.

For their part, the provinces have promised to spend an additional $6 million per year over the same time period to improve enforcement. Of course, these are merely the incremental costs. For example, the provinces will hire new enforcement officers and re-train existing ones as necessary. I understand that the number of commercial vehicle enforcement officers, approximately 1,400, will be increased by 10 per cent. This is in addition to the thousands of provincial and municipal traffic officers who routinely enforce safety on our highways.

The National Safety Code will form the basis of safety regulation in future. Several key elements of the code will be included in the federal safety regulations. The detailed standards for these regulations will be finalized by August, 1987. Hence, once this Bill is passed, federal regulations setting out safety requirements for both trucks and buses will be in place by January 1, 1988.

This should not be misconstrued to mean that we have no highway safety at this time. Canada has an excellent safety record, but we are determined to improve it. We already have a fine regime of safety regulation in each of the provinces and territories. Indeed, most of the elements of the new safety code are already in place in one or more provinces.

Provincial safety regulations are in place now to control driver qualifications and medical standards. All provinces have joined the North American Commercial Vehicle Safety Alliance which sets standards for roadside inspections of trucks and buses. Increased roadside enforcement has already started in some provinces and other provinces will follow suit this summer.

There will be improvements made to safety standards in provincial regulations, some of which will be ready by January, 1988 and the remainder of which will be ready by mid-1989. The provinces have made a commitment to have enforcement resources with regard to these improvements in place by the end of 1989.

Over all, Mr. Speaker, the improvements which we will have under the new safety code and Bill C-19 include first, a safety requirement for obtaining an operation licence. For the first time in legislation, all applicants for an extra-provincial trucking licence will have to meet tough safety standards. Legally, the National Safety Code will be adopted in regulation under the new Motor Vehicle Transport Act and under the laws of each province. Second, there will be uniformity among the provinces. The code will provide the basis for ensuring that safety requirements for all extra-provincial traffic are the same in every province. Third, there will be information exchange among the provinces. Records on safety deficiencies by companies and individual drivers will be kept and available to all provinces. This means we will have a national enforcement scheme. Work has already commenced to create the required national computer network.

In addition, existing national safety programs for driver testing and control, vehicle safety enforcement and insurance and dangerous goods legislation will be augmented by the following new initiatives to be implemented on or before January 1, 1988: First, upgrading the single driver licensing system, which has been in place for 20 years, to enhance enforcement and control; second, standardization of existing licensing classification; third, modification of existing medical standards for drivers; fourth, modification of existing regulations for security of loads; fifth, a new training course for dangerous goods trainers; and sixth, integration of the Canada Vehicle Safety Alliance with its American counterpart to ensure uniformity throughout North America to the greatest possible degree.

This last initiative is very significant because it will provide a uniform roadside vehicle inspection program. All provinces have signed memberships and paid their dues to the North American organization. As Members from Quebec probably know, a pilot project for safety inspections is being undertaken in that province. This program is already having a positive impact on truck safety in that province. Other provinces are expected to follow suit with similar projects of their own.

Finally, uniform vehicle maintenance standards are being developed as part of the code and will be enforced across Canada by October 1988. Hours of service regulations will be fully enforced by January 1989 and the interprovincial exchange of records will be fully implemented by December, 1988.

Governments, both federal and provincial, the carriers and their employees are all participating in these initiatives to ensure that Canada achieves the highest practicable standards in accordance with the policy statement of the new National Transportation Act, Bill C-18, which we have been considering.

Regarding administration of the code, it makes good sense from all viewpoints to leave it with the provinces which have clear jurisdiction over highway safety. It has been noted, however, that nowhere in law is there a delegation of off-the-road safety practices of extra-provincial trucking and bus companies. We have, therefore, added a section to Bill C-19 which would enable provincial enforcement of safety in the federal jurisdiction.

The time has come for change. The costs of trucking service can be held down, in some cases lowered, by reducing the regulatory restrictions on entry, rates and routes. Both the federal and provincial Governments are confident that the Canadian trucking industry has matured. It is fully capable of meeting the challenge of greater competition that will result from Bill C-19 and competition with all other modes. Without a doubt, a solid foundation is being laid for long-term healthy growth, both in the trucking industry and in the economies of all the regions of Canada.

There will be a significant improvement in highway safety through promulgation of uniform safety regulations, both federally and provincially and through enforcement by the provinces. We are enacting a regime that seeks to advance the interests of all Canadians by removing obstacles to the growth of our economy and our trade. This legislation will permit enterprise to flourish in the trucking industry, safeguarded but not oppressed by government regulation.

The experience of other countries indicates that the greatest benefit of reducing economic regulation is innovation. It is not possible to predict exactly how it will occur, but free from restrictions transportation companies will develop innovative new services and rate structures. Shippers can then take advantage of these innovations to become more competitive in their markets and jobs are thereby protected or created throughout the economy.

Of course, these benefits will not arise overnight. We are planning and laying the foundation for long-term economic growth. Similarly, there will be no drastic upheaval in trucking services, no destructive, super-heated competition. Why? Because the approach to reform has been thoughtful and balanced with a view to ensuring gradual adaptation.

We stand before a clear window opportunity. The need for the reforms in Bill C-19 is clear, as are the significant long-term benefits for all Canadians in every region of the country. Now is the time to act. Canada is maturing as a nation in transportation.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had some discussions with my colleagues in the other Parties and there has been a good deal of co-operation from them on this very minor matter that I wish to bring before the House. There is a feeling that the Bill would be more accurately described if the year were changed from 1986 to 1987.

I appreciate that this is an unusual procedure but it would be our desire to have the short title mentioned in Clause 1 of the Bill now before the House changed. I move that it reads as follows:

Motor Vehicle Transportation Act, 1987.

• (1540)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate to the House that we agree. In fact, there were efforts made in committee to suggest that the more appropriate year would be 1987, seeing as how that is the year in which we are passing the legislation. However, I would like it if the Government would consider changing it to 1988 so that we would get the year's delay in implementation that we have been seeking as well.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Parliamentary Secretary's motion, especially since at the report stage, our own suggestion for such a change was turned down by Government Members on the Standing Committee on Transport. We realize the Parliamentary Secretary has finally seen the light, and we support the motion.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed by the Hon. Deputy House Leader. Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Lewis) agreed to.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-19, an Act respecting motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings.

This Bill, which has raised some perfectly legitimate and normal fears in the Canadian trucking industry and elsewhere, will replace the Motor Vehicle Transport Act. When the initial legislation dealing with this sector was adopted in 1964, the federal Government at the time had decided to delegate to the provinces its authority to regulate extra-provincial truck leasing services.

The main consequence of this legislation was that over the years, the provinces adopted a different regulatory framework with widely varying rules and administrative procedures for regulating market entry, abandonment of services, and the setting of rates in the extra-provincial trucking sector. Obviously, we as Liberal Members of the Opposition found cause to rejoice when in 1985, the Government announced it had reached an agreement with the provinces on the general structure of what was to be a new system for regulating extra-provincial trucking, a system that would be more uniform and less cumbersome.

Unfortunately, the proposed legislation arising from this agreement leaves much to be desired. That is why many operators, owners, representatives and experts in the trucking industry are asking some serious questions about the changes introduced by the Government through this Bill. They wonder with good reason why, when dealing with such a major piece of legislation which could change the very nature of the trucking industry in Quebec, the Conservative Government refused to pay any heed to the quite legitimate requests of those who are more familiar than anyone else with this industry. As in the case of Bill C-18, the Government listened only to the organizations controlled by the large and wealthy shippers.

We believe that the Government should have used a much more careful and responsible approach. In preparing a Bill with such a major impact, the Government should have taken care to evaluate the consequences of this measure on such things as road safety, unfair pricing and competition from American supercarriers.

During the next few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to draw a picture of the consequences passage of Bill C-19 by this House will have. We no longer have any choice. The Government has pushed us and speeded up the process to make us agree at any costs, whatever the consequences, to Bill C-19, in spite of the deep opposition of all those involved in the trucking industry in Canada.

For those who did not have the privilege of attending the proceedings of the Committee on Transport, I would like to examine some of the most striking submissions we heard in the committee to underline how unreasonable and even dangerous this Government's initiative could prove to be. First, let us deal for a few minutes with the issue which, perhaps more than any other, gives Canadians cause for concern when we speak about deregulating the trucking industry, and that is road safety. This is the fundamental issue which worries everyone. Once again, we find ourselves faced with a Bill which is the result of the bad habit the Conservative Government has of wanting to imitate the United States in everything. I would even say in this case that the American model is viewed as the ideal of perfection by the Conservatives.

[English]

Indeed, in everything it does, the Tory Government seems to be reaching for the American dream. It wants to emulate the Americans in everything, at any cost, even if in some cases it means repeating tragic mistakes. One such mistake would be to go the way of the American Motor Carrier Act of 1980 which, like this Government's Bill C-19, had the effect of eliminating the public convenience and necessity entry criteria, leaving only the question of whether or not an applicant was fit, willing and able.

Looking at what is going on in the United States under deregulation, we realize it led to an increase in road accidents, increased bankruptcies and concentration into the hands of a few large carriers that conquered new markets through price discrimination. The hard-nosed approach that seems to be favoured by economic advisors to the Minister of Transport takes on a quite different look when confronted to the stark reality experienced by truckers.

[English]

That unfortunate tendency in the Department and in the office of the Minister of Transport, of wanting to reduce what is essentially the human condition to mathematical equations, telling us of gain for shippers, must in fact be looked at in light of human suffering. It must be looked at in light of lives lost on the highways because of trucks which cannot economically be maintained any longer. It must be looked at in light of the health of drivers which is jeopardized by taking pills in order to be able to work longer hours. That is the harsh reality of deregulation. That is the human reality and no number of economy models will make it go away.

But why such a legislation? Why do you find it so terrible, so bad, you might ask?

What the Bill does is open the door to increased competition in an already saturated market. Because what Bill C-19 does is drop the criteria for entry into the market, the so-called public convenience and necessity rule. That criteria, which has been in place since 1954, puts the onus of proof on the applicant. In order to have a chance to get a licence, the applicant must show that the proposed service is needed and the general public will benefit. Only carriers who supply a service that is required and needed get a licence. But under the guise of increasing competition, this Conservative Government decided to change everything, to replace the public convenience criteria by what is now called the "fit, willing and able" criteria. That new criteria is aimed at allowing any business, whether large or small, that proposes to operate an extraprovincial trucking service and that meets minimal standards—I am not referring to maximum standards, because now they are lowering that down to the most minimal of standards, the least common denominator in terms of safety and insurance—to get a licence almost automatically, as a matter of course.

The Government says that in order to meet provincial and industry concerns, the Bill provides for a five-year transitional period for moving from the current system to a so-called capacity system.

However, Mr. Speaker, a closer look at Bill C-19 proves this to be a scam.

● (1550)

During this interim five-year period when what is called a reverse onus test will be applied amounts to de facto deregulation. It is interesting to listen to what the Canadian Trucking Association had to say on this issue:

Based on all the legal advice available the CTA Board is convinced that the reverse onus language in Section 7 of Bill C-19 is useless to achieve the purpose supposedly intended of providing a transitional mechanism.

The reverse onus concept in C-19 amounts to subterfuge in terms of any transitional protection. That is because: The approach removes virtually all discretion from provincial boards.

Following the U.S. example, the change to a totally new test must lead to a deluge of early applications that will swamp the process before it can be properly tested.

The prospect must be that the new language will sooner or later result in court challenges thereby tying up the interpretation of the concept indefinitely in the courts.

It can be easily circumvented by carriers acquiring existing operating licences of which there will soon be a glut with minimal, if any, review mechanism applicable.

[Translation]

Because that new criterion reverses the burden of proof to licence holders, who will now have to prove that the entry of a new carrier on a route that is already served will endanger the service's profitability. The difference between that test and the previous one is quite clear: under the new system, anyone owning a truck will get a licence if he is fit, willing and able.

The repercussions of that increased competition on road safety is a matter of upmost concern to us and to the trucking industry. Because it is clear that safety considerations cannot be examined or perceived independently from a specific, economic context.

Let me quote on this the excellent brief submitted by the Ontario Trucking Association to the Committee on Transport, in March 1987.

[English]

Safety considerations cannot be separated from economic regulatory reform. We know this is not the intent of the Government of Canada. However, this point needs to be emphasized. There is a direct relationship between economic deregulation and highway safety. Faced with increased competitive pressures and declining profitability, some carriers will—in a deregulated environment—be forced to give less than adequate consideration to those factors which ensure public safety. Costs will be cut in those areas most related to safety—proper vehicle maintenance, inspection and replacement procedures, driver training and operational control. An October 1986 study of road accidents involving heavy trucks in eastern Quebec, points to implications arising from the impact of deregulation on independent truckers or owner-operators.

A 1986 U.S. study conducted by Transportation Research and Marketing in conjunction with the Commercial Vehicle Safety Alliance also reported some shocking results. The study's 100,000 interviews showed that average speeds of trucks increased sharply following deregulation from 60 m.p.h. in the 1977-79 period to about 65 m.p.h. in the 1983-86 period. The study also showed that the average age of equipment rose from 3.7 years in the initial period to 5.2 years in 1986.

In the struggle for traffic, some owner-operators will be forced to run excessive hours and over-exploit their equipment. All of these factors endanger the lives of motorists and truckers alike. Experience in Australia and California has demonstrated that the economic ills resulting from deregulation put some carriers' commitment to safety under extreme pressure.

Often, Mr. Speaker, both during the second stage debate on Bill C-19 and during the hearings of the Standing Committee on Transport, we, of the Liberal Party, have indicated just how concerned we are about the consequences deregulation will have on highway safety.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) and the Conservative Members kept repeating that we were raising a non-problem. They felt that there was no connection between highway transport deregulation and the deterioration of safety experienced in the United States.

[English]

That attitude shows either a sign of intellectual dishonesty or a disquieting lack of homework on this crucial issue, on the part of the Minister, his officials, and Conservative members of the committee.

Indeed, let us look at the California experiment with deregulation. The California Public Utilities Commission has been recently looking to reinstate some basic rate regulation, finding that to be in the public interest. The factors causing the C.P.U.C. to reintroduce rate regulation was a deterioration in safety. Of course, the one explanatory variable was deregulation. To quote from this brief:

Since 1980, when California deregulated the intra-state trucking industry, the following has occurred:

1. Public Safety—By 1983, years of steady improvement in truck safety statistics has reversed. The truck accident rate per million miles has skyrocketed by 22 per cent between 1983 and 1985.

2. Employee Safety—The workers' compensation rate for trucking company employees increased by 44 per cent between 1978 and 1985. It is currently 51 per cent more than comparable industries.

3. Safety Expenses—Since deregulation, the California trucking industry is spending 10 per cent less on vehicle maintenance and repair even though truck fleets have aged.

4. Safety Practices—Since deregulation, support of the trucking industry for the Certified Practising Safety Administrator program and the annual Safety Congress has dropped by 83 per cent and 49 per cent, respectively.

Of course, it is evident that the California situation differs somewhat from Canada. No two jurisdictions are totally alike, obviously. However, we have to look at the empirical evidence from California, and that is undisputable. Ignoring these facts is a sign of irresponsibility of the worst kind.

We in the Liberal Party who have opposed this legislation cannot understand why the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), who now has the experience of the U.S., is proceeding so rapidly and so urgently without taking the appropriate precautions.

The Government's failure to recognize facts which are not consistent with its wishes will have characterized its approach from the very beginning. It demonstrates that the deregulation which the Conservative Government is proposing is a purely ideological exercise.

It is quite unfortunate that for ideological considerations and to please the powerful lobby of major shippers, this Conservative Government is prepared to jeopardize the safety on our highways. I do not hesitate to say that it is prepared to risk the lives not only of our truckers, but also of each and every person who travels on Canadian roads.

As far as safety is concerned, the American experience is quite convincing, as I mentioned quite briefly in the document which I have just submitted and which is quite clear. But in case it is not, I should like, if I may, to quote another source.

[English]

Allow me to quote from a booklet prepared by The Coalition for Sound General Freight Trucking which is made up of motor carriers, shippers and other persons concerned about the future of the general freight trucking industry in the U.S:

In the case of the independent owner-operator, it means hauling a load for whatever price can be had. Sometimes, this is bare, out-of-pocket money for operating expenses and perhaps some contribution towards the monthly equipment loan and something to send home to the family; sometimes it is nothing more than fuel money to get back to a more promising source of loads.

It also may mean speeding or making the cross-country trip with little or no rest because only by maximizing the number of hauls per month can the financial obligations be met. It also may mean choosing what to do with the limited cash in-pocket: fuel for the trip, meals, money sent home, or brake relining or adjusting. Not surprisingly, maintenance is the first to go.

This type of experience is frightening. We cannot understand why the Minister wants to ignore it.

• (1600)

Let me now cite another study which was prepared by Professor Glaskowsky. In a chapter on safety and equipment aging it says the following:

Opponents of deregulation predict trouble in regard to safety deterioration due to the aging of equipment and financial pressures to defer maintenance. Trends since 1980 clearly confirm this prediction.

The American Trucking Association, Inc., in its March 19, 1986 statement before the House Subcommittee on Surface Transportation, summarized an increasingly serious trucking safety situation as follows:

1. Truck accidents reports to the Bureau of Motor Carrier Safety increased 18 per cent in 1984. That is the largest increase since 1972.

2. Trucks placed out of service by federal and state inspectors for serious defects increased from 23 per cent in 1984 to 41 per cent in a national truck inspection in September, 1985.

3. The per centage of motor carriers with unsatisfactory safety ratings is highest among those that have recently received operating authority from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the number of these new carriers is steadily increasing.

4. Unsatisfactory safety ratings are more prevalent among motor carriers with smaller profit margins.

I think that the impact which deregulation will have on highway safety is quite clear. And I do not think that we could honestly disregard everything that is done, said and written about the negative effects of deregulation in the United States.

Unfortunately, that is the path this Conservative Government has chosen. Because of this and because of the great many facts which the Conservative Government has overlooked, we are quite concerned about the welfare and safety of those men and women who drive the juggernauts of the highway; we want our highways to be as safe as possible, and we say that the Government's will to go ahead with deregulation before the implementation of a national highway safety code is altogether unthinkable, inconceivable and unacceptable. The Official Opposition has been essentially asking the Government, in view of the American experience, to realize that it cannot go ahead with deregulation in Canada as long as there is no national highway safety code in place, and as long as the Provincial and Federal Governments have not hired properly trained inspectors in sufficient number to ensure that our highways are safe; until then, it should not implement Bill C-19.

I should like to quote also from the excellent brief submitted by the Quebec Trucking Association which provided another testimony which the Government should have listened to.

> Recognizing the value of a single rule for all, you assured us that you understood the problem and that the introduction of the regulatory reform would coincide with the coming into force of a national safety code imposing the same standards to all. We were also given the assurance that the means to enforce that code would be provided. We were assured that a control mechanism regarding enforcement of and compliance with all social and fiscal obligations imposed on the trucking industry would be implemented. We were finally assured that we would be able to compete with foreign trucking companies on an equal basis.
> Where do we stand now? The Government wants to deregulate as of January 1st, 1988, but nothing indicates that we could have a uniform safety code throughout Canada before 1990-91. Each province looks at its role in this area in its own way and the only national leadership is the wish to agree on some uniform code at some indefinite time. You can imagine what the situation will be if anyone can start a trucking business without proficiency or fitness test, without rules or control mechanisms for things like vehicle safety to protect the general interest of the public.
> What we cannot understand in particular is the desire of the Government to move in a direction that the Americans are starting to abandon. When you look at what happened in the United States after deregulation you see an increase in traffic accidents, a rising rate of bankruptcies, and a greater concentration of the industry, where a few firms have been able to gain new markets through discriminatous, pricing and other means. The cost-benefit analysis takes an entirely new aspect when we compare the benefits of the shippers to the direct and indirect costs incurred in other areas such as accidents caused by vehicles in bad repair, the health of drivers who take drugs to work longer hours, etc. California was the first state to get into deregulation, it is also the first where steps have been taken to restore regulation.

Evidently, the Quebec Trucking Association is concerned by what the Tory Government is trying to do and in this paper it is trying to slow down this deregulation process. The Liberal Party believes that it is essential to proceed with caution before embarking in that dangerous course of deregulation of motor vehicle transport. This is the reason why we introduced an amendment in committee, both during consideration of the bill clause by clause and in the House at the report stage, amendment which tied the implementation of Bill C-19 to the setting up of a national security code. Unfortunately, in his eagerness to serve the interests of a few large Canadian shippers, the Government has overlooked the most elementary carefulness and common sense.

[English]

The Government is in fact telling Canadians that it does not care what is happening in the United States, it does not even seriously address their arguments and concerns but will deregulate immediately and worry about safety later. That kind of attitude is unacceptable. Also unacceptable is the staggered implementation schedule for the 17 components of the safety code to which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) has agreed.

On some components compliance is not estimated before August, 1989. On the absolutely crucial question of hours of service enforcement, four provinces and two territories will not bring their regimes in until, at the earliest, May, 1989.

Of course, we are talking here of estimated compliance dates. The Minister has no guarantee as to the implementation of the safety code. Yet he proceeds with full deregulation. We think the Minister should have waited for an effective and enforceable national safety code to be in place before proceeding. To please his powerful shipper friends, he has put the cart before the horse and, in so doing, is jeopardizing safety on our roads.

Notwithstanding all the minister's fine words in committee and in this House to the effect that security is and will always be the main concern of his government, a mere cursory examination of the facts shows that there is reason for concern. On that basis alone, Mr. Speaker, we would have voted against this legislation. But there is more to it than that.

We will dwell a while upon another issue that concerns the trucking industry in Canada, that is the unfair price practices that result from a deregulated system. It is perfectly clear that in a free market where competition prevails, the shippers will tend to look for the lowest rate available. According to the most basic rules of deregulation, that would be one of the big assets.

Yet we must be careful. Testimony before the California Public Utilities Commission in February, 1987, provides significant insight into the dangers of unfettered price competition. Volume discounts and rate reduction had become the order of the day in California. Several carriers have not had any increase at all in their rate levels since 1980.

Moreover, a price floor has never been achieved in California. Some carriers have always been willing to cut their rates to get a shipment. Indeed, transportation is like a perishable product, a missed load could never be recaptured. That seems to be the prevalent philosophy in California. I suggest that that could be the prevalent philosophy in Canada if we proceed with Bill C-19.

In our opinion, accepting Bill C-19 as is would have catastrophic results for the Canadian motor vehicle transport industry. Most certainly, the American industry giants will be among the first to ask for licences that will have become easier to get. According to industry members in Canada, foreign takeovers of Canadian road carriers will multiply within five years. Since 1981, operating costs in Canada have increased by 28 per cent. That comes mainly from taxes on gas and outrageous costs of liability insurance.

In the same period, the loading rates have increased by only 5 per cent. The net result is that the profit margin has dropped 3 per cent to become one of the lowest since the Second World War. So the large American firms, whose sales often surpass those of the entire Canadian industry, will be in a position to easily penetrate Canadian markets, to lower their rates, to offer predatory prices, to absorb some losses for a year or two and then to take over any Canadian truck undertaking in difficulty. This is why it is dangerous to introduce such an entrance requirement when profit margins are at 3 per cent; the Canadian trucking industry could be destroyed.

Here again, on the question of unfair practices, the American experience teaches us that caution should be the rule, given that, since the coming into force of the U.S. Motor Carrier Act of 1980, which marked the beginning of the deregulation process in the American trucking industry, the largest firms have been growing constantly. In fact, the four major firms, Roadway Express, Consolidated Freightways, Yellowfreight and United Parcel Services, have increased their share of the American market by 24 per cent. This figure demonstrates clearly that these companies intend to increase their market share and can do it rapidly.

[English]

These predatory practices by American carriers have been highlighted by the recent anti-trust suit filed by Lifschultz Fast Freight, a motor carrier based in New York, against the three largest American motor carriers in the United States, Consolidated Freightways Motor Freight, Yellow Freight System and Roadway Express.

Let me quote from the American Transport Association magazine Transportation Topics, from May 18:

> Three of the nation's largest trucking companies asked a Federal Court to dismiss an anti-trust law suit filed against them by another carrier.
> Lifschultz Fast Freight of New York filed the suit March 3, seeking over $1 billion in treble damages from Consolidated Freightways Motor Freight, Yellow Freight System, and Roadway Express. Lifschultz alleged that the fleets attempted to use predatory pricing to drive competitors out of markets and obtain control of those markets. The three carriers were accused of doubling their combined market share in the general freight LTL market over the last ten years at the expense of 104 other carriers Lifschultz said were driven out of business through a concerted campaign of predatory pricing.

Mr. Speaker, in a deregulated market where only the strong survive, the heavyweights can take advantage of their superior strength. By opening Canada's doors wide to these companies, the Government may see the same situation develop in this county, and I think the risk is even greater, because as we know, the American Anti-Trust Act has a lot more clout than the Canadian Competition Act. Despite recent amendments to our Competition Act, I have I am very much afraid that the big American companies will be able to come and do here what they are now doing in the United States and do it even more easily in Canada, because the Competition Act will not have the necessary clout to take on these companies and prevent them from abusing market forces and engaging in unfair competition with small Canadian truckers.

When the Conservative Government justifies its policy by saying that the legislation make the sector more competitive, I think we should remember that the bulk of that competition will come from the giant companies south of our borders, and that Canadian companies will be hard pressed to survive.

Our main concern is that the legislation on combines investigations will not have enough clout to prevent this kind of unfair competition.

[English]

In the whole history of the provision which dates back to the 1950s, only six cases have come to the courts, only one conviction has been obtained and that was for goods given away in large quantities for a period of one year.

The reasons for such ineffectiveness are clear. Predatory pricing is a criminal versus civil offence under the Competition Act. All elements of the offence must be satisfied by the criminal standard of proof which is proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and all criminal law defences are available, including the Charter. The predatory pricing inquiry into Canadian newspapers was launched in 1978 and is a good example of what I am talking about.

Marshalling sufficient evidence to meet the criminal standard of proof is very difficult and is the reason most often cited by the Director of Combines for discontinuing inquiries. The courts have said that the evidence must be strong to convince them to intervene and convict.

Indeed, as Mr. Moore, in his book How Much Price Competition said: "The battle is likely to be over before the case is completed". Such a situation is dangerous for our trucking industries.

We recognized this and at the report stage the Liberal Party moved an amendment which, in some small measure, dealt with these very real concerns. Of course, government Members voted it down, and that is regrettable. It is regrettable because I feel that the Bill deals inadequately with this very serious situation that could arise.

In conclusion, I want to deal with the third area of practical concern which is tied to the use of predatory practices from American mega-firms.

The U.S. companies tend to be bigger and more monolithic, for the very simple reason that a dynamic infrastructure connecting urban centres to terminal networks, set up many years ago by the trucking companies, makes for a very efficient system and, more important, a system that works strongly in favour of the U.S. industry with respect to its ability to compete with the Canadian trucking industry.

In the United States, a network of as many as 860 highways connects metropolitan markets of over one million people. In meagre contrast, Canada has only three. Furthermore, the widening gap between our two taxation systems as a result of the major reforms introduced in the United States in 1986 is working to the advantage of the U.S. companies. They pay less income tax, proportionally, because of the way tax reform has affected vehicle depreciation in the United States. American companies pay a lot less tax on gas, and there is far less government intervention in the U.S. in labour-management relations. All these factors tend to make Canadian companies less competitive.

During the debate at the report stage, we expressed the hope that the Minister of Finance, when tabling his White Paper on tax reform, would take this opportunity to consider the serious problems facing the Canadian trucking industry.

• (1620)

Unfortunately, that was not to be the case. Indeed, there was, for example, no recognition that the Canadian trucking industry was particularly susceptible to U.S. competition and, therefore, ought to have been looked at outside of the larger corporate picture.

On the same subject, I would like to quote from a document sent by Mr. Ken MacLaren of the Canadian Trucking Association to all members of the Standing Committee on Transport:

[English]

If anything, the capital costs allowance comparison information on trucking understates that true advantage of U.S. truckers. Under recent U.S. corporate tax reform a U.S. trucker can now write off heavy duty tractors (Which are by far the most expensive item used in international highway transport) in only three years, not five years as shown in the example.

The attached information was released by Mr. Tom Younan of Price Waterhouse at the CTA conference on tax reform at which Mr. Younan shared the platform with Parliamentary Finance Committee Chairman Don Blenkarn. During the same conference, Lana Batts, Vice President, Policy of American Trucking Associations, in addressing the same audience, referred to the fact that by far the most important gain made by U.S. truckers since deregulation has been under tax reform.

The U.S. trucking industry's relative tax position has been dramatically improved. At one point the U.S. trucking industry was the most heavily taxed industry in America.

From the standpoint of the Canadian trucker, a ten to twenty per cent differential in after-tax return coupled with significantly higher capital cost allowance provisions in the U.S. could be enough to persuade at least some Canadian truckers that the time has come to relocate their international operations. Some are doing so already. Certainly that would be the case if Mr. Wilson follows through on previous indications that he intends to reduce CCA rates.

The Canadian Trucking Association had also asked that compensation for loss of value of operating authority be based on the fuel tax formula base developed for those truckers who could not claim under the existing tax write-offs for good will. There, too, the White Paper was silent.

Mr. Speaker, if the Government had any sense at all, it would rethink its strategy. It is letting an industry that employs 50,000 Canadians... Its 50,000 workers earn an honest living, and their lives are about to be disrupted by the deregulation of the transport industry in Canada. Their jobs are being threatened by the Canadian Government's desire to act quickly. The carelessness of the Canadian Government could mean a slow but certain death for the Canadian trucking industry.

I therefore believe that this Government is acting quite irresponsibly in trying to further the interests of the big Canadian shippers who have asked for these changes and in jeopardizing the existence, the safety and the very life of many truckers.

The Government might destroy by one stroke of the pen what several generations have given us by building a strong and competitive trucking industry.

Of course, the coalition of shippers wants deregulation. However, just as obviously, Canadian truckers are opposed to it.

In closing, I would like to point out that the Government and the Minister have no guarantee from the provinces that a road safety code will be implemented next year or the following year, or even early in the next decade.

We are therefore going to have to approve in 1987 a piece of legislation which has been imposed to Parliament by the Conservative majority and which will completely deregulate the trucking industry in Canada in the hope that, within the next three or four years, there will not be too many accidents or too many abuses in the system and that, in the early nineties, an adequate road safety code will have been implemented.

In my opinion, the Minister of Transport is acting irresponsibly. He has abandoned all sense of his public responsibilities in forcing us to give passage to this Bill in spite of all the warnings he has had and in spite of the disastrous experience of the United States trucking with deregulation.

The Minister of Transport is acting irresponsibly, and as I pointed out in the case of Bill C-18, within a few years, we in the Opposition will have to repair the damage done and amend this piece of legislation in the interests of truckers, workers in the industry and the Canadian public.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it has been for a number of years that I have had the opportunity to involve myself in the whole question of deregulation of the trucking industry. As a Member of the Ontario Legislature from 1975 to 1977, I participated in select committee study within the Province of Ontario on possible deregulation, and since being elected to the House of Commons in 1984, as a member of the Standing Committee on Transport, first dealing with Freedom to Move and then with Bill C-18 and Bill C-19, the twin deregulation Bills of this Government, I find that much of my political life has been caught up in the study of trucking and the rules which apply to it.

I want to say at the outset that I regret seeing once again a Conservative Government—I regret seeing a Conservative Government at any time, actually—moving federally in the same way as it did in Ontario to change the rules of the road.

Before I get into the specifics of the Bill, I would like to quote part of a speech given by the President of the Public Utilities Commission in Idaho earlier this year. An article reporting on the speech is entitled "Idaho PUC President Swisher Dubs Deregulation 'Free-market Feeding Frenzy'". I think the manner in which this gentleman approaches the whole concept of deregulation is interesting. Those who are watching and those who will be reading Hansard for this day's debate will find the speech most interesting. Mr. Swisher said in his speech:

"Utter deregulation is a leap of faith if it can actually be carried off," Idaho Public Utilities Commission President Perry Swisher told a national conference of utility executives and regulators recently.

Swisher was on a panel addressing the topic of total deregulation of the telecommunications industry. The panel was part of the Third Annual Current Issues Conference organized by the Center for Public Utilities at New Mexico State University's College of Business Administration and Economics.

"For about eight years I've been hearing testimony from gurus who proclaim, and interviewing biz ad and econ graduates who believe, they have found God in the market," Swisher said. "The marketplace, if unfettered, will cure warts."

Swisher characterized the drive toward deregulation of the nation's utilities as a proto-religious movement.

"An incredible foundation of this new creed—when you consider the prosaic halls where it is taught—is its Book of Genesis," he said. "In the beginning, there was a free market in which all transactions occurred, in innocence. Enter government, the snake, with regulation, the apple. I stand before you as an heir and beneficiary of a profound seduction. Do away with my function—I myself need only be reduced to a consultant, not a beheaded corpse—and paradise will be regained.

"No other society has this mythology. It is uniquely American—

• (1630)

And I might say North American—

—like jazz. Unlike jazz, but very like the hula hoop and aluminum siding and dental floss, it will last as long as it entertains, preoccupies, and fills a service as yet unprovided by a higher technology. That is, it is oboriginal.

"What we learn is that the entirety of regulation can't be dismantled, if only because some freedoms—as distinct from liberty—rely on regulation," Swisher said. "Freedom of the road would be even more dangerous than it is if your choice of a driving lane on a two-way street was entirely up to you and whether you prefer to stop at green or at red lights, the same. Ideological fervor for flat-out deregulation is of a part with anarchy. It is romantic in the extreme.

"Where deregulation has occurred, it has taken two primary forms," Swisher said. "One is the preemption of local or state authority by federal fiat. The other consists of displacing public, impliedly consensual regulation with private, strategic regulation. Nearly all deregulation has commingled these two strains."

Swisher cited transportation "deregulation" for examples. Idaho's two pages of in-state rail tariffs have been replaced by 150 pages of Interstate Commerce Commission rules. Even so, railroad management now has more freedom. One result has been the abandonment of hundreds of miles of Idaho branch lines.

"—ore concentrates, for example, now go by truck 110 miles to the railhead, paralleling for most of that way a rusting bed of deserted track," he said.

"Nationwide, that energy-efficient system for moving freight is on the decline. Non-metropolitan access is declining. In yet another generation, American rail deregulation could eventuate in the nationalization of the railbeds—a gift from the free-market ideologues to the 21st century, and all in the name of free enterprise.

"Trunk airlines served four, sometimes five airports in our state of scarcely a million people, before deregulation. Now they serve one—Boise. Dozens of Idaho communities lost scheduled common-carrier truck service with truck deregulation. Greyhound crosses Idaho only for the reason a chicken crosses the road—to get to the other side—

"How long the free-market feeding frenzy will last, of course I don't know. Not long, I hope, because it is oblivious to real-world consequences."

In a nutshell, this gentleman has given us the concept and how it is perceived by some people. I would now like to turn to the Bill.

As we worked through Bill C-19 in committee we tried to sow the seeds of doubt in the minds of government Members on the committee. More than that, we tried to sow the seeds of doubt in the minds of officials from the Ministry, from the Minister's office and from the regulatory agency. They are the ones who shape the legislation for the government of the day. We tried to sow doubt in their minds in order to bring about some changes to try to make what we consider a bad Bill a slightly better Bill.

As you yourself know, Mr. Speaker, given your role in the committee, there have been some changes. For the most part we welcome those changes. We wish that the amendments that we had put forward had been accepted in their entirety both in committee and in the House. But, unfortunately, the might of the Government was against us. One could suggest that the might of the bureaucrats was also against us.

It is interesting to note that during the run-up to third reading of Bill C-19 the argument was that this was a shippers' Bill, that it was out to redress some imbalance that existed in the system so that the shipper, the individual who produces a commodity and wants to get it from point x to point y, would get a break because of this Bill. The shippers were strong in their lobby. Their lobbied members of the Opposition, members of the Government, the Minister and officials. They used public platforms wherever they could find them to put forward their case.

On the other side was the trucking industry. Obviously, for vested reasons, and I do not say that in a negative way, it was concerned about the impact of this Bill on its ability to survive and to operate.

So we had two opposing camps. I know that the Shipping Council of Canada was quite upset with what it perceived to be backroom manoeuvering. While we were out on the road as a committee, the Transport Committee having been given the task of reviewing the Bill clause by clause, deals were being made in the Minister's office between truckers and the provinces, the truckers and the federal Government, or between the provinces and the federal Government.

When the shippers appeared before us again in Montreal, I said: "Welcome to the real world of politics". I said that because, unfortunately, that is how things go, deals are made. The shippers now find themselves very unhappy with the Bill. As opposed to their original suggestion to pass the Bill quickly they now feel that damage has been done to the Bill by changing the three years reverse onus provision to five years. It no longer meets their needs. They are now suggesting that it should not go forward. They are appealing to us for a last minute change that would reverse the decision that was made in the backroom between the trucking associations and the Government.

Ironically, while we welcome this new-found opposition, we have said all along that reverse onus is just a form of deregulation and that for all intents and purposes, whether it is three years or five years, deregulation will happen overnight. It will happen as soon as this Bill is proclaimed, as soon as we go to the fit, willing and able test instead of the public convenience and necessity test.

I cite for Hon. Members the experience on the air side where we have had a modified form of deregulation since the spring of 1984. It was brought in by the Minister of Transport of the day through a policy statement. It put in place the reverse onus stipulation so that there is no real strong reason for carriers to object to a new entrant.

We had a situation back a year or so ago in which Air Ontario was coming in to run parallel to Air Canada on a run from Thunder Bay to Sault Ste. Marie or Sudbury, I am not sure which. I went to the local manager and asked: "Are you guys opposing this?" He said: "No, because opposition these days to that kind of thing just does not work, the regulatory agency is not listening to us any more".

If Bill C-19 passes in its current form—and we will do what we can to prevent it from passing—the moment it is proclaimed, which will probably be January of 1988, there will be deregulation in the trucking sector.

Let me go over some of the concerns that we on this side of the House have. We are concerned about safety, about employment, about service to the small communities and the small shippers. We are worried about the decisions that a lot of these new carriers are going to have to make.

If a small one-man operation or family-owned business is faced with the choice of making the bank payment on the rig or buying a needed set of tires, the bank manager will get his money. The small operator, faced with payments that are due and a family to feed, will take the chance on his tires lasting one more week, or his brakes lasting one more week. And because he has on his mind the next payment on his rig and the need to do something about his tires or his brakes, he will push himself as well. He will take an extra hour or two on the road; he will hustle for that extra load he can get by driving 300 miles out of his way.

Faced with a broker who tells him that he has a load if he can deliver it that night, he will take that load. He will stretch himself and his equipment in order to keep food on the table, in order to keep the rig on the road, and in order to keep the bank manager from his door.

That is the kind of scenario we are worried about. We know that the "Sears" of the world, the "Canadian Tires" of the world are not going to be cutting corners in that way. Such corporations have the ability to cross-subsidize within their operations. On the air side, we do not worry about Air Canada or Canadian Airlines International. It is the little guy that we are worried about. We are worried about the small operation, the one-man or family-owned company which does not have a stable economic operation such that it does not have to cut corners. Once corners are cut, safety is jeopardized.

In the United States, we have seen a massive disruption in jobs. We have seen a loss of jobs and job displacement. We have seen a real attack on unionization and a real attack on union wages.

We are concerned about the small communities. In a regulated environment, if a trucker applies to serve two large centres, the provincial regulatory boards are in a position to grant such a licence on the condition that a certain level of service be provided the smaller communities in between. For example, the communities along the north shore of Lake Superior cannot, in and of themselves, justify large volume transporters in or out; they are, however, accessible if a trucking firm, wishing a licence to serve the major centres on either end of the north shore, is instructed to provide service.

We are concerned that once Bill C-19 is passed, it will not be possible to exert the kind of regulatory pressure necessary to force transport companies to provide service to such communities. Everything will be reduced to economies of scale. It is the bottom line that will dictate the level of service.

During committee consideration of the Bill, the trucking companies and shippers indicated that it is the small communities which will be the losers; that it will be the small communities which will face reductions in service, or possibly elimination of service; that it will be the small communities that will face increased tariffs.

In the regulated environment, the carrier was assured a reasonable return in respect of services provided to the smaller communities. Under a free market system, with no control over prices or service, the fly-by-nighter could come in and undercut the existing carrier, driving that carrier out of the market, out of the community, leaving the community in the unregulated hands of that new carrier, a carrier which is quite prepared to squeeze that community for every penny it can because it knows there is no competition.

That is the ultimate irony of this Bill, as it is the ultimate irony of this Government. It professes a belief in competition. Yet, this legislation will eventually—and I emphasize "eventually"—mean less competition.

We have seen that take place in the United States, as we have seen it in other modes in Canada. On the air side, we are back to two major carriers. The little guys have either been gobbled up or have themselves gobbled up the big guys. Where is the competition?

We in Thunder Bay do not even get advantage of seat sales. Because there is no competition other than the two major carriers, we lose out.

I should like to go back to the safety aspect for a moment, Mr. Speaker, because it is that aspect that is really of concern to us. Recognizing the inevitability of the passage of this Bill, what we endeavoured to do in committee was to ensure that the necessary safety tools were in place and operational for at least one year before we moved from the "public convenience and necessity" test to the "fit, willing and able" test.

• (1650)

Fit, willing and able means that if one has the money to buy the truck and pay for the insurance, one gets the licence. One's banker becomes one's regulator. If the banker feels that he is a safe risk financially, he will get money. There is no guarantee of long-term stability. It is just that he has enough money to buy the rig, to pay for the licence, to put in some gas, and perhaps to hire an employee or two. That is all the banker looks at. As long as the owner keeps paying the loan payments on his truck and whatever else he has, the banker does not really care what happens.

We tried to convince the Government that there should be a delay, that at least a year should pass. We know the situation today under a regulated environment. The Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) sat through the committee hearings with us. With his personal political history in Alberta, he knows that things are not that great out there today. We have a lot of unsafe trucks on the road. We already have a lot of corner cutting. It is our feeling that we must bring that up to an acceptable level before we change the rules, so to speak.

We heard evidence from the Province of British Columbia which had conducted a number of safety checks, both local and province-wide. They basically shut down sections of the highway and either pulled everyone over or every fourth or fifth operator. I would like to give an indication of the kinds of things that were found. I refer to an April 5, 1987 article which appeared in the Vancouver Province entitled "Safety check is shocking". In part it reads:

> Only one truck passed a random roadside safety inspection specially staged for The Sunday Province.
> And three of the eight trucks given a 33-point check were pulled from the road by the Ministry of Highways area inspector Sam Nair.
> "It's always the same things—brakes, steering and tires," says Nair.
> "We require that 50 per cent of the brakes be working effectively—some of these trucks are not even meeting that."
> Nair confirmed that as many as 80 per cent of trucks stopped have either failing brakes or ones that are not adjusted properly.

We have had a situation in northwestern Ontario where because of the nature of our region we do a lot of logging. We have a lot of off-highway and on-highway haulage of both tree length and cord length wood. I discovered through communications with one of my constituents that under federal law there is no requirement to have brakes on an extra axle.

These trucks have an axle which under full load drops down so that they have an extra set of tires to carry the load. The trailers are built with brakes on that axle unit, but the regulation does not require the brakes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member has completed the 20 minutes allotted to him. However, it has been the custom at this state of third reading of the Bill to allow a Member more time. Is there unanimous consent to allow the Hon. Member to continue for a few minutes?

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that would find favour on this side of the House, keeping in mind the caveats of earlier interventions that it not be unlimited use of time.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I honestly did not realize that I had used up that much time. I will be very brief. I would like to conclude this one point and make a general comment about the Bill.

When people have a choice, when it is a question of economics, they will make the decision based upon economics, not upon what is safe. When the brakes on these units to which I was referring wear out, the companies do not replace them. They cut the lines to the brakes. It is totally legal, but it points out once again that when economics are involved, unfortunately people will choose the economic rationale as opposed to the extra margin of safety which would be there if the brakes were still working.

I thank my colleagues for giving me the extra time to complete my comments. I could probably continue for 40 minutes or 60 minutes dealing with the information and knowledge I have about trucking deregulation.

I want to say very clearly that the New Democratic Party will be voting against Bill C-19. We think it is the wrong thing to do at this time, particularly as we are ever more under the threat of economic domination by our neighbour to the south.

Quite frankly, the Bill is just one more nail in the Canadian coffin. We like to think we are Canadians. We like to think we are free. However, if we deregulate, we will be less free because of it.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, again I thank you for giving me the floor on this Bill dealing with deregulation, specifically in this case the deregulation of motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings.

Without referring to all the points already raised by my colleagues who have spoken to this Bill, I will lay emphasis on the question of safety because it happens to be my greatest concern, Mr. Speaker: the Minister is going ahead with motor vehicle transport deregulation without first implementing a national safety code. The provinces and the federal Government may very well have signed an agreement a few months ago, but I firmly believe that the national safety code will not be ready by January 1, 1988 when deregulation takes effect.

As you would know, the Committee on Transport held public hearings throughout Canada, and a number of interest groups took this opportunity to urge us not to proceed with highway transport deregulation until such time as a national safety code has been put in place. These people also sought the assurance that the national safety code would be standard from coast to coast, not a checkerboard code but a code which would be similarly applied throughout the country. If I may, as an example I will quote the Atlantic Provinces Trucking Association which represents the interests of the 300-member trucking industry in the four Atlantic provinces. Here is what they had to say, and I quote:

[English]

While the original concerns and/or opportunities presented in the initial brief remain valid today for the most part, the APTA would like to point out that members are still uncertain as to the impact of the various proposed changes. Varying interpretations are being given by federal and provincial officials in such key areas as the timing and enforcement of the new National Safety Code as well as the uniformity of the regulations themselves.

Truckers in the Atlantic provinces are faced with a minimum of five different interpretations of other areas such as the meaning and intent of the "reverse onus" test in enabling a gradual reform phase and commitments to review the impact of the same on the structure of the trucking industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Members of the House would be interested to know that the APTA's mandate is to promote the well-being of the trucking industry in the Atlantic region. Their views are extremely important, and I should think the Minister would indeed be well advised to take them into account. APTA spokesmen also cautioned the committee Members that the impact of deregulation might be quite different in the Atlantic region as compared with the rest of the country. Again I quote:

• (1700)

"The APTA would also like to point out that regulatory reform in the trucking industry may have a different impact on carriers in the Atlantic provinces compared to other parts of Canada. It is our understanding that many provinces across Canada may continue to regulate intra-provincial freight movements as they have in the past, while adopting freer regulations for interprovincial freight movements. Given the smaller size of the intra-provincial freight markets in the Atlantic region, concern has been expressed as to whether or not present provincial and regional carriers will be able to survive in such an environment".

The above comments apply particularly to the three Maritime provinces which are the three smallest provinces in Canada. Should the scenario be that the National Safety Code regulations and their enforcement not be uniform, and the "reverse onus" tests be interpreted differently in the three Maritime provinces, then considerable havoc could result in trucking operations.

It was also noted that APTA officials did insist on the fact that rail rates had to compensate. They felt strongly that Bill C-18 did not provide adequate guarantees, but that Bill has now passed the third reading stage.

Mr. Speaker, I must point out that the concerns of APTA have not been allayed.

With respect to the national safety code, I should like to read a letter written by Trucking Association President Raymond R. Cope and recently published in newspapers. This rather enlightening article is entitled "Deregulation Safety Threat to Truckers, and I quote:

[English]

Deregulation safety threat to truckers.

Transport Minister John C. Crosbie's letter (June 10) suggesting that the implementation timetable for the new National Safety Code is consistent with safe trucking in Canada is totally misleading. The facts are these:

With the passage of Bill C-19, the extra-provincial trucking industry within Canada will be effectively deregulated as of January 1, 1988. Economic regulation of the trucking industry in Canada has in the past provided barriers that have prevented many unsafe trucking operators from acquiring operating authority. Thus, economic regulation has had a safety regulation by-product.

With the elimination of economic regulation, the only barriers to irresponsible trucking operations will be those laws and regulations which are brought into being across Canada to implement the new National Safety Code.

The minister of transport has indicated that the National Safety Code is to be phased in between 1988 and 1990 and that the main elements of the code will likely be in place by January, 1989. This will mean that for the period January 1, 1988 to January 1, 1989, there will be inadequate safeguards to irresponsible and unsafe trucking operations.

As a result, the accident rate in Canada will be higher than it otherwise would be with correspondingly higher numbers of injuries and fatalities.

The deregulation experience in Australia and in the United States has clearly established the need to have a proper safety net in place before the onset of deregulation.

It is essential that the Government of Canada take immediate steps to synchronize the timing of the effective implementation of the National Safety Code and the phase-out of economic deregulation.

And it is signed by Raymond R. Cope, President, Ontario Trucking Association.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian trucking industry is far from being satisfied with Bill C-19. And what about the Canadian people who are quite concerned about the increase in trucking traffic on our highways. Already, we are well aware that the deregulation experience in the United States trucking industry has resulted in a considerable increase in the number of highway accidents.

We, on the Standing Committee on Transport, have been warned by several experts that a similar situation could develop in Canada if a national safety code is not put in place at the same time as deregulation. It is unfortunate for all Canadians, but the Government just will not listen, preferring to risk the lives of Canadians, which is altogether unacceptable.

We, of the Liberal Party, would prefer not to see this bill implemented before the national safety code is in place. We should listen to the officials of the trucking industry. We feel it would be wise to take into account the American experience and to set in place first a national safety code.

To conclude my remarks on highway security, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a letter with a June date which was sent to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) by Mr. A.K. MacLaren, Vice-President of Governmental Affairs, Canadian Trucking Association. I will quote just a few paragraphs:

[English]

An objective overview of the attached material can lead to only one conclusion; namely, that there has been a marked deterioration in highway safety for particular segments of the U.S. trucking industry in recent years and the position continues to deteriorate despite serious attempts to introduce more effective highway safety enforcement.

We have a huge job to be done in Canada on safety and time is of the essence, as we tried to tell the committee. Due to the erosion of the regulatory process in recent years, the Canadian trucking industry has come under much the same pressure as its U.S. counterpart and the position is anything but satisfactory as things stand.

It can only get worse. In that regard, you may be aware that the Quebec Department of Transport recently introduced a comprehensive on-highway enforcement crackdown on highways leading into Montreal and Quebec City. The initial results from that exercise show that well over 50 per cent of vehicles inspected were in violation of either safety or licensing requirements. More and more Canadian carriers operating in the U.S. are now being picked up for serious safety violations there.

CTA and its provincial affiliates are coming under pressure from individual carriers who are not at all happy with the position we have taken on safety. The fact is that there are established fleets operating on a regular basis that push their drivers beyond 20 hours in a shift. If one carrier does it, everyone has to do it to remain competitive. It is just as simple as that.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. And the other paragraphs deal with the need for a national safety code.

You will certainly realize that the deregulation of the transport industry will increase the number of trucks on our highways, which should result in time in a deterioration of our highways. In Atlantic Canada, and especially in my own province of New Brunswick, our highways are already in a very poor condition. As you know, in New Brunswick, our highways are used not only to transport goods to New Brunswick markets, but also to carry goods from the three other provinces towards Central Canada and the United States. We can therefore conclude that this significant increase in trucking traffic will result in a serious deterioration of our highway network.

So there will be a problem, Mr. Speaker. Who is going to pay to repair our highways? Who is going to pay to improve them? In other words, who will foot the bill? Will it be the Federal or Provincial Government? This bill provides no answer.

It will be necessary to increase significantly the amounts spent on highway repairs and development. Of course, it is a provincial responsibility. But we know, and you know, and all Hon. Members here know that a province such as New Brunswick will not be able to implement major programs, for lack of financial resources, because our highways were designed to carry the traffic of 20 years ago. Things have changed and these highways are already used to full capacity. It will be necessary to review the highway network. Where will we get the money?

Will the federal Government be involved? If not, our road system could deteriorate rapidly.

Indeed, I would like to quote the New Brunswick Opposition Leader, Mr. McKenna, our next Premier, it is now a matter of months, and I quote:

• (1710)

In its present state, the New Brunswick section of the Trans-Canada Highway simply cannot handle the demands placed on it. It could never meet future demands, as evidenced by the fact that the number of accidents involving trucks on it is far above the provincial or national average.

Clearly, Mr. Chairman, any new transportation policy must recognize the importance of this highway as the major surface connection between central and Atlantic Canada. This highway needs prompt attention and it must be upgraded to a four-lane divided highway.

I would urge this committee to recommend to the federal Government that it immediately negotiate with this province for the necessary upgrading—for the safety of passengers as well as for the more safe and efficient movement of goods. Deregulation will be much more palatable if we have the tools to compete.

So much for the Opposition Leader's comments, and I could go on to quote New Brunswick's Premier, who holds similar views. It is therefore imperative that we have a second look at the road system and ensure it is improved for the greater safety not only of truckers but of all Canadians.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the extent of my comments, and I firmly believe that on Bill C-19 the Government is proceeding too hastily, because the timeframe set down by the Government for putting in place the National Safety Code will not allow for that Code to be implemented before deregulation is here. This is why it would be wise in my view to oppose Bill C-19, as I will be doing.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has referred to the condition of the roads as that relates to the deregulation of the trucking industry. I was thinking of something while he was speaking, and I am sure others were as well. New Brunswick is a vital link to Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and of course on to Quebec and Ontario going the other way. I wonder if the hon. gentleman could pass comment on the fact that New Brunswick is the only province in Canada that does not have a road that is a main link going straight through the province in a straight line.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): In a straight line?

Mr. Baker: The roads going through New Brunswick are—

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Curved. You said straight line.

Mr. Baker: The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. He has never been on the roads in New Brunswick so he does not know what we are talking about, but the truckers do. The truckers of Canada know what we are talking about.

The roads throughout New Brunswick are simply two-lane highways, and I recall several truckers complaining about this. The roads weave and wind down the west side of New Brunswick and they weave and wind up around the northern part of New Brunswick. There are straight roads in Nova Scotia from Halifax right up to the border of New Brunswick and from Cape Breton Island up to the border as far as Truro. Then in New Brunswick there are these two-lane highways, winding and weaving. Ordinary drivers can find shortcuts on maps but the truckers cannot do this because they are not allowed to. You can take out your map and see where you can cut off 20 or 30 kilometres in driving through New Brunswick. There are signs that say that no truckers are allowed on those roads. I suppose it promotes tourism, but could the hon. gentleman explain why you do not just go straight all the way through the wilderness? In Quebec, for example, you see nothing but highway. New Brunswick only has these two-lane highways. Was there a conscious decision on the part of the New Brunswick Government to do that? Certainly the truckers do not like it.

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) knows New Brunswick's roads well because he used them often enough. When the TransCanada highway—that straddles New Brunswick, from Nova Scotia's border to Quebec's border—was planned, I believe the traffic was not as heavy as it is now. It was then decided to link all the major communities in the province, which was done, the highway going through Moncton, Sussex, Fredericton, along the Saint-John River to Edmundston, and finally to Quebec. The province is now developing a second branch that would link Moncton, Cambellton and Quebec, but I agree with him that road conditions certainly do not favour truckers. If the Hon. Member listened to my comments, at the end of my speech I quoted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenna) who said that some sort of agreement must absolutely be negotiated in order to improve New Brunswick's road system, failing which many lives could be in danger.

• (1720)

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, deregulation was not invented by the present Government. It was inherited from the previous Liberal Government. Would the Hon. Member tell us to what extent the Liberal Party, were it ever to form the Government again, would reverse the deregulation this Bill envisages?

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, it is true that deregulation is not the invention of this Government, because one of my colleagues who was at the Department of Transport under the previous government had undertaken some kind of deregulation. Indeed, we agree on some kind of deregulation. The problem that we have with Bills C-18 and C-19 as they are, is that we believe the Government is proceeding with undue haste which could lead to a lack of security in road and air transport as well as in other means of transportation. However, I do not believe that when Liberals are back in power, we will simply back-pedal to destroy everything that has been done. We will see to it that security measures are in place to have a system that will benefit all Canadians in all regions of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman said there is talk about putting a road between Moncton and Campbellton. If you do that surely you will be going through the New Brunswick wilderness. Is that the intent, or would it be to go to the north shore or the Bay of Fundy? Is it a two-lane or a four-lane highway or what?

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, that second section would serve somewhat the same purpose as does the TransCanada Highway in the other part of New Brunswick. It is an improvement on the present system. When my colleague suggests that such part of the road will go through the wilderness of New Brunswick, let me point out that it will go through my constituency and my village and there will be a lot of people and small communities located along this new road.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Debate.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to speak on behalf of my Party on this legislation which envisages the almost total deregulation of the trucking industry. Under the government proposals there would be a radical change in the way in which the Canadian trucking industry is structured, organized and operated. The impending cut-throat competition this Bill envisages will permit, and in fact in the view of some of its supporters promote, the elimination of most small and medium-sized firms in Canada. There is also the likelihood of intense market battles with large American-owned companies such as Roadway Services of Ohio, Yellow Freight Systems of Kansas, and Consolidated Freightways of California. They could cut a swath through our industry and this would lead to another essential service being dominated by organizations outside of this country.

I believe there are a number of significant, serious and incontrovertible effects of deregulation. Initially, of course, it can bring more competition. I do not think that point is seriously in doubt because barriers to entry into the industry will come down. It will no longer be essential to go through the sort of application process to get routes, necessary permits and licences, as it once was. This will encourage anyone who has or can borrow sufficient capital to buy a truck or, let it also be said, simply to make a down payment and lease a truck, to get into the industry on the basis of a mom and pop type of operation. A couple of brothers or someone hiring a couple of friends could get in the business. It would of course be non-unionized and vulnerable to all sorts of exploitation and difficulties which can arise in a very small firm that depends for its livelihood on the crumbs off the table of the larger companies.

I believe it to be incontrovertible that within a matter of few years there would be a greater concentration of industrial ownership. The big would get bigger and more American, the medium-sized would go bankrupt or be bought up, and the small would scrap fiercely for the crumbs of local markets. The economic pressures under such a deregulated regime are not going to contribute significantly either to economic prosperity or to social harmony in Canada.

We are fortunate never to have seen what one might almost call civil war which has prevailed from time to time in the American trucking industry largely as a result of moves to deregulation. Rate slashing on the major routes has already begun. Discounts are being offered. I, of course, have no objection to discounts being offered but this relates to the whole theory and practice and, indeed, the differences between the theory and practice, of a competition economy which I will go into in some detail later. Discounts as high as 50 per cent on general freight rates and as high as 20 per cent on commodity rates have been reported. We are seeing an over-capacity that will become even more acute as the large American-owned firms and their subsidiaries enter the market.

Trucking deregulation is, of course, closely tied to the Government's free trade initiative. There is little doubt that an unspoken priority on the Government's agenda is to harmonize, as far as possible, Canadian economic policy and Canadian economic regulation with the regulations of the United States. There may be some transitory benefits from this. There may be some small gain. There may be some savings realized in, of course, the larger markets, the larger centres, and the more powerful industries.

However, what a cost there is in terms of American domination of our industry, in this case our commercial trade trucks rating. What a cost in terms of the often painful adjustment which Canadians may have to go through. What a cost in terms of lost jobs and lost wages for people who find their companies taken over by companies which are not prepared to pay the wage rates that they have won through their unions.

Canadian shippers who, after all, are the industrial sector lobbying the hardest for deregulation, are motivated by that self-perceived need to lower their transport cost to match the deregulated American transport costs in preparation for a continent-wide scramble for markets. Thus we see the tie-in between the Government's free trade initiative and this Bill, which is essentially free trade in trucking initiative which is being foisted on the Canadian people.

Let us not forget that so many of those Canadian shippers are themselves branch plants of American firms. The interests they are serving are not necessarily interests of employment, Canadian production, and reinvestment in Canada but may very well be impelled by a desire to increase the economic return that they can send back to the United States in the form of management fees, royalties, licences, franchise fees, intercorporate dividends, and cross-investment.

The potential for the larger American trucking firms to overwhelm the Canadian industry is so palpably obvious that even the Government economic analysts could not ignore or misidentify it. Each of the six largest American companies holds more freight in a single year than the entire Canadian industry. Indeed, the general manager of the Manitoba Trucking Association has argued that the largest U.S. carrier with dozens of terminals can take over the Canadian market by the simple expedient of serving at cut-rate prices from the addition of perhaps four distribution points.

This gets into the fundamental fallacy of the "free market philosophy" as promoted by the Government and as incorporated and inherent in the ideological agenda which underlies the free trade initiative and whose thoughts, of course, underpin this entire Bill.

The fact is that if there is such a thing as a free and perfectly competitive market, it is yet to be identified, at least on this continent. The fact is that natural forces, not necessarily market forces, but the forces of psychology which are inherent in human behaviour, consistently and continuously militate against that so-called free market, that nirvana which sets Tory ideologists salivating and which yet ever remains beyond their grasp or beyond their practical realization. The fact is, of course, that American trucking, which is what is being implicitly held up as a model to us in this Bill, was for years dominated by forces which could be termed less commercial than collusive, less competitive than collaborative and, very frankly, not contributing to the healthier development of society in the United States of America.

I recall the idea that is set out by Adam Smith in the Wealth of Nations about the perfect competitive market. Yet, in recalling it I am unable to come up with any example from real life that truly offers a parallel which could be identifiable as enshrining and incorporating these free market characteristics. Everywhere the free market is trumpeted to exist there are oligopolies and monopolies and there is predatory competition.

It is very difficult for me to imagine an industry which would be more vulnerable to predatory competition and the use of pricing structures to run the smaller competitors out of business than the trucking industry. Surely this has to be one of the industries in which it would be hardest to regulate such a practice and in which it would be hardest for the small operators to survive the operation of such unfair competitive practices. The ability of the larger companies to control the generation of any internal evidence that might point to collusion and to eliminate any visible semblance of collaboration must surely be the major vulnerability in this legislation.

Let us see how it works. Take the case of a small trucker newly entered into the business, lured in by the Government's glittering vision of cross-continent market possibilities, of north-south routes. He has gone to his bank manager with perhaps 25 per cent equity or has gone to the leasing company and entered the trucking industry with one or two major clients, one of which is taken away by the operations of a larger competitor.

This person must then start playing the rob-Peter-to-pay-Paul game. He must decide whether to put this month's customer cheque into the lease payment or into new tires or necessary work on the rig he is driving. It is not a pretty picture. It implies that safety will deteriorate. Even the Ontario division chairman of the Canadian Industrial Traffic League, who has supported deregulation, admits that highway safety is likely to get worse under deregulation when profits start to be squeezed.

I have a considerable amount of documentation from studies that have been done in this industry which can be used to back up such a conclusion. Rather than get into the simple reiteration of statistics which I know my colleagues, in their diligence and knowledge, have put on the record already, I would like to point out some of the likely consequences in terms which can perhaps be more vividly imagined and in terms which relate specifically to my riding.

In the United States the highway accident rate is rising, equipment is being kept on the road longer, is being less maintained, and is carrying heavier loads. I can envisage what is likely to happen in my riding with Highway 17, the Trans-Canada Highway as it is officially and somewhat hyperbolically named given the state of maintenance to which it has been allowed to deteriorate. I believe the highway is already in a condition that reflects no credit upon the federal Government or the Government of the Province of Ontario. Given the likely impacts of deregulation on loads and running times over the road, I cannot foresee that the highway will stand up any better.

One loser in deregulation will be the Canadian truck driver. The impact of deregulation upon the American trucker was devastating, since upwards of 300,000 union jobs were lost, major concessions were demanded and benefits were rolled back. If there is one lesson that the economics of this North American continent should have taught all of us by now, it is that the more remote, less prosperous and less economically influential areas of this country are where the severest impact of deregulation will take effect.

My riding contains many areas which might be classified as remote, small centres. In many of these parts, freight comes from 300 to 400 miles away, generally in truck load form and occasionally in less than a truck load form.

Quite often there is not a back haul for the trucker to return due to the nature of the local economy and the size of the community. Deregulation in these areas could lead to a reduction of service, an increase in prices and, after taking over the medium carrier, abandonment by the larger carriers who may not find the smaller market worth-while any longer.

There are a number of examples in my riding of opposition to this Bill and the Government's over-all deregulation plans. On April 13, 1987, the Town of Fort Frances passed a resolution that the request by the Fort Frances and District Labour Council for the Town of Fort Frances to register opposition to Bills C-18 and C-19 be approved and the request of the District Labour Council be fully supported.

The District Labour Council in Fort Frances compiled an excellent brief and analysis on the possible effect of transportation deregulation in an area such as Fort Frances which is over 200 miles from the nearest major centre.

They were concerned about less competition, about control of the market by fewer firms and, above all, the situation under deregulation where because of dips in profitability over an extended period of time it may not pay the airlines, buses, railways, or trucks in this instance, to routinely provide service to outlying areas. Nothing in the legislation will either compel them to do so or indeed give them any incentive to do so.

As the Labour Council said:

> How many of our local businesses will be able to afford the higher price of shipping or receiving their goods, and if the increased costs are passed on to the consumer, how many customers will they lose, if unemployment rises due to business failures, there will be even fewer markets than before. Shrinking markets and higher transportation costs are not factors likely to attract investors to our community.

When we consider deregulation of the trucking industry in my part of northwestern Ontario, we have a powerful example that we believe provides a close comparison and very persuasive paradigm of what may happen. I refer to the airline industry. We have had a spate of amalgamations in the airline industry in this country that have led to a loss of jobs. While there has been some improvement in other areas, it is my experience that there has been a deterioration of some services and our over-all impression is that deregulation is not good for the outlying areas of this country.

If we consider the situation in the United States now, a very persuasive report published in one of our national newspapers a couple of weeks ago indicated the degree of inconvenience and disservice suffered by airline passengers all the way from the downtown taxi terminal to the point of arrival because of the effects of deregulation. A copy of Harper's Index indicated that the average airline fare in the United States since deregulation had risen 42 per cent.

We should not be looking to chaos in Canada's trucking industry any more than the United States should have been looking to chaos in its airline industry, which is the situation that appears very much to be developing. I and my Party stand in opposition to this Bill. It is not the prescription for the development of a healthy decentralized Canadian economy. It is a prescription for more centralization under the control of our neighbours to the south.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman comment on the effects this Bill will have on trucking companies in the more rural areas of Canada—

Mr. Epp (Provencher): As opposed to less rural ones?

Mr. Baker: As opposed to the more urban populated areas of Canada. Will there be a drastic effect on the local trucker in northern Ontario?

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member represents a remote, mainly rural area of this country, as I do. In fact, when I read a recent newspaper account of the difficulties he faced in getting around his riding personally, they seem to reflect very much my own experience. We must have a bragging match on that point.

The obvious conclusion on the fate of the trucker in remote or rural areas is, first, that the prime routes into remote areas that involve steady hauls and reasonable bulk of commodities will be taken up by the larger companies. They will be taken up by companies that will eventually be swallowed by large multinational companies controlled by the United States.

There may be phases when local trucking in rural areas flourishes to a limited degree. That is a possibility we cannot overlook because in a developing market where there is a local trucker who has the intelligence and initiative to take advantage of that local market, presumably he or she will become the first to serve it. There may be a period of time in which that trucker will reap a reasonable return for that route.

However, we must remember that the logical corollary of that type of opportunity is that the larger firms, with their commercial intelligence operations, contacts, and ability to gather information through the analysis of statistical reports provided by the Government, will identify those opportunities when they grow beyond the level of a one or two-truck operation. At that point in a deregulated environment they will be able to enter the market and offer whatever price they want to get the business that has been developed and essentially take the market from the small local competitor. They will have the opportunity to either drive that competitor into bankruptcy or purchase the assets of that competitor, often at a very reduced price, and incorporate them into their own wider operation.

These are the risks and perils for the remote areas of this country. The consequences will be higher prices for such things as groceries, furniture, appliances, building materials and everything else that is trucked into the remote areas of Canada.

Mr. Angus: I wonder if I could put a question to my colleague? I listened with interest to his very excellent presentation to the House on Bill C-19, but there was one area the Hon. Member did not touch upon. Because of my knowledge of his riding, and I think the awareness of the whole country, I wanted to ask what happens when a transport truck gets into difficulty on the Trans-Canada Highway, as happened a couple of years ago, not in terms of a road accident per se, but in terms of the leakage of PCBs along that highway.

In a deregulated environment where safety has gone the way of decisions to pay the banker instead of putting a new set of tires on the truck, what would an accident of a fairly serious nature of a transport truck on the section of the Trans-Canada Highway between, say, the Manitoba border and the community of Kenora, do to the security of our system in terms of our ability to move goods from east to west?

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, the situation of blockages of the Trans-Canada Highway is one which is relatively familiar to the residents of my riding of Kenora—Rainy River. The Trans-Canada Highway has been blocked over the years for many reasons. Sometimes a truck hits a moose, goes out of control and straddles the entire highway. At other times a forest fire or a blizzard can close the highway for days, even up to a week at a time. Of course, the example, given by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus), was potentially one of the most serious incidents by which the Trans-Canada Highway was blocked.

When we have small undercapitalized operators in the trucking business—and that is a situation which deregulation must surely encourage, and I believe the Government has intended to encourage—then we will have situations like the trucking company which trucked the still PCB-laden transformers from Quebec to the Nisku Industrial Park in Alberta which was the eventual intended destination. That company folded its tent. It did not pay its fine and did not appear in court to defend itself against the suits brought against it. We were left in a situation where the Province of Ontario had to pay the cost of the clean-up and had no opportunity to collect from the polluter, in effect, the cost of that clean-up.

If a properly regulated environment had determined that the carrier of those dangerous goods had not only complied with all the safety procedures for the shipment of those goods, but had also complied with all the bonding and insurance provisions, and had posted adequate security for the safe movement of those goods—and this would be the situation with responsible re-regulation of the trucking industry—society as a whole and the Exchequer of the Province of Ontario would have been properly protected.

It is my belief, and I think the experience of the United States would bear it out, that in the unregulated, deregulated environment the Government is proposing in this Bill, the potential for this sort of environmental hazard and disaster will be indeed greatly magnified.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman could suggest a solution to the problem, that is, of the transportation by a truck or other means of polychlorinated byphenyls? What is the solution to the problem? Does he believe that he might be able to offer some suggestions?

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to respond to that question, although it is a little outside the main thrust of this Bill. It would appear to me that a manifest, concise system with a verified pick-up and delivery of any items such as a transformer which contains PCBs, would, first, ensure that the container or object was in safe condition when put on the truck and, second, would double-check that the object or container was in safe condition when it was taken off the truck. There would certainly be those environmentalists who would advocate that there should be some form of gateway or weigh-scale check at different points of the itinerary of any such possibly harmful and toxic waste. That would certainly be an alternative which I think a responsible government would have to look at if this sort of disaster with the polychlorinated biphenyls were repeated.

I believe it is also obvious under the provisions of Ontario legislation that it would be the height of folly for any carrier to take on a hazardous cargo or load for which it was not properly insured, bonded and licensed, to ensure the safe carriage of that cargo to the final destination.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is over. Debate.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I was going to pose a further question concerning the transportation of dangerous goods, specifically, polychlorinated byphenyls, or any number of dangerous goods, with which we have a problem disposing of as a country. We have no means that I know of today, unless I am behind the times, of actually disposing of that particular chemical. In fact, the transportation of that particular waste takes place via truck whenever a provincial authority allows it. In other words, to carry PCBs over the highways of Ontario, to get them to Alberta from the Province of Quebec, requires the permission of the Provincial Department of Transportation in the Province of Ontario. The Province of Quebec does not usually give that type of permission to a carrier to move from eastern Canada to western Canada, so one has difficulty in moving the product. Certainly, the problem has to be addressed, not only in the movement of PCBs, but how do we get rid of the stuff once we move it?

The Bill before us today is simply a continuation of the policy of the Government of Canada to allow the transportation industry to run downhill. The Government intentionally over the past two years has forced Canadian National to increase its rates and to discontinue some of its services in various areas of the country, although the Government got elected on the promise it was going to revitalize the railway in Canada. It was going to provide the railway with enough money and competitive spirit to really carry the goods and services right across this country. In other words it was going to provide a cheap transportation network across the country for passengers and goods for the people of this country. All we have seen is a steady downhill passage as far as the transportation of goods is concerned. We have seen Canadian National have imposed upon it various budget restrictions. We have seen the carrier then via the water, that is, Canadian National Marine, CN Marine, or Marine Atlantic, or whatever one wants to call it, having restrictions imposed upon it so that it has to increase all of its rates, thereby driving up the costs of goods to people who live in Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland.

Do you wish the floor for a moment, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes. It being six o'clock pursuant to Order made Friday, June 12, 1987, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on his Private Members' Business, I have received written notice from the Hon. Member for Montreal—Saint Marie (Mr. Malépart) and the Hon. Member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore (Mr. Boyer) that they are unable to move their motions for Private Members' Business M-21 and C-209 respectively on the dates required by the Order of Precedence. It has not been possible to arrange an exchange in positions in the Order of Precedence pursuant to Standing Order 39(3)(a). Accordingly, I am directing the Table to drop these items of business to the bottom of the Order of Precedence.

There will be no Private Members' Business on the days which would have been scheduled for these items, namely, Thursday, June 25, and Friday, June 26. The House will continue to consider Government Orders pursuant to Standing Order 39(3)(b).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS--MOTIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

ADVISABILITY OF REPEALING USE OF SEVERANCE PAY AND PENSION INCOME IN CALCULATING UI BENEFITS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the regulations made under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, in order to repeal the dispositions which have the effect of taking into account severance pay and pension income when assessing unemployment insurance entitlements.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the chronology of events which has lead to the necessity of my presenting this motion for debate is very essential for us to look at. This motion—and I know that Bill C-50 was passed some weeks ago—is one more attempt to persuade the Government to look into its heart and to see how the passage of the regulations following the announcement in November, 1984, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) have impacted so unfairly on many, many Canadians. Furthermore, it is another attempt to try to persuade the Government that, in effect, what it passed in Bill C-50 some weeks ago goes only part way in retreating from the untenable position announced by the Minister of Finance in November, 1984.

We all recall November, 1984. The Conservative Government came to power with a massive majority. What did the Minister of Finance state in his first budgetary statement on November 8, 1984? Suddenly, it was not "jobs, jobs, jobs" anymore but it was "cut the deficit, cut the deficit, cut the deficit". There was not any consultation whatsoever with those who were affected. Their representatives were not consulted. Members of Parliament on the government side were not consulted, nor were Members on the opposition side. Members of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration were not consulted. The Unemployment Insurance Commission, which has the responsibility for administering the UI program, was not consulted. The Advisory Council of the Employment and Immigration Commission was not consulted either.

The Minister put on his new shoes, came with his blue rose in his lapel—if one can imagine a blue rose—and stood up in the House and announced changes to the Unemployment Insurance program by which pension income and severance pay would henceforth be considered earned income for unemployment insurance purposes.

From the moment the Minister sat down we on this side of the House condemned his announcement. At that time we said that this treatment of pension-severance pay as earned income was unfair, that it was discriminatory and illogical. We know that over 100,000 Canadians were affected by that announcement. They were negatively affected. The Government saw pension income as earned income.

I want Hon. Members to think about that for a moment. Pension funds are really savings. A worker agrees to take part of his wage and the employer agrees to match it. The money is put aside in a pension fund and can only be withdrawn when the employee reaches a magic age or fulfils the agreement of the pension program.

In small companies which do not have pension plans what does a worker do? Looking to his retirement years, a worker takes part of his income and places it into an RRSP. He may very well make some investments to look after his retirement years so that when he stops working or when he is of an age to leave his job he can withdraw the funds. Yet the RRSPs and the investment income are not affected by this ruling. It is only the pension plan wherein a worker saves for his retirement years that is affected by this regulatory change.

One of the things that struck us at that time was that the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, which states that pension income or severance pay was not earned income for unemployment insurance purposes, was an Act of Parliament passed by Members of the House. What the Minister of Finance announced was an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and it was done by regulation. It seems to me that that sort of fiat struck at the very heart of what we call parliamentary democracy. In fact, the Government did by stealth what it did not have the courage or the fortitude to put before the House in the proper form as a Bill.

Having taken that position, the proverbial you-know-what hit the fan. In fact, some would say that the Government held up the fan. Having done that, we saw more slipping and sliding than one has ever seen in a stable. The Government backed up and then slipped and slid and postponed until, in fact, it stirred the pot so much that it was impossible to see the bottom.

Nobody knew where they stood in respect of the regulations regarding UI and pension income and UI and severance pay. The former Minister, who is now the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald), kept issuing edicts which postponed the pension change, so what was announced in November 1984 did not become effective until January 5, 1986. When the whole thing was blowing up, to save face and their political necks, they used a good tried and true method—they asked a commission to study the matter.

The matter was turned over to Claude Forget, and the Forget Commission studied the change in respect of pension income and UI. The commission was to make a recommendation to the Government on both the pension question and the severance pay question.

Not only were the changes unfair and discriminatory, but they set up classes. There were those workers who were able to work deals with their employers such as in the case of Inco and Falconbridge in my community where workers could have their pensions deferred for a year while they collected UI. Not all workers, certainly not Armed Forces personnel, are able to make that kind of deal. Therefore, we have one set of workers treated one way and another set of workers treated in an entirely different way.

The Government and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) held up Bill C-50 as their solution to the problem. It even says that a worker can collect full UI benefits provided that he gets a second job. If a worker takes an early retirement, he must show good faith by going out and getting a second job. If he gets a second job and is laid off from it, he can collect his full UI plus his pension from his first job. How discriminatory, how class conscious.

It might be easy in some parts of the country for workers to get second jobs. In places like southern Ontario it is quite possible. However, it is not so easy for older workers to get second jobs in northern Ontario, the Atlantic provinces, British Columbia, or parts of the northern Prairies. In fact the Government has reinforced the discriminatory aspects of the original change in 1984.

We know how difficult it is to get a second job. As a matter of fact, the 1985 report of the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council pointed out that the change in unemployment insurance regulations was seen as a most unfortunate development which came at a time when every means of assisting unemployed older workers should be explored. Even that advisory council pointed out how difficult it was for older workers to get second jobs.

Since the recession of the early 1980s, the whole question of early retirement was used by employers to ease older workers out of the active workforce to protect the jobs of younger workers. That is a fair goal. Many workers accepted it. It is not that they were finished with the work world, but they could go out to seek a second job, knowing full well that they had the backing of unemployment insurance to tide them over. Once they made that decision, they were hit between the eyes by an unconscionable change in the rules. The Government is changing the rules in the middle of the game.

No active player of hockey or any other sport would expect a referee to blow the whistle in the middle of a game and say, "I have just been handed a change of rules by the governors of the league, and you shall not shoot unless you are 60 yards from the goal". No referee would start introducing all sorts of changes in the middle of a game, but that is exactly what the Government did. It did it without any representation from the players in the game or their representatives. It was certainly done without any consultation with Parliament or its standing committees.

What did Claude Forget say when he finally reported? He said to the Government that the idea that pension income was earned income and the changes were fine, but that he disagreed with the way in which they were implemented. He said that the Government had not given enough notice to the players in the game and therefore advised it to go back and pay all the UI and then make an announcement that as of January 5, 1989 the new rules would come into effect.

Of course that is a little fairer than what the Government did, but it is totally unacceptable. Let me make crystal clear that we would not accept that, because using pension income and severance pay as earned income was unfair in the first place. They are savings.

The Minister had that proposal from the Forget Commission. Then the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration looked at the question. I see the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) in the Chamber; he is the new chairman of the standing committee. It looked at the Forget report and at the pension income and severance pay questions.

What did the standing committee say to the Minister and the Government? It was an all-Party committee and there was a majority decision, with only one member voting against it. It said that pension income was not to be considered earned income for UI purposes.

Mr. Boudria: Who voted against it?

Mr. Rodriguez: The one who voted against it was the Hon. Member for Jonquière (Mr. Blackburn). He said, "The Minister is a friend of mine; I cannot go against the Minister". The Hon. Member for La Prairie, God bless his soul, was unbiased. One would think that he would spout the government line, but he brought fair judgment to the committee.

Mr. Boudria: Let's hear it for the Hon. Member for La Prairie.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: He deserves that applause.

The committee submitted the report to the Government, but what did the Government do? It said "No, no, no", and it came out with Bill C-50, a Caspar Milquetoast Bill, which clearly put the Minister on the fence where he could sit and get a lot of splinters.

I say to the Government,"Shame, shame, shame". It is not too late. It is never too late to repent. Just as we passed Bill C-50 by regulation, the Government can change the rule and give pensioners their full UI benefits. It can say to those people who were laid off and got severance pay, "By golly, you take that severance pay and use it, and with the UI benefit get retrained or move to a place where there is a job; use it to tide yourself over until you get another job".

Instead, what did the Government do? It punished them. I see you signalling, Mr. Speaker, that I must wind up. I am just getting going. Can you imagine anything more cruel than a person who has worked 15 years for a company and one Friday he gets a blue slip—it is not pink any more, it is blue—saying "You are through". He gets severance pay of $7,000. This fellow has 15 years with that company. He is not going to walk out of the door of that company and pick up another job because he may be 35 or 40 years old. What do we do? First, we penalize him by making him pay tax on that $7,000 even though he has lost his job. The Government turns around and says to him "You don't get UI benefits because you have $7,000". Is there anything more heartless, cruel, unfeeling and insensitive? I say it is a shame. Shame, shame on the Tories. Shame on them.

I see you have indicated that my time is up, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would love to give the Hon. Member more time but he is over his time by one minute now.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has indicated, he had other points he wanted to make. Would there be a disposition in the House to provide unanimous consent to allow him to finish his remarks?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to give the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) time to finish his remarks?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak this motion. In fact, in seventeen months this must be the twenty-fifth motion tabled on the subject in the House of Commons. I think Canadians and parliamentarians, especially Conservative Members whose memories tend to be rather short, should recall it all started on January 5, 1986. Before January 5, 1986, if a worker, old or young, lost his job by reason of termination of employment or because he agreed to take early retirement and let a younger person take over his job, as an alternative to laying off people, and if he was then in a position to look for another job, he had the right to draw full unemployment insurance benefits, notwithstanding any income from an employer-employee pension plan or severance pay following the closing of a plant.

Unfortunately, on January 5, 1986, not by a decision adopted in the House of Commons but by regulatory order, supported by Cabinet, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), this Government decided—

Mr. Boudria: It was Brian's doing!

Mr. Malépart: —without any notice whatsoever, without informing parliamentarians, without informing the workers, the Government decided that as of January 5, 1986, income from pension plans to which these people had contributed would be considered as earnings and their unemployment insurance benefits cut accordingly.

This immediately affected 35,000 workers in Canada. The decision, made without prior notice, was arbitrary and it was unfair. From then on, after protest movements were organized in Quebec, the Liberal Party, at the request of its Leader (Mr. Turner), got together with these coalitions to force the Government to change its course. And we know what happened. The pressure was on. We even had a change of Ministers, when the former Minister became Minister of Communications, and the Hon. Member for Roberval became Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard). At that point, all this Government could say was: Well, we are going to ask the Forget Commission to tell us whether we are right or wrong. And that was because not a single Conservative Member in this House had the guts to tell the Minister: You are wrong. The money belongs to those workers. It's their money. It's the employers' money. It came out of their pockets. The money doesn't belong to the former Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald), and it doesn't belong to the Prime Minister. It belongs to the workers. The Conservatives said: Forget Forget. If you got your benefits, you will have to pay them back.

Mr. Speaker, not a single Conservative Member rose in the House at that time. Elderly workers had to come here to Parliament Hill to challenge the Government. They were unemployed and they had to spend money to come here. They were losing money every two weeks because the Government didn't give them their full benefits. These people had to pay $20 or $25 to charter a bus and come and challenge the Government because they could not have meetings with their Members in their ridings. There were pressures from the representatives of ARSAC, from Mr. Cloutier, Mrs. Lalande, Mr. Fortin of Montreal, and from representatives of our military. After three manifestations on Parliament Hill and after publication of the Forget Commission Report, the Government was told: "You were wrong; Mr. Prime Minister, you are wrong; you have to reimburse these people; you cannot change the rules in the middle of the game." Did you ever hear of someone who has automobile insurance being told after an accident: "I am sorry, but the rules have changed and you can get compensation only after your second accident. Go and have another accident, and when you lose your other leg, come back and see us; we shall pay you for both." This is silly, but it is what the Conservative Government wanted to do.

We have won half the battle, thanks to the Leader of the Liberal Party, who asked the members of his party to fight as long as something could be done to obtain fair treatment for older workers. Unfortunately, in spite of the pressures exerted by the Official Opposition, by the labour organizations, by the Forget Commission, which cost $6 million of taxpayers' money and whose recommendations were rejected out of hand by the Government, and by the Committee on Employment and Immigration, including its Conservative members, with the exception of the Hon. Member for Jonquière (Mr. Blackburn)— In passing, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Laprairie (Mr. Jourdenais), even though I cannot congratulate his other colleagues who have been content to do nothing publicly while leading us to believe in private that they were doing something, because he at least was not afraid to defend these workers and to tell the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) and the Prime Minister that they were wrong.

Unfortunately, what the Government has given us is even more shocking than the amounts spent on shoes by the Prime Minister. It is shocking to think that all the workers over 55 who are laid off following the closing of a plant, whether on the South Shore, in the Quebec riding, in the Richelieu riding or anywhere else in Canada, are being told: "My dear sir or madam, you are not entitled to your full unemployment insurance benefits as are other workers because the Conservatives have decided that the pension contributions you paid while you were working is not an investment, but earned income. However, if you know someone who has invested in an RRSP, whatever his income, even if it is $500 a month, you can tell him that he is entitled to the full unemployment insurance benefits."

And that is the kind of injustice which this Government and Conservative Members, including the Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon), the Member for Quebec East (Mr. Tremblay) and the Member for Châteauguay (Mr. Lopez), are willing to condone to make sure that all workers who lose their job as a result of a plant closure as well as all military personnel, men and women in our armed forces, who are now needlessly paying unemployment insurance premiums, will have to find alternate employment, and if they should lose that second job then the benefits are no longer deemed to be an income as they were the first time.

This gives you an idea of the way this Government operates and manipulates people. Had it not been for the determination of the Liberal Party, for the doggedness of various groups such as ARSAC, the Quebec coalition and representatives of the military, had it not been for them the 35,000 early retirees in Canada, including 13,000 in Quebec, would not be getting their cheques. Indeed the Government and the Tories were satisfied with the situation, and the only reason why they decided to reimburse these claimants was that we turned the screws on them, we had them with their backs up against the wall and they were ashamed. They are sending refund cheques to these 35,000 people because they have been forced to do so, not because they think these people had a good case.

But we have to be on our toes . . . Mr. Speaker, I have only two minutes left. People have to be on their toes. At the request of my leader, I can assure these people—because the cheques have not been delivered yet—that we will keep an eye on the situation until the last minute, until these 35,000 people get their money.

It does not matter where they live—Quebec, Alberta, the Atlantic Provinces, Western Canada—we Liberal Members have been asked by our leader to be vigilant and make sure that these people are not penalized as a result of this decision.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude on this note and I hope the Conservative Members will rise to speak. I think the New Democratic Party Members have clearly and unequivocally expressed their opposition, no one has to wonder where they stand. To us Liberals the issue is crystal-clear: we want things to be as they were before, we do not want two classes of workers, we do not want any injustice.

Now it will be the Conservative Members' turn to speak, and I hope we are not going to see a lot of twisting and turning and posturing and beating around the bush as we did when the early retirees went to their offices. It seems they said: Well, personally, I think you are right, but you know how things are . . . And once they are back in the House, they switch sides.

Mr. Speaker, I am about to conclude my remarks, and I hope there are some Conservative Members who will fight, because there is still a chance, there is still a glimmer of hope, a very slight glimmer, if Conservative Members are prepared to take a stand in their caucus and demand that the Government introduce amendments to give all workers a fair deal, instead of just half the early retirees.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House during the hour set aside for Private Members' Business, and especially to speak to Motion 26 which deals with Bill C-50, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, which contains, as you probably know, and I think it does no harm to repeat it, three important amendments for Canadian workers. These deal with the provisions to include income from pensions and severance pay in calculating unemployment insurance benefits.

As Hon. Members well know, on April 5 of this year new regulatory provisions dealing with pension income and severance pay came into effect.

One of the amendments contained in Bill C-50 makes amendments dealing with pensions retroactive to January 5, 1986.

Since January 5, 1986, income from pensions arising out of employment is considered as earnings for the purposes of unemployment insurance.

Bill C-50 provides that a worker whose benefit period is based on subsequent employment, whether it started before or after January 5, 1986, will no longer have his income from a pension arising from his previous employment considered as earnings for the purposes of unemployment insurance.

This Government has always held the firm conviction that individuals who retire should not consider unemployment insurance as an additional source of income.

Furthermore, we must make a distinction between people who retire permanently and those who retire in order to start a new career. The amendments allow for this distinction. They make sure that that group of people who retire and start on new careers are treated fairly and equitably, since they are still part of the labour force.

It is our belief that those people should be entitled to full unemployment insurance benefits, whatever their pension income.

Those amendments will benefit workers who have started on a new career in which they pay unemployment insurance contributions. If they later become unemployed, they will be entitled to full unemployment insurance benefits, based on their employment income following retirement, whatever their previous pension income.

In order to illustrate the situation, I will give a real life example taken from the experience of some retirees and the impact on them of the new proposals in the Bill.

Let us take a member of the Canadian Forces who retired in February, 1986 and applied for unemployment insurance. Under the January 5, 1986 regulations, the amount of his pension income will be deducted from his unemployment insurance benefits. No change so far. Let us now assume the same person found a new job in June, 1986 for instance, and was laid off a few months later. Under the previous regulations, they would have kept on deducting his pension income from his U.I. benefits.

Under the provisions of Bill C-50, the worker whose unemployment insurance benefits were reduced because of pension income will be reimbursed all the deductions to that time if his benefit period is based on previous employment.

On the other hand, another major amendment will allow people who filed a claim for unemployment insurance benefits before January 5, 1986, to have their eligibility determined under the old rules. As the saying goes, old claims, old rules.

As already mentioned in this House, some people have allegated that they were given vague information about the pension income provisions which came into effect on January 5, 1986. The fact is that, when the regulations on pension income came into effect, retirees with pension income either lost their entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits or had their benefits reduced.

Bill C-50 therefore provides that any claim filed before January 5, 1986, is not covered by the regulations on pension income.

The eligibility of these claimants will be determined under the old rules. To make this even clearer, let me say that a retiree whose unemployment insurance benefits have been interrupted or reduced because of his pension income and who filed a claim before January 5, 1986, will be reimbursed an amount equal to the deductions from his benefits.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of Bill C-50 will affect many Canadians. These changes show the determination of this Government to ensure that all workers are treated fairly. As I pointed out in this House on June 11, Mr. Speaker, I shall continue to monitor the progress of this Bill to ensure that it is approved by the Senate as quickly as possible so that the workers concerned can have their cheques shortly.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we are firmly convinced that our unemployment insurance legislation now meets the expectations and needs of all Canadians.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise in support of the motion before the House put forward by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). He has fought an incredible battle for fairness and equitable access to unemployment insurance for many Canadians. Wherever I go across Canada, I find that the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt is certainly held in very high esteem because of the job he has done on this particular piece of legislation.

I wish to discuss a matter that affects retiring members of the Canadian Armed Forces. Many individuals have retired in the area of Comox and generally when individuals retire from the Canadian Armed Forces, they are not in a position to choose the time they retire. They are asked at a certain age to leave the Armed Forces in order to make room for younger people or for new people. It is as a result of that that throughout the years, when individuals have left the Armed Forces, they have been able to take with them unemployment insurance benefits in order to make adjustments into the community.

Adjusting into a community is very important because many of these retirees are in their forties and fifties and have to make profound adjustments. Many leave the area in which they had been living. Many must sell homes in which they had lived for some time and must purchase other homes in other areas. This adjustment is hard to make on the rather meagre superannuation they receive immediately upon leaving the Armed Forces. Therefore, it is important that they have unemployment insurance benefits as a cushion to carry them through that adjustment period. Most Canadians would agree that after 20 to 25 years of service to their country, retiring members of the Canadian Armed Forces are entitled to that cushion.

Many of those members have children graduating from high school and going on to post-secondary education. This is a time of enormous financial burden for the families concerned. Not only are they retiring from their lifetime career, they are faced with the additional financial burden involved in their children attending university. If you live in the Comox Valley, your children must travel hundreds of miles to attend university. They have to pay for room and board, tuition, books, and otherwise support themselves. Members of the Canadian Armed Forces who retire to the Comox Valley and wish to support their children who are attending university need the additional cushion in the form of unemployment insurance to make the adjustment. As I said, most fair-minded Canadians would agree that it is not unreasonable that those people receive the benefit of that income.

What has the Government done? In January of 1986 it decided it would no longer permit this to happen. Right in the middle of the game the Government changed the rules. Retiring members of the Armed Forces did their homework. They made preparations. They were in a position to take responsibility for the transition to civilian life. Then, all of a sudden, the Government changes the rules of the game. This has caused great suffering. Many of these people were unable, on such short notice, to make the adjustment to meet their responsibilities. Many of them were unable to obtain employment or, in any case, reasonable employment to fill the gap.

That will not be quickly forgotten. Many people who supported the Conservatives in the last election thought that they would make right the years of neglect by the Liberals. What happened? They found they were even more badly handled by the Conservative Government.

In addition to being unable to collect unemployment insurance, the Government, adding insult to injury, insists that when they go to work they pay unemployment insurance premiums. Here you have a retired member of the Armed Forces collecting a modest pension, forced to immediately obtain employment because he or she is unable to collect unemployment insurance—and it is often only part-time employment at low wages—and then forced to pay unemployment insurance premiums on top of it all. Given the seasonal nature of work in many areas of British Columbia, particularly in the Comox Valley, lay-offs occur frequently and the individual finds he or she cannot collect unemployment insurance. The Government has turned around and imposed an additional burden on those retired members of the Armed Forces.

I would like to make my comments this afternoon very brief.

Mr. Malone: Good.

Mr. Skelly: I hear one of my friends saying "good". If the point is made, then it is good. Hopefully we will see members of the Conservative Party who have some respect and consideration for retired members of the Armed Forces support this very worth-while motion put forward by my colleague from Nickel Belt.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I also welcome this opportunity to take part in this hour of debate, a debate that is definitely a Johnny-come-lately, since the Bill has already reached the Senate, and the cheques will soon be delivered to our early retirees who are very anxious to get them. As usual, however, the NDP keeps arguing. That happens to be its specialty, and today it is again using up time that could otherwise be used for constructive debate and the well-being of Canadians. Of course the Liberal Party is in it as well—we hardly know which one is the Official Opposition—and it too is claiming that the Government is wrong and that it should do this and that. They would like to revert to the old system when money was spent without any concern for deficits. I suppose they would like to go back to a $38-billion dollar deficit, with acumulative deficit of $225 billion. Who cares! For them it was a matter of voting for what they wanted when they wanted to and hang the consequences. That is the kind of government we had then. That is the kind of government the voters threw out three years ago. And that is the kind of government they don't want back.

The early retirees realized that because of an erroneous interpretation by certain officials at the Employment Centres, they were misinformed. Some people took early retirement on the basis of the erroneous information, and that is why, we corrected the situation. We did not do what the previous Government did. We're not stubborn. We listened to our fellow citizens. We understood their concerns in our ridings. We defended them in caucus. And we managed to find a solution that gave them full satisfaction, as they said last month in the media across this country.

Today, of course, the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart), for instance, rose in the House a little while ago to give vent to his indignation and to say that the Government had to go on spending whether it was $1 billion, $2 billion or $250 million, it had to go on spending money on early retirees, claiming this would make room for younger workers. However, we know that 90 per cent of early retirees are not replaced by the youngest workers because in 90 per cent of the cases the jobs are automated. The Hon. Member may not remember that in 1976 or 1977, the Government, that was during his time, cut family allowances by $5 and by putting a five per cent ceiling on indexation, prevented senior citizens from getting a 6 per cent increase in benefits, which at the time was about $25 per month. Back then our senior citizens needed that money, but the Government did not say a word. That was normal, the correct thing to do, take $25 off the benefits of people over 65. That was normal. But now, all of a sudden, they tell people who are already on pension: Be warned, if you opt for early retirement you will have to declare your income like any other citizens. That is not normal. When family allowances were reduced by $5 it was normal because it was done by a Liberal Government. But here we are today trying to help low income families by supplementing family allowances with tax credits, and all they say is: Still not enough. Rather strange, the Government used to be so silent. That reminds me of the oil crisis, it was very active when Shell was fighting, but very silent when the three closed down before.

Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Malépart: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. The Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) on a point of order.

Mr. Malépart: Since the Hon. Member has referred to me, just to show him he does not know what he is talking about, the fight had nothing to do with Shell. He is mistaken, it was not Shell, it was the case of Gulf and Ultramar. He is all mixed up, and in the case of family allowances—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order and neither is that of the other Hon. Member. Debate. The Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) has the floor.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I was telling a few truths to my Honourable colleague who seemed to be shocked and wanted to take advantage of a point of order to give his own views; yet, he gets many occasions to express his views. In fact, being so few in the Opposition, they get a chance to speak much more often. Sometimes, the truth may be shocking.

I am also surprised that my colleague from the NDP moves such a thing after the whole matter has been dealt with. We know that it has always been fairly customary with the NDP. Some time ago, early retirees as a whole said they were quite pleased with the Government's proposal. In fact, every newspaper in Canada reported so. They said they were quite pleased with that proposal to provide a full payment for those who had been treated unfairly before January 5 on the basis of misinformation on the part of senior officials.

Today, the NPD wants to keep up a certain fight. There is indeed a lot of contradictions in that Party. I remember a few years ago when they talked about the right to independence for Quebec, at some convention held in the Montreal area, and then a year later, they voted in favour of patriating the Constitution with the Trudeau team. A year later, it was no serious matter. They were still discussing the Constitution at the Montreal convention, and then we had the Meech Lake Agreement. On the one hand, they have told the members of the Parti Québécois in Québec: It is not good enough. But when they turn to English Canadians, they say: It is quite reasonable, after all, we might put up with it.

By dint of trying to flatter everybody, we will end up deceiving everybody. In this sense, not taking into account the billions of dollars which would be spent, the financial difficulties Canadians would be faced with, after investing billions of dollars in various projects, as suggested by the NDP and the Liberal Party, we would end up again with a deficit and the impossibility to improve the welfare of Canadians by concrete and precise legislation.

This bill is the end result of a battle carried out by the Conservative Members within their caucus, among Canadians, following consultations with their constituents, and clearly demonstrates the Government's will to listen to Canadians and respond to their needs within the normal limits of Government resources.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate and rectify the errors which the Hon. Member for Richelieu has just made. When referring to the early retirees and pension issue, Mr. Speaker, the first thing which any Member of this House should do would be to praise the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie for his tremendous contribution. All Hon. Members know that it is thanks to the efforts made by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) that 35,000 early retirees who had been so unfairly treated by this Conservative Government, were finally able to collect their benefits.

It is unfortunate that the Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamandon) did not take the time to listen to the Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malepart), who could have briefed him very well on the subject. If he had listened, his intervention would have been far more valuable than that which we heard. I say that with respect for my hon. friend from Richelieu, for whom I have a lot of respect. However, in this particular case he appears to be very poorly informed, as I am sure you have noticed, Mr. Speaker.

We all know that these retirees were unilaterally cut off after paying into the unemployment insurance fund for years and years. That is equivalent to telling someone who had a car accident that their policy was changed last night and they will not be paid for the car accident. If you were told that, you would obviously ask what you had been paying premiums for if you are not covered, and if you are not covered, why you were not told that you would not be covered before you were asked to pay premiums. Would that not be reasonable? Surely it would.

I know that all Members of this House, and particularly you, Sir, who is nonpartisan in this debate, understand that perfectly well. I am sure that if the Tory Members across stopped and thought a little bit they would understand too.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on December 5, 1986, the Conservative Government finally admitted it was wrong. The Government said through its Minister: I am guilty. That is what the Government said. It was guilty of having caused early retirees so much grief.

However, having admitted its guilt, the Government said: Sure, I am guilty, but I going to help you just a little bit. So, they reimbursed 35,000 early retirees who had contributed all their lives like so many others, and who had already retired when the Minister changed the legislation and took away their benefits.

Mr. Speaker, some had even resigned just two or three weeks before. Some of my constituents came to see me and who said: I resigned. I was entitled to receive benefits during the couple of weeks of my waiting period, but I lost that entitlement. What is going on? It's unfair! I told them: Yes, it's unfair, I agree. Mr. Speaker, it is unfair. That is Conservative justice, Mr. Speaker. Justice for the rich but no justice for the poor.

Through Bill C-50, the Government has reimbursed 35,000 early retirees. That is wonderful. But it doesn't solve the problem. We have dealt with just a fraction of the problem. As far as the other group is concerned, people now have to be fired twice before they are able to draw benefits. The Hon. Member from Montreal—Sainte-Marie, with his thorough knowledge of the issues, pointed this out here in the House. I am sure that all Members of this House, all early retirees and especially the people from the Montreal area appreciate the tremendous work done by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie on this question.

[English]

As a matter of fact, my honourable and very distinguished colleague, the Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie, was explaining this to me a little earlier. Let us take the hypothetical cases of three persons. If the first person, Mr. White, had retired after having contributed the maximum allowable to the unemployment insurance fund, $235 per week, and had a pension of $300 coming in, he would be getting no unemployment insurance. However, if his neighbour, Mr. Brown, was contributing the same amount but had a registered retirement savings plan and was receiving $300, he would get $231. You see the injustice. You see why we all have to vote now in favour of the motion presented to the House by the Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

• (1900)

Mr. Rodriguez: Sit down.

Mr. Boudria: I want to agree with the Member for Nickel Belt and encourage all Members to vote in favour of this motion now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is still a minute to go in this debate. The Hon. Member for Pembina (Mr. Van De Walle) has the floor.

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak about what this Government is doing to address the situation of the pensioners and unemployment insurance. Bill C-50 contains—

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Once again, the Conservatives are talking out a very logical proposal. They do not want the pensioners to get their unemployment insurance. They are talking the motion out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT ACT, 1987

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Crosbie that Bill C-19, an Act respecting motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) has the floor.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the Government has moved toward deregulation of all transportation in Canada, and certainly toward a system of user pay like we have never seen before. The Government has demanded that Canadian National make numerous cuts and lay-offs. It has demanded that CN Marine cut $20 million from its budget for this year and make numerous lay-offs.

It has even gone so far as to approve, through the Canadian Transport Commission, increases in rates which violate the terms of union between some provinces of Canada and the federal Government. The terms of union state quite explicitly that the cost of transporting goods across the water to the islands of this nation shall not be more than the cost of transporting goods on land via the railway. Yet, when there was an objection to the Canadian Transport Commission by a private water carrier owned by big business friends of the Conservative Government, the Commission ruled that the rates will increase. Therefore, for the first time since Newfoundland joined Canada in 1949, we have seen the first violation of the terms of union on the cost of transporting goods across to the island of Newfoundland via the Crown corporation that carries the trucks. Therefore, the rates are sky-rocketing.

Furthermore, the Government of Canada recently decided that boxcars will no longer be allowed on the railway in Newfoundland. Let us examine how such a decision is made. Cabinet can make any decision it wishes, and because Terra-Transport is a part of the rail system, it is a Crown corporation and Cabinet can decide that TerraTransport will no longer be allowed to carry boxcars on the railway. That decision will take effect next week. There will be no more boxcars allowed on the railway in Newfoundland.

Mr. Benjamin: It is not a railroad.

Mr. Baker: The hon. gentleman says it is not a railroad. However, flatcars and container cars are still allowed. While a 20-foot or 40-foot container is acceptable, boxcars are not allowed.

I ask my hon. friend; how does one get the grain from the hon. gentleman's riding in western Canada to Newfoundland? It must be put into containers because grain cars no longer exist. The Government has ruled that if it is not carried by truck it must be put in a container if it is to be taken on the railway.

Depending on what is carried, the cost of bringing grain in a grain car compared to a container on a truck sometimes runs double. Yet at the end of the month no boxcars will be allowed on the railway and everything will have to be carried by container.

The Government further decided that the railway would no longer be permitted to carry automobiles. It is my understanding that a trucking company from St. John's, Newfoundland, purchased trucks from Toronto and is being paid by Terra-Transport—Canadian National—to truck the cars from St. John's harbour and Port aux Basques across Newfoundland. Again, the Government is removing goods being transported by trains.

The Government of Canada has made a conscious effort not only to deregulate and cut back on Crown corporations, and to reduce the number of employees working with Crown corporations, it has also made a conscious effort to replace the trains with trucks.

Of course, an increased number of trucks on the highway requires maintenance of the roads. Furthermore, it is not acceptable to have roads like those in New Brunswick or Newfoundland, with two-lane highways as the main mode of transportation.

If everything is to be carried by truck in those provinces, there must be an adequate highway system. Yet this consideration has been absent from government policy. Nowhere in this policy is there an indication that there will be a proper highway network in those particular provinces. New Brunswick and Newfoundland have highways that wind in and around the bays and communities. It is very dangerous for people who do not know the roads to travel in those provinces.

What will happen under this Bill is that we might have a carrier transporting goods right across the nation, ending up in Newfoundland, then picking up goods in Newfoundland and going to Massachusetts or some other state in the United States or province in Canada. What is wrong with this Bill is that under the section which deals with the issuing of licences, it outlines exactly what the authority of the local provincial boards will be. It defines it in such a way as to make it completely different from the responsibility of the local board to a local trucker applying for a licence and the responsibility of the local transportation board to an out of the province trucker who is applying for a licence. That is certainly not acceptable.

It is not acceptable for the Government of Canada to say in Clause 7(1), under the Issue of Licence, that the provincial transport board in each province "may" issue a licence. It does not have to. It does not say "shall". Then we go to Clause 7(2) which states the provincial transport board in the province "shall". It shall do what? It shall issue a licence to operate an extra provincial truck undertaking in that province to an applicant therefor, an applicant who meets the prescribed criteria relating to the fitness of the applicant to hold such a licence. What criteria? The criteria passed by regulation by the Government of Canada. That is the criteria which shall be used. It even points out in Clause 7 that public hearings will not be held. Public hearings cannot be held? I quote from Clause 7(3):

> —the board shall not hold a public hearing with respect to an application for a licence referred to in subsection (2) . . . the operation of the extra provincial truck undertaking in respect of which the licences sought would be detrimental—

To the public interest. That bears no resemblance whatsoever to the description under the provincial authority which determines whether or not a public hearing will be held. It is very definitive wording on the part of the Government of Canada, I suppose agreed to by the provinces, as far as these extra provincial licences are concerned.

It then says there shall not be a hearing or the provincial board shall not interfere with the issuing of a licence unless an individual objects and displays to the board such reasoning that would be "detrimental" to the public interest. It continues in Clause 7(5)(b), and I quote:

> (b) have regard to any relevant written expressions of public transportation policy issued by the Government of Canada after consultation with the Government of each province affected thereby.

It then goes on to state in Clause 5(6)(a):

> (a) a provincial transport board may not attach any restrictions or conditions to a licence issued under the authority of this Part;—

In other words, after the passage of this Bill, the provincial authority is totally under the restrictions as outlined in Clause 7. In other words, the Government of Canada, through regulation, through a Cabinet Minister, through a Deputy Minister, will decide the terms and conditions of trucking licences issued in provinces in this country. That would not be so bad if perhaps the trucking companies were located in areas of great competition and lots of work.

I am particularly concerned about the smaller provinces of Canada such as Newfoundland where truckers have spent a great deal of their money and time in developing a business which can now be removed by a multinational company or an American company simply because there is no longer a guarantee that that area will be restricted to a local trucker or to the needs of that particular local area.

Following passage of this Bill we will have two sets of rules, one for the local trucker who is receiving a licence, what is commonly referred to as his "plate" to operate within a provincial jurisdiction, to pick up and drop off, and the distinctions are there. There is always a public hearing held whenever an objection is laid when it comes totally under provincial jurisdiction. But here it sets out very clearly that some of the big multinationals, the big American firms, the big firms perhaps even from central Canada can take over. Certainly it is quite obvious to me there will be two sets of rules. What will happen is that the local truckers in the local communities on the extremities of our nation will go out of business. They will certainly not have the controls they had prior to the passage of this Bill.

We cannot say that because we are protecting the right of a multinational to go into Newfoundland or any small province of Canada that the increased competition will result in lower prices for the goods which are transported. That is utter nonsense. We cannot find today many truckers anywhere in eastern Canada, independent, individual truckers, who are making a lot of money. We just cannot find them because the costs of operating are just too great. They have the cost of their insurance and maintenance which are just too great to make a lot of money in the trucking business.

I think this is basically a bad Bill. The provinces all said they cannot agree with the Bill until a safety code is developed with it. That has not been done by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie). He has not satisfied the Canadian Truckers Association, the very people who would be affected by the Bill.

It is interesting to note that the only consideration to be given in this entire set-up under Clause 8 and Clause 9 of the Bill is to the actual users and not the operators of the trucking business.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. colleague from Newfoundland. After having worked on the Standing Committee on Transport, it was a surprise for him to say to this House and to the people of Canada tonight that he is happy and content with what has happened in the past. I am sure he did not mean to say that to his constituents, to the people of Newfoundland or to the people of the Maritimes and to Canadians in general.

What we have attempted to say with Bill C-19 is that the free market system can offer perhaps better competition. My hon. friend, the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), God love him, has given me advice in the past, even though we are not on the same side of the fence. But coming from the Maritimes, I feel almost personally insulted that he would say this to his people of Newfoundland. I cannot show the white cuffs because I do not have the gift of the gab that they have in Newfoundland. I would say to the Hon. Member that he has let his people down in saying: "You cannot transport your goods at a cheaper price because we give you an option". That is the option we have. I realize that my time is short and I will proceed to my question.

We have had consultation with truckers from across the country. We talked about fit, willing and able. We talked about people who are able to go into the market, who can compete. I come from the Gaspé region and I have truckers in my region. There ain't nobody coming from Montreal or Toronto who can compete with my people because they have the people around them and behind us with our products and they are going to bring them out. They will do the same thing in Newfoundland. They will do the same thing in Nova Scotia and the same thing in P.E.I. They will do it. There is no problem there.

What we have to talk about is a national safety code. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) has always said that there is no question about national safety as far as Bill C-19 is concerned in deregulation for trucking, no question at all. An agreement between the provinces was struck. How can we talk here tonight as Members of Parliament from different provinces and say that representatives from our provinces are against that? It was an agreement that was struck with the federal Minister of Transport.

Mr. Angus: It is falling apart, too.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): We have talked about a takeover from central Canada and there is no question about it happening. I guarantee my colleague from Newfoundland that in the Maritimes there will be no question of it happening because our truckers will have a chance, and our truckers are the best truckers in the world—the best in North America. We do not have to worry about that.

I would ask one question of my colleague from Newfoundland. Up until this evening has the Hon. Member been happy with the way the system has worked in Newfoundland?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, one can never be satisfied with the system.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer!

Mr. Baker: I know what the gentleman is getting at. He is acquainted with Îles-de-la-Madeleine. I believe he lives there, although I am not sure. At any rate, he goes there quite often. So he is familiar with the problem of transportation to and from the islands.

I would remind the Hon. Member of this. The costs of competing can only be balanced out so far. We have in place in Canada a rather unusual system of trying to balance out the costs. However, it can only go so far.

In some provinces the cost of maintenance, insurance, trucks and sales tax on equipment is quite different from other parts of the nation. Provinces have tried—every province does try—to balance it out by saying to every trucker: "Look, if you don't spend money in our province on fuel, oil and this kind of thing, then you will remit to the Department of Finance after you have passed over our roads the amount of tax that you would normally have spent if you had purchased those items on our highways". So what we have is a trucker who comes across the nation and when he goes over the roads in Nova Scotia, his amount of fuel is tested at every weigh station as he enters and leaves the border—

Mr. Boyer: Why is that?

Mr. Baker: The reason for it is that—

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): We know!

Mr. Baker: The hon. gentleman asked for the reason. It is that the local trucker in that province has to pay a great deal more for his gasoline in Nova Scotia than he would in the State of Maine, or in Ontario, although I sometimes doubt that. In Newfoundland one would pay 59 cents per litre whereas in some parts of the State of Maine the price is down to 25 to 30 cents. So what the Ministers of Finance say in those provinces is: "Look, you cannot put two 100-gallon tanks on your trucks". Most of the big trucking companies did that, and I can name them. They are from the State of Maine and their trucks used to come across the provinces equipped with two 100-gallon tanks. They would purchase all of their gasoline in the State of Maine, or in any state in the United States. They would come right through and go all the way back again—

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are debating tonight Bill C-19 and not the United States. I think the point trying to be made is that with respect to a national safety code and the trucking system in Canada we have an interprovincial system—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. It is probably a supplementary question, but that is about it. The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Baker: Anyway, Mr. Speaker, what happens is that when one passes through the province and goes home one will receive in the mail, perhaps, a bill from the Department of Finance from, for example, the Province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or whichever province one passes through, stating: "You owe us x number of dollars because you did not purchase gasoline in this province. That is the sales tax that you owe to us for using our highways". That is the way it is right across Canada.

As far as compensation, the local trucking companies, the provincial Government and keeping things on an even keel of equal competition within a province, one can only regulate it so much. If truckers were allowed to put three 100-gallon tanks onto an 18-wheeler, then of course that trucker could outcompete the people in all the provinces and go back home.

As I have said, it can only be balanced out so much in the transportation industry. Hon. Members would have to agree that if a trucker is based in some provinces in Canada he has an extreme advantage over truckers in other provinces. Certainly, if he is based in the United States I believe, although sometimes I am not sure from talking to truckers, he has an extreme advantage over someone who is located in Canada.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, does the Hon. Member agree with me when I say that there are some regulations in transportation that need revision? The one I am thinking of specifically is one which places an onerous burden upon the Hon. Member's constituents. I refer to the regulation which requires cost recovery for ferry services. User fees have to be paid to use the water-borne part of the Trans-Canada Highway to get from one part of Canada to the other. Would the Hon. Member agree with that?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly agree with that. In fact, that applies to all the islands, including Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and the Queen Charlotte Islands. I have five islands in my riding. The people living on those islands are discriminated against as far as transportation, goods and services are concerned. It is absolutely incredible. Every trucker and everyone being transported to and from the province has to pay all that money now. Since this Government has come into office user-pay is in force. All the rates have sky-rocketed since this Government has come to power. However, I would suggest that everyone come to Newfoundland this summer, the rates are not that high.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I know that you will be interested in listening to me talk about trucking. Members of the Government are trying to sell Bill C-19, or at least the philosophy behind it, as one of keeping every truck on the road full in each direction that they are going in order to get the lowest cost per unit of commodity moved. That is the summary I hear coming from government Members. They also claim that this will cut regulation and that it will increase regulation. But at what cost?

I think we have an opportunity to look at what has happened to the great republic to the south of us where there is a similar type of legislation in the State of California, which was introduced seven years ago, and in other areas of the U.S. since that time.

The trucking industry will be drastically changed as a result of Tory plans for deregulation. Not only will the impending cutthroat competition eliminate most of the medium-size and smaller firms, but the likelihood of aggressive market battles with the American big three, being Roadway Services of Ohio, Yellow Freight System of Kansas and Consolidated Freightways of California, threatens to decimate the Canadian trucking industry.

• (1930)

One of the points the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) was making—and I am sure the Hon. Member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Gray) would agree—is that over time, particularly in the outer reaches of the country such as northern British Columbia, Yukon, Northwest Territories, northern parts of the provinces, and the Maritimes, small localized trucking firms have managed to patch together routes for themselves. They move groceries in the morning and move furniture in the afternoon. They do a little of this and a little of that and manage to keep a localized business going. However, over past months we have seen the penetration of a lot of trucking firms which have already taken Bill C-19 to heart. They are looking at what kinds of routes they can get with a back-haul, where they can take in a half truckload of something to Stewart and take two-thirds of a truckload of something back out. They will take away the bits of localized trucking we have had out of Terrace, Prince Rupert, Smithers, Kitimat, on the Queen Charlotte Islands, and throughout the northwest of the province.

We will see the long trucking routes penetrating deeply into an area, dropping off bits and pieces of commodities all the way through, picking up back-hauls, and going all the way back out. They will not only take away small trucking jobs and bust small trucking firms. At the same time they will take away the capital which would turn over a couple of times in small local economies and will pipeline the money back into Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, or Edmonton, the main trucking centres.

There is a number of important and undeniable effects of deregulation since the United States launched a similar experiment half a decade ago.

First, trucking deregulation will initially bring more competition. The Government says that will happen. Anyone who takes a look at Bill C-19 can see that that will happen. Rates will drop temporarily. However, why is that? It is because small non-unionized firms, as they try to enter the market, will be bumped back out. Existing small unionized firms will be bumped out, because as we get into a situation where there is that kind of competition and not the safety requirements we have seen in small, carefully managed firms, competition will become a blip on a screen. However, within several years there will be greater concentration of industrial ownership. As they get bigger, the medium go bankrupt or are swallowed and the small fight ferociously for the crumbs of the local market.

Rather than having a long-term view in this piece of legislation, one of the biggest single faults I find in it is that it designs a period of high competition to begin with. Then we see the concentration growing, the monopoly structures being reintegrated, the cost of moving freight going back up, and the small localized firms which have survived having to struggle with the almost impossibility of staying alive.

Second, rate slashing on major routes is already beginning. Discounts as high as 50 per cent on general freight rates and as much as 20 per cent on commodity rates are already being reported. Over-capacity is already at 25 per cent to 40 per cent and is growing. This will become even more acute once the American "Big Three" penetrate further into our markets.

Third, trucking deregulation is closely tied with free trade. Canadian shippers, who are the industrial sector lobbying the hardest for deregulation, are motivated by the self-perceived need to lower their transport costs to match the deregulated American transportation costs in preparation for a continental scramble for markets.

Fourth, the large American trucking firms will overwhelm the Canadian industry. Each of the six largest American trucking giants hauls more freight by itself in a year than Canada's entire industry, and we are not small; we move $8 billion worth per year.

The general manager of the Manitoba Trucking Association argued:

> The largest U.S. carrier with dozens of terminals can take over the Canadian market by the simple expedient of serving at cut-point prices from the addition of maybe four distribution points.

Fifth, safety will deteriorate. Even the Ontario Division Chairman of the Canadian Industrial Tariff League, strong proponents of deregulation, admits that highway safety is likely to get worse under deregulation "when profits are being squeezed". In the U.S. the highway accident rate is rising—and it has been since deregulation was implemented—as equipment is kept around longer, is on the road longer, is maintained less, and carries heavier loads.

Sixth, the Canadian truck driver will be the biggest loser. The impact of deregulation upon the American trucker was devastating. Upwards of 300,000 union jobs were lost, major concessionary agreements were forced upon unions, and pensions and benefits were rolled back. Present indications suggest that an even greater impact will be felt by Canadian truckers.

The Standing Committee on Transport was not allowed to do—and it should have done it—proper evaluations of the impacts. Some states in the United States have conducted impact evaluations of increased trucking on some of their main arteries versus heavy commodities being previously moved principally on rail. The most cost effective way for the taxpayer to have heavy commodities moved—and I am not talking about paper and that kind of thing—is on rail. Whether there are three inches, six inches, or a foot of asphalt, when 18-wheelers are moving at high speed up and down main arteries, there is a rippling effect, particularly when there is any kind of frost heave. Some very good studies have been done in the United States which point out that a very substantial amount of actual net cost is transferred to individual taxpayers and consumers in those states.

I suspect, as we see the impact on some of the arteries in Canada dramatically increasing in terms of truck movement and truck speed, we will see a deterioration of the highways and additional costs having to be borne by consumers. Many speakers have pointed out that this is just a continuation of freedom to manoeuvre, not freedom to move.

I am surprised that government Members have not been more vocal about Clause 8. When they were in Opposition they always made a point of raising such Trojan Horse, regulatory clauses which allow the Governor in Council to make any kind of recommendation. Subclause 8(c) allows the Minister, only with consultation, not with agreement, with the province affected to exempt certain corridor operations from the application of most of the Act.

What happens to the prescribing of the type, the amount, and the conditions of insurance and bonding coverage where a corridor is exempted? What happens to prescribed safety standards for the operation of extra provincial truck undertakings?

As we know, the majority of the regulations under Clause 8 will be made over the next four years, five years, or ten years behind closed doors by the Minister and a few of his officials who will be typing them up madly on various machines.

The point which has been made from coast to coast by small truckers, big truckers, and people interested in safety, deals with the whole question of the safety code. I would first like to quote from the evidence of David W. Gruchy from the Canadian Transport Lawyers Association who appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport on March 31. He said the following:

> I think the implementation and the ability to enforce a clear and precise National Safety Code is essential before deregulation takes place. The absence of it will lead to the loss of lives. It is just as simple as that. I go a bit further: the hiatus which will be created between deregulation and the implementation of a National Safety Code can be filled by the retaining of the threat of the loss of authority. That has been a major factor in safety in trucking in Canada.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) has not addressed that in any way, shape or form. As a matter of fact, while we were dealing with amendments to this piece of legislation last week—and the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus) and the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) moved many to try to improve the Bill—the Minister of Transport admitted that it would be years, perhaps on into the 1990s, before the national safety code was in place.

I should like to quote from a June 2, 1987 editorial entitled "Why risk truck safety?", which reads in part:

> Trucking is an $8 billion-a-year business in Canada that spells jobs for 50,000 people. About 40 per cent of our freight—and half of all goods shipped to the United States—moves by truck. So a seemingly obscure proposal by the federal Government to deregulate interprovincial trucking is, in fact, a major policy change that warrants closer scrutiny than it has been getting.
> Bill C-19, introduced last November but not yet passed by an overloaded Parliament, is designed to stimulate competition in the industry, mainly by making it easier for truckers to win licences for the interprovincial transport of goods.
> That could lead to lower freight costs and potential savings to Canadian consumers. In theory, it sounds like a good idea. But as is so often the case, there's more than one side to the trucking deregulation story.
> For example, there is the critical question of safety. If everyone with a truck is allowed to enter the interprovincial trucking business, how can the public be certain that he won't cut corners on vehicle maintenance? Will drivers, especially those employed by small companies, be forced to work longer hours? And will the average age of trucks on our highways increase as small companies keep equipment in service longer?

• (1940)

Before the Government makes a wrong turn on truck deregulation, it needs to ask itself whether the risks it is creating outweigh the potential rewards. Again, that is one of the rallying cries. I remember a few days ago listening to the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) who said that one of the reasons he likes Bill C-19 and wants to support it is that beef cannot presently travel from Alberta to Ontario without trucks going through the United States. It is a preposterous argument. I have checked into it. It is not entirely true. Trucks can go from Calgary to Toronto without going through the United States with existing licensing. There is no doubt the argument that there is too much regulation is true.

Mr. Malone: Right.

Mr. Fulton: But Bill C-19 does not do what the Member for Bow River argues that it will. The underlying principles as enunciated by the Minister of Transport are three things. You can get into the business if you are ready, able and willing. RAW. That means if you can get a truck and if you can get a loan for a truck, if you can get insurance, if you can get a loan for insurance and if you can get in there and pick some market then you are up and away. That sounds ground for the small truckers. We know that something quite different happened.

A good comparison to make is the state of California, roughly the same population as Canada, which has a much tighter market, and, therefore, much greater competition, much shorter hauls. What happened there, Mr. Speaker? Most of the smaller medium-sized firms have gone. The big six took over that market and for a period of a few months there was more competition. They were all scrambling to stay in the business. New people were scrambling to get in. But who is left? The big six. Not the little firms, not the little guy. Government Members say oh, oh, oh. This will get lots of jobs for lots of small guys. It is not true, Mr. Speaker.

Look at comparable markets, comparable populations, comparable movements of goods, and here the added component of the enormous distance. A lot of our commodities are moved on rubber on our highways which means one more added burden for a small trucker. He will not have a computer terminal or all kinds of back-haul arrangements made by brokers and by other parts of his firm. He will be doing it by phone or his wife, his son or neighbour down the road will. Is he likely to maintain and expand into the other more competitive market where computers play such a vital role? I do not think so. This legislation is being sold like a Trojan Horse. The regulations are not here. The National Safety Code is not here. The myth that this will be good for the small guy is nothing more than a myth.

I met recently with a few dozen truckers in my constituency and talked to them about it. They were particularly alarmed at a situation that has arisen in northwestern B.C. It is in the logging sector, but I think it bears understanding in relation to what Bill C-19 could bring to that part of the industry. Almost none of the local truckers in Stewart are hauling logs out of Bell Irving or out of the top end of Tree Farm Licence No. 1 or out of the Dee's timber supply area. We have Tam Logging, Orenda and Buffalohead working out of there. They are principally using truckers out of Alberta who can operate on a less expensive plate and many of them have been there for months. The Department of Highways have not taken them off, the RCMP have done nothing. They, of course, are able to operate at lower rates because their insurance costs are less, their licensing is less and one of the things that these truckers expressed concern about in relation to Bill C-19, because they are already finding trouble with it, is that in years gone by in B.C., Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes and north of 60 there used to be a system in place where you could get localized plates so that within a local market if you operate a little gravel business, you would have a special plate. If you were not working, somebody else could not come in and do gravel operations in that area. That tended to keep at least some of the contracts localized so that some of the money spent by governments, in particular, but also in large projects was kept in the local area. With Bill C-19, that is long gone. That kind of a concept of being able to develop localized industries on rubber is long gone.

Let us take another look at what has happened in the United States, Mr. Speaker, because it is worth having some understanding of what has happened there after the Americans have had half a decade of experience with this kind of deregulation. Another testimony to the identification of this source of the problem comes from the New York State Automobile Association, an affiliate of the American Automobile Association. Their analysis of motor carrier safety problems is put this way:

> The federal Government's deregulation of the trucking industry, intended to decrease red tape on governmental interference, has also created a free-wheeling market-place where safety takes a back seat.
> Before deregulation began in 1980, major trucking firms exercised substantial control over interstate rates and routes. Since that time, savage price wars have forced many major firms out of business. In their place, some 12,000 new firms have sprung up, many of them independent, single vehicle, owner-operators. These firms are in fierce competition for a volume of freight that has dropped by almost 45 per cent, a decrease that adds to the underbidding and discounting and declining profit margins for truckers.
> These financial pressures are forcing many truckers, especially independents, to try to reduce their expenses by deferring maintenance, replacing their vehicles less frequently and disregarding regulations concerning driving hours and speed limits.
> From 1979 to 1984, the average age of trucks in service increased from 6.9 to 8.2 years. The 1984 figure represents the highest average since just after World War II. Close to 15 per cent of the 40 million trucks in service in 1984 were 15 years old or older.

In those areas where independents have managed to maintain a bit of participation in the market the way they have done, it is at the cost of safety. They keep their trucks longer, they spend less on maintenance, more hours on the road and it leads to a much more dangerous highway for everyone, including truckers.

A press release from Keith Bissell, Commissioner, Tennessee Public Service Commission states:

> Truck problems go beyond the vehicles. Truck companies which shave maintenance costs also pay relatively less to drivers. These companies get what they pay for. Our findings show drivers have far less experience. More drivers use drugs and alcohol.
> How general is the problem? That is, can any distinction be made between the truckers who are creating the problems and those who are not? A report from R. J. Hicks, Deputy Chief, Port of Entry Division, State of Colorado, shared some light on this:
> "It has become very apparent that after the start of our POE's inspection program in July of 1984, that a high level of unsafe trucks were on Colorado's highways. Better than one out of every four were placed out-of-service for major violations of safety and HM regulations in FY 1984-85. That posture deteriorated in FY 85-86 with four out of every ten trucks being placed out-of-service. Well-known, established companies have done an admirable job in safety of their trucks, but others are failing miserably to address even basic maintenance."

We know what is happening for example in British Columbia where the Government has taken away safety inspection on cars and trucks. In a crackdown on the Hope-Princeton highway just last fall, two-thirds of the trucks stopped had to be pulled from the highway. Most of them did not have their brakes hooked up.

Mr. Malone: That is a system you want.

Mr. Fulton: The Member from Alberta says that is what Members of the Opposition would like. His own Party is bringing this measure in without the National Safety Code in place. As we have learned from the experience of the Americans, even with a partial safety code in place, the levels of safety in the U.S. have plummeted. Someone driving a small vehicle on the highway is 40 times more likely to die in an accident with a truck than the trucker.

Safety is a major question that should have been addressed and has not been. It is the small truckers, the independents and the small and medium-sized firms that will take it in the neck from this legislation, and consumers in the long term will not benefit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are two questions for the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) with interest. I must find that what he described no way resembles what is in Bill C-19.

Mr. Gormley: That is not surprising.

Mr. Belsher: The Hon. Member does the House a disservice and the Canadian public to say that there has been no co-operation with the provinces and that the safety aspects have been forgotten. He knows full well that there has been an agreement signed by all 10 provinces along with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) saying that at least 50 per cent of the safety code will be in place by January 1, 1988, and the remainder by 1990. The federal Government is contributing some $20 million toward helping each of the provinces to be able to put it in place by that time. It has been agreed that the reverse onus will take place five years after the Bill has been proclaimed. The Hon. Member does a disservice to the Canadian public when he paints a picture that is not accurate.

• (1950)

The Hon. Member spoke of fatalities and used California as his reference point. It is a matter of fact that there are fewer fatalities per mile driven by trucks in California now than there were in 1978. These are some of the things that the Hon.

Member should be careful about when he starts to quote statistics.

When representatives of the railways appeared before us to make their presentations, we asked them about volume and they said that there would not be any loss of volume on the tracks due to Bill C-18 and Bill C-19. Yet the Hon. Member is telling us that trucks will suddenly carry so much more volume that they will be taking it away from the railways. That is a distortion of the facts. Would the Hon. Member care to comment on why representatives of the railways would tell us that there will be no loss of volume because of deregulation rather than saying that Bill C-19 will put a tremendously higher volume on the highways?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member does a great disservice to himself, to his constituents and to Canadians generally by asking the question that way. He has not told us the sources from which he is quoting. I have statistics before me from a state in the United States, New York. I do not have California statistics, but since deregulation was introduced in New York, the number of fatalities on the highway among commercial motor vehicles has increased by 50 per cent. Those are the statistics that I was quoting. I have them here and I am perfectly prepared to table them. I would like to see the statistics of the Hon. Member saying that in California, fatalities have declined since 1978, and I would like to see them tabled tonight.

Mr. Gormley: That was you who quoted from California.

Mr. Fulton: I did not. I quoted from New York and I have the statistics right here.

Mr. Gormley: You said California. Read the "blues".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I believe the Hon. Member has rebutted the question.

Mr. Binns: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak, but I could not help but hear some of the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). He spent considerable time talking about how the big three companies in the United States could take over the trucking industry in Canada if they so desired because of this Bill.

I recently travelled all the way down the eastern coast of the United States and back up through the middle of the United States. I could not get over the number of independent trucks I saw on the road. In fact, I could drive all day and watch tractor trailer after tractor trailer going by and I would see very few trucks with the same company names.

I had my CB radio on and I was listening to these truckers talk. I talked to them myself. On Interstate 95, Interstate 84, Interstate 81 and a whole host of other highways, I did not see this conglomeration of trucking companies that was taking over the American industry. In fact, it looked very much to me as though the private truckers were doing very well.

I guess what is surprising about the Hon. Member's remarks is that his argument went all the way around the circle. He ended up by concluding through his testimony about what was happening in New York that his earlier argument was not correct. In fact, he indicated that a few big trucking companies had lost the war to some 12,000 new firms. I expect that that means individual, independent truckers.

Just because the individual truckers have trucks that are a year or so older than the other trucks does not mean to me that they are unsafe. In fact, when I pulled into truck stops on these Interstates to get fuel, to check my tires and so on, I saw that these rigs were in immaculate shape. They have chrome wheels, chrome stacks and murals on their sleeper cabs. These guys take pride in their outfits. These are not the kind of trucks that would be unsafe.

While the Hon. Member's remarks were interesting, I think he went all the way around the circle and lost the gist of his argument.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher) said that it was all right with him that the safety code will come in in 1990. I think that is the kind of inappropriate—

Mr. Belsher: The main parts will be in in 1988 and you know it.

Mr. Fulton: No, 1990, the Minister of Transport said it here in the House last week, that the main parts will be in by 1990.

Perhaps the Hon. Member for Cardigan (Mr. Binns) would like to reflect on the fact that 300,000 truckers lost their jobs in the last four years under deregulation in the United States. If he thinks that is creating new jobs, I am very surprised at the kind of mind the Hon. Member has operating inside his skull.

The point I was making about small truckers in the State of New York is that the big six have taken over the overwhelming majority of the market and 12,000 other truckers are left. I quoted that figure from U.S. documents.

It is pretty clear that the arguments government Members are using are the ones that are faulty. They are trying to sell this Bill as being a great creator of new jobs, something which will cut prices for the movement of commodities, something which will make the highways better, in fact something which will make the sun rise earlier. It is just not true. We have learned from what has happened in the United States and particularly in California and New York what the truth is. There have been more fatalities, more casualties, and less safety. In fact, over time costs have increased again after the prices for the movement of commodities went down initially during the initial surge of competition.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak, albeit very briefly, on Bill C-19. We know that one of the main reasons this Bill is before us is the fact that we have passed the accompanying legislation, Bill C-18. What will we have with these two Bills? On the one hand we will have a severely dismantled rail system and on the other a deregulated trucking system.

I would like to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that the largest single employer located in the constituency I represent is a company known as Glengarry Transport Limited or GTL for short.

Mr. Angus: It's appropriately named.

Mr. Boudria: GTL has 2,000 employees—someone has just said that it is appropriately named. I thank the Hon. Member for that remark. I kind of like the name myself and I am sure most of my constituents do too.

In any case, GTL, with its 2,000 employees, has at the present time some 5,000 different vehicle units including trucks, trailers and the like. It is a family-owned business based in the constituency that I represent and it is the seventh largest trucking company in Canada.

GTL provides good and meaningful employment to a large number of the constituents I represent. As I understand it, it belongs to the Lefebvre family of Alexandria and we are very proud of the Lefebvre family for their achievements in the community of Alexandria and in the great County of Glengarry.

Some time in the past, I was speaking to Messrs. Pierre Vaillancourt and Paul Poirier of Glengarry Transport. They told me that some 20 per cent to 30 per cent of all their employees would lose their jobs as a result of Bill C-19. That would be a very serious consequence for the constituency that I represent. Needless to say, there would be many more jobs in other industries in the area lost as well. When a community such as Alexandria loses jobs in its trucking industry, needless to say there are other job losses as well. When we talk about 30 per cent of the workforce possibly being laid off, we are talking about 600 people. The Town of Alexandria has a population of only 2,000 to begin with. Do you see how serious this legislation could be for my constituents?

I drew a parallel in this House before when we were discussing the Gulf refinery in Montreal, the de Havilland plant in Toronto and other similar issues involving job losses of 500 or 600 in some of those large urban centres. Many people in the media and in this House raised the issue extensively. Of course, we were talking about large urban centres. I do not want to diminish the impact of job losses in those communities, but if that was severe, and I recognize that it is, it is far more severe to lose those jobs in the riding I represent.

Mr. Friesen: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member has just said there was a loss of jobs with the sale of de Havilland in Toronto. I would like him to explain that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. The Hon. Member will have his opportunity during questions and comments.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member is very busy doing constituency work at his desk and perhaps was not listening too closely. Perhaps I was talking too fast for a Tory to understand. Maybe I should repeat it slowly so that even he can understand what I am talking about.

Mr. Gormley: This time think when you speak and surprise us.

Mr. Boudria: When I was speaking at a much faster pace, a pace too fast for Tories to understand, I said the loss of jobs in large communities was serious. The loss of a similar number of jobs, or the potential loss of a similar number of jobs, in a smaller community was even more serious. It is fine for him to make fun of it because it is not happening in his constituency, it is happening in mine. It is only too symptomatic of the Tory attitude towards the loss of employment. They do not care. They make fun of it. However, there will be a day of reckoning for the Tories.

We were talking about the potential effects of Bill C-19. We know of course of the deliberate action by the Government through this Bill to cause shut-downs of large sections of the railway and then adding intermodal and truck traffic. The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) was saying a little while ago, and very eloquently as he usually does, that there would be an increase in truck traffic because of some government policies. He was quite right, as he usually is.

I want to read to you from a letter of Mr. A. Blackwell, Assistant Vice-President of Strategic Projects of CN Rail. I think I have informed you in the past that CN is planning to shut down parts of its main rail line linking Ottawa to Montreal. It is also planning to shut down the rail line between Ottawa and Capreol, near Sudbury, which would remove all rail links between the capital of this country and the City of Montreal, as preposterous as that may sound. It is all in the internal document I have here in my hands.

Mr. Boyer: Internal document?

Mr. Boudria: I would be glad to share it with Tory Members. I gave a number of them to Conservative Members who attended a meeting I had on CN Rail a few weeks ago. The proposal to shut down this line would cause some traffic to be diverted to trucks. Let me read to you from this letter and you will understand the issue very clearly:

> This will confirm discussions on Thursday, September 4, 1986 concerning the Alderdale-Beachburg Subdivisions.

That is the rail line between Ottawa and Sudbury. It continues:

> These changes in routing should achieve economies of scale in the Montreal-Toronto corridor and, at the same time, will focus attention on actively seeking alternatives—

Note the word "alternatives".

—for handling the 2,000 annual carloads of woodpulp traffic from Portage du Fort, which is currently served by way-freight from Ottawa.

In other words, they are simply saying they are going to put 2,000 more truckloads on the road, 2,000 more truckloads out of one place, Portage du Fort, not far from here on the Quebec side near the national capital. This traffic is going to end up on already overcrowded highways in western Quebec and eastern Ontario.

Clearly the Government is taking its responsibilities and shoving them off on the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The Tories do not care. They do not maintain the provincial highways; the Governments of Ontario and Quebec do. If we increase traffic, tough, says the Government. If we have highway traffic which is deregulated and less safe than it is now, tough, say the Tories. The potential closing of the Ottawa-Montreal rail line has already stopped an expansion at a plant in my riding.

An industry called Moulures Alexandria shelved its $25 million investment projects. The company put its projects on the back burner while waiting for the Government to make up its mind concerning the CN track.

So we have the Glengarry Transport Company which stands to lose a number of jobs. We have jobs which are threatened by the possible closure of CN Rail, and more jobs still will be lost if ever CN Rail closes shop, as proposed in the internal documents I have here.

Mr. Speaker, you can see that the Conservative Government's laisser faire policy is having a negative impact in the riding I have the honour and privilege to represent in the House.

[English]

I want to read to you from other documents I have here. This letter is signed by Ron Lawless, at the time President and Chief Operating Officer of CN Rail. It is dated September 10, 1986. Mr. Lawless should stop leaving his mail lying around all over the place. It comes into opposition Members' hands sometimes. In any case the letter says:

You are aware that in June a proposed five-year program of line abandonments totalling 5,400 miles was developed in accordance with the "Blueprint Initiative" to divest 1,000 miles of track per year. A copy of this list is attached. Due to the serious financial situation, this list was used in a conference call on August 7, as a basis for reviewing with the Regions, possible reductions in Engineering and Transportation expense for 1987.

The premise used was that the train operation, if required, would be provided where possible on 48 hour notice. During the conference call and in subsequent consultations, some 100 engineering positions were identified for reduction out of a total of 616.

Therefore, we are talking about letting go one of every six people in the engineering section of CN, further cut-backs which will further affect my area and many regions of this country.

• (2010)

I see the Member for Etobicoke—Lake Shore (Mr. Boyer) across the way. He will know that if the CN Rail between Capreol and Montreal does shut down the chemicals produced in northern Ontario going to Montreal will be moved on the rail line to Toronto and then from Toronto to Montreal.

Mr. Boyer: You're a fantastic alarmist.

Mr. Boudria: If the gentleman across thinks that my statements are touched with a tint of partisanship—

Mr. Gormley: No, alarmism.

Mr. Boudria: —he should contact the unions of the railways which will tell him, as I am telling him now, that thousands more railcars per year of toxic products will pass by right near his city. When has a Tory Member spoken on this issue? Never. His colleagues from the Ottawa area have studied some of the documentation I have. They have been lobbied by the unions of CN and they have copies of internal documentation. The Member should speak to the Members for Stormont—Dundas (Mr. Warner), Ottawa—Carleton (Mr. Turner) and Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney), all of whom are aware of those facts. When the Member for Etobicoke—Lake Shore says that he doubts the accuracy of what I am saying—

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Member opposite is saying that I said in this Chamber that I doubt the accuracy of statements made. That is nowhere near what I said. I ask him to retract that and to proceed with his comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. If the Hon. Member wishes to pursue it during the period for questions and comments, he may do so then. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to continue my remarks, and I would urge the Hon. Member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore (Mr. Boyer)—and the other Conservative Members—to find out more about these facts, and he will realize that what I am talking about today are facts. So we have this Bill C-18 and its harmful consequences, as described by my colleague from Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) and my colleague from Westmorland—Kent (Mr. Robichaud). Both of them have done an outstanding job with respect to these two Bills, and I take this opportunity to congratulate them, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you would want me to commend them for their work in connection with Bill C-18.

And this evening we are dealing with Bill C-19, and again our position has been ably explained by my colleagues the Members for Papineau and Westmorland—Kent who are working relentlessly in an attempt to make the Government opposite understand that it must change its policy before it is faced with disastrous consequences.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to answer the questions of Members opposite concerning these very important issues. I would urge them to reflect very seriously upon the job losses which I mentioned a moment ago.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member with regard to regulation per se. An awful lot of the debate that we have heard from the government side makes the point that it is very necessary to deregulate and that this will somehow bring about a better rubber service in particular. I will not deal with the issues with relation to air which were raised through Bill C-18.

I would like to hear the Member's comments on one of the premises on which regulation is brought into society, that is that it is to protect society from those who would take advantage of a situation in a safety sense, which is the context in which I want to put it.

Any of us who drive from here to our homes in Ottawa encounter stop lights, stop signs, and certain other things which we have to obey. Does the Hon. Member think that disposing of certain regulatory regimes, particularly in the area of safety, is likely to be in the interest of the trucking industry or of the consumers who are presently using our highway systems?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that excellent question. It is my opinion that before moving any further with deregulation we should wait for the national safety code to be fully in place which, as I understand it, is not yet the case.

It could very well be that some of the present trucking regulations are too onerous and need to be toned down a notch. However, that does not mean that we should scrap practically all form of regulation.

The question of the Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) reminds me of another very important topic. A few minutes ago a Conservative Member was saying how well things seemed to be going for independent truckers in the United States.

I remind the House that witnesses appeared before our CN save-the-train committee which was held in the Railway Committee Room a little over a week ago. Members of all political Parties were there. Witnesses told us that in certain instances 50 per cent of the trucks stopped for safety checks were found to be unfit for the road. That is the type of thing that is taking place right now in some of the states south of the border, particularly in the southeastern part of the United States where some of the studies were done.

There is indeed a second side to the deregulation story. I know that everyone wants to be less controlled and less regulated by government. Of course, we all want to be protected more by government too. That is the sometimes hard-to-reconcile view that we all have. However, we must remember that no one wants unsafe vehicles on the road. No one wants to sacrifice safety. Therefore, we should be very careful with this process, particularly as we know what happened in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question? Debate. The Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin).

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious, and, I hope, fit, willing and able, to take part in this debate. Not only are members of the Official Opposition and members of the New Democratic Party opposed to this legislation being brought in its present form, the Canadian Truckers Association and the Concerned Shippers Association, both of which appeared before our committee more than once, are opposed as well. Who is asking for greater enforcement, more inspectors and a higher level of safety and maintenance? It is not your average shipper, receiver, Canadian citizen or MP. It is the truckers themselves who are asking for that.

• (2020)

A number of truckers who appeared before our committee told us that they were anxious to have a high standard of safety, maintenance, inspections and accounting of those operations and procedures that were not only set down in a standard but were inspected and enforced. The limited level of those standards in Canada today is woefully inadequate, and even more so in the United States.

Once we rely on the bottom line syndrome of market forces and free enterprise principles as the primary consideration for transportation policy, otherwise reliable and conscientious servers of the public in transportation are forced to cheat.

The free market atmosphere permits the entry of competitors who do not have the kinds of standards and financial viability that the long established, large, medium or small firms do. The market is simply divided among a large number of operators who will cut corners, take chances and take turns going broke. The ease with which operators will exit and enter the market means that the provision of the service will be unreliable in terms of quality, frequency and reliability.

The Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher) entered the debate tonight and discussed having these provisions in force by January 1, 1988. The trucking industry itself said that this was impossible.

There is general agreement in principle between the federal Government and the provinces about a national highway transportation Act. However, I am certain that they have not reached agreement on the details of such legislation. They are very unlikely to establish before the end of the year a national trucking board that would provide a multiprovincial licensing authority. Such an authority is necessary in view of the present illogical regime in which one must go before ten different highway traffic boards, with different regulations and standards, in order to obtain a national licensing authority. For example, in order to operate from Toronto to Prince Rupert one must deal with five provincial highway traffic boards.

There is agreement in principle between the provinces and the federal authority to return interprovincial and international trucking under the federal jurisdiction as it is under the Constitution. That authority was turned over to the provinces in the early 1950s, which they administered with the consent of the federal Government authority.

We agree with the principle that there should be national legislation under which an 11-member or preferably a 13-member board, including both Territories, would set national standards and regulations on safety, maintenance, schedules and working hours for truck drivers. They would operate under one licence, the price of which will vary according to the number of provinces in which the operators want to function. I believe there is likely unanimous agreement in achieving that goal, but it will take at least a year when we consider the difficulty in achieving unanimous agreement with the provinces.

The recently retired head of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the United States, an appointee of Ronald Reagan, appeared before our committee in Ottawa. He urged us not to make the same mistakes that were made in the United States, whether it was with the airline industry, the trucking industry, or the railroads.

The Government is on an ideological binge of deregulation. It has the majority to carry out its policy and there is not much we can do about it. However, this Ronald Reagan appointee who was head of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the United States told us not to deregulate until these other provisions were established. Those who want the freedom to enter and exit a market will then know the rules and minimum standards by which they must operate. Once they are required to abide by those standards, I suspect that those jerk-water, fly-by-night outfits that want to begin an airline or trucking company under deregulation will think twice before doing so because they will not be able to meet those standards.

Once this legislation is passed, anyone who can get a bank loan, some insurance, can lease a few tractors or second-hand aircraft and hire some laid off truckers or pilots at one-third the pay will be in business. How will that achieve quality and reliability in transportation service?

Should we allow someone to take the cream off the top during a peak season of the market from a successful and long-established operator who has built up the market? That is a predatory practice rather than free enterprise and they should not be allowed to do so if they cannot meet a number of safety and maintenance standards and regulations on the number of hours a person can fly or drive.

How long does a diesel engine or jet engine have to run before it is overhauled? Surely that has to be in place. If we allow the bottom-line syndrome to govern, then what we will have are cost accountants, chartered accountants and lawyers, all deciding what kind of transportation service will be provided, where it will be provided, how often and under what conditions, and all of them would not know one end of an 18-wheeler from another and one end of a boxcar from another. What we will end up with is that people who do not know much, if anything, about transportation will be making decisions about how well our transportation system serves the public, how reliable and viable it is and, most important, how safe it is.

That is why we have to keep a degree of regulation. We are not arguing against streamlining the CTC so it responds faster and is more responsive. There is an all-Party agreement on that. We are not arguing that a lot of regulations have outlived their usefulness and are no longer relevant to today's circumstances. We say throw them out. We need new regulations to take into account the new technology. They need to be continually updated and upgraded.

I sometimes think that with all the thousands of regulations there are in the Government of Canada, we could have a special standing committee of the House of Commons which does nothing else but review regulations. It would take the full time of a standing committee.

There is another area the Government and the committee refused to consider. It was in the minority report on Freedom to Move submitted by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus), and myself. When a truck operator in Canada receives a franchise from a highway traffic board on a given route, given a number of places to serve, he has to pay so much for that licence. That licence becomes part of his assets. It serves as security in the minds of his customers and his employees and it also serves as security when he needs to make a loan at the bank for operational costs. That licence serves as part of the assets of his company. The committee and the Government refused to address that.

I want to read what we said in our minority report. We said then, and we say now, that we are concerned about those who hold licences and the effect of deregulation on the value of those licences. For most businesses, their licence is an asset, and many have borrowed against it for operating or capital expenses. After deregulation, however, these assets will have no value and the trucking company or airline will have to come up with other means of securing demand loans with financial institutions. Goodness knows, all of them have to take out demand loans, sometimes several times a year.

In addition, operators will not realize any profit from the sale of their business as was the case in the past under a regulated regime. The Government must pay close attention to this issue to avoid bankruptcy, especially of smaller firms. We support some method of writing off this loss against their income tax. We note that companies must be in the position of reporting a profit which would cover the book value of their licences. We do not believe that the operators who may be most threatened by the devaluation of their licences would be in that situation.

We understand that the actual value of a licence versus what the operator carries in accounting may be difficult to determine. Some method of direct compensation should be established. We have run into the matter of the value of licences in the fishing industry as well. But the Government refuses to face up to what is an economic reality. People in transportation, fishing, or a number of other enterprises, have to acquire a licence, and to acquire a licence they have to make a massive investment in relative terms, which automatically means that that licence is an asset which can be used in a variety of ways. Bill C-18 and Bill C-19 run away from that completely, in spite of the pleadings of witness after witness before the committee.

I want to say something about transportation on highways. My Party believes that we must devise transportation law and regulations which minimize as much as possible discrimination against people and the goods and services they produce just because of where they happen to be located. Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, the Queen Charlotte Islands and Vancouver Island, I have always assumed, are part of Canada. Our rail and highway systems, when it comes to transporting goods and people between those places, should be considered part and parcel of our national highway and railway system. There should be no tolls, or a minimal charge, on those ferry services. They are part and parcel of people in Canada sharing together in the cost of dealing with one another and of moving about this country or shipping their goods.

Surely that is part of co-operative federalism. Surely that should be a given. If someone wants to ride the ferry to Vancouver Island and take his wife, three kids and the dog, it will cost $30 or $40. What would happen, Mr. Speaker, if Highway 401 somewhere around Kingston, for example, were shut down for four hours, everyone was lined up and then learned it was going to cost them $50 or $100 to go the next 20 miles? Can you imagine the uproar, Mr. Speaker, in downtown Toronto or Montreal if someone were to suggest that? They would probably be locked up, especially if it were said in Ontario or Quebec.

Why would the Government even contemplate that kind of operation on our East Coast or West Coast or anywhere else in Canada where there has to be a viable transportation service serving our islands, not just the mainland? We have proposed for many decades that those be made a public utility, a public liability, and the nation as a whole, through our various provincial and federal taxes, should share in the cost. Someone buying a tank of gas in Toronto would be paying his share of getting from Nova Scotia to Newfoundland because we are all part of the same country.

Under deregulation, and under this legislation, however, all we do is to compound the felony. We continue to discriminate in transportation because of where people happen to live and where they happen to produce their goods.

Finally, I want to suggest that the Government, if it does not want to listen to me or my colleagues, or even to the Official Opposition, listen to both the opponents and the proponents of Bill C-19. Under Freedom to Move, the Canadian Truckers Association thought it was not a bad idea. By the time we got the legislation, it had changed its mind. When we started discussing Bill C-19 in committee and in this House, shippers and receivers, the Concerned Shippers Association, thought Bill C-19 was a good idea, but just yesterday a piece of correspondence landed on all our desks which said: "Do not do it yet".

Most important, and if nothing else, the Government should agree to announce in the House tonight an amendment that states that this legislation will not be proclaimed unless and until all the matters regarding licensing, federal-provincial agreements, regulations, inspectors and the boards which have the authority to enforce the legislation are in place. Then and only then, as bad as this legislation is, should the Government put it into place. The Government could wait at least that long. I predict that it would take at least until January, 1989, if not 1990. That is how much time we need.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, will the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) comment briefly on a point he brought up with respect to the confusion in the minds of government Members and those who drafted Bill C-19 between free enterprise and predation? Government Members do not seem to understand that in the United States in the five years following the introduction of very similar legislation one-third of the truckers lost their jobs or their trucking businesses.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member, who has been a member of the Transport Committee for the last 15 or 20 years, whether or not at any time any witness or any correspondence has ever come to the attention of the Transport Committee from trucking companies, independent truckers, municipalities, provinces or anybody else suggesting that legislation anything like Bill C-19 was needed in Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge legislation of this type has never been requested by the trucking industry, the airlines or the railroads. It has never been put forward by any provincial government or any municipality. That is why I said that the Government is on an ideological binge. Even if it is not going to work, the Government is on a binge. The problem is that the whole country will get the hangover.

Many of us, not only Members of the House and of the committee, but the hundreds of witnesses who appeared before the committee, have made a sincere effort. We have pleaded, asked, begged, suggested amendments and everything else to improve this legislation. The one drawback with getting stubborn is that one gets stupid. Boy, has this Government been stubborn!

The former Minister and the present Minister said that this Bill was not engraved in stone. They said: "We will be flexible". They do not understand the definition of the word. However, I guess for Tories they have been flexible. But as much as we strove and tried to make a bad Bill less bad, they refused to listen. Nobody outside the Conservative Party that I am aware of has asked for this type of legislation.

I have yet to have it shown to me why this legislation is needed. Our transportation system is not perfect. Goodness knows that it needs a lot of improvement and modernization. But it was functioning pretty well. So if it is working, then the Government should not try to fix it. This is where the Tories got so stubborn that they then proceeded to get stupid, which is exactly what this legislation is. If anybody needed to go back to the drawing-board on two Bills in this Parliament it is with respect to Bill C-18 and Bill C-19.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to premise my remarks by saying that it was not my intention to participate in this debate.

Mr. Andre: Then don't bother!

Mr. Riis: I only wish to say a few short words about the Bill. I realize that there is business to transact in the next number of days.

Because there were some interesting points made during the last number of hours I simply want to raise them with members of the Government who are here. As we all know, and as has been made clear by all the speakers who have spoken on the Bill, Bill C-19 is a Bill to deregulate the trucking industry. One must then say, presumably, that this is something that the trucking and busing companies of Canada would support. This is something they should endorse. This is a Bill which they would be encouraging us to pass rapidly. I do not have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, since you would be well aware of it because of your interest in transportation, along with every Member in this House, that Canada is the second largest country in the world and transportation, from the very beginning, has played an integral role in the development of our national economy and our regional economies. I have found out that the Canadian Trucking Association is against this Bill. If it is not in favour of it, then what on earth are we doing passing this legislation?

The trucking associations of the Provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and B.C., and probably all the other provinces, which represent thousands and thousands of trucking companies, as well as thousands of drivers and mechanics, oppose this legislation. The Canadian Truckers Association opposes Bill C-19.

One must then say that if the truckers are against this legislation, and if the bus drivers are against this legislation, then the shippers must be in favour of it. Somebody has to be in favour of it. We have received a letter from the Coalition of Concerned Shippers. It states in the letter: "Our coalition represents thousands of companies large and small across Canada who depend on an efficient, competitive trucking sector for service and for growth". The association is asking the House of Commons and the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport to reconsider the negative effects contained in recent amendments to Bill C-19 for extending the reverse onus test for truck entry from three to five years. In other words, this coalition, which represents in its own words thousands of companies large and small, is opposed to Bill C-19 in its present form.

The shippers of Canada oppose it. The truckers of Canada oppose it. The provinces have indicated their concern with it. Of course, they are asking us not to proceed with this legislation as well. So one must look around to see who it is who wants this legislation. The only person we can determine who wants it is the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) and the Conservative Members of the House.

I consider this to be undemocratic. It is clear from the presentations that the committee members heard during their examination of Bill C-19 that an overwhelming number of groups in the country that understand and live transportation every day of their lives oppose Bill C-19.

What the Government is saying is: "We know better than the shipping companies of Canada. We know better than the trucking companies of Canada. We are going to jam this legislation down their throats. We are going to use our majority to impose this deregulation on the transportation sector of the economy". That is what the Government is doing.

Let us be clear with respect to what is going on. When we talk about deregulation in trucking what it means is that for a short period of time we will throw the trucking industry onto the open market-place in anticipation of increased competition. Indeed, there will be increased competition. There will be hundreds and thousands, perhaps, of small trucking firms, perhaps even single truck firms, that will take advantage of this new deregulated environment. But we have already seen what that has done in the United States. We have seen what it has done in other jurisdictions. After a flurry of competition, when one is in an incredible cut-throat, shark-like environment, predation is the more appropriate term that describes it, free enterprise goes down the tubes.

These small and medium-size trucking companies are now being asked to compete against the giants in North America, and one of these giants does the same amount of business as all trucking in Canada. We are asking our Canadian trucking firms to take on, head to head and in open, free competition, these incredible transportation giants in the United States which, as a result of the free trade talks, will have complete access to our highway systems and will take on the small, independent Canadian transportation companies. That is the reality.

Are we to stand here as responsible Members and allow the legislation to pass? Are we to give it our enthusiastic endorsement, knowing full well that we would be sounding the death-knell for small, independent Canadian trucking companies?

Mr. Fulton: And a lot of medium-size ones as well.

Mr. Riis: To say nothing of the medium-size ones. We cannot compete with the larger American giants and the advantages which they have in terms of their economies of scale.

The Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) went on at some length to indicate what this will mean in terms of safety on our highways. I suspect that most of us as Members of Parliament have already been approached with the kinds of tales the trucking companies foresee in terms of an unbelievably competitive environment with drivers driving for 14 hours and 16 hours straight on the highways. Those trucks will have to be kept on the highways at all times and will not receive appropriate maintenance. This means that our highways will be significantly less safe than they are today.

The situation in the United States has demonstrated that conclusively. We have long lists of various U.S. organizations in the United States which have clearly and definitively pointed out that highways in the United States have been made significantly less safe as a result of deregulation.

Mr. Fulton: There has been a 50 per cent increase in tragedies on some highways.

Mr. Riis: Good grief, it is difficult to imagine. The data keeps coming in. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) indicates that 50 per cent more casualties are directly related to the deregulated environment in the United States.

It is not as though we are going into this blind. We know full well the experience down south, and now we are to apply it to the Canadian scene! Let us recognize clearly what the Government is doing. It is saying that it prefers to have large American trucking companies working in Canada. It prefers to have a less safe highway system. No one is asking for this. It is just that the Government is driven on the ideological bent that fewer rules is good business. Fewer rules might be good business for a handful of mega-trucking companies in North America, but it is bad news for small and medium-size Canadian independent trucking companies. This is the message which the Canadian Trucking Association has made so clear.

In closing, I simply want to say that we plan to oppose the legislation. We look forward to the day, not too long from now, when we are across the aisle, form the Government of Canada, and have an opportunity to undo the disaster which the present Conservative Government is imposing upon the people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the Parties, and I think Your Honour would find unanimous agreement that the recorded division be deferred until 3.15 p.m. or immediately after Question Period on Thursday of this week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that so agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS INFORMATION REVIEW ACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act and to amend other Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make a few comments on the House concerning the workplace hazardous materials information system or WHMIS.

The primary purpose of WHMIS is to protect Canadian workers by disclosing information about hazardous substances. This kind of information is not available to workers and employers at the moment. We feel that it is something all Canadians working with hazardous materials have a right to know.

Before I describe WHMIS to the House, let me talk briefly about the process of consultation and consensus which produced this legislation.

WHMIS is a real product of consensus. It is the result of over four years of extensive consultation among industry, organized labour, and federal, provincial and territorial Governments. The Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have all been key non-government parties to the WHMIS consensus. The provinces, the territories, and the federal Government also agree on WHMIS. They feel the program is needed, and they will co-operate in implementing it.

The co-operation which went into designing WHMIS and the strong and enthusiastic support for WHMIS among all consulting parties are unprecedented. The program is unique because all participants, each representing a different interest, support the proposal.

It is unique. It is the first time in Canadian history that this type of consensus or this type of tripartite agreement has been reached. We think it is yet another example of the Government's commitment to the consultative process and demonstrates that this commitment can work; we can bring about a consensus in the country if we work at it.

[Translation]

As for WHMIS, Mr. Speaker, the program provides a national, standard source of information designed to protect Canadian workers by providing both employees and employers with the necessary information on hazardous chemical products used in the workplace.

WHMIS will ensure that manufacturers, suppliers and importers provide information on hazardous materials. It will also make it possible to transmit that information to employers, who in turn will pass it on to the employees who use the materials in the workplace.

[English]

To be effective, a workplace hazardous materials information system must be comprehensive. It must be applied consistently in workplaces across Canada.

It would make little sense to require hazardous products information in one jurisdiction and not in another. The purpose is to make a uniform, national system by consensus. Of course this requires the co-operation of all federal, provincial, and territorial Governments. All these jurisdictions have existing occupational safety and health programs. WHMIS would work through these safety instruments to implement uniformly a national program in all 13 Canadian jurisdictions.

Even though WHMIS is essentially an occupational safety and health initiative, Governments, business, and labour agree that the present federal Hazardous Products Act is the best existing statute in which to establish the core requirements for WHMIS. This is because WHMIS will deal with standards and disclosure requirements for hazardous products at the point of sale or importation.

The Bill before the House would deliver the federal portion of WHMIS and would enable the program to be implemented efficiently through the existing occupational safety and health programs of the jurisdictions concerned. This will avoid needless duplication, make for smoother administration, and enable WHMIS to be a leaner, more efficient program.

Altogether, the proposed Bill contains modifications to the Hazardous Products Act and to Part IV of the Canada Labour Code. It would also establish new provisions to protect legitimate confidential information.

The Hazardous Products Act amendments will serve as a national regulatory foundation for WHMIS. WHMIS will identify hazardous materials and require information about them in the workplace. It will set up a cautionary labelling system for containers of hazardous materials and require the disclosure of even more information through material safety data sheets including the identify of hazardous ingredients. Manufacturers and importers of such material would have to provide this information as a condition of sale and importation.

WHMIS will establish a supplementary ingredient disclosure list, containing the names of additional substances which must be declared on material safety data sheets. It will establish a maximum fine for an indictable offence of $1 million for violation of the Hazardous Products Act and increase the fine on summary conviction from $1,000 to a maximum of $100,000. It will set up a mechanism to protect sensitive confidential business information. It will require suppliers to provide information, in confidence, to treating medical professionals during emergencies. The Bill also provides for consultation with the provinces, Territories, industry and labour prior to changes in the WHMIS regulations or schedules in the revised Hazardous Products Act.

• (2100)

Amendments to the Canada Labour Code Part IV are an important part of the WHMIS legislation. These will extend the protection of the WHMIS proprietary information mechanism to federally regulated employers. All other authorities to implement WHMIS, including requirements for worker education programs, are currently contained in the Canada Labour Code Part IV.

[Translation]

The revised occupational health and safety regulations will include WHMIS requirements for federally regulated employers. These requirements will be enforced in accordance with similar provincial and territorial legislation. The purpose of WHMIS, Mr. Speaker, is to protect workers, and this means that education programs for workers are an important part of the system.

[English]

Under occupational safety and health legislation, the program will require employers to establish education and training programs for employees exposed to workplace hazardous materials. These programs will ensure that employees have the information they need to handle hazardous material safety, and will include instruction about the information required on supply and workplace labels and on material safety data sheets, and the purpose and significance of this information; procedures for the safe handling, use, storage and disposal of hazardous materials in a specific workplace and procedures to be followed in case of accidents.

In arriving at a workable WHMIS program, we had to be very sensitive to the need to balance Canadian workers' legitimate right to know about the hazards of products they handle with industry's need to protect confidential business information. Attaining this delicate balance is a fundamental consideration of WHMIS. Without a proprietary information mechanism, Mr. Speaker, the program could not be implemented.

The proposed Bill, therefore, includes a mechanism to determine if a supplier should be allowed an exemption to the WHMIS ingredient disclosure requirements on the grounds that such disclosure would cause economic harm. During consultation, all parties agreed on the best mechanism to deal with claims. The mechanism would screen initial claims, adjudicate appeals against screening decisions and provide a method of judicial review limited to points of law.

The Bill before the House would create the workplace hazardous materials information review commission. It would be a single national independent agency able to screen trade secrets and hear appeals. Trade secret claims would be ruled on initially by a screening officer of the commission. Affected parties, manufacturers, importers and employees would have the right to appeal screening decisions to a tripartite appeal panel, comprising members nominated by industry, labour and provincial governments. The commission would be governed by a multipartite council of governors and would report to Parliament through the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The commission would be self-financed by fees charged to claimants and appellants.

There are several advantages to the proprietary information mechanism as it has been set up. For example, the consolidation of screening and appeal functions under one roof will result in significant savings to industry, labour and government. To guarantee that proprietary information provisions will not conflict with the requirements for worker safety in case of medical emergencies, provision has been made for the release, in confidence, of necessary information to medical professionals.

The WHMIS initiative is part and parcel of the Government's regulatory reform policy. It is also smart regulation.

Before I sit down, may I publicly acknowledge the co-operation of the opposition Parties in regard to this legislation. There has been pre-study in the Consumer and Corporate Affairs committee. It is an example that consensus and co-operation can sometimes extend to the floor of the House of Commons. I appreciate it and want to publicly acknowledge it and I hope that this spirit will last into the next session in the fall.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate today on the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System or WHMIS as the Hon. Minister has just described it. Bill C-70 before us, as the Minister has indicated, has the support of all Parties. I do not just mean all political Parties, but all parties involved in the preparation of the document meaning labour, industry, provincial Governments, the standing committees of this House of Commons and I believe all political Parties in the House as well. I would like to recognize the contributions of my two colleagues, the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) and the very distinguished Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), our Labour critic for the Liberal Party who has been working on this Bill and who is very well informed on the topic, as we know.

The Minister a few moments ago said in one breath that this legislation had been in the making for four years, which means that it was started under the previous Government, and then he took credit for the legislation being there.

He then went on to describe that it was part of his Government's regulatory reform which was started about a year and a half ago. Those are rather interesting contradictory statements coming from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre) which should not go unchallenged. As we all know, this process was initiated by the previous Liberal Government, and an excellent Government it was, Mr. Speaker as you know. Needless to say the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System will offer workers and the industry very useful information about hazardous chemical products used in the workplace. The system will be available to help reduce on-the-job accidents which, too often, could have been avoided had the appropriate information been available.

I have here the different symbols that will appear on the hazardous products and I understand as well that there will be a central registry where more information on specific chemicals will be available for people who are injured on the job and there will be easier access than we have now to obtain assistance.

The labour movement worked very hard in helping draft this legislation and for very good reason. Until the Bill came along, Canadian workers and the industries in some cases lacked very basic information in handling hazardous substances on a day-to-day basis. Unfortunately, as I said previously, when there were accidents, sometimes groups were almost totally helpless to assist a fellow worker. I would like to point out the contribution and the involvement of the Canadian Manufacturers'

Association and suppliers who prepared and assisted in the preparation of this Bill. They too offered their useful input along with organized labour and have all agreed to comply with these requirements.

Another important feature of this legislation is the fact that it will be applicable in all provinces, as I understand it, and territorial jurisdictions as well. With this legislation, we now have international standards to protect workers at the workplace.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my sole concern is to ensure or to have the Government give this House the assurance that the various juridictions, namely the federal, provincial and territorial governments, will have the necessary resources to deal with this question and enforce the new legislation being introduced today.

[English]

In order to make sure that this legislation is properly enforced, the standard must be at adequate levels and a commitment is necessary on the part of governments, be it the federal Government or the territorial governments and as well commitment is necessary on the part of employers that the resources will be there.

Mr. Speaker, that federal Act would provide for the establishment of a single, independent, trilateral, national Commission responsible to Parliament, through the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre), with responsibility to rule on confidentiality claims in respect of industrial products.

It would also be charged with ruling on initial examination of claims validity and providing trilateral arbitration on any appeal of those rulings. Because we know that often toxic chemical manufacturers, all kinds of chemicals, claim the confidentiality of their documents could be violated if the chemical composition of some of their products was published. But with the appeal mechanism provided for in this legislation, there will still be a method under which, as I am told, appeals could be made, where a manufacturer claims that others have violated his secrets, if they can be so termed, for the manufacturing of chemicals.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be part of the Liberal party which initiated that measure some four years ago. It is my hope the legislation will pass within a very short time frame in this House, and I repeat my wish and that of our party that the necessary resources, both nationally, provincially and industry-wide be made available to those who will need them to ensure that the legislation not only is well drafted but effectively implemented in the future.

• (2110)

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks on Bill C-70, the hazardous materials legislation that is before us at the present time, the Minister congratulated the opposition Parties for their co-operation. In my case, I think there has been more than co-operation because I have been pushing for this legislation almost from the day I became a Member of Parliament many years ago. It is something that I believe is very necessary and I do congratulate the various participants from the provinces, the labour movement and the business sector for working together to achieve this common goal.

The Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Labour and Health and Welfare of the federal Government deserve a great deal of credit for having facilitated this process. The participants, especially the Canadian Labour Congress, the Fédération des Travailleurs du Québec, the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and Dupont Canada deserve a great deal of credit for having worked toward an agreement which will achieve not all that each of them wanted but which will allow the legislation to be passed in order to improve health and safety conditions for Canadian workers.

Frankly, I look forward to seeing this consultative process continue in other areas of health and safety, in other areas of labour legislation and as a general practice. Personally, I believe it is too bad that the Government does not use this real consultative approach in economic matters, in job creation and with regard to social programs.

I reiterate that I am pleased that this Bill is finally coming before the House. I realize it is an all-Party agreement and that it is very difficult for us in the House to amend an all-Party agreement. By all-Party, I mean the participants from the business sector, the labour movement and the chemical industry that have worked with the provinces and the federal Government to bring this legislation before the House. They worked together on this consensus document and it is understandable that the parties that were part of that consensus would not want to see changes made in the legislation. However, as I have indicated to the Minister earlier tonight and during the prestudy in committee, I have a small number of amendments which I believe can live up to the principles of the consensus and at the same time improve the legislation.

One of the most important changes to be made is that there should be an actual implementation date in the legislation. In testimony before the committee, it was indicated that there was a tripartite agreement that the law and the regulations should be in operation by October 1 of 1988. I believe that it is important that the legislation actually have a deadline stating when it will be the law of the land. I believe that because of past experience with changes to occupational health and safety regulations in this land.

Hazardous Materials Information Review Act

In June of 1984, Parliament passed changes to the Canada Labour Code. The Code and most of its regulations did not come into effect until March of 1986. In fact, some regulations affecting health and safety in the aviation and rail industries did not come into effect until March of 1987, almost three full years later.

Clearly, with this track record, the House must act quickly. The House has agreed to act quickly on this legislation but we must have a guarantee that the Government itself and its Departments will also act quickly. We do not want to pass this legislation today with the partners to the consensus believing that it will come into effect one year from now but find out that it will not come into effect for two or three years.

There are two other changes to the legislation that I believe are necessary. One, this legislation allows for a large list of exemptions. According to the Bill, Part I does not apply in respect of the advertising, sale or importation of any explosive within the meaning of the Explosives Act; cosmetic, device, drug or food within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act; control product within the meaning of the Pest Control Products Act; or prescribed substance within the meaning of the Atomic Energy Control Act. That is one clause which contains a long list of goods and products which will be exempt. To further complicate that, Clause 12 of the same Bill lists these same exemptions and adds a number of others including hazardous waste; product, material or substance included in Part II of Schedule I and packaged as a consumer product; wood or product made of wood; tobacco or product made of tobacco; or manufactured article.

The reason we were given for having these exemptions in the Bill was that the Government had good intentions. It believed that the Departments concerned would get around to having legislation in place affecting this and hoped that the legislation would be similar or equivalent to the legislation we are passing in the House at this time. Again, going on past experience, I do not believe that we as legislators should take that chance.

The federal Government is saying that it will not force federal government Departments or Crown corporations to live up to the same legislative requirements the private sector will be required to live up to for most goods that fall under provincial legislation. I question a federal Government that does not force its own Crown corporations to live up to the same legislation it expects the private sector to live up to.

Again, referring to—I know that workplace safety may not be interesting to some Tory Members but I wish they would keep quiet.

Mr. Lewis: I object to the guy behind you reading the newspaper.

Mr. Parry: I'm very quiet.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We still have another Bill or so to deal with before the House adjourns at 10 o'clock. I would hope that we would complete this day in a nice, friendly manner. The Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has the floor.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I have been very co-operative on this Bill and I said that there would be only one speaker from our Party. If there is only one speaker, that speaker had better be heard or that speaker had better be someone other than myself.

Mr. Forrestall: Stop threatening and grow up. You make an arrangement and a commitment, stick with it.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I said this legislation is important. I find it absolutely repugnant that when this House is dealing with occupational health and safety legislation for the first time in three years, given the record of death, injury and occupational disease, that the House is not paying attention. On both occasions when legislation on this subject has been brought forward, we made arrangements not to prolong debate. I suggest that those Members who want to stay in the Chamber should either listen or keep quiet. Their other option is to leave. This is important legislation. We have done all we can to make sure it is passed. We gave it pre-study despite the fact the Government could not get it into the House until June 23. We have expressed concern about the fact the legislation has flaws but we have the commitment to do we all we can to make sure it is passed in all its stages. I said I wanted a chance to explain the amendments I thought were necessary and I expect to have that right and I hope to get the co-operation of Members of all Parties in this House.

When I was interrupted I was discussing past difficulties we have had with Crown corporations and others being exempt from the legislation. I explained that we expect that those Crown corporations should be covered in the same way the private sector has agreed to be covered. I have pointed out that the history of some Crown corporations does not increase my belief that they will live up to the spirit of the legislation so I believe it is important that, if not today then some time in the future, those Crown corporations should be covered by the legislation. Let me give an example.

When Atomic Energy of Canada was faced with workers protesting sex discrimination because women workers were allowed lower radiation exposure levels than men, AECL did not lower the limits for men, it raised the limits for women. Not only that, despite the fact that they set the limit in the first place, they insisted on doing it behind closed doors. It took a number of questions in this House to the then Minister responsible, Jean Chrétien, to allow the Canadian Labour Congress to make its presentation to the AECB to be made in a public session. With that kind of record I do not believe they should be exempt from the legislation.

This is a consensus document and it is going to be very difficult to change the legislation in detail so it is going to be very difficult to change the legislation in detail. Therefore this large list of exemptions should be subject to a sunset clause. It should not go on for two, three, four, five, six, ten or twenty years, or even indefinitely, without the workers being protected by legislative action. I gave the Minister amendments today which say that in two years' time these clauses would lapse and those workers would be protected in the same way other workers across Canada are protected. I consider that a constructive amendment. I have also suggested that if that is not acceptable to the Minister, we should have an automatic legislative review of these clauses by the appropriate committee in two years' time. That is the least the House can do for the workers in these industries. I believe it is necessary that we guarantee the workers concerned that this House will be able to take some action in the future or that the relevant clauses are subject to a two-year time limit.

In addition, although the legislation calls for data sheets on hazardous materials and their chemical components, there is no requirement for any kind of central repository for those data sheets. There is no provision whatsoever to guarantee that the public has access to those sheets. The employers and employees of a particular plant may have access, but people passing through those work sites for whatever reason have no guarantee of access. In addition, the lack of a central repository restricts the ability of those who are concerned with occupational health and safety in obtaining adequate information.

I suggested that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should be responsible for the central repository. That department would be responsible for monitoring complaints under the Act as well as checking to make sure these data sheets are in the appropriate form and meet the requirements of the Act. That is what we expect of government departments when we pass legislation like this, and I do believe it is important. I hope the Government will accept my amendment in that respect.

I have one more subject that I am going to deal with and it relates to the Government's approach to occupational health and safety. I find it ironic that at the very time we are passing this legislation, which requires more work in this field so that the employee is able to better exercise his or her right to know, the Government has cut funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

It was clear from the presentations we received that most people expected that the centre in Hamilton would have a responsibility for assisting small businesses and helping employees obtain further information on chemicals, training sessions and materials, and other related material. Yet, as a result of funding cut-backs, that centre does not meet those requirements and is not going to be in a position to make sure that the protection this legislation calls for is provided. In light of the passage of this legislation, I call upon the Government to make a commitment to provide increased and adequate funding for that centre so it can do its job to protect the health of Canadian workers.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a committee of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS AND DEPOSIT INSURANCE SYSTEM AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-42, an Act respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (for the Minister of State for Finance) moved:

That Bill C-42, be amended in Clause 17 by striking out lines 32 to 36 on page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"17.(1) The Minister may make expenditures out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to defray the expenses arising out of the operations of the Office."

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to assure Members of the House that this is a technical amendment to correct a drafting oversight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As we have passed the amendment to Bill C-42, I believe we could move on to the concurrence stage. I must admit that we have not had full discussions with the other Parties, but I think you would find unanimous consent to move to third reading stage of Bill C-42 at this time.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations and I agree to that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm that there have been excellent negotiations during the evening and, in an effort to expedite the business of the House and facilitate the rapid passage of this Bill, we will certainly agree to proceed to third reading now.

Miss MacDonald (for the Minister of State for Finance) moved that the Bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Miss MacDonald (for the Minister of State for Finance) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on behalf of the Official Opposition during the debate at second reading of Bill C-42, I said that the Bill is a useful first step in the Government's agenda for financial re-regulation in Canada. I stressed that it is a very preliminary first step containing the least contentious of the measures proposed in last December's paper New Directions for the Financial Sector.

It is worth repeating that one of the reasons we have been able to make relatively quick work of this particular Bill is the strong support of all Parties for the process of reform and the accompanying need for enhanced regulatory authority. This House was greatly shocked by the events, some 18 months ago, of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northlands Bank and the weaknesses they showed in the regulatory system and ministerial accountability. We in the Opposition have felt considerable urgency in moving to correct the problems revealed then.

This is essentially what is involved in Bill C-42. It is the enabling legislation for a new regulatory body, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. It also contains some provisions respecting the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The Bill implements only a small portion of the scenario outlined in broad strokes in the December Blue Paper. The provisions of Bill C-56, which the Finance Committee examined concurrently with Bill C-42—apart from one aspect to which I will refer later—do not add much to the government record in terms of legislation brought before the House. As I have said, these two Bills can be characterized as curtain raisers. The main event, the 1,000-page blockbuster Bill which will give us all the main pieces of the puzzle, has not yet appeared.

I was critical of this in my speech at second reading, and I remain so. I asked then why our examination of the Government's proposals could not be facilitated by having all the Bills before us. We have been dealing with bits and pieces, which is most unsatisfactory. It proved to be something of a handicap to us in committee.

Time and again Members would question a provision of the Bill and we would be told that the matter would be clarified in the final piece of legislation. This put members of the committee in the position of having to decide whether they were prepared to approve legislation about which we have unanswered questions on the strength of assurances that the questions will be answered to our satisfaction when we see the final Bill.

When will we see this Bill or, rather, this draft Bill? First we were told that it would be tabled before the House rose for the summer. More recently the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) said he expects to release it "this summer" which I suppose could mean anytime before the House reconvenes in the fall. Therefore, although some progress is being made with regard to the less contentious of the Government's proposals, it appears that we may be in for further delay when it comes to introducing and implementing the bulk of the measures proposed in the Blue Paper, particularly matters concerning ownership and commercial links which are important matters of public policy which require detailed debate.

For now I would like to return to some of the issues I raised in my earlier speech on Bill C-42 and make further comment based on the hearings held by the Finance Committee.

In speaking of the new regulatory body, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, I mentioned that although I support this initiative and the expanded powers conferred on the regulator, I had some questions about the size and funding of the new office, as well as the exercise of its new powers.

The new office is to be formed by amalgamating the Department of Insurance and the Office of the Inspector General of Banks. Both these offices have had needed increases in their person-year allocations. However, unfortunately, the Minister, in his appearance before the committee, could not give a commitment that in terms of person-years at least the new office would be larger than the sum of its parts. I say that this is unfortunate because we were all very much aware at the time of the bank failures that staff shortage in the regulator's offices was a factor. We are now moving toward a much more integrated financial system which, by its nature, will require closer and more vigilant supervision. It is important to ensure that the chief regulator has not only the quality of staff but the numbers necessary to do the job.

With respect to funding of the new regulatory agency, 15 per cent is to come from the Government through the Consolidated Revenue Fund and the remainder is to come from the financial institutions and is to be levied on the same basis as the premiums paid now by institutions to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation for their deposit insurance. Should an institution disagree with the assessment levied on it, there is no means of appeal except through the courts. None of this information is in the Bill. We are told that it will be in the regulations.

With respect to the new powers made available to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions through Bill C-42, I remain concerned about the vagueness of the provisions by which the Minister is to be kept informed of action taken by the regulator. The Bill allows the regulator to take control of an institution for seven days or longer and to make business decisions for that institution if "there exists any practice or state of affairs which may be materially prejudicial to the interests of policyholders or creditors". Obviously this is a serious action which would not be taken lightly.

I was surprised, however, to hear the Minister say in committee that he is not contemplating any specific guidelines or criteria under which the regulator would assume control of an institution. Although the Bill requires the Minister to be informed within seven days of the regulator taking over an institution, there is no requirement to do so at the outset. The Minister stated that he is comfortable with that and with reliance on convention and practice rather than a built-in legislative requirement that he be kept informed.

Members will recall that in the aftermath of the bank failures, we spent a great deal of time trying to determine the extent to which Ministers had requested and received information from their officials, and attempting to find out exactly what information the Ministers used as the basis of their decision. In light of all that, I am surprised that the Minister is not taking every opportunity to formalize the principle that he should be kept fully informed of his Department's operations. It seems logical, since it is the Minister who is accountable for those operations.

Turning now to Bill C-42's proposals with respect to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, I would like to refer briefly to a matter I raised in my speech at second reading. That is the CDIC Board of Directors and the practice that has been followed there of sending substitutes to board meetings. This is unheard of in the private sector. Indeed, in committee we were told that no substitution will be accepted with respect to the private sector representatives of the CDIC board. That is nice to know, even though there are no private sector people on the CDIC board. The enabling legislation was passed last year but the Government has not yet made any appointments.

My concern is directed at the public sector members and with keeping some continuity. There can be no continuity if these Members can designate a different substitute every time the board is scheduled to meet. We have some reason to think that this was a factor in the lack of knowledge of the precise state of the Canadian Commercial Bank a couple of years ago.

Of course, the optimal situation would be to have no substitution. However, the proposal put forward in committee seems an acceptable compromise. It is to designate for the public sector members permanent substitutes through order-in-council or ministerial letter.

Bill C-42 gives CDIC powers to terminate deposit insurance coverage and to levy penalties or fines on institutions deemed not to be carrying out sound business and financial practices. The phrase "sound business and financial practices" appears in the Bill but is not defined. I am advised that a definition is to appear in the CDIC by-laws which are to be made public before being enforced.

My concern, which was expressed by other members of the Finance Committee, was for the consequences if the fact that an institution had paid a premium penalty, or even been threatened with a premium penalty, became public knowledge. It would be a signal that the institution had engaged in questionable practices and would probably spell the death of that particular institution. Then we were told the assessment of premium penalties is not intended to be public knowledge. As pointed out in committee, records are kept so the likelihood is there.

Perhaps it should be made public. Payment of a premium penalty might be something that an institution's auditors would have a duty to report to the shareholders.

It is a real dilemma. If it became known that an institution had had its knuckles rapped, so to speak, obviously that would lead to a loss of public confidence and a run on that institution which might very well force it into failure. On the other hand, keeping it secret is probably not justifiable on ethical grounds because if an institution is engaging in unsound business practices, its customers and shareholders have been put at risk and information should not be withheld from them.

In committee I asked the Minister how he would resolve this dilemma. He said that the matter of premium surcharges was not intended to be made public and he was reluctant to have a situation where one "transgression", as he put it, would result in permanent damage or collapse of an institution. He used an analogy of headmaster and school child which, in my view, falls far short of the complexity of the situation we are actually dealing with.

Granted, the power to assess penalties is one that may not be exercised often. The fact of its being there may be all the disincentive that is needed for institutions that might be tempted to questionable practices. However, there really is a certain amount of pious hope in this.

An alternative which was not accepted by the Minister was that of not using inflammatory words like "unsound business practices", but perhaps having different premiums for institutions that were doing high risk business. This was not accepted by the Minister. I must say that I do not find his solution very satisfactory.

With respect to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation deficit, I raised the question in committee why the Government had not chosen in Bill C-42 to deal separately with CDIC's ongoing function of providing deposit insurance coverage, and with retiring an accumulated deficit which is not closely related to CDIC's core function. By that I mean that significant portions of the CDIC's deficit are due to policy decisions of the Government. Since the Bill does not provide for a separation, we are left with a situation where the retirement of the CDIC deficit, which is still hovering at about a billion dollars, is very much tied to the future health of Canadian institutions. So any further payouts to depositors, any further use of CDIC resources to finance Government policies, will further postpone the eventual retirement of this debt.

• (2150)

At committee, the Minister appeared satisfied to take the chance that there would be no more failures of financial institutions, federal or provincial, to delay repayment of CDIC's deficit. He also said he could not see a need for separate measures. However, I have to say again I cannot follow his reasoning.

He told the committee on June 8 "The whole question of addressing Government planned decisions that affect the CDIC is a separate problem, and a separate event than can be addressed separately". As I pointed out, the Government's practice of using CDIC funds to pay for its own policy decisions is a convenient way for the Government to implement costly decisions without having to show it as an increase in the deficit of the Government of Canada. This is because the CDIC deficit, like the deficits of other Crown corporations, is not included as part of the over-all Government deficit. There are no provisions made for it because it is not recognized as an obligation of the Crown. The Minister's theory with respect to CDIC is that the money is not at risk because it can be recovered through the member institutions.

However, the point is that if the Government had not dipped into CDIC funds to help pay for such things as the bail-out of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the takeover by the Hongkong Bank of the Bank of British Columbia, it would have had to make direct use of Government funds, and its deficit would have been $1 billion higher. I would have preferred to see the Government adopt a regime to deal with the CDIC deficit in a timely manner without being dependent on there being no further payouts of deposit insurance.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to refer briefly to another matter involving the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation which I raised earlier in the House and in committee. In March in this House, in Question Period, I asked the Minister of State for Finance about a proposition made to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation by Peter Pocklington whose company, Fidelity Trust, had failed and who had thereafter offered to pay to CDIC $10 million to buy $150 million worth of Fidelity Trust tax losses which he would then use to shelter his other profitable enterprises. The Minister of State for Finance referred to this as an extraordinary story and behaved as though I had invented it. Yet in committee we find that in fact this offer was made. The President of CDIC confirmed that they examined the offer and considered it for quite some time before rejecting it, and further, I learned that recently the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) issued a directive to Crown corporations regarding the sale of tax losses.

When I asked the Minister about this matter, and he behaved as though I had invented it, it was under active consideration by the Canada Deposit Insurance Company which, to its credit, rejected it, and the Minister of Finance presumably was concerned since he has subsequently issued a directive to Crown corporations advising them not to get involved in this kind of exercise. I am very glad he has done this. However, I am concerned that the Minister of State for Finance either did not know about the issue, or knew but chose not to answer my question.

It is this kind of lack of frankness which makes it very difficult for us to have confidence in the Government and to have confidence when we are told to pass the Bill and all our concerns will be satisfied later on. Nevertheless, because this Bill does reinforce the powers of the regulators to some extent, I will be voting for it and further questions will remain until we get the more solid Bill, whenever we get it.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise and comment on this Bill. I must admit that given the exhaustive and comprehensive analysis my colleague, the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) has provided, it almost verges on the superfluous for me to try to expand on the points she has raised. Nevertheless, I think it is very useful that we reinforce that the over-all strategy of the Government in dealing with the shock waves which went through the financial industry as a result of the failure of two western banks was definitely lacking. The shortcoming lies in the slowness of action and in essentially realigning the regulatory system without, as my hon. colleague said, providing any firm assurance that there will be a strengthening of the personnel involved. That does not reflect favourable on the Government's level of commitment to ensure this sort of failure and, indeed, the losses which would have arisen but for the Government stepping in and subsidizing the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, does not happen again.

I think the situation, obviously, which ideally all Parties in this House would want to see, is one in which the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation always has access to the funds necessary to pay any claims against it arising from the failure of any size of financial institution. We know that this was not the case with respect to the two western banks, and the Government felt it was incumbent upon itself to step in. That which was essentially an ad hoc investment, if we put it politely, and expenditure, if we put it bluntly, of taxpayers' funds was in fact little more than the parallel to the sort of shoring up of industrial companies, particularly Crown corporations which has happened under previous Liberal Governments. So it is not for any partisan purpose that I would instance this as an indication of failure of the Government's over-all agency financial institutions regulatory policy.

We saw the turnover of personnel at the highest levels, the supervisors, the watchdogs of the financial industry and, indeed, one thing which at least we can say is that we know the management which previously had allowed some of the things to happen was not there to let it happen again, which we could not say in the case of some industrial companies which were subsidized under the previous administration.

This element of ad hoc policy of all governments both at the federal and provincial level as it relates to financial institutions is something we as Canadians surely cannot countenance for much longer. I think, of course, of the several cases in my own Province of Ontario. The names Seaway Trust and Greymac will ring a bell. I think the related flipping of residential apartment units within Metropolitan Toronto, the enormous paper profits generated and the subsequent and possibly resultant stripping of the assets of the companies involved, shows there has been a general weakness in the regulations of financial institutions in Canada which, even with the Government proposing and expounding a climate of deregulation, surely must give us indication that in the future we will need far stronger regulations than we have had in the past.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it ten o'clock, I believe the Hon. Member for Ottawa Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has the usual question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister could tell us what the business of the House will be for Thursday, that is the day after tomorrow, June 25, and even for Friday—tomorrow being the national holiday of Quebecers and other French-speaking Canadians, the House will not be sitting—so we may prepare ourselves.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, Thursday the House will resume the capital punishment debate, I think it should be a normal day. As to Friday, the matter is under discussion with the other House leaders and our caucus.

PRIVILEGE

AVAILABILITY OF BILL BEFORE INTRODUCTION IN HOUSE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege of which I gave you notice earlier this morning.

I was surprised this morning when listening to the CBC Radio-News to learn that three Members of Parliament, the Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin), the Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon), and the Member for Charlevoix (Mr. Hamelin) had received and made comment on a Bill not yet tabled in the House and therefore not available to all Members of Parliament for similar comment. I refer to a Bill to amend the Official Languages Act.

I would like from you clarification on this practice. It is my recollection that it is against the rules and customs of the House for the Government to make available to one group of Members a Bill for comment that is not made available to others. I think that requires some clarification and direction on your part.

I can understand the Government discussing the principles of a Bill that it will table with some Members of Parliament, including its own caucus, but not giving those Members the final Bill for comment publicly. I can also understand the Government providing Bills and documents to the official critics in the Opposition, but again under the obligation that they shall not make those Bills or proposals public, and not comment on them until the Bill has been tabled in the House.

In this case, the Member for Charlevoix said that according to the Bill Anglo-Quebecers would have no reason to worry. Perhaps he is right, but I, as a Member representing a Quebec riding with a majority of Anglophones, have no way of responding or commenting on his comments.

I would appreciate your clarification on this rule and custom of the House. If you feel that I have a prima facie case of privilege I will move that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedures.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could be permitted to comment on the question of privilege raised by my hon. friend, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). I simply want to assure the Hon. Member, the Speaker, and the House, that no Member, with the exception that I will explain, received a copy of the Bill.

Indeed, the printing of the Bill was only completed last night, and I only now received the Bill which is to be tabled in the House of Commons. It is true that I have given copies of the legislation to the Hon. Member's colleague, the Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), the critic for the Official Opposition, and to the critic of the New Democratic Party, the Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp). I also had breakfast with them to discuss the provisions of the Bill.

I have discussed with members of my caucus the general principles of the legislation which, as indicated by the Hon. Member, is the usual case with caucus members in order to obtain their guidance and direction concerning the ultimate provisions.

There has been no breach of the long established tradition of having copies of any legislation that is to be tabled delivered to any Member, except for the exception that there has been a lock-up in this case. There have been interest groups, as well as the Commissioner of Official Languages, who have been briefed this morning and provided with a copy of the Bill, with the usual embargo.

There was one final courtesy that I thought I would extend and which would not breach the traditions of the House. Due to their particular interest in this area, this morning at ten o'clock I delivered copies of the Bill with a covering letter of an embargo to the chairpersons of the Standing Joint Committee Official Languages. I hope that will explain the matter satisfactorily to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair wants to ensure there are no other Members wishing to rise on the question of privilege. The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) wishes to comment.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, if the situation is as described by the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), I accept that. However, I think the rules should be clarified because it appeared from the very specific comments made by the three Members to whom I referred that they had very explicit knowledge of what was in the Bill. As I say, one can understand discussing the principles of a Bill with one's caucus, and giving advance copies under embargo to critics, the Language Commissioner and so on.

I hope the Speaker and the House would agree that it is not fair to all Members if only some Members of the House have complete access to a Bill and make comments publicly before all Members can make those same comments. It leaves many of us in a position where we cannot properly defend the interests of our constituents.

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker: Are there any Members rising on this Question of privilege?

I think the Chair can dispose of it appropriately by reminding Hon. Members that this matter has come up before and I have ruled there is not a prima facie case. I would so rule in this particular matter, especially having listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and hearing the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) who, of course, accepts the explanation of the Minister of Justice.

Having said this, Hon. Members can understand the difficulty in which the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East finds himself, along with other Members, no doubt, if statements are made in advance of a Bill being introduced into the House, and if those statements are made, giving the impression—even though it may not be the fact—that someone else has a copy of the document itself.

However, in this case the Hon. Minister of Justice made it quite clear that that was not the situation. He has also made it quite clear that a copy of the Bill was given in the usual and traditional ways to the interested members of the Opposition.

While I understand the complaint and concern of the Hon. Member, this is not a question of privilege. I thank the Hon. Member for bringing the matter to the attention of the Chair and to this Chamber, and I thank the Hon. Minister of Justice for his very frank presentation which has been helpful to the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 84(1), I have the honour to lay upon the Table copies of a Ways and Means motion to amend the Income Tax Act.

Pursuant to Standing Order 84(2), I ask that an order of the day be designated for the consideration of the said motion.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles Hamelin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 99(2) of the House of Commons, the committee asks the Government to table a response to this report within 150 days.

[English]

The report makes recommendation for necessary changes to official languages policy and programs within the federal jurisdiction as a result of testimony received from 16 government departments and agencies.

[Translation]

The committee firmly believes the Treasury Board must play to a greater degree its key role in the co-ordination of official languages programs for the whole Public Service, and it recommends that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Mazankowski) present Parliament with a report on the status of official languages at the time the Main Estimates are tabled.

The committee further recommends that a plan regarding official languages be submitted each year by all federal departments and agencies to the Treasury Board.

[English]

Also included are recommendations that the minimum language knowledge level of positions offering a service to the public be eliminated in favour of an intermediate knowledge level and that managers and supervisors be required to possess a superior knowledge of the second official language.

Finally, the report recommends an efficient control system be established for the payment of the bilingualism bonus.

PRESENTATION OF THE REPORT OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-21

Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Québec East): Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-21, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Competition Act, to repeal the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, I have the honour to report the Bill with an amendment.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to thank all members of the committee for their participation and their interest in that matter, specially the technical staff, and the clerk of the committee whose work is so valuable yet often away from the limelight.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have suggested this before to four of Your Honour's predecessors, and I will now suggest it to you. Is there not some way to avoid the Chair having to read off a lengthy list every day and just say something to the effect, "Shall all the motions as shown on today's Order Paper stand?" and let it go at that?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I agree whole-heartedly with my friend. It would seem to me that, perhaps over the summer, some consideration could be given to this matter to incorporate exactly what the Hon. Member has said into our procedures. In this way business would flow more smoothly. It would not look as if Hon. Members were being dilatory by not being here to present their motions.

Mr. Speaker: I very much appreciate the comments of the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) and the comments of the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary. I take it that there is a general disposition in the House at this time that the Speaker should proceed to find a more expeditious way of carrying out this item of Routine Proceedings. I am very grateful to Hon. Members, and I will do that.

TRANSPORTATION—ECONOMIC REGULATORY REFORM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and honour to present two petitions. The first is from citizens of Thunder Bay who hope that it is not too late.

They state in their petition that Bill C-18 will create unnecessary chaos in the transportation industry leading to unacceptable reductions in safety standards as well as a deterioration in the quality, type and frequency of service. They request that the Parliament of Canada withdraw Bill C-18 and retain public convenience and necessity as a fundamental factor in the development of public transportation policy.

Petitions

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATOR—SETTLEMENT WITH FRED TURNER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition for which I know the Hon. Member from the Northwest Territories will renew his support. It has to do with the bankruptcy of Fred Turner, Turnair and the decision of the CTC to cancel his licence to operate an airline in 1983.

The petitioners call upon the House to assign an independent arbitrator to this matter in order to investigate the details of the case and to review and negotiate the offer from the federal Government with Fred Turner in order to reach an equitable settlement which better reflects the true nature of his loss.

OPPOSITION TO REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to introduce a petition from the parishioners of Saint-Louis-de-France in my constituency who object to the reinstatement of capital punishment. They believe that the right to life is a sacred principle and that God alone is entitled to take it away, that a civilized people cannot approve revenge and that a judicial mistake can definitely seal the fate of an innocent individual.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO USE OF CHEMICAL PESTICIDES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from Kaslo, Silverton, and Nelson, British Columbia, as well as a number of petitioners from the Province of Ontario who are drawing to the attention of the House of Commons the fact that increasing numbers of chemicals used as herbicides and insecticides have been proved to have harmful effects on human health. They list a whole number of concerns which I will not go into since we will have an opportunity to look at this matter later.

They ask the House of Commons to initiate a full public inquiry into the safety, testing, registration and regulation of the use of pesticides, suggesting that we examine alternative ways of controlling pests by such methods as biological control and plant-derived pesticides.

SUPPORT FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present some 65 petitions from citizens from a wide range of locations in Canada all of whom petition and pray that it should be in the best interest of good order in society that the capital punishment motion should go forward and that the return of capital punishment should be given consideration by this Parliament.

OPPOSITION TO CHANGES TO PATENT ACT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have a number of petitions to present. In order to save the time of the House of Commons I will present all 16 petitions now and list off the communities from which they come. They are: Elliot Lake, Ontario; Blind River, Ontario; Moncton, New Brunswick; Riverview, New Brunswick; Hillsborough, New Brunswick; Thunder Bay, Ontario; Fort St. John, B.C.; Dawson Creek, B.C.; Vancouver, B.C.; Toronto, Ontario; Scarborough, Ontario; New Glasgow, Pictou, Trenton and Stellarton, Nova Scotia; Mississauga, Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Sudbury and London, Ontario; St. Thomas, Kitchener, Huron Park, Aylmer, Keewatin, Windsor, Tecumseh, Elgin, and Nipigon, Ontario; and Fredericton, New Brunswick.

In these petitions hundreds of Canadians express their concern with respect to the Government's intention to pass Bill C-22 into legislation. They believe that it will unfairly hurt those Canadians whose health needs require the purchase of prescription drugs on an ongoing basis. They believe that the federal Government's proposal will result in higher costs to provincial government drug plans. They also believe that this is another example of the Canadian Government making concessions to the United States at the expense of average Canadians in the free trade negotiations.

OPPOSITION TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION OR SUPPORT—SDI

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition from all parts of Canada containing some 8,978 signatures. The petition, following the new rules, is commendably brief.

To the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled; whereas the United States Strategic Defense Initiative, or star wars, is a dangerous escalation of the nuclear arms race and over 50 Nobel Prize winning scientists have condemned it as economically disastrous and strategically destabilizing, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to firmly guarantee that there will be no testing, development, manufacture or deployment of SDI systems or components in Canada; end all Canadian political support for SDI and actively support positive alternatives to SDI, including; strengthening the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, the establishment of an international satellite-monitoring agency and a ban on all nuclear weapon testing.

SUPPORT FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of citizens of the Province of Ontario and other Canadians from all across the country 2,000 signatures calling upon this Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment. These signatures, which now total over 24,000, represent the strong will of the Canadian people on this important issue.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to present to the House of Commons today on behalf of the citizens of Scarborough and other locations across Ontario and, indeed, from citizens in towns and villages right across Canada, 2,081 signatures of people who are calling upon Parliament to pass a motion for the return of capital punishment for certain acts of planned and deliberate murder and the killing of police officers and prison guards.

The signatures now total nearly 25,000 and represent the strong will of the Canadian people on this very important issue.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of the citizens of the City of Mississauga and, indeed, Canadians from all across the country, over 1,000 signatures of people who are calling upon this Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment.

The signatures now total almost 30,000 and represent the strong will of the Canadian people on this important issue.

Mr. Peter Peterson (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of the citizens of the City of Hamilton in the Province of Ontario and Canadians from all across our country 2,015 signatures of petitioners, who are calling upon this Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment in Canada.

The signatures, which now total well over 30,000, represent the strong will of the Canadian people on this important issue.

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO CORPORATE PLAN

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of literally hundreds of my constituents petitions calling on the Government to maintain Canada's postal service, especially in rural areas, where it is under attack and where there is great uncertainty.

• (1130)

OPPOSITION TO CHANGES TO PATENT ACT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Next, I have a petition signed by several hundred of my constituents concerning the Patent Act as it relates to drugs. This petition calls on the Government to maintain the place of generic drugs in the market-place, given the adverse effect the loss of these generic pharmaceuticals would have on the price of drugs generally.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed from Monday, June 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

Mr. Riis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kaplan: A point of order.

Mr. Lewis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall hear first from the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary, followed by the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and then the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have reconsidered. I shall proceed in a different fashion.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, before we resume the ongoing debate on capital punishment, taking into consideration that we are holding discussions in an effort to expedite the business of the House and make the House of Commons as productive as possible, I wonder if I might ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader whether there would be a disposition on the part of those on the government benches not to call for extended hours later today.

If he were to so indicate, we would reciprocate by saying that it would not be our intention through the day to be calling for a quorum.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I was intending to refer to that in my remarks. I can assure all Members of the House that the Government feels that the debate on capital punishment is progressing in an orderly manner. There has been a great deal of participation by Members from all sides of the House, representing both sides of the issue. Under that circumstance, the Government has no intention of extending the hours for debate either through the lunch hour or at ten o'clock this evening.

I should point out that Private Members' Hour has disappeared today, with the result that the debate will continue right through. As well, there will not be a dinner break at 6.00 p.m.

I appreciate the Hon. Member's suggestion that, in return for my assurance that extended hours will not be called for, a quorum will not be called at any time during the day.

I am sure that all Members realize that we are all in the position of trying to complete whatever we can with regard to constituency work and committee work and that it is not possible for all who are on duty to be in the House at all times. I appreciate the assurance given by my colleague in that respect.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) rising?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I was not, Mr. Speaker; however, I dare not rise when you invite me to do so.

I think it reasonable, Mr. Speaker, that we undertake not to call for a quorum in light of the Government's undertaking not to move a motion calling for extended hours. However, I should point out that under the rules recently adopted by the House, it does take 15 Members to block a motion for extended hours. So, we will attempt to be vigilant about that possibility, in any event.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—and it is just a technicality. In calling the business of the day, I appreciate that it is often done in an abbreviated fashion. I would ask that the next time business of the day is called, it be done in a more complete form.

Given the manner in which this order was called today, there is in fact no motion on the floor. The next time it is called, I would appreciate it being done in a very complete manner, enabling a full disclosure as to the precise terms of the motion before the House. In that way, there will be no confusion.

Mr. Speaker: That seems to be a reasonable request. I shall ensure that something is done to satisfy it.

The Hon. Member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan) on debate.

Mr. W. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I very much welcome this opportunity to participate in the capital punishment debate. I support the re-establishment of capital punishment in Canada. However, I think it would be worthwhile to narrow the issues we are discussing today to those contained in the motion.

In order to bring about focus on the real issues, let me start by disposing of some of the arguments which have received some attention thus far in the debate.

It is often asserted that before capital punishment was officially eliminated in 1976 the law had ceased to be effective and, therefore, restoring the status quo ante-1976 will accomplish nothing. Let me state that I agree with this argument.

The second emotive argument which is raised is that somehow those of us who wish to reinstate capital punishment want to bring back the noose. This is not what I want, nor what the vast majority of Canadians want.

The third argument which is raised is that society has progressed beyond the "eye for an eye" mentality; that is, that vengeance should not be the principal thrust of a modern judicial system. I also agree with this concept, as do the vast majority of MPs and the public.

The fourth argument which is raised is that if capital punishment is reinstated it will become more difficult to convict murderers. I personally consider this a strong argument in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment. The implicit assumption underlying it is that somehow jurors are convicting people of murder now notwithstanding that they have genuine doubt as to guilt. With capital punishment in place, jurors would be more reluctant to convict in the absence of resolving all doubt.

I personally feel that juries should not be handing down guilty verdicts in circumstances where they have some doubt as to guilt. If the availability of capital punishment will cause jurors to take the extra time for consideration before bringing in a guilty verdict, I would consider that to be an argument in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment.

The question then which is relevant to the capital punishment debate is this. Does one favour taking a human life under any circumstances and, if so, on what basis? If so, the matter of which crimes should be potentially subject to capital punishment and who should impose the sentence, as well as the method of execution to be used, must also be considered.

When I first entered politics nine years ago I decided it would be prudent to ask myself, in the privacy of my own home, what my beliefs and convictions were, so that when I appeared in a public forum or gave interviews to the press, I would not be left to wing it; that rather, I would have a comprehensive philosophical and political basis on which to respond.

I must admit that until I sat down and wrote a list of the questions that I could be asked, I had not given the issue of capital punishment much time or thought. What thought I had given it led me to believe that capital punishment should not be imposed in the majority of first degree murder cases, since most first degree murders were committed by close family members, and murderers falling into this category show a remarkable degree of rehabilitation. Nor did I believe that an accomplice who was waiting in the get-away vehicle should be equally liable for the death penalty as the person who went into a bank and shot a teller.

However, as I considered that decision, my mind turned to individuals such as those who killed the Portuguese shoe-shine boy, Emanuel Jaques. After holding the boy for several days and assaulting him, they then drowned him.

I also began to think of cases involving young children, particularly girls, who were murdered following violent rape or sexual molestation, as well as, of course, serial killers, of whom there are all too many, who principally abduct, assault and kill young women.

In these situations, it seems to me that there is a valid case for capital punishment. The rationale, of course, is primarily one of public safety, although there is a substantial element of deterrence. For example, questions asked of the killers of Emanuel Jaques elicited the response that had there been capital punishment, they would not likely have proceeded to kill the boy. Similarly, there are examples of lifers, particularly those guilty of multiple murders, who have nothing to lose in trying to escape and as a consequence inflict serious or deadly assaults upon prison guards.

In these situations of serial murders and murders which involve rape or child assault, in the case of murders involving any violent crime, or in the case of murders done for ideological reasons, particularly the so-called executions of innocent hostages, I found, in closely examining myself, that I believed the public safety was best served by reinstating capital punishment. Having reached this conclusion, the questions were these. What sort of system should be brought into being, how would this differ from the old system, and how could a structure best be set up to achieve the desired results?

Over the last nine years I have had many discussions with constituents and participated in well over 100 all-candidate debates in which the issue of capital punishment has often arisen. By and large I found that most of the population had not thought out the issue thoroughly. They tended initially to engage in a knee-jerk reaction to the issue. However, after prolonged discussions, I found that the vast majority of Canadians seem to have similar views to my own.

With this in mind, I ran a referendum in my riding early this year. In my referendum I did not simply ask a black and white question such as, "Are you in favour of capital punishment?" I took steps to explain the issues to my constituents and to use open-ended questions to seek their views.

I indicated that I would treat the referendum seriously, that I genuinely desired to know the views of my constituents, and that I would reflect their thinking in my speech in the House of Commons.

The response was overwhelming. Over 16,300 ballots were returned; by far the largest response ever received by any Member of Parliament on any issue up to that time. About 10 per cent of these ballots either included lengthy comments in the section provided on the ballot or contained letters. The ballot of course was conducted completely anonymously, but many individuals took the opportunity to sign their names to the letters.

I was interested to find out that my constituents' views closely coincided with my own. First, there was no support whatsoever for an automatic death sentence for any crime. However, the vast majority of my constituents believe that capital punishment can be justified under one or more circumstances.

Almost two-thirds of the respondents felt that capital punishment should potentially be available to any person who commits first degree murder. Almost one-quarter of respondents feel that this is too widespread and that capital punishment should only be potentially available for some first degree murders. Of this minority, more than three-quarters cited murders of police and jail guards, and just over one-half cited murder in the act of committing another violent crime as potential capital offences.

However, the psyche of my constituents was much more interestingly revealed in respect of a question about serious terrorist acts which did not involve taking a human life. The hypothetical example I cited was drawn from real life and dealt with a terrorist who intended to blow up an airliner by planting a bomb in the hand luggage of his fiancé. The fact that he did not succeed in committing murder was not due to his efforts but due to the diligence of the airline inspection system. Astoundingly, more people favour capital punishment for terrorism of this type even though no life was taken than favour capital punishment for first degree murder.

These results and many notes and letters which I received indicated quite clearly that the public's desire to see capital punishment reinstated was first and foremost based on a concern for public safety. Some people who have committed the vilest and most violent type of murder were judged simply too dangerous to have around. In addition, there was and is a steely determination to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the type of terrorism against innocent people now prevalent in Europe or in the Middle East does not spread to Canada. It was for these reasons that people overwhelmingly supported the resurrection of the death penalty.

The second question I asked was, "Who should impose the sentence"? Once again the public's view coincided closely with my own and represented a complete rejection of the previous system. The public simply does not want the very serious decision to take a life to rest in the hands of any one individual such as the judge. Over 85 per cent of the respondents felt that the jury should first vote whether the individual was guilty or innocent of a potentially capital offence and then, immediately after returning this decision, the jury should be asked for its recommendation on whether the sentence should be a capital one. Some 27 per cent of respondents felt that the jury alone should be society's surrogates and should determine whether capital punishment is imposed, while over 58 per cent felt the jury should express its opinion to the judge directly and that the judge should bear its views in mind before imposing the sentence.

It is quite clear that the public does not wish to delegate this authority to any one individual who may be a so-called "hanging judge" that automatically imposes the sentence or who may have, on the other hand, a philosophical opposition to imposing capital punishment. The public wants any decision to take a life to be based on an extremely wide forum—those jurors who have heard all the evidence.

I was very interested to learn that such a double jury vote system exists in other parts of the world and that in practice results very similar to those I intuitively felt should be obtained were obtained. Only rarely is capital punishment imposed in cases of murder involving close family members, the area with the greatest likelihood of rehabilitation. However, for serial killers, killers of hostages, and killers caught in the act of committing another crime such as rape or child molestation, the death penalty is frequently imposed.

Finally, I asked what method of execution should be selected. The restitution of the noose received only 9 per cent support. Overwhelmingly, by their votes and in their comments, people indicated that if they found the taking of a human life necessary, it should only be done in the most humane method possible.

Older people of both sexes, particularly those likely to have encountered serious operations, strongly supported lethal injection. They, as I, have experience with general anaesthesia and know that within 20 seconds a person can be rendered unconscious and that a lethal injection can then be administered.

Younger voters were more apt to favour allowing the condemned to have the choice. However, once again they clearly indicated that they desired the most humane method possible. Consistently, almost three-quarters of the respondents chose these two options for both sexes and at all ages. The public does not believe in an "eye for an eye" or in revenge, and neither do I. If the deed is to be done, we want it to be done using the most humane method possible.

Some people might believe that capital punishment is in some way playing God and no one has the right to decide when a life should be taken, that this is a decision that should be left to God. Certainly I respect this view, and the more consistently it is espoused, the more respect I have for it. The people who are most consistent in terms of this view are those who in wartime are conscientious objectors even when the fabric of society itself is threatened.

For example, even with Hitler threatening in the Second World War, these people were consistent and refused to accept that taking a life could be justified by bearing arms. I have the highest respect for those who hold this view. However, I do not share it. I believe society can justify taking a life when public safety is involved.

When society has identified individuals who pose such a threat to public safety, who have committed crimes such as serial killing or murders after torture or brutalization, society, in the form of the jury, has the right to judge that they represent a threat to society's safety and that society has the right to protect itself by taking a human life.

In my mind there is no consistent philosophical basis for accepting the right to take a life in defence of one's country because public safety is threatened or self-defence is threatened, and yet hold out the philosophical argument that taking a life can never be justified.

The vast majority of Canadians feel that when individual or public safety is threatened, killing of individuals in self-defence or through declaration of war is justified. It is my contention that the views of society in respect of capital punishment have exactly the same philosophical basis of the right to public safety, and it is for this reason that they and I support the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House of Commons to speak to my fellow Members of Parliament and to my constituents, many of whom have written to me here in Ottawa, have called me, have spoken with me on the streets in Vancouver—Kingsway, or have met me on the doorsteps of their houses.

I want to begin by saying that on this extremely complex moral issue I owe my constituents my own judgment. This is in accordance with a long parliamentary tradition going back to the British Member of Parliament, Edmund Burke, who, speaking to the electors of Bristol on November 13, 1774, said:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry alone, but his judgment, and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

While my own Party has a policy on capital punishment, I am here exercising my own judgment on this issue. That is not to say that I do not respect or consider the views of my constituents, or indeed the views of other Members like the one who has just spoken, who take a view different from the one I take. I have read their letters carefully and I have listened to their views carefully and sincerely, and I respect them all.

This debate is really a life and death debate. If we restore capital punishment, people will be executed by the state. It would be foolish to assume otherwise. That is why I take this debate very seriously.

I am concerned that many Canadians may think there is an easy way for the state to kill, in a sanitized way, if you like. The Hon. Member who just spoke talked about lethal injections. Maybe we will not have the noose, the electric chair or the kind of circus atmosphere that accompanies American state executions, but I remind Canadians and fellow Members that the state will be taking the life of a fellow human being whether it be in a sanitized way through the lethal injection or through a more public and circus like way of the noose or the electric chair.

Members of Parliament all have different ways of coming at this question. In the period before I entered the House of Commons, I practised criminal law. I think I have the unique situation among Members of this House that as a former Crown attorney and former defence counsel I prosecuted someone charged with murder and I defended someone charged with murder. I will never forget—it is one of these incidents that stands out in one's memory—the murder case that I handled in Prince Rupert when I was a young lawyer. It was my first murder case and I defended a young native woman who was charged with murdering her husband.

I practised law in a period in which the death penalty was abolished but I recall the older lawyers telling me how often juries would refuse to convict even in fairly strong cases because they could see the accused before them. They knew that they were personally sentencing a human being to death. In many cases they simply could not do this. Often people who normally would have been convicted were acquitted, and studies bear this out. To me, this is a more accurate reflection of the real views of the ordinary Canadian than the mere answering of a phone call from a polling organization.

During my practice as a criminal lawyer I came to have a deep respect for our criminal justice system. I think it is one of the best and the fairest in the world. I also saw first hand, because it is a system that functions through human beings, that mistakes can happen. When the state hangs an innocent person, and that has happened in the United States, in Britain and perhaps in Canada, there is no correcting that mistake. You cannot bring the person back. Indeed, along with other kinds of sentences, I feel the application of the death penalty will be, and has been, discriminatory and will fall on those least able to get a good lawyer, the poor, the under-educated, the inarticulate, the mentally retarded, the emotionally disturbed and minorities, and studies in the United States bear this out.

As a criminal lawyer, I also got the opportunity to see criminals as human beings, often pathetic, desperate, sometimes sick human beings, usually inadequate in some way, people who did not fit into society and people who belonged to a minority. More often than not they were poor. That is why I am not surprised to find that studies clearly show that capital punishment is no deterrent to murder.

Why then, I ask myself, this demand to restore capital punishment, given that there has been no real change in murder rates since we abolished the death penalty. Is it a religious demand? The Christian Bible says in the Old Testament, "Thou shalt not kill. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a hand for a hand, a foot for a foot". But Jesus of Nazareth in the Bible says:

> Ye have heard that it hath been said, 'An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth' but I say unto you, that ye resist no evil: But whoever shall smite thee on thy cheek, turn to him the other also.

Most churches have written to me against the death penalty. In 1983 the Pope himself spoke out against capital punishment. Therefore, I do not think the argument for the return of the death penalty is based on religious grounds.

I have a letter from a woman whose daughter was murdered. She tells us that capital punishment will not bring back her daughter; nor indeed, even if restored, will it deter murders of other daughters. Unfortunately, that will be a fact of life.

Why then the demand for restoration of capital punishment, Mr. Speaker? I think it is based on revenge, which is still a natural part of the human make-up, a part that we still have not yet conquered, together with the frustrations of modern life which come from the feeling that in the modern world we cannot control what goes on in our lives. The Hon. Member who spoke last spoke of terrorism. Capital punishment is still, and really is, state vengeance and I think it comes down to being part of our penal philosophy. To restore capital punishment abandons hope in our ability to cope with violence, whether it be criminal or otherwise, except with more violence.

John Donne, the great English poet, many years ago said:

> Any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind.

I conclude that to restore the death penalty no matter how it is done would be a step backward for Canada. It would place us among the more barbaric and violent states of the world. The death penalty is out of place in a modern, peaceful, humane society, which is my vision of Canada. Therefore, I will vote against the motion.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to speak, not only to those who, like myself, are against a return to capital punishment but especially to those who today still believe that reinstatement of this ultimate penalty is truly justified.

During the few minutes I am allowed, I would like to explain my reasons for opposing capital punishment today, as I did in 1976.

Before I go any further, I would like to express very briefly my profound dismay, which I am sure is shared by many of my colleagues, at the way the Government put this question before the House and the way it intends to conduct the debate.

During the last election campaign, the Prime Minister promised Canadians that once elected, his Government would hold a free vote on capital punishment. We thought this would involve a clear and straight forward process and that the House would decide the issue with all the moral and political consequences that would entail, both for the individual Member and for the Government.

Instead, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government have decided to play hide and seek. They have decided to hide their true colours behind a quite perilous procedure, considering the nature of the debate and what is at stake.

On tabling his motion in the House on February 13 this year, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) said the tabling of the motion did not mean the Government approved or disapproved of reinstating capital punishment.

However, the motion he tabled on behalf of the Government and on which we will be asked to vote is crystal-clear in this respect, and I quote:

> That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment—

And the Government would have us believe it is not taking sides!

This manoeuvre would let the Government take its distance from a debate that will not enhance any reputations or produce any winners.

I suggest we take a closer look at the content of the motion. Briefly, the motion tabled by the Deputy Prime Minister asks the House to support reinstatement of capital punishment and orders the appointment of a special committee consisting of 15 members, a committee that is to hold hearings for three months across the country and make recommendations, on the basis of the testimony received, regarding:

(1) the offences that should carry the death penalty;

(2) the methods by which the sentence should be carried out; and finally,

(3) the same committee will be responsible for preparing and bringing in a Bill.

We have here the three basic elements of what normally should have been the Government's responsibility: the crimes that should be punishable by capital punishment, the methods used and the requisite drafting of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, when the previous Liberal Government tabled Bill C-84 in 1976, it did so frankly and forthrightly. It did not seek every kind of excuse to shirk its reponsibilities. It fully recognized its responsibilities, and it did so after a free vote in which the Prime Minister at the time and his Cabinet voted in favour of Bill C-84, to adopt the motion taking capital punishment out of the Criminal Code.

This Government is trying to to eat its cake and have it too. Government Members are divided on the issue, that we know. The Cabinet seems to be as well. And so they do not want to have the responsibility for this motion. Once the debate is concluded, they want to be able to tell proponents of capital punishment that they kept their word. They want to be able to tell the others, the people who are against capital punishment: Well, what can we do? The decision was made by a committee of the House with Members from all three Parties.

The motion is a highly regrettable one. I am also concerned that some Members, instead of acting as responsible Members, prefer to bow to the majority views of some Canadians. Members who want to shirk their responsibilities tell us: in the final instance, it doesn't really matter whether I'm for or against capital punishment since the majority of my constituents are in favour, and that is why I intend to vote for the motion.

Personally, I think that in the final instance, a Member should be accountable for his actions to his constituents. I believe a Member must answer for his actions to the people who elected him, but this does not imply that he can shirk that same political responsibility by giving up his freedom to speak, and especially his freedom to think and his freedom to vote in this House. Were he to act this way, I do not think he would be doing a service to his constituents, nor would he be enhancing the quality of our system of Government, and indeed the quality of our democratic life.

This debate borders on the realm of unreality for those who, like myself, had the privilege of being here when Parliament voted to abolish capital punishment in 1976, convinced as we were at the time that, after a long and difficult debate, our country had finished a very significant and historic journey.

• (1200)

[English]

We thought at the time that as parliamentarians and, more fundamentally, as Canadians, we had turned a page of our collective history. We thought that we had clearly signified to the world our deep commitment to human values. We thought that we had signified our commitment to justice and to life in voting for the abolition of the death penalty. We thought that we had expressed in 1976, collectively and individually, our fundamental belief in the primacy of human life, and that in doing so we had joined the family of enlightened peoples.

So we are wondering today how we ever got to the point where again we would want to change everything and move backwards.

Admittedly our country has been witness to sordid crimes in recent years, often involving children. Our television screens at home have often shown scenes of horror and suffering.

The same television has enabled us to see—and feel, to a certain extent—the sufferings of parents who had just lost a child, or the sufferings of a wife who had just lost her policeman husband coldly shot dead while on duty. Undoubtedly such incidents have stirred emotions and raised fear and indignation among many Canadians.

[English]

But that same television has also magnified tenfold the tales of human suffering. It has magnified our horror and indignation by feeding us a steady diet of violent programming. Indeed, every night on prime time, we see murder, robbery, assault, rape and kidnapping. Unfortunately, very often these are American programs.

All of this makes us believe that somehow we have in the last 10 years changed fundamentally as a society and become more violent, more brutal than we were when we had the death penalty. I think this is not the real fact. Rather than numbing us to the real violence, it makes us feel weak and defenceless and leads us to believe that our penal system is faulty, that we need to protect ourselves because the state no longer can protect us from a violence which is nevertheless more often perceived than real. We began to advocate capital punishment, and as things went on some Conservative Members of Parliament decided to press on, and here now we have the Government presenting a motion to reinstate capital punishment. I think this is a very sad situation.

[Translation]

I am very sincere when I suggest that the quality of our judicial system will not be enhanced if we vote to restore capital punishment. Nor will it be an accomplishment for those who advocate the repeal of the existing statute in favour of the reinstatement of the death penalty. A man like Clifford Olson will be the real winner because he will thus bring us down to his own lowly common denominator. As I see it, such a move would make our society less humane from the outset, and we will certainly be less tolerant, less avid of freedom.

In conclusion, I should like to quote from a statement released by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops entitled "The Escalation of Violence", which I recommend to all my colleagues:

> A society which so respects the right to life that it cannot resort to capital punishment to protect itself creates an atmosphere which commands respect for other human rights. The death penalty is acceptable only in a society which is not well organized enough to find another way to defend itself against elements which would threaten the lifes of its citizens, and such is not the case in Canada. Violence begets violence, and capital punishment is a violent measure. Today still, ten years after capital punishment was abolished, we harbour the same conviction: a society which respects the sacred and intangible character of human life and which gives top priority to human rights definitely promotes its own social progress, even though this may seem to be a slow and not immediately apparent process, besides contributing to the development of mankind. This conviction, confirmed in the message of Jean-Paul II when he visited our country, is based on the evangelical project where guilty mankind is reconciled with God thanks to the pardon of Jesus. Innocent, but convicted and sentenced to death, Jesus himself advocates total forgiveness: "Forgive them, Father, for they do not know what they are doing."

I think we can admit that a society such as ours has the right to punish a criminal, the right to inflict a sanction which is proportional to the crime, but I maintain that killing a man to punish him is tantamount to vengeange, and nothing else.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote former Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau:

> As members of society, do we have so little respect for ourselves, so little hope of bettering human condition, are we so near social bankruptcy that we accept the principle of State vengeance as the cornerstone of our penal philosophy?

Finally, I would ask all Members in this House, whether you support or oppose reinstating capital punishment, to vote according to your conscience. Discuss this with your constituents, of course, discuss it also with your families, but by all means do not vote because a majority of voters in your constituency want capital punishment back, and want society to be brought back to a state of barbary. On the contrary, vote according to your conscience, and above all vote in a manner where liberty will prevail, rather than vengeance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I have two short observations to make and a question to ask of the Hon. Member.

He referred to the 1976 vote and how he thought that would resolve the issue for all time. I beg to differ. If that vote had reflected the wish of the majority of the Canadian people, I suggest it might have helped resolve the problem. However, we had a so-called free vote in 1976, and he knows as well as anyone in this country that there was a solid cabinet vote opposing the retention of capital punishment. Yet many of the cabinet Ministers in that Liberal Government spoke out in support of capital punishment prior to the vote.

We have today a parallel with 1976. According to a recent Maclean's magazine poll, 68 per cent of members of the PC Party support capital punishment in one form or other; in the Liberal Party it is 61 per cent, and in the NDP it is 55 per cent. If the Government and elected representatives in Parliament ignore the vast majority who support capital punishment, the same thing will happen as happened in 1976.

How does the Hon. Member propose to deal with this desire of the Canadian people; by ignoring them time after time after time? How does he expect the issue to ever go away if Parliament does not pay at least some attention to the majority?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I am pleased to respond to the Hon. Member by reminding him that capital punishment was abolished in Canada in 1976 by the Canadian Parliament, with the knowledge that such was basically the case in most western— industrialized nations— France, Belgium, Britain and so forth, and at the time Canadian parliamentarians wanted thereby to ensure that we express our deep respect for human rights, and what we did in fact was put an end to an experience that dated back to barbaric, archaic customs.

The fact was that both the then Liberal Government and the previous Conservative Government had refused to hang those who had been sentenced to death. It will be remembered that in a systematic way, both the Diefenbaker Government and the Pearson Government, as well as the Trudeau Government, when a death sentence was sent to Cabinet for commuting to life imprisonment, those successive Cabinets in a systematic way commuted all death sentences to life imprisonment.

The reality therefore in Canada was that already the Government, inspired by that modern spirit of treating prisoners, criminals in a modern rather than archaic way, had decided no longer to hang criminals.

The legislation passed by Parliament in 1976 was therefore confirming a tradition that had been well anchored into Canadian usage by various Cabinets, both Liberal and Conservative.

Capital punishment proved a punitive act rather than a reforming move. Clearly, those who claim that capital punishment will prevent a criminal from killing are mistaken. It never was and never will be a rehabilitating action, a sentence that will bring someone, with the thought that if he goes ahead and kills someone he will be hanged, along the road, to decide not to commit his crime, knowing he will be hanged. Reality is quite different.

Therefore, we are assuming it would be much more important to have a correctional and judicial system based on administrative reform and a more modern way of operating our judicial system, than going backwards with that punitive form that in my view should have no place in modern society.

[English]

Mr. Greenaway: Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to ask deals with this rubbish of a free vote the last time this measure came before the House. I say rubbish because it was not a free vote and everyone knows it. I was told by a Liberal Member of Parliament, one who still sits in this House today, that the Prime Minister of the day put pressure on his caucus to vote in favour of abolition. If they did not he would call an election and the Liberals were down about 20 per cent in the polls at that time. I would like the Hon. Member to please comment on that.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Hon. Member listened to my speech a while ago, but I clearly indicated that there is a fundamental difference in approach between the steps taken in 1976 and those of the current Government.

Walking both sides of the fence at once, this Conservative Government is trying to keep everybody happy. While some are for abolishing capital punishment, others insist on reinstating it. So, instead of moving a clear and definite motion, it uses this shaw of creating a parliamentary committee.

In 1976, with the support of his full Cabinet, the Prime Minister of the time had opted for abolishing capital punishment, and the motion moved by the Government of the time had made it possible for all Hon. Members from both sides of the House to vote freely on this issue.

But the Government, I mean the Prime Minister and his Ministers were all of the same view, namely, that the time had come to end this barbarous practice and abolish capital punishment. All back-benchers had an opportunity to vote according to their conscience.

I must say that some of my hon. colleagues did not try to justify their position with Gallup or other polls. They voted clearly for or against abolishing capital punishment. It was a free vote. Quite evidently, the Liberal Cabinet of the day was fully behind abolishing capital punishment and so was the Prime Minister. It is a clear situation which does not exist now, something I deplore enormously.

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a privilege for me to rise in this House on this most important debate, perhaps one of the most important, talked about, controversial, and possibly agonizing debates that we have had in this Parliament. This debate deserves the full attention of this House. No matter what side a Member may take on this issue, this is indeed an ultimate test for each Member in decision-making. We might even ask for the wisdom of Solomon to help us make a decision.

In making a decision none is 100 per cent right. We may be 80 per cent or 90 per cent right, and that is how decisions are made. We have to make our decisions reflecting generally the views of our constituents. We are talking about whether we oppose or support capital punishment.

The views of each Member will, of course, be at odds with those of some constituents, because in every constituency there will be a certain number of people in favour and a certain number against. How can a Member of Parliament reflect everyone's view? This is the decision that we as parliamentarians have to take in order to reflect what we, in our wisdom, after consultation not only with our constituents but with other Members of Parliament and groups of people, believe is in the best interests of the people of Canada.

This issue appeals to emotion as well as logic. Hopefully we will not rely on emotions only. We must use our hearts and our minds and they must always be open to the arguments, thoughts and beliefs of others. We must make our decision with care, thought and responsibility.

I will be voting in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment. I would like to explain to you why I believe that capital punishment should be reinstated in Canada. I believe that the state not only has the right but the responsibility to protect itself and its citizens from harm. We are waging a war of sorts against crime in its most barbarous form, that is, murder in first degree, the taking of innocent lives. We as a state must protect our citizens from those who would seek to destroy life within our country.

If a foreign country were to invade our borders we; individuals, soldiers, sailors, men and women, would not hesitate to fight back, to punish the invaders, especially those who may have killed our citizens in the process of the invasion. By fighting back we would most likely take the lives of the invaders. This is the role of the state to protect its inhabitants. It must provide a safe haven for its citizens. In a way, to kill the invaders is capital punishment and is part of the protection which the state must provide. It must punish the enemy for having taken a life within our country.

Within Canada the enemy is the individual who deliberately plans and kills innocent members of our society. The state must have the power to exercise its strength as protector and must have within its jurisdiction the power to choose the ultimate punishment for the ultimate crime, for example, that of murder in the first degree or high treason.

Canadian citizens are starting to live in fear in their own homes. Seniors are frightened to walk alone at night. Many people expect us to accept that as part of the changing times, part of the 80s and 90s—the reality of life. Well, this is not right and we must not stand for it. Canadians should feel safe, not only in their own homes but throughout the country. It is up to us as legislators to ensure that safety, with our police forces and other protectionist forces.

We must become more sensitive to the rights of victims. They did not choose to become victims but were chosen by the perpetrators of violent crimes. Many people have forfeited their lives in senseless, brutal murders. It is becoming obvious that the state is not responding to their basic need and want, that being to live a safe and secure life.

I share the same view as the majority of my constituents. Last year I conducted a survey of my constituents to learn their views on the issue of capital punishment. At that time 81 per cent supported the return of capital punishment for first degree murder and the murder of police and prison guards. The majority of comments which I read in the questionnaires expressed fear and outrage at the tragedy which befell the victims. They also expressed the perception that our judicial system was possibly somewhat impotent.

In my town hall meetings I have heard many views on the issue of capital punishment. I have never hesitated to ask those who have gathered for their thoughts. The general view that I hear again and again is that the judicial system is not working in favour of law-abiding citizens but rather against them and that we should have capital punishment. The ratio is usually three or four to one in favour of capital punishment.

I have had conversations with members of the clergy who have supported the reinstatement of the death penalty. When I visit community groups and schools and knock on the doors of my constituents I invariably ask them what they think of capital punishment. The views I hear reinforce my belief. Not everyone is in favour of capital punishment, but the vast majority is.

In one high school which I visited this spring we talked of many things including capital punishment. When I asked for a straw vote the result was two to one in favour of capital punishment, this from 16 and 17-year old students.

People do not want to live their lives in fear. It is not a prevailing fear but rather a sense of disquiet that all is not quite right. Part of this disquiet comes from the fact that men and women who have not been rehabilitated are roaming the streets. At a time when the quality of our lives should be at its highest it is actually at one of its lowest points. Some people are starting to develop a bunker mentality due to their weakened sense of security.

I spoke earlier of the sense of the general public that our judicial system is impotent. I highly respect lawyers, judges, and our judiciary. One of the main points that I hear again and again is that our laws and punishments for crimes are not only lax but seem, in the eyes of the public to be inconsistent. I am told that the parole system procedures need to be tightened. Prison sentences should be made longer and violent criminals should be kept off the streets. Yet rehabilitation is necessary. A life sentence should be just that, a life sentence. Currently within our parole system, a 10-year sentence could actually mean six years or seven years, and even less in certain extenuating circumstances.

Furthermore, the public is often threatened by criminals once they are sentenced. I have been in a court where the criminal who was convicted has pointed a finger at the victim saying, "I will get you when I get out". These families who have been threatened are quaking in their boots in a few years, keeping their doors locked and staying inside. Repeat offenders are often released earlier than their sentence required and go back on the street to commit crimes. This is entirely unacceptable.

Our criminal justice system is in serious need of reform. The average Canadian citizen is not provided with the necessary protection to live a safe and healthy life, while criminals and murderers are allowed to remain on the streets often after serving a minimal sentence. We are often told that they are rehabilitated, but one should ask the family of a murder victim or a victim who has been badly molested, raped or grievously harmed. There are hundreds of such victims.

We as citizens and legislators must reassess what is happening in society and become sensitive to the needs and wants of our citizens. For years, many Canadians have been asking for the reinstatement of the death penalty. Legislators have not always responded to those demands.

Let us examine why the public is expressing such strong views on capital punishment. Perhaps it is the exasperation they feel with the justice system. Maybe they believe that the state should do something to protect them and give them a sense of fairness and that they have a right to live in peace and quiet.

Many representations on all sides of the issue have been made to each Member. For example, I have an open letter from a father of a first degree murder victim. He is Mr. Donald Sullivan of Ajax, Ontario. He wrote concerning the brutal and senseless murder of his daughter Pamela on October 22, 1980.

Pam was sexually assaulted and murdered on her way home from work one evening, right in front of her family home. She was murdered by a complete stranger who had been released by the Collins Bay Penitentiary just a week earlier, on mandatory supervision release. The theory is correct; the practice is not. This man was found guilty of first degree murder in 1981 and sentenced to imprisonment in Kingston Penitentiary. It is ironic that he became a homicide victim himself when he was killed in prison in July, 1986. He was another murder victim, but this time within the walls of our prisons. We often hear other Members say that we may be executing an innocent person, but no one seems to pay attention to the fact that this woman was an innocent victim. She is a statistic, he had been made an anti-hero.

Mr. Sullivan writes:

> I am asking you to try and wade through the rhetoric, the confusing jumble of statistics, all the graphs, numbers and try to remember that each number, each statistic, represents one who was a loved family member, a son, daughter, a wife, a mom, a husband, a dad. Numbers do not bleed; rates per thousand do not die; justice centre statistics do not have to be buried.

Mr. Sullivan, and his family, is as much a victim as his murdered daughter, Pamela.

In Edmonton we have the organization "Victims of Violence" which was founded by Gary and Sharon Rosenfeldt. The Rosenfeldts became victims of violence when their son was one of the children brutally murdered by Clifford Olson. Mr. Rosenfeldt has been to my office several times in the last two years asking for help and for us to do something to prevent crimes like this, preventing the potential of someone like Mr. Olson being released again. There are many others like Clifford Olson.

The Rosenfeldts have been lobbying legislators to become more aware and more sensitive to the plight of victims of violence. I cannot help but feel that it is wrong for Canadians to believe they must lobby for the basic right to feel secure. I am not calling for revenge or retribution, but just the right to feel safe. We as legislators must keep this in mind at all times and work to ensure that the state has the strength and the power to protect its citizens. Otherwise, we as a nation fail in our duty to protect Canadians.

Capital punishment should be an option made available in the sentencing process. There is nothing wrong with it being an option. It is the ultimate and often times the greatest and only protection that potential victims may have.

It is believed that there is a deterrence factor in having the death penalty. We have heard debate about this issue, but the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment in Great Britain heard evidence concerning criminal cases which indicated in some instances that the threat of the death penalty had acted as a deterrent to murder. In 1976, the Supreme Court of the United States considered capital punishment a significant deterrent in a number of cases.

Law enforcement authorities have contended that abolition of the death penalty increases the risk for police and prison staff. It would be reasonable to assume that in seeking to avoid arrest, a criminal would be less likely to shoot a police officer if there were a death penalty.

Growing numbers of inmates serving life sentences for first degree murder seem to increase prison violence and murder. They have nothing to lose and perhaps something small to gain. Murder rates within the penitentiary population almost doubled between 1976 and 1981, with most occurrences taking place in maximum security institutions. That is a plain fact for all to see. In 1983, participation in major security incidents was higher among first degree murderers than among the rest of the penitentiary population. Again, it is because they have nothing to lose.

Who is in the greatest danger? First, it is prison inmates. I referred earlier to the inmate who was killed, as have many others. Prison guards and police officers are also in danger. First degree murderers have nothing to lose and can go on to participate again, raise a bit of hell to see what they can do. The logical conclusion is capital punishment.

Deterrence does not show up in statistics. By preventing a killing, the potential victim is alive and well. We never consider that this is a person who might have been killed under certain circumstances by a convicted murderer who was released. However, since we know nothing about it, it cannot be a statistic. That is something we should all consider.

• (1240)

Very few convicted killers will kill again after being allowed to go free. Most of them do not. Most of them are rehabilitated. But we must protect every citizen to the best of our ability. An innocent Canadian, neighbour, member of family, once killed is gone forever. It is very important that we as a country have the ability to protect our citizens.

More than 20 such innocent Canadian victims have lost their lives. I would like to read to the House a letter to the editor which appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. It is entitled "Vile Murder", and states:

> I believe in capital punishment. I always have and always will. Our Sheryl, age 20, was a successful fashion model in Toronto. She was violently murdered, her face destroyed by a hammer. Ralph Powers, a stranger to Sheryl, was on mandatory supervision, having served seven of 10 years of his sentence. Powers had stalked 15 beautiful young women before he saw Sheryl. He posed as a Bell Telephone repairman to gain entry to her apartment.
> Powers gave my daughter a life sentence with no chance of parole. Perhaps Powers will be released in 15 or 25 years. Is that really a life sentence for first-degree murder? I believe that Powers will kill again, as he confessed after his second attack (she escaped) that he had chosen his third and fourth victims in August 1981.
> I would not want another family to go through what our family has. The pain of the violent murder of my daughter will never leave me. It is a life sentence for me and for my family and friends—with no chance of parole.

It is signed "Sally Gardner, Ottawa".

The death penalty must be returned. I thank the House for the privilege of speaking on this most important debate and look forward to a favourable response to the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment in support of my colleague's position and his concern about the justice system as it pertains to persons in prison and on parole. I would like to read into the record the most recent information from StatsCan, the Solicitor General's office, and from the Correctional Institutional report.

Since the abolition of capital punishment in 1976, there has been a 400 per cent increase in murders within our prisons. Prior to 1976, on average, there were two victims of murder in our prisons per year, that is, from 1962 through until 1976. When we officially abolished capital punishment in 1976, the rate jumped to 28 murders in 1977, eight murders in 1978, 10 murders in 1979 and as high as 15 murders in 1984. When we average it out we find there were 100 persons murdered in our prison societies of less than 1000 in population, making an average of 11 murders per year.

That is not to mention the recent report in support of my colleague, dealing with persons on parole. The Solicitor General of the former Liberal Government has stated, "There have been a total of seven cases of repeat murderers committing the second offence while on parole".

If that is not bad enough, since that statement the Parole Board has advised me that since February of 1987, the cut-off date for the last report, there have been two more murders in Canada by murderers on parole. One of those murderers has been convicted very recently and the other has been charged with murder. His conviction is pending.

Therefore, I think not only has the parole system been an abysmal failure but it needs, as reiterated by the Chairman of our current Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, a pretty close look at. For that reason the committee initiated a study into the parole system for the need of change. While doing so, I suggest that the justice committee take a pretty good look at our plea bargaining system within the justice system.

A lot of these people who are charged with first degree murder, plead a lesser offence of second-degree murder, receive a quick conviction and are out in 10 years after serving two-thirds of their 15-year sentence rather than going the route on the first degree charge as laid by the authorities on the basis of their investigation.

I think this liberal attitude of the justice system, the plea bargaining system, the parole system and all of these various factors, need to be closely looked at. That is not to say that by addressing those systems only we will deal effectively with the psychopathic repeat murderer who shows no remorse or regret and would willingly do it again without hesitation.

What we are looking for is capital punishment, as is my colleague, for only certain acts, the most heinous acts of planned, deliberate, premeditated murder. That is what the Canadian people want. That is what this House of Commons must respond to.

As Members of Parliament, in the interests of the protection of society, we must listen to our constituents on what they consider to be a reasonable form of justice befitting the most heinous crimes. We are not looking to execute 400 or 500 persons a year, but only those who commit murders of the most heinous nature. Robert Shantz of Vancouver who defended Clifford Olson said, "There is only one answer for Clifford Olson and that is execution". That was said by the criminal lawyer who defended Clifford Olson.

A prematurely retired criminal lawyer in British Columbia by name of Les Bewley resigned because he said one of the most contributing factors to his displeasure with the judicial system today is the plea bargaining system between Crown prosecutors and defending lawyers. They gleefully sit behind closed doors and bargain down the most serious offences in order for a quick conviction and early release. Adjusting that system is long overdue. Mr. Les Bewley, a former criminal court judge, handed in his resignation to the Attorney General because, he said, "Plea bargaining is the venereal disease of our justice system here in Canada today".

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Hon. Member with whose position I also agree. I also want to share some information with him. The Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) was talking about our justice system. I would like to point out to the House that I had an opportunity, which perhaps other Members of the House have not, that is, the honour of serving on a jury in a trial on a murder case. There are always those people who will worry about convicting an innocent person. I would like to tell the Hon. Member that when one is serving on a jury in a trial for murder, one wants to be 150 per cent sure. If the Hon. Member sat on a jury in similar circumstances I think he would agree that if there was any doubt in his mind, he would find that person innocent. Many people will use as that reason for doubt that chance of convicting an innocent person. Having been on a jury, I can tell the House that it is the most excruciating experience one could possibly go through, and if there is any doubt in one's mind, the person certainly would not be convicted.

I am sure the Hon. Member's constituents will say to him that they are opposed to capital punishment in general, but in specific cases, yes, they would agree to capital punishment. How does the Hon. Member answer that? Can we have a partial bringing back of capital punishment only for those specific cases? How do we bring it back on the books so it would apply to those heinous crimes talked about by the Hon. Member himself and the Hon. Member for Peterborough? We are in a bit of a dilemma in that situation in which many people oppose the death penalty. However, there are those who are in favour, in particular cases. How would the Hon. Member answer constituents concerns in this particular area?

Mr. Lesick: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to respond to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Essex—Kent (Mr. Caldwell). This is indeed a dilemma. I appreciate that the Hon. Member has asked me about it. I appreciate the dilemma of our constituents, the people outside this House. Nothing is perfect. We cannot guarantee anything. For that matter, we might walk out of the House and be run over by a vehicle and become an accident victim. So life is gone.

However, my contention is, and I believe it is the contention of most citizens with whom I have spoken, that the state should have the prerogative, in the wisdom of the judge and jury, to mete out the ultimate penalty. If that terrible crime is committed then the state must have capital punishment on its books. The person will receive the death penalty and that will be the end of the case.

There is nothing wrong with the state having this prerogative, or to carry it out for the protection of its citizens. As my colleague from Peterborough has mentioned, there are many areas which we should consider, including the judiciary, the parole system, and capital punishment in the over-all context of what is the best and most fair for our citizens.

Of course, citizens will always ask, "What about this particular case", or "What about that particular case?" It is up to the judiciary in its wisdom, with or without a jury, to make a decision. A decision is made and we will have to live with it. We must be strong and firm. We must also be compassionate.

This is why I believe that the state has to have this prerogative, so that we can proceed with it rather than appear as impotent legislators, or impotent judges or impotent police. This is why the people are out there screaming, "Do something". This is one step, and it is a positive one. It is what I believe to be the right step.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) on debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Kaplan: Since it is already quite late and because this is a very important issue, I wonder if I could start my remarks following the Oral Question Period and call it one o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is a request from the Hon. Member for York Centre to call it one o'clock. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I certainly do not want to deprive the Hon. Member of having an opportunity to speak. However, there are seven minutes remaining until the luncheon adjournment. I know that there are many members on the government side who would like to express their opinions. I would ask that the hon. gentleman begin his speech and finish it after Question Period. I know it is not the best way to give a speech, but there is limited time in this debate and there are many Members who would like to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The other alternative the Hon. Member has would be for me to recognize the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Desjardins) and then the next speaker would be the Hon. Member for York Centre.

Mr. Kaplan: I would prefer that, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Debate. The Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Desjardins) has the floor.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I shall be able to continue my speech and use the rest of my 20 minutes after the Oral Question Period.

It is with a great deal of interest that I take part in the debate on capital punishment. I would like to touch on several points. First, I wish to speak about the reasons for which this Government decided to hold this debate. Second, if I may, I would like to review some of the speeches we have heard in this House on the death penalty, and finally, to express my own views on reinstatement of the death penalty.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that the Member for Témiscamingue is against the death penalty, and I know that most of my colleagues already know where I stand on this issue.

We have been strongly criticized by the opposition Parties for holding a debate on the death penalty during this Parliament. However, it should be pointed out that the Progressive Conservative Party had made a commitment to hold such a debate during the 1984 campaign. In passing, Mr. Speaker, while I am speaking about the commitments made by the Progressive Conservative Party during the 1984 election campaign, I would like to say that we have a quite enviable record as far as respecting those commitments is concerned. On which themes did the Progressive Conservative Party base its campaign during the summer of 1984? There were three major themes in our campaign. The first was national reconciliation, and with the constitutional agreement signed recently by the 11 first ministers of Canada, I believe that we can say that national reconciliation is now a fact. Another major theme of our campaign was reduction of our enormous national deficit, which severely restricts the freedom of movement of the federal Government. In this regard, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Government have done a remarkable job. A third major theme of our campaign was economic recovery, and I believe that, objectively, everyone will have to admit that our economy is now definitely in better shape, with nearly 800,000 jobs created, a very active economic sector and prosperous businesses. I have the feeling that, within a few months, we shall be able to say that one million jobs have been created.

What was said about the death penalty issue during the 1984 electoral campaign? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had promised that there would be a free debate in the House during our mandate. Saying that such a debate was unwarranted would be completely inaccurate since the death penalty issue has aroused the interest of Canadians for decades and has already been discussed in this House. Parliament has had to examine the death penalty issue on many occasions, as have many other Parliaments, for instance in Great Britain, where this issue has also been discussed many times, including few months ago when Parliament voted against reinstatement of the death penalty in Great Britain.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Government was justified in reopening this debate as many Canadians wanted to discuss the issue of the death penalty and as such a debate can bring new light on this issue. Whatever the solution chosen by this Government, it will have been worthwhile having an open and enlightened debate in this House. Naturally, I must say that I sincerely hope that this Government and this Parliament will vote against reinstatement of the death penalty in Canada. If they do, Mr. Speaker, the debate will still have been useful as it will have been carried out in an enlightened manner and the Canadian public will perhaps be better informed about the issues involved.

In my opinion, it is extremely important in such a debate to respect the opinion of others. The debate should remain objective, and it is essential to respect the views of others even though they might not be our own. Mr. Speaker, how is Canadian public opinion represented in the House in the debate on the death penalty?

From the views I have heard expressed in this House, I believe that the Progressive Conservative Party is truly representative of public opinion on the death penalty. You would have to be blind to say that public opinion is not very divided on whether to reinstate the death penalty or not, and it is our own party which best represents this plurality of opinions.

As you are about to interrupt me, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I shall perhaps be back after the Oral Question Period to conclude my speech and explain to the House the basic reasons why I am personally vigourously opposed to reinstatement of the death penalty.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 1 p.m., I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m. this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 21

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—CONTRA ATTACK ON CANADIAN-AID PROJECT

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I have previously asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to condemn the American-backed Contras as terrorists. Their destruction of a Canadian-aid project in the small village of Macotol, Nicaragua, was a crime ending in the slaughter of innocent men, women and children. The Secretary of State for External Affairs assured me that he would raise the matter with U.S. Secretary of State

George Shultz when he met with him, in either Venice or Reykajavik.

The Minister's response is of great concern to Canadian non-governmental organizations in light of the fact that the U.S.-backed rebels, on June 19, attacked a state supervised farming community in Los Millones, Nicaragua, killing eight and robbing the community of food and medical supplies.

Indeed, this was not a Canadian-aid project but the Contras' track record of attacking innocent villagers is bound to happen again and again.

Canadians are aware that they are working in a hostile environment in Nicaragua, but they do not need the extra burden that comes with our American neighbours backing rebels to attack, kill and destroy the lives and property of non-combatant people who already face a daily struggle to survive.

I am calling upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to inform the House publicly and the Canadian people of his meeting with Secretary of State George Shultz regarding the action, if any, the U.S. proposes to undertake to prevent this slaughter of innocent peasants.

Also, will the Minister tell the House whether he informed the Reagan administration that Canada will pursue its own course of action through the United Nations if the U.S. does not improve the situation?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—COMMITTEE MEMBERS' VISIT TO UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the Special Committee on Acid Rain returned home from Washington last night after discussions with members of the U.S. Congress and environmental officials.

Time and again committee members were assured that Canada's persistence toward achieving acid rain controls is playing a crucial role in the United States.

Senator George Mitchell of Maine, who has an acid rain control Bill before Congress, said that our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is directly responsible for changing President Reagan's attitude on this important issue.

The Senator pointed out, as did other Congressmen, that the only times the President has spoken in favour of acid rain abatement were in the presence of the Prime Minister.

For this reason, acid rain control proponents in the U.S. are urging Canada to keep the pressure on.

Our fears were confirmed in meetings with the State Department, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the National Coal Association, whose representatives are less than enthusiastic about controls.

On the other hand, Canadians can rest assured that the efforts put forth by the Prime Minister are echoing through the halls of Capitol Hill.

The appearance of the special committee, showing political solidarity among all federal Parties, is yet another indication that Canada expects real action in the form of U.S. acid rain controls.

EMPLOYMENT PLANNING

REQUEST GOVERNMENT PROVIDE FUNDS TO SATISFY ORGANIZATIONS' REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Gilles Grondin (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I rise concerning job planning projects for seriously underprivileged people in respect to employment.

Many agencies are rightly wondering why the Department of Employment and Immigration continues publicizing such a program when in fact, as confirmed by the Minister's office, no monies are now available to support new initiatives for job integration of seriously underprivileged persons.

What right has the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) to so mislead the people and agencies involved by making available to them literature pubicizing on programs they will never be able to access because the funds needed are not there, unless an already committed agency withdraws?

We are faced with an unacceptable situation, Mr. Speaker, and I am asking the Minister to correct that gap as soon as possible and inject extra money to meet the needs of agencies that had applications turned down for that reason, after having their appetite whetted by enticing literature.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OPPOSITION TO EMPLOYEE REDUCTIONS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago I made a statement in the House regarding the reduction of 102 employee positions in Saskatoon and Melville by the Canadian National Railways.

In response to my statement a meeting was held last week, in Saskatoon, with a Vice-President of CN. However, we unfortunately could not reach a decision that satisfied all parties involved in the discussions.

I clearly understand CN's need to down-size its operations and encourage early retirement to make its rail service more cost efficient, but I must let the facts speak for themselves. Over 14 per cent of CN's revenues come from Saskatchewan. That contribution is more than the combined revenues of all of the maritime provinces, the Northwest Territories, and the Province of Manitoba.

Wheat will continue to be a major export out of the province, and an increase in the production of potash and coal, as shown in economic forecasts, promises a wider use of CN facilities in the future.

It may carry out the down-sizing of its labour force. However, I insist that CN not transfer those employees to Winnipeg and close up repair shops that will be increasingly important to CN and Saskatchewan's future.

FISHERIES

ALCAN CORPORATION—REDUCTION OF WATER FLOW INTO SALMON-RICH B.C. RIVERS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in 1980 residents in northwest British Columbia were shocked to hear that Alcan allowed little more than a trickle of water to be released over its Skins Lake Spillway into the salmon-rich Nechako and Fraser rivers.

Under public pressure from farmers, communities, recreationalists, Indian bands, and commercial and sports fishermen, a Supreme Court injunction forced Alcan to provide minimal water flows.

The injunction was renewed annually until 1985, when Alcan sought exclusive jurisdiction over a publicly-owned river. With private profits to be made from the export of raw power, Alcan wants to hoard the water for its own hidden agenda.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) has now sold out to Alcan with a private deal on water flows at only one-half of what his own scientists filed in court as the minimum required.

• (1405)

One cannot adequately convey the level of betrayal ordinary British Columbians feel upon hearing that the Minister of Fisheries has sold out the public trust.

The salmon industry is worth over $500 million a year. The Minister has failed to exercise the responsibility granted to him under Section 29(10) of the Fisheries Act and to ensure that proper water flows are maintained. The Minister must immediately hold public hearings into the required flow regime and ensure that no green light be given to Kemano 2 without a public approval process.

No such initiative has been forthcoming from the Minister who must now resign. He is allowing our salmon resource to be ruined.

It is totally unacceptable and irresponsible for the Minister to stand in the House under the charade of representing the fisheries ministry while he ignores his legal mandate, neglects his responsibilities to the fisheries resource, and guts the Canadian public trust.

RAILWAYS

IMPORTANCE OF RAILWAY NETWORK IN ABITIBI

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, after considering the CN's application to abandon the line in the Chapais-Franquet subdivision in Abitibi, the CTC's Committee, further to a decision dated January 22, 1979, concluded:

"Railways may file grant applications in respect of branch lines, provided that a line not covered by an application would not in effect be isolated from the remaining system, were the line covered by the application to be abandoned".

That Chapais subdivision would be rerouted to a longer haul through via the CN's Cran subdivision in Lac Saint-Jean. It appears this would be a case of unacceptable line division as specified by the CTC. The CN was to file with the CTC on June 22, 1987, further argument concerning their application.

The long distances between Canadian regions are for us Abitibians an enormous challenge to knowing and understanding one another, and we cannot legislate geography. The railway system has helped Abitibi overcome that difficulty.

Mr. Speaker, this is a first victory for the CN's workers, people in Senneterre, all economic partners in the Abitibi—Témiscamingue economy and for myself. We are proud to be Abitibians.

DAY TRIPPERS' PURCHASES OF MILK FROM UNITED STATES—EFFECT ON DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, "Welcome to the Land of Milk and Honey and Cheap Gas", that is the 20-foot billboard which greets British Columbians as they near the Douglas border crossing into the United States.

The price of American milk is attractive to budget-minded shoppers, but B.C. dairymen cannot compete with the current heavy subsidies within the U.S. industry. Canadians pay 90 per cent of the true cost of milk at the dairy case, while American shoppers only contribute two-thirds.

Using the Customs count of 12,000 border crossings every day, the B.C. dairy industry estimates that it loses about $70 million every year in lost sales. The New Brunswick dairy industry has similar problems because of its geography.

Dairy producers in British Columbia and New Brunswick want Customs and Excise to enforce the 17.5 per cent duty on goods purchased in the United States when travellers have been out of the country for less than 24 hours, in order to keep our farm producers on an equal footing with American dairy farmers.

SPACE DEVELOPMENT

CANADIAN RADARSAT SUPPORT PROGRAM

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, Canada's lead in space will be maintained. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Oberle) is in Toronto today announcing a 10-year support program for the Canadian Radarsat.

Based on the immense and diverse geography in Canada, our scientists have continuously developed remote sensing technologies to the point where Radarsat is recognized as the leading edge in this field for the monitoring of ice floes, the assessment of environmental developments, the forecasting of our weather, and the evaluation of our natural resources.

This is a collective and collaborative achievement on the part of many federal government Departments, the provinces, the United Kingdom, and the United States.

Let us salute the Minister and the Government as Canada continues its lead in space with Radarsat.

FRANCO-ONTARIANS

REGULATION 17—HISTORIC CONSEQUENCES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, today, as the House of Commons is making itself acquainted with a new legislation on official languages, it is important to remember that June 25, 1987 marks another important anniversary in the history of Franco-Ontarians.

Regulation 17, announced to the Ontario legislature on April 13, 1912, we implemented on June 25 of that same year. Unfortunately, that regulation prohibited for all practical purposes French education in Ontario.

Many Franco-Ontarians no doubt remember the period that followed the implementation of that legislation. Indeed, more than 200,000 French-speaking citizens of Ontario were deprived during almost 15 years of French instruction.

I am sure that all Members of this House will want to join me in paying tribute to all those who fought against the implementation of that rule and especially one of my predecessors, the late Aurélien Bélanger, provincial Member for the riding of Prescott.

I would like to mention the historian, Mr. Paul-François Sylvestre who underlined recently the 75th anniversary of that infamous regulation 17.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

DISCIPLINARY STANDARDS

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Almost three weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bob White, a Vice-President of the Socialist Party, had accepted to appear on The Journal to speak out against the Meech Lake Accord. He was summoned by his Leader and ordered immediately to keep his mouth shut. This means that the Leader of the Socialist Party has two standards of discipline, one for English Canada, and the other for French Canada. Otherwise, he would have also muzzled the Vice-President of the Socialist Party in Quebec, Mr. Jean-Paul Harney. His attitude is all the more curious, since the Socialist Leader is gagging his own source of funds and unaccounted free service, while failing to impose his discipline on the Socialist Vice-President in Quebec who, for his part, brings in a lot less money to the Socialist Party of Canada. Against the Meech Lake Accord in Quebec and for the Meech Lake Accord in Ottawa. For Socialists, political expediency ranks above clearness and frankness.

REQUEST THAT MEDIATOR BE APPOINTED

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Since the letter carriers' strike began two weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, the general public has been able to watch on television and read in the papers about the great many acts of provocation, confrontation and violence.

Last week, Mr. Speaker, the Canada Post Corporation asked the Government to help end the conflict by appointing a mediator who would be mandated to try to bring the parties back to the negotiating table and end this violence.

Unfortunately, because of a stupid and irresponsible decision of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the postal conflict continues and violence will continue to exist on the picket lines.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I urge all Hon. Members to ask the Prime Minister to review the Minister of Labour's decision and to appoint a mediator to end this conflict.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): As Member for Beauce, Mr. Speaker, I am proud today to see that my Government has delivered the goods to the Canadian people concerning the Bill on the official languages. Here are some of the highlights:

—measures to ensure better access to justice in the two official languages;

—ready availability and visibility of bilingual federal services and communications;

—recognition of the right of Canadians to work in their own official language in federal institutions, in accordance with the linguistic responsibilities of those institutions;

—recognition of the principle of full participation of English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians in federal institutions;

—a commitment to enhance the vitality of official language minority communities and to promote the official languages in Canadian society; also

—federal cooperation with the provinces, and the private and voluntary sectors, to provide and extend bilingual services;

—a legislative framework setting out the powers and co-ordinating role of the Secretary of State in promoting official languages and providing support to official language minority communities; and also —enhancement of the role of the Commissioner of Official Languages;

Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of legislation Canadians could expect from a responsible Mulroney Government.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

TREATY MONEYS RETURNED TO GOVERNMENT

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, on May 15, 1985, the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development signed an order finally recognizing as Indian bands six communities of the Nisnawbe-Aski nation; namely, Aroland, Kee-Way-Win, Wawakapewin, New Slate Falls, McDowell Lake and Saugeen.

Today the chiefs of these bands have come to Ottawa to demonstrate publicly their extreme disappointment at the recent cabinet committee decision to deny their communities lands for reserves and to reject their funding requests. To symbolize their total rejection of the Government's breach of Treaties 9 and 5, the chiefs have asked me to return their annual treaty monies to the Government, together with a statement of their deep grievance and hurt.

In fulfilment of and support of that gesture, and with a deep sadness that it is necessary, I will now duly return these treaty monies.

ACID RAIN—BENEFICIAL EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD'S RULING ON ELECTRICITY EXPORTS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the decision of the National Energy Board to reject Hydro Quebec's application to sell electricity was well timed for the acid rain committee's visit to Washington, D.C. this week. Some American legislators have charged in the past that Canada wants tough acid rain controls in the United States to shut down U.S. dirty coal plants and open up a larger market for Canadian electricity exports. The ruling of the National Energy Board has helped to put that ludicrous conspiracy theory to rest.

• (1415)

The NEB ruling has implications in Canada too. Increased sales of Hydro Quebec power to Canadian provinces would reduce reliance on coal-fired power plants in Ontario and in the Maritimes thus helping to reduce acid rain pollution. Larger sales of hydro electricity in Canada would reduce pressure for more nuclear power plants now being considered in New Brunswick and Ontario.

Quebec's Energy Minister is to be congratulated for announcing that Quebec hydro-power will be offered to Canadian provinces first. He would best protect the environment and the national interest if Quebec Hydro offers electricity to the provinces at the same price as it offers it to American clients.

ACID RAIN

OPPORTUNITY TO INVITE AMERICANS TO PRESSURE THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Special Committee on Acid Rain has just returned from Washington, where, during two days of intensive sessions, the Committee met with major U.S., environmental groups and with senators and members of the House of Representatives who are involved in the fight against acid rain.

The message brought by our delegation was very clear: Stop polluting us, act on your promises and reduce pollution-causing emissions.

Mr. Speaker, everyone the Committee met insisted that the pressure put by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) on the President of the United States was to have encouraging results. In fact, a number of Bills are now on the table, and if any of these were to be passed, it would be a great victory for Canada.

However, much remains to be done, and the Americans gave us a very clear message that our Government and Canadians should continue to put strong pressure on the U.S. Administration.

Mr. Speaker, why do we not take advantage of the summer holidays to urge all the Americans we meet to put pressure on their elected representatives? That is the only way we are going to win.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—CRITICS OF CLEAN COAL TECHNOLOGY AGREEMENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that the Special Committee on Acid Rain learned while in Washington was that those who were least in favour of the Canadian view that acid rain control legislation should be put in place by the United States Congress are the ones who are most in favour of the agreement signed between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and President Reagan with respect to the funding of clean coal technologies. I think this irony should be pointed out to the House and particularly to the Prime Minister.

It is the enemies of acid rain control legislation who are the greatest fans of what the Prime Minister and the President agreed to in April. It is those who are in favour of acid rain control legislation in the United States Congress who are the greatest critics of the clean coal technology program and that which the Prime Minister and the Government are in the habit of lauding.

I would ask the Prime Minister and Members on the government side to rethink the enthusiasm with which they often portray what has been achieved between the Prime Minister and the President and to be willing to go beyond that and be critical of their own agreement so that they can be the real allies of our real allies in the Congress.

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—REQUEST THAT MEDIATOR BE APPOINTED

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Canadians want their mail delivered. Instead, the Prime Minister has provoked a strike of the letter carriers and has done nothing to resolve it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Hon. Members might not like the truth, but by limiting the manoeuvrability of Canada Post to negotiate in terms of what it can settle for, he has provoked this strike.

Since the two sides are now talking and since both sides have called for a mediator, will the Prime Minister reverse the decision of the Minister of Labour and appoint a mediator immediately before the crisis and the violence get out of hand?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out last Tuesday, it was decided not to appoint a mediator because the parties had not shown enough flexibility at that time. I am delighted to see that, today, the parties are back to the negotiating table, and I strongly urge them to reach a settlement.

[English]

HIRING OF UNEMPLOYED AS STRIKE-BREAKERS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): That is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker. I would say to the Prime Minister once again that he is playing politics with the Post Office.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I warn him he is playing with fire because the Post Office is using the unemployed in an attempt to break the strike. If this matter worsens the Prime Minister will be responsible for what happens.

• (1420)

Will the Government stop taking advantage of and manipulating unemployed workers by using them as strike-breakers, thereby fueling confrontation and the possibility of violence?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the process which has been unfolding over the last 10 days in these labour negotiations is perfectly normal. It is foreseen in the structure. As the conciliation commissioner pointed out in his report, which I commend to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, the Post Office has no alternative but to try to fulfil its social responsibility for delivering the mail. I have asked the Post Office and it has indicated it is trying to avoid situations which lead to violence. It is supervisors and managers who in fact are driving vehicles across picket lines.

I ask the Hon. Member to use the moral suasion he has with other parties to encourage everyone to avoid violence because it serves no one's purpose.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, by limiting the mandate of the Post Office the Minister has provoked the strike. By using, manoeuvring and manipulating the unemployed to act as strike-breakers he is increasing the possibility of violence, and it is happening today right in the national capital.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER INTERVENE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are blaming the Prime Minister for this crisis. His Government provoked the crisis. His Government watched it get worse. Could the Minister use his talents as a negotiator so as to guarantee Canadians a summer without violence, without confrontation, without conflict and without interruption of their postal service?

[English]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the best thing we can do right now, particularly in this House, is to let the parties negotiate at the table because they are the ones who know exactly what is good for them.

HIRING OF STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Voices from ministerial benches may well try to blame violence on the people who are doing the fighting in the streets but they will not fool Canadians who know who is causing the strike-breakers to be hired. Everyone knows that is at the root of the problem.

I am going to try to smoke out the Prime Minister. Maybe he will stand up and answer what I consider basic policy questions. Is it the official policy of his Government to hire strike-breakers to break a legal strike? Is that now the policy in this country?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talks about a legal strike and it is a legal strike. It is also legal for the Post Office to try to deliver the mail with replacement workers. Both sides have the responsibility to act legally. If the Hon. Member has any evidence that the Post Office is acting illegally, please bring it to my attention and appropriate action will be taken.

In the meantime I remind him, as I reminded his Leader, that the Post Office is fulfilling its social responsibility of trying to deliver the mail. The conciliation commissioner pointed out it has no alternative.

EMPLOYMENT OF STRIKE-BREAKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians want the mail to be delivered, but at what price? Are we, as a society, prepared to watch the violence that is taking place and to accept that violence? That is the question Canadians are asking today.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, who refuses to rise, I want to ask him again to do so. After all, there is such a thing as tacit agreement! I want to ask him whether it is his Government's official policy to hire strike-breakers to break a strike that is perfectly legal. Is that this Government's policy?

• (1425)

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the Post Office is acting legally and in accordance with the mandate given it by this House and is fulfilling its responsibility.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): So it's the policy.

Mr. Andre: If it is the position of the Liberal Party that the Post Office should cease operations and not try to deliver the mail, let it take that position publicly and defend it.

STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The letter carriers want a mediator. Management wants a mediator. The Canadian public wants service. Why can the Government and the Prime Minister not appoint a mediator right away, to smooth the way towards a settlement?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how often I will have to repeat this answer. The parties are sitting around the table today and they are negotiating. Let them negotiate.

Oral Questions

[English]

PICKET LINE VIOLENCE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister spoke on this yesterday outside the House. I wish he would show his concern for the issue by answering questions in the House today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Everyone knows that we have violence on the line because those who are on strike are, understandably, deeply concerned about the potential loss of their jobs to strike-breakers. Since the Post Office has made it clear that it will stop hiring strike-breakers as soon as a mediator is appointed, why does the Prime Minister not get on the phone, appoint a mediator, and end the violence now?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I have also indicated before, violence is not part of the collective bargaining process. No party should resort to violence. The parties are at the table right now. Let them negotiate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, while the parties are negotiating violence continues and the Government of Canada does nothing. The people of Canada will notice that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the question to the Prime Minister. The Post Office has said that it will stop hiring strike-breakers as soon as a mediator is appointed. Since the postal workers want a mediator and the public wants service, why is the Government not acting to give us a mediator to get the two sides together?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the two sides are together. They are at the table negotiating now.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ORDER CORPORATION NOT TO EMPLOY STRIKE-BREAKERS DURING NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Post Corporation is a Crown corporation. If today, the Government and the Prime Minister refuse to answer a question about hiring strike-breakers, it is a signal to Canada Post that from now on, strike-breakers may be hired in a labour dispute.

Is that the Government's policy? The union and the Canada Post Corporation have been meeting since this morning. They have started talking to each other. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to order Canada Post not to hire strike-breakers while discussions are taking place?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question with regard to the Post Office acting legally. I repeat that I think all Members in the House should fulfil their responsibilities and ask all parties to act legally in this circumstance. The union is putting considerable pressure on Canada Post by these rotating strikes. Management is trying to fulfil its social mandate by delivering the mail. It is an escalation of the economic warfare that is part of the collective bargaining.

• (1430)

In the meantime they are at the table trying to negotiate a settlement. It does no good for the Member to stand up in the House and make wild accusations when he knows everyone on the Post Office side is acting legally.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Minister responsible for the Post Office said that he was in favour of having a mediator. Why does he not take his responsibility as Minister, if he is in favour of appointing a mediator, and convince his colleagues, the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister, who said yesterday that a mediator is not needed, to appoint a mediator and maybe avoid some deaths on the picket line?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for appointing or not appointing a mediator is mine. I made my decision last week. I am following the events right now and I am pleased to see the parties at the table, assuming their responsibilities and negotiating. They do not need any disruption from that side of the House right now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT MINISTER APPOINT MEDIATOR

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. He just said that the parties do not need disruption from this side of the House.

Some Hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. Keeper: Will he acknowledge that the Post Office said it would find a mediator helpful? Why does he choose to substitute his own judgment for those who are at the table? Both the union and the Post Office are saying that a mediator would be helpful. Why substitute your own judgment? Appoint a mediator.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Because it is my responsibility, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT APPOINT MEDIATOR

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): My supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. That is the whole point. The Government is a responsible party in these negotiations.

An Hon. Member: Right on.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: Will the Government respond responsibly in this situation and appoint a mediator as was called for by both parties? Will it improve the climate for negotiations and appoint a mediator? What possible reason can there be in the present situation for not appointing a mediator?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Government, through this Minister, has already acted responsibly because we appointed a conciliator and we have appointed a commissioner. I have taken the decision not to appoint a mediator and the parties are back at the table negotiating.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY WHETHER PROGRAM TO REDEVELOP LAND AT MIRABEL WILL BE CONFIRMED

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works or, in his absence, the Parliamentary Secretary.

Pursuant to the draft agreement pertaining to the resale of expropriated land at Mirabel, the federal Government was going to spend $5 million to redevelop this land, and a reassessment of eligibility criteria was to take place one year after the beginning of this program.

I would remind the Parliamentary Secretary that agricultural producers and farmers do not redevelop their land during winter.

Can the Parliamentary Secretary tell us the exact date of the land redevelopment program at Mirabel, Phase III will be confirmed? When?

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, city dweller at heart though I may be, I do suspect that now is a better time than winter to prepare for cultivation.

However, Mr. Speaker, a technical problem did crop up, but we can tell the House now that this measure will be adopted at the earliest opportunity. In other words, given the dispatch with which the business of the House of Commons is proceeding now, one might say it will take place in the next few days.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—INVESTMENT ISSUE—NEGOTIATOR'S MANDATE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. I must say that I am first tempted to ask him, in light of the way in which Winnipegers are being good sports in replacing the football team from his home town, whether it means we will get the CF-18 contract back in return.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: You are an easterner now.

Mr. Axworthy: We have to go through these identity crises sometimes.

I will go on to another topic with which I think the Government is badly fumbling at the best of times. It was only the end of May when Ambassador Reisman indicated that in his negotiations with the United States he lacked a mandate to deal with the broad area of investment and therefore could not proceed to negotiate in that area.

Yesterday Mr. Reisman was reported as saying that he is now totally comfortable with his mandate and feels that he is in a position to proceed with those negotiations. Is it the case that the Government has given Ambassador Reisman a broader mandate for negotiating the issue of investment? Does it go beyond the very narrow question of trade related investment to include a much broader range of the kinds of investment priorities we have in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend mentions problems with football in my home town. I want him to know that Baie Comeau is still very much a member of the CFL. We will see you in the Grey Cup.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: The mandate given to Ambassador Reisman in this and all other areas is appropriate. I think he exercises it prudently and effectively, with a reporting mechanism to the Minister and Cabinet Committee. We monitor it carefully. Matters progress as I know my hon. friend would want them to do.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, does that mean that Baie Comeau will get a football team in addition to the prison and everything else the Government has to give away?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: When is enough, enough, Mr. Prime Minister? When does the stadium come?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

SCOPE OF MANDATE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): The Prime Minister said that Ambassador Reisman has the appropriate mandate. Will he be a little more forthcoming and indicate if that mandate goes beyond what the Minister for International Trade defined as narrowly circumscribed to only trade related investment?

Does Ambassador Reisman now have the right to negotiate investment matters relating to the monitoring function of Investment Canada, investment practices in culture and the financial securities industries? Does Ambassador Reisman now have the right to negotiate what the Americans want him to negotiate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was asking about the possibility of a stadium for Baie Comeau. I am going down there next week. I would be happy to say something on behalf of my hon. friend.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: With respect to Ambassador Reisman's mandate, the negotiations are progressing. As my hon. friend who has some experience in negotiation realizes, matters of this complexity require appropriate mandates. These are given to Ambassador Reisman, having been fully considered and refined by the Cabinet, so that he can give appropriate responses. That is what is taking place.

My hon. friend would not want me to go beyond that in these circumstances, except to give him the assurance that the Canadian national interest is being fully maintained and defended by Ambassador Reisman's mandate having been given to him by Cabinet.

INQUIRY CONCERNING POSSIBLE CHANGE IN MANDATE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, when this question last came before the House, the Minister for International Trade said that no change in mandate had taken place. Since the Prime Minister has not provided an answer to this question, will he say whether there has, in fact, been a change in the mandate with respect to investment, which Mr. Reisman is carrying into these free trade negotiations?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Prime Minister has answered that question. The Hon. Member would know that a negotiation, and the authority a negotiator receives, are fluid things. The negotiator has, as he has had for some time, the authority to receive recommendations or proposals the Americans might make respecting investment at the table, but any decision as to the response to those proposals the Americans might make rests at this time with the Cabinet.

Mr. Langdon: It may be a question of fluidity. It may be a question of stupidity as well.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I want to put to the Minister that there is a pointed and important question here which he should answer. I ask him to give us a clear straight forward answer to the question. Is there a change, which, for instance, would permit a company like Gulf and Western to have a different relationship in terms of takeover than has been the case in the past? Is there a change in the mandate? Answer the question, please, yes or no?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade answered that question. As to the preamble of the Hon. Member, I will speak for fluidity, he can speak for stupidity.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN'S STATEMENTS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns his decision, as reported by the press today, to discipline his colleague, the chairman of the finance committee of this House, who has severely criticized the Government's tax reform package as being "unfair and inequitable" by saying, for example, and I quote the Hon. Member for Mississauga South: "It just seems to me you're really socking it to the middle class". Why should the Minister "shoot the messenger" for telling the truth, rather than making major changes which will bring more fairness to tax reform for the middle class?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do know whether the chairman of the finance committee looks disciplined. He looks like he has a big smile on his face down there. I think he and I have always been on very good terms and I hope we will always continue to be on very good terms because I admire very much the fine work which is done by the Hon. Member and his committee.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: It is not reciprocated.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): To get to the point the Hon. Member raises, I have made it very clear that those people who are earning between $30,000 and $50,000 will receive an income tax reduction as a result of tax reform of anywhere between $400, $500 or $600. I think that is a good reduction in tax for these people.

In the second stage of tax reform, when we bring in the federal sales tax, I have indicated there will be further reductions in the income taxes for middle-income people.

EQUITY—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, the Minister suggests that his tax reform is fair to the middle classes. In saying so, he is contradicting his colleague from Mississauga South. If, as he suggests, his tax reform is fair to the middle classes, how can he explain that, according to the figures of his own department, in the case of someone over 65 whose entire income is made up of dividends from Canadian companies, such a person will pay $1,000 more in taxes if his income amounts to $40,000, while his taxes will be $40,874 less if he has an income of $1 million? Is it fair for middle-income Canadians that someone with an income of $40,000 in dividends from Canadian companies will pay $1,000 more in taxes while he would be paying $40,000 less if he had an income of $1 million? Where is the equity in this?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member can play around with figures all he wants—

Mr. Garneau: Look at the figures.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —but the facts of the matter are that eight out of 10 Canadians are going to be better off after tax reform. They will be paying less income tax. Nine out of 10 senior citizens will be paying less income tax after tax reform. After tax reform 850,000 Canadians will not be paying any tax whereas they are now.

These are the fundamental differences that we have proposed in tax reform that deal with many of the problems that are there in the tax system. Corporations will be paying $5 billion more income tax after tax reform. The people in upper-income brackets, corporations which have been taking full advantage of tax preferences, will pay more.

SALES TAX PROPOSALS—QUERY CONCERNING APPLICATION TO FOOD

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. On May 28 my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre, asked the Government a very simple question. He asked if the Finance Minister intended to impose a national sales tax on food. The Minister of State for Finance assured my colleague that he and the country would get an unequivocal answer on June 18. That day has come and gone and Canadians are still waiting for an honest and frank answer to that important question.

When will the Minister of Finance finally assure Canadians that there will never be a national sales tax on food?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in the House, I believe to the Hon. Member who is just making a—no, I had better not say it. I did respond to that question to the Hon. Member. I said there is nothing in the tax reform White Paper that calls for a tax on food.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has told the House and Canadians that the White Paper does not include a tax on food. What it does do, and he cannot deny this, is make a clear case for a tax on food.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Jong: This Minister, Mr. Speaker, had an option. He could have simply said that food was exempt from a national sales tax, whatever its form. Why did he not have the courage and guts to tell Canadians that there never will be a tax on food?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have to answer to the Hon. Member about whether or not I have guts or courage.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FILM INDUSTRY—CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Canadians would like to have a chance to watch, listen to and see their own authors, their stories and themselves reflected on their TV screens and in the movie theatres. After a slow start we now have a young and dynamic budding Canadian film industry which is producing exciting options at the corner movie theatre and in the video stores.

At this critical time and juncture in the Canadian movie and TV series development, at a time when we are on the verge of developing an internationally famous and recognized film industry, why has the Minister nipped it in the bud by imposing dramatic cuts from 100 per cent to 30 per cent on the capital cost allowance for this industry? How does the Minister expect film producers to go out and find the risk capital they need to produce the kind of films which are making us very important persons in this whole industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I should make it clear to the Hon. Member that there are two elements of tax reform as it relates to films. There is a tax benefit being given to the film industry by the increase from 50 per cent to 100 per cent of the capital cost allowance against film income.

There is another element of tax reform. We have restricted the application of losses from the capital cost allowance against other forms of income. It is consistent with the over-all policy of tax reform to reduce or restrict the number of tax shelters.

My colleague, the Minister of Communications and I, and my officials met with representatives of the industry in recent days. We are explaining to them what we are trying to achieve through tax reform. They are telling us their point of view as well. Those conversations are continuing.

CONSULTATIONS WITH INDUSTRY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, that is not how the film industry hears the Minister. What it hears is a drastic, dramatic epic disaster.

I would like to understand something—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Finestone: When will the Government stop sending out contradictory signals to the film industry? Only last winter the Minister of Communications wrapped herself in a Canadian cultural flag and developed a film distribution policy. The Minister of Finance is now sending out an entirely different story. He will cut potential risk capital which is needed to develop the industry.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member could conclude her question.

Mrs. Finestone: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister realize the devastating effect his capital cost allowance policy will have? Will he delay the implication or the application until he has had a chance to consult with the industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are consulting with the industry now, as I indicated to the Hon. Member. In addition to that, there are grandfathering provisions that provide for the continuation of activity. That is in the mill right now.

As I have indicated, the intention of the White Paper is not to do the things that the Hon. Member's rhetoric would suggest we are doing to the film industry. If she thinks further about what we are saying in the paper, by allowing a 100 per cent deduction of the capital cost allowance—

Mrs. Finestone: There is no incentive.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —without the half-year rule, there is an incentive to investors to build a portfolio of film investments and thus provide a continuity of investment capital to the film industry so that it can plan to a greater extent into the future.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN COMMITMENT TO DEFENCE OF NORTHERN NORWAY

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It involves the withdrawal of our CAST commitment to northern Norway.

I met recently with our NATO colleagues, in particular our Norwegian friends, who are naturally still apprehensive. Will the Minister clarify for the House the timing of the actual beginning of the withdrawal of the commitment? More important, can he assure the House that adequate defence alternate provisions will be put into place for northern Norway before the beginning of our withdrawal takes place?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, NATO has given to Canada its consent for the shifting of our commitments in north Norway to the central theatre in Germany. It is our intention to shift the commitment to send two rapid reinforcement fighter squadrons to north Norway, to shift that to the central theatre next year when the CF-18s become available. It does not make sense for us to build new facilities in Norway for them and then shift them within a few months.

In the case of the CAST commitment, that would not happen before 1989. NATO has appointed a committee to make recommendations on who would replace us by the end of this year. That should give plenty of time for a smooth transition.

EQUALITY RIGHTS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Meech Lake Accord has accomplished much in that it has brought Quebec into the constitutional agreement. I hope that the Prime Minister will agree with me that there is much yet to be done, particularly with respect to those Canadians whose forbears were neither British nor French.

Does the Prime Minister think that a Constitution in which the equality rights in Section 15, the section which accords equality rights to all Canadians regardless of race or national origin, and is subject to the override as it presently is in Section 33 of the Charter, is adequate for all Canadians?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the Hon. Member's question. I think that the Constitution of our country is quite clear, as reiterated most eloquently last week by the Prime Minister. In the Meech Lake Accord there is a reaffirmation with respect to that very important part of our community that consists of people who are neither of English nor French background.

I cannot think of any Government which is more committed to equality than this Government, which has demonstrated that with a new spirit of co-operation between the provinces, between all peoples in the country, as manifested by the Meech Lake Accord.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. It is simply this. Will the Prime Minister take the initiative in future constitutional negotiations to see that the equality rights in Section 15 are removed from the notwithstanding clause, Section 33, as was done with women's equality rights during the constitutional discussions in 1982?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any representations for improvement that my friend would like to make in regard to the Constitution are very helpful.

The First Ministers indicated that after the agreement on Meech Lake there would be a second constitutional round. Indeed, I suppose constitutional rounds will go on for some time. The First Ministers and parliamentarians can meet to consider the suggestion of my hon. friend and others designed to improve the Constitution.

The fact that the First Ministers specifically met pursuant to an agreement in Edmonton to deal with the issue of trying to get Quebec back into the Constitution, which I think is a pretty noble objective in itself, does not preclude consideration of other matters in the future.

As other constitutions are amended, for example south of the border, from time to time, I suppose that there will be improvements brought in the future to our Constitution designed and based on the premise of equality, tolerance, and fairness for all citizens. But I think my hon. friend will agree that the objective of bringing Quebec back into the Constitution was one that warranted the attention of all First Ministers. This was done without in any way doing anything other than enhance the multicultural contribution to Canada.

QUEBEC GAMES

REQUEST FOR SLEEPING ACCOMMODATION FOR ATHLETES

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. For several years, the government of Canada has been lending beds to the Quebec Games Corporation for Quebec athletes during the provincial games. This summer, the Quebec Games will be held in Val-d'Or from August 7th to 16th. My question is this: Can the Minister tell us today whether or not young Quebecers will have beds for these events? The Quebec Games Corporation and the Val-d'Or organizing committees are anxiously awaiting the Minister's decision.

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his question. I want to say to the Hon. Member, who has worked very hard at hosting the Junior Games in Quebec and in his home community of Val d'Or, that the Government of Canada has put together a package whereby the requests that he has put forward on behalf of the games for Quebec and for his home community can be met. I am pleased to be able to confirm that in the House today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

1987 CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to return to the Prime Minister on a line of questioning raised by the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville. Granted the primordial importance of bringing Quebec into the constitutional process and granted also the desirability that there be future rounds of constitutional evolution, the question which was asked and which I want to repeat is about this round of evolution, the Meech Lake Accord which is now being presented to Parliament and to the legislatures.

• (1500)

I would ask the Prime Minister precisely what his attitude is toward amendments that are brought forward.

This Party will be bringing forward amendments. The Canadian people will be appearing before a joint parliamentary committee and a committee of the Senate. Ideas will be brought forward.

I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister to indicate that this is a welcomed process and that the door is not shut now on this round for additional improvements to the Accord.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend from the NDP was asking questions in regard to future constitutional rounds, subsequent rounds, as opposed to the consideration that will be given, shortly, to the Meech Lake Accord.

An Hon. Member: No.

Mr. Mulroney: I understood that to be the question.

With respect to the Meech Lake Accord, I have responded in regard to my undertaking as Prime Minister of Canada to bring forward that document for consideration by Parliament.

The Premiers of all of the provinces undertook to do exactly the same thing.

The Premier of Quebec brought it forward in the National Assembly and it has been ratified by the National Assembly of Quebec. I suppose it will be by other provinces as well.

In my judgment the document is capable, I believe—because it is a good document, one that is good for Canada—of being ratified by Parliament, and I so recommend. But there will be a committee of the House that will consider this matter and make its own judgment. I give you my judgment in regard to a fundamental document that I believe is good for Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AMENDMENTS TO IMPROVE MEECH LAKE ACCORD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York-Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is only about the terms of the existing Accord. We shall have a large majority in the Senate while the Conservatives have a majority in the Commons. Will the Government accept amendments which could improve the Accord or keep strictly to the existing terms of the Accord, without any possibility of amendment? This party would prefer the Government to keep an open mind as concerns amendments which could improve the Accord.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, is it the position of the Liberal Party of Canada that the Meech Lake Accord is flawed right from the start and requires amendments? If such is the case, you should have warned the Quebec Premier, who has agreed to the existing document. As for me, I have already expressed my opinion. If any Member of Parliament has questions to ask, whether he be a Conservative, a Liberal or a New Democrat, I imagine that he will ask these questions at the proper moment. I cannot answer for the committee. I am answering only for myself. I have given my views and made the same commitment as all the Premiers as concerns their own legislatures. My own commitment is to the House of Commons and I shall try to keep it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise Hon. Members that it is after three o'clock. I should bring to the attention of the House that there will, shortly, be a vote on the deferred division. Before that, I would ask the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) whether he wishes to rise now to put the usual "Thursday afternoon" question.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, again I have to obey your summons to rise, as I did this morning when the House was discussing a point of order.

I know that we are going to have our weekly House Leaders' meeting today, yesterday having been the Fête de la Saint-Jean Baptiste, and it will not be until 4.30 this afternoon.

I am delighted to ask the Government House Leader the usual question on House business, but it may be that I will have to have the indulgence of the occupant of the Chair to ask the question again later in the day.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray). It would seem that some further discussions must take place.

Mr. Benjamin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) on a point of order.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

NINETEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION OF CLASS OF '68

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the deferred division, I have a point of order to raise that will be of interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) as it concerns, among others, his desk mate. It concerns, as well, the following Hon. Members; for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom), Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), Joliette (Mr. La Salle), Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), Davenport (Mr. Caccia), Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner), Algoma (Mr. Foster), Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski), and myself, the Hon. Member for Regina West. It has to do with the nineteenth birthday of the survivors of the Class of '68, plus one recidivist, the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), who is a repeater.

I thought I would draw that to the attention of the House. We are all only 19 years old today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendation on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business", and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members from any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meeting to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to finish the speech on capital punishment I started this morning. Since taking up where I left off a little before 1 p.m. requires some introduction, I would like to recall some points I made this morning in connection with the debate on the death penalty.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House were criticized by the opposition Parties for actually bringing this debate before Parliament. This morning I pointed out that we did so because we, as a Party, want to keep our promises. I said this morning that during the 1984 election campaign, the Progressive Conservative Party made certain commitments regarding national reconciliation, reducing the deficit and bringing about economic renewal in this country, all of which have now been met. The Progressive Conservative Party also made a commitment to hold a free vote on the important issue of reinstating capital punishment in this country, and that is what we are doing today.

An Hon. Member: It takes guts.

Mr. Desjardins: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it takes a lot of guts to have this kind of debate. But we are doing it because Canadian public opinion has shown an interest and wants Parliament to review the question of capital punishment in this House from time to time.

I also said, Mr. Speaker, that if we listened to the kind of speeches being made in this House, it was only among members of the Progressive Conservative Party that we heard the true expression of democracy in this country, a true expression of Canadian public opinion. As the House is aware, Canadian public opinion is extremely divided on the issue of capital punishment. Proponents are to be found on both sides of the House. The point I am trying to make is that the Progressive Conservative Party in Canada was able to express this plurality of views in this country, while it seems opposition Parties have practically adopted a party line approach. The majority there is against capital punishment. Not so within our own Party, where those who are in favour and those who are against are more or less evenly divided.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to say in the House that the Member for Témiscamingue is firmly opposed to the reinstatement of capital punishment in this country.

During the few minutes I have left, I would like to explain why the Member speaking to you now is against the death penalty.

Mr. Speaker, even before I became a Member of this House, the issue of capital punishment was already a subject of some concern to me as a citizen. Upon reflection, I realized that my moral principles were such that I could not let the State have power over life and death in this country.

When I was elected a Member of Parliament and the issue was again brought to my attention, there was also the issue of who I was representing. As a Member, I had to decide whether, in voting on a matter of this importance which had such moral repercussions, I should vote according to my conscience, my principles and my judgment or whether I should merely reflect the views of my constituents and reproduce these like a robot in this House.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue did not take this approach. As a Member I thought it was a major responsibility to meet with my constituents and discuss this very important issue with them.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that, like many of my House colleagues who have expressed their views, I consulted widely with various groups in my own riding. Such exchanges proved to be fruitful of course, not always easy but always in a spirit of friendship and respect for the opinions of others.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that when I first began to talk it over with my constituents it became quite clear that those groups including a majority of people over 50 were definitely and instinctively in favour of capital punishment.

As their Member of Parliament having ready access to certain information and perhaps certain data as well, I had to sit down with them and exchange views in a clear and enlightened manner, without twisting arms, simply a free and open discussion.

Mr. Speaker, you know that as Members we have access to a tool called householders. I sent a householder last February to survey my constituents. Their replies were sent to my office and I can give you the percentages of people for, against and undecided.

In February 1987, in the riding of Témiscamingue, there were 417 people in favour of the death penalty, 616 against, and there were 64 undecided.

Mr. Speaker, in February 1987 the majority in my riding voted against capital punishment.

But what pleased me most, Mr. Speaker, is that older people who at first were reluctant and instictively in favour of restoring the death penalty let me know a few weeks ago, through a resolution adopted by most golden age clubs in my riding, that they had changed their position and were now against capital punishment in this country. Their resolution really pleased me.

Three weeks ago in Rouyn-Noranda, I met with 500 of these people from senior citizens' clubs of my own constituency, and when I told them that I would reflect their own stand against reinstatement of the death penalty in Canada, they gave me a standing ovation.

Mr. Speaker, this means that the more people talk about the death penalty, the more they are against its reinstatement, and the more people think about it, the more convinced they are that the death penalty is not an answer to the crime rate in this country.

When I was consulting various people, I certainly heard all the classic arguments in favour of reinstating the death penalty in this country. The one we hear most often concerns the deterrent effect. This is the argument which the supporters of reinstatement use most often: the deterrent effect.

The second argument we hear, Mr. Speaker, is that the state should react to certain crimes in a spirit of retribution. A third argument which we often hear is the economic argument.

I would like to examine each of these arguments and explain why it is difficult to find them convincing in 1987, in such a civilized and modern country as Canada.

It seems immoral to me to demand retribution for any crime committed in Canada. This is only applying the old law of an eye for an eye, and I find it unacceptable in principle, in a country which has the greatest Charter of Rights and Freedoms and which recognizes the basic right to life, that we should go back to the past and consider reinstating the death penalty.

As for the deterrence factor, I would like to refer to the comments made by the Chief of Police of the Urban Community of Montreal on April 5, 1987. I think that the views of such a man should be taken into account. Mr. Bourget, the Chief of Police of the UCM said on April 5, 1987: "I find it inhuman to keep people in prison for five or six years waiting to be executed." A bit farther in the same article, we find this: "After some 30 years of police work, the UCM Chief of Police, Mr. Roland Bourget, remains opposed to reinstatement of the death penalty."

Mr. Rossi: He is not alone.

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, this is an opinion which should be taken into account in this debate. Still in the same article, we find this: "Contrary to the majority opinion shown by polls carried out in the general public and especially in police forces, Mr. Bourget does not believe that this extreme measure can reduce the number of murders, and even less the general crime rate. His readings, observations and especially his many years with the police lead him to believe that the death penalty will not have any deterrent effect as 70 per cent of murders are committed on impulse by ordinary citizens."

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this is an important argument against the deterrence factor.

As far as the economics of the question is concerned, we have often been told that keeping a prisoner or a criminal in prison costs the State between $60,000 and $65,000. That may be. But what price should we put on the entire process, on the various avenues that would be open to someone who has been convicted of a capital offence? According to some figures, the total would be nearly one million dollars, and this includes the endless process of appeals and recourse to which a criminal sentenced to be hanged or to any other death penalty is entitled. When we talk about the economics of the issue, I think this is a red herring. And I would like to expand on this, Mr. Speaker, because in my own riding as in the rest of the province, we have institutions for the chronically-ill and institutions for psychiatric patients. How much do these people cost the province and the country in terms of social costs? Enormous amounts are involved. Should we get rid of these people because they cost too much? I think the economic argument does not hold water and that it is an argument we must reject outright.

Mr. Speaker, although this particular Member is against capital punishment, I still think the Canadian people should be better protected against crime and real criminals. And in this connection, I would like to recall that we had a royal commission of inquiry that, a few months ago, produced a very thick report on sentence reform.

Are you telling me I have about one minute left, Mr. Speaker?

So what I wanted to say is, we should review the Criminal Code and have far stricter sentences for the truly unscrupulous criminal.

In concluding, I would like to say a few words to the undecided. I would advise the undecided to vote against restoring capital punishment because there is always a possibility that an innocent man might be executed. The dead cannot be resurrected, Mr. Speaker. And I would not want to live with that on my conscience for the rest of my days. It constitutes an irrepairable injustice and this is why I urge the undecided, if they are really undecided, to vote against reinstating capital punishment.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Desjardins) for his eloquent speech. During his remarks I noticed that he wanted—and I would certainly have given more time—to refer to sentence reform, so I commend him for that, perhaps he had in mind more severe sentences! Well, I might tell the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue that by more severe sentences we should mean sentences served in full. Do you mean to say . . . with respect to more severe sentences I would refer to the word "rehabilitation" which is, in my humble opinion, a joke in some cases. When you say more severe sentences, do you mean sentences which should be maintained, like when a judge tells the accused: For a hold-up you must stay in 10 years. Instead of 10 years, the guy is out on the street after three years. Is that what you mean?

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, let me thank the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) for his questions. I take this opportunity to tell him how much I appreciated his contribution. He admits he voted for capital punishment in 1976, but that in this debate he is against the death penalty, an opinion which I think he has expressed many times here.

In answer to his question, the royal inquiry commission recommended that a criminal convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to 25 years in prison cannot apply for parole before serving at least two-thirds of his time, that is at least 15 years before filing an application with the National Parole Board. I believe that this would be a major improvement since it is now very easy for criminals to be put on parole. After serving one third of his sentence, a criminal is eligible for parole. What the royal commission recommended was that a criminal sentenced to life imprisonment, that is to 25 years in prison, would have to spend at least 15 years in prison before becoming eligible for parole. As for rehabilitation in the penal system, I would like to tell the Hon. Member for Bourassa that I am convinced that a criminal remains a human being and is entitled to receive training in prison, to learn a trade, to prepare him for the day when he will be asked to rejoin society. However, I also believe that keeping certain types of criminals in prison for at least 15 years is a form of protection which Canadian society wants and to which it is entitled.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I also want to congratulate my colleague from Temiscamingue (Mr. Desjardins) for his very courageous stand in this debate. I would like to know whether he has read carefully the motion under consideration on which we shall be voting. This motion says:

> That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:
> (a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;
> (b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

As an abolitionist like myself, I would like to know what his feelings would be sitting on a 15 member committee responsible for choosing the type of sentence or the type of execution which should be used and under which circumstances it would apply. Does he not feel that this fifteen member committee will represent only one side of the issue, namely those who favour reinstatement of the death penalty?

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, as I did earlier for the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) because I know he took part in this debate, that he is on the abolitionists' side and that he made a remarkable speech in this House.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the plumbing, mechanics and setting up of this committee are concerned, all I can say is, I find this extremely repugnant and I will have no part of it. I would never agree to sit on a committee that had the task of listing the various actions that can lead to the death penalty and the actual machine that will kill someone.

Mr. Speaker, the Member for Témiscamingue would of course refuse to sit on such a committee, and as far as I am concerned, I do not think we will need the plumbing.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I too would like to take this opportunity to commend the Hon. Member for his speech and for the position he has taken on this very important issue facing the House. As he knows, the Government intends to invoke closure on this debate. As he probably knows as well, I share his views but I may not have the opportunity to present my views to the House of Commons because of his Government's decision to invoke closure, thereby precluding some Members who wish to speak on this very important issue from having the opportunity to do so.

What are the Hon. Member's thoughts on the Government's intention to invoke closure? Does he consider it appropriate that in the circumstances of dealing with probably the most important issue facing this Parliament there are those of us duly elected Members of Parliament who will not have the opportunity to express our point of view?

[Translation]

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his question. I may remind him that a few months ago, the British Parliament dealt with a debate on the same issue in five hours, and they had a very intelligent vote on this issue, a vote in which the majority rejected reinstatement of the death penalty.

As far as this Parliament is concerned, we have been debating the subject for more than 50 hours, if I am not mistaken. I think that in 50 hours, every Member of this House has been able to make up his or her own mind about reinstating or not reinstating the death penalty in this country. Personally, I have nothing against having a vote at 6 p.m. this evening or at some time in the next few days, because I believe that most of the Members of this House have now made up their minds and that Members will be able to express their positions when they rise to vote.

It would not bother me in the slightest if we had a motion of closure, because I feel that since we have been debating this issue in the House for more than 50 hours, the minds of Hon. Members must be made up by this time.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, again I should like to ask the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Desjardins), after the question of my colleague . . . it is because we are debating an issue relating to human life. As I see it, human life is just about the most important consideration on our mind and conscience. But we are debating capital punishment, and I listened very attentively to the remarks of the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland). Let me tell you that I congratulated him publicly, again I do so, and I urge you to read his remarks again because he has touched on all points which probably lead a young man to become a killer. And this is where we must act, not when a man gets to the point where society has made him a killer.

In his remarks the Hon. Member for Portneuf mentioned the young man who goes before the courts and who should be given a chance. Nobody cares about this young man, so finally the judge tells him: I sentence you to two years in jail. And so he goes to the university of crime.

This is the point I stress because during my career as a policeman—I was a lieutenant detective in charge of armed robberies, in charge of murders, I saw gunfire, I had to live with criminals—I always say that is where the young man must be seen. You will tell me that we are debating capital punishment. But when we are debating tax reform, when we are talking about rehabilitation I would like to have your views. You will tell me it has nothing to do with the death penalty. But as the Hon. Member for Portneuf so ably put it—I greatly appreciated his speech, he spoke like an expert—should we not, as members of society, act right then instead of waiting until he becomes a killer? I too believe that perhaps most Canadians would change their mind. If a man sentenced to ten years is not on the street after two or three years, because we must not forget the word "rehabilitation", when the prisoner is released they tell him: You had been given 10 years. You are out after three years but if you are caught committing another crime you will have to serve the rest of those 10 years, plus whatever time you get for the second crime. So is that not what we certainly want to correct, is that not what we as Members of this House want to show the people of Canada, that we want the sentences to be served in full, that when we talk about rehabilitation we mean investing money to rehabilitate juvenile delinquents?

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) once again for his comments. I think that this debate is particularly useful, in that it gives Canadians a chance to know the views of every Member of this House and this Government.

Of course, what we want, as I said earlier, is to ensure that unscrupulous criminals remain incarcerated as long as possible and that people who shouldn't be in prison at all are released. In fact I think the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) said as much in his speech. Prison should not be used for minor offences. It costs money. Prisons should exist only to punish serious offences.

The Hon. Member made some reference to the time that would be allowed for this debate. I think that speeches like the one made by the Hon. Member for Portneuf, and of course we must not forget that the speeches made by the party leaders were learned discourses, and I include the speech made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). The speeches by the opposition Leaders were excellent. I think that we have now touched all bases and that Hon. Members should now be able to say they are for or against this issue. I think we have had a healthy debate and that it was good for this country. But personally, I would be ready to vote. And I think most of my colleagues will be ready as well, because the debate was an open one, addressing most of the issues.

[English]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are not often called upon to debate a fundamental question of life and death. The question of the restoration of capital punishment is exactly that question. This House will be deciding whether there are circumstances in which the state is justified, in the criminal justice system, in taking a human life.

I want to disagree strongly with the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Desjardins) who has just indicated that he believes 50 hours of debate is enough and that all Members who would want to speak should have done so within 50 hours. We on our side know that that is not the case. We have a very long list. Ministers have made three attempts now to prevent all Members who want to speak from doing so. We seem to be in a hiatus now between their plots of one kind and another to bring this debate to a close.

If the Hon. Member favours abolition, I urge him to support the continuation of this debate as long as possible because the effect of it seems to be to encourage a number of Members who thought otherwise to have second thoughts and begin to see that capital punishment is not the solution which many believe it is.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, you may find it ironic that the Member for York Centre, that is myself, am what I like to call an abolitionist, but an abolitionist with one exception in which I feel that capital punishment is justified. I hope in my remarks today to be able to indicate the circumstances in which I support capital punishment. They are exactly the same circumstances in which I supported it in 1976. In the intervening time I had the opportunity to be the Solicitor General of Canada responsible for Canada's penitentiaries. That which I learned in that job, about which I want to speak soon, has confirmed my feelings that capital punishment, in one narrow area of the law, would actually save lives. I believe that with due respect to human life the use of capital punishment is not justified except where it can be shown that it will actually save lives.

Before I turn to my own views on capital punishment, I want to make some comments about this debate in general. I do not favour this debate. I am voting against the resolution because I believe the debate has been used to distract attention from very important areas of public policy, not only the performance of the Government but even ways of improving our criminal justice system.

I think the effect that capital punishment will have in the criminal justice system is small compared to all the other things we can do to make our criminal justice system better. I condemn the Government for focusing on this one issue, particularly under the administration of a Prime Minister who is an admitted abolitionist and is taking a position before the country which may well see capital punishment restored.

I will deal with my concern about the debate of the issue by dealing with the two sides of the issue. First, among those who support capital punishment—and I refer to many millions of Canadians—I find that in their position is a sense of desperation, that while they are not confident that capital punishment will work in reducing the murder rate, it will have a beneficial effect on law and order in society. I sympathize very much with that view, but I think it is wrong.

I do not believe that restoring capital punishment will do very much outside the area of murder, yet I have heard Members say in the House that having capital punishment is the corner-stone of an effective criminal justice system. It is as if to say there would be less other crimes if capital punishment were on the books, and there would be more law and order in society. Because people have that view about capital punishment, I think it gets the support of people who, when they look at it as a remedy, fundamentally do not really believe that it will do a significant job in the criminal justice system.

I have heard others say that the reason they support capital punishment is a fear that people who are sentenced to life imprisonment for murder will get out on parole and be back on the streets in a few years, ready to murder again. I want to tell those people something that I do not think they will believe but is absolutely true. We have on the statute books of Canada today a penalty for murder which is as effective as capital punishment. It is the life sentence.

I know that people say they have read about criminals who get out, but I want to state categorically to those who support capital punishment on this ground that no one in Canada who has ever been sentenced to the stiffest penalty that was added to our law in 1976 has been released from penitentiary. All of them, except those who have died since 1976, are still in prison. We read about people who committed murders getting out of jail, but if one checks into it, one will see that these are people who are not sentenced to the maximum penalty.

The Member for Témiscamingue was wrong about that as well. He said that the 25-year sentence means that people may apply for parole after seven years, and argued that it should be increased to 16 or 17 years. That is not a 25-year sentence. It is a full life sentence, except that after 25 years one has the right to go before a judge and ask for permission to apply for parole. It does not mean that parole will be granted by the judge or a parole board. None of those people will even be eligible to apply until the year 2001. None of them have done so. The idea that people who get the maximum sentence known to the law now are getting out and committing other murders is absolutely wrong.

I say to those who support capital punishment on that ground that they should look again. There is a very good, equal deterrent in the law in the form of the full life sentence that was introduced by my colleague, the Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), when he was Solicitor General in 1976.

I want to say something to the abolitionists because I find something peculiar in their position as well. Abolitionist after abolitionist will stand up and say that while they are an abolitionist, they believe our criminal justice system is lousy and needs to be fundamentally changed. They seem to want to defend their support for abolition in the face of the retentionist by agreeing somehow or other that we have a lousy system of criminal justice that is not working. I think they are also wrong.

I speak as one who knows something about the criminal justice system. I am not saying that it cannot be improved, but it is not correct to say that it is fundamentally wrong, that sentences are too low and making changes to the criminal justice system will produce much less crime in society.

I have ideas for improving the criminal justice system. I introduced some, in the area of crime prevention for example, while I was Solicitor General. I believe crime can be reduced much more easily by preventing it from happening than by the way we handle criminals, whether it is putting them in prison or diverting them. I tried to encourage the movement of the criminal justice system into crime prevention. There is not much room to make our criminal justice system do a very much better job for us. While we read about those things that go wrong, let me suggest that they are as much a function of the human condition as they are of the criminal justice system. Unlike some other countries, such as the United States, we have control of our criminal justice system.

I suggest to those abolitionists who are telling people that there is a magic solution to making the criminal justice system prevent all crime that they are wrong and misleading people in trying to convince them that capital punishment is not the answer and that there is some magic key when the fact is that crime is related to the human condition. We are making our best efforts to try to fight crime.

If there was a key to tremendous reductions and great improvements in running our prisons, dealing with criminals or altering sentences, I think we would have found it years ago.

There is a very strong will in Canadian society to improve the criminal justice system.

While I do not mean to sound like a Conservative by saying we have to defend what exists, I believe steps can be taken to improve it but not enough to deliver on the commitments of some abolitionists who are saying that we must scrap this system and start again. It is a good system that serves the Canadian people rather well, even though I think it can be improved a lot.

One of the reasons I condemn the Government for bringing this resolution forward is that I feel so strongly that we should be looking at the criminal justice system. We should be studying the report of the Sentencing Commission. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) says that he is against capital punishment, but instead of dealing with the report of the Sentencing Commission, which makes some sensible recommendations for improving the system, he is giving the House a capital punishment debate that is detached from any inspection of alternatives to capital punishment which might help people make up their minds as to whether or not they are in favour of capital punishment.

I have indicated that I am voting against the resolution and have given my reasons. Now I want to explain the reason I support capital punishment in the area in which I believe it will be effective.

I stated my belief that a full life sentence as already established in our law is as effective as capital punishment. However, there is a growing number of murders committed by people who are not deterred by a full life sentence. The reason they are not deterred is that they are already serving a full life sentence. These are people who have been sentenced since 1976 to spending their natural life in prison. The statistics which were released in a summary form a few weeks ago by the Ministry of Solicitor General show that the murder rate in our penitentiaries is astronomical. It is the duty of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher) to protect inmates from being killed by other inmates during their sentence, and to protect guards and officials from being killed by inmates during the time they are in prison. That protection is not being afforded now.

While I may be criticized for saying this, the officials do not even try to solve most of the murders that take place in prisons because everyone knows who is responsible for a murder when it is committed. The prison is too small that the knowledge of the identity of the killer is not known. Yet, the philosophy must be: "Why bother trying to solve this murder?"

• (1610)

Why bother singling out an inmate, charging him again, having an expensive police investigation, a trial, putting the inmate up in a hotel, eating in restaurants, getting his picture in the papers, and all this, including his lawyer, paid for by the taxpayers, and then at the end, after the conviction—and I could actually name a few inmates who have gone through this process—back he goes to prison to continue the sentence he was serving before he committed the murder. I think we have a responsibility within the criminal justice system to deal with that problem.

I know there are those who feel they are not convinced that capital punishment is a deterrent but who say that if they could be convinced, they would support it. I want to urge those people to reflect on this situation and on the problem of dealing with the offender already sentenced to serving life.

We hear people say from time to time that capital punishment in their view is not a deterrent. I think that is a very foolish thing to say. Certainly, it is true to a point. Capital punishment is not a deterrent to the 99.9 per cent of Canadians who would never think of killing anyone, even if it was not a crime. Those people are not deterred by the idea of capital punishment. They are deterred by the respect they have for life and by the feeling of horror they have against killing anyone.

Among those people who have a potential under some circumstances to commit a murder, I think capital punishment is a deterrent. The knowledge they have that they could be caught and, if caught, their life would be taken, must surely figure into their calculations. Common sense tells us it does. Therefore, it is a deterrent.

The point I make, though, is that I do not see how one could consider it to be a more effective deterrent than life imprisonment. I think they are equal, especially when "life" is, as I said, full life. Capital punishment is a deterrent, one which involves taking a human life, but comparing it to the equally effective deterrent which does not involve taking a human life, I think one has to choose the latter. That is why I support full life imprisonment for the kinds of murders which are defined in the Criminal Code, with one exception.

I want to close by suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, that I think I can characterize myself as an abolitionist, as one who would oppose capital punishment except that I am convinced, from my knowledge of prisons and from my experience with the violent murders which take place there on an increasing basis, that capital punishment is justified in those circumstances.

I want to say another word on a subject which perhaps many have not thought about. I think if we introduce capital punishment, it would be unacceptable to the Canadian people if it resulted in a great number of executions. If there are 700 murders a year and if there were 500 or so people convicted of murder, anyone who wants to suggest there should be 500 executions a year in Canada would be putting an appalling proposition forward. I wonder if the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) has ever taken a pencil to his theory to see how many executions there would be if capital punishment was reinstated? I think there would be something abhorrent to me of several executions taking place a year. I would find that appalling in a civilized country such as ours.

On the other hand, if the Members who favour capital punishment were content to see it applied only in the area where I have suggested it is logical, because there is no other alternative, then the number of executions which would occur would be very small. I think if there were one in five years, or seven years, it would be as much as one could possibly expect. I think that is a factor. I know that those who favour capital punishment, if the statistics are right as this debate has proceeded, are having some second thoughts about it.

I think one of the calculations must surely be what is happening in the United States where recent hurdles have been cleared with respect to cases before the Supreme Court and where 1,400 convicted murderers may be executed in the next several months. The prospect of that appalling number of executions taking place in a democratic country is in itself a great deterrent to the restoration of capital punishment. If this resolution carries, I would urge all of those who are going to sit on the committee to bear in mind that Canadians, even those who have supported capital punishment, would be tremendously disturbed to see anymore than a very, very small number of executions take place.

With those thoughts, I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate and look forward to the Government changing its mind about its agenda. If this resolution is not to be withdrawn, and frankly I would prefer to see it withdrawn, I hope all of those who wish to speak to it would be given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would like to put a question to the Hon Member. Much of what he has said in the House today one can find in similar terms in the speech he gave to this House on May 19, 1976, the last time there was such a debate on the question of capital punishment. My question will be along two lines. I find there is a bit of a contrast in what the Hon. Member has said this afternoon. In 1976 the Hon. Member said:

> I suggest that public opinion is an extremely important factor in the determination of an issue like capital punishment.

He went on to say:

> I do not see how any Member of this House can escape the undeniable fact that the majority of the people of Canada are of the opinion—however you want to measure or count it—that there is a place for capital punishment in our system of justice. I insist that this House must respond to that concern.

The Hon. Member has just said he would prefer to see this resolution withdrawn. Is he today feeling differently from the way he felt on May 19, 1976 when he stated: "I insist that this House must respond to the public concern that there should be capital punishment in our system"?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the Hon. Member listened to the whole of my speech, but at the beginning I made some points about what I thought might be done to improve our war against crime in Canadian society. I suggested that capital punishment was not a large part of the solution, it was a very small part, and that time would be better spent on other things. I visualized a capital punishment debate being a very lengthy one. That is the reason I would prefer to see the resolution withdrawn than continue in order that we could deal with crime in other ways.

I also think that public opinion is volatile and I invite the Hon. Member to notice that just in the last few months public opinion in support of capital punishment is beginning to decline. As I suggested, I think it will continue to decline as a great number of executions begin to take place in the United States and Canadians get to see who gets executed when a society introduces capital punishment and when it is applied on a very large scale.

Fundamentally, I agree with what I said in 1976. I am glad to have it read. I have not looked at it myself for awhile. What I would have to say is that in a final analysis in a democracy, the population is entitled to the kind of criminal justice system they want.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member on this subject. I preface my question by saying that I have taken part in a debate on capital punishment in this House on two previous occasions. I expressed my reservations about what we were doing on both those occasions. The first time in 1973 was with regard to the fact that we were entering into another five-year-trial period and I did not feel that we should have an additional trial period, that we should move to abolition right away. The second time in 1976 was with regard to the fact that in compensation for the removal of the death penalty, the Government was introducing a maximum penalty of 25 years before parole, or life.

I would like to focus on what the Hon. Member said in his comments since the reservation I expressed in 1976 was that that 25-year period as a minimum was the wrong move to take. In fact, at that time I said:

> —two specific findings of criminal research—shows first, that convicted murderers have low recidivism rates, and second, the longer the imprisonment, the slimmer the chances of rehabilitation.

If the Hon. Member is saying that in the ensuing years since capital punishment was abolished he has seen a larger number of murders within the prison system, I want to ask him whether or not he figures that this lengthy penalty which was imposed at that time was wrong. Should it have been imposed and should we be moving today to re-examine the sentencing procedure so that that act which was taken at that time is reduced? Should we go back to the previous situation so that we do not escalate the difficulties within the prison system, about which I appreciate he knows, and which I know, by continuing this minimum sentence of 25 years for first-degree murder?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the proposition that the minimum of 25 years should be reduced. I know it works terrible hardship for some of the people who are sentenced to it, but they have committed a very grievous offence. I think that life imprisonment is a reasonable penalty for someone who commits a murder as defined by that section of the Act and where that penalty is invoked.

The Hon. Member wants to draw some conclusions from the fact with which I concede that the longer a person stays in prison the more likely they are to become recidivists. But what does that mean? Who gets long sentences? It is people who have committed more serious crimes. I would say that people who have committed more serious crimes are more likely to become recidivists. Murder is an exception, and I would like to say a word about that.

However, when we take the run of criminals going through the courts receiving their sentences, the longer the sentence they receive is a reflection of their character and the kind of crime they have committed. I think the resulting fact that there is a higher rate of recidivism among those people is not necessarily as a result of the time that they spend in prison but the kind of person they were and the kind of crimes they committed for which they were sentenced.

Murderers include two very different categories of person. Most of the murders that are committed in Canada are committed by people who have not committed other kinds of crimes, people who are not in the criminal culture. They are people who commit crimes of passion, although deliberately, or they would not be convicted. They are people who are responsible for what they did but who are of a sort who have not been involved in criminal activity before. Those individuals have a low rate of recidivism. They are very easy offenders to look after in prison. They are sentenced to low-level security institutions. They lead useful lives behind bars. I would not reduce the length of time they have to spend in prison because of what they did and because of the deterrent that I think ought to apply to them.

There is another category of murderer, the remorseless contract killer who is driven to it. In our maximum security prisons these are the individuals who create the problems. These are the ones who are frequently responsible for other murders. If they can be charged and properly convicted of committing a second murder in prison, then their removal from the maximum security institution will have a beneficial effect on that institution. It will reduce the jeopardy of guards, many of whom are constituents of the Hon. Member. It will remove the jeopardy of other inmates being killed. I think we owe it to them to reflect on the effect that capital punishment will have if imposed on those in prison who kill again.

Perhaps the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has been in prisons more times than I have been in prisons, although I was in a great number of them during the time I was Solicitor General. I had a lot of time to talk to offenders, guards and officials. She will know, while perhaps most Canadians do not, that in a maximum security institution these are the toughest offenders in Canada. Most of them are trying to stay out of trouble. Some of them go through the day tense, trying to avoid getting into situations in which they will do anything but easy time with the possibility of being paroled and getting out on good behaviour and so on. The trouble with them is that in the maximum security institutions they do not have the ability to stay out of trouble. They have been raised or directed in a way in which they respond with violence to any kind of provocation or harassment or aggression, the kind of things that a Member of Parliament, when they happen to him or her, can turn into a positive direction. Inmates in maximum security prisons cannot. They blow up. That is why, after having been convicted, they are in maximum security instead of being at lower levels. But they are provoked by this smaller group of trouble-makers in each of the maximum security institutions.

I would urge the Hon. Member, for all the respect that I have for her commitment to abolition, to recognize that where capital punishment is a deterrent, where it will have the effect of saving lives, that however distasteful she may find it, and I find it distasteful as well, I think one has to recognize that there is a place for it. If it were here, as distasteful as it is, other people would be alive who are innocent in that circumstance and who deserve the protection of the law.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to inform Hon. Members that the time for questions and comments is over.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, when the last person was hung in Canada, and I believe there were two of them at the same time, in 1962, I was 11 years old. In the intervening quarter of a century I feel that I have had the privilege of growing up in, becoming an adult in and becoming a Member of Parliament in one of the most non-violent societies in the world.

Mr. Stevens: The murder rate has doubled!

Mr. Blaikie: The murder rate has not doubled, despite what the Hon. Member for York—Peel (Mr. Stevens) says. I hope he will give me the courtesy of hearing me out. The fact remains that Canada is one of the most non-violent societies in the world. I am proud of that. I think all Members of the House should keep it in mind when we are talking about what kind of Canada we might be embarking upon if this resolution were to pass. I am of the view that the passage of this resolution would be a step toward not a less violent society but a more violent society.

I think it is ironic that as we move toward the end of this debate, whether it be tomorrow, Monday or Tuesday, or whatever the case may be, that what is shaping up is that this resolution which people once thought would carry by a significant majority may either be defeated or may pass by an insignificant margin, by a very small margin, and even then unenthusiastically.

• (1630)

I sense that there are Members of Parliament who feel cornered by their past statements on capital punishment and who feel cornered by various arguments as to how they ought to respond to the wishes of their constituents. Having listened to the debate and having been a party to the public debate which has been ongoing since this resolution came before the House, they are no longer as sure of their position as they once were. Those are the Members to whom I am addressing my remarks.

I appeal to those Members to think very carefully about their responsibility as Members of Parliament.

I know there are some who have said to themselves: "Well, I will vote for this motion now, because it is not a motion that actually reinstates capital punishment. I will vote for this motion now and, in doing so, will be consistent with what I have said before, and privately hope that the time for actually reinstating capital punishment will not come to pass; that somehow in the course of things a Bill proposing the reinstatement of capital punishment will not come before the House."

In that way, they will not actually have to vote on the reinstatement of capital punishment but will still be able to live up to some of the political commitments they have made—and some people in this House have made political commitments in that respect going back more than a decade, to the time of the last vote on capital punishment.

I ask those Members who feel that way to vote against this motion now, thus preventing what I would consider to be the possibility of a very grim road show, where a committee of this Parliament would be travelling around the country debating the relative merits of hanging people as opposed to electrocuting them, as opposed to lethal injection, or whatever other methods may be considered—something which I think would be degrading in terms of the public discourse and the general level of political and public debate in this country.

The argument for capital punishment, for the return of the death penalty, is a classic example of false expectations. There will be no decrease in violence in our society as a result of the return of the death penalty. The roots of violence and disrespect for human life are deep and complicated, and hanging a few people every year will not help. While it may make some of us feel better when a particularly vicious and obviously guilty murderer is executed, it will not stop violence in our society. It will in fact increase it, as people lose the example of a state that is not prepared to condone killing as a solution to the problem of violence in society.

The Canadian Coalition Opposed to the Death Penalty puts the question starkly and powerfully: Why kill people who kill people to show that killing people is wrong?

In 1975, the year prior to the total abolition of capital punishment in Canada, there were 701 homicides in Canada, for a rate of 3.09 per 100,000; in 1985, there were 686 homicides in Canada, for a rate of 2.78. Between those dates, Canada reported a low of 593 homicides in 1980, for a rate of 2.47.

I have read some of the speeches that have been made during the course of this debate and I am aware of the distinction that needs to be made between first degree murder and second degree murder and the fact that there may have been a slight increase in the number of first degree murders. But, it is the second degree murders which tend to be reported in such a way that people are left with the sense that violence is on the increase, thus bringing about an increased sense of insecurity. Therefore, these figures are relevant, despite that distinction, as it is in response to the sense that there is an over-all increase in violence that many people take a position in favour of capital punishment.

The argument that the death penalty deters murder is certainly true, in the strict sense that those who are executed will certainly never murder again. I am not going to argue against that one, Mr. Speaker. Yet, this fact has to be weighed against the fact that repeat murderers constitute a very small minority of those convicted. Most murders are still committed by those who are too angry, too insane, or otherwise caught up in the moment to care whether or not they get caught and are subject to execution, or by people who do not intend to get caught, in any event.

There is also the fact that bringing back capital punishment may actually cause some murderers to go free, as judges and juries become more reluctant to convict if there is any doubt at all, or sometimes even if there is not any doubt at all, when they know that their decision will lead to the taking of a human life.

Our criminal justice system, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said the other day, is an imperfect and fallible process, like everything else run by human beings. Yet, the decision to punish an individual with death is one of an absolute nature. Not only is there the possibility of punishing the wrong person in this absolute and irretrievable way, but there is also the fact that the death penalty cannot be distributed, even among the surely guilty, in a perfect way. The poor, for instance, will almost certainly hang for their crimes more often than the rich, who can afford the brightest and best lawyers in the country. Visible minorities may also be more vulnerable in this respect, as blacks have been in those American states that have reinstated the death penalty. And those who are clearly insane—and it is these who commit some of the crimes which get the most publicity—will not be hanged in any event as the defence of not guilty by reason of insanity will continue to be available.

In recent years, Donald Marshall of Nova Scotia and John Wildman of Ontario were convicted of murder and later found to be innocent. In 1984, Senator Metzenbaum tabled in the U.S. Congress a list of 48 persons who were convicted of murder in the U.S. and later found to be innocent.

It also interesting to observe that, despite suggestions to the contrary, jurisdictions with capital punishment spend far more money than do those which have abolished such punishment. Trial and lengthy appeal costs are all borne by the taxpayer. A 1982 study showed that if the death penalty were reintroduced in the State of New York, the cost of the capital trial alone would be more than double the cost of a life term in prison.

While that is something to think about, in the final analysis, I think we have to reject arguments for or against capital punishment based on a dollars and cents calculation. Let us be clear that the money argument cuts both ways.

The case for doing something to protect the lives of prison guards and police officers is, to many, probably the most appealing argument for capital punishment. Might I say personally that I come from a long line of big Irish cops. I am no stranger to policemen, either among my family or among my friends. My grandfather was the Chief of Police in the community which I represent here in this Parliament, and I have an uncle who has served 25 years in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I know the compelling nature of this argument, particularly for families whose members serve in these capacities.

Yet, this argument also has its limits. Prison guards are often the victims of tensions that could have been prevented through better management of the prison system; and police are often vulnerable because they are forced to work alone or under unnecessarily dangerous conditions.

Politicians who call for capital punishment but who refuse to properly finance our police departments and our prisons should not be so easily let off the hook on these issues. The question of what to do about repeat offenders who are already in prison and who already have received the maximum possible penalty under the law is a difficult one. However, that is not the motion that we have before us. I remind Hon. Members, with respect to the matter of the killing of police, that the greatest number of police killed on duty in one year was in 1962, when there were 11 police officers murdered in Canada. In that year, capital punishment existed and there were two hangings for the killing of police officers.

Since abolition in 1976, the worst years were 1984 when six police were murdered and 1985 when five police were murdered, and the number of police has doubled since 1962.

Mining is still a more dangerous profession than police work. Many miners are killed every year and many more have died over the years, not just from accidents but from diseases related to the conditions in which they work. I mention this not to make any easy or simplistic comparison between the death of a miner by accident or by neglect and the death of a policeman by gun-fire. Obviously there are significant differences. However, it raises the question of what calls for the highest degree of moral outrage.

I guess my problem is that I am just as outraged by mine owners who have knowingly endangered the lives of their employees and by factory owners who have knowingly poisoned the environment of neighbourhoods and surrounding areas. I am just as outraged by the people who allow others to die, either quickly or slowly, or to be damaged just so they can make bigger profits. These people are just as high on my list of undesirables as many of the people convicted of murder.

If we could come to see these kinds of acts as equally criminal, maybe I would not be so anxious about the fact that the present furore about capital punishment deflects and diverts us from other areas of concern. At this point we do not even prosecute, let alone punish, those who make death-dealing decisions all the time. This is not to mention, when we talk about premeditated murder, the premeditated mass murder of the entire human race which is being premeditated every day in the Pentagon, the Kremlin, and many other places around the world.

I would like to see some of the moral outrage which we get from government back-benchers about premeditated murder of individual Canadians expressed against the premeditated murder of the entire human prospect, the premeditated destruction of all creation which is being premeditated here and now, every day that we sit in the House. I would like to see some moral outrage about that for a change. I would like to see that expressed by the same people who argue that they have so much respect for their constituents' views on this issue. I would like them to show respect for their constituents' views on that issue. The next time we have an opportunity in the House on a free vote, as we have had, to vote against the testing of the cruise missile and other death-dealing weapons, I would like to see them have the same respect for their constituents' opinions, have the same outrage as they have about premeditated murder, get up and vote against cruise missile testing. When that day comes, I will know that moral outrage has been reclaimed in a constructive, not just a destructive way.

Self-righteousness must be guarded against on all sides of the debate. Pro-capital punishment people should avoid thinking that they are the only ones who care. Those of us who are against capital punishment experience anguish and gut-rending pain when we read of children being abused and murdered. It is every bit as real for us as it is for those who are for capital punishment.

Like many people, I sometimes think what I might do if I got my hands on some of these guys, but I am still against capital punishment. It should be clearly understood that pro capital punishment people have no monopoly on the emotion which many murders generate. The debate is not about how we feel or even what as individuals we might want to do or take individual responsibility for. The debate is about the proper role of the state and society and whether there should be state directed killings.

Anti-capital punishment people should guard against the self-righteousness of pretending that they are somehow more morally advanced or civilized than those who argue for it. This is not necessarily true. Many people of goodwill feel capital punishment is a tragic necessity of life which they wish was not necessary, or they experience the cry for capital punishment as a cry for limits, for a sign that there are some things which just will not be tolerated. Even if I do not agree with it, this is understandable in a world where we are too cool by half about many life denying solutions, from nuclear war at the level of collective morality to abortion at the level of social and individual morality.

I view it as a mistake to single out this issue as the place to reclaim moral outrage as a social good. I also regard it as a mistake or a form of self-righteousness for various small "l" liberals to pat themselves on the back for being against capital punishment, as if it is all we have to do or be to become a "civilized" society, while social, economic, and military decisions which condemn millions to suffering and death are regarded as "political realities".

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to address the question about whether I should vote according to my own view or according to what the majority view in my riding might be, particularly if it is true that a majority might favour capital punishment. So far I have more letters of opposition to capital punishment than letters for it. I have run three times—in 1979, in 1980, and in 1984—each time against someone who wanted the return of capital punishment and who tried to make a big deal out of it. Each time I made it perfectly clear where I stood on capital punishment. I therefore believe that I can vote against capital punishment with a clear political as well as moral conscience in this regard.

I say two things to Members of Parliament here who might be feeling queasy about going against the will of their constituents in this regard. First, the will of their constituents is not as clear as they think it is. Let us look at what happens when we push someone who is in favour of capital punishment as I have. I know many who were in favour of it, but when asked the second, the third, and the fourth question beyond just the general question, I found that they were not as in favour of it as they really sounded. Second, I ask Members to remember that because people are basically decent, they tend to respect people who are willing to put themselves on the line and to vote according to what they think is right, in spite of the fact that their constituents might disagree with them. I have never found that to be politically debilitating in my years in this place and in three elections.

I subscribe to the traditional Tory view of the responsibility of a Member of Parliament put forward by Edmund Burke in 1774, that a Member of Parliament owes constituents the exercise of his or her judgment and must be held accountable for that judgment at election time. He said:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry alone, but his judgment, and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

Surely no one would want to argue seriously although it may be tempting when one disagrees with one's Member of Parliament, that as a rule MPs should vote in mechanical obedience to the majority view in their constituencies. Such a view overlooks the fact that part of what we are paid for as Members of Parliament is to take the time which others do not always have to study the evidence, to hear the witnesses, to read the reports, to meet the various lobby groups, to participate in the debate, to consult with our colleagues, and to vote according to our best judgment. Indeed, if Members of Parliament are only delegates doing what they are told, maybe all we need is for them to have a computer hook-up in their homes by which they can vote on everything as it comes up, without the benefit of the process which Members of Parliament now go through when they vote. I imagine that some might see this as not a bad idea, given the quality of some of the decisions we make here. However, I am not ready to declare the work I do here in Ottawa as redundant.

• (1650)

A final word, Mr. Speaker. This is a free vote. A free vote does not mean that we all receive the freedom to become Pontius Pilate. It does not mean that we all receive the freedom to do simply what the crowd wants, to ask the question what is truth and let the mob answer. A free vote means that we are given an opportunity, rare in this place, to exercise our own best judgment according to our conscience. That is what I hope all Members will do when it comes down to the vote, whenever that may be.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed, without amendment, Bill C-13, respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa

25 June 1987

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 25th day of June, 1987, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Léopold H. Amyot
Secretary to the Governor General

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm).

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie). The first one deals with the former speaker, the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). He made the statement that he supports capital punishment and always has supported it and has considered it for certain offences. He mentioned specifically today, if my memory serves me correctly, the repeat or serial killer, the person who kills over and over again. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill said that he feels that each Member of Parliament has the responsibility of voting on this issue as he or she feels on his or her conscience. Does the Hon. Member support the idea where a Member of this House supports capital punishment for certain acts of planned, deliberate murder and then votes against the motion that would allow it to be considered—

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) on a point of order.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Chair whether the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) can ask a Member for the New Democratic Party questions about a comment or speech by a Liberal Member who just spoke.

I would appreciate your advice because I doubt the Hon. Member could very well ask an NDP Member for his opinion on—

[English]

We did not say we are untouchable. I am talking about rules. Do not get aggressive. Just cool down. The Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) will not do what he is not allowed to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments should be related to the speech of the Member who spoke. I am sure the Hon. Member for Peterborough will do that when he puts his question to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie).

Mr. Rossi: That is what I was trying to drive at. The Member knows that, too.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Hon. Member who rose on a point of order, I was referring to a statement that was made and I was drawing the analogy between the statement of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill that each Member should vote on how he or she feels and whether the question would support the idea that a person can be in support of capital punishment yet vote against the motion. How can he have it both ways?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member said that he had two questions for me. Maybe he should give me the second one and I will have a crack at both of them.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member mentioned in his remarks that the homicide rate in Canada had not doubled since the last executions in 1962, which were the last occasions for executions in Canada. According to the Statistics Canada reports and the Justice Department, the homicide rate in Canada in 1962 was 1.43 per 100,000 of population. There were 265 homicides in 1962. Homicides have gone on up on a computerized graph since then and in 1985, the last complete year for which statistics are available and reported, 704 homicides were committed, giving a rate of 2.78 per 100,000 population. Is it not correct to say that homicides in Canada have doubled since the last people were executed in 1962?

Miss MacDonald: Since the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I know this statistical debate has been going on between the Hon. Member for Peterborough and almost all the rest of the world since the beginning of this debate. I do not think we are going to sort that out here this afternoon.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member is evading the question. The facts are on the records. Statistics Canada, as the Hon. Member for Peterborough has indicated, states that the rate per 100,000 was 1.43 when the Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill was 11 years old. Now he is an old man of 36. Will he not agree with figures from Statistics Canada which show the rate currently at 2.78 in 1985? That is double the rate. Admit it.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the rate has gone down since capital punishment was abolished. I would like to answer the question which the Hon. Member for Peterborough asked me concerning the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

The Hon. Member for Peterborough has been involved in politics for some time. He knows that people are often put in the position where they have to choose to vote for or against something in a way that they would prefer not to because they feel the question could be more aptly or comprehensively put, which is what the Hon. Member for York Centre said with respect to his position. Even as one who does not take the view that the Hon. Member took, I was satisfied with his explanation why he intended to vote against the motion.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I was impressed listening to the Hon. Member. His remarks statistically reminded me of something I read in The Economist just the other week, commenting on the British election. Spokespersons can use statistics to prove whichever case they want. Mrs. Thatcher could use statistics to prove that the British economy had never been better and Mr. Kinnock could use statistics to prove that it had never been worse. It seemed to hinge on which year either of them chose. I suggest that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) is an example of the same process. He chose statistics from the year when capital punishment was fully, formally and legally abolished but not the year when executions ceased.

If we take the figures from the year when the last execution took place and compare the murder rate in that year with the murder rate of last year, then we find that there has been an increase of almost 100 per cent in the homicide rate. We have had an example here of selective statistics.

May I take the time of the House to add another example of selectivity in the Member's remarks? He was very selective regarding causes for moral outrage when he cited the enormity of it on top of murder itself. I agree with him entirely. However, I noticed, unless I did not hear him correctly, the omission of one significant cause for moral outrage when it comes to human life, and that is the taking of the lives of the unborn.

I wish there had been some of that passion and some of that crescendo of emphasis on behalf of the unborn, especially those whose lives have been taken when their bodies are fully formed. Of the 65,000 abortions which occur per year, something like 15 per cent occur when the body of the foetus is fully formed. That comes to about 10,000 such abortions. I hope that the Hon. Member's moral outrage would include some concern for those human lives. The next time he has an opportunity to rise in his place and cast a vote on their behalf, I hope that he will do it as a free person, not as a person following the lead of his Party's policy.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, with respect to his last point, the Hon. Member did not listen very carefully to my speech. If he has a chance to read Hansard tomorrow, he will find that I did mention that and I hope I will hear from him then as to the appropriateness of what he just said.

I think if one were to examine my argument, one would find that it was largely non-statistical.

Mr. Stevens: You referred to 1962.

Mr. Blaikie: No, most of my argument was not based on statistics at all. I stand by what I said with respect to statistics and which statistics are relevant. I do not accept that 1962 must be taken as the benchmark, as the Hon. Member argues that it must. That is a difference the Hon. Member and I have.

With respect to the Hon. Member's comment about abortion, I would hope that the Hon. Member would give me the credit of attributing to me independent judgment when voting on that matter even though I voted differently than he did, I presume, a couple of weeks ago when we had an opportunity to vote on that matter. I voted according to my own judgment and not according to any other dictum whatsoever. It is well known in my constituency and elsewhere that I am a critic of both the pro-life position and the pro-choice position.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the House on the motion before us dealing with whether or not to reinstate capital punishment. I know that many Hon. Members on both sides of the House have already or will utilize this chance to express their views on this very important and highly volatile subject.

I would like to thank all those who have written to me and who have taken the time to make a concerted effort to write or talk to me on this matter. When the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) announced the motion in the House on February 13, he stated:

> I would expect all Canadians to make their views known through letters, briefs or meetings . . . to Members on all sides of the House.

Each of us on this side of the House may vote according to our own individual wish and not be bound by Party discipline. We appreciate this opportunity. I applaud the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who, despite his own personal opinion on the matter of capital punishment, promised this free vote and is fulfilling this promise.

In 1774, more than two centuries ago, Edmund Burke, a British MP, said:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgement: and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

He was speaking to his constituents at the time. No one here today would dare to compare himself or herself to this great philosopher, but the intention of his message is valuable to us in this debate.

When elected, a Member of Parliament's duty lies in representing the best interests of all his constituents. At the same time, we were elected for what we ourselves believed and for what we stood for. My beliefs are not a secret to my constituents.

In April 1984 when I stood for the nomination meeting for the Progressive Conservative Party in Fraser Valley East, I stated that capital punishment should be reinstated for first degree murder. My belief in that has not changed to this date.

A questionnaire that I sent to every household in my riding in December of 1984 asked this question: "Do you support capital punishment for premeditated first degree murder?" Indications were that 95 per cent of the 4,387 people who returned it voted yes.

Capital punishment is perhaps one of the most thought-provoking issues that each of us have had to face. I believe I speak for many of my colleagues when I say that I have wrestled with the pros and cons of abolishing or reinstating the penalty for some time now. I still come to the same conclusion. Capital punishment is the ultimate punishment for the ultimate crime.

Underlying all the theories which explain the purpose of criminal law is the basic premise that criminal law is the means by which society reaffirms its values and denounces its violators. These values develop to some extent in response to changing social values. Society abhors murder and anyone who intentionally, with forethought and total disregard for another individual's life, murders a person is abhorred to the same degree.

We live in a world in which at times we must make some difficult choices. The choice of reinstating capital punishment for the crime of first degree premeditated murder is a last resort and is the choice we must make with reluctance.

Abolitionists who try to use the argument that capital punishment merely perpetuates violence are incorrect and are misleading Canadians. When a person on the street takes it into his own hands to be judge, jury and executioner and murders another person intentionally, he has denied that other person the right to be tried before an independent, impartial jury. This is murder. If society gives that murderer the right to counsel, to the safeguards inherent in our criminal law system, including an impartial, objective jury and the best legal protection and then finds him guilty without doubt of that murder, that in my opinion is justice. The difference between the two is obvious.

It is fine for those opposing capital punishment to say that no system is perfect and mistakes happen. How cavalier of them to say this and in the same breath say that we cannot have capital punishment because we may kill an innocent person.

Our laws prohibit anti-social behaviour. We must count on our criminal justice system to be objective enough to deal equally with everyone. Whatever the seriousness of the crime, the protections guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply. Maximum penalties are a statement by Parliament and thus by society that the conduct of the criminal is seriously anti-social.

It is interesting to note that the offence of murder has not changed much since 1955 when the last complete revision of the Criminal Code took place. However, its classifications and related punishments have changed. I would like to outline the changes that have occurred since 1961.

In 1961, murder was classified for the first time. Distinctions were made between capital and non-capital murder, with the former being punishable by death. The clear intent at the time was to reserve the death penalty for the most calculated and direct forms of murder. These fell into three categories: planned and deliberate, death caused by own act or otherwise directly participating in the killing and finally when the victim was a peace officer, guard or similar official, whether the murder was intentional or not. In 1961, the death sentence could be commuted to nothing less than life imprisonment.

In 1967, the Act to amend the Criminal Code changed the qualification of capital murder to apply only to those who had murdered peace officers, prison guards and similar officials who were acting in the course of their duties. Every other form was delegated to non-capital and was punishable by life imprisonment.

When this amendment expired in 1972, the law reverted to the 1961 formula. In 1974 the capital and non-capital categories were changed to murder punishable by death, reserved for those who killed peace officers and prison guards; and murder punishable by life imprisonment. This lasted three years. Capital punishment was abolished in 1976 in a narrow vote in the House. It was at that time we adopted the categories of first and second degree murder. The difference between the two is in the sentencing. First degree murder, which includes planned and deliberate murder, contracted murder, and murder of a peace officer or prison guard, is punishable by life imprisonment without parole for 25 years. Since then there have been numerous Private Members' motions and Bills in favour of the reinstatement of the death penalty, but none have come to a free vote until now.

We must remember that this motion, if passed, will require a parliamentary committee to examine the issues relating to capital punishment and subsequently draft legislation to be debated in the House. The constitutional Act of 1867 gave the federal Government jurisdiction to legislate criminal law, with minor exceptions. This is what we are doing here today and have been doing for the past several days.

We should be careful with some of the information we have been hearing in this House from those who advocate the abolition of capital punishment. The year 1962 seems to be the time many are using to indicate that capital punishment does not deter or prevent murders. However, it is clear that year ends a period of time when little comprehensive data was kept. From 1956 to 1961 inclusive, 10 on-duty police officers were murdered. Unfortunately the data does not show how many cases were solved. However, it does show one of the killers committed suicide. Another was declared insane. Four more were convicted of murder.

It can be said, after examining the information available, that in the six years before 1962 two police killers were executed. In the supposed watershed year of 1962, 11 officers were killed out of a total of eight incidents involving 10 killers. Of those 10 persons charged, two were declared insane and the death penalty is not likely to deter those who are mentally ill. A third committed suicide and spent time in a mental institution. A fourth, who was responsible for killing three officers in B.C. in one incident, was shot and killed by police. He also had spent time in a mental institution. Four of the 10 killers who were responsible for six of the police officer murders in 1962 were mentally ill and probably would not have been deterred in any event. This information weakens the abolitionists' argument. No conclusion can be made against capital punishment as a deterrent factor for murder by using 1962 as the example.

Our society is not going to the dogs. We have not reached a stage where the call to reinstate capital punishment is the result of mass hysteria or hype. Canadians are looking at our criminal law and asking why rehabilitation is not working. Why are mass murderers such as Clifford Olson being allowed to receive special protection in the Kingston Penitentiary? Because the system fears for his life if he was incarcerated in the regular stream of a different maximum security prison. It has been reported that Mr. Olson himself, after confessing to his crimes, said he would not have killed those innocent children if the death penalty was in effect and enforced.

Retribution means recompense for evil done. The German philosopher Kant, in the 1800s, believed that the only proper reason for punishment was the service of strict justice. The only just punishment for the unpardonable crime of murder is proportionate to that crime. Using that philosophical framework, I reiterate that with our system of criminal law, the person charged with and proven to be guilty of first degree murder, planned and deliberate or contracted, should be eligible for the maximum penalty, death.

It seems remarkable to me that the NDP, which calls for abortion on demand, turns around and righteously states that we should not reinstate capital punishment for first degree murder. The message members of the NDP are sending out is that it is all right to destroy the life of an unborn child but do not consider putting to death someone who has been convicted of intentionally murdering an innocent person. What hypocrisy.

In closing, I must say that my conscience demands that I vote in favour of this motion. I anxiously await the rest of the debate and hopefully the upcoming legislation from the parliamentary committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member a couple of questions based on his closing remarks in which he drew on the philosophy of the German philosopher Immanuel Kant. This relates to the concept of the appropriateness of punishment.

I wonder if the Hon. Member would feel his view that the death penalty is an appropriate punishment for first degree murder is extendible to other degrees of criminal offences? If they are not, I would like him to explain clearly why he is prepared to tolerate this inconsistency in his own views? Is the Hon. Member then in favour of such things as amputations for those who wound or physically hurt another person? Is he in favour of stealing from the thief? Does he not appreciate the inconsistency of applying that rigorous logic to one category of offence and not to any other of a number of offences?

In addition, I would like the Hon. Member to address the question of the company of nations which the reintroduction of capital punishment in Canada would put us in. Does he have any particular admiration or feeling of solidarity with regimes such as those of Iraq, the Soviet Union, Albania, China and Iran, as well as numerous states in the United States, where capital punishment is in effect? Does he really feel that is appropriate international company for this country to be counted with?

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, we have degrees of punishment for degrees of crime. I said that for planning and carrying out the taking of someone's life, the person who did so would have to forfeit his or her own life. I do not see any inconsistency there with the rest of our laws.

As to whether or not we should be comparing ourselves to other countries, I find in passing strange that the very Party which seems to take great delight in supporting the Socialist Soviet Union—

Mr. Parry: Rubbish.

Mr. Rossi: Talk about capital punishment.

Mr. Belsher: He asked a question and I will answer it. He finds that part of their law repugnant. Nevertheless, we do not base our laws on what other countries are doing. We have to shape our laws for the situation we have here in Canada.

I find it very strange that when you ask many abolitionists if there are any crimes for which they would be in favour of having capital punishment as the penalty, many of them will say, yes, if it was just for that crime. Just a few minutes ago we heard an Hon. Member say that he could see capital punishment being brought back for repeat offenders. However, he was planning to vote against the motion the way it is.

I for one want to see it brought back for a very limited number of crimes. Many people have used the argument of the sanctity of life and therefore they cannot vote for capital punishment. I, too, value the sanctity of life but the sanctity of life can be demonstrated in no better way than putting on the books the penalty for those convicted of premeditated murder. It is very difficult to prove that murder is premeditated. I do not believe there will be many people executed if capital punishment is put back on the books, but it should be on the books as a deterrent in order to save lives.

• (1720)

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, on two previous occasions in this House, in 1973 and again in 1976, I voted for the abolition of the death penalty. This time I decided not to rely merely on my past point of view but to rethink and reconsider my position carefully and seriously. I decided to do so to see whether there were any good and substantial reasons to justify changing my mind.

I stand for effective law and order in our society. I abhor all acts of violence and, most especially, I am repulsed and angered by violent and criminal acts against children, women, elderly people, and all other peaceful, non-violent persons who have done nothing to provoke or invite acts of terror or horror upon themselves.

I am for law and order. I believe that our police forces should be sufficiently strong in numbers and effective in the enforcement of law to prevent as much violence as possible. Our nation must have a system of justice, including punishment, which while always protecting the innocent does not allow the guilty to laugh in our faces, to be set free on technicalities or after serving only token periods of time in prison. I believe these things, especially with reference to those who think that their problems or their way of life can be resolved or eased by way of violent acts.

During the debate on capital punishment in June of 1976 the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, said:

> It is clear that the protection of innocent people against assaults on their lives and liberty is one of the highest duties of the state. It is equally clear that this duty requires the aggressive and effective prevention, prosecution and punishment of criminal violence.
> It is essential that people have confidence in the law, essential that they have confidence in the ability of the legal process to protect them against the lawless.

I ask the House, however, whether reinstatement of the death penalty will help in any way to give us a better and a safer society. Will it accomplish what its advocates claim it will, that is, bring down the murder rate and make the streets safer? Will it reduce the number of violent acts in our nation?

There is a widespread belief among Canadians that a very high percentage of all crimes committed are violent. In fact, according to Statistics Canada, violent crime comprises only about 8 per cent of all crimes and homicides less than 1 per cent of all violent crime. More than one-third of all murders occur within a domestic situation in the victim's very own home. These statistics do not in any way lessen the seriousness of the problem of violence in general or murder in particular, but they do place the problem in some reasonable perspective.

It distresses me that so many who advocate the death penalty as the answer to violence in society seem, at the same time, to place so little emphasis on prevention. For example, in the constituency which I represent, there are two young people who have developed an excellent school program on violence in the home and in interpersonal relationships. Programs such as these can help so much to avoid violent acts. However, the two young people in question are experiencing great difficulty getting the funding they need to take their program to more schools and present it to a larger number of students.

Is it not curious, Sir, that if we are concerned about violence there are no resources available for a program such as this which can prevent acts of violence in the home and among those who interrelate one with the other? Dr. Nora Volkow, a Texas psychiatrist, recently told a medical conference that one-half of all violent crimes are committed by people who may have brain defects that are treatable with medicine. Murder committed by someone with a mental disorder is not culpable homicide. In the past, when the death penalty was in effect, our Criminal Code described capital murder as being planned and deliberate. Even with the death penalty, then, we do not execute sick people. Is it not entirely possible that a serious brain defect, a mental disorder of one kind or another, could go undetected and such a person could be executed?

Our system of justice is not established on the principle of vengeance. Capital punishment was generally accepted throughout the world for many centuries mainly because of the desire for vengeance as well as the recognition of the sovereign right to inflict death in the name of society. At one time many crimes were punishable by death but gradually in most western democratic societies there came to be only one capital offence, that is, deliberate, planned homicide.

Following World War II, with its shocking record of the holocaust, its bombing of civilian populations, the use of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, there was a strong reaction throughout the western world to officially-sanctioned death. The universal declarations of human rights of 1948 recognized the rights and the dignity of man.

So, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that while our system of justice is not established on the principle of vengeance, neither is it built on the Christian ideal of turning the other cheek. Punishments are meant to be deterrents and there is no doubt in my mind that capital punishment is a deterrent. Most forms of punishment are deterrents, even fines for parking violations. Have you ever witnessed someone rushing out of a meeting in order to put another quarter in the meter?

The question then becomes whether such a drastic form of punishment as the death penalty is an effective deterrent—not whether it is a deterrent alone, but whether it is effective. Is it, for example, more effective than life imprisonment? Studies to date lead one to the conclusion that the death penalty does not have any demonstrable deterrent effect greater than that of life imprisonment. United Nations data confirm the view that abolition of the death penalty does not appreciably increase the incidence of crime.

I have heard the argument, of course, that using the death penalty is more economical than keeping people in prison. That being so, it is entirely logical to ask why not then increase the number of capital crimes and save not only a little money but a great deal. Obviously, even to pose such a question is absurd. Capital punishment can never be reintroduced on the basis of being part of any Government's program of economic restraint. In fact, executions can be extremely costly when all of the different aspects are factored in, including trials, appeals, seeking pardons and so on. At least one U.S. District Attorney has acknowledged for the record that it would be cheaper to send the killers to jail than to execute them. But then he went on to say: "But with some horrible violent crimes even if it costs more, it is worth it to put them to death". That surely is the question for this House: Is it worth it to put them to death?

• (1730)

Some of those who have witnessed executions think otherwise. Recently I took part in a panel discussion on capital punishment which was held in the City of Yellowknife. One woman there told the group that her father, an RCMP officer, once had to witness a hanging as part of his duty. He was ill for many weeks thereafter and he became a strong abolitionist as a result.

A U.S. journalist who won the draw to witness an execution said later:

> Until you see it, you don't understand how gruesome it is, what tremendous responsibility it is . . . you have to block out the fact that this was a killing, not a death. What it said was people are junk, and if you don't believe it, just watch this.

Professor Ken L. Avio of the University of Victoria in Victoria, British Columbia, in a study entitled "The Quality of Mercy: Exercise of the Royal Prerogative in Canada", has noted that those who actually did hang in Canada when capital punishment existed tended to be a limited group, more likely to be male, more likely to be an aboriginal person. Other groups which were more likely than others to die if convicted of murder were a labourer, a French Canadian, or a person whose origins were eastern European.

As well, whether clemency was granted or not depended on the number of homicides committed while one's case was being considered. If one was on death row when a number of murders took place, one would more likely hang than if one's case was being examined during a more quiescent period.

The Assembly of First Nations has written to all Members of Parliament, opposing the death penalty. The letter, signed by the National Chief, George Erasmus, says in part:

> The death penalty is uncivilized, heathen, barbaric and unworthy of—a reasonable people. There is evidence all over the world that the death penalty is not an effective deterrent to the heinous offences upon which it follows. The legal system is not without failure and innocent persons have been put to death by the state.
> There is further evidence that First Nations' citizens have been and are being punished by the Canadian state in disproportionate numbers and could be the most victims of a restored death penalty.

Former U.K. Speaker George Thomas, in his book Mr. Speaker tells of two murders which were committed on the same night in the Aberavon constituency at a time when Great Britain still had capital punishment. One murder was brutal, unprovoked and involved an innocent young girl. The other murder was by a young man of his girl-friend. The latter confessed and pleaded that it had been entirely accidental, having taken place on a lonely mountain road during a love-making encounter.

One of these young men was Roman Catholic and the other was Protestant. Both were found guilty and sentenced to death. A request for clemency was made on behalf of the young man who pleaded that an accident occurred. The British Home Secretary refused to exercise the Royal Prerogative of mercy in the one case where there was justification because he feared offending one of the two major religions in the United Kingdom. If one was Protestant and the other was Roman Catholic, then both must hang and they both did.

Speaker George Thomas writes:

> When Chuter Ede left the Home Office he told the Commons that he had changed his mind about capital punishment. As I listened to him say that the case of Timothy Evans, whose innocence was proved after he had been hanged, had made him opposed to the death penalty, I recalled my own unhappy dealing with him and wondered if the boy from Aberavon was also on his conscience.

I have faced some criticism at home because I did not take a straw vote on capital punishment. However, one newspaper in my riding did and there was a 1 per cent return and a near split decision. I want to say that I am not opposed in any way to a measure of direct democracy in our country. If we wish to use referendums more often, I am not against that. However, I ask Members who do not usually poll their constituents about other matters such as tax increases, free trade, or constitutional amendments why they choose the single issue of capital punishment and ask their constituents to become involved in this process?

Even if I were to take a straw vote in the constituency I represent, how valid would the results really be? A satisfactory referendum involves using full election apparatus, not merely mailing out a householder with a tear-off card which is no more than a pseudo-ballot. The results are entirely and completely inconclusive, proving nothing about the attitude of the people who live in that region or constituency.

No, I tell you that our system of democracy is to the greater degree representative in nature and it is I who must stand here in my place soon and make a decision regarding life and regarding death. It is a matter of conscience. Since I myself could never be an executioner, and since I would never want to witness a hanging which my vote, in part, may cause, I must therefore oppose the death penalty and I will vote against this motion.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, it was quite interesting listening to the Hon. Member. I respect him because he has convictions.

Does he believe that the state has a responsibility to defend the security and liberty of an individual? For instance, does the state have an obligation to defend the nation from outside invasion?

Does the Hon. Member believe that we must have armed forces that defend liberty and security of the individual? If he agrees, can he explain why he does not agree that the state has the obligation to protect the liberty and security of an individual inside the country, when the threat comes from within, whether it is terrorism or hired killers? In each instance, the state has to kill.

When there is war, the state has the obligation to defend the liberty and security of the individual. There is killing. Similarly, when someone takes an innocent life, or there is terrorism, does the state have the right to protect its citizens?

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, that is an entirely reasonable and fair question. I gather from the question that the Member was not here to listen to the first part of my speech.

In the first part of my speech I placed emphasis on the need for law and order in society, for an effective system of justice and for punishments in order that the number of violent acts could be reduced.

Then I asked the question about whether or not something as drastic as capital punishment would in fact achieve what its advocates said it would, namely a safer, better society with less violence? I used all the evidence I could muster to show that, in fact, the death penalty does not do that.

The Hon. Member asks me if I believe that we need a standing army to protect our society in the event of a war? I say of course. However, I return that question to my hon. friend and ask him: Do we go to war if we do not examine first all the other alternatives? Before we go to war do we not examine the possibility of negotiating a peace, some kind of compromise which would prevent us from a head-on conflict, death and destruction? Of course we do. We try to avoid war at all cost because we know the results are so drastic and irreversible in many instances.

I say it is the same thing within our society. Do we need something so drastic as the death penalty when there are other alternatives which are equally effective and yet do not carry all the dangers and consequences which the death penalty has upon our society?

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the Hon. Member says, but on the other hand, if we compromise to get peace at all costs, what will happen? We had this type of compromise in the 1930s. Mr. Chamberlain tried to compromise with Hitler. The result was that 30 million people were killed. So we cannot compromise on principle because we can be pushed too far. Does the Hon. Member believe there is too much of a compromise on that one point?

Mr. Penner: The Hon. Member talks about the need to compromise to avoid war and sometimes it does not work, but surely the Hon. Member is not saying that matters ought never to be taken before the Security Council of the United Nations Organization to see whether a confrontation between two sovereign states can somehow be avoided, that somehow the United Nations can intervene and prevent war? That is a kind of compromise, a kind of peace-making operation which every Hon. Member would encourage.

I say that within our own society there are other ways of dealing with violence. We should have more programs to prevent violence in the home and among people who know each other—where most of the violence takes place, by the way—and we can have a more effective justice system to ensure that people who commit violent acts do not laugh in the face of society, thinking they can do it again and again. There are many, many alternatives before we, as the representatives of the people of this country, would have to say that we have exhausted all possibilities in dealing with crime in our society, that we have no more answers and, therefore, we must reintroduce the death penalty.

If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher) came to this House and said: "There is nothing more we can do. Nothing works. We still have violence in our society, therefore, we must use execution", then they would have a convincing case and a person like myself would have to reconsider. But I suggest to the Hon. Member and to the House that we have not exhausted all the alternatives. There is so much more we can do. We have not even begun to seriously deal with violence in a civilized society. Until we have exhausted every single alternative, why would we turn to something as drastic, dramatic and final as the death penalty as an answer to this problem?

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government House Leader what business he intends to call for the next several days.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, again I can advise my hon. friend that, as he is aware, we have had a very productive House Leaders' meeting. We have reached agreement on the order of business for the next couple of days. Tomorrow we will begin with Bill C-60, the Copyright Act, followed by Bill C-21, the Shippers Conference Exemption Act, followed by Bill C-42, the Finance Bill, followed by Bill C-56, another Financial Institutions Bill, followed by Bill C-66, the Veterans Affairs Bill, followed by Bill C-64, the Income Tax Act and Bill C-63 the Small Business Act. If that is finished, we will go on to Bill C-70.

On Monday we will call the capital punishment debate again. On Tuesday we will call Bill C-71, that is the amendment to the Criminal Code flowing out of the Deschenes Report, Bill C-70, WHMS Bill, that is the Workmans Hazardous Materials Bill, Bill C-69, the Customs Tariff Bill.

A Bill will be introduced with respect to the farm improvement loans, I believe, tomorrow. That will be considered. It will be followed, hopefully, by Bill C-62. I understand there may be some problems with that, but if we can work those out, we would like to deal with that Bill. Then Bill C-62, which is a debt relief Bill, and Bill C-61 and Bill C-51. Bill C-61 is on proceeds from crime and we would like to move that into committee if possible, and Bill C-51, the Tobacco Bill.

It is a fairly light agenda and with co-operation, tolerance and understanding, I am sure we can get through all this and perhaps adjourn before the regular hour of ten o'clock.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. House Leader that if tomorrow we go through Bill C-60, Bill C-21, Bill C-42, Bill C-56, Bill C-66, Bill C-64 and Bill C-70, do we understand that if they were not to be passed, they would be taking their place on Tuesday next week, or will they be eliminated and we would start next Tuesday with Bill C-71? If such was the case, I would like to know to prepare myself accordingly to speak on some of these very important Bills. Will there be a legislative committee for some? Will they be dealt with here? What exactly are we saying yes to today? I would like to know the rules.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Hon. Member is saying yes to nothing. I am simply outlining the order of business and it is subject to change. The details have been worked out with the House Leaders and perhaps the Hon. Member may want to consult with his House Leader.

We would hope that we would be able to dispose of those pieces of legislation. If we do not complete all the agenda I proposed for Friday, it will obviously be carried over until Tuesday. I would hope that we might be able to conclude the capital punishment debate on Monday.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (1800)

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

Bill C-50, an Act respecting the treatment of pension payments in determining certain unemployment insurance benefit entitlements and to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971—Chapter No. 17.

Bill C-59, an Act to provide for payments in respect of exploration for or development of lands for the production of hydrocarbons in Canada other than coal—Chapter No. 18.

Bill C-13, an Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada—Chapter No. 19.

Bill C-65, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988—Chapter No. 20.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) on debate.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this very important debate in the history of this Parliament. It is a debate that is in response to a commitment made by the Progressive Conservative Party to have the matter of capital punishment brought before the House, thus enabling Members to deal with this issue which is very serious and important to many Canadians.

I support that process, Mr. Speaker, because I believe there is a role for Parliament in dealing with difficult issues facing the country. Notwithstanding that I, as a Private Member of this House of Commons, hold very strong views in opposition to the restoration of the death penalty, I do appreciate the fact that Parliament should have the opportunity to be seized of issues of great national interest and importance. I do not believe anything is accomplished in attempting to ignore the very strong interest that exists on the part of the Canadian people on this particular issue.

Having agreed, as a matter of Party policy, to this process, I have to inform the House again of my very strong feelings in opposition to the motion before us.

It was 11 years ago last Monday, Mr. Speaker, that I stood in the House of Commons and voted in favour of the abolition of the death penalty in Canada. I voted in favour of abolition because at that time my analysis and assessment indicated to me that, in terms of public policy, there was no basis for the death penalty in Canadian society and in Canadian law.

I speak now, as I did then, as a Private Member. This is an issue on which we all have the opportunity to vote on conscience, without our respective Whips calling for a vote one way or the other.

My position on this question has not changed since the time of the 1976 vote. I want to explain once again to Members of this House and the Canadian public why I think that any move to restore capital punishment would be a retrograde step for our society and for our laws.

In 1976 I believed the death penalty to be wrong. I was proud to have had the opportunity to play a part in what I regarded as an important step in the evolution of Canadian law, of Canadian society. That evolution should not now be allowed to slide back, to devolve, or in fact to digress. In 1987 I still hold the view that the state should have no power to sanction the execution of criminals. It is my hope that the continuing evolution of Canadian law will build on the strengths and important steps we have taken over the years.

In my role as a Minister of the Crown, and specifically as the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, I can assure Hon. Members that I strive, as far as is humanly possible, to play a role in this continuing evolution.

There were many reasons for my vote in favour of abolition 11 years ago, and as I review them today I find that these reasons are at least equally as strong, if not stronger and more appropriate today than then.

It is important for all of us to reflect on the fact that 11 years ago this country abolished the death penalty. Our experience over the period since 1976 should speak to our hearts and to our logic.

At the time there were many who suggested that the abolition of capital punishment would lead to dire consequences in terms of the administration of justice in our country. The people of Canada and Members of Parliament who consider what has happened in our country over that period of time will come to the realization that indeed we have not seen a deterioration of the situation that existed at the time. In fact I think the statistics bear out the contention that is made—and it is one which I make—that there has been a reduction in the homicide rate in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, first we all know that our system of justice is human. Like our greatest institutions it was created by men and women. However motivated and animated by a sincere and deep desire for justice as they may very well be, they are only human. Being human implies that one can err and fail.

[English]

That the essential humanity of our courts can lead to mistakes, Mr. Speaker, convinces me that it is too dangerous to apply the irrevocable measure of death to the verdict of a court. Members of this House do not need to be reminded of the incidents of wrongful convictions that have in fact occurred in the past. We as a society can attempt to compensate those we wrongfully convicted and imprisoned; however, we cannot restore a life once taken. Errors by eye-witnesses, by the police, by defence counsel, by prosecutors and by judges have been made, and will continue to be made, and it is this essential fact that makes the death penalty the awesome and terrible instrument that it is.

No one should feel content that something so unpredictable as a murder trial should be allowed to end in a mistake that might only be rectified after the death of an innocent man or woman.

There is no room, in my view, Mr. Speaker, for retribution or vengeance in the sentencing of a criminal. I acknowledge, and would share at a personal level, the anger and frustration and bitterness one experiences when a loved one is murdered. The desire for revenge would be great with respect to such an atrocity. But, as Members of Parliament involved in the development of public policy, we have to ask ourselves whether or not we want to arm the state with the right to put to death a citizen of our country. This is a fundamental principle and one which should receive careful consideration before a decision is taken.

While we may decide today that the death penalty would be available for a given offence, or two offences, given the way in which the House of Commons and representative government operates, one could not be assured that, in the future, the offences for which the death penalty would be available would not be increased.

So, we have a heavy burden in forming the proper policy to apply to all Canadians, and it is one of which we must never lose sight. To operate only on a visceral basis, an emotional basis, may lead to a disastrous and wrong decision.

What should be the role of the criminal law in our society in Canada? Certainly, deterrence, protection of the public, and rehabilitation are indeed the proper goals in delineating the best policy. These are the pillars on which the criminal law and the law on sentencing should indeed stand. I believe that criminal justice penalties, and especially the ultimate one, must be demonstrated to be such that they deter the criminal activity they are directed toward.

I know that the statistics, Mr. Speaker, have been referred to many times through the course of this debate. One thing is clear, and that is that an analysis of the facts that have been brought to our attention does not demonstrate, does not prove that the death penalty is a deterrent.

A review of recent statistics shows that the murder rate, as I indicated earlier in my remarks, is declining in Canada today.

• (1810)

We have experienced a period of time in which there has been no death penalty. On the basis of the activity in this vibrant and growing country of which we all can be proud, there has not been an increase in the incidence of murders and homicides. In 1986 the homicide rate fell to a 15-year low. Last year the rate declined by 20 per cent. First degree murder has declined by nearly 25 per cent in the last two years.

I want to examine the experience not only in Canada but in adjacent jurisdictions. What has been the situation in the United States? It has been shown that abolitionist states have equal or lower homicide rates than adjacent retentionist states.

Let us review the last year for which we have statistics in this regard, 1983. In the United States the average homicide rate for all states was 8.3 per 100,000 people. Texas and Louisiana showed rates of 14.2 per 100,000 population, and these two states have the death penalty. West Virginia, which is an abolitionist state, had a homicide rate of 4.9 per 100,000, while its neighbour, Virginia, a state in which there is capital punishment, had a rate of 7.0. These are adjacent states with similar demographies or similar populations, yet we find a dramatic difference in terms of their homicide rates.

Let me deal with some other examples. Iowa, an abolitionist state, had a homicide rate half that of Indiana which has capital punishment. Iowa's rate was 2.2 and Indiana's was 4.9. Maine, which has no death penalty, had a rate of 2.1 per 100,000 population, and Vermont had a rate of 3.6, a state in which there is capital punishment. North Dakota, an abolitionist state, had the same 2.1 rate as South Dakota, a retentionist state.

These figures underline the fact that in adjacent states, one with capital punishment and the other without it, the rates are at least the same. In many cases the rate in abolitionist states is below that in states with the death penalty. Oregon, an abolitionist state, had 4.1 and Washington, which has the death penalty, had a rate of 4.9. The murder rate in Florida has increased since the restoration of capital punishment. That is the record of that state.

I also have some international statistics which I think should be interesting to the Canadian public and to Members of the House. We should remember that the United Nations has called for the eventual abolition of the death penalty worldwide. This international body has the opportunity to examine regimes and strife in various parts of the globe. It has a first-hand opportunity to observe the consequences and effects of capital punishment. The countries which make up the United Nations are for the abolition of the death penalty.

Having dealt with the United States, I think it is important for us to understand that as a western democracy we are in the same position as other western democracies. All western European countries, by way of example, have abolished capital punishment, with the exception of Belgium and Ireland. I should point out, however, that no executions have occurred in Belgium since 1945 and in Ireland since 1954. We must understand what kind of country we want in terms of this particular law and the sanctions we are imposing in respect of our criminal law.

I acknowledge that the death penalty exists behind the Iron Curtain. It is a constant, ultimate penalty in Iron Curtain countries. I acknowledge that in the Middle East there is a very wide range of countries which in fact have the death penalty.

I make no comment in respect of this matter, except to point out that we in Canada should set our objectives at the highest possible standard of decency, humanity, and compassion in terms of our policies and our law, particularly our criminal law. It is important to see the experience of those countries with whom we most relate in terms of the death penalty. Such a comparison commends itself to the House.

In terms of the protection of the public, I believe this important facet of criminal law can be achieved by the alternative—imprisonment for life for those who commit atrocities. As a parliamentarian and a lawyer, I join with other Members of the House in the hope for further and continued evolution in law in the areas of sentencing and corrections to ensure the protection of all Canadians.

As we debate the issue today, we have before us some very interesting and intensive studies in respect of the whole question of criminal law. We are looking at suggestions of fundamental changes in our criminal law. Recently a report on sentencing by the Archambault Commission was tabled in the House which contained far-reaching and wide-ranging recommendations respecting the whole area of parole, sentencing, and protection of the public, a consideration which was given a great deal of attention by the commission.

At the present time the federal Government is taking the lead and is working with provincial Attorneys-General in looking at these recommendations with some priority to determine what we in Canada can do to improve the protection of the general public.

I see that I am nearing the end of my time. I want to make only two or three final points. When current opinion polls reflect the majority's desire to return to the death penalty, I think often it is a reflection of the frustration sometimes felt by average Canadian citizens in respect of our criminal justice system. I believe we have it within our ability to make changes in Parliament to alleviate the apprehension and concern of many Canadians. In doing that, and not reverting to the symbolic gesture of returning to the death penalty, we will be serving society and truly dealing with the issue.

I will not deal with the question of whether or not we have an obligation in respect of rehabilitation in the criminal justice system. If this is to be a signal that we have given up on that particular objective, it would certainly be a sad day for Canada.

Some issues transcend the use of cold hard numbers. Sometimes our intuition or our visceral feelings coincide with empirical research. I recall our former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, a great advocate, lawyer, and Canadian, who led the defence in many murder trials in Saskatchewan, once said that the existence of the death penalty resulted in more acquittals by juries than his own efforts as a lawyer.

I note that a recent research study by University of Toronto psychologist, Professor Jonathon Freedman, came to the same conclusion. There has also been released recent research data collected by Amnesty International in its publication entitled "On the Death Penalty in the United States", which indicated an even more disturbing point, that the racial background of the accused and the victim can influence the outcome of a trial and that certain visible minorities are disproportionately and adversely affected by the trial process.

Some have argued in favour of the restoration of the death penalty by use of an economic argument. Have our notions of justice become so impoverished that dollars and cents enter the equation when a life is in the balance?

It is inconsistent to use state sanctioned killing to punish the crime of murder. The state must, by its example, show that there is no place for violence in our society. Violence begets violence. Violence in our society should not be answered by violence by the state. I believe that the return to the death penalty would be the ultimate act of despair by our justice system.

In conclusion, I find the arguments against the deliberate act of judicial killing compelling. Further, and more fundamentally, I find my answer to this question comes from my sense of what is morally correct and from the force of my own conscience. We must stand in our places and be counted. Nothing since 1976 has convinced me that this penalty should be reinstated. My sense of duty also compels me to urge my fellow Members of this Parliament to examine the arguments, to search their hearts and their minds to consider whether or not we as legislators, as policy makers, as representatives of the people of Canada but also as individuals with a duty to use our best judgment, to vote our conscience, think now is the time to allow the shadow of the scaffold to fall again across this land.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, earlier this year, I believe in January or February, the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) in speaking to an organization indicated that he believed Canadians had lost confidence in our criminal justice system. He was not alone in that comment because shortly after that the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, the Hon. Ian Scott, made a similar statement saying that Canadians have lost confidence in our criminal justice system. To me those were very shocking admissions coming from the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for maintaining our criminal justice system and making sure that Canadians have confidence in it, and coming from the Attorney General of one of the largest provinces, if not the largest province, who also has responsibility for making sure that the criminal justice system of the land is administered in the Province of Ontario so that people have confidence in it.

The Minister tonight has indicated that he is for a stiffening up in the system—if I get him correctly. I will not put words in his mouth, I want to hear what he has to say—and he urged that there should be life imprisonment. Life imprisonment means a lot of different things to a lot of different people. In law now it is supposed to mean 25 years with parole after that. But with the recent Chartrand case involving a first degree police murderer, that may very well mean parole after only 15 years. A lot of other people believe that life imprisonment should mean just that, life imprisonment, and no parole.

We have as well in the mix, to which the Hon. Minister referred, a variety of studies, some of which have been completed and some of which are under way. The Law Reform Commission of Canada has undertaken a variety of studies, some of which are still under way. That commission referred to the question of the massive changes in the Criminal Code and it has also recommended changes in sentencing procedures. The Archambault Commission to which the Minister of Justice referred has recommended changes in sentencing. But the Hon. Minister knows very well that Archambault did not suggest life imprisonment should mean life imprisonment or that life imprisonment should mean 25 years in prison, or that a person should be subject to parole earlier than 25 years in prison.

In addition to that, the Correctional Law Review is under way. Reading the documentation being put out would lead one to believe that the Correctional Law Review might come to an entirely different conclusion from what the Law Reform Commission has come to, from what the Canadian Sentencing Commission has come to and from what the National Parole Board has determined. The latter also has a study under way on how we can change the system of sentencing and parole to give Canadians more confidence in the system so that they will not lack faith in the criminal justice system in Canada.

What does the Minister mean when he says that he is favour of life in prison as an alternative to the death penalty? Has he come to any conclusions at all—I suspect that he may not have, quite frankly—but if he has, does he really think that he has a plan to reassure Canadians that we have a criminal justice system which is workable, effective, one which will make Canadians feel good when they sit watching television at home at night?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the very comprehensive overview of the Hon. Member with respect to a number of initiatives and studies. He has addressed himself to two or three main points. I want to try to be direct with him and not take up too much time in the event of other questions.

Starting in the reverse, I know one thing. I know that whatever is the public perception with respect to the adequacy of our criminal justice system, restoration of the death penalty is not the answer. I believe that with my entire being and heart. To suggest that somehow the restoration of the death penalty will cure all the ills in our criminal justice system, I think the Hon. Member would be the first one to agree that that is simply an untenable position for us to take as a justification for moving on this debate.

I was responding in the context not only of capital punishment but also with respect to the support which seemed to me to be rising in our country for vigilantism, for operating outside the constraints of law.

There are many reasons why public perception is that way. It does not altogether have to do with reality, with whether our system is operating properly. It is the public perception more often than not that causes people to think that something is definitely wrong. People are exposed night after night and day after day to violence on TV. People read the newspaper and know that the only news that will be reported is the aberrant activities of some misguided soul in our country.

Success stories in our criminal justice system get no coverage at all either in the popular press or throughout the electronic media, or very rarely. I should not be too categorical. It may be human nature for reporters to bring that kind of an incident to our attention because it is aberrant and unusual. It is not what Canadians understand their personal lives to be. If that is the case, then I say, yes, we have a lot of work to do. We have it within our capacity in the House of Commons to improve society. I have no great illusions that we are all a bunch of Winston Churchills here who are going to change the destiny of the world. But we can work together to improve our system. I believe that firmly and I believe that we have that attitude in this House.

When the Hon. Member asked me about life imprisonment, that is the law now. I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that there are provisions for application for parole to take place at a certain time. This is not an ironclad guarantee that people will be released from custody. I was addressing that question in the context of protection of the public. Life imprisonment is now the penalty for murder. In certain cases there is no right at all of application to appeal until 25 years of that sentence have been served. If we are going to improve the situation, we should look at what we must do in terms of incarceration, parole and all these matters, to protect Canadians. We should devote our attention to that, and not to restoring the death penalty.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I hope I will have the time which could not be given to the other speaker, although 10 minutes . . . First I want to commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) for the position he has taken. I have a question for him because I am somewhat confused by the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), knowing full well that capital punishment was abolished in 1976. Now everybody knows that the Prime Minister is against capital punishment, yet he is the one who brought back the debate on the death penalty. Since the Minister of Justice belongs to Cabinet perhaps he is in on the great secrets, because I am confused; the Prime Minister is against capital punishment, capital punishment has been abolished, yet he re-opens the debate. So I wonder if he might give me an answer where they say:

• (1830)

[English]

> That was a fine speech delivered Monday night by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney on the death penalty. He called it "repugnant," "unacceptable" and "abhorrent" and finished with a ringing declaration: "We uphold one principle—the inherent dignity of a human being, the inherent worth of human life. I will resist with all my strength, all my life, any action that would diminish that reality, that would lessen that human value."—
> The answer, of course, is that Mulroney was trapped by a pledge he made during the Progressive Conservative leadership campaign in 1983. In an effort to win votes from Tory delegates who favoured the restoration of capital punishment, Mulroney promised a "free vote" on the matter in Parliament if he became Prime Minister. Once he was elected, certain backbench Tories wouldn't let him forget this pledge. It serves Mulroney right. Unfortunately, the country is paying for his sins with a divisive, time-consuming, ghoulish debate that is ultimately headed nowhere.

[Translation]

I want to ask . . . The Conservative Members do not like this, but I want to ask the Minister of Justice who knows the secrets of the inner sanctum, I repeat the question: Why did the Prime Minister, who has always been against capital punishment, who knows capital punishment has been abolished; however why would he re-open the debate on capital punishment? Why?

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, our Party has been on record not since 1983 but since the 1970s that it has been our policy that we believed the House of Commons should have the opportunity to address this particular issue.

Mr. Rossi: Why did he bring it back?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We have not brought it back. We have brought a debate onto the floor of the House of Commons on an issue that is of immense importance to many Canadians. I addressed this at the outset of my remarks.

I think we are deluding ourselves if we as parliamentarians think that we can somehow shuffle important issues under the rug. I think Parliament is here for open debate.

I respect the position the Hon. Member took prior to this year and I appreciate even more the fact that he has now changed his mind and is now supportive of the continued abolition of capital punishment. His record as a police officer and as a citizen has been exemplary, so I commend him for that.

I do not commend the Hon. Member for attempting to slide important issues under the rug, for saying that parliamentarians should not be allowed to debate important issues of our times. I do not think that it takes a Rhodes scholar to understand that if people feel that important issues are not brought before the House of Commons, they will not only lose faith in our criminal justice system but they will lose faith in our democratic institutions.

That is why I, as a person who fervently believes in the continued abolition of capital punishment, feel that it is important from time to time for us as parliamentarians to have it out, to look it straight in the face and say that we again reject capital punishment now and will reject it the next time it comes up. The freedom of speech and the freedom of a representative assembly such as ours dictate that we must address important issues and address them when the people of Canada want us to address them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald).

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I rose before the Liberal Member to ask a question on two occasions and was not recognized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the Hon. Member for a question after the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) speaks.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to be taking part in a debate on what I consider to be a very retrograde measure. I am sorry that Canada is considering the reintroduction of capital punishment after it had finally been abolished in the last decade. I am sorry that we are joining countries that are thinking of reintroducing it.

In 1962 the last hangings took place in Canada in the Don Jail which is in my riding. In 1966 a four-year moratorium on hanging was begun after there had been a series of reprieves. That moratorium was renewed in 1971, and in 1976 Canada finally abolished the death penalty for murder on a very close vote, but we took that extremely important step at that time and I am very concerned that we not take this step backward. I want to advance arguments both moral and practical on this issue.

Fundamentally, my argument is a moral one. I do not think the state should take life. I believe that the right of self-defence exists, but in the case of an execution which is by definition a situation in which there is no immediate risk to anyone, certainly self-defence does not exist.

We live in a rich society. We are at peace with our neighbours. We are not at risk and do not have any of the excuses for executions that another society or another time might have advanced. We are a very privileged country in that respect.

The murder rate in Canada is a relatively low one by world standards. Canada is not a highly violent society and there are many measures that we could take to make our society less violent without going back to the death penalty.

Many people have written us to give us their views and I very much appreciate hearing from so many people who are now opposing the death penalty. I am very pleased to see the leadership role that churches, synagogues and religious leaders have shown in presenting their arguments. However, we have also received letters containing such arguments as people quoting the Bible in defence of the death penalty. As a practising Christian, I am shocked by this and I want to examine some of these arguments.

We have heard it said that there should be an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. This is somehow taken to be an endorsation of capital punishment. It is not an endorsation of capital punishment, it was a limitation on a system of revenge which very often went far beyond the initial crime.

There are instances in the Bible of people who were themselves criminals but were forgiven for their crimes, not punished. There is a whole list of such people. If we began to use the Bible as the guide to what we should do as a House of Commons in Canada today, I note that there are 18 offences listed in the Old Testament for which the capital penalty is the stipulated punishment. These offences include, apart from murder which is on the list, striking a parent, reviling a parent, adultery, incest, homosexuality, possession of a vicious ox which gores someone to death and failing to control it, witchcraft, bestiality, sacrificing to another god, working on the Sabbath, giving children to Molech, calling up ghosts, blasphemy, the rejection of a decision of a priest, the disobedience of a son who is a wastrel or a drunkard, and false testimony resulting in the death of someone accused of one of the above offences.

I suggest to those who want to quote the Old Testament as the source of guidance on this subject that we would have to be consistent, but that is obviously quite preposterous. No one seriously suggests that we institute capital punishment for all those offences in our society today.

I note as well that the law of the time provided extensive restraints on the use of the death penalty. It was very, very unlikely that the death penalty would have been used because there were very strenuous safeguards in place with requirements of numbers of witnesses, who the witnesses had to be, changes in venue to ensure fair trials, and of course the death penalty itself for perjury if it resulted in the death of a person. In this situation, the Old Testament is being quoted in a very blood-thirsty way, but in fact all kinds of safeguards existed at the time making it very unlikely that the death penalty would in fact be used.

I can think of criminals mentioned in the Old Testament who were not executed. Cain killed Abel and far from being executed was protected by God from execution by other people, according to the story. David committed two capital crimes, adultery and murder. God did not demand his life. Jesus did not allow a woman to be stoned after she was caught in adultery. That is one of the famous stories of the Christian faith. Paul did not have the runaway slave executed but urged his owner to take him back. There was a death penalty for runaway slaves at that time. There are plenty of examples of a religious faith teaching that justice does not require this kind of revenge. Indeed, we have the very explicit: "Justice is mine, sayeth the Lord". We as human beings should not presume to take the life of another person. We should let a divine authority make that decision.

We know the ethic of forgiveness is taught. For Christians to be arguing in favour of the death penalty suggests a certain amount of hypocrisy. After all, what is the Christian church but a group of acknowledged sinners who admit they need forgiveness and welcome grace? Why should we then turn the tables and say we will be the judges and exact the final punishment? It seems to me there is a very serious inconsistency there.

What kind of justice would be achieved? The justice of the faith I believe in talks about reconciliation and harmony, not some kind of mechanical retribution. What kind of justice is that? There has to be a restoration of harmony in and a building up of the health of the community, not some kind of mechanical vengeance that will obviously do nothing to restore order and make people live in peace with each other again.

There are as well plenty of practical reasons for not taking this step backward. We have heard the suggestion it would save us money. It is most abhorrent to suggest that we would execute people in order to save on the bills. If we started following that line of argument we would certainly be changing our medicare system rather drastically. It is very doubtful that this is a good argument in any event because of the number and expense of the required judicial safeguards.

It is suggested that the death penalty is a deterrent. We have certainly had plenty of people using statistics in this House to persuade us of the merits of the arguments for and against. I am of the view that the deterrence argument has not been proven by anyone. You can look at longitudinal and cross-section studies. You can compare U.S. states with and without the death penalty. You can compare countries which have abolished it and countries which have not.

By and large countries that do not have the death penalty are at least as well off in their rates of crime, violence and murder as those that do. It does not seem to make a difference one way or another. I would not argue we are going to see any improvement by maintaining abolition, but in the last few years we have seen a very modest but definite reduction in the murder rate. I do not want to argue that very strongly because it might change. Yet we have no reason to believe we are going to have any greater security with capital punishment.

Every year 2,000 drunk drivers kill somebody. It seems to me we could do a much better job of preventing deaths caused by drunk drivers. We have all kinds of ways we could intervene to save lives from accidents and suicide by providing services such as counselling. There are all kinds of opportunities for us in conflict resolution and giving an opportunity for victims to grow up safely and prevent a cycle of violence in subsequent generations. We do not need the death penalty if we want to reduce the amount of violence in our society. We have practical measures available which would achieve this end far better than deterrence. Obviously one has to be very selective in pulling out the statistics to argue the deterrence factor.

We know that errors will be made with the death penalty. No system is perfect. Our system is modelled on that of the U.K. and there have been executions there which were subsequently found to be absolutely wrong. Once a person is executed it is very seldom that further evidence comes to light because no one has much incentive to go out and gather it. Yet from time to time we find that the evidence was not as solid as it appeared and it is quite possible a number of people were executed who were not the criminals they were thought to be.

Eyewitnesses are notoriously unreliable. What seems to be a good objective test today may, 10 years from now, be proven scientifically not to be very accurate. If someone's life is going to depend on the accuracy of tests of their hair or fingernails for chemicals or whatever, we know mistakes have been made in the past and further refinements have shown that to be the case. I certainly would not want it on my conscience that I had voted for a system that would inevitably result in the death of the wrong person.

We have only just recently had the embarrassment and shame of finding about the very long and wrongful imprisonment of Donald Marshall on a murder charge. If we had capital punishment for murder at that time he would have been executed.

Mr. Stevens: That is not true.

Ms. McDonald: It depends on the definition in the Criminal Code. One of the things we are looking at is to what crimes the death penalty should apply. It is perfectly plausible that it would include first and second degree murder, and conceivably other offences as well. The motion before us is not restricted to first degree murder at all.

Mr. Stevens: That is for the committee to decide.

Ms. McDonald: Yes, but we are opening it up to that possibility. We know that in the past there were no divisions between first and second degree murder. They were all murder.

Mr. Stevens: No.

Ms. McDonald: There was the death penalty for rape as well until very recently. You do not have to go back too far to find the death penalty for armed robbery. In Britain, which is where our system derives from, there was the death penalty for 150 offences in the last century. Most of those were property offences and some of them very trivial. Many people were executed and undoubtedly some for crimes they did not commit. Undoubtedly many were executed for crimes which were not very serious.

People do not seem to think very much about the practical consequences if we take this retrograde step. Every time someone is sentenced to death reprieve will be considered. That is an ancient custom. Studies of reprieve have found there is a great deal of discrimination, as there is in people moving through the system.

We know native people are six times more likely to go to jail for any offence in Canada. They are only half as likely to be paroled even though the offences are, by and large, less serious. We know there is discrimination against natives in our society and we would fully expect there would be discrimination on grounds of economics, race and national origin, because this has happened in every system. It has happened in the past here and we have no reason to believe we would suddenly become perfectly fair. So every time a death sentence is pronounced by a judge there would be appeals all the way to Cabinet. Members of Cabinet would have to decide whether or not the penalty should be applied in each case. Citizens would be writing, there would be vigils and parades and processions.

Mr. Stevens: For Olson?

Ms. McDonald: It is also possible that with the death penalty there would be fewer convictions. I do not know that the evidence is entirely convincing on this point but there are certainly experts who say that with a death penalty juries are less likely to convict. There is some evidence in favour of that argument. We would not get absolute protection if people were acquitted due to a jury's scrupulous care that they not convict the wrong person. They might let someone off completely who ought to be convicted and imprisoned for a very long time.

• (1850)

Some people say that I may not have talked enough to families of victims. I am pleased to see that in some cases families of victims are speaking up. They are saying that the death penalty will never bring back their child and they do not want to have the death penalty reinstated. They mourn the loss of their child who was tragically killed, but the death penalty is morally wrong and there is no way they would get any comfort through it being reinstated. I am very proud of people who have the courage, even in the face of their great loss, to take this stand.

I am very pleased to see the significant number of people who are writing in. They include the leadership of the Elizabeth Fry Society and the John Howard Society. Many, many churches including my own, the Anglican Church, as well as the United Church and the Presbyterian Church, have been very strong on this issue. The Quakers and the Mennonites have long given leadership on this issue as have a number of Rabbis. The Canadian Jewish Congress has taken a strong position. All kinds of people are speaking out and saying very clearly that they do not want Canada to take this step backward.

The countries which have abolished the death penalty so far are the countries which have goals and moral values far more similar to ours than those of the countries which have retained capital punishment. They are the kinds of countries we want to visit and the kinds of countries we enjoy having as our friends. They include European countries, Australia, Austria, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Iceland, Italy, Malta, Mexico, Monaco, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Peru, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and Venezuela.

The United Kingdom had a vote on the subject very recently. I was pleased to see that the House of Commons there overwhelmingly defeated a bid to bring back capital punishment. These are the kinds of countries with which we want to be allied. The American states which have abolished capital punishment and stuck with it are, in the majority, our neighbourly states, not those with high crime rates. It would be very sad if we stepped backward and brought back capital punishment.

The Americans who are working in the abolition movement are looking to Canada now. They are extremely concerned that we not take a backward step. They are nearly losing hope themselves as they see large numbers of people on the death rows of the prisons of the United States. They are looking to us for leadership. They will be extremely disappointed if Canada, a relatively nonviolent society, a society of peace, takes this retrograde step with no good reason. That would be a very sad thing for the world. I think we owe it to our American friends not to take a step backward but to give them a glimmer of hope that we are staying the course with them.

There is no solution in capital punishment. I think many fine people are in favour of it because they want a symbol. They talk to us about their fears. They like to think that the reinstatement of capital punishment would say something about respect for life and having a decent kind of society. I respect those sentiments. I think these are people with good will, but I think their means are mistaken. We have no reason to believe that their good instincts would be well rewarded.

We have no reason to believe that any child, any prison officer, or any police officer would be any safer with the reinstatement of capital punishment. There are just no easy solutions like that. I think it would be very wrong for us in the House of Commons to tell people that we can provide safety to Canadian citizens by bringing back the hangman. That is not the right answer.

I am proud of the role that my Party has taken on this issue. We have worked very diligently against the death penalty and are doing so with perhaps a majority of people against us. A majority of people have at least some support for capital punishment. I do not want to exaggerate the position. I do not think there are a lot of people who strongly want to bring back the death penalty. Some people are looking for a symbol. I am proud of my Party for saying that we will not provide that symbol because it gives a false hope, it is a false solution. We said that even when it was unpopular.

We see public opinion moving our way as it has on equality rights, medicare and civil liberties. We had the courage to take unpopular positions on those issues and now see that the vast majority of Canadians agree with us. I am proud of the moral leadership which we have taken on this issue. We have been against capital punishment even when it was tough to be against it. We are now seeing so many people joining us and agreeing that it is a false solution and an immoral act for our society to undertake.

I know my own constituents are divided on this issue. I am hearing from them and am pleased about that. I respect their opinions. We are divided as a society on this issue but I appeal to people to listen to their higher instincts, their better passions. Let us say no to the reintroduction of the death penalty.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, earlier in her remarks the Hon. Member said that she felt there was no relationship between the existence or nonexistence of capital punishment and crimes of violence. In that context, how can she explain that in 1962, the last year that there was an execution in Canada, the total number of crimes of violence was 41,000 while every year since, with the exception of one year, the number has steadily increased until in 1985 there were 189,000 crimes of violence?

In the context of a mistake, does she not think that perhaps a mistake was made in 1962 and has been made every year thereafter? With regard to homicides in particular, there has been one extra murder in Canada per day since executions ceased, resulting in a rate of murder double that which we had in 1962.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to this question. I am a sociologist by trade and actually studied and published on this issue a number of years ago. The Member asked two quite different questions. The first on crimes of violence and the second on murder rates.

The Hon. Member referred to a figure of 41,000. It should be understood that "crimes of violence" is quite a broad category. Murder, manslaughter and attempted murder represent a very small number of crimes of violence. They also include rape, robbery and aggravated assault. An assault can be a push or a shove. It does not have to be very serious. An aggravated assault does not necessarily result in hospitalization.

My point is that it is quite a broad category and broad categories are very much influenced by definitions, by classifications, and by police numbers. When you hire more police, the crime rate goes up. When you install a computer at the police station, the crime rate goes up because record-keeping is improved.

We know that there has been an enormous improvement in the amount and quality of policing and in the keeping of police statistics. That, in itself, may be one reason for this increase over time. These figures of police-reported offences are very vulnerable. When you look at convictions you will see that crimes of violence have not increased. Convictions are a more solid estimate because these are the offences which have gone to court and on which a guilty verdict has been rendered.

Unfortunately we cannot do long-range studies on crimes of violence or murder with these figures because the categories have changed. Even with regard to murder there is murder in the first and second degree. Convictions represent only a very small number of homicides actually reported. Therefore, long-term series are simply not available. I have tried to get raw data from Statistics Canada to study this. They do not keep the data in the same form from year to year. One cannot make these long-range comparisons except by using very solid figures like those on convictions. There are problems even then because of the difference between first and second degree murder.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to various countries that do not have the death penalty. She referred to European countries in a general category but I noted that she did not refer to Ireland. My people came from Ireland, which still retains the death penalty. I do not think there is anything wrong with associating with that country. Belgium is another country that still has the death penalty.

Over 80 per cent of the world's population live in countries that have some form of the death penalty. Is it not somewhat presumptuous to suggest that a small minority of the world's population is right and it is a reflection upon almost 90 per cent of the world's population that still keeps the death penalty to say that they are wrong?

I was startled to hear the Hon. Member even drop the name of Nicaragua as a country that does not have the death penalty. I do not know what is contained in the statutes in Nicaragua, but can she seriously suggest that there is not state killing in that country? They simply shoot you there if you do something wrong. They do not worry about trials.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, my name is McDonald but half of my ancestors are Irish as well. I am sorry that Ireland has not abolished the death penalty. There is still much terrorism there and the political situation is more difficult than ours in Canada. While Ireland has not abolished the death penalty, I suspect that it will in due course.

I do not want to condemn countries that have not abolished the death penalty but I think they are wrong. However, countries come to a realization of what they want at different times. I hope many more countries will come to abolish the death penalty.

Some of them are at war and it is difficult for such countries to abolish the death penalty. I know that Nicaragua is in the midst of a civil war, yet it abolished the death penalty and I think it deserves credit for showing that moral leadership in difficult circumstances.

While there are differences among countries, I believe we should say as Canadians that we choose this morality and encourage other countries to join us. We will not stop being good neighbours with countries that do not take the same route. We will try to persuade them and hopefully always behave toward them in a decent manner. I think it is time that we engaged in a debate in which we try to persuade them that we are right.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) will have noted that the hon. minister of peculiar reasoning suggested that since the death penalty had not been administered since 1962, crimes of violence have increased dramatically. I doubt the Hon. Member would follow the logic of his question, which is to suggest that all crimes of violence should be punishable by capital punishment. An equally logical and perhaps more temperate argument would be the application of corporal punishment in proportionate measure.

I listened with great interest to my hon. colleague. She identified the quite shocking inadequacies of the simple-minded analysis of the statistics that were advanced. It should have been self-evident to anyone who is interested in the facts that there is no measure of the frequency of crime but a measure of the frequency of the reporting of crime. Furthermore, any increase that could be measured to have taken place could be attributed to other factors.

Does the Hon. Member see a similarity between this manner of reasoning and the kind of simple-minded answers that are advanced so consistently with that pattern of reasoning to solve what are essentially very complex social problems?

Ms. McDonald: I suspect that the psychology is one of "I have my position, now I have to find the facts to go with it". There is a selective use of Statistics Canada figures on a crime by crime, murder by murder basis. If the murder rate goes up one year, one cites those statistics. If the murder rate goes down the next year, one uses manslaughter statistics or a general category such as crimes of violence.

There is a well established pattern of people who want to use repressive measures quoting rising crime rates and being very selective about the crimes they pick. I do not believe that helps the debate at all.

I agree with my colleague, the Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy), that we have complex problems of violence with which we must deal. We need legislation on pornography, victims of child abuse and many other measures. We need a decent social welfare system. That is how we deal with the question of violence. It is a complex question for which we need complex answers, real services and genuine caring.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow a short question by the Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy).

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, my question is essentially quite simple. The New Democratic Party, almost as a bloc, voted against the motion of the Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) to prevent the taking of innocent life. They vote, almost as a bloc, in favour of preventing the taking of the life of a guilty person. How does she square those two positions?

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, the vote that was taken on the Hon. Member's motion was by individuals in a free vote. All of us will be voting in the same way because we have made the same decision on capital punishment. However, it is a free vote and we have that opportunity.

I do not believe there is any inconsistency. The proposal by the Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) was for a constitutional change that would not necessarily protect anyone's life. When one considers the availability of abortion in other countries, and the availability of illegal abortions, it would not necessarily save anyone's life.

If anyone is responsibly against abortion they have to be in favour of family allowance, parental leave, child care, adequate sex education and adequate contraception. The way to deal with that issue is by addressing the question of unwanted pregnancies. It is a practical and complex issue which will not be solved by passing a law. It is a law that will be circumvented in any event and in my opinion would not save one life.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are terminated. Debate.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I join others in the House who have recognized that the debate on capital punishment is an issue which the House should address. Part of the process of government is to focus all of our attention on this very human issue.

The question of the death penalty in Canada is one that can be answered yes or no. If the answer is yes after a free vote in this debate, the question would then become, "When and how?"

I am one of those elected to this place who was either unable or unwilling to make a decision when this question was first posed. I wondered whether I should simply listen to the arguments presented by my colleagues, my family and friends, my constituents in the west Montreal riding of Lachine, and all those across Canada who have sent me their views and recommendations before reaching my personal decision. Stated directly and simply, I want to do the right thing for Canada and Canadians, as I believe do all my colleagues.

I have heard convincing arguments on both sides of this very basic human issue. Persuasive arguments come from people who, having made life-long studies of human behaviour, take opposite positions on the deterrent effects of capital punishment. Persuasive argument comes from mothers of girls who have been raped and murdered, pleading for and against capital punishment. The Hon. Member for St. Michel—Ahuntsic (Mrs. Killens), so highly respected as a human being, recorded in this House the effect on her of the testimony of one such mother. Persuasive argument also comes from 9,000 survey responses and letters forwarded by my constituents, now nearly equally divided in their views. I guess it is not surprising that opinion and argument is so strong and contradictory on this soul-searching issue.

In arriving at my personal decision, which will be reflected by my vote on this issue, I have reached conclusions on a number of parallel or consequential concerns. Without question or doubt, our justice system needs review and correction. Those who break the law must be punished if there is to be respect for the law, and the punishment should fit the crime. It should be both fair and firm. Sentences pronounced by our judges should be carried out rigidly by our penal system. Our parole process must therefore be very judiciously applied. The public has a right to be protected from those who have broken the law.

I believe that the victims of crime deserve more attention. In fact, innocent victims of crime should have direct support from the state. To the degree possible, criminals themselves should be held responsible for the compensation of their victims. Of course, this is seldom possible or practical. Fair compensation is not always monetary. It may be physical or emotional. It will always be difficult to assess or estimate. Assistance may be difficult either to extend or receive. Victims themselves may be the best counsellors.

In this regard, Detective Sergeant Robert Menard recently shared his hope with me that society would support an association of the victims of crime, a self-help organization. Himself a victim, and handicapped as a result, he is devoting his considerable energies to promoting the interests of the victims of crime. Sergeant Menard deserves our encouragement and our support.

But there can be no compensation for capital crime. Murder, planned and consciously carried out is the ultimate crime, whether it is carried out as a part of or the result of another crime, in passion or imposed on unknown innocents, such as an act of terrorism. Our debate is how we, as Canadians, should deal with those who commit murder.

Just as the crime of murder is the ultimate crime, the death penalty is the ultimate penalty. While it evidently protects society from repetition of the crime by the same individual, capital punishment introduces the possibility of irreversible error which, as our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) described, is an unspeakable horror.

But, as it must in a free vote, the issue of capital punishment will be resolved when each of us votes as our conscience directs. Like most, if not all, of my colleagues in this House of Commons, I have found this issue of capital punishment very troubling. However, after deep reflection, I have decided that I will vote against the Bill to restore capital punishment. I believe it is right for Canada and Canadians. I hope my colleagues will agree.

Mr. Clinch: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to comment on this very important and obviously controversial question before the House. For me, the question of capital punishment is a matter of moral responsibility, tied in with my concept of reverence for life.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. This is the time for questions and comments on the Hon. Member's speech. I would hope the Hon. Member would take that into account.

Mr. Clinch: I will certainly take that into account, Mr. Speaker, in my comments which would be in support of the speech just delivered, so I would assume that I would be allowed to make the comments I propose to make.

My reverence for life has been strongly encouraged in my early life by my parents, whom I know will be supportive of the stand I take, as well as those who were involved in my early education, the Sisters of Charity and the Brothers of the Sacred Heart at St. Thomas University, and all through my life by the former Bishop of the Diocese of Bathhurst, Monsieur Camille André LeBlanc.

The burden of proof always lies with those who argue for the destruction of any form of life. They have to demonstrate that it is necessary. They have to bring forward convincing evidence. They must demonstrate that its use makes the world a better place than it would otherwise be. For years it has been argued that capital punishment deters people from committing murder. Almost every study I have read comes up with the same conclusion, whatever causes the murder rate to rise, the absence of capital punishment is not one of them.

I have laboured long and hard over this question. I have consulted with the constituents of Gloucester, sought their opinions, and asked whether or not they favoured the return of capital punishment. Opinions have varied. I have been attacked verbally by some and encouraged by others to do what I felt was right. I have always maintained a great deal of respect and tolerance for the views of others. This debate has not caused me to change that position.

In making my decision on this matter, I recall the words of one whom I have always respected. It has been said:

> Cowardice asks the question—is it safe? Expediency asks the question—is it politic? Vanity asks the question—is it popular? But conscience asks the question—is it right? And there comes a time when one must take a position that it is neither safe nor politic nor popular, but he must take it because his conscience tells him that it is right.

For that reason, I must vote against the restoration of capital punishment.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I want to very briefly comment on the speech by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Lachine (Mr. Layton), and say to you, Sir, and through you to the House, what an excellent speech it was. It was exceptionally well prepared, well thought-out and well delivered.

I go back to the time in the early 1970s when we had a number of debates on capital punishment. I agonized, as has my colleague. I spoke with my bishop, my friends, my family, and so on. I arrived at a different conclusion. I have not heard anything in the debate so far to change my mind. I am not at all critical of my colleague's decision. It is his personal decision.

What I want to ask my colleague about is the result of his poll. As I recall in his speech he said the poll he received was about evenly distributed. I assume by that that he means there were half for and half against. In a poll which I took in my constituency, about 70 per cent were in favour of the reintroduction of capital punishment. I am curious as to how the Hon. Member asked the question. Did he frame it in any way that might have attempted to attract a special answer? Did he have any comments from his respondents to state whether or not there were qualifications in their yes or no?

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, in response to the question from my colleague, the Hon. Member for Prince Edward—Hastings (Mr. Ellis), I patterned the survey in my Householder after one which had been responded to extensively in a Householder put out by one of our colleagues from Toronto. The concerns were all very carefully outlined. In the case of the Hon. Member from Toronto he identified his position, which is for the return of capital punishment. In mine, I took what was a consistent position until today, that I was uncertain, totally uncertain, as to which way my vote should be cast.

The response to my survey was interesting. An earlier survey which was conducted showed about a five-to-three or 65-to-35 ratio in terms of the first responses we received. In that case there was an overwhelming response in favour of the return of capital punishment. We watched as the thousands of responses came in to the point where, as I mentioned, there were nearly 9,000. The gap narrowed to where I think the estimate would be in the two-to-three range.

What was important to me, and what I was very interested in, was the way in which my community responded, a community of which I am very much a part, a community which is in the west end of Montreal. As Hon. Members know, we face quite a number of concerns in that Anglophone section of Quebec. We reflect upon issues which are issues of Quebec in the global sense, but we are a special community in that society. I was interested to see how the people in my community would respond.

Some 70 per cent, give or take, are Anglophone voters in my community while 30 per cent are members of the French-speaking community. From other surveys that have been conducted in the Province of Quebec we know that the response in Quebec is approaching 50-50. That of course would reflect a strong majority of French-speaking Canadians. However, in my riding of Lachine where the majority is still two-to-one, or more, English-speaking I was curious as to what the reaction would be.

The initial reaction came on strong but gradually diminished to a four-to-three position. In addition, I found that those who were prompted to write from the heart numbered in the hundreds. They sent letters along with the survey and also separately. The overwhelming majority sought my support on behalf of the rejection of capital punishment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since there are no further questions or comments the Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) on debate.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at this point in the debate it is hard to advance notions that are fresh and crisp and which carry a connotation of novelty. I enter the debate with the thought that this is a propaganda war over statistics as to whether our crime rates have gone up or down and whether we should use 1962 as a base year or a more recent year.

I observe that in this debate the question is whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent that works or does not work, and where it seems to work and where it does not seem to apply at all.

I have read and heard some perverse arguments in this debate at times on economic grounds which state that it would be less expensive to the taxpayer to execute a person rather than to keep that person in prison for an extended period of time. It seems to me that at this point it would be only fair to ask some busy questions and the questions, of course, that guide me in this debate in particular.

The first question is this. Can we retreat as a nation and go backward by adopting the measure that is being proposed and thus allow Canada to join a dwindling number of nations, those nations that are still hanging on, so to speak, to the notion that capital punishment is the answer? Can we do that as the proponent of this measure would like us to do by way of a vote next Monday? In other words, can we lead Canada backward into a phase out of that which we thought we had achieved once and for all 10 years ago? Can we do that? Is it fair to Canada? Is it fair to the reputation we have in the world? Of course, my answer is no.

Can we vote for a remedy, as proposed in this motion, that would treat the symptoms of a big problem, evidently, instead of the causes? In other words, can we be lead to believe that by reintroducing capital punishment we will really improve the social conditions and behaviour of Canadian society? I ask the proponents of this measure this. Can we honestly and seriously believe that this will be the net effect and the net result of this measure? Do they really believe it?

Obviously, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, by the way I am posing the questions, I do not believe that by voting for capital punishment we would be introducing a remedy that would treat the roots of the problem.

I would also ask whether, as the representatives of the people who have elected us, we can pronounce ourselves in favour of an action, in favour of killing, in order to prove that killing is wrong. Can we do that? Can we set that kind of example? Is that what Canadians really expect from us fundamentally and basically, to vote for a measure to kill in order to prove that killing is wrong?

Evidently there is a watershed here between those who believe that to kill in order to prove that killing is wrong is the right thing, and those who believe the opposite, like myself. I reject that first notion, as do many Canadians. It is true that we have received a number of letters urging us to vote for capital punishment, and we should receive letters since this is a very important public issue. But we have also received a number of representations, and very thoughtful ones, and I will refer to two of them shortly, which definitely indicate that it is distasteful to again see Canada adopt this measure.

What we should be debating instead are the root causes that lead to violence in society. That is the ground for a substantial, constructive and meaningful debate for this House to be engaged in, in which we would be asking ourselves the following. What are the root causes that lead to increases in crime rates in our society? That is the essence, the foundation, of this debate. Really, it is what is behind this motion.

• (1930)

In a sense, we ought to be grateful to the movers of this motion as it provides us the opportunity to pose these fundamental questions. But, that is the extent to which I would express my gratitude to them.

The question I ask is this. Why is it that we are not debating the root causes of violence in our society? The more one considers this issue, the more one has to conclude that capital punishment is not the answer in terms of ending or reducing violence in society.

In terms of the debate thus far, I must conclude that in fact the advocates of capital punishment have failed to prove a cause and effect relationship between the absence of capital punishment and an increase in violent crime. Not one of those speaking in favour of capital punishment thus far in the debate has been able to discharge that burden of proof; not one has been able to show a cause and effect relationship between the absence of capital punishment and an increase in violent crime. The onus is on the advocates of capital punishment to prove that, and they have not done so. Therefore, the case for reinstatement of capital punishment is falling apart. More and more Members of Parliament are coming to the conclusion that the right approach is to vote against this measure.

When faced with two communities, one with a high crime rate and one with a low crime rate, one has to ask one's self what it is that accounts for the difference. That is the question that we ought to pursue and that we ought to understand. It is not an easy question to answer. Obviously, some answers must be found.

We know that some of the elements that can lead to an increase in the level of violence in a community can include a lack of basic income, a lack of proper housing, of proper social services. Other factors could include the lack of a strong family base and a lack of adequate education. What we are addressing here is a fundamental social issue. It is one that cannot be resolved by adoption of the simple notion that capital punishment by the state can reduce violence in society. If that kind of thinking were to prevail in this House, it would take us back several centuries in our evolution.

It was two centuries ago that Cesare Beccaria, an individual who was born in the same city where I was born, wrote a treatise on crime and punishment which included the following on capital punishment. Just listen to what he wrote in 1764. I quote:

> The death penalty is not useful because it sets men an example of cruelty. Even if the passions or the necessity of war have taught the shedding of human blood, the laws moderating the behaviour of men should not add to this cruel example, all the more disastrous because lawful death is dealt out with formality and after due deliberation.

Just listen to that! In the coldness of the morning, usually. He goes on to say:

> To me it seems absurd that the laws, which express the will of the people, and which loathe homicide and punish it, commit homicide themselves and, in order to dissuade citizens from murder, decree a public murder.

That is a fundamental principle in public thought that those of us who are against capital punishment hope will prevail when the vote is held next Monday.

What we should be examining at this stage is the question of the root causes for violence in our society. We should look at the question of the redistribution of wealth in society, and the over-all question of what leads human beings to behave in a given manner.

If we were to pursue such a broad range of social questions, we would come up with answers that Canadians would accept as fair and that Canadians would want to adopt. I am convinced that Canadians do not want violence in response to violence. It is true that Canadians want protection and prevention. It is the search for prevention that is the challenge that is still ahead of us.

With the reintroduction of capital punishment, if it were to happen—perish the thought—who would be executed? Who would be the victim of the inequity and unfairness that follows from capital punishment, as it has been examined and documented in other countries? Would it be the member of a minority group, the person who cannot afford a lawyer? Do you think it would be the person who is without political contacts? The evidence clearly demonstrates that those who would be the subject of capital punishment would be the weaker elements in society.

To ask in the final stage the political body, the Cabinet of Canada, to make the decision on whether or not a person should be executed is an abhorrent thought. It is unfair to the person involved whose life is at stake, and it is unfair to the person who would be asked to make that decision.

It is interesting that in the last several months a good number of religious organizations across Canada have expressed their position against this resolution. Why? I submit that they have done so because of ethical reasons, not for pragmatic reasons.

I profoundly disagree with those who make it an issue of deterrence and who say, "Oh, if it were a deterrent, then I would vote for capital punishment; but since it is not a deterrent or it cannot be proven to be a deterrent, I will not vote". It is still the taking of a life. It is still asking the state in the name of society—and the state is asked to be an example of exemplary behaviour to society—to do the very thing the state wants to prevent. That is the basic principle which to me is the guiding light in this particular debate.

For Heaven's sake, why should capital punishment be a deterrent? Would it be a deterrent in a moment of passion or of anger? Would it be a deterrent in abject poverty or in a moment of insanity? Would it be a deterrent in a moment of irresponsible behaviour? Do they really think that? Are they serious about that? It is unbelievable. I can only say that an increasing number of Canadians are against capital punishment.

I was extremely touched a few months ago to receive a letter from Mrs. Lesley C. Parrott, the mother of Alison Parrott, whom she described in her letter as her 11-year old daughter who was abducted and murdered in July 1986. In her letter she wrote:

> Alison's murder has given me a very personal and agonizing experience of the horror of violence and killing. It has more than ever convinced me that we as society cannot ever and must not ever condone killing, whether by state or individual, in any shape or form.

She continued:

> I do not want to be part of a society that brings up future generations with the belief that killing can be legitimized under certain circumstances.

That is a beautiful way of putting it. Mrs. Parrott continued:

> Let the message be clear and unconditional: human life is sacred; killing is always wrong.

Capital Punishment

Please consider my deep felt views, and vote NO to the return of the death penalty.

By the way, she is not a constituent of mine.

I have another document which deserves to be raised in the course of this debate. It is a letter from Pauline Maitland, the widow of a slain Toronto policeman in 1976. She wrote:

I learned—that the man who killed my husband, P.C. Leslie Maitland, last February 1st, has now been sentenced to death. I would like you to know that the views of myself and my husband's family on capital punishment remain unchanged. We are totally against it. It would not bring Leslie back and it is too easy a way out for all of us. Society condemns murder, but is willing to accept the murder of this man in the name of justice. Please do what you can to prevent this second crime, before it is too late . . . The killing of this man would be completely foreign to all the moral standards of both my late husband and myself.

In conclusion, and because my time is up, I voted against capital punishment in the past, and I can assure the House that today I am still against capital punishment and that so long as I live I will be against capital punishment.

I would like to take this opportunity to urge colleagues who are still undecided to join in voting against capital punishment.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The speaker who just took his place was looking at me through a good deal of this debate, perhaps simply because I was the only one in this corner of the House. He asked a question directly of me, whether those of us who favour the reintroduction of capital punishment could satisfy the burden of proof. I am not at all sure that it is incumbent upon us to satisfy any burden of proof at all.

He went on to blame society, as many do, for the killers of the day. I say to him that Clifford Olson, who has perhaps been used as an example too often, as I have read of him, comes from the same kind of background as nearly half of the people in my constituency, yet I do not see half my constituents going out and carrying out the terrible acts that this man did.

Tomorrow morning when the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is in the House during Question Period, the galleries will be perhaps one-half or two-thirds full. On a Friday morning maybe they will be half full, so there will be nearly 400 people in the Chamber. I ask him to think about all of them being killed in one fell swoop by one person, whoever that person was who put the bomb on the Air-India flight.

I do not think any of us who support capital punishment would respond with violence for violence. There is no way that any of us intend to take out Clifford Olson and horribly rape and beat him as he did his victims. There is no way we would take the man who killed nearly 400 people on the Air-India flight, put him out over the Atlantic, put a bomb on the airplane, and blow him up. That is not our intent.

He speaks of unfairness. I can only suggest to him—and he may want to answer this—that sadly I hear from him that he has no respect for the life of those 10 or a dozen teenagers in British Columbia or those nearly 400 people on the Air-India flight, but he does have respect for Mr. Olson or for the person who put the bomb on the Air India flight. I think it is a matter of fairness that those terrible crimes be met with a just penalty.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, it is sad to hear these kinds of questions from the Hon. Member for Prince Edward—Hastings (Mr. Ellis). I thought he had reached a stage of maturity where he would pose different kinds of questions.

My answer to his question is this. First, he cannot brush away the responsibility of those who have put this motion forward to come forward with proof in support of their motion. I say to the Hon. Member, as an advocate of capital punishment, that so far he and the other proponents have failed to prove a cause and effect relationship between the absence of capital punishment and an increase in violent crime. He has not yet, and he had admitted it himself, discharged that burden that goes with putting forward that motion.

Second, concerning respect for life, I would say to the Hon. Member that two wrongs do not make one right. We are all fully aware of the tragedies that occur whenever a murder takes place and whenever an act of terrorism has been carried out, whenever one life is lost. But what is the remedy to prevent this from happening? In my speech I attempted in some detail, within the limitations of time, to indicate to the Hon. Member what we should be searching for, namely, the root of the problem, in order to reduce the likelihood of these actions taking place in future. It is getting to the root of the problem that I urge upon the Hon. Member, rather than accusing colleagues here of not having respect for life. I think that is absolutely silly, and I reject that notion.

Mr. Greenaway: Mr. Speaker, first, I want the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) to know that I respect his position as I respect the positions of anyone in this issue, whether pro or con.

At one point in the Member's speech, if I have this right, he asked if Canadians want reinstatement to prove that killing is wrong? Is that not exactly what the people have been trying to tell us year after year in poll after poll? The majority feels that capital punishment should be reinstated. Do we not have a democratic system in Canada? Does the majority not stand for anything?

This is one of the issues with which I have trouble personally. It has nothing to do with how I feel about the issue because I made up my mind in 1974 that I was in favour of the return of capital punishment, but 87 per cent of the people in my riding in a fair poll feel that capital punishment should be reinstated. Across the country somewhere between 60 per cent and 80 per cent of the people feel it should be reinstated. How can we turn away from our people in the democratic process?

I ask the Member that question not in any spirit of malice or embarrassment. I would be interested if he could shed some light on that problem. It is a problem for me.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult question. It is only fair that the Hon. Member would raise it because it is one that troubles the minds of many. There is no easy answer to the question.

I suppose basically one might find the answer in whether the Hon. Member sees himself as a delegate from his riding or a representative from his riding. If he chooses to be a representative in the real meaning of the word as it appears in the dictionary, then he will endeavour to represent the views of the majority as he perceives that majority to be. He will of course, deny the minority the alternative option, having acted as a representative. The alternative would be for the Hon. Member to perform his mandate as a delegate.

If he does choose that route, then he would be doing something like this. He would be using his time and effort, because he is paid to do that, to study the issue in much greater depth than probably anyone in his riding. He would collect the data, the information, the knowledge and the philosophical background that would guide him in arriving at a decision or conclusion that a study in depth of this kind will permit him to arrive at. If that happens to conform with the views of the majority in his riding, he will vote with a majority of the people in his riding.

Should he, as a result of his efforts, arrive at an informed opinion based on the principles that he will be searching for that is different from that of the majority of the people in his riding, and should he decide to be a delegate for his people in Ottawa, then he will make a decision that will not represent the majority in his riding. In doing so, he may give leadership to the people in his riding. He may be criticized. He may even lose the next election, but he will definitely achieve one thing. He will have the respect of his electors.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway).

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Thank you for the opportunity to enter this debate, Mr. Speaker, on what I really do not have to tell you is a most difficult and trying issue. You have sat through a good many days and evenings of debate on this subject, as I have. Before that you listened to the arguments pro and con as they have been debated across the country. You and I know that this is an issue on which there are extremely strong feelings on both sides. There really does not appear to be any meeting of the minds of any sort. It is a very divisive issue.

For me, this issue started back in 1982 when I decided that I would seek a nomination and stand for Parliament. At that time, as you will recall, the issue in Canada, as it is today, was the question of the economy and jobs. It was not an issue of capital punishment. The major issue as reflected in the minds and the hearts of the people in your riding, Mr. Speaker, and certainly in mine was that of the economy and jobs. The polls reflected that fact. If we look at the polls today we see that they still reflect that fact.

As I campaigned I found that if there was one issue raised as I knocked on people's doors and I suspect they raised it with you, Mr. Speaker and most others in this Chamber—apart from the economy and jobs, and that was the one I talked about first—it was the issue of capital punishment. It was not an issue on which I went out to campaign. I doubt if it was an issue on which you went out to campaign. It was not a subject matter that politicians in this House of Commons wanted particularly to have as an issue. It had been dealt with in the past. I suspect all of us, no matter on what side of the issue they were, would have been happy to leave it alone, and forget about it.

The reason it is an issue is not because you made it an issue or that I made it an issue—frankly it is not because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) made it an issue—it is because the people of Canada made it an issue. The people were concerned about it, and they raised it time and time again throughout the election campaign. The Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition at that time, made a commitment that there would be a free vote on the issue after the election, if our Party were elected.

For me, the issue did not stop there either. That commitment was not the end of it. We went for two years without a motion being introduced in the House on the subject of capital punishment. Throughout those two years I received phone calls and letters on the subject. Every time I held a town hall meeting in my riding, as I try to do on a monthly basis, that issue inevitably came up. Time and time again at those meetings, we spent half the time, three-quarters of the time and sometimes almost all the time discussing the issue of capital punishment, and those meetings would go on for two or three hours. We discussed when this issue would be dealt with by the House and when Parliament would come to grips with the issue.

In the last few days and weeks, I have listened to my colleagues talk about why we are debating this issue. In my view, the reason is clear. It has nothing to do with politicians. The reason is basically because the people of Canada want it debated, brought before Parliament and dealt with.

Since the motion was introduced, it has become quite clear in my mind that those who were very vociferous in their support of capital punishment decided that the matter is now before Parliament and there is no point in remaining on my back about it. Perhaps they are still on your back about it, Mr. Speaker, but at least I have not been hearing from those who had wanted to bring this issue forward. It appears that they are now content because the issue has been brought forward.

The people from whom I hear now, of course, are those who are opposed to the reinstatement of capital punishment. I have received virtually every letter and card that has been referred to in the House, virtually every one of which opposes the concept of the reintroduction of capital punishment.

Throughout these debates, and particularly since the reinstatement motion was introduced in the House, all sides of the debate have raged in the press and the media. In my view, virtually every conceivable fact was reviewed and discussed, and latterly most of those facts have been contrary to the concept of the reintroduction of capital punishment.

This was a troublesome issue for me during the election campaign. As I said, I resolved in my mind that the best way to deal with it was to have a national public referendum which would be binding on Parliament, the Government and the people of Canada. That is the position I personally put forward during the election campaign. After the campaign was over and the Prime Minister made the statement that there was to be a free vote at some time during the term of this Parliament, it became obviously clear that the concept of a referendum was passé. So at that time I made the commitment that the next best thing to a referendum would be a poll of my constituents. If their views were very clear, regardless of my own views on the subject, I would vote in support of the views of the majority of my constituents.

At the same time, I indicated to my constituents that originally I had been a proponent of capital punishment but laterally, on all of the evidence, I had swung around and had come to oppose it personally. However, I said that if there was a clear expression of majority opinion on this issue, notwithstanding my own views, I would vote in accordance with the views of my constituents.

I would like to read into the record what I put in my Householder. I stated:

> The results of both the questionnaire survey and the poll are extremely important. Please answer the questions as if you were making the ultimate decision on the life or death of a fellow human being because regardless of my personal feelings and regardless of the fact that many will accuse me of copping out, I will cast my vote in accordance with my understanding of the wishes of the majority of the residents of our constituency, if there is a very clear majority. If there is no clear majority, I shall feel free to vote my own conscience.

I decided that a survey was not good enough as far as I was concerned. There were too many ways a survey might be rigged or tampered with by individuals who would want to slant it one way or the other. I undertook at the same time to do a professional poll, fortunately paid for by my constituency association. I decided to base my conclusion on those two criteria as long as there was a clear-cut understanding.

You may be aware, Mr. Speaker, and if you are not, many others are, that I personally have been severely criticized for that view in the press. The Toronto Star ran an editorial aimed directly at me and one other Hon. Member who was mentioned by name two or three times. In addition to that, one of my former municipal council colleagues wrote an open letter to me in his regular column in a Sunday issue of The Toronto Star attacking the position of voting for one's constituents' wishes. The basis of that criticism is one that has certainly been reported in The Toronto Star several times, but one I have heard in the House many times during this debate. I will not refer to individuals by name, but I have heard this referred to today and that basis is the great principle enunciated by Mr. Edmund Burke.

What was it that Mr. Edmund Burke said? He said:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

That has a nice ring to it. It certainly seems to be the very essence of what a politician, a parliamentarian, is supposed to be. However, I think we must all remember that Burke wrote those words back in the 1700s. It was a time when the French Revolution was raging in Europe. Burke wrote those words at a time when there was no television, there was no radio, there were no libraries, there was no public education system, there were few newspapers and there were few books. He wrote them at a time when very few people could even read or write and he wrote them at a time when only very substantial land owners could vote.

In my view, Burke's statement was a product of its time. It was an elitist statement reflecting disdain for the opinion of others. His views are the views that are always quoted by a politician who is trying to rationalize why he has disregarded the views of his constituents. It is an I-know-better-than-you approach to one's role as a parliamentarian and representative of the people. That is a viewpoint which I personally have always rejected.

That is not to say that there is not a kernel of truth in what Mr. Burke said. He talked about owing one's constituents one's judgment. I certainly believe that I owe my constituents my judgment and I certainly believe that I exercise my judgment on all issues. I believe that I am exercising my judgment on this issue as well by utilizing my constituents' views in coming to my conclusions.

I say that bearing in mind the fact that on most issues and perhaps virtually every issue except this one, I have a great deal more information at my command than any of my constituents. I have at my command reports, material, library references and all sorts of different inputs that my constituents do not have.

• (2010)

In my view that is not the case on this issue. This issue has been debated publicly for years and years. In fact, serious debate in this House started at least 30 years ago. Over that time every single fact and figure one way or another has come out. More recently, the press and media have debated it backwards, forwards and sideways. In my view, my constituents know every single fact of this issue just as much as I do. I have heard all the pros and cons debated. I have heard the very substantial reasons put forward for being against capital punishment and the very substantial reasons for being for capital punishment. I have to conclude that for every argument for, there is an argument against. I will not go into that ad nauseam because some Hon. Members may want to ask me questions, but I will just mention three or four items.

First is the question of whether or not it is a deterrent. I sat here this afternoon and this evening and heard very compelling arguments on both sides. Statistics are trotted out applying to one or the other. We have had very compelling arguments as to why the state should not take a life. On the other hand, we have had the argument that the state is protecting other innocent lives by doing so. There is the argument that doing so discriminates against the poor and minorities. The rich people always get good lawyers and always get off. Yet you and I know that not so long ago in my Province of Ontario a man by the name of Buxbaum hired as his defence counsel someone who is considered to be probably the best defence counsel in the country. That counsel could not get him off and he was convicted of murder.

Then there is the argument that the wrong person may be executed. There have been some very compelling stories there. On the other hand, the other side says there is no evidence that anyone in this country has been wrongfully executed. The only case I have heard where it is said perhaps an innocent person was put to death was a case I have not heard much about. That case is that of William Coffin in Quebec.

About a year ago I was in Montreal for a great political convention which I think you attended, Mr. Speaker. I picked up the Montreal Gazette on a Saturday evening, March 15, and there was a big article about the Coffin case. That was long before this motion was introduced, so perhaps someone anticipated this debate. That article contained a lengthy interview with the widow of William Coffin. She was asked if, after 30 years of anguish, she favoured a return to capital punishment in Canada. Mrs. Coffin said: "Hang them. They brag about killing and then they're out after just a few years even where there's absolutely no doubt about it. They hanged Bill despite the doubt. The stupid asses give murderers weekend passes today and houses so they can visit with their wives."

I do not put that forward as a reason for supporting capital punishment. I do so to show that for every argument against there is a compelling argument for.

The conclusion I have come to and the judgment I have applied in this case is based on the fact that, given all this evidence, I think a rational person could come to the decision to support capital punishment and a rational person could come to the decision to oppose it, all on the same evidence. The typical rational person could come to two different conclusions. I mean no reflection on anyone else in this House because I believe this is a matter of deep personal conscience, but I personally believe it would be arrogant for me to decide on that sort of evidence, and on the basis of the fact that a substantial majority of people in my riding favour capital punishment, that I am so right and they are so wrong.

There are other things that come into this decision to support the views of my constituents. Some of those things were raised by the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) in his comments. One was the fact that there has been a growing lack of respect for the law and a rise of vigilante-ism. We have seen that in Calgary and Montreal. As the Minister said, the public has lost confidence in our criminal justice system. If there was a way of assuring the people of my riding and other Canadians that we could institute a criminal justice system in which they could have confidence, then I think the results of public opinion polls on this question would be different. Yet I have heard no one in this House, and I have questioned several Members, put forward their views on how we can restructure our system to meet that goal. I have heard no one give us a reasonable answer on that.

I took a survey and professional poll in my riding. The results of the survey were 69 per cent in favour of reinstating the death penalty and 24 per cent against. Going on an across-the-board basis, whether they were males, females, young, middle-aged, older people, family income was less than $20,000, $20,000 to $40,000, or over $40,000, whether their education was high school or university, the lowest percentage in support of reinstating capital punishment was 59 per cent. In the professional telephone poll conducted, it was 68 per cent the same way. Again across the board, depending on whether you were male, female, your age, family income, and so on, the lowest was 61 per cent in favour. Based on all of that information, I have come to the conclusion that the message from my constituents is clear and overwhelming, and I will be voting for reinstatement of capital punishment with this motion.

I want to conclude with this. I do not believe even while voting for this that if it passes, and it may not, we have come to the end of the debate. Even if capital punishment is reinstated, the debate will continue to rage. The same is true if it is not reinstated. When you and I are out knocking on doors in the next election campaign, I do not think we will find anything different. There will still be a lot of people who want the issue back before Parliament one way or another. I think we are in for a long one on this issue. The ultimate conclusion in my mind is to find some other reasonable alternative, something where people have some confidence that the system works and they are not being threatened. I have not heard anyone suggest that in this Chamber today or in the two and a half years I have been here. Neither have I seen it in any of the studies the Government has published or is in the process of publishing to date.

Mr. Greenaway: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member raised an interesting point. He said that upon examination of the evidence a rational person could conclude either way. If that is the case, how does he explain that a preponderance of Canadian people are in favour of the death penalty? Should it not be 50-50? Is he saying that the people of Canada are not rational or have not examined the evidence?

Mr. Redway: I would certainly never say that, Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows quite well. I am saying that on the evidence any individual could, in my view, conclude one way or the other. It so happens that the vast majority of Canadians have concluded that they want capital punishment reinstated. I, personally, have reached the opposite conclusion on the evidence. I do not think that makes me any less rational than the vast majority of the Canadian people, as the Hon. Member points out.

I do believe that the evidence is fairly well balanced in this case. For every argument there is a counter-argument. I cannot conclude that, because I have come to one conclusion while 69 per cent of my constituents have come to another, I am right and they are absolutely wrong. That is why I have reached my own decision.

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member made the interesting point that on the same information and statistics it is fairly easy for people to arrive at different conclusions. As the debate goes on, it becomes more and more apparent that people speaking for and against the motion are drawing on the same information and, in many cases, basing their arguments on the same premises. To make a final decision one way or another is obviously very difficult for all Members.

During the debate I have noticed that many people have different ideas of for what crimes the punishment is appropriate. I spoke at some length on this topic to a Miss Lynch who was with the Parole Board for 15 years. She was a proponent of capital punishment. Over the 15 years she met practically every person who was in jail in Canada for murder. Of the 600 or 800 people with whom she spoke, she felt that probably only six or eight should have been executed.

In this context, perhaps people who are having difficulty with this resolution should consider passing it in order that a Bill could be developed which would be appropriate to bring to the House for further debate.

I commend the previous speaker for pointing out the fact that from the same premises, the same information, and very similar statistics, people arrive at different conclusions. If this motion passes, we may have a form of capital punishment which would be appropriate for Canadians.

If you would allow me one more comment, Mr. Speaker, the term "capital punishment" may not be the best choice of words. Perhaps we are looking for justice.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's comment has given me the opportunity to expand slightly on what I said with regard to the poll I conducted. I tried to conduct a survey which was slanted against capital punishment. I tried to make sure that people considered every possible issue before they reached their final conclusion. I asked them a series of questions. To ensure that I had a proper mix of respondents, I asked them whether they were male or female, their age distribution, and their combined family income distribution. I then went on to ask the following questions:

> 1. Although some scientific studies indicate that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent, do you personally think that it acts as an effective deterrent or not?

The majority of people, notwithstanding the slant of that question, concluded that it was an effective deterrent. I asked:

> 2. For which of the following crimes, if any, would you favour imposing the death penalty?

I listed child murder, police and prison guard murder, terrorism, rape, treason, any first degree premeditated murder, and mass murder. There were various responses to that which certainly ties in with the Hon. Member's comment. Third, I asked:

> 3. Some people have stated the following: "Restoring the death penalty could mean more murderers would be loose on the streets because juries would be more reluctant to hand down a guilty verdict, knowing the death penalty would be imposed."

Most people disagreed with that. Fourth, I asked:

> 4. If the death penalty is reinstated, do you think that the trial judge should have discretion as to whether or not the death penalty should be imposed?

Most people said yes. Fifth, I asked:

> 5. If the death penalty is reinstated, do you think that the federal Cabinet should again have the right to "stay" the death penalty or not?

In my newsletter I pointed out the problems which that creates for the federal Cabinet in that it spends more time debating the life or death issue than worrying about whether people have jobs. However, the majority of people said that the federal Cabinet should have the right to stay executions.

I also asked:

> 6. If the death penalty is reinstated, which one of the following methods of execution should be used?

I listed hanging, electric chair, lethal injection and the gas chamber. Most people, as you can imagine, opted for lethal injection. I then asked:

> 7. Which, if any, of the following would you consider as a viable alternative to the death penalty?

I listed 25 years minimum in prison, 25 years in prison subject to parole, life sentence meaning life, and no viable alternative to the death penalty. The majority of people said "life sentence meaning life". I suspect if we debated that issue in this House we would find that this House could not agree on that issue. In fact, every Member of this House to whom I have put that question has not agreed with that and has opted for basically what we have now. The eighth question I asked was:

> 8. Do you think that the issue of capital punishment would best be decided by the House or . . . a public referendum—

Although that was not an available option, almost 80 per cent of the respondents said it should be answered by a public referendum. Finally, I put the question:

> 9. Do you think that the death penalty should be reinstated in Canada or not?

I have indicated the results I received.

I used that format both in my questionnaire to my constituents and in the professional poll so that respondents would have to address all of these other issues before finally making a decision on whether they were for it or against it. Notwithstanding that, 69 per cent favoured the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I, too, like the Member for York East (Mr. Redway), have agonized over the question of how to vote on this issue. I was most interested in his comments about reform of the criminal justice system. Would my colleague comment upon whether he believes that the return of capital punishment may possibly lead to a reform of the criminal justice system? In other words, if we vote to return capital punishment, will the House study the criminal justice system with a view to implementing the reforms which the people he surveyed asked for?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, the Government has undertaken and continues to undertake a variety of studies on this very issue. There is the Law Reform Commission of Canada study, parts of which have been reported. There is the Canadian Sentencing Commission study which has been recently reported. There is under way now a study by the National Parole Board on criteria for parole. There is also under way now the Correctional Law Review study. There are at least four studies on this issue that are either completed or in the process of being completed.

• (2030)

In addition, the Hon. Member, who is a member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, knows that the committee has now agreed to undertake a study of this which will commence in September. I am delighted with that and, whether or not I am a member of the Committee, I intend to be there.

I hope that in some way, shape or form we can synthesize all of these different reports and come up with something that will be a reform of our criminal justice system, that will restore the confidence of Canadians in our criminal justice system.

I must tell the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Horner), however, that I am not tremendously optimistic about that. As he has heard in the House tonight, throughout the debate, and as we have heard throughout the last two and one-half years, there is a wide divergence of opinion on this subject of the criminal justice system and whether there is anything wrong with it, whether it is better to make it looser or tighten it up. There is not a consensus in this House on that issue. That will be the toughest thing to achieve.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, let me say that I regret that this debate is taking place in this Parliament. I think there are far more useful things that this Parliament might be doing. However, I accept my obligation to consider the question which has been put before the House of Commons as a result of the decision of the Government.

I am quite prepared to spell out the reasons why I oppose the reinstatement of capital punishment and share the repugnance of so many Canadians at the thought of hanging anyone, even first degree murderers.

This is truly one of those moral issues that faces parliamentarians at various times. It is a question in which the free vote that has been given to each of us is justified. It is a matter on which taking a leadership role is very important and, it is in that spirit that I will consider the question.

The issue of capital punishment is of far greater importance in some parts of the country than in others. It is difficult to explain why I have had relatively little mail on the subject. The Nipigon Gazette in my riding of Thunder Bay recently ran a letter from one of my constituents which included a coupon addressed to me as a Member of Parliament. This constituent invited readers to clip it out and send it to me as an expression of their opinion. I was surprised to discover some weeks later that only three of these coupons had been sent to me. It was one of the most remarkable demonstrations of limited importance that this issue had for my constituents.

Clearly there are other issues of far more importance to them, such as a fairer system of taxation, employment opportunities for the young, middle-aged and older workers who are driven out of work. That sense of what is really important encourages me again to take the stand that I do.

I had the opportunity to join in a debate on this matter at Conrad Grebel College at the University of Waterloo approximately a month ago. I was the opponent of the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer). Anyone who knows the ethnocultural communities will know that like myself, he is of Mennonite background. In fact, he is a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church, as are some of my mother's relatives.

I was paired on the side of the question against the reinstatement of capital punishment with Professor John Redekop, a political scientist and Moderator of the Mennonite Brethren Church of Canada.

Paired on the other side of the question with the Member for Kitchener was Professor Clark Pinnock, from McMaster Divinity School. He is a scholar of some note in evangelical circles in Canada. In light of that position, I regretted seeing him on the other side of the question.

I grew up in Canadian evangelicalism as well as in a Mennonite family. Therefore, in this context, I could readily have had the impact of these particular communities in conflict.

Some 70 per cent of the Mennonite community generally is overwhelmingly opposed to capital punishment. When one singles out the Pentecostal and Christian Missionary Alliance

Churches, the evangelical community is even more overwhelmingly on the other side. My brother Bert and his wife in Winnipeg are very active in the Christian Missionary Alliance Church, and I am very much aware of those who think overwhelmingly on the other side of the question that we should reinstate capital punishment.

My presentation is more of a politician's argument rather than that of the professor I am on political leave. It has been suggested that we should follow the majority. Of course, as a New Democrat, I have never been partial to that argument from the beginning due to the radius to lead in what has been a minority position which, fortunately, is becoming smaller. Of course, I still want as many of those whom I respect as possible on my side of the question.

I was pleased to be able to link a past Moderator of my church of present affiliation, the United Church of Canada, and co-chairing the Alliance Against the Reinstatement of Capital Punishment and other leaders, including the present Moderator, with my Mennonite forebearers and those who lead the communities today and others.

I am a supporter of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association which held a great rally in Toronto against reinstatement at the beginning of June. I support the work of Amnesty International. I have received many letters from people connected with that organization encouraging me not to support reinstatement. I respect all of these voices intensely. I would find it intensely unsettling if they were people opposing my stand. These were consolations to a politician who has taken the particular moral stance I have taken.

In considering the position held by the Member for Kitchener and the Member for London East (Mr. Jepson) for theological reasons, which relatives and friends of mine in various parts of the country have also taken, I was interested to read an article in the May issue of the United Church Observer which contained the admirable title: "Do Justice and Love Mercy".

The article by the Reverend Victor Shepherd under the title "Murder and the Cross" comes to grips with what I believe is the most profound theological view on the question. Because I respect the communities for which the Member for Kitchener and the Member for London East have been speaking in their way in the House, I want to put this on the record for consideration as a profoundly powerful statement of the counterview, using some of the same Scripture that they would be prepared to accept, yet resulting in a diametrically opposed position. The author states:

> Murder is dreadful. Its victims spend their last moments in anguish. There is a unique finality to the crime, since the murder victim can neither recover nor be compensated.
> It's no wonder that the public reacts angrily, nor surprising that anger intensifies to rage. Rage, after all, is more than a mindless reaction to murder. Rage is an appropriate Christian response, since the Christian's rage reflects God's.
> God's anger, every bit as real as God's love.
> Every Hebrew prophet reminds the people that to disobey, ignore, or trifle with God is invariably to incur God's wrath. Jesus himself was livid on many occasions, not least when his premeditated violence (it takes considerable time to braid cords into a whip) flayed those who were exploiting defenceless men and women. Those who are outraged at murder, then, are not reacting in an unchristian or sub-human manner. Their response is one with God's. And when an outraged society cries out that the murderer deserves to die, God concurs: The murderer does deserve to die.
> With this conviction in mind we must learn from Scripture how God does deal with the murderer. With all of us, in fact. Perhaps we are surprised to read that "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Romans 3:23), that "none is righteous, no, not one" (Romans 3:10). While Scripture never regards murder as anything but heinous, nevertheless it insists that before God, the only searcher of human hearts, each of us is a sinner with nothing to plead in self defence. There is a solidarity-in-sinnership which admits of no excuses and no exceptions.
> Yet there is also one who has come to us, stood with us, and taken upon himself the condemnation owing (or falling on) all of us. "One has died for all therefore all have died". (2 Corinthians 5:14). The apostle's word could not be plainer. For in the profoundest sense, the death of Jesus gathers up in itself the death which the murderer and the rest of us unrighteous rebels deserve alike.
> This plain but profound word takes us to the very heartbeat of Scripture, the atonement. The atonement makes one of God and a runaway world.
> Jesus insists he came precisely to give himself as a ransom for sinners (Mark 10:45). On the eve of his crucifixion, distressed and distraught at the ordeal before him, he ponders asking if he can be spared it all. He is jolted as he realizes afresh, "No for this purpose I have come to this hour." (John 12:27) Too often we assume that Jesus came to show us something or tell us something, as though the root human ailment were our ignorance. Really, the root human problem is humankind's defiant disobedience, a situation which God must punish even as God longs to spare the creation the condemnation it deserves and from which it cannot extricate itself.
> The purpose of Christ's coming, then, is to do something; namely to act as God's agent in reconciling the entire creation to God and in restoring it to the "way" or "walk" to which God has appointed it. For this reason the cross or the atonement is the event in which the passions of sinners and God collide and from which the church's life and thought radiate.
> For every New Testament writer the death of Jesus is not merely a matter of biological cessation nor even a matter of martyrdom . . . The death of Jesus, rather, is seen to be tied up with God's judgment on sin. God had always decreed that sin must issue in estrangement from God, banishment from God's presence. It does. As sinners, all of us deserve God's judgment, and all of us call it down on ourselves. Yet when Jesus cries, "My God, why have you forsaken me?"—
> All New Testament writers discern that the condemnation the world merits has been borne by the one who gathers up our sinful humanity before God even as he mediates God's mercy to us. "One died, therefore all have died." All of us are fixed in the same condemnation; and as that condemnation is borne away, all of us are made beneficiaries of the same mercy. In other words, God's condemnation spares no one in order that God's mercy may miss no one.
> This being the case, can it ever be appropriate for Christians to insist on adding to what God has accepted as sufficient, the acceptance which God declares in raising Jesus from the dead?
> To suggest that God requires "something more" (the death of the murderer) is surely to try to do better than what God has already pronounced will have the desired effect.
> As the truth of God's purpose and the effectiveness of God's act transfigure our mind and heart, we understand why the apostle says, "Never avenge yourselves. Vengeance is mine, I will repay, says the Lord." (Romans 12:9) The command of God is clear: Christians must renounce any claim to vengeance. But not because Christians can afford to, smugly knowing that God will "do it" for them.
> The text means something else. We should renounce our claim to vengeance simply because we are near-sighted people with partial perspective and stoney hearts who cannot comprehend the murderer's entire situation. God alone sees the situation whole since God alone is the searcher of the heart. God alone discerns the many factors of which we are not aware or do not want to be: The murderer's upbringing, social disadvantage, childhood abandonment, emotional malformation.

God lifts this entire development out of our hands and lifts it up where God can infuse it with mercy and correction and healing.

To say that the death of Jesus is sufficient doesn't mean that no place for punishment remains. Indeed, everyone, whom God loves, God disciplines. (Hebrews 12:6) Certainly it is appropriate for Christians to insist on punishment, as long as the nature of such punishment is disciplinary and aims at restoration of the murderer.

There, of course, in the suggestion of restoration and redemption, is the ultimate Christian motive for refusing to cut short a life even when it is that of a murderer who has committed a heinous crime.

• (2040)

As a profound statement from Christian theology, a theology to which I think the evangelical can respond as easily as those he would regard as liberal in his theology, this seems to me to be a sound basis for taking the political stand I do.

What should we be doing, then? It is clear from a public opinion poll published just in the last days that Canadians do not like hanging very much. In fact, very, very few support that as the form of capital punishment. We find also a declining number of Canadians are actually in support of capital punishment. My expectation is that if this national debate, which has been going on for some time now in the media as well as in the House of Commons, continues, we will actually reach a 50-50 position in the country, half of the people on each side of the question and if you will, a normal distribution statistically. And, of course, as far as opinion is concerned, how would one choose on that basis?

I would suggest that recognizing the factors that are at work in lives, to which the Reverend Victor Shepherd was alluding in suggesting that God alone knows the situation of the murderer in earlier days, we might well consider other matters on which the Canadian public has expressed itself quite strongly and ask why the Government is not taking up those matters? I focus specifically on the matter of capital punishment which has been before the Government and on which the various Parties have taken a stand, and upon which the Canadian people have expressed themselves very clearly. Child care is, I suggest, closely related to the situation in which so many people find themselves. God knows where they end up, given the kinds of situations they experience as children.

I was intrigued to see that when the special committee was touring the country, receiving representations on child care, a total of 519 of the respondents addressed the question of delivery of funds, for example, and 76 per cent called for funding to be directed to the child care service itself. On the matter of funding for-profit child care, 77 per cent were opposed to public support of for-profit programs.

On the matter of universal versus targeted accessibility, 86.5 per cent called for a universally accessible child care system. On the question of child care and its effects on children and families, no fewer that 89 per cent believe that child care outside the family could be a positive experience for children and families. This, of course, was supported because these are the respondents addressing the special committee. But I would say that this was matched by the Goldfarb poll of 1,667 Canadians, which has also been reported in this matter, with 79 per cent of Canadians thinking that day care spaces should be ensured and 74 per cent believing that the money should be spent on the day care centres themselves. That is powerful public support. Three-quarters of the Canadian public and more support these positions.

The Government presumes to contradict that, to think that a different stance makes sense, a program that will not create the number of spaces that we need. That strikes me as an odd thing for a Government to do, a Government whose Leader in the last election campaign knuckled under to some expressions of public opinion and established this free vote process. Surely, something that is genuinely creative, something that would save lives, programs or centres that could easily reduce the number of murders, deserves action along the lines that the Canadian public want, and want in overwhelming proportions.

These seem to me to be interrelated arguments in support of the position that I intend to take. I must say that I have been studying this question, as all of us have, I suppose, at least all of us who are making speeches in the House on the matter, and I have been struck by a very different kind of effect altogether, an effect which appears in the United States when capital punishment is reinstituted. Of course, there is first of all the question of deterrence to consider, not that many Members in the House are making that argument any longer. It is striking that in the United States in 1982-83 the 18 states that had no capital punishment experienced homicide rates of 5.9 per 100,000 while the 32 states that had re-established the death penalty had a homicide rate of 7.66 per 100,000. The lowest rate came in abolitionist Minnesota at 1.7; the highest was in retentionist Louisiana and Texas at 14.2.

Even more startling is the evidence that when capital punishment is reinstituted it increases the homicide rate. We may debate the brutalizing effect of capital punishment but here we seem to have an incitement to violence, when people are aware that the state is practising the ultimate violence against the lives of murderers. We find that in Florida the first electrocution in 15 years took place in May of 1979, even though the three years preceding, 1976-78, had the lowest murder rates on record in the state, while the three years following the reinstitution, 1980-82, had the highest murder rate in the state's recent history with a 28 per cent increase in homicides in 1980. That sort of indication that people respond to violence and strike out at their neighbours seems to me to be the clinching argument for me to take the position that I do and to vote against the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I listened to my friend's very thoughtful speech. I wish to compliment him on the research that he has done and his liberal use of quotations. I wonder whether or not he was quoting from The United Church Observer—

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Yes.

Mr. Lewis: I would like to ask the Hon. Member to comment as to whether or not he was quoting from The United Church Observer. Perhaps in framing the answer he can tell us if he feels that the recent second-year-in-a-row drop in membership in the United Church is in any way connected with the fact that the church in many cases is taking an adversarial role, has completely eliminated the very basic and fundamental separation between church and state, and is completely out of touch with its congregations on issues such as free trade, refugee laws and fiscal matters, and that this is a case for the church to take a stand on a moral issue.

Is the Hon. Member prepared to support why the church would take a stand on a moral issue and at the same time confuse the issue so greatly on areas in which a great many of us who support that faith believe that it has absolutely no business being mixed into, such matters as refugee laws, immigration and free trade, issues on which the leadership of the church is completely out of touch with its congregations? In places such as Orillia there is absolutely no support for the positions taken by the leadership of the United Church. I appreciate that this is a moral issue. I think there is a place for the church to be involved in this issue. My friend has very ably quoted from what I thought was The United Church Observer and I just want him to comment on that point.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it is customary to thank Members of the House for asking questions. So I follow the convention here.

Without meaning to reflect on the Parliamentary Secretary unduly, I had indicated what I was quoting from. It was an article by the Reverend Victor Shepherd in the May issue of The United Church Observer which has a kind of text, if not picture, that moves me, entitled: "Do Justice and Love Mercy". It is a marvellous injunction from the Old Testament prophets for us to follow. It is one I want to be moved by since the message of the prophets, no less than the message of Jesus, dealt with everyday life. It was certainly not designed for the after-life only or for some distant place. It was designed to take people where they were, to liberate them and to set them free to live full lives. That is what the church is about.

If the Parliamentary Secretary thinks that the stance taken by the United Church on some of these questions does not have support in the congregations, then I guess that is an open question. Some congregations are more supportive than others. The church is never involved in playing to the gallery. The church is never involved in trying to be a majoritarian movement. The Conservative Party in the last election campaign under its Leader, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), played that kind of game with a vengeance. We all see the consequences of that lack of principle.

The United Church of Canada, like the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, and those other churches that do more than just think about the salvation of souls, considers the lives of people in their time and in their society. They dare to question what governments put forward as the best route, the best policies for the country to be following. Those churches follow what has always been an inspiring and fertilizing path in their time.

As far as the possibility that capital punishment might have had some immediate effect on the United Church membership, as my good friend the reverend from Winnipeg—Birds Hill has observed quietly, the United Church of Canada has taken this particular stand for many a decade. I am sure that it has had no effect now.

Perhaps I could say as one last observation, which the Parliamentary Secretary needed to be here when I got into this to understand, that I am speaking to the constituency that the Hon. Member for Kitchener and the Hon. Member for London East presumed to speak for. I speak to those people as people among whom I grew up, those who, whether one calls them fundamentalists or evangelical, think that Scripture points toward capital punishment.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I would like to first make a comment and then ask a question of the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp).

Early in the speech of the Hon. Member he suggested that most Mennonites were opposed to capital punishment. I will just speak for one conference of Mennonites, the conference to which I belong, the Mennonite Brethren. I think Hon. Members would find that it is probably the other way around, that maybe 60-40 approximately support it as opposed to those who oppose it. However, I cannot speak for all the others. But the Hon. Member did not differentiate. This is a comment to at least make the statistics as close to accurate as we can.

• (2100)

The Hon. Member referred to one of the verses of Scripture out of the Book of Romans, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that vengeance is forbidden to the Christian but we were to leave room for God's wrath. I believe it is the nineteenth verse of the twelfth chapter of Romans. Then, five verses later there is a verse that says that the civil authority, which is there to maintain law and order in society, is called "God's servant, an agent of His wrath to bring punishment on the evil-doer".

Would the Hon. Member not agree that one of the ways that God exercises His wrath upon evil is through the civil authority that He placed in society? Does it not create a problem for the Hon. Member to simply say that that is not the case?

I would ask him to comment on that.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my good friend the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr.

Blaikie) has just observed: What an incredible argument to come from an anabaptist.

The statistic that I was alluding to was the response in the self-selected poll which Faith Today published some months ago, which showed that 70 per cent were opposed to capital punishment. That they were the more evangelically inclined, as opposed to the General Conference, is, I think, an interesting manifestation that their anabaptism is triumphing over whatever influences they have been subject to in Canada. I concede that from among the Mennonite brethren—

Mr. Blaikie: Creeping Anglicanism.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Creeping Anglicanism. That is a thought. The Hon. Member for Kitchener will want to respond to that, I am sure.

It seems to me that if we are going to compare our society and our Government to that of the Roman Empire and all of its autocracy and brutality, and so on and so forth, we are going to end up with some very strange country. To say that the magistrate does not carry the sword in vain is surely to say something that is very true as a truism, but given—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to inform Hon. Members that questions and comments are now terminated. The Hon Member for Parry Sound—Muskoka (Mr. Darling) on debate.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in support of the return of capital punishment in Canada.

As a long-time advocate of capital punishment for specific types of killing, I can assure each and every abolitionist that this decision is not taken lightly. Most proponents of capital punishment have completed an emotional struggle, using their personal, religious and moral experiences.

I believe it is unfair to depict the supporters of capital punishment as right-wing Neanderthals who value neither human life nor the spirit within. This issue bears no resemblance to blood lust. Instead, those of us who equate fairness and justice with capital punishment endured a painful and gut-wrenching process prior to reaching that conclusion.

This issue was fought with verbal wars, Mr. Speaker, waged with logic, statistics, and each Member's own interpretation of ethics. It is as debate should be. However, it is incumbent upon each of us, as elected representatives of the people, to think with our heads as well as our hearts. Consider for a moment the so-called logic in this popular statement frequently proffered by the abolitionists: Murder is killing. Capital punishment is killing. Therefore, capital killing is murder.

As retired Vancouver criminal court judge Lou Bewley astutely points out, there are a couple of things wrong with this contention. It is counterfeit logic, a linguistic swindle, and a false assumption. This faulty proposition is akin to claiming: Water is wet. Liquid Draino is wet. Therefore, liquid Draino is water. There is a difference between unlawful murder and judicially-ordered execution. The state does not murder. The state protects the majority. Modern man, no less than his forefathers, has the God given right to protect himself.

As a species, we have been given the will to survive. When certain persons among us threaten that ability to survive, and the ability of our wives and children, we must collectively ensure our futures are intact. This constitutes the most basic function of the state. It is the essence and definition of civilization. It seems curious that abolitionists consider judicially-ordered execution as uncivilized, when it is actually the fruition of a civilized culture.

When we consider that 95 inmates released on mandatory supervision committed homicides and 37 inmates on parole also murdered between 1975 and 1984, we are given to question whether or not we are adequately protecting ourselves from that element.

I doubt that the proponents of abolition in this House, Mr. Speaker, would advocate the laying down of arms in the event of war. To their credit, they would agree that Canada's participation in both world wars was both warranted and necessary. In the event of a future attack on democracy and our quality of life, I would wager they would offer unconditional support to avert our country's demise.

People will kill people during wartime, and are encouraged by the state for survival of the same. As citizens of this country, we take great pride in the military might and the bravery exhibited during wartime. The declaration of war is the endorsement of state-sponsored killing.

Of course, the abolitionists will disagree that killing during wartime and peacetime are the same. There are many dissimilarities. Yet, the end result, and the reasoning behind both types of killing, are strikingly similar. In war, we kill to avoid being killed and to retain law and order as we know it. In advocating judicially-ordered execution, we are doing the same thing. We are ensuring that those convicted will not kill again and undermine the fabric of our society by way of a heinous crime.

While it is questionable that capital punishment serves as an effective deterrent for others, we know it would be an excellent deterrent for convicts who are let out of prison or who escape and kill again. It is the ultimate deterrent for murderers who repeat the act after incarceration, and during.

Consider the lifer who has nothing to lose. Under current law, we are an impotent and toothless society when we are forced to deal with a convicted murderer. We have virtually no recourse against the lifer who carves up a prison guard, a social worker, or another prisoner. Sure, we can give him or her a life sentence again. But, to what end? I cannot help but wonder whether some abolitionists would convert if they were responsible for prison surveillance day after day, month after month, and year after year. As legislators, we have the power to remove this constant and very real threat to the well-being of those who function within the prison system in Canada.

The debate on capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, is taking place in Parliament, in coffee shops, and on the streets across this country. Whenever debate takes place on this delicate subject, it is tempting to wage a war with statistics. It seems that stats are readily available to argue both sides of the issue. As is often the case with tabulation, it is child's play to bend and shake the figures to best suit one's own need.

It has been argued that the murder rate has actually decreased during some years since capital punishment was abolished in Canada back in 1976. I would point out that during some of the years since 1976 statistics show increases as well. However, if politicians were to take a lesson from scientists seeking experimental results, we would look for confounding conditions which might have affected our results. What could account for fewer murders after capital punishment was removed? What has changed since 1976 which might skew the numbers downward?

It is noteworthy that the world of trauma medicine has come into its own during the last decade. Many of Canada's larger urban centres have integrated trauma centres in hospitals with paramedics in the streets for the treatment of wounds causing victims to go into shock. Trauma centres are on the cutting edge of modern medicine. With the impressive efforts of those physicians and paramedics in the field, many lives are saved which would have been lost a decade ago.

Trauma medicine comes to the fore most commonly after car crashes, industrial accidents, and the like. We should consider for a moment that these same trauma specialists are constantly treating gunshot wounds, knife punctures, blast victims, and hundreds of other unspeakable afflictions. I submit that there have been fewer murders in the books during certain years because medical breakthroughs have kept more victims alive.

If we are still taking notes from our friends in the scientific field, we would look to see if attempted murders have increased, and the answer is yes. Therein lies the confounding factor in the results of our real life experiment. Heaven knows what the statistics would show if Canada had an identical medical community in place now as we did back in 1976.

Is it just a coincidence? Are we to ignore the healing effects of the air ambulance, or the use of medical anti-shock trousers commonly known as MAST, or communications which allow hospital specialists to read the vital signs of a victim miles away?

Where trauma medicine is available, patients often arrive at hospital already stabilized. Drugs have been administered at the scene, paramedics have intubated patients whose breathing was obstructed, blood shortages have been replenished, and the list goes on and on. I remind the House that such treatment was virtually unavailable a decade ago in Canada and was used only in heavily populated areas of the United States. Fortunately it is more widespread now, but Canada is still many years behind our neighbours to the south.

The magic of medicine could very well be skewing the statistics to which we all seem to cling so dearly. I suspect that the fine men and women in trauma medicine are at least partly responsible for keeping Canada's murder rate as low as it is.

Speaking of statistics on homicides, it was mentioned earlier today that in 1962 there were 265 homicides, or they were at the rate of 1.43 every 100,000 people. In 1985 the figure was 704 or 2.78 per 100,000 people.

As the debate on capital punishment continues, the people of Canada may take little solace from recent developments in the court room. We should take, for example, the case of Louis Troalen of Quebec who was convicted of second degree murder while already serving two life sentences. According to a press account, this individual killed a fellow inmate at Archambault Penitentiary on February 4. Last July the same man shot and killed Marcel Simard of the St. Hubert Police Force and tried to kill his partner. While sitting in the prisoner's box with a guilty plea for stabbing his fellow inmate to death, Troalen raised his handcuffed hands in the shape of a gun and shouted at the investigating officer: "You're my next victim, you bastard".

A situation such as this fairly begs the question: Does this sort of human being deserve to live in our midst? Is our society safe so long as he is alive? The inmate he killed in prison most certainly was not safe. Are the prison guards who feed and supervise this man secure while in the same room? Is this society offering the investigating officer any peace of mind in the unlikely but possible event of a jail break? Just how often are we to allow an individual to kill in cold blood?

To the confirmed abolitionists I submit this: "Are you not inadvertently encouraging murder by keeping certain people alive?"

I can appreciate the abolitionist's revulsion at the taking of a human life, but so long as certain individuals remain on this earth, more lives will be taken by the habitual murderer. If human life is so valuable, how can the abolitionist justify giving such a misfit the further opportunity to take the lives of those around him?

On one of the coldest days of the year in early January 1981 I attended a funeral in Huntsville, Ontario. It was one of the biggest funerals I have ever seen. Following the church service, I walked down the steps outside, a few paces behind a coffin draped with the Canadian flag. A few days before, on January 2 to be exact, Constable Rick Verdecchia of the Huntsville Ontario Provincial Police Detachment was driving down the highway on a routine midnight shift. He pulled a car over to the side of the road and approached from the rear. He probably never heard the shot which killed him.

Little did he know that a gas station attendant named Chester Blackmore was shot and killed further up the highway minutes before, within five miles of the place where I live. Later, believe it or not, after they had shot and killed the constable in Huntsville, these same two young men sped away to Orillia where another police car stopped them, not knowing about the murders at all, and a constable was shot—and I believe his name was Constable Hurtubise—but fortunately he recovered.

As I looked past Constable Verdecchia's coffin at several hundred policemen and policewomen from across North America who were standing at attention, the shortcoming of Canada's Parliament became crystal clear. As legislators we have offered virtually no security, no vote of confidence to these people since the last execution took place in 1962. We fully expect them to protect us in the light of day and dark of night, yet we offer no safety in return.

Since the abolition of capital punishment in 1976, 37 policemen have been murdered. Much has been said about whether capital punishment would act as a deterrent in police killings. Abolitionists usually advocate that there must be statistical proof of deterrence before they accept state sanctioned execution. Can they offer proof that there is no deterrence? So long as the lives of Canada's police personnel are on the line, I do not believe that we should even take the chance. If there is even the most remote possibility, and there is, that capital punishment will save their lives, we owe it to them to put it in place. If the life of just one policeman or policewoman is saved through capital punishment legislation—and I believe this to be the case—we as parliamentarians must come to their aid.

The popular argument that high risk, that is to say dying, is an occupational hazard for police is callous and indefensible. Our police are extensions of ourselves who perform those unsavoury duties from which we gladly give a wide berth ourselves.

Voting in favour of reinstating capital punishment is a vote for fairness. It is a vote for self-preservation and a vote for protection. Canadian Members of Parliament owe it to themselves and the people they represent to deliver them from the threat of cold-blooded murder. I advocate dispatching those found guilty of specific crimes by painless injection, and now I am speaking of persons guilty of first degree murder, rape killings, and high treason, who have proven they no longer deserve to live in our society.

As I said earlier, I have had the same conviction for some years. I listened with great care to those who have opposite views. I am aware of the position taken by the media. I can think of a recent issue of Maclean's magazine with the gruesome noose in it and other newspaper cartoons with the noose, the scaffold and the grey dawn and how terrifying this all is. I agree that hanging is very gruesome. I am confident that if this motion passes and a committee is formed that recommendations will be made for the most humane way to deal with those criminals who no longer deserve to live.

Let me point out that the media would do well to portray the victims and the grieving families of those who have been so wantonly murdered. There are certain people in this life who are beyond redemption as far as hoping that they can make a new life and turn over a new leaf. It is for those very few that I feel that capital punishment should be reinstated.

My colleague mentioned polls. Polls across the country have overwhelmingly been in favour of the return of capital punishment, that up to 80 per cent of the people are in favour of it. Some of the polls show that 60 per cent of the people are in favour. When people think and look at figures for premeditated murder, some of those who said they were against capital punishment when they were polled probably thought that these were crimes of passion. We know that 98 per cent of all murders are as a result of fights, crimes of passion or family quarrels. Only a very small percentage fit into the category where capital punishment would be applied.

It must be proven beyond a shadow of a doubt that an individual is guilty. The verdict is given by his peers of 12 jurors. The judge weighs the evidence, and he can consider mercy. If the sentence is for capital punishment, there is still the last resort of appealing to the Cabinet of the federal Government to commute the sentence. Every opportunity is given for a fair trial. I will be considering all of these things when I cast my vote Monday night or early Tuesday morning in favour of the return of capital punishment.

Mr. Riis: I have a simple question for my friend. I listened with interest to his speech. I know how he feels about the procedures and the way Parliament has always been conducted. He made reference in his closing comments to the fact that he plans to be voting late Monday evening or early Tuesday morning, which, of course, will only occur if closure is invoked on Monday.

How did he feel when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said that everyone would have an opportunity to speak to present his or her views on this important issue of life and death? What does he feel about the Government's initiative to invoke closure which will curtail debate by probably two-thirds of the Members of Parliament?

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by my colleague. As far as the closure motion is concerned, this Parliament has been aware that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) prior to the last election in 1984 gave a commitment that there would be a free vote on capital punishment. Many of us on this side are honest enough to say that we were pressuring him in the first year to bring in a motion of capital punishment or at least give the House Leader the go ahead to do it. I am well aware that for the Prime Minister, it has been a traumatic experience. I understand he gave a very eloquent speech Monday evening. Unfortunately I was unable to be here because I was on my way to Washington to talk to a congressman on acid rain. But he gave his word.

We are well aware that these are the last few days, and I am sorry about that. People have made up their minds. Despite the eloquent pleas of the Prime Minister on Monday night and despite the eloquent pleas of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), the chief law officer of Canada, who are both abolitionists, they have not changed five votes in this House, and I would be willing to bet on that.

Mr. Gauthier: How do you know?

Mr. Darling: Over 100 have spoken in this debate as I understand it. Over 40 hours have been used. I believe in 1982 the British House of Commons had a debate on capital punishment which took just eight hours. Another one was held earlier this year and I believe that took five hours and 19 minutes.

The Opposition has had every opportunity to speak on this important subject. When I say the Opposition, I am talking about those who are abolitionists, most of whom are on the opposition side. I was in a committee where two Members, one from the Official Opposition—that should not be said—but two Members said that they would do everything possible to use every trick in the book to stall this vote. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) is shaking his head.

Mr. Blaikie: It is not true.

Mr. Darling: It is not true? I will name them after but I will not name them publicly—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Further questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) and then the Hon. Member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. Browes).

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: As for me, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the Hon. Member for Parry Sound—Muskoka (Mr. Darling), who is a close friend of mine, had absolutely no intention of misleading this House. However, when he said that more than 100 Members had spoken into this debate, I would like to remind him, and that is why the Opposition is opposing the closure of the debate, that he was himself only the fifty-fifth one to speak. Thus, we are far from the 100 figure.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member has inadvertently misled the House, but let me tell you that we, on this side—the Opposition—we would like every Member of the House to have an opportunity to speak, as was suggested in the House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) on I do not remember what date. And it is not by bringing in closure that they will keep their promise to let every Member speak.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I can answer the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), who is my neighbour down the hall. When I said 100, I am not too far out. I am not talking necessarily about the speeches but also the many comments that have been made. Those people participated. Look at those who have participated here tonight. Some of them probably do not want to speak at length on the matter, yet they have been able to make a statement and get their points across in questions. I would be willing to bet the Hon. Member that by the time the vote is taken there will have been 100 Members on their feet who have expressed their views and have asked questions.

• (2130)

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short comment on the Hon. Member's speech. I would like to compliment the Hon. Member on the thoughtful approach he has taken and also for his commitment to and enthusiasm for something in which he obviously believes very firmly.

This is a serious debate. Not only is this debate taking place in a serious fashion in this Chamber but with this motion having been brought to the floor of the House of Commons, a great deal of debate in the kitchens, family rooms and backyards across Canada has been precipitated.

I had the opportunity to hear several hundred people who came to my constituency office talk about this particular issue and tell me how they feel about it. About 82 per cent of the people from the riding of Scarborough Centre, right across the board and not falling into an age or gender category, are, according to the letters and questionnaires, in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment.

The Hon. Member said that the state protects the majority and that is something with which I certainly agree. Having capital punishment as an option on the books is something for which I am prepared to vote.

Throughout the world, there are 28 countries that are abolitionist by law for all crimes. Eighteen countries are abolitionist by law for ordinary crimes only and Canada falls into that category. Then there are 129 countries and territories that retain capital punishment on the books. That, as I understand it, represents more than 80 per cent of the population of the world.

When we talk about many countries taking capital punishment off the books, I believe we must look at the 80 per cent of the population of this planet who believe there should be capital punishment on the books. When this motion comes to a vote, I will vote with the Hon. Member for Parry Sound—Muskoka (Mr. Darling) for the principle of reinstating capital punishment for premeditated murder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak to the subject of reinstating the death penalty, in the firm conviction that my constituents will understand why their Member, who was known to favour capital punishment in the past, is no longer in favour of reinstating capital punishment today.

I do not want to judge anyone in this speech. I just want to explain my decision.

I respect those who do not share my views but I expect them to respect me as well.

I know from representations I have received that many people in my riding, and we have discussed the subject at length, share my opinion. I have received a great deal of correspondence, and the vast majority of the letters I receive are opposed to reinstating capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, as in the House, a number of people in my riding are in favour of capital punishment. But today, and let me tell you I visit my riding regularly, and I talk a lot, and I must say that their reaction when I decided to change my stand was surprisingly favourable.

To some, a return to capital punishment is a matter of conscience. Personally, I weighed the moral implications and I made my decision after a great deal of reflection.

I have a deep respect for all forms of life, and morally and as a matter of personal conscience, I cannot approve of the act of killing, whether by the State or by individuals, except of course in extraordinary circumstances such as when defending one's country in time of war or when one is engaged in self-defence.

The consequences of this debate go far beyond the confines of our usual debates, Mr. Speaker. Our decision in this House will determine whether Canadian society has the right to end the life of a murderer or not. However, even if the person is a murderer, the fact remains that this person is above all a human being, and that is why I condemn, in no uncertain terms, the motion of closure tabled by the Conservatives to restrict the speaking time of Canada's elected representatives who want to speak to this vital issue, this matter of life and death.

Mr. Speaker, my police origins, as many Members will know, and of course my constituents who put their trust in me, put me in an environment that no one in the House, and I say no one, would have been proud to belong to.

In my 31 years as a detective lieutenant with the Bureau des enquêtes criminelles, Mr. Speaker, I was involved in cases of hostages taking, armed robbery, negotiation and gun fighting. In my line of work, cases of rape and murder were routine.

• (2140)

These cases were routine for myself and my fellow police officers and detectives in Montreal whom I respect and to whom I send greetings. I am proud to say that, contrary to what a great many people may think, there is not a single police officer who enjoys catching or firing on a human being. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that none of the police officers in the Montreal urban community whom I know personally will shoot to kill. And when I hear someone say: Come on, Carlo, you were a police officer and against capital punishment. Let me tell you that in addition to being an elected Member of Parliament or former detective lieutenant Carlo Rossi, there are a great many police officers in Canada who are against capital punishment because a police officer is first and foremost a human being who respects life and who has taken an oath to protect it. His duty as a police officer is to protect life.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that I arrested several suspects. Most of them were sentenced. But the big question is: Did they all deserve capital punishment? Of course not. But some murderers certainly deserved life emprisonment. On the subject of life imprisonment, I want to return to these paroles which are granted much too early.

I am sure that if this committee which wants to travel from coast to coast to ask Canadians how murderers should be killed, either through an injection, hanging, the electrical chair or any other way the life of a man can be taken. Instead, it asked people: Do you feel that, beside taking a human life, there are other ways to remedy the situation? Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Parry Sound—Muskoka (Mr. Darling) clearly stated early in his speech that even if he is for capital punishment, there were 36 or 37 people who killed while they were on parole. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my point is quite true.

Those guys should have done their time, instead of spending 15 years in a penitentiary, they should have stayed there for life as sentenced, and I am going to deal with parolees, Mr. Speaker, because I have some first hand experience . . . let me give you an idea of how it works, based on my own experience, in the case of inmates sentenced for other offences than murder to 10 or eight years in prison. After 3, 4 or 5 years, those people are out in the street again. However, what a lot of Canadians do not know is that when those guys are paroled they are told: If you are caught committing another crime, you will have to complete the balance of your 10 years and an additional term for your crime. I therefore leave you to imagine, Mr. Speaker, what the parolee is going to do: Needless to say, if he takes part in an armed robbery, he will be very careful not to be caught again and go back to jail to spent another 20 years.

I think it is one thing to tell Canadians throughout this great country: Yes, we are going to amend the Criminal Code, the parole system, we are going to have a reform of the Parole Board if you want. However, I think we should come clear on this and not mislead people, because when you visit constituencies, mine at least, you meet elderly people who know what it is all about and keep telling me: they are sentenced to jail, they get a five-year sentence, and after two years they are back in the street. So that is what we should be concerned about. This is where we should try to find solutions rather than killing human beings.

I wish to talk about the parole system along the same lines. As you know, no one in this House has ever mentionned statistics dealing with rehabilitation. No one ever dared to mention figures on the concept of "rehabilitation", on the people who get out of prison and are rehabilitated. No, Mr. Speaker, they cannot talk about those figures because the people who commit crimes after their rehabilitation do not get caught, therefore we have no statistics. Let me tell you something else from my own experience. There was an inmate of Saint-Vincent-de-Paul who came out. It is what they call in police parlance—those policemen listening to me know what I am talking about, and the policemen who took part in that inquiry with me also know that it is called: Code 26. Code 26 means you get out on day parole. You know, the guys in prison, I have nothing against them—as long as they are there, they have their hands folded like impressive choir boys. But as soon as they get out, watch out! So that guy gets out at eight o'clock in the morning, he has one day on parole, one Code 26, and he must get back to prison at 6 p.m. So he comes back to prison at 6 p.m., Mr. Speaker, but what he did not boast of and we found out after an investigation is, he went and rented a priest's costume in a Montreal firm I will not name, a priest's costume, a cassock. He went into a bank in Côte-des-Neiges, on Côte St. Catherine Road, held it up and came out with $35,000. So at 6 p.m. he went back to prison, but in the meantime he had commited a $35,000 armed robbery. Do you think that guy if by any chance a policeman had barged in, would have hesitated before killing that policeman? No chance because, certainly, he did not want to get caught. That is normal. This also, Mr. Speaker, is part of what Canadians should be told.

Before we take a human life, Mr. Speaker, there are other alternatives. And this is what I am asking Hon. Members in this House. There are many alternatives. But let us stop kidding ourselves, let us open our eyes and face reality. Reality is something I have experienced. If you want to know how many people are on parole, do not look up statistics because you do not maintain statistics. Go and see police officers. It is amazing that police officers are not consulted. They know how many guys have parole days and make hold-ups. You will not find that in the media. That is not published, but I can tell you about it. Go to the criminal investigation office and you will be surprised, Mr. Speaker.

After saying all that, I repeat that I am against capital punishment. A civilized society such as Canada has no more right to condemn a criminal to death deliberately than anyone has to commit a murder. Canada is envied throughout the world. One of the major attributes of this country is certainly its democratic principles and our judicial system no longer provides for the death penalty. Very few democratic countries still have the death penalty in this day and age. Instead of thinking about the death penalty and establishing a committee which will travel throughout Canada to examine how to kill other human beings, should we not ask this committee to try to determine, for instance, what type of organizations we should have to help the victims? What type of committee will we have? We are doing everything for the convicts, but what are we doing for the victims? What are we going to do for the children whose parents have been killed? We are going to execute their murderer. But what about the children? Let us try to be more humane. Let us try to act logically and humanely.

The previous speaker told us about crimes of passion. That makes me laugh. If a man kills his wife, it might be a crime of passion, but he might also have wanted to kill her for 15 years. Can this be considered a crime of passion?

Then, there are murders committed while under the effect of drugs. Such murderers can certainly be rehabilitated. I also heard the previous speaker mention the sick people who kill children. My friend in front of me is a lawyer. It is true that we sometimes hear people say: He is sick because he has killed. However, what many people do not know is that this sick person is not supposed to be at large in society. He is institutionalized for an evaluation, and when... My friend the lawyer, I am not a member of the Bar Association myself, but I think that you will agree with what I am going to say. When he is deemed fit to stand for trial he is supposed to return before the court and be accused for his crime. So there are two possibilities, Mr. Speaker: He is never set free because he is crazy, that is the way to say it, and when he is thought to be no longer crazy, well he stands for trial.

[English]

If you have something to say, sir, say it out loud and I will answer you. I am not a shy type.

Mr. Lewis: I am not heckling you, Carlos.

Mr. Rossi: You had better not.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is not the risk. Some say it is not the risk of executing an innocent man. Some Members have said in this House, indeed the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway)...

[English]

I can say this in English. According to him, there was never a mistake made in this great country of Canada. In 1982—

[Translation]

—the Minister of Canada released Donald Marshall who had been convicted in 1971 for the murder of Sandy Seale. A review of the case 11 years later proved he was innocent. Had he been hanged he would be dead. That is just one case, but there are many others. I know of others, not in Canada, I know of some in Massachussetts, I know of others here and there, but it matters little where, these are human beings who are killed.

Mr. Speaker, I care so much about human life and much—

An Hon. Member: Me too!

Mr. Rossi: I do not know who said "me too", but I for one care about it and to prove it. I was talking about the work of a policeman, because I do not think that in this House, with due respect for all Hon. Members, we hear about statistics. You have been listening to statistics all evening, Mr. Speaker. Some say there have been fewer murders since the death penalty has been abolished. Others say the number has doubled. Well, I think everybody will agree that statistics mean what we want them to mean. But in real life, on the scene, on the battleground one knows what a human life is. And I was there when some guys departed for a better world, Mr. Speaker.

And I remember very vividly because I was a human being even though I was a police officer, first and foremost I was a human being. Some radio commentators who know me will remember this incident because they were there with me.

There was an individual, who had taken a 20-year old girl as hostage in an hotel in the eastern part of Montreal. I am called on the premises at 11.30 p.m., almost at midnight. After three hours of negotiations, the man let the young girl go and tells me: "Mr. Rossi, give me half an hour. I have just escaped from a 10-year bid—he meant 10 years of penitentiary—give me half an hour Mr. Rossi, I want to smoke a cigarette and I will kick off." He meant that life was finished for him. Let me tell you, that I was human as all other police officers. I made his cellmate come out to try to convince him to give up without killing himself. A human life had to be protected. Now the said convict . . . you are signalling me, Mr. Speaker, but I began at 9.33 p.m., unless I cannot read the time. Well, 33. Excuse me.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that man killed himself. He shot himself. We did everything to save his life.

There is another thing that people do not know when I refer to parole. There is something that the people do not know about capital punishment. Several Members in this House do not know it. Do you know that inmates hate jail more than capital punishment? They would rather be hanged than remain in prison. So, capital punishment will not be a deterrent for them. Far from it!

A gangster, a thief, a murderer, must be punished. What is the use of a 12-member jury, a judge, a platoon of lawyers, and the expenditure of a small fortune if, after he is found guilty and sentenced by the judge to 15 years in jail, he comes out after six years? Like some other Hon. Members, I believe that we should have a reform of the prison system, we should be less lenient and when someone is sentenced . . . It is clear, as I said earlier, that the guy behind bars will co-operate. He is going to be a real good guy. However, he is not the same back on the street, Mr. Speaker.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I will say that my position is clear, I am against capital punishment. I would say that despite the very good speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney)—I say very good because, in my humble opinion, it is a good thing to be for all forms of human life and I congratulate him—I cannot praise him for having said that he would give every single Member of this House the opportunity to voice their opinion in this debate on human life. He even said: "Please, Hon. Members, do not let yourselves be swayed by public opinion, vote according to your conscience." Do you have a conscience, ladies and gentlemen of this House? Or is your conduct dictated by opinion polls?

Do not worry! If you have the confidence of your constituents and if they value your judgment, you will be re-elected, even if you voted according to the polls. Thank you. I am against capital punishment.

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for my colleague for Bourassa.

[English]

I understand the turmoil that my hon. colleague has gone through in changing his opinion of some months ago on the capital punishment issue. I sincerely respect the comments he has made tonight. I want to compliment him on his service to the people of Montreal in his former life as one of the new centurians and in his present life as a Member in this Chamber.

The Member mentioned the right of the state to kill and how wrong that was. As he is fully aware, in extreme circumstances our nation and other nations give soldiers the right to kill. In every day circumstances our nation gives our policemen the right to kill. Would he comment on what would happen in this country if we took away that right, the protection we have in our police forces?

Would he also comment on the comments his colleague, the Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), made earlier today? That Member said that the one case in which he can support capital punishment is that of those who have murdered, are in prison, and essentially face no further penalty for killing prison guards or policemen. How does he feel about that issue?

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like first of all to say that my friend and neighbour down the hall did not quite understand my remarks. I did say "except for the state, as in times of war and so on—"

But at no time, when he says that permission is given to police officers to—and I quote:

[English]

—permission is given to police officers to kill. That is very wrong, Mr. Speaker. No police officer is given permission to kill. When a police officer is sworn in, he swears to protect life. To protect life means to protect the life of any human being, whether he is a thief, a priest or your son. You are sworn to protect life. It is not as this Member has said, that we are granted permission to kill.

Mr. Schellenberg: On occasion.

Mr. Rossi: I am sorry, my dear colleague, not on occasion. We are not sworn in to kill. You will not make me say that we are permitted to kill. That is completely false. We have to protect the life of everyone but we do not have to kill.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to interrupt, but it being ten o'clock, pursuant to order made on Friday, June 12, 1987, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow, at ten o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

PRIVILEGE

APPLICATION OF STANDING ORDER 92(2)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a Question of Privilege of which I gave you notice earlier this morning.

Yesterday the chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration called a meeting of the committee to plan the future business of the committee and to deal with recommendations of the steering committee, that is, the subcommittee on agenda and procedure, that the committee meet on Monday, June 29, to examine the policy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to force unemployment insurance beneficiaries to take work as strike breakers, and also to deal with the John Quigley affair.

Rather than deal with the proposals of the steering committee, the majority on the committee forced the committee, first, to meet in camera, and then passed a resolution that the committee would not meet until September 14.

As a result of that action taken by the Government majority, myself and three other members on the committee made a demand under Standing Order 92(2) that the committee meet to deal with the Unemployment Insurance Commission policy with respect to strike breakers. This demand was made by myself, the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) and the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi).

As of this morning we have not yet had a reply from the chairman of the standing committee with respect to our demand and we need 48 hours notice in order for such a meeting to take place. We maintain that the chairman of the standing committee has no discretion in this matter to delay or refuse our request, nor can the majority on the committee do so.

The purpose of Standing Order 92(2) was to ensure the calling of a meeting by a minority on standing committees of this House. We strongly believe that this action taken by the Conservative majority on the committee, and the chairman, to refuse a meeting under Standing Order 92(2), is a violation of our privileges and, in particular, a violation of the privileges of all Members in opposition Parties in this Parliament. This is particularly so in a Parliament such as this where the Government has an overwhelming majority.

If Standing Order 92(2) is to have any meaning whatsoever, it is that four Members of a committee can force that committee to meet when there is an important issue on which it must meet. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that our privileges, the minority Members of this Parliament, the Opposition, are being violated by the action of the majority on the committee by the refusal to act on our demand under Standing Order 92(2) to have a meeting to deal with this important matter.

If you find, Mr. Speaker, that we have a prima facie case of privilege, I will make the appropriate motion to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer you directly to Citation 76 of Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition:

> Breaches of privilege in committee may be dealt with only by the House itself on report from the committee.

Second, I would submit that the committee majority has decided not to sit during the summer as has, I believe, almost every other committee of this House, so that puts them in the majority rather than in the minority.

Third, the four Members of the Opposition who wish to meet Monday, only for their own purposes, have given notice under Standing Order 92(2), which they are entitled to do. But my friend presupposes that the chairman will not call that meeting. This is only the first day of the 10 day period. My goodness, if we are going to have a Question of Privilege, surely it must come at the end of the 10 day period, not on the very first day.

There is no one in breach of Standing Order 92(2) until the expiration of the 10 days. I do not think I need to say anymore than that.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) could wait and I will hear the Hon. Member for Kamloops Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and then I will hear the Hon. Member again.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I find it unfortunate that I feel an obligation to rise on this Question of Privilege this morning. This is a time of year when we are trying to facilitate the business of the House. All Parties are trying to co-operate. We also recognize that the committees are an extension of this House, that the work done in the committees is a reflection of what happens in this House and vice versa.

I believe it is important to recognize this as a unique situation for two reasons; first, the committee was intending to deal with the Unemployment Insurance Commission's approval of the hiring of strike breakers in the Post Office.

Mr. Lewis: Not true.

Mr. Riis: This makes it unique. This is not a typical piece of committee business. I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary not to interrupt. We all listened to him carefully.

Mr. Lewis: Tell the truth. This is hearsay, and you know it.

• (1010)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, that deserves a comment.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East has raised an alleged question of privilege. I have listened to the Parliamentary Secretary who has made his points effectively and succinctly. The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap has the floor. I would ask all Hon. Members to extend the courtesies to that Hon. Member that were extended to both the other Hon. Members in this intervention.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make the point that we are dealing with a very special situation here today at a time when the co-operation of all sides of the House is required. We are dealing with a situation in committee regarding a matter that concerns us all, that is, the impasse between Canada Post and the letter carriers and the hiring of strike-breakers. This is an issue that deserves attention by the appropriate committee, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. That is what is behind a great many of the concerns that we have had in the last 24 hours.

Granted, Standing Order 92(2) indicates that within 10 days of receipt by the Clerk of the Standing Committee of a request signed by any four members of the said committee the chairman of the said committee shall convene such a meeting. Let us also recognize that by its Standing Orders the House will recess on Tuesday. In other words, if the committee chairman were to fulfil the intention of Standing Order 92(2) he could, by following that rule, call for a meeting in September. Obviously, the issue facing us today regarding the hiring of strike-breakers by Canada Post will be an academic issue come September, at least we all hope so. The issue is now; it is before us now. That is why the Hon. Member has indicated that the privileges of the minority members on the committee have been obviously violated.

Considering that we are about to enter into the summer recess and the fact that the hiring of strike-breakers is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity for the committee to deal with now, it is not unrealistic for Hon. members on this day to be concerned that, in spite of the request, the chairman of the committee has not given any indication whether or not there will be a meeting. I simply want to speak in support of my hon. colleague's concern that the privileges of Members of this House have in fact been breached.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to make some very brief comments about the question of privilege raised by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). First, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis) argued against the validity of the question of privilege on the basis of Citation 76 of Beauchesne. I point out that Citation 76 is in the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne which appeared years before the provision of our Standing Orders which the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East relies on in support of his question of privilege. In fact, that section of our Standing Orders was made permanent only a few weeks ago. Thus, I would respectfully submit that the citation is of questionable relevance and validity with respect to the section of our Standing Orders upon which the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East relies, especially since as far as I am aware that section did not exist at the time that Beauchesne's Fifth Edition was published.

Second, if Your Honour looks at the citation itself, the context of the language seems to be with respect to the conduct of witnesses and their failure to attend or to refuse to give evidence rather than the type of situation which the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East is talking about today. If the point made by the Parliamentary Secretary is correct, then members of a committee could decide for themselves whether any of the Standing Orders referring to committees apply to them. I respectfully submit that such a conclusion urged upon Your Honour by the Parliamentary Secretary is patently ridiculous.

The committees of the House are subsidiary bodies of the House and subject to the Standing Orders of the House the same way as the Chamber itself is subject to those orders. Surely, if a committee or the majority of members of a committee are unwilling to follow the Standing Orders, and they are not in a position to decide whether or not the Standing Orders apply to them, then surely this is a matter for Your honour to decide upon as Speaker of the House responsible for applying the Standing Orders to the House and any and all of its subsidiary bodies.

I submit that it is clearly a matter touching upon the privileges of all Members of the House whether or not a committee or a majority of members of a committee follow the Standing Orders.

The Parliamentary Secretary attempts to play down the significance of four members of the committee having made a request for a meeting of the committee pursuant to Standing Order 92(2) because they are members of the Opposition. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Standing Orders of the House adopted unanimously by the House—in fact on the proposal of the Government—make no distinction whatsoever between members of the Opposition and members of the Government majority when it comes to determining the validity of the request provided for and permitted under Standing Order 92(2). The request for a meeting provided for under Standing order 92(2) is just as valid if it is made by four opposition Members as if it were made by government Members, or by a mixture of government Members and opposition Members.

Therefore, the question for Your Honour to decide is whether the unwillingness of the majority members of the committee to act pursuant to the clear wording of the Standing Orders of the House involves a question of privilege, not only of the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East but of all Members of the House. I submit that it does.

If it were possible for the majority members of the committee to follow the rules of the House on committee meetings as they see fit, it would make a mockery of what this House has decided on with respect to the application of the Standing Orders to committees and the way that the committees should act. It would make a mockery of all the pretensions of the Government with respect to parliamentary reform which was supposed to make committees more important and more useful for all Members of the House, including members of the Opposition.

Finally, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader argues that the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East is premature because there are still 10 sitting days within which the chairman of the committee should convene a meeting. But the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East, I think, will be pointing out—but I want to put this on the record now—that the majority of members of the committee, supporters of the Government, passed a resolution stating that they would not meet until September. In effect, they have given their answer. Unfortunately, that answer is that they do not care about the rules of the House.

I respectfully submit that you, Sir, acting on behalf of us all have to say very clearly that the members of a committee, even though they are a majority supporting the Government, have to obey the rules to the same extent as the rest of us.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in reply to two of the arguments of the Parliamentary Secretary. First, he said that questions of privilege arising in committee could only be dealt with on a report from that committee. In this case the committee refuses to meet even to consider the question of privilege.

Second, he says under Standing Order 92(2) that the chairman has 10 days from the receipt of a notice by four members to call the meeting. The rule also says that 48 hours' notice must be given of such a meeting. We all know that Parliament has only two more days of sitting after today, next Monday and Tuesday, before it must adjourn for the summer. If we are to have this meeting before we adjourn for the summer, then the 48 hours' notice would have to be given today.

The steering committee of that committee resolved and made a report to the full committee that the committee should take up the issue of whether or not the Unemployment Insurance Commission was forcing unemployed workers to take jobs as strike-breakers or else they would lose their unemployment insurance benefits, and were saying, "here are these jobs at the Post Office, take them", and if they refused to take them, it said, "you lose your benefits".

Members of Parliament on that committee have received calls indicating that that is what is being done. We do not know whether or not it is being done. That is why we wanted to call the committee to examine this very important issue which affects the ongoing postal strike.

If we cannot meet on Monday or Tuesday to have the Unemployment Insurance Commission deal with the issue and answer whether or not it is being done, then we will not have an opportunity to do so.

If Standing Order 92(2) means anything at all, it means that four members of a committee can oblige the sitting of a committee to deal with issues such as this, even when the majority may not want to do so. Why did we decide to include that rule in the previous round of reforms? It was just for that reason, so that a committee would have to meet on the request of four members to deal with certain specified issues.

By the committee refusing to respond and grant us our request today, we will not be able to do it before the House adjourns. I submit that our privileges in the Opposition, and the privileges of all Members are being harmed by this lack of decision and/or the decision of the committee not to meet at all during the summer months.

By the way, we are not asking in this case to meet during the summer; we are asking to meet next week, next Monday or Tuesday, while the House is still sitting.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I see no reason to reply to my colleague's recent comments.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) has raised a specific complaint that he and other members of the Standing Committee of Labour, Employment and Immigration have heard allegations that unemployment insurance officials are telling people who are receiving UIC benefits that they can no longer receive those benefits unless they take jobs at the Post Office which, as all Hon. Members know, is in a strike position.

The Hon. Member's complaint—and presumably it is the complaint of other members on the committee who join with him—is that if the Post Office is doing this, it ought not to be doing so because it is forcing unemployed workers to act as strike-breakers.

The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East has clearly stated to the Chair and to the House, as I am sure he would, quite frankly, that he does not know whether this allegation is in fact true. However, he says that what he wishes and what other members of the committee wish to do is have a meeting of the committee so that the matter can be pursued.

The Standing Order under which the Hon. Member seeks recourse within the committee—and Hon. Members will note that I said "within the committee"—is Standing Order 92(2), which reads as follows:

> Within ten sitting days of the receipt, by the clerk of a standing committee, of a request signed by any four members of the said committee, the Chairman of the said committee shall convene such a meeting provided that forty-eight-hours' notice is given of the meeting. For the purposes of this Standing Order, the reasons for convening such a meeting shall be stated in the request.

As has been pointed out by the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), it is a Standing Order which has just been confirmed by the House. The Hon. Member for Windsor West argued that because it is a new order, Citation 76 from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, which was given to the Chair by the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary, is not relevant. That citation is to the effect that it is not for the Chair to interfere with the internal workings of a committee.

It is the Chair's view that the citation in Beauchesne's to which the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary referred is not made irrelevant at all just because there are some new rules and, as a consequence, the Chair must pay a lot of attention to that.

The general rule is that a complaint about the workings of a committee is not something with which the Chair in normal circumstances is entitled to interfere or to try to set right, unless of course it is in fact a question of privilege that is carefully defined—and it has been so for decades—as something that is being done which makes it impossible for or diminishes the capacity of Hon. Members to do their duty as Members of Parliament.

The complaint the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East brought to the Chair is one which is, certainly in the minds of some Hon. Members, a serious one, and it may well be in the minds of most Hon. Members of this place. However, I cannot make this decision on the basis of the complaint itself.

What the Unemployment Insurance Commission is or is not doing is, as the Hon. Member said, not clear yet. Even if it were clear, that cannot in itself be the basis for a ruling of privilege by the Chair. As legitimate as the point may be, the Chair must remind Hon. Members that it is the responsibility of the Chair to rule on procedural matters, not on matters extraneous to the procedure, no matter how important they may be in fact.

The Hon. Member has asked the Chair to intervene by saying that the privilege of Hon. Members has been breached as a consequence of one of two things, or perhaps both; first, the majority of the committee having decided, apparently, that they do not want to meet until after the summer is over, and second, the refusal, at least so far this morning, of the Chairman to convene a meeting as a consequence of a notice given to the Chairman on behalf of four members pursuant to the rule.

Whatever the rule might have been intended to mean, other than how it appears on its face, the Chair is in a difficult position in this case because the Chair must read the rule as it is actually stated. What the rule says is, "Within ten sitting days of the receipt". I quote these words, but the effect is that within ten sitting days of the receipt of a notice—and I am assuming for the purposes of this ruling that the notice was properly given—the Chairman shall convene a meeting and forty-eight hours' notice must be given of that meeting.

The Chair reads that to mean that under this rule the Chairman must convene that meeting or must give notice of that meeting within ten sitting days of the receipt, which means that the meeting could take place some days, certainly, after receipt of the notice.

The difficulty of the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East and of the other members who want this meeting is that unless something should change—and of course the Chair assumes nothing at this point, except that there is some expectation that the House will adjourn this coming Tuesday—the chairperson of the committee may not decide to set a date or give notice to have a meeting during the next three sitting days, that is, today, Monday, and Tuesday. If that should happen, the next sitting day the rule would apply to would be sometime after the House reconvenes in September.

It is not for the Chair to comment on whether the chairman or other members of the committee ought or ought not to make some special effort to comply with the request that has come in. It might very well be that Members would prefer that the Chair did not comment at all on what they want to do. It is certainly not the place of the Chair to do so.

It is because, at least as of this morning, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East and the other Members who have asked for a meeting have had no response one way or the other, except a clear indication from the committee that they do not want to sit until September under after the House reconvenes, that this complaint is brought to the Chair.

As I have said, the matter is not one that is frivolous. It is certainly one that this particular committee, if it were disposed to hear it, would have every right to hear and perhaps ought to hear. Unfortunately, and I say this with some regret to the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East, the Chair cannot find under these circumstances a prima facie case of privilege.

Again, the Chair is in a position where it is not appropriate for the Chair to try to intervene in the workings of the committee. The effect is, of course, that if members of the committee are not able to have some further discussion today or Monday, it may well be that, because of the wording of the rule, the committee will not have before it this matter which, as I have said, at least on the basis of the allegations is certainly of interest and seriousness.

However, that is a situation in which we all find ourselves as a consequence of the two things; the wording of the rule and the fact that an adjournment is scheduled for sometime this coming Tuesday. I would point out to the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East and to other Members that there are some opportunities available today, Monday and Tuesday when this matter can be raised. It may be possible for the Hon. Members to find some clarification through Question Period or by some other means, and possibly a resolution of the problem about which they are concerned may be there. I regret to have to advise the Hon. Member and his colleagues that under the circumstances it is not appropriate for the Chair to try to intervene.

I want to thank all Hon. Members, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East for raising this matter, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis) for his succinct remarks and the Hon. Member for Windsor West and the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis). I would hope that perhaps some Hon. Members could gather together in the next little while and perhaps a discussion would help resolve the difficulty.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State for Finance) moved that a Ways and Means motion with respect to the Imposition of Taxes in the Nova Scotia Offshore area and to amend the Income Tax Act, laid upon the Table Thursday, June 25, 1987, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Copyright Act

COPYRIGHT ACT

The House resumed from Monday, June 15, consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald that Bill C-60, an Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, when I opened debate on Bill C-60 on June 15, I mentioned that we were introducing long overdue amendments to the Copyright Act and that this was the first package of amendments that would come before the House. The House will realize, of course, that there has been no major revision of the Copyright Act since it was introduced in 1924. Therefore, we are very pleased to be able to bring these amendments forward.

I had begun to list the various measures that are included in this first package of amendments to the Copyright Act. The first measure dealt with collectives.

The collective approach has many advantages. For users, lengthy searches for copyright owners and protracted negotiations on royalty payments for each individual use are eliminated by the extension of collectives. The result is quick, easy access to protected works for users. On the other hand, for copyright owners, there is remuneration that might otherwise never have been received. There is also greater protection. Collectives have the resources to monitor the use made of works in their repertoires, insist on royalties and even sue for infringement if necessary. I know that in addition to the existing performing rights societies, namely, CAPAC and PROCAN, some similar groups are already forming and are eager to receive the go ahead that this legislation would provide.

Visual artists, for example, have banded together in Vis-Art Copyright Inc. which licences the right to reproduce its works in books, calendars, greeting cards, films and so forth. This provides a new source of income for artists. The new provisions on collectives will give Vis-Art and other newly formed groups the legal recognition needed to operate collectively. Because of the obvious benefits for both users and owners, the Government feels that the collective exercise of copyright should be explicitly encouraged in our Copyright Act.

The second measure deals with the copyright board. The collective exercise of rights does entail, as we know, possible abuses. Whenever a combination of individuals together controls access to, and use of, a particular goods or service, there is the potential for anti-competitive behaviour. In other words, if the only practical access to a particular right is through one collective, this collective can achieve such a dominant bargaining position that the interests of potential customers are not sufficiently safeguarded.

Our existing copyright law provides for a regulatory body, the Copyright Appeal Board, vested with the authority to separate after hearing from interested parties. But under the present Act, only musical performing rights associations are under the jurisdiction of the Copyright Appeal Board. The revised Act would extend the jurisdiction of a new board to be known simply as the Copyright Board to include all collectives of copyright owners. This board will continue to set and regulate royalty rates. It will also be able to make binding decisions whenever collectives and those who wish to use their members' works are unable to reach an agreement. In response to a request for arbitration from either party, the board may set what it feels to be a fair royalty rate.

We believe that users will prefer the simplicity of the collective administration of one particular right to the more difficult approach of dealing with greater numbers of individuals and groups. They will rely on the Copyright Board to ensure reasonable rates and copyright owners will also welcome the board's regulation because it will preserve their right to band together for their own protection. That is to say, to the extent that specific activities are regulated by the Copyright Board, they will be shielded from the competition act under an exemption encompassing activities subject to federal or provincial regulation.

The introduction of a system of collectives regulated by a copyright board will benefit both users and owners of copyright. This will encourage creative activity in Canada and will ensure freer access to copyright materials by all users.

The third measure has to do with the abolition of compulsory sound recording licences, a very welcome measure indeed. The Bill responds to the changing circumstances in the music industry. The present Copyright Act provides for a compulsory licence for sound recording. It has been there for 60 years. Under this provision, a company or an individual has the right to make a second recording of any musical work once a first recording has been made by paying the copyright owner a statutory royalty of two cents. This royalty has been in effect for some 60 years and is one of the lowest in the world.

[Translation]

Originally, compulsory licenses were brought in to promote the development of new businesses in the Canadian sound recording industry. Sixty years ago, there was a fear that the industry would be dominated by a small number of large companies if music editors could use their exclusive rights to set high rates for the recording of musical works.

However, the legislation on competition has already eliminated the threat of such monopolies. Moreover, it seemed inappropriate to continue to deny copyright holders the right to determine who can record their works and in what circumstances.

[English]

Rather than being forced to sell to anyone at an arbitrarily established price, owners should be given the right to negotiate the most favourable terms possible with potential copyright owners and that is what this Bill will ensure.

The fourth measure deals with moral rights. As Hon. Members know, there is more at stake in the exploitation of a work than economic reward. Creative works are very much the expression of the personality of their authors. Creators cannot be fully protected unless their moral rights are recognized. Such moral rights include the protection of the integrity of the finished work, guarding it from any distortion, alteration or other modification.

Thus, if red ribbons are tied around the necks of sculpted figures as happened to a work by Michael Snow not long ago, the artist would no longer have to seek special legal redress since the new law would guarantee the artist's right to protect the integrity of his or her work.

Moral rights also include preventing a work from being used against its creator's wishes, in association with a product, service, cause or institution as if to imply endorsement. The present Bill specifies that moral rights are to be protected as carefully as economic rights. In fact, all the legal remedies that are now available for copyright infringement will be available for moral rights violations. This will be just as important an encouragement to creative activities as the measures I have already described. It has been welcomed by Canada's artists.

Fifth, is the measure that deals with the rights of exhibition. It is another important new right being provided in the Bill before the House. Creators of visual arts, for the sake of their reputations and integrity, will be entitled to control in what context and under what circumstances their works are to be displayed and to be compensated for this exhibition. Considering that the right of public performance of musical and dramatic works is already protected, it is only fitting to offer similar protection to visual art works.

The sixth measure deals with the protection of choreographic works. The social and cultural transformations that have overtaken the Copyright Act leaving some types of creative endeavour without sufficient protection include a very important development in the field of dance. Sixty years ago when the Act was drafted, choreographic works were characterized by a plot or a sequence of action and were therefore protected under the category of dramatic works. Now, of course, many choreographic works are visually pleasing, aesthetic compositions without any particular story line. In order to protect works in a field in which so many Canadians continue to distinguish themselves, Bill C-60 makes protection explicit for all choreography, whether or not it has a story line.

Three of the measures included in the Bill are being introduced in conjunction with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre), who has worked with me in the preparation of the present legislation before the House. The first of those measures that fall within his jurisdiction has to do with the protection of computer software. In addition to transformations within categories of creative endeavour, entirely new categories have developed since the original Copyright Act was passed. Think, for example, of the knowledge, the originality and the imagination required to develop computer software.

Software development is rapidly becoming a major industry in Canada. Computer programs are clearly intellectual property entitled to copyright protection. However, since computers were unheard of back in 1924 when the Act was drafted, special court judgments have been required until now to safeguard the rights of software creators. The Bill before the House today will protect these software creators by including computer programs under the definition of literary works in the Copyright Act.

According to some estimates about some popular computer programs, one illegal copy exists for every one purchased from the legitimate owners. This measure will help ensure that creators in this dynamic field receive the rewards due to them and this will encourage further progress in a field that is vital to our economic development and international competitiveness.

The second measure that falls within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has to do with increased penalties for the sale of unauthorized copies. We realize that artists and creators will not be properly protected if the penalties for infringement of copyright are an insufficient deterrent. The maximum penalty for breaking the existing copyright law is only $200. This is clearly inadequate, given the enormous profits presently being made through the illegal copying and sale of books, records, video-tapes and computer programs. Therefore, the new Bill provides for fines of up to $1 million and penalties of up to five years in jail for conviction on indictment of copyright infringement.

The final measure in this grouping has to do with copyright and industrial design. While certain types of creative endeavour have been left without protection under the Copyright Act, other types protected elsewhere seemed to have been granted redundant protection. Specifically, designers of utilitarian objects which ought to be covered by the Industrial Design Act have been found potentially eligible for full copyright protection by recent judicial decisions. The uncertainty caused by these decisions has created a pressing need to clarify the present wording of the law.

The Copyright Act should not be transformed into a kind of a catch-all legislation protecting works for which copyright is not appropriate. Bill C-60 will therefore provide an objective means of determining whether or not an article can be protected by copyright, industrial design, both, or neither.

• (1050)

As I said, this Bill deals only with a certain number of issues under the Copyright Act. Because of the obvious urgency of copyright reform, the Government decided to proceed with revision in two stages rather than waiting to submit an omnibus Bill at a later date. The matters to be addressed in the second phase have just as high a priority as those presently before the House. However, because of the complexity of these issues, the drafting of legislation to address them has not yet been completed. Nevertheless, it is my firm intention to introduce this second phase of amendments just as quickly as possible.

In conclusion, a recognition of creators' rights stimulates creative activity and the flow of intellectual products to our cultural industries. It secures returns to creators and entrepreneurs and encourages capital investment in high cost technology. Copyright provides a legal basis for the publishing, film and recording industries and will now ensure the same for the computer industry. It is a fundamental element of cultural policy which can help ensure Canadian cultural development, Canadian sovereignty, and a national identity.

In the final analysis, copyright stimulates the economy by creating jobs and encouraging investment. It is estimated that $10 billion or 3.2 per cent of our Gross National Product is generated by industries dependent upon copyright. The legislation now before us will reinforce the Canadian cultural sector, contribute to the development of a copyright industry, and stimulate the creation of high-technology jobs. For all of those reasons, I urge that Bill C-60 be referred to a legislative committee for deliberation and study just as quickly as possible.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to assure the Minister that I agree with her and look forward to swift passage of Bill C-60. While I think we need to look at and clarify a few issues, I assure her that she has my support.

Canada's present copyright laws are a marvel of antiquity. They were written in 1924 when piano rolls and silent films were king. It was a time when a composer was satisfied to receive two cents each time a recording of his song was sold, and when a computer was a person equipped with an adding machine. Times have changed and it is time that this law reflects those changes.

Copyright law allows for the exercise of economic as well as moral rights. For most Canadians copyright will never be a household word, yet these laws vitally affect many activities which are of immense importance and interest in a developed society. The conduct and ethic of the businesses touched include the press, radio, television, computer software, cable television, satellites, the recording, film and theatre industries, home entertainment, books, magazines, architecture and music. In fact, almost anything that makes life worth living. Therefore, copyright legislation must reflect the legal recognition of the exclusive right of creators to determine the use of their work and to enable them to share in the benefits.

The goal in this Act is to protect intellectual property and strike a healthy balance between copyright owners and users. In 1984 the Liberal Government issued a White Paper on copyright entitled From Gutenberg to Telidon. In 1985 a Commons subcommittee held hearings across the country on revisions to the Copyright Act and its report became known as a charter of rights for creators. Both documents provided greater protection to those who rely on copyright for their living, the creators of books, songs and other intellectual property.

While we recognize the urgency and priority of new copyright legislation, we must also recognize it is not a solution in and of itself. As stated by the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee, commonly known as the Applebaum/Hébert report, in 1982, no one should be under the delusion that copyright legislation by itself will solve either the economic or social problems of all authors.

Copyright legislation serves best those authors whose works appeal to large segments of the public wherever in the world they be. It cannot solve the social and economic problems of those authors whose works, although they may have great aesthetic and academic value, will earn very little because they appeal to relatively small numbers of users.

Therefore, I underscore my ongoing concern, and I believe that of the Minister, that passage of this legislation will not suffice for the creators of much of Canada's artistic community. The cultural support programs already in place must continue. I refer to the book publishing policy, postal subsidies, museum assistance, Indian cultural development and art programs, film development programs, funding for sound recording programs, payments to Canadian authors for use of their works in public libraries, cultural initiative programs, assistance to the performing arts, Bill C-58, the advertising regulations for magazines and television, and the simultaneous advertising substitution for cable distributors.

In the report From Gutenberg to Telidon we note that the value of the work of Canadian industries concerned with copyright law is now $10 billion. This is equivalent to 2.2 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product. Actual copyright payments totalled more than $1 billion. Perhaps a lot of people will find that they knew very little about these facts and figures and will now start to recognize the worth of these industries. If so, they might pay a little more attention. Of that $1 billion, 67 per cent is paid to Canadian sources and 33 per cent to non-Canadian sources.

It should be noted, however, that the radio and television industries accounted for 75 per cent of the total, with 82 per cent of those payments going to Canadian sources. With respect to the publishing, recording and film industries, just 22 per cent of those payments go to Canadian sources while the remaining 78 per cent was paid to foreign rights owners.

Last month the Government introduced the first of two stages of the copyright revisions. Bill C-60 has received favourable acclaim from Canadian artists. It addresses computer programs, anti-piracy remedies, the relationship of copyright and industrial design legislation, the Copyright Board, collective management of copyright, moral rights, protection of choreography works, the abolition of compulsory licences for the making of sound recordings, and the right to exhibit artistic works in public.

I would like to give a small amount of background information on the part dealing with computer programs, offences and penalties, which is often referred to as the piracy section. The revenues from systems and application of software and custom software development as forecast for the Canadian software industry was to be in the range of $1.5 billion in 1986. We are told this Bill will give the software industry the same protection against illegal copying as has already been accorded to books. The software industry estimates that illegal copying has cost it close to $400 million a year. The legislation will now give software copyright the protection it now gives to books; that is, protection to authors for lifetime plus 50 years. It increases as well the current $200 maximum penalty to $1 million or a five-year prison term. Thus, the Bill recommends penalties which will be efficient and effective deterrents.

Casey August, Director of Intellectual Property at IBM Canada Limited, a major software developer as well as the country's largest computer company, says:

> It is important that the legislation very clearly states that it is the message that is protected without reference to the media on which it is recorded.

Casey wants legal protection, not only for diskettes but for microchips, compact disks, and other media containing proprietary information.

Mr. Speaker: I very much regret to interrupt the Hon. Member. I hope I have interrupted at a point at which her very interesting speech can be continued very easily when she resumes debate. However, it is now time for Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 21

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

TREATY TERMS—ALLEGED VIOLATIONS

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Oxford Dictionary defines a treaty as a formally concluded and ratified agreement between nations, one that a country is bound by. Canada has a number of treaties with Indian nations within Canada. These treaties are recognized and affirmed in our Constitution.

Treaty No. 9 in northern Ontario was signed in 1905, and ten years ago Treaties Nos. 6 and 7 in western Canada observed the centennial commemoration of their treaties and focused attention on the meaning of these documents. The chiefs of treaty Indian nations repeatedly express dismay that the treaty promises have not been kept by Canada and many of their people continue to live in poverty.

In 1977 Prince Charles, while visiting western Canada and speaking on behalf of the Government, acknowledged these hardships and stressed that the Government wished to work out solutions jointly with the Indian people. In fact the Government and Indian leaders have different perceptions regarding Indian treaties and this leads to violations of the treaties by Canada.

I say to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that it is time for a national conference on Indian treaties in order to determine clearly and precisely the obligations by which Canada is bound.

CHILD CARE

OPPOSITION TO UNIVERSAL SYSTEM

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I and many of my constituents do not believe in universal child care. Why should the taxpayers provide child care for the wealthy who are quite able financially to look after their own children, either in privately operated centres or by hiring a nanny? Under universality, in some cases children of the wealthy fill the centres leaving no room for children of single parents.

I am all in favour of helping those who need it, but we should not be taxing everybody, including the low and middle-income families, to pay for day care centres for the children of the rich. Furthermore, the parents in the low and middle-income groups, and even many in the wealthy classes where one parent stays at home to look after the children, object strenuously to paying taxes to take care of the children of the wealthy.

Let us provide excellent care for the children of parents who need it. Universality sounds nice but is absolutely unfair to those who look after their own children and to a majority of the people who pay the taxes.

IMMIGRATION

FOREIGN DOMESTIC WORKERS PROGRAM

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in two Globe and Mail articles today Judy Steed outlines the plight of "May"—not her real name—a domestic worker who, after spending five years in Canada, did not qualify under the Foreign Domestic Workers Program even though she had met all the normal requirements. May's unfortunate problem was having responsibilities in Jamaica for four school age children.

The Foreign Domestic Workers Program allows women from developing countries to work in Canada as badly needed nannies mainly because of insufficient day care spaces. However, these women are not acceptable to Canada as landed immigrants unless they leave domestic work and have no responsibilities outside Canada.

The Government is telling the thousands of domestic workers in this country, as well as parents, that the care and nurturing of future generations of Canadians is worthless. The Government is telling domestic workers that house work and child care are not a career.

I call on the Government to reform the Foreign Domestic Workers Program and allow these women landed status on the basis of what they are doing now.

NAVIGATIONAL SAFETY

LAC SAINT-JEAN—IMPORTANCE OF NEW HYDROGRAPHIC MAPS

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, immediately after my election in September 1984, I received an important request from residents of my constituency.

Everyone is familiar with the size of the interior sea we call the Lac Saint-Jean. It gives great pleasure to those who live along its shores, to the many tourists who come to swim in it, as well as to the great number of boaters who sail its waters.

It is mostly on behalf of these boaters that I am rising today. Even before I was elected, the Lac Saint-Jean boaters had requested new hydrographic surveys. As the lake is difficult to navigate, these maps are essential for the safety of boaters.

The Canadian Hydrographic Service told us that these maps would be published first in the spring of 1985, then of 1986, and then of 1987. Now, we are told that they will be published on July 13th.

On behalf of my constituents, I would like to thank the Canadian Hydrographic Service for having acted quickly in this matter to make navigation on Lac Saint-Jean safer.

THE CONSTITUTION

1987 CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding my support in principle for the Meech Lake

Constitutional Accord; notwithstanding my fervent hope that appropriate amendments will be made to ensure that Governments will preserve and promote the fundamental characteristics of Canada, which include the rights of English-speaking Canadians in Quebec and the rights of French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec; notwithstanding my desire to see that the Accord recognizes that the unique character of Canada is its bilingual, multicultural and native aspects; and notwithstanding my concerns about the restrictive way in which Clause 16 of the Accord has been drafted and can give rise to serious Charter constraints, my most serious concern about the Accord is that it makes no attempt to revoke the "notwithstanding" clause in the Charter of Rights, the clause which provides that the rights and freedoms of Canadians can be taken away at the whim of any Government.

It is totally unacceptable that the rights and freedoms guaranteed to Canadians should be taken away for five minutes, let alone five years, as permitted by the "notwithstanding" clause. Adequate protection is to be found in Clause 1 defining "reasonable justification".

The November, 1986, resolution of my Party advocates the repeal of this clause. It is unfortunate for Canada that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) missed the opportunity to press his provincial counterparts for the repeal of this most invidious and offensive clause. I sincerely hope that it will be addressed in the near future.

WOMEN

EMPLOYMENT—WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY ACTION TRAVAIL DES FEMMES

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in a unanimous ruling which will probably have a major impact on the labour market, the Supreme Court of Canada maintained yesterday an order issued in 1984 by a tribunal of the Human Rights Commission forcing the Canadian National Company to implement a special hiring program for women.

This ruling represents a hard-earned victory for the organization which launched this fight against discrimination, Action Travail des Femmes, a Montreal group devoted to the promotion of women in occupational sectors traditionally dominated by men.

The CN is one of the largest employers in Canada and a very small group has succeeded in getting a very significant ruling against this corporation.

In its 1984 ruling following 150 individual complaints; the tribunal of the Commission supported the claim of Action Travail des Femmes that the CN was using discriminatory hiring and recruiting practices by refusing women the possibility of holding certain unskilled manual jobs allotted to men. Late in 1981, only 57 women had manual jobs in the St. Lawrence region of the CN, or just 0.7 per cent of all workers in the region.

Mr. Speaker, this is one more step towards equality for women. The results of this ruling will be felt not only in businesses under federal jurisdiction, but also in all equal opportunity programs in other provinces.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HIRING OF WOMEN

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this week we celebrate the Supreme Court of Canada ruling that Human Rights Tribunals can set hiring quotas for companies that discriminate against women and other disadvantaged groups.

In 1984 the Human Rights Tribunal discovered that the recruitment, hiring and promotion policies at CN Railway prevented and discouraged women from moving into blue collar jobs and ordered CN to meet a hiring quota. CN appealed to the Federal Court of Canada and had the ruling overturned. However, the women of Quebec, led by Action Travail des Femmes, refused to remain silent when their rights were in jeopardy and appealed the decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In a landmark decision, Chief Justice Brian Dickson overruled the Federal Court, ordered the restoration of the Tribunal's 1984 order, and dismissed a cross-appeal by the railway company.

This ruling in the Supreme Court will have a lasting impact on women and minority groups far into Canada's future. Due to the perseverance of Action Travail des Femmes we have taken a positive step toward eliminating systemic discrimination in employment for women and minorities.

THE ECONOMY

IMPORTANCE OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the outcome of the election in Great Britain eloquently attests to renewed confidence in private enterprise, in individual initiative, in productive efforts, and in fair competition. The socialists across the floor entertain doubts about this message from London. Consider Moscow. What do they make of Mr. Gorbachev's draconian approach to the spirit of enterprise, the notion of profit, decentralization and responsibility?

The agenda of the Soviet plenum which opened yesterday is clear, and I quote: "It is devoted to Party work concerning the radical economic management restructuration".

Mr. Speaker, in the context of Great Britain and the USSR, the socialists on the other side are totally refuted and abandoned. Before nationalizing, regulating and distributing unearned wealth, their leader ought to phone Michael Gorbachev, a gesture which would modernize these dissidents!

LABOUR RELATIONS

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—ATTEMPT TO REDUCE NUMBER OF BARGAINING UNITS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Government is not only riding roughshod over the rights of the letter carriers in the present postal strike, it is out to break unions wherever it possibly can.

A great example of this is taking place at the Cape Breton Development Corporation in Cape Breton, where until recently there were 12 bargaining units representing 7 different unions. The corporation wanted to eliminate some of these bargaining units. While that may be admirable as far as it goes, it does not require a corporation to tell people to give up their bargaining unit.

Three of the unions, the International Association of Machinists, the nurses' union, and the United Transportation Union, want to maintain their own identity.

The Cape Breton Development Corporation is saying that there are too many illegal stoppages. The International Association of Machinists have only lost 12 days through illegal strikes and have only had one legal strike in 47 years. In 10 years the nurses' union has only had one grievance, which it won.

The workers of this country should be able to maintain their bargaining units. It is a right that the Government should respect.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORTHERN TRAINING CENTRE—SUGGESTED LOCATION IN INUVIK

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the White Paper on National Defence, with its re-emphasis on Canadian territorial, particularly northern, defence, has been extremely well received in the North, the defence needs of which had been neglected for so long by previous Governments.

The establishment of a northern training centre is an excellent idea which ought to be put into effect as soon as possible.

A location will be needed with an existing infrastructure, variety of terrain, and one which is suitable for land, sea and air operations. Might I invite the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Beatty) to consider Inuvik which combines all these attributes together with a long and friendly association with the military, as probably being the best site in the Arctic for the new training facility.

SPORTS

CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE—END OF MONTREAL ALOUETTES' FRANCHISE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with sports fans across Canada in expressing my concern about the future of the Canadian Football League.

I want to say at the outset that I believe strongly that Canadian football can survive and prosper. However, in order to do that it will take a concerted effort from all those involved, the owners and management of all teams, the players, the fans and the communities involved, and all levels of government.

The collapse of the Montreal Alouettes a couple of days ago, while coming as a shock to all of us, was really not a complete surprise. Dark clouds had been building over the CFL and this franchise for a number of years.

Nevertheless, it was still a tragic day for professional sport in Canada. The CFL, and the Alouettes in particular, are a Canadian institution which has brought a great deal of pleasure and no small sense of pride to Canadians for many years.

As our cultural and sport industries come under increasing domination from south of the border, the CFL, and Canada's unique brand of football, become increasingly important as a source of national unity, and national and regional pride.

The CFL can survive but it will take all of us to make it do so. Let us pull together and ensure a healthy future for Canadian football.

FISHERIES

DRIFT NET EXPERIMENTS—CALL FOR CANCELLATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago I had the opportunity to attend the Canada-U.S. interparliamentary group meetings in Vancouver. I was part of Committee 3 which was discussing areas of mutual environmental concern.

Something which we all agreed upon as Canadians and Americans was the horrible practice of the Japanese and others in the Pacific Ocean with respect to the use of drift nets. Imagine my embarrassment when I found out subsequent to that meeting that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) not only allowed a drift net experiment last year but, after making several lofty speeches about how horrible this practice was, allowed another experiment to continue in drift netting. Drift netting is the marine equivalent of clear-cutting. It is totally abominable and unacceptable.

I call on the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to cancel this experiment, to give some credibility to Canada's international voice on this issue, and to work actively to have all other nations stop this horrible practice of using drift nets.

OPPOSITION TO FOOD TAX

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, having slapped taxes on prescription drugs, soft drinks and long distance phone calls, the Government—contrary to the answers given in the House by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson)—clearly and definitely intends to tax food. Just look at pages 10 and 11 of the brochure Tax Reform 1987—Sales Tax where the Government clearly indicates the process leading to a tax on food.

Mr. Speaker, I serve notice on the Prime Minister and the Conservative Government that a country-wide action plan will be launched as early as this summer. Petitions will be forwarded to 3,000 organizations to make sure that this Government never gets around to taxing food, bread and butter.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

SUPREME COURT JUDGMENT—OPPORTUNITY FOR GOVERNMENT TO ACT

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Supreme Court of Canada released its judgment on the equal opportunity program.

Pursuant to this Supreme Court decision, henceforth CN Railway will have to offer 25 per cent of its blue collar jobs to women until such time as they make up 13 per cent of all CN staff. By ruling in favour of Action Travail des Femmes, the Supreme Court has paved the way for women to gain access to jobs which, by tradition, are open to men only. We can only rejoice at this decision.

Yesterday, however, Mr. Gordon Fairweather made a statement to the daily newspaper La Presse asking the Government to enforce its employment equity legislation much more rigourously. On a number of occasions this year, the head of the Human Rights Commission told the Government that its employment equity legislation for women was not producing concrete results. He publicly urged the Conservative Government to act more firmly and make its employment equity program compulsory. Perhaps the Conservative Government will draw inspiration from the Supreme Court ruling to show leadership by enforcing Bill C-62 so that Crown corporations will give women equal opportunities under their employment programs.

TRADE

REPORTED LETTER FROM UNITED STATES PRESIDENT TO PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Could he confirm a report in today's La Presse that the Prime Minister received a letter from President Reagan, stating that the U.S. would go along with a trade dispute mechanism that would be applied only at the discretion of the United States, especially in the case of free trade talks?

Did the President really say that in his letter to the Prime Minister? And what was the response of the Prime Minister of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that I received, as I do from time to time, a query from the President of the United States, following comments I made to him in Venice, and which constitutes a major step towards a final settlement, I hope, of this aspect of the problem.

I will not comment on the contents of the letter or my answer, except to say that we are making the kind of progress that is normal in this kind of situation.

REQUEST THAT NEGOTIATIONS BE TERMINATED

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that it has been our position ever since the imposition of the U.S. countervail on the export of Canadian lumber to the United States and, indeed, I understand it to be the position of his Government as well, that a binding trade dispute mechanism must be an essential part of any trade agreement with the United States. It appears that the United States is not willing to contemplate that mechanism. It also appears that the United States is not willing to exempt Canada in any meaningful way from its unilateral remedy position even after a free trade agreement is signed.

Will the Prime Minister not admit, therefore, that if there is not to be a binding trade dispute mechanism, if there is not to be some meaningful restriction on the unilateral imposition of countervail, he might well order his negotiator to break off negotiations because there is no further point to those negotiations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says he received advice that the Americans are not willing to contemplate such a proposal and are not willing to exempt Canada. We have received no such advice at all. We have received indications of positions, bargaining positions, I presume, of the American administration, and we have received no such indications, definitive indications, of positions whatsoever.

I have indicated many times that I believe an important part of the rationale for the building of a free trade arrangement is the promotion of our mutual trading interests. It would be self-defeating if, within the parameters of such an agreement, there was an instrument that vitiated the notion of this free access, in other words, if a free trade arrangement contained the capacity for one party unilaterally to trigger retaliatory measures against the other. The object of the exercise is to find a mechanism that will resolve those matters without that unilateral capacity to trigger reprisals of that kind.

That is the philosophy that motivates our negotiators. That is the mandate we have given our negotiators, and we have received no position, definitive position, from the other side, declaring this to be unacceptable from their point of view.

APPLICATION OF UNITED STATES LAW—REQUEST THAT PRESIDENT'S LETTER BE TABLED

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have had it confirmed that the letter does exist, as the Prime Minister has also admitted in the House, and that in that letter the President of the United States expresses the unwillingness of the American administration to exempt Canada from those unilateral remedies, particularly by way of a compulsory submission to a binding dispute mechanism.

The Minister for International Trade has already said today: "I have been monitoring the politics of this and I would say that the free trade talks could be the victim of a U.S. Trade Bill". Both the United States Trade Act of 1974 and the current Bill before Congress apply increasingly strict unilateral remedies directed by the Congress against trading partners of the United States. The truth is that this country has already been a victim in these trade talks in terms of lumber, fish and other items, and we have received nothing in return.

Will the Prime Minister table the letter from the President of the United States? And if it be true that the Americans are not willing to contemplate a compulsory binding trade mechanism, will he advise his chief negotiator, Mr. Reisman, to walk away from the table while he still has the shirt on his back?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend had, of course, a more charitable view of Mr. Reisman's competence when he was serving as his Deputy Minister of Finance. I would just say that the interests of Canada are being extremely well served by Ambassador Reisman and his colleagues, who are doing a tremendous job in putting forward the national interest in a very important and sensitive series of negotiations.

The Leader of the Opposition does know, of course, it would be a breach of every convention for me to table correspondence I receive from the President of the United States, or from any other Head of Government, on a given item in the House of Commons. My hon. friend knows that. The President of the United States expresses a point of view in his letter and he does not go beyond that. On the basis of that, the negotiations will continue.

But my right hon. friend raises an important matter when he refers to the Trade Bill which is presently before the United States Congress. The ramifications of that Trade Bill could be extremely serious for America's trading partners and, in particular, have serious consequences for Canada, for employment in Canada. That Bill could cost jobs in Canada. It is precisely because of the implication, the enormous implications, of that trade legislation, and what it could trigger in consequence, that Canada is seeking a comprehensive free trade arrangement with the United States to make sure that does not apply to Canada so we continue to have the investment and jobs, the hundreds of thousands of jobs this country needs to grow and to prosper. That is why the negotiations are so important.

CONTENT OF PRESIDENT'S LETTER

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, despite the Prime Minister's best efforts to suggest otherwise, let it be made clear that it is not the competence of the negotiator, Simon Reisman, that is in question today. It is the competence of the man who has given Mr. Reisman his mandate, the Prime Minister, that is in question today.

Mr. Reisman said this week: "If we leave each side free to interpret the trade agreement, then you do not really have what I would call a reliable commitment". Today it seems clear to everyone but the Prime Minister that a reliable American commitment will never happen.

Hasn't the President of the United States in his letter to the Prime Minister, in reality, politely suggested to the Prime Minister that he should take a walk?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the question is no.

REQUEST NEGOTIATIONS BE DISCONTINUED

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, the author of the mandate. I want to say to him that it is clear to everyone in Canada, and to everyone in this House, that these talks are coming apart at the seams. The Government is setting up the U.S. Congress as the villain in the talks.

The Prime Minister has said many times that it took courage to enter these talks. I want to tell him that the last fellow who went over Niagara Falls in a barrel also had courage. The question Canadians are asking today is does the Prime Minister have the common sense and intelligence to walk away from these talks when the interest of Canada is obviously not being well served?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the only people who want the talks to come apart are the Liberals and the New Democratic Party. They would love to see them fall apart—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Come on.

Mr. McDermid: —for crass political reasons, no other reason. I can tell the Hon. Member, number one, the talks are not coming apart as he would like to say.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Even your own Party doesn't believe you.

Mr. McDermid: And number two, our Government has said right from the start that if it is not a good deal for Canada and for Canadians we will not sign it. We still stick by that.

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—PICKET LINE INJURIES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Post Office who said yesterday in this House: "The process which has been unfolding over the last 10 days in these labour negotiations is perfectly normal". The Minister will be aware that two days ago in Prince George, British Columbia, a large postal truck, crashing through the picket line, broke both arms, both legs and caused internal injuries to a female employee on the picket line. He will know that yesterday there were two people in Ottawa injured on the picket line.

Is this the process the Minister considers to be normal in terms of labour negotiations?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member would have been more forthcoming if he had read the rest of my comments into the record as well, but they are there in Hansard. However, I would like to read from the Gazette of June 18:

"It's a very tough issue because you have two conflicting realities. The postal workers must be treated fairly and justly, but other Canadians must continue to receive their mail", Saskatchewan MP Lorne Nystrom said yesterday.

That is what the Post Office is trying to do, deliver the mail.

CORPORATION'S HIRING OF STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On April 19, 1984, the Right Hon. Prime Minister made the following statement. He said: "My father was not only a union member, he was a union officer, and I do not cross picket lines". In light of this very clear and precise statement made by the Prime Minister does he think that it is correct, that it is appropriate, that it is acceptable for the Post Office of Canada to be hiring strike-breakers whose intention it is to cross picket lines?

• (1130)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite right. I do not cross picket lines. I never have and I never will.

The answer to the second part of the question was provided by the Hon. Member's seat-mate who indicated, in a response which was just cited in the House, that the Post Office has an obligation to the Canadian people, to the taxpayers and to ordinary citizens to try to deliver the mail. That is what it is trying to do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST MEDIATOR BE APPOINTED

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister is this. Does he support Canada Post's hiring of strike-breakers to cross picket lines?

I also want to ask him this question. He knows that this morning both sides have indicated that they have reached an impasse, that the negotiations have in fact broken down. On many occasions both sides have made the request for a mediator. The right hon. gentleman's reputation is as a labour mediator. When both sides are requesting the appointment of a mediator, when the people of Canada want the mails to continue, when the talks have broken down and an impasse has been reached as of this morning, why on earth will the Prime Minister and his Government not ask that a mediator be brought in now to begin resolving this very critical issue?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the article I just cited had another interesting quote from a member of the New Democratic Party. It states:

> Although condemning the use of strike-breakers, Keeper—

—the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre.

> —hesitated when asked if an NDP Government would move to ban the use of non-union labour during a legal strike . . .
> "Frankly, I really don't know. It's difficult for me to know what we would do if we were in office—"

Mr. de Jong: Appoint a mediator and quit playing stupid politics. People are getting hurt.

Mr. Andre: The fact is you cannot have it both ways, on the one hand—

Mr. Riis: What about answering the question?

Mr. Andre: —standing up here being condemnatory, and on the other hand talking like this.

Mr. Cassidy: Are you going to put a mediator in or not?

Mr. Andre: I remind the Hon. Member to read—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Everyone wants the mail delivered, but I am not sure every Canadian admires the way the Government has been handling the mail strike, to put it mildly, in a strange way. It has not intervened. It has not appointed a mediator. It has not put an end to the use of these scabs, these strike-breakers, despite the violence. The questions which beg to be asked are these.

What is the Government's hidden agenda with regard to the Post Office? Is the Government out on a mission to try to bust the unions? Is this step number one to privatize the Post Office? Why is the Government not coming out clearly now and telling Canadians what it is trying to achieve by its hands-off approach, what it is trying to achieve through the back door?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in an article reported in Le Droit on June 18 the Hon. Member for Papineau had some advice. He said:

[Translation]

> The Government should "cut the umbilical cord. The baby doesn't belong to the Government any more, and the Conservatives should let the baby grow up."

[English]

When the Crown corporation was created by the House, with its unanimous consent, the objective was to remove the political interference which had caused the problems in the past. Canada Post is endeavouring to fulfil its social responsibility of delivering the mail. There is a dispute going on and the parties are in discussion now at the Chateau Laurier. I think we ought to give that process a chance to work and, in the meantime, ask all parties to behave responsibly and to avoid violence.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I think we can safely say a Government has never behaved as mysteriously as this in a postal strike—watching events unfold without doing anything. One wonders what the Government is trying to accomplish. Is it trying to break the unions? Is that it? Is it trying gradually to privatize the Post Office? For heaven's sake, stop this hypocrisy! Tell us and tell all Canadians what you're really trying to do through the back door!

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the impresssion I get this morning from the questions asked by the parties opposite is that they don't want the negotiations to continue. The parties are sitting around the table, and they are now negotiating. The Government has already intervened by appointing a conciliator and a commissioner. The parties have gone back to the negotiating table. Why not encourage them to negotiate? We should not get involved in the negotiations when the parties are at the table. Let them negotiate!

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—FILM LEGISLATION PROPOSALS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I would like to quote to the Prime Minister from the publication which his own Government put out at the start of the free trade thrust with the U.S. in which it said that its primary goal was "new rules . . . limiting U.S. trade remedy laws, i.e., exemptions from measures aimed at others—". Will the Prime Minister confirm that in the same week that his Government has postponed its film legislation proposals it has received from President Reagan a clear rejection of that exemption which has been the primary goal of the Government, according to its own publications?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that because that would be false.

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER TABLE PRESIDENT'S LETTER

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is a question which I think the Canadian people can only resolve if the Prime Minister is willing to table the letter which was sent to him by President Reagan. I ask the Prime Minister why he will not do that. Is this country condemned to keep on surrendering while the United States keeps on hammering us?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that as a matter of policy the NDP is a protectionist group. I know that the NDP favours this kind of economic isolation. I know that the NDP is opposed to foreign investment unless it happens to be in the riding of the Leader of the NDP.

Mr. Althouse: Do you know what your Government's policy is?

Mr. Mulroney: We know that NDP policies would take us back to the 1930s. We know, and I can assure the House, that at an appropriate time the anti-trade, anti-American—

Mr. Blaikie: You are starting to sound like Trudeau now.

Mr. Mulroney: —anti-NATO, anti-business policies of the NDP will be examined by the Canadian people.

Mr. Riis: You sound defensive.

Mr. Mulroney: May I ask the Hon. Member this. While an international negotiation is going on—

Mr. Blaikie: Stop reading your own fund-raising letters.

Mr. Mulroney: —designed to create the hope to create jobs for Canada, stop taking the American side—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Carleton.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST DEPUTY MINISTER—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Young: Good luck!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, serious allegations, including the accusation of perjury, have been made against the Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration. What does the Prime Minister intend to do about these very serious allegations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the charge of perjury that was made is entirely without foundation. The Deputy Minister, Mr. Gaetan Lussier, neither appeared as a witness in the case in question nor did he sign any affidavit on the matter. He could not even legally, by extension, have been involved in any act that would give rise to that accusation.

May I say on another level that I have had the personal privilege of working with Mr. Lussier, as have other people. I had the opportunity the other day to reach him in Whitehorse to convey to him what he already knew about my view, that he has been, as have his colleagues, a truly outstanding public servant.

The Public Service has served the country honourably and well. This kind of attack is unacceptable. I have dealt with it in my caucus. I shall deal with it every time and in every circumstance.

The accusation against Mr. Lussier is false and unacceptable, and such accusations against public servants shall not be tolerated by the Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA POST CORPORATION

COST OF EMPLOYING STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. Canadians have voiced their indignation, and even the Conservative Member for Richelieu, echoing the feelings of many of his colleagues, has stated that the Conservative Government is being immoral and antidemocratic when it allows Canada Post to hire strike-breakers and encourages violence on the picket lines. Can the Minister tell us today how much Canada Post is paying to hire strike-breakers? What is the cost of the newspaper ads which Canada Post is running every day? Is there any truth to the rumours that the strike is costing Canada Post up to $1 million a day?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we know that the lack of postal service in a complete shut-down of the system costs the Canadian economy enormous sums of money. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business said that the last strike in 1981 cost $3 billion to that business sector alone.

We know that postal service is vitally important in many sectors of the economy, and that is why the conciliation commissioner recommended and observed in his report that the Post Office has no other alternative but to continue to try to deliver the mail.

Officials are trying to do that. I have asked them and they have indicated that they will try to avoid violence in all circumstances. I would ask other parties to do that.

In the meantime let us encourage the negotiators at the table to reach a solution, because I think it is in everybody's interest that we have an efficient, productive postal service to serve the needs of Canadians.

CORPORATION'S HIRING POLICY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, the daughter of the Liberal candidate in the by-election in St. John's was refused a job in Canada Post because she refused to sign a form that she would cross picket lines.

Does the Minister agree with the policy of Canada Post that in order to be hired a person must sign a form agreeing to cross picket lines? Is that fair? Is that justice?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Hon. Member might spend some time profitably with his colleague, the Hon. Member for Papineau, in terms of what is the proper position vis-à-vis the Government and this Crown corporation.

The Crown corporation is endeavouring to fulfil its social responsibility. It is endeavouring to do that in a way which avoids violence but gets the mail out.

In the meantime they are at the table now, as I have indicated, trying to find a resolution to this dispute. I would hope that all Members of the House would try to be encouraging to that process rather than try to make mischief.

EQUALITY RIGHTS FOR WOMEN AND MINORITIES

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, Canada leads the world in the constitutional protection of the equality rights of women.

Recently women lawyers in Canada, while welcoming the Meech Lake Accord, have raised serious concerns that the guarantees of equality rights for women and minorities have been overlooked in the Langevin amendments.

If this is the case, will the First Ministers be open to improvements which will ensure that the equality of rights of women and minorities provided for in Sections 15 and 28 of the Charter will not be put at risk?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely nothing in the Meech Lake Accord that would diminish or in any way affect equality rights for women and minorities.

On the contrary, the object of the exercise was to strengthen the country and, in the process of so doing, strengthen the rights of minorities and women across the nation.

REQUEST THAT FIRST MINISTERS CONSIDER EQUALITY RIGHTS

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the First Ministers will know that the Langevin amendments overlooked the guarantees of equality rights for women and minorities in the Charter. Surely this will be raised in the public hearings this summer.

May I at least ask the Prime Minister, and indeed all First Ministers, if they will now give very serious consideration to this concern, so that the rights of women and minorities will not be undermined and that indeed they will be enhanced?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in any way quarrelling with the right of my hon. friend to raise the question about equality rights for women and minorities. If someone wishes to raise this at the parliamentary committee, of course that is the place where I suppose concerns can be mentioned.

Surely my hon. friend will acknowledge with regard to the Meech Lake Accord that there is nothing which does anything other than strengthen the unity of the country. Specifically, I think that the action of the Government with regard to the promotion of the interests of women toward equality—plus, for example, the most recent action yesterday of the Government in the House with regard to the promotion of the rights of minorities under the Official Languages Act—indicates a commitment which is profound, durable, and I think beneficial to Canada.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS

NEED TO PLACE CERTAIN CLAUSES ON AGENDA FOR NEXT FIRST MINISTERS' MEETING

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In fact, the Prime Minister promised Canadian women he would fight to give them equality, but the kind of Bill that was tabled yesterday is certainly not going to help minorities or women and it certainly does not hold very well for having the equal status of women included in the new Meech Lake Accord. I wish the Prime Minister would give the House the assurance that in the next round of discussions, women's rights which were laid down in the Charter and the Constitution will not be threatened anymore than the rights of Indians and minorities. Could the Prime Minister give the House the assurance that when he has a meeting with the Premiers, the agenda will include reinforcing Clause 2 and providing additional assurances with respect to Clauses 15 and 28, in order to promote entrenchment of the rights of Canadian women?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I am not sure I understood the Hon. Member's comments. Is she trying to say, on behalf of her political group, that the Meech Lake Accord is flawed and that some radical surgery is necessary or a radical amendment in connection with the question she brought up, or is she talking about tabling some new proposals at a second round of discussions, because I get the impression that her party was basically in favour of the Meech Lake Accord and, in fact, I said yesterday that we were prepared to consider the other issues at a second round?

NECESSITY TO ENSURE WOMEN'S RIGHTS WON'T BE JEOPARDIZED

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my question is to ensure that proposals will be made at the second meeting with the Premiers, to show Canadian women that their rights are not being threatened. This is not a protest against the Meech Lake proposals. I simply want to ensure that at a second meeting with the Premiers, you will confirm those rights in the Constitution.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if there is the slightest doubt about this, I will do so with the requisite speed, and, I am sure, with the co-operation of Members on all sides of this House.

AGRICULTURE

SPECIAL CANADIAN GRAINS PROGRAM—REQUEST THAT HAY PRODUCERS BE INCLUDED

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Hon. Minister of Agriculture. Whereas the Hon. Minister, in answering my question last Thursday on the eligibility of hay farmers to share in the Special Canadian Grains Program, said in part "market prices must have been directly and detrimentally affected by the U.S. Farm Bill"; and whereas the market price for exported hay to Japan from Alberta and indeed from Canada is adversely affected because the U.S. has been and is subsidizing American compressed hay exported to Japan, will the Hon. Minister review the negative decision made, I believe without this information, by the farm leaders?

• (1150)

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we must respect and admire the Hon. Member's continuing interest in this problem. I must inform the Hon. Member that I have in front of me a briefing note from Mr. Pender, the administrator of the program, and also from Mr. Frank Clayton, the assistant deputy minister of policy, which confirms my answer to my hon. friend of last Thursday that, indeed, hay is not supported under the U.S. Farm Bill and that lower prices received from last year's hay crop really resulted from an overabundance of supply. Consequently, it cannot be regarded as eligible under the Bill.

The Hon. Member will know, Mr. Speaker, that our Government already provides assistance for alfalfa pellets and alfalfa cubes as eligible commodities under the Western Grain Transportation Act.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

REQUEST THAT LEGISLATION BE INTRODUCED

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. What is his view on equal pay for work of equal value? The Prime Minister will recall that in the 1984 Leaders' debate the Prime Minister said

[Translation]

"I find it an aberration and an injustice that the Government would accept a principle and later smother it in practice."

[English]

Yesterday the head of the Human Rights Commission announced that fundamental reform of existing equal pay for work of equal value legislation is essential if women are to achieve pay equality. Will the Government introduce pay equity legislation just as soon as possible as recommended by Mr. Fairweather?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member's question, I would like to say that it is always good to put some order in your own house before doing it elsewhere.

We have moved, and moved quickly, to implement equal pay for work of equal value in the federal Public Service in conjunction with the unions. All 13 of them are working closely with the Government to implement as quickly as possible pay equity that should influence positively roughly 81,000 female employees of the federal Public Service.

REQUEST THAT PRIORITY BE GIVEN TO DRAFTING LEGISLATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Justice. He will know the Human Rights Commission concerns a much broader sector than that to which the President of the Treasury Board has referred. It is not good enough to limit this to employees of the federal Government. We need fair pay now.

Will the Minister of Justice give priority this summer to drafting equal pay legislation? Will he introduce it in the House in the fall so that employers will be required, and there will be enforcement, to raise the wages of underpaid female employees?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member points out, the recommendations of the Chairman of the Human Rights Commission have only recently been received. I can assure the Hon. Member that these recommendations will be carefully considered by myself and by my cabinet colleagues.

Building on the record that we have developed in our Government, as indicated by the President of the Treasury Board, we want to make sure that where possible we will continue this exemplary record, and we will give this matter the most serious consideration.

WAGE GAP AFFECTING WOMEN IN FEDERALLY REGULATED COMPANIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Earlier this spring Statistics Canada came out with a report indicating that for the first time in 18 years the wage gap between men and women in Canada had widened rather than narrowed.

At that time I asked questions of the Government as to whether it would do something about it. Now we have the Chairman of the Human Rights Commission pointing out that 300,000 women work for federally regulated companies and that the wage gap is 35 per cent. Is it not time for the Government to give urgent action to the suggestion of the Chairman of the Human Rights Commission and bring in amendments as soon as possible?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any Government that has been quite as sensitive on the whole question of equality for the women of Canada than this Government. It has been manifested in areas within our own direct jurisdiction. I would remind the Hon. Member that this Government has been responsible for the creation of 850,000 new jobs since we came into office. A very large number of these have been devoted toward the women of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East. A short supplementary, please.

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, we also know that 71 per cent of part-time jobs are held by women and that is one reason that the wage gap is widening.

The Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission points out that under the present system for lodging complaints on pay equity, federally regulated companies are depriving women of $1.2 billion and this amount is growing all the time. This is an urgent matter. Won't the Minister take action soon as a result of the request by the chairman?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I reiterate the fact that we have worked and demonstrated our commitment with respect to equality. I have given the undertaking in this House to look very carefully at the recommendations and suggestions of the Chairman of the Human Rights Commission. I have been known as "Fast Ray", but to ask me to bring in legislation the day after the chairman brings in his report is asking a bit much.

ENERGY

PURCHASE OF DOME PETROLEUM—SENATE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, this has been a fairly quiet Question Period. I hesitate to bring up the matter of public opinion polls, but I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister. He is probably aware that a huge majority of people, according to the public opinion polls, favour a Canadian solution to the problem of the take-over of Dome Petroleum.

Given that yesterday or the other day the Senate Committee on Energy recommended that the federal Government take steps to re-open the bidding for Dome so there can be a Canadian solution, what is the Government of Canada waiting for? Why does it not do just that?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the question of the Hon. Member, and especially at his comments about the Senate. I find such a show of interest surprising coming from him. I had always thought that the New Democratic Party was convinced that the Senate held no views whatsoever and that the Senate was not a valid place to produce such opinions.

Second, the Canadian solution which this Government would prefer, and I wish to emphasize this, Mr. Speaker, would be to ensure that the assets and shares of Dome remain in Canada. In this context, the best solution would be one which would ensure a future for Dome in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway. A short supplementary, please.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister would like a Senate appointment.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister. Yesterday, given that Bill Hopper, president of Petro-Canada, told the House of Commons energy committee that he was interested, to use his words, in some of the assets of Dome, what is the Government's policy? The June 30 deadline is coming up. Is the Government prepared to let Dome go bankrupt, lose all those jobs in western Canada and cause all those problems, or will the Government act and get a Canadian solution now for Dome?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that it was the action taken by the previous Government under the National Energy Policy which created the problems we are now facing, especially as far as Dome is concerned.

What this Government is now doing is to ensure that Dome will have an economically realistic future in the energy sector.

TAX REFORM

TAX ON FOOD—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with statements made by the Minister of Finance concerning the tax reform. People in Canada, especially senior citizens and families, have been wondering ever since the tax reform was announced, the new tax, whether—if only the Prime Minister would stop talking and laughing, and listen to the questions we are asking—

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, and Canadians would like to know: Will the Prime Minister speak out against any sales tax on food, a sales tax on bread and butter? Will the Prime Minister reject such a measure?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, will the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie stop scaring people with this kind of question!

Nowhere in the White Paper is there any reference to a tax on food. The Minister of Finance has been quite clear. There is no question of taxing food in the White Paper. We will be consulting the provinces concerning three possible sales tax formulas.

TAX ON FOOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, either the President of the Treasury Board cannot read or he did not read the document. The document entitled Sales Tax, pages 10 and 11, shows what the consequences would be and who are the biggest food consumers. Since it is printed in this document—and my question is directed to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, the public at large would like to know—will the Prime Minister prevent his Government from taxing food, bread and butter, or does the Prime Minister intend to allow this tax to be levied? Yes or no?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): In the White Paper there is no proposition about a tax on food. The decision has not been made—

Mr. Malépart: The decision has not been made!

Mr. de Cotret: The reference is to the base. No decision has been made. The discussion has to do with the tax base and the tax rate. There is no mention of a tax—

Mr. Malépart: Like in the case of the elderly. Pensions will not be de-indexed!

An Hon. Member: Small dictator!

Mr. de Cotret: Again I will repeat what the Minister of Finance said: There is no tax on food in the white Paper, nor will there be a tax increase for small wage earners.

PORNOGRAPHY

EFFECT OF SUPREME COURT DECISION ON BILL C-54

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice will know that the Supreme Court of Canada rendered its decision yesterday in the case of Video World Ltd. This case involved the obscenity section of the Criminal Code. The Minister will also know the country's concern over the spread of pornography and the degradation of women. Can the Minister advise the House of the effect of the Supreme Court case on Bill C-54, the pornography amendments?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada has affirmed the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal which determined that explicit depictions of vaginal, oral or anal intercourse are contrary to the current obscenity laws. The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada was unanimous, as was the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, and I think it establishes that the Government's Bill is in tune with the current law of the country with respect to the explicit depiction of these activities.

Mr. Speaker: The next will be the last question. The Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REINSTATEMENT OF FORMER STATUS HOLDERS—PROVISION OF GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs. The Government has made a complete shambles of the implementation process of Bill C-31 providing for the reinstatement of Indian people who had lost status through unfair and discriminatory laws. Instead of the Government honouring its commitment that no band would be made worse off because of Bill C-31, almost the entire burden has been put on the individuals themselves, mostly women, and on the bands, their councils and chiefs.

Why has the Government not followed through with its commitment to provide adequate funding so that no Indian band would be made worse off after Bill C-31 than before? Why is the Government making an already difficult situation between reinstated people and their bands more difficult by not making the resources available?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's premise is completely false. Under the provisions of Bill C-31, dollars are made available for implementation. Once membership and status are established, the programs that are available to other status Indians in Canada are automatically made available to the returnees under Bill C-31 as of the date of application, not as of the date membership has been recognized by the Department through the review process.

The Government has identified dollars. Housing dollars are made available for those people who indicate that they would return to their bands and to reserves. The Government is honouring and will continue to honour the commitments made.

One thing the Hon. Member should be aware of is that the committee assumed that the maximum number of people asking to be reinstated would be in the neighbourhood of 68,000 to 75,000. We now anticipate that there will be some 90,000 individual applications made for reinstatement under Bill C-31.

LEVEL OF GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the system is completely backed up. Less than one-third of the 90,000 applications have been processed. Only 12 bands have had membership codes approved and that provision expires at the end of this year.

Will the Minister guarantee to the House that he will seek more funding for the reinstatement process when the present funds run out because they are completely inadequate to do the job?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the dollars provided by the legislation are still there. The dollars that were recommended by Government and approved are still there to be used by those bands with returnees.

The Hon. Member says that only 12 codes have been recognized. The legislation, in a compromise situation to try to accommodate different points of view, established a two-year time period in which bands could put forward membership codes and have them accepted if they wished to take charge of the membership of their people rather than have the Department do so, and I hope they all take advantage of that opportunity. The point is that over the two-year period we have assisted Indian bands in establishing membership codes so they could provide for their own people and have control of those membership codes as the legislation allows.

STRIKING—TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the Twenty-Fourth Report of the Striking Committee.

[Editor's Note: For above report see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the opposition Parties regarding unanimous consent to defer the tabling of the 25th Report of the Striking Committee until shortly after one o'clock. I would ask that you secure that agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Mr. Gauthier: I agree, Mr. Speaker, but I think that by our rules the names must be tabled today. I take it that the Conservative Party Whip is going to do that shortly after one o'clock.

• (1210)

Mr. Fennell: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the chairperson of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and a member of that committee, I have the honour to present the second report of the Committee on Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act, and to amend other Acts in relation thereto, with amendments.

I want to commend the people who made the work of the committee so easy. It is a tripartite committee consisting of the federal and provincial Governments and management and labour, who worked long and hard on this. I encourage early enactment of this legislation with a view to the safety of people in the workplace.

EMERGENCIES ACT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-77, an Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Introduction of Private Members' Bills.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, on a very brief point of order, Members today received a communiqué from the Hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight) which indicated that today in the House he would be tabling a report in conjunction with the requirements of Section 22 of an Act to amend the Indian Act, 1985. The Minister was in his place during Question Period and at the appropriate point in the proceedings he did not rise to present his report. Can the Parliamentary Secretary or the Government House Leader explain what went amiss?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not a point of order but if the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski)—

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the communiqué but I will undertake to the Hon. Member and the House to look into it and perhaps come back a little bit later.

Mr. Penner: Yes.

Mr. Gauthier: Here he is.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, my office provided to the opposition Party critics notice that later this day a report would be tabled on the implementation of changes to the Indian Act as prescribed under Bill C-31. As I understand it, that will take place later this day.

SUPPORT FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of 279 Canadians living in my riding in the Cities of Kitchener, Waterloo and Cambridge, I am pleased to present a petition calling upon the Government to pass the motion favouring the return of capital punishment for certain acts of planned and deliberate murder.

OPPOSITION TO RENTAL INCREASES FOR MAISON D'AMITIÉ

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to table eight petitions signed by people from my riding. The petitions meet the requirements of Standing Order 106.

These petitions are signed by residents from several areas in my riding, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable House will therefor provide a remedy.

They say that according to a report published by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, one woman out of eight is subjected to psychological, economic, sexual or verbal violence by her spouse; that at a time when the Government should act instead of cracking down, the National Capital Commission intends to raise the rent for La Maison d'Amitié, the only francophone non-profit organization in the area for women and children in distress, by more than $3,000 a month; that the Prime Minister stated recently in the House that the problem of battered women is one of the most seriouus social and legal challenges facing us today; therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the National Capital Commission to reverse its decision to raise the rent and to continue, as in the past, charging the symbolic sum of one dollar.

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): If I may, Mr. Speaker, a brief comment before presenting my petition. This is the first Friday I am in the House since the Standing Orders have been changed, and on Fridays we rise at 3 p.m. instead of 5 p.m. I am proud that this new Standing Order has been adopted because it was a project I launched nearly a year ago.

I am proud because not only Members but also the Clerks, the stenographers and all the staff of the House can finish earlier.

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF PART-TIME SERVICE CENTRES—NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House a petition in the name of the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean AQDR and its 1,530 members, the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean FADOC and its 13,500 members, and the Lac-Saint-Jean information and redevelopment service which request the continuation of the part-time service centres of the Department of National Health and Welfare of Canada at the temporary offices of Alma, Roberval, Saint-Félicien, Dolbeau, Jonquière, and Ville de la Baie.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition against Bill C-55 which attempts to change the entry system for refugees in this country. The people who have signed this petition come from many different parts of Canada. They are deeply concerned about the limitations to the right of appeal in this Bill. They are deeply concerned about the notion of a safe third country. They suggest that Parliament should look instead to the Standing Committee which has made many recommendations for a better and more humane direction for the future.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition signed by about 200 Canadians, most of whom are from the City of Toronto. They point out that since many people are driven by the troubles in the world to seek safety from persecution in Canada and since the existing system of refugee status determination has been overloaded, a new system is needed. They advocate the one which was developed a year and a half ago by the Standing Committee of Parliament on Labour, Employment and Immigration which has widespread public support.

Therefore, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that the Government enacts legislation which will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings for refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada, and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition which relates to the same matter but has a different prayer. It points out that Bill C-55 threatens to undermine Canada's commitment to assisting refugees, in particular by screening out many who might have a genuine claim. The petitioners recommend that the new procedure for refugee claimants should be that recommended by the Standing Committee of Parliament.

Therefore, they recommend that Parliament withdraw Bill C-55 and substitute therefor legislation embodying the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of claims of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every applicant in Canada, and the right to appeal on the basis of fact.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS AT ARMED FORCES BASE GOOSE BAY

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from a number of residents in many parts of Canada who are concerned that the low-level flight training of pilots of NATO countries at the Canadian Forces Base in Goose Bay, Labrador, is disrupting the way of life of many of the native people there and is also a provocative and aggressive war-fighting action which tends to endanger world peace.

They therefore request Parliament to ensure that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) end all low-level flight training at the Goose Bay Canadian Forces Base and cease negotiations with NATO for the establishment of a larger base there.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO USE OF CHEMICAL PESTICIDES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 106 signed by petitioners in Ontario and a variety of places in British Columbia who are increasingly concerned that the number of chemicals used as herbicides and insecticides are being proven to have harmful effects on human health.

They believe that these chemicals produce short and long-term harmful effects on non-target organisms such as soil and water. They say that the same chemicals have, in past years, been registered and approved as safe for various uses. They believe that the new chemicals are consistently approved under the same guidelines as the now-proven-harmful ones were and that the non-active inert components contained in the distributed product have been neither adequately tested nor named.

Therefore, they are calling upon the House of Commons to initiate a full public inquiry into the safety, testing, registration and regulation of the use of pesticides. They ask the House of Commons to consider the examination of alternative ways of controlling pests such as biologic control and plant-derived pesticides.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

COPYRIGHT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald that Bill C-60, an Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I note that Bill C-54 does not purport to extend copyright protection to actual semiconductor chips. This is surprising since the Bill does deal with other aspects of computer programs and software. The Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs advises me that such changes will be forthcoming in part two of the copyright legislation yet to be tabled.

The United States has a semiconductor chip protection act which extends protection to chips created by Canadian nationals only if Canada enacts comparable legislation protecting American chip originators. Since we do not have comparable legislation on chips, our local originators could be at a disadvantage in the U.S. market.

I am advised, however, by officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that Canada has been granted an interim protection order under the U.S. legislation. Since this order is due to expire in the fall of 1987, and notwithstanding assurances that there will be an extension, I believe the Government would be best advised to give immediate and serious consideration to this chip issue. Postponing the addressing of this issue to some unknown and fleeting phase two is really not satisfactory.

With regard to the anti-piracy remedies, the major objective of a copyright enforcement policy is to secure compliance with the law and to provide for restitution if the copyright owners' interests have been damaged. As with all aspects of the legislation, the remedy provisions must be seen to be fair to both users, that is the defendants, and owners, the plaintiffs, both in the letter of the law and in its application.

• (1230)

According to the feedback I have been receiving, at the present time there seems to be satisfaction for the new measures being proposed to increase the criminal penalties, including fines. For example, revenues from the sale of sound recordings in Canada amounted to over $600 million in 1985. It is estimated that a further $40 million worth of pirated records and tapes were bought in that year. Pirated video cassettes account for as much as 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the legitimate market, whose retail value was some $530 million in 1984 and has been growing considerably.

Estimates of pirated software vary widely. For some popular application packages, there may be at least one pirated copy in use for every package authorized by the publisher. That can be very serious.

The new Section 25 proposed by the Bill imposes severe penalties on a person who knowingly infringes the copyright of a work. While I appreciate that the word "knowingly" has been in use in the penalty section of the old Copyright Act for decades, I want to be assured that these new stronger deterrent criminal sanctions are not imposed against persons who unwittingly violate copyright laws. Do such people commit the offence knowingly? Just as the innocent infringer is treated less severely under Section 22, the civil remedies section of the existing Copyright Act, I will be asking in committee whether the new Bill could treat innocent infringers less severely than deliberate infringers, as I have no sympathy for the latter.

Let us turn to educational exemptions. Leading up to the introduction of this legislation, I received representations from educators who were concerned that they might not be exempted from penalties for not obeying copyright. It is my understanding that there is not a general exemption for the reproduction of copyright material for educational purposes mainly because such an exemption could seriously jeopardize the function of the copyright system in stimulating the production and dissemination of copyright material.

Clearly, educators face problems in attempting to ensure access to a lot of copyright material. In many cases, it is difficult and time consuming to locate copyright owners of particular works in order to secure permission to reproduce such materials.

In Quebec, teachers can legally photocopy substantial extracts from a repertoire of 17,000 titles under a blanket agreement between the Quebec Ministry of Education and the Quebec Writers' Union, l'Union des ecrivains du Québec. The Ministry of Education is paying $1 million a year to cover photocopying of printed works by educational institutions in the province. The union distributes royalty payments to its members according to the use made of their works. Perhaps educators in other provinces could use the Quebec experience and therefore allay their fears.

The new Copyright Board and the introduction of an incentive to set up a system of collectives to ensure reasonable rates for artists is a new and welcome addition.

Let me turn to the mechanical royalty rate for composers. There exists in the present Copyright Act a provision for compulsory licensing of mechanical reproductions which is a two-cent rate for composers and music publishers of recorded music. It was intended for piano rolls and shellacked 78 rpm breakable recordings. The law was passed in the heyday of silent pictures and three years before the first national radio broadcast. Last March, I called for the abolition of this section and, therefore, am most pleased to see the repeal of Section 19, for it has been two cents for too long.

Song writers will now be able to freely negotiate royalty rates with publishers. I am pleased that we are finally allowing individual creators who work with their minds and imagination a fair return for producing exciting Canadian cultural products.

Creative works are very much the expression of the personality of their authors. The authors of the Charter of Rights for Creators believed that moral rights should be accorded as much importance as economic rights. I am pleased, as are many Canadian artists, that this definition has been expanded. We will certainly all remember artist Michael Snow who, in 1982, was forced to go to the courts to have the Toronto Eaton Centre remove the red ribbons from the necks of the 60 geese forming his sculpture, Flight Stop.

I find it interesting that the Government, in one piece of legislation, gives the creators rights over their work, preventing it from being altered in any way, while another piece of legislation, Bill C-54, commonly known as the pornography

Bill, gives authority to alter displays of erotica. Clause 159.7 of the Bill states:

> Every person who displays any erotica in a way that is visible to a member of the public in a public place, unless the public must, in order to see the erotica, pass a prominent warning notice advising of the nature of the display therein or unless the erotica is hidden by a barrier or is covered by an opaque wrapper, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Is this not a conflict? Which legislation will take precedent? I will not address the matter of whether we should cover erotica material with a fig leaf, a maple leaf, or gift wrap.

What about the right to exhibit works of art in public? Presently the 1924 Copyright Act does not entrench in law the right of artists to obtain royalty fees for exhibiting their art works in public.

According to the new legislation, exhibition rights will become an integral part of copyright that can be exercised like other economic rights. Fifty years ago, the enactment of a performance right was considered a maverick development. Now performance rights are commonplace and have undeniably enriched composers and lyricists.

While Canadian visual artists are compensated through proceeds of sales and reproduction fees, these sources do not cover the full use of these art works. Today, the businesses of art rentals and exhibitions in public and private galleries significantly exceed the income from original works. Furthermore, in 1981, a Canadian Council study found that less than one-tenth of one per cent of art gallery expenditures went to artists' fees. Clearly there has been an insufficient onus on gallery proprietors to remunerate the visual artist in amounts commensurate with the number of exhibitions being held.

I am pleased that through this statutory exhibition right, artists will now be in receipt of royalties rightly earned.

I will now deal with choreography. Under the current 1924 Copyright Act, choreographic works come within the category of dramatic works. As a result, works of choreography must develop a plot or a sequence of action.

Glass Houses, a work by Toronto choreographer Christopher House, or Marcel Marceau's work in mime are examples of work not constructed around a dramatic plot.

Groups appearing before the subcommittee in 1985 asked that there be an entirely separate category of protected subject matter labelled "choreographic works" incorporated in the new legislation. "Choreographic works" is defined in Bill C-60 as: "Any work of choreography, whether or not it has any story line". While I accept this definition, I would have preferred that suggested by Elise Orenstein of the Canadian Association of Professional Dance Organizations, which is "an arrangement or an organized thought in time and space which uses human bodies as design units".

Perhaps the most contentious part of the Bill could be the clauses which relate to the Industrial Design Act of Canada. The field of industrial design is closely related to copyright. In fact, a number of court cases have occurred in Canada because the parties were unable to ascertain whether their rights were protected by the Copyright Act, or by the Industrial Design Act.

For example, consider the June, 1986 decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Bayliner Marine versus Doral Boats. The court held in that case that a company which produced engineering drawings to manufacture a special type of hull for a boat, and then manufactured the boat from those drawings, could not assert any copyright against a party which bought one of the boats, took it apart, and manufactured its own boat after copying the actual hull. The court held that if the company which originated the design had wanted to protect its rights, it should have sought registration of the design for the boat hull under the Industrial Design Act. The originator was out of time to make such a registration since the Industrial Design Act only permits such registrations to be made within one year from the date the design was "published", that is, shown publicly. According to the Government, Bill C-60 proposes to "resolve the ambiguities resulting from recent court decisions" and "to provide an objective means of determining whether an article can be protected by copyright, industrial design, both or neither".

However, the Bill may fail to accomplish its objective in the area of industrial design. The amendment to Clause 46 of the Bill returns the law to the unsatisfactory state which existed in Canada following the Bayliner marine decision, to which I just referred. The new Clause 46 provides that the copyright in certain designs will become unenforceable once an article is manufactured from that design in quantities of more than 50. So we are left with the unusual situation that if 35 articles are produced from the design, the designer will have copyright protection which will then disappear once the 50th article has been produced.

The effect of the Bill is that those relatively few designs which are created purely for artistic purposes, and not for manufacturing, will be afforded copyright protection, while the vast majority of designs which are created for industrial purpose, that is, products to be manufactured in quantities of more than 50, will have none. The latter will be protected, if at all, under the little-known Industrial Design Act, which is only about two pages long, but only if registered within the specific time limit of one year allowed under that Act. Therefore, the ultimate effect of the Bill will be to take most designs outside of copyright and place them under the Industrial Design Act.

In other words, most of our designers will no longer be able to simply fill in a pre-printed form and send in a cheque for $35 in order to register their copyright in a new design. Nor will they be able to claim copyright protection even if they forget to register at all, which is normally the case. Rather, our designers will be obliged to register promptly under the more complicated scheme set forth in the Industrial Design Act, which could cost hundreds of dollars in legal or agent's fees.

The lawyers will be happy. The designers, the persons the Bill is supposed to protect, will not.

If our designers are astute enough to know about the obligation to register under the Industrial Design Act, will they receive as much legal protection for their design as they would have obtained under copyright? I am advised that the answer is no. First, the length of protection for industrial design is a maximum of 10 years. It is considerably longer for copyright, as we well know. Second, the remedies for infringement provided for in Section 15 of the Industrial Design Act, that is, the injunction, are not as extensive as will now be available under the new Copyright Bill.

One would have thought that since Bill C-60 chose to shift registrations to the Industrial Design Act, for designs which are manufactured in quantity, rather than the Copyright Act, the least the Government could have done would be to amend substantially the Industrial Design Act which is itself decades old and inadequate. But, no, while the Government has sought to bring non-controversial parts of the Copyright Act up to date with Bill C-60, the same Bill proposes only one amendment to Section 2, that is, the definition section of the Industrial Design Act, an Act which in itself is over 100 years old.

I recognize the difficulties and the differences in opinion, but once having decided to amend this Act, I think we should do it right, do it thoroughly and do it now.

How are the two Acts to work in a complementary fashion when one of them is being brought into the 1980s and the other is left to languish in the past? In my books, I give the Government only half marks. Having identified the problem that exists on the inter-relationship between these two statutes, the Government's Bill fails to deal adequately with the problem.

It is suggested that necessary amendments to the Industrial Design Act could be brought in under phase two of the copyright legislation which has yet to be tabled in the House. But who knows if we will ever see phase two of the legislation during this Parliament? Phase two may prove to be as illusive a subject as the introduction of phase two of the sales tax reform proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson).

I have some additional concerns with respect to the new Clause 46(3) of the Bill. That clause sets out certain kinds of products which will be afforded copyright protection, notwithstanding the Industrial Design Act. For example, is it fair that the creator of cartoon characters which are covered by copyright, will lose copyright protection, and that is the Mickey Mouse characters and so on from Walt Disney? They will lose copyright protection and only be covered by industrial design protection for a maximum of 10 years once the design is imprinted on a T-shirt? I would suspect that during legislative committee hearings into this Bill, some groups will wish to come before us to suggest that their particular type of manufactured product should be added to Clause 46(3) so as to receive copyright protection.

With respect to the retroactivity portions of Clause 24 of the Bill, I am always wary of such clauses and will invite the closest scrutiny in legislative committee. I am indebted, however to officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who have explained the mischief with which the section is designed to deal. I hope they will not catch more fish in this retroactive net than is absolutely necessary.

Copyright is an essential freedom. It has an important role to play in the culture and economy of our country. It is not a restrictive concept. It is, rather, one which promotes the free flow of knowledge. Without copyright, any book, painting, or musical composition, for example, could freely be copied and its creators would not be entitled to any benefit such as royalties from the creation of their work. Obviously, an author would have little incentive to produce any original works if others could, without authorization, copy those works and benefit from so doing.

Thus protecting works by copyright enables creators to profit from their creations. Copyright encourages and provides incentive for artists to continue to create works to be part of the growth of Canadian culture, the development of which we all encourage.

I would like to say in conclusion that copyright is an essential right which must follow the trends and technology of a society like any other basic right. I hope that will be the outcome of this amendment.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on Bill C-60, the very long-awaited amendments on copyright legislation. We are dealing with a Bill which dates back to 1924, the last Act, which has been scarcely modified since then and, of course, there have been enormous changes in the intervening years which have necessitated a new Bill.

I had the pleasure of working on the Subcommittee on Copyright, and of hearing submissions from experts, from artists and from cultural workers across the country. I very much enjoyed the learning experience in finding out the very particular problems that changed technologies have made for our artists and which have necessitated this new legislation. I regret that not more of the recommendations of the subcommittee have been included in this Bill. This is rather a timid Bill. It includes the most non-contentious of the items on which we worked and a lot more remains to be done.

Nonetheless, I compliment the Government for finally bringing in the Bill. I am certainly going to co-operate in seeing that it gets passed today on second reading and gets to committee for some further study, not that we would anticipate a lengthy period in committee for a subject which has been so very much studied by committee, by departmental task forces and by experts over the years.

The Subcommittee on Copyright entitled its report: "A Charter of Rights for Creators". Certainly our approach was to give creators full credit to ensure that their economic rights, their moral rights and the integrity of their work, are far better protected. We enunciated some principles which guided our approach throughout the treatment of copyright. Our idea was that a creator should be protected and abuses eliminated, whatever the medium. We ought to have some common standards to ensure that the creator has the full economic rights and the opportunity to control and prevent copying and distortion of his or her works. We set out the general principle, whatever the medium they should apply.

We, of course, sought to incorporate the new forms of creative activity that were not anticipated at that time in 1924 when the Act was first passed. Computers, software, hardware and television itself were not invented at that time. Of course, there have also been enormous changes in other techniques for printing, changes in all forms of creative activity since then that we felt needed to be updated in the new legislation.

In the case of computer software we thought that there ought to be protection by way of copyright. An amendment to Bill C-60 will ensure that the writers of software will receive full protection, that criminal and civil liabilities will apply, and there will be the provision of the full period of 50 years plus the life of the creator, as is the case for other literary works.

I especially welcome the measure in the Bill to end the right for mechanical reproduction for sound recordings. For a long time there has been agitation on this issue. At the time this provision was made, the sum of money agreed upon was two cents per side as the fee to the composer. There was then the possibility of compulsory licensing. No one had to negotiate a contract with composers. They were automatically given the right of payment of this very minimal sum of money. Of course, over the years inflation has made two cents per side a ridiculously small sum of money. It has meant that there is no incentive, for one thing, for composers to see their works produced in Canada when they can be making more money having them produced elsewhere. Who else is working at the same wages as they were in 1924? It is hard to imagine that type of situation continuing. So this is one of the provisions that was very long overdue. I am pleased to see it as one of the provisions that we have in Bill C-60 which is before us.

The question of moral rights was one that the Subcommittee on Copyright spent a lot of time dealing with. We were concerned not only that artists receive their economic rights, and many artists are poor, but that all artists are at the risk of having their work misrepresented, distorted, used in some fashion or other. We have had scandalous cases of writers and visual artists having to sue to protect their rights. In some cases they have been successful. But why should they have to prove damage to reputation? Why should they have to go to this excessive amount of trouble to prove their case, to guarantee the integrity of their work?

So what we recommended and what the Bill will do is to make it easier to protect the moral integrity of an artist's work. There cannot be modification without the creator's consent, except for legitimate restoration and conservation. The artist will no longer have to prove that the change was prejudicial to his or her reputation. For the purpose of penalties, moral rights will be treated as being just as important as economic rights. So an artist could sue for damages and not just for an injunction to stop the distortion to the work as is the case at present. I think that is an advance that our artists will very much appreciate. Certainly, the people who came to see us talked very vigorously about the need to protect their moral rights as creators and the need to end the indignity of having to prove that somehow their rights had been damaged, the presumption being that they did not have the right to control the use of their work.

The provisions in Bill C-60 state that moral rights cannot be assigned to anyone else, although the creator can agree not to exercise them, in effect, to waive them. I hope that artists will not be pressured into these types of agreements, as I think that would be unfortunate. Certainly, our intention is to increase the rights of artists. One has to worry about what kinds of contracts they may be forced to sign that would limit their ability to exercise those rights.

Another area in which we see an important advance for artists is in exhibition rights, rights for visual artists to receive fees for the exhibition of their works in museums, public art galleries and so forth. At present there is no such provision. Visual artists have made various arrangements. They have some type of a fee schedule and they request payment. But they do not have a right in terms of payment; it is only a voluntary provision right now. The sums of money earned are not very high. We are very pleased to see this advance that gives a visual artist exhibition rights.

I am not sure how far these rights go. I will be looking into the fine print to examine this matter a little more closely. It was brought to the attention of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture at hearings recently in Moncton by a very well known artist, Claude Gauvin, that when she had a CBC show done on her and her work the CBC would not pay her artist rights for showing her paintings. The CBC argued that she was getting free publicity by having this show and she ought to be grateful for having free publicity and ought not to be getting royalties. I think that is unfortunate. I think it is wrong. If she had been a musical artist having a show done on her compositions the CBC would have had to pay her royalties for her copyright on her musical works. But because she is a visual artist there was no similar obligation. I hope that that loophole will be closed. If it is not, we will have to look at some amendment in committee.

Another area in which there has been improvement is with respect to choreography. There will now be protection for the first time in a choreographer's own name. There will be a separate category for choreography. It will not be considered just a type of dramatic work. The limitation of treating choreography simply as one other type of literary work is that, of course, for some modern dance there is no story line. They are not literary works. The expression is that dance is an arrangement in time and space using human bodies as design units. This is a technical expression for what we are trying to get at. Perhaps it is the right expression. It does not quite convey what we see. Nevertheless, the idea is that there ought to be protection for these more abstract forms of choreography as well as for the more traditional type which tells a story. This is an interesting advance to see. We have excellent dancers in Canada and excellent choreographers. This is an art form that has really thrived in recent decades. So it is quite proper that we see improved recognition of this art in our new copyright legislation.

The area of industrial design and its overlap or separation from copyright is a very complex one. At present there is a certain amount of uncertainty as to whether industrial design or copyright is the appropriate framework for some particular blueprints, designs and so forth. Our recommendation at committee, something which the Bill respects, was simply to clarify this point of division. There have been lawsuits and there is a certain amount of murkiness as to what the situation is. We have to clarify what comes under copyright, which has very much more extensive protection, and what should come under industrial design legislation.

We should extend the full rights of copyright to what should come only under industrial design. Full copyright protection is, of course, the life of the creator, plus 50 years. That is a very strong form of protection. It would be quite inappropriate and certainly not good for the economy to extend this type of protection for examples of work that should only receive the lesser protection of industrial design.

We are expecting a revision of industrial design legislation. That is another question and not one I will deal with here. We are content to see that there ought to be a careful delineation of roles and to confine copyright to what copyright was really intended to be for, that is, to protect the original work of creators.

[Translation]

Creators have been waiting for this Bill a long time. It is a disgrace that we still depend on legislation passed sixty years ago, when we consider the major technological changes that have taken place since then. At the time there were no computers, no software, no television or video-cassettes.

There have also been major changes in the field of artistic expression, in dance and choreography. Choreography used to mean the explanation of a theme or a story. Today, we have form choreography, without a story. The legislation mush be amended to include this type of expression.

There has been a substantial change in the value of the dollar, if we look at inflation over a period of sixty years. For composers, two cents per record side may have been reasonable in 1924 but it certainly isn't now and has not been for some time. We should abolish the right to music reproduction so that composers can get contracts that are fair.

This Bill is going to do just that, since the moral rights provisions under the present legislation are not adequate. Artists and especially painters have told us that an amendment is needed to better protect the integrity of their work. Today, an artist has to produce evidence of prejudice to his name or reputation.

The proposed legislation will extend moral protection and prevent any changes in the original work.

Another part of Bill C-60 would facilitate the establishment of copyright societies. Certainly this development is very much welcomed and very much promoted by the copyright committee.

Individual creators may authorize collectives to manage access to their rights to collect and to distribute royalties collected on their behalf. We already have two very large collective copyright societies in operation for music—CAPAC and PRO Canada. There is also the Union des écrivains du Québec for the administration of photocopying rights. However, the development of similar kinds of copyright societies has been impeded in Canada by competition legislation. There would be the possibility of prosecution under those laws, which has prohibited the formation of other copyright societies.

Under the new law, if a new society formed and filed its rates with the copyright board, it would be exempt from prosecution by the director of investigation for the Competition Act. Instead it could go to the copyright board for an examination of the tariffs set, if the society thought that the tariffs were not in the public interest. However, the society would have to make a case that the tariffs set were not reasonable and were contrary to the public interest. That gives considerable scope to artists to form collectives and ensure that their rights are better protected.

The user and owner of copyright would decide on the rates. There would be an appeal to the copyright board, only if there were an objection by one or the other side, or if there were an objection by the director of investigation for the Competition Act.

Our idea was that we should encourage creative people to get together to protect their rights, to advance their rights, to administer their rights collectively in a way which they certainly cannot realistically do individually, to assume that bargaining will take place in a fair way, and to use appeal to the copyright board only if the parties are unable to resolve their difficulties, or only if it is clear that the public interest has been harmed. We would expect that normally this would not be necessary and that owners and users of copyright would regulate tariffs themselves.

The Copyright Appeal Board is to be given a new name. Its old name was somewhat a misnomer because it was not an appeal board. With its new, more descriptive name, it will have certain new powers. It will have the power to set rates or to alter rates by copyright societies on musical performance rights. It will have the power to fix royalty rates for new societies when negotiations between the user and the owner of copyright fails, or when there is an appeal to it in effect.

The copyright board will have the right to license the use of copyright works when the owner of the copyrighted work cannot be located. There would be an appeal to the Federal Court on points of law from decisions made by the copyright board.

The chairperson of the board would be a judge. There would be two full-time appointees and up to three others, full or part time. They would not be public servants. I would hope they would be knowledgeable experts in the field of copyright.

Altogether the provisions for the board are very much those anticipated by the committee. They are certainly in the spirit of the recommendations of the Copyright Subcommittee as to its powers and composition. I very much look forward to seeing this copyright board established in the fashion proposed here.

Finally there is the question of piracy, the violation of copyright. Right now the provisions are far too inadequate. We know that there is an enormous amount of violation of copyright and that the technology available now for home copying and piracy in video and audio cassettes is extensive.

Right now the fines do not deter. Pirated video cassettes may be 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the legitimate market, which of course means an enormous loss in revenues to artists. Fines on summary conviction could go up to $25,000 or six months. The penalties on indictable offence, or the really serious offences, could go up to $1 million or five years in prison.

I remember the Copyright Subcommittee discussing what the penalties should be. I certainly remember arguing very strenuously for hefty financial penalties. We must have realistic deterrents if creators are to have full protection of their economic rights. We must have serious penalties, which will mean that it is not good business to violate copyright, that one is better off to pay the royalties than to pay the stiff fines which we would anticipate being meted out.

I want to raise a few objections about how the Minister has dealt with the issue. I am very concerned, as a member of the committee and as someone who has worked extremely hard on the issue, that I have been somewhat maligned. The Minister actually had the colossal gall to say in the House the other day that I have been holding up copyright. I even received a telephone call to the effect that the NDP was not being sufficiently vigilant and indeed was working against the interests of artists.

I sat on the committee and was there when it reported. On October 18, 1985, just shortly after the committee reported, I directed a question in the House to the Minister asking when the Government would bring in a Bill and received an answer indicating that at the earliest possible moment the Government would give these 132 recommendations its consideration and would introduce legislation, subject to negotiations with the other House Leaders. We had been somewhat led to believe that there might be legislation within six months.

I raised the issue again on October 24, 1985, and referred to the subcommittee's report and urged that we have speedy action to implement it.

On January 28, 1987—and in the meantime I had raised it in committee with the Minister, indeed with more than one Minister, on a number of occasions—I indicated that artists had been waiting since the fall of 1985 for action on a new Copyright Act. I said:

> They are beginning to be very disturbed by rumours that the Government is backtracking on the excellent proposals for reform unanimously made by the copyright committee.

We had even heard rumours that the legislation would not be complete, and of course it has not been complete.

I continued:

> The only way for the Government to put to rest these most unfortunate rumours is to bring in a Bill soon with the important and comprehensive recommendations of the copyright committee in it.

• (1310)

Then on March 11, again in a question to the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) referring to the long-standing injustice to composers, I asked when she was going to bring in legislation to remedy this injustice and to do so very quickly. Then, however, on June 15, 1987, we have the Minister stating:

> Last week the Member was protesting when I brought in copyright legislation. That was long overdue as well . . . I hope the Hon. Member will not have the same negative reaction when I bring in the film legislation.

I have been urging film and copyright legislation. In the case of copyright legislation, I have been urging it for years now. This is a complete misstatement of my position. What the Minister was referring to was a letter that I had sent her on May 25 wherein I protested her plans to bring the Bill in on a particular day when the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture would be holding hearings in Saskatoon. This would have meant that the Liberal critic and I could not have been present.

Here we had a Bill that had been waiting for months and months and months. The Copyright Subcommittee's report was presented in October, 1985 and the Minister was planning to bring in the Bill on a day on which the two people most vitally concerned from the opposition Parties had to be at her own Department's committee hearings on another task force. What I did was not done to hold up the legislation. I have been urging that the legislation be brought in for years and I simply want to correct that situation for the record. I think it is quite reprehensible that that sort of misrepresentation should have been committed.

I want to refer to my regret that certain other matters have not been included in this legislation and very much hope they will be included soon in the Government's next legislation. Performers' performances is one aspect of copyright that was not included in Bill C-60.

We did not see any easy remedy for the question of home copying. The committee recommended that there be some kind of royalty payment attached on cassettes, blank tapes and machines for copying that would go to collective societies. My recommendation was slightly different from the majority report. It should be in the form of a tax to ensure that the money does not go out of the country but gets plowed back to our own creative people. Nonetheless, the principle is that creators ought to be paid. Home copying is a way of escaping paying royalties. If a person purchased that same object, he or she would be paying royalties, but if a person copies it from the air, the individual avoids paying royalties to creators. I am sorry we have not seen action on this very important question.

We recommended changes about how photographs get treated for copyright. That is not in the Bill. Some of the contentious issues were excluded. I can understand the Government is still divided on that issue, particularly with regard to broadcasting and retransmission rights.

I call on the Government to move quickly on these very important matters that have not yet been included. Artists are concerned with the possibility of new taxes. They are concerned with cut-backs in the arts, and so it is important they get adequate protection in copyright.

I welcome this legislation. I am keen to see it get to committee. I do not think it will take long in committee. Our artists deserve this piece of legislation. I will certainly co-operate and my Party will co-operate in seeing that the Bill gets swift passage at this stage and gets back to the House for third reading as soon as we can possibly manage it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1986

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. George Hees (for Minister of Transport) moved by unanimous consent, that Bill C-21, an Act to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Competition Act, to repeal the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Hees moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to rise to speak on third reading of Bill C-21, an Act to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Competition Act. I can assure Members of the House that this Bill has had a thorough going over by the legislative committee.

Bill C-21 was referred to the legislative committee and we started hearings in April. We heard some 16 witnesses, we had 36 submissions and there were 16 motions for amendment which were accepted. I am totally convinced that this Bill sets out a sensible and reasonable balance between the needs of Canadian shippers and the international carriers.

I want to commend the Members of Parliament who sat on this committee. We have all spent many years in opposition and some years in Government. We were led by the distinguished Chairman, the Hon. Member for Quebec East (Mr. Tremblay). The Hon. Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher), the Hon. Member for Dartmouth—Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), all members of the committee, served the committee very well indeed. The Official Opposition was represented by the Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), who has had many years' experience in this House and in Cabinet. He brought a lot of wisdom and advice to the committee. The Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp), representing the New Democratic Party, presented his case well.

I believe that the committee served the new rules of Parliament very well. We had recommendations that were aggressive and had to go back to Cabinet. The Cabinet accepted the wisdom of the three Parties as represented on this legislative committee, and I think the Cabinet should be commended for accepting the committee's wisdom. Not all wisdom lies entirely in the bureaucracy and the narrow interest groups that bring some of these issues to the fore. When Members of Parliament direct themselves to a problem, it can genuinely lead to improvements in Bills. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate on third reading.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of my party at the last stage before Bill C-21 is adopted by this House.

We are all aware that the international shipping conferences play a major role in the transportation of goods between Canada and other countries. The conference system was created over a century ago as part of the trade relations between Great Britain and India. At the time, fierce competition between big ocean carriers caused a great deal of instability and uncertainty in the important export trade between these two countries.

Finally, shippers, carriers and consigness decided that all parties stood to gain from increased safety and stability in the transportation of both goods and passangers.

The resulting agreement finally formed the basis for the shipping conferences that have now spread throughout the world.

The conferences are organizations whose members, the various ocean carriers, all subscribe tot he same code of conduct covering, among other things, rates and levels of service, doing so in exchange for agreements on the provision of regular services.

A typical activity of shipping conferences is monitoring price competition, since member shipping lines are obliged to charge the same rates.

In order to restrict internal competition, shipping conferences usually set limits on the number of trips that may be made by each member, as well as on the quantity of merchandise that may be carried and the number of ports members may call.

The present legislation does not require a shipper enter into a patronage contract exclusively with a carrier who is a member of a conference. In practice, however, the conferences generally insist on signing such a contract, in return for certain considerations, including discounts on the quantity of merchandise shipped.

On the other hand, a shipper may drop a patronage contract to take advantage of cheaper rates with another carrier, whether or not the latter is a member of a shipping conference.

The present legislation also protects the conferences from any legal proceedings under the Competition Act, it provides Canada with a measure of control over conference activities and gives the Canadian council of shippers the right to restrict the powers of the conferences.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation, referred to as the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979, has served our country and our trade interests very well.

However, in 1984, the United States, our neighbour to the south, passed a new Act, the U.S. Shipping Act of 1984, which not only ratifies the principle of the conference system but also includes provisions to further protect conferences in certain areas against American antitrust laws.

[English]

Canada's proximity to the United States and the fact that this country is served by a number of joint U.S.-Canada shipping conferences requires that the laws of our countries be fairly compatible on this question. That was one of the arguments put forward by the Government when it tabled this Bill.

At the outset, we in the Opposition agreed. Nevertheless, we had some serious reservations about some aspects of this legislation. The Government was trying to reconfirm the shipping conference situation, but the legislation had some clauses built in that in fact threatened the very existence of the shipping conference. We in the Opposition argued that some of these features had to be removed from the legislation. To that end, we moved a number of amendments in the legislative committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in our view, the amendments improved the Bill and provided legislation that recognized the existence of the conference system without thereby jeopardizing their existence or viability. I must say that the work done in committee was exemplary and that all parliamentarians and the Government in particular should take note.

In fact, this time the Government decided to listen to the claims and suggestions of the various intervenors who testified before the parliamentary committee. I must say that had the Government been as receptive to the representations which were made with respect to Bills C-19 and C-18—both pieces of legislation concerning the Department of Transport—but to which the Government would not listen, we in the Opposition would probably have supported C-19 and C-18. But we could not do so because we felt that the Government was simply not prepared to move forward without bringing in amendments in the field of transport deregulation, particularly concerning Canada's trucking industry as well as air transportation in Bill C-18.

But this time, in the case of Bill C-21, consultation has not been a sham, it has been real. Not only did the Government listened to the suggestions of the witnesses who appeared before the parliamentary committee, but it also listened to those of the Official Opposition.

It has acted responsibly by amending the Bill to take these suggestions and criticisms into account.

[English]

Finally, we will have seen an exercise in which good faith, good judgment and a sense of responsibility won over simple partisanship. This is thanks to the contribution of all members of the committee and in particular the excellent work of the Parliamentary Secretary. I would like to pay tribute to him on this occasion because he has been very active in the committee. He has been a force that has conveyed to his Minister and his Government the views expressed by all members of the committee, not only by opposition Members. Some government Members also had views and feelings with regard to this legislation.

In conclusion, we have before the House a better Bill, a good Bill.

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that we in the Official Opposition will support this legislative measure.

[English]

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, as the New Democratic Party's representative on the legislative committee which dealt with Bill C-21, I appreciate having this opportunity to say something about the Bill before us and about the work carried out by the committee. I would recognize comments made by others about working together on the committee and about the role of the Parliamentary Secretary in carrying changes to the Bill to the Cabinet for consideration.

I must say that I remain very concerned about what the consequences of Bill C-21 may be in practice over the next several years. In order to spell out some of those concerns, I would like to take a little more time than my colleagues on the committee have taken to consider the matter.

This particular version of the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act is of course a part of a series of Bills designed to exempt the operation of conferences, agreements among ocean carriers, selling services to those who wanted to export or import products. These conferences have allowed carriers to agree together on the terms and the rates of service and have exempted them stage by stage through each reformulation from the operations of the Canadian competition law.

The need to re-enact the 1979 Shipping Conferences Exemption Act created the opportunity to which the Government responded with Bill C-21. In 1982 there was a review of this matter by the Water Transport Committee of the CTC and the report to the Minister was generally favourable to the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979.

It is realistic to recognize that the U.S. legislation in 1984 changed the situation somewhat. Of course, various other factors are at work on the oceans these days, primarily less traffic and an over-supply of vessels. This has created a situation where it has been very difficult to operate at a profit. Whether one blames the U.S. legislation for the bankruptcies in the American lines or ascribes them to the same circumstances affecting others is an open question. It is worth recognizing, however, that the Canadian Bill arose not just in the circumstances of a change in the U.S. law but in the context of an oversupply or, one could easily say, excessive competition among lines. A good deal of service was being offered by carriers who were not in the conferences and rates were falling. It is that economic context which we need to keep in mind in considering the Bill before us today.

The U.S. legislation had several key points, and I want to single out just a few of those. First was the provision for independent action by shippers within the conferences, that is mandatory independent action on rates on 10 days' notice. That meant that if a shipper wished to come to an agreement with a carrier who was in a conference and negotiate lower rates than the conference had established, there was a provision in the law for the shipper to do so. That mandatory independent action was the first of the disruptive elements which the U.S. law threw into the operation of the shipping conferences.

The provision for service contracts which would enable an individual shipper, usually a larger shipper with a lot of business to do, to arrive at special terms with a carrier within a conference was another of the provisions which the U.S. law threw into the ocean shipping scene. The law required that not the contracts themselves but their essential terms be published and available to others who were interested in trying to match these favourable arrangements. A third provision was a denial of intermodal rates, that is to say, not just the carriage across the ocean but also the movement on land by rail or truck. The carriers were denied the opportunity to do that.

The question for us, of course, is how to relate to the changes the U.S. has made. How should we position ourselves given the diversity of conferences, and some very large ones have come into existence recently, which organize the vessels carrying goods to and from North America? What we were given in Bill C-21 so far as some of these provisions I have been exploring are concerned was a provision on loyalty contracts. That is to say, a basic feature of the conference system by which shippers commit themselves to a particular carrier. They say, in return for giving you all of our trade, what are the rates? The loyalty contract reflects the arrangements they have arrived at. This gives the carrier some assurance of cargo to be carried. That is for the carrier a very important feature.

What Bill C-21 has done is to open up the possibility that a shipper might be able to divert some of the cargo from this loyalty contractor to others. Of course, that opens up the possibility of playing off members of the conference against independents who may want to enter the trade for their own advantage, even if what they are doing in the short run is going to be ruinous to them and to others in the long run.

The Bill also includes provisions for independent action and it is of course reflecting the American law, where mandatory independent action is provided for on very short notice, that another of the contentious features of Bill C-21 is to be found. The length of notice a shipper has to give before this action comes into effect is one of the points in which the Bill was amended in committee thanks to the hearings and the careful investigations we carried out.

A third feature of Bill C-21, the service contract arrangement, is given novel treatment. Where the U.S. law provides that these particular special arrangements between shippers and carriers will be filed confidentially but their essential terms released so that others know what they are doing, what the best arrangements are that a big shipper can arrive at, in Bill C-21 we have a provision for confidentiality of service contracts. It will not be known to others what exactly a big shipper has been able to arrive at in negotiating one of these service contracts.

As I have already suggested and others have noted the Bill received some amendment in committee. One of the most important changes, and this was a recognition by the Government of concern in the industry about the consequences of the legislation, was the deletion of a clause which would have allowed independent action on service contracts. Those contracts now negotiated will not be open to that additional violation of the conference principle but the service contracts themselves will continue to operate and the confidentiality of them continued as well, as I want to note in a moment.

The increase to 30 days' notice on independent action was an improvement over the 10 days originally in the Bill. A couple of other more or less significant changes which the Bill proposed were a fine of $5,000 per day for violations, which is an enormous increase from what was in the old Act. The committee agreed to reduce that to $1,000 a day.

The proposal that the Act, once passed, should terminate at a certain time was also dropped from this Bill. That strikes me as very sensible. Once the law is established it should continue in force unless and until it proves to be unwise or in need of reconsideration. That can obviously be done. However, it should not contain a sunset clause which will cause it to lapse in five years, which will only impose work on the next Parliament. Therefore, that was a useful amendment.

Among the amendments which I put forward in committee which were not accepted was one to Clause 12 to have service contracts, in their essential terms, open to the public, as American law now specifies that they shall be. I regret intensely that that particular amendment was not accepted. Various interests called for it in appearances before the committee. The decision to keep them confidential in Canada becomes the basis for my objection and my advice to my colleagues to vote against the Bill in the form in which it has come back from committee.

Clause 21 is another on which I proposed an amendment. That amendment grew directly out of the work of the Water Transport Committee in 1982 but which reflected a philosophy different from that of the Government on transport legislation in general which is to let the market-place operate with very little concern on the part of the Government. It seemed to me that we wanted instead sound regulation and, since the negotiations between shippers and the conferences do not always go as well as they might, an obligation placed upon the carriers to negotiate with these shipping associations in good faith which would reflect the American law. That was one of the obligations which I sought to include in the Bill. The government majority of members of the committee refused to accept that.

The issue of considering Bill C-21 was illuminated by a couple of professional witnesses who appeared before the committee at the very beginning of its deliberations. The first was a Canadian, Professor Gunnar Sletmo of Montreal of l'École des Hautes Études Commerciales. As Professor Sletmo himself reminded us, he chaired the task force considering deep sea shipping a few years ago. He knows intimately the people involved in large-scale shipping in Canada. He knows very well what their concerns are about carriers. He took quite a different position on the Bill from that of the shippers' council. In a paper which he presented to the committee he discussed the background to the operation of conferences and his concerns about what Bill C-21 might do. He said:

> As shipping space, usually in the form of containers, is largely a standard "commodity", there has to be some mechanism for reaching agreement on rates among major shipping lines. If not, the result is a free-for-all which while it may benefit the large corporation in the short run, will squeeze out the small shipper who does not have hundreds of containers to offer for shipment. To insist on free competition in a market with the above characteristics is to promote instability, inefficiency, and bankruptcies. A completely free market will result in rates that are non-compensatory in periods of slow trade and surplus capacity, but which will skyrocket during tight supply conditions with growing trade.

Under such circumstances, the price shocks in the general cargo sector would be akin to those experienced in the oil sector in years past where tanker rates changed by a factor of ten or more over a short period of time.

In this paper Professor Sletmo points out a variety of forces that work on the conferences as constraints on the possibility of monopoly pricing. I will not take the time now to note those, but to the six cited in a classic study from the early fifties he added a couple of additional factors which are operating now, those being air cargo and the neobulk shipment developments of the last years.

He is arguing, of course, that the constraints are such that there really is no need to try to destroy the basic conference system. It was his conviction, as well as that of many other people, that the shipping conference system basically, which Canadian law recognized more fully than U.S. law had before, though perhaps not quite up to the sophistication of European and Japanese law, was in fact designed to destroy the conference system.

In addition, Professor Sletmo pointed out what the consequences would be for small shippers. In a certain classic sense there was a confrontation between the shipping federation, which speaks for those who represent the ocean carriers, and the shippers' council which is, I think, first of all, the organization of the large exporters and importers who provide so much of the container trade to the carriers. The shippers' council wanted Bill C-21, and the shipping federation was convinced that some of the provisions, particularly the secrecy on the service contract, was detrimental to the future of the conferences and, therefore, a danger to Canadian ports and Canadian shipping. Professor Sletmo adds:

The Bill in its present form may harm the small shipper who lacks the resources—human and economic—to keep fully informed about different transport arrangements. He usually lacks the volume to obtain interesting special rates or service contracts. The small shipper is highly dependent upon regular liner services at stable and predictable rates. For that to be available, an efficient and reliable liner industry is needed. In all trades, that has till now meant the presence of conferences. This does not preclude the presence of independents, however. On the contrary, non-conference services represent a valuable complement to conference lines and obliterate claims that conferences "monopolize" trades.

If the hand of the largest shippers is further strengthened by legislation, it means still lower rates for those shippers. However, this does not mean reduced costs to conference lines. Hence, the general rate structure will come under upward pressure to recover the reduced liner income. An analogy is a hotel raising its individual rates because it was forced to accept even lower corporate rates.

I could read from the submission of Dr. Leslie Kanuk, an American authority who appeared before the committee the same afternoon. I will only cite her American observation that if it ain't broke, why fix it? She stated that the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act of 1979, the system which we will continue to have until this Bill comes into effect, worked pretty well. I suggest that we face a period of very serious risk as this Bill goes into effect. It is more severe than the American law. Rather than following American law, as the Government has often done, particularly in the secrecy involving service contracts, we do not know how ocean carriers and the conferences will respond to it. There is a possibility that they might give up serving Canadian ports. That, of course, would have immediate impact on our ocean ports.

There are some particular possibilities along that line that I want to point out. Given the developments in carriage these days, particularly the U.S. railways going to the stacked container system of movement across the continent, there is a possibility that American ports and railways will be able to grab trades, even from inland Canadian shippers. Some Canadian centres, in particular Toronto and Montreal, are not all that far removed from American ports. There is a real possibility of displacement of Canadian ports by American ports. For example, Vancouver on the West which could be displaced by Seattle. In the East, Elizabeth, New Jersey, would displace Saint John, which could conceivably take port business from Montreal.

In 1985 almost a quarter of the containers moving through Canadian ports were American. In addition, approximately one-fifth of Canadian cargo moved through American ports. In fact, on the West Coast, almost one-half of the containers were moving through Seattle and other centres.

The Shipping Conferences Exemption Act could easily result in the various ports, such as Montreal, Vancouver and Saint John suffering very severely. This could involve some thousands of jobs at the ports, with the additional economic ramifications. Only time will tell, but the uncertainties that the Government has created with this Bill are such that I have advised my colleagues that we should join in opposing this Bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 13(5), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hockin that Bill C-42, an Act respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Resuming debate with the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My colleague, the Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry), may have concluded his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-42 has been before the Finance Committee for some time. It is the first of three portions of the financial deregulation and reregulation which the Government has been putting forward.

While this Bill is important, it is unfortunate that it has not been accompanied by the third portion of the Government's legislation which would have informed us of its policies about such crucial issues as self-dealing, conflict of interest, and the size of financial institutions.

This is the least contentious of the three Bills because in the wake of the collapse of the western banks and the new ownership under which were placed all of the minor banks that were set up in the last 10 or 12 years, it became evident that there needed to be a new formula for the supervision of financial institutions. That is what is being done in this particular area.

I regret that the portions of the Bill dealing with deposit insurance still have not resolved some of the existing questions. The committee spent considerable time looking at this question in some detail.

I might say that there was some contention in the committee over the question of whether or not and under what circumstances the Deposit Insurance Corporation would be able to levy a penalty of an excess premium on institutions that were not maintaining the standards prescribed by the CDIC for the operation of its affairs. A good deal of confusions remains between the Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions as to who does what to whom. I think it is wrong that the Bill has not been changed in order to prescribe more specifically some of the duties of auditors. I hoped that change would be implemented because one of the tragedies and scandals of the collapse of the western banks is that there still has been no effective action taken to discipline the professional auditors who allowed that to take place without reporting on the prevailing situation in the western banks. We now know that there was a great deal of effort to essentially mislead investors and depositors about the true nature of what was happening.

There was some interesting discussion in the committee on the question of whether the creation of a separate office of the Superintendent of Insurance was adequate protection in ensuring that financial institutions in Canada will continue to be safely, effectively, and prudently operated.

The basic question in this area was whether we should essentially insure deposits, almost without limit, or whether there should possibly be a form of co-insurance for deposits over a certain level. No specific measures were ultimately implemented in this area, but the point is well taken that the Government has put too much reliance on the effectiveness of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to oversee these financial institutions. This has essentially left little or no role to the private investors, municipalities, and depositors to ensure that they are not making unnecessarily unwise investments in order to obtain an extra one-quarter per cent or one-half per cent interest.

I expressed concern that it looks as though the Office of the Superintendent of Insurance would not get adequate new resources in order to ensure that what happened in 1985 might not happen again. The Superintendent said that he would decide what resources he needed and had been assured that he would get those resources when he went before Treasury Board and Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). I appreciate the confidence that he expressed.

The new Superintendent is obviously a man of great capacity and we welcome his appointment. However, I am not sure whether Mr. Mackenzie might not face similar problems that his predecessor faced as Inspector General of the banks. He may be unable to get adequate resources or effectively fulfil the greater responsibility he has been given. Unfortunately, that is a problem that has not been resolved.

One could raise many other questions about this legislation. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions is being given very substantial powers to effectively move in on institutions, seize assets and, according to the other Bill, determine the value of real estate assets. This was not possible at the time of the collapse of the western banks and, had some of these powers existed at that time, it might have saved the taxpayers, bank customers, or perhaps both, hundreds of millions of dollars. Canadian taxpayers would not have had to bail out the banks to the degree that was required.

It is regrettable that we are essentially locking the stable door after the horses have fled. I think one has to conclude that while this legislation is a welcome improvement on what existed before, we are looking at a situation where well over $1 billion has been effectively advanced from the Treasury of the Government of Canada to rescue institutions which went deeper and deeper into trouble before they were caught. It was the officials who were responsible to the Government who gave assurances that these institutions were in good financial order. It was those assurances which then led the Government to decide that it had no choice but to honour the commitment and bail-out not just those depositors who were insured but those uninsured depositors, which meant that tens upon hundreds of millions of dollars went to foreign depositors who simply invested in the western banks in order to get a slightly better term on their money.

It was this Government which was responsible for that and for the expenditure. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to recall this very carefully when at future times we find the Government saying: "We cannot go ahead on such issues as child care. We cannot have a universal child care program because the money is not there".

It reminds me of what the Government said before the Second World War when Members of my Party, the CCF at the time, said: "We should be spending money to help get the economy moving. We should be prepared, if need be, to even have deficits in order to ensure Canadians get back to work". The Prime Minister of the day, be it a Conservative Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, or a Liberal Minister, Mr. King, said: "We cannot do it. The money is not there". But then the war came along and suddenly the money was there, not to invest in peace but to invest in armaments to fight against the Germans. Of course, we should have done that in the circumstances of the time, but it is ironic that when it was a matter of having Canadians working, the money was not there, and when it was a matter of Canada fighting in a war in Europe, the money suddenly came to be there.

Our Party's suggestion was that there should be a program which would initially cost, I believe, some $300 million, and we are told the money is not there. When we press our case, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) stands up and goes through those lines he was rehearsing with Decima Research before he came to the House of Commons today, to try to paint the New Democrats as a bunch of crazy socialists who somehow do not know which end is up.

I have to ask which is more important, to bail out foreign depositors who happen to put money into Canadian banks in order to get an extra one-quarter per cent of interest, or to ensure the beginning of a child care program which will serve families across Canada? It says something about the Government's priorities that it puts foreign bankers ahead of Canada's children. With those remarks, I conclude my comments on Bill C-42.

We are in fact opposing the Bill as we did on second reading, not so much because of the technicalities of what is in here but because of our basic disagreement and concern with the Government's failure to come to grips with the problems of over concentration of ownership in the financial sector, its weak procedures, the weak policies it put in place, and its failure to even come up with policies which would match the recommendations made by the committee on finance in which my friend, the Hon. Member for Kamloops Shuswap (Mr. Riis) participated and which unanimously recommended that no commercial concern should be able to own more than 30 per cent of a financial institution in Canada. The Government has said it is very worried about commercial financial links but then it tells a company such as Imasco, for example, that it only has to disburse 35 per cent of Canada Trust and it can keep the remaining 65 per cent.

We are disagreeing with all three of these Bills for these basic reasons of principle, although when we get down to the specifics, my comments would be a bit more moderate and would reflect the comments I just made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is very important, I think, that a variety of points of view be put on the record—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Speaker will now hear a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

INDIAN ACT, 1985—FILING OF REPORT BY MINISTER

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I had arranged to hear a point of order from the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) at this time, at the conclusion of the last Member's speech.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding the tabling today of a report by the Hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight) as required by Section 22 of an Act to amend the Indian Act, 1985, a statute which is generally referred to as Bill C-31. I gave you notice earlier today, Mr. Speaker, that I intended to raise this point of order and I thank you for hearing me now.

Mr. Lewis: Order or privilege?

Mr. Penner: A point of order. I would have made my point of order earlier today under Routine Proceedings. I had expected the Minister to table the report. I realize now he was not required to do that, that since it is a statutory obligation, it could be filed with the Table and that has been done in correct order.

I regret, however, that the Minister did not make a brief statement in conjunction with his tabling because the Standing Orders permit no oral questions when a report is tabled only. However, that is beside the point. My point of order will be brief and succinct. It has two parts to it. Both are related to the statutory obligations of the 1985 Act to which I referred earlier, commonly known as Bill C-31. The statutory requirements of what the report must contain is the first point I want to make. My second point is what further action is required now that the report has been tabled, that is the adequate and appropriate Parliamentary response to the report.

First, the statute in Section 22.1(c) states the report shall include detailed information on "the impact of the amendments on the lands and resources of Indian bands". There are two other requirements just ahead of that, (a) and (b), and they require certain statistical information. So far as I know, those two sections are complete and in accord with statutory requirements. It is Section 22.1(c) which gives me concern, the impact of these amendments on the land and resources of Indian bands. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, there is a deficiency here and this deficiency represents a statutory avoidance. The obligations of the statute have not been fulfilled.

To support my allegation, I turn to the report itself which confesses this inadequacy. It says it is still too early for the full impact of the 1985 amendments on reserve lands and band resources to be felt. In view of the changes that may take place over the next few years, Indian Affairs will undertake an evaluation of the impact of the 1985 amendments and present a report in June 1990. I argue that that simply will not do. The statute never said at any time that the report must indicate the full impact. It said it must report the impact after two years. Those, Sir, are already significant because 25,000 native people have now been registered as Indians and 9,000 had their band status restored immediately. The impact, therefore, exists and this report does not adequately report on that impact.

The Minister and his department have made no real effort to provide this information to the House. So the first part of my point of order is what recourse does the House then have if a statutory requirement imposed on the Minister is incompletely or inadequately fulfilled? I allege this report is deficient and incomplete. Second, Standing Order 67(4), states:

> Reports, returns or other papers laid before the House in accordance with an Act of Parliament shall thereupon be deemed to have been permanently referred to the appropriate standing committee.

However, the statute differs from that standing order and when there is a dispute between a statute and a Standing Order, you will know, Sir, that the statute must take precedent. I quote from Erskine May, 19th Edition, page 212:

> A statute overrides, and cannot be superseded by, an order or regulation of one House or of both jointly.

• (1410)

There is a difference, Sir, in simply referring the report pursuant to Standing Order 67(4) or doing what the statute requires. Section 22(2) of the statute states that such committee of Parliament as may be designated or established for the purposes of this subsection shall forthwith, after the report of the Minister is tabled under Subsection (1), review that report and may in the course of that review undertake a review of any provisions of the Indian Act enacted by this Act.

That refers to a committee of Parliament. It does not state a standing committee of the House of Commons. Someone advised me earlier that that may be no more than sloppy drafting. Be that as it may, it states a committee of Parliament—and the definition of Parliament is the House of Commons, the Senate and the Governor General. Of course the Governor General does not participate in committees.

So it would seem to me that a case can be made that what is called for by the statute is a special joint committee. This special joint committee shall be given more than the usual powers of a standing committee. It should be able to travel from place to place, and it should have the assistance of experts. It is vital that such a committee assess fully the impact of this law, Bill C-31, upon Indian people, Indian bands and Indian nations.

The simple fact is that the opposition Members, that is, myself and the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry), have lost confidence and faith in the work of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development. It rarely meets. When it is convened it barely functions. This law, Bill C-31, is too important to be treated in such a cursory fashion.

Therefore, Sir, the second part of my point of order is that the statute calls for the designation or establishment of a parliamentary committee to deal particularly and exclusively with the report. A perfunctory reference to the standing committee will just not do. I ask Your Honour to rule that such a reference to the standing committee ought to be set aside. There is a statutory obligation on the House to strike a special committee, most likely a special joint committee, to undertake fully and completely the assessment of Bill C-31 upon the Indian people of Canada.

Thank you, Sir, for listening to my point of order.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) for giving me notice that he would be presenting this point of order. I would like to address the point the Hon. Member made with respect to the adequacy of the response in the report under the statute that we are discussing, which is ordinarily known as Bill C-31. I suggest that there is a response. The response as to the impact was that the impact could not be measured, enunciated or substantiated with knowledge because of the information that the Department had at the time of the legislative requirement for responding.

One of the most dramatic and far-reaching aspects of the changes to the Indian Act under Section 22 will be with respect to Indian bands having control of their membership. As the statute was passed, two years were allowed for bands to take control, if they wished, of their membership by establishing a membership code in accordance with the statute.

Up until the last two weeks or three weeks as this report was being prepared, bands had not provided membership codes to the Department. Therefore it was very difficult for the Department to assess how people who were reinstated under Indian heritage return and membership return would be treated by individual bands. Therefore, with respect to the impact on lands and resources, as well as in terms of actual increases in program and service expenditures, only a small number of people have returned to reserves to date. As a result, the full impact of the amendments are yet to be felt. The Department is therefore committed to continuing to monitor the impact of implementing Bill C-31.

I do not want to take any more time on that point. I think the Hon. Member opposite understands the rationale for the report being statistical in nature and the inability of the Department to enunciate the full impact.

I want to address briefly the tabling of the document, as the Hon. Member has suggested, pursuant to Standing Order 67(1). That Standing Order states:

> 67. (1) Any return, report or other paper required to be laid before the House in accordance with any Act of Parliament or in pursuance of any resolution or Standing Order of this House may be deposited with the Clerk of the House on any sitting day, and such return, report or other paper shall be deemed for all purposes to have been presented to or laid before the House.

My colleague opposite referred to this. I would also point out that Standing Order 67(4) states:

> 67. (4) Reports, returns or other papers laid before the House in accordance with an Act of Parliament shall thereupon be deemed to have been permanently referred to the appropriate standing committee.

In this report, as it was tabled, we felt that it was deemed to be referred to the appropriate standing committee, that is, the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a few words in support of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner).

I agree with him when he says that the report that is being tabled today by the Minister is incomplete in that it does not deal with the very important fact of the impact of Bill C-31 upon Indian bands and Indian organizations. That was not dealt with. In his response the Minister said that the impact could not be measured because the information that the Department had at that time was incomplete.

I wish to submit that the Minister and the Department did not undertake the necessary process to obtain that type of information. Although the full impact is not yet known as to what Bill C-31 will do to Indian bands across Canada, Indian bands are already experiencing considerable difficulty in the implementation process. The Assembly of First Nations, meeting now in Toronto as we speak, would not agree with the Minister that no determination about the impact can be determined. There is an impact. Although the full impact cannot yet be established, we should be able to see what some of the preliminary impact is. We should be able to understand in what direction the impact is moving Indian peoples.

I wish to stress that when the committee was dealing with this Bill, we were very concerned about the widespread changes that this would introduce to Indian communities. As a result of that we built in the procedure that there would be a full reporting to Parliament by the Ministry on the impact that this would have. We realize that we were not completely sure of what was going to happen. By the Minister and the Department not filing a full and complete report, they are not meeting their obligation to Parliament. In turn, as Members of Parliament, we are not meeting the obligation that we undertook at that time to the Indian people to ensure that we would monitor the impact of Bill C-31 upon their communities. The Department has failed. The Minister has failed. Unless we as the House of Commons insist that the Department and the Minister table a full report, then we are failing.

I would like to second the other point made by the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior, that is, that a special joint committee be appointed to look at all aspects of the implementation of Bill C-31 to see how it is actually affecting Indian communities and the people who are being reinstated.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few brief remarks to make since I believe the Minister has replied fully. First, with respect to the question as to whether or not this matter should go to a standing committee or a joint committee, I make two points. First, I wish to reiterate a point made by the Minister. He said that Standing Order 67(4) states:

> 67. (4) Reports, returns or other papers laid before the House in accordance with an Act of Parliament shall thereupon be deemed to have been permanently referred to the appropriate standing committee.

I submit that the Minister is in compliance with the rules of the House. Had the Government been aware of any request or consideration that the matter go to a joint standing committee, then that is something we could have taken into consideration. In the meantime I submit that to suggest to the House that one has a point of order because one has lost confidence in a standing committee, which is not fully made up of people of one's own Party, is more a matter of debate than a point of order.

• (1420)

I submit that the point of order fails and that the Government has in fact complied with the rules of the House, which I submit is in Your Honour's jurisdiction. Whether or not the report is broad and does all things which every Member of the House of Commons wants it to do is a matter for debate and maybe even a matter of judicial interpretation. However, as far as whether or not it complies with the rules of the House and stands as a valid point of order, I submit that we are in compliance with the rules of the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to add two or three points to this very critical point of order. I am pleased the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) raised it.

I suspect that every Member of Parliament has received volumes of mail in terms of the problems and concerns of native people in respect of Bill C-31. I know that in my own constituency, with a number of reserves and the problems associated with them, it has been a matter of delegations, telegrams, and letters for months and months. Obviously we are all interested in the issue.

Setting aside the point made by the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior and the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly), that members of the standing committee have little faith in the committee in terms of its past performance, to say nothing of the views held by Indian people through various Indian bands and native nations, the critical part of Your Honour's decision is where the statute calls for a parliamentary committee.

I do not think you would find anything but an enthusiastic response from native people and native bands across Canada if the House saw fit to send the matter, not to the standing committee which I submit has lost the confidence of the House and of native people, but to a special parliamentary committee made up of Members of the Parliament of Canada, including the Senate and the House of Commons, to assess the impact of Bill C-31.

It is not only important for what it has or has not done over the last two years, but in a sense it sets the tone for decades and generations of people to come. We would only be fulfilling our parliamentary responsibilities and duty in the most honourable way possible if we participated in a parliamentary committee as opposed to simply seeing the matter referred to the standing committee.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) has brought a matter of some complexity to the Chair, and others have commented on it. It is somewhat similar to an application brought to the Chair some days ago by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). Since I will be ruling on the matter shortly, it is probably advisable to reserve at this time.

I assure the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior, the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly), and the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) that I will look very carefully at the point raised. There is, as I say, a similarity which creates certain problems for the Chair.

I have listened carefully to the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary who, as always, made remarks which will be of assistance to me. However, I think I would ask the indulgence of the House to reserve on the matter because the two cases are very similar and will probably have to be decided on somewhat similar grounds.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hockin that Bill C-42, an Act respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-42 comes at an interesting time, at a time when for obvious ideological purposes the Government has launched into a mad plunge into deregulation. We have seen the deregulation of the transportation industry—shipping by sea, by rail, by land, and by air. In other words, we have seen an ideological approach to the whole matter of deregulation when the facts and witnesses indicate that there is no sense to it at all. I suspect we would see exactly the same applied to the financial industry. However. we have seen an interesting mix of deregulation and reregulation. If the Government had decided to deregulate financial industries as it has deregulated other industries, it would have been inappropriate. Of course what brought it on was the total collapse of a number of financial institutions in the last few years.

This is a new phenomenon in Canada. Previously the last bank failure in Canada was in 1923 with the failure of the Home Bank. There had not been a bank failure in Canada until 1985 when of course, 62 years later, the Canadian Commercial Bank and Northland Bank collapsed. I will have more to say about that in a moment.

Along with those two banks other financial institutions collapsed: Astra Trust Company, the Fidelity Trust Company, AMIC Mortgage Investment Corporation, Greymac Mortgage Corporation, Seaway Mortgage Corporation, Northguard Mortgage Corporation, Pioneer Trust Company, Western Capital Trust Company, Continental Trust Company, North American General Insurance Company, Underwriters National Assurance Company, American Reserve Insurance Company, and Pitts Insurance Company. I will not take up the time of the House to continue reading the list. However, basically since the Conservatives formed the Government of Canada, we have seen the collapse of a whole series of financial institutions. I do not want to suggest for a moment that it was only because of the election of the Conservative Party to form the Government of Canada, but I will say that it was a factor.

The need to move with some haste or some expedition in terms of reregulating or updating the regulations attached to Canadian financial institutions was focused on the $1 billion bank bail-out bungle perpetuated by various government Members. It was a financial mess.

Those who must bear some of the responsibility include the management of the banks in the whole matter of the bank-gate affair, when they tried to cover up the errors they had made as senior financial managers in both the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank. Then of course outside auditors were involved—the Clarkson Gordon team, the Peat Marwick team, and the Thorne Riddell team—for not ringing the alarm bells when they should have. If they were living up to their professional responsibility, they should have said to the shareholders and the depositors that those two banks were in serious trouble. However, they too were part of a giant cover-up.

Then the Governor of the Bank of Canada told people not to worry, that the Canadian Commercial Bank was a secure bank. He told depositors to have no fear, and of course he should have known better. The Inspector General of Banks also misled, I suspect inadvertently, the people of Canada by saying that his team had been in there looking at the banks, and of course he had not. He had overlooked that and in a sense misled the shareholders, the depositors, and those doing business with those two banks, to say nothing of the then Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) who repeatedly stood in the House of Commons as senior representatives of the Government, sending out a false message to the people of Canada, particularly the shareholders, the depositors, and those doing business with the two banks. They said: "Everything is fine, don't worry, have confidence in us". Big deal, we know what happened when the whole thing collapsed.

Of course with them went thousands of small businesses in western Canada and a concern for the shareholders, to say nothing of those people who were wondering what would happen to their deposits.

Even the six chief executive officers of the six major Canadian banks were caught up in this misrepresentation of the facts. They were brought in at the eleventh hour. They did not realize that the two banks, for all intents and purposes, were brain dead and could no longer survive. They did not know that the two banks required artificial intensive care just to keep them going in a very artificial way for some time. They should have known, but they listened to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and the Inspector General of Banks. They had faith in these people, but of course we know now that that faith was misplaced.

Then along came the Estey Commission which proved conclusively that the failure of the two banks had nothing to do with economic conditions in western Canada. It was a popular myth at the time to say that there were difficult economic times and therefore the two banks collapsed. We were reminded of many other financial institutions which did not collapse in western Canada; they in fact remained strong and viable. It is true that they had difficult times, but they did not collapse.

Judge Estey of that inquiry pointed out clearly that it was the management or, more appropriately, the mismanagement of those financial institutions that made the whole set of errors, errors upon errors upon errors, made by people who had failed to do their jobs adequately. While no one person or one group of people can be targeted as being the cause of the problem, it was indeed the system. Today we are trying to improve the system.

We have made some progress in improving the system. As my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), indicated, we are supporting parts of this legislation, but other parts we have difficulty with. The critical part of Bill C-42 responds to Estey in the creation of the office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. This mega-office will provide an overview of financial institutions in the country. This office will consolidate the function of the present Inspector General of Banks and the Superintendent of Insurance. The superintendent of this new office will be responsible for the administration of statutes, the execution of supervisory actions in the assessment of solvency and will be answerable, of course, to the Minister of Finance.

I will not take up any more time of the House in an effort to facilitate the passage of this Bill, but we oppose this Bill primarily for the reason that it fails, in our estimation, to deal adequately with deposit insurance. While we hold to the policy of ensuring deposits over $60,000, as long as this Government is in power the depositors know that regardless of what happens, it will move in with whatever amount of taxpayers' money is necessary, whether it is half a billion dollars, a billion or a couple of billion dollars. But there is no money for decent day care facilities, no money to provide venture capital for small business and no money to support fishermen and farmers. When it came to bailing out the uninsured depositors, made up almost exclusively of foreign banks, the Bank of Japan, Wells Fargo, the Bank of Kuwait, the Dubai National Bank—and we can go on, along came the Government of Canada, using taxpayers' money, and bailed them out.

We do not have confidence in the present Government to have faith in the present deposit insurance changes. More appropriately, Mr. Speaker, is the ownership provision. We felt strongly about this when we looked into this whole matter in the Finance committee. As a matter of fact, I remember sitting late into the night time and time again looking into concentration in the financial community. As New Democrats, we felt ownership should be limited to 10 per cent, that 10 per cent ownership in a financial institution, like we have at the banks, is a safeguard to keep away from one individual or one group of companies having exclusive domain or having monopoly control over a particular institution.

The Finance committee thought that might be a little bit heavy, although it was okay for the banks of Canada, so they raised it to 30 per cent. They felt that any more than 30 per cent ownership would cause problems in terms of financial corporate concentration in the power exercised therein. This Bill fails totally to come to grips with that. As my colleague from Ottawa Centre indicated, even with the huge Imasco conglomerate it will only be allowed to divest down to 60 per cent ownership in its financial institution which gives Imasco total effective control, to say nothing of many, many others where the control is 100 per cent in the hands of one individual. With all due respect to Arab sheiks, they can come into Canada and pick up a financial institution and own one. That is not what we feel is in the best interests of the Canadian depositors or people doing business with the Canadian financial institutions.

We oppose this legislation. We feel reluctant that we did not have a better Bill than Bill C-42. It is a small step in the right direction. The Bill really fails to deliver the kind of protection that the Canadian public deserves, in terms of shareholders, depositors and those doing business with the Canadian financial institutions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-11, an Act respecting the acquisition, operation and disposal of the Windsor-Detroit tunnel by the City of Windsor, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hockin that Bill C-42, an Act respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis) apparently does not believe that I can deliver a very short address. All I need is one minute—I could take 20 minutes if I wished, but I won't because I understand we are going on to another Bill in a couple of moments—just to put on the record what the previous speaker was talking about. It is interesting to note that none of these people from the Governor of the Bank down to the top management of all of our major financial institutions, to all of the highly paid experts in the financial community during those meetings which took place, knew exactly what they were recommending or what they were about.

It is interesting to put on the record as well that politicians and Cabinet Ministers had meetings prior to the decision being made, and really on their shoulders lies the responsibility of the billion dollars which had to be spent.

There appears in this Bill a section under which fines can be levied for "not sound business and financial practices". It leads certain financial institutions to think twice about taking a chance. In other words, at the end of this month, on Tuesday, the Fisheries Improvement Loans program comes to an end, the Farm Improvement Loans program comes to an end, all of the guaranteed loans to primary producers come to an end unless Bills are passed in this Chamber by Tuesday afternoon, which obviously they will not be.

The Government of Canada, getting out of the practice of guaranteeing loans to small business people, changed the law under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Now, if you are a businessman and you walk into a bank, wanting to start up a business, you have to put 1 per cent up front first. You have to say to the bank manager "Look, I want a loan and I will pay you 1 per cent cash today in order to get that loan because that is what the Government of Canada says in its new Small Businesses Loans Act". The other primary producers cannot even get a guarantee anymore. By putting in this Bill, "not sound business and financial practices", banks will hesitate, they will think twice or three times because if it ever gets in the newspaper that they have been fined for carrying out unsound business practices, as our critic has pointed out, that would certainly be a serious affront to that particular financial institution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 13(5) the recorded division stands deferred until 6 o'clock p.m., Monday, June 29, 1987.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to indicate House business further to the exchange which took place here in the House a week ago arising out of the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) and as well the point of order raised by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). I would like to indicate at this time that House business as it relates to the proceedings next week and perhaps address the concerns that have been expressed by both Hon. Members.

• (1440)

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, as will Hon. Members, that both the question of privilege and the point of order respecting the notice and timing of the proceedings on Motion No. 5 respecting capital punishment standing in my name were left in abeyance to allow Members to have private discussions to determine if acceptable arrangements could be arrived at. For my part, I have been unable to have spokesmen for the Parties reach such agreement and arrangements. Earlier today I received rejections from my counterparts to a proposal which would have added time on Monday next to allow participation in the debate and to conclude it that day.

In the circumstances, therefore, I feel it is appropriate as a way of giving the fair notice of a vote which was sought by the Hon. Member for Burnaby and to follow up on the concerns expressed by the Hon. Member for York Centre a week ago to give adequate notice prior to the vote being taken. I would like to take this opportunity to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on government Motion No. 5 respecting capital punishment and on any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate be not further adjourned.

As the Standing Orders work, the notice, when moved on Monday, will require a final vote on the question by 1 a.m. that sitting day without a provision for deferment. I regret that I cannot help the Hon. Member for Burnaby meet his request but at least—

Mr. Cassidy: So much for a free vote in the House of Commons.

Mr. Mazankowski: At least, I do want to use this opportunity to give ample and timely—

Mr. Cassidy: So much for free debate in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) is addressing the House on a matter which is very important to this Chamber as all Hon. Members know. Members of course will have different views as to how this debate might proceed. However, the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister has come to the House to take into account at least to some degree the matters raised by the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) and the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) several days ago.

At that time, I adjourned the matter in the hope that Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber could sort out their difficulties and arrive at some more unanimous agreement as to how the debate should proceed. The Hon. Deputy Prime Minister has said that at least in his view, that was not possible and has now come to the Chamber to, as I take it, try to meet at least some degree of the concerns that were raised the other day and to give more notice than perhaps was seen to be given before of the steps the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister is intending to take on Monday which will of course lead to a limitation of the debate, assuming that all of that does take place. However, I would ask Hon. Members to extend to the Deputy Prime Minister the same courtesy that we would extend to all others and that is to hear the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister throughout his entire remarks. Other Hon. Members may want to rise briefly and the Chair will consider that if it is appropriate.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I have almost concluded my remarks. I would simply repeat that the purpose of my coming to the House this afternoon is to try to comply with the requests made by Hon. Members opposite to provide ample and timely notice to Members who have expressed concern and to all other Hon. Members. I appreciate being allowed to take the time of the House to do just that.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we are profoundly disappointed that the Government has chosen to choke off debate on a matter as important as the reinstatement of the death penalty. This is not consistent with what happened when this matter was before the House in the past and it is certainly not consistent with the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in his eloquent speech opposing the death penalty.

I do want to make an inquiry and I hope I am doing it in a proper manner. In light of the remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), I wonder when there might be rulings on the question of privilege and point of order raised in this connection Friday last. I hope my inquiry will not be taken in any way as attempting to expedite your consideration of the matter, but I feel that I must ask the question in view of what the Deputy Prime Minister has just said.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am very, very disappointed that we have to do this. First, I want to say to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) that at least we appreciate the notice so that on such a critical vote, Members of Parliament from all sides will be adequately notified that the vote will take place at one o'clock early Tuesday morning. However, I want to say how profoundly sad we are that this has taken place.

So far during the debate on capital punishment, 82 per cent of the Members of the House of Commons have as yet been unable to make a speech.

Mr. Fennell: That's not true.

Mr. Riis: Eighty-two per cent have been unable to make a speech in the House of Commons. We believed the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when he said that the people of Canada would see a full and free debate and a vote in the House of Commons. We took that to mean that those Members of Parliament who wished to make a speech on capital punishment would have the opportunity to do so. Now, when 82 per cent of the Members have yet to make a speech on capital punishment, the Government is introducing a motion that will force a vote after just a few more hours of debate. That is something that we find unacceptable. Once again, we find that the Prime Minister's word is not to be taken as offered. The Prime Minister has said one thing and now the Government is doing another. That seems to be a trend that we find very, very disappointing.

I think the people of Canada will also think that they have been shortchanged. They have a right to know why their Members of Parliament are voting as they will vote at one o'clock on Tuesday morning. It is not unrealistic to expect an opportunity to be at least provided to those Hon. Members who wish to make a speech to explain to their constituents and the people of Canada why they will vote as they will.

On behalf of the New Democrats, I want to register our profound disappointment. We feel that this is an inappropriate use of parliamentary procedure. Never was the heavy hand of closure meant to limit a debate on what is literally a life-and-death issue.

On behalf of the New Democrats, I say that this action is inappropriate. This is not what the Prime Minister promised the people of Canada. It is something that we feel will detract from the esteem the public now holds for the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada. If Hon. Members who wish to speak on an issue as crucial as this cannot, with 82 per cent of the Members of the House of Commons not yet having had the opportunity to make a speech on this critical issue, the people of Canada will feel that they too have been betrayed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I too want to say how deeply disappointed I am that the Government should have decided to impose closure on the capital punishment debate.

The decision has a special impact because this is supposed to be a free vote, yet it belittles the authority of the whips, and each Member expected, or perhaps the majority of Members were expecting to have an opportunity to air their views and explain their vote.

I also think that the majority of Canadians really thought that their Members of Parliament or most of them would speak to this issue.

Speaking for myself, I may be among those who will not be able to take part in the debate and who would have liked to explain why they will be voting against the resolution to restore capital punishment.

I want to be brief, and in conclusion I would say that it is rather strange that the Government chose to impose closure on this kind of vote. Ironically, closure, which is also called the guillotine, will now apply to a bill aimed at reinstating capital punishment.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here listening to the House Leader on this very sensitive and serious issue. Having been involved in three other debates on capital punishment in my term as a Member, knowing full well the emotion and division this debate creates because it deals with individual conscience, I am frankly rather disappointed at the reaction from those on the opposition side, and I have sat there myself. I was hoping the House Leaders would have been able to reach an agreement to shorten the time for the debate and extend the hours. If Members opposite really wanted to give every Member an opportunity to participate in the debate, surely that would have been the simple thing to do. House Leaders could have come together for that purpose, not for partisan political reasons in order to try and castigate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). They can face up to the issue without making cheap political points.

I am not going to have a chance to speak in this debate, but I am not that worried. There is not a Member of this House who cannot communicate with the media as to why he or she votes the way they vote. To lay the blame on the Prime Minister is to give it to him both ways. I have had some problems with the Prime Minister on other issues, but I am not prepared to sit here and listen to the hypocrisy involved in lambasting the Prime Minister for not fulfilling his promises and then doing the same thing when he tries to fulfil a promise on something as sensitive as capital punishment. The Opposition in their hypocrisy tried to condemn him there, too.

I think the House Leader has been most reasonable in trying to come up with a deal which nobody here has talked about. We could have sat here all weekend, any weekend and had this thing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: This leaves me absolutely cold.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I indicated that to the degree it was appropriate I would recognize Members, and I may well recognize a few more. However, I want to warn that in the mind of the Speaker this exchange could very rapidly become a debate on something else entirely. I do not think that would be appropriate.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, every Member enjoys the privilege and the right to speak in the House. Sixteen Members of the Official Opposition have expressed their desire to take part in this debate. If anything is important at all in this House, it has to be that Members may express themselves, speak, and present their points of view. What this Government has done by imposing closure is that it turns this into a partisan issue, it adopts with respect to this question a new policy which restricts the right to speak of the Members of the Official Opposition, and I strongly object to that policy. I think it is irregular and unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. Again I repeat that 16 Members on this side are anxious to take the floor, and we will do everything we can to make sure they get it.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the Government's decision, and especially, and that is the point of order, the fact that the Government interfered in a debate that had been initiated as part of Private Members' Business. Furthermore, according to the Government spokesman, it was initially supposed to be a free debate and a free vote without any inteference on the part of the Government.

I also deplore the statement by the Government House Leader, who said that, after seeking a consensus with the opposition parties, he had been obliged to announce closure.

Mr. Speaker, the Government House Leader wanted the Opposition parties to accept his proposal to finish the debate next Monday or else he would impose closure. Mr. Speaker, it was no choice at all.

Quite frankly, I think it is hypocritical of the Prime Minister and his Government, the Minister of Justice and the rest who have clearly stated they are against capital punishment, to let the debate go on and then all of a sudden insist on a vote.

I would say to my colleagues opposite, Mr. Speaker, that all Members should have a chance to participate. It was this Government's decision to have the issue debated in the House. We felt there were many other questions that were far more important to Canadians than spending days and weeks and months on the debate on capital punishment. Everybody knows now it is hardly likely this process will lead to a Bill and, subsequently, to the application of the death penalty.

Mr. Speaker, we may well ask why the House has spent so much time and effort on this issue. Didn't the Government know enough not to initiate this process or have it initiated? And why is the Government now interfering with this question instead of leaving it as Private Members' Business?

[English]

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that opposition Members would agree to any time being convenient to bring in closure. The suggestion that it will happen on Monday certainly will not be agreeable. However, if the people opposite are sincere in wanting to make sure Members have an opportunity to speak they could, through the House Leaders, talk about a limited time of five minutes or 10 minutes for each person to speak in the debate on Monday. Thus all Members could be accommodated.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who is probably going to find himself in much the same position as other Members who want to speak on this Bill. Let us be clear what we are doing. The House is being asked to endorse or reject a motion which in principle affirms capital punishment as a suitable vehicle for the state to carry out the law of the land. We are talking about the House of Commons saying yes or no to capital punishment. For Members to stand up and suggest that five minutes or four minutes or three minutes is an appropriate amount of time for a small number of Members to be heard on such a fundamental question is simply unacceptable, as well intentioned as those comments may have been. I include the Hon. Member for Annapolis Valley—Hants (Mr. Nowlan) in that comment.

If there is to be something said for House Leaders going back to the negotiating table and discussing this further, then I would suggest, if there is any hope of a reasonable or rational solution being arrived at, the three gentlemen involved should go and do it. I for one cannot agree in any way, shape or form to do anything but to refuse to allow the business of this House to proceed if the Government is going to invoke closure on a fundamental question like capital punishment.

I cannot accept on the one hand the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) standing in this House making the speech he made just a few short days ago and today the man who sits at his right hand, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), walks into the House and moves closure. The Prime Minister said he would do all within his power to oppose capital punishment and two days later in walks the Deputy Prime Minister and moves closure.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) is raising a point which was raised a few days ago. I suggest to the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) that the Chair would find it appropriate to make a ruling and I will do so at eleven o'clock Monday morning. I do not see anything to be gained by re-arguing what I heard a few days ago. I assure all Hon. Members that I have the point and that having been through this same debate twice in my time in this Chamber, along with many of those who are here today, I understand completely the feelings, sentiment, emotion, and some of the other things that go with it. With that we can close off the argument and I will come back to the Chamber at eleven o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties and I think you might find there is a disposition to not see the clock in order that the House may deal with report stage of Bill C-56 and third reading on consent, which deals with certain Acts relating to financial institutions. In addition, we would deal with second and third reading of Bill C-66, an Act to establish the Veterans Appeal Board. Having dealt with those two items, we would adjourn for the weekend.

• (1500)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm that there have been discussions. There was an undertaking by the House Leaders to assist the Government in passing certain Bills, particularly that of concern to veterans and the tandem legislation to the Bill with which we have just dealt.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, it is our intention not to see the clock for a few minutes in order to allow the completion of this legislation today.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, after the conduct of the Government in moving closure, it does not deserve any consideration with respect to its legislative package.

Mr. Nickerson: Don't take it personally.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): If that is the way it is, good-bye.

Mr. Speaker: It may be that the Chair could ignore the clock for a couple of seconds in case anyone wants to change their mind. I am, of course, prepared to co-operate. Are there any Members rising?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to echo the sentiments of my hon. friend, the Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the House Leader for the Liberal Party, that it is very frustrating, when you are trying to accommodate business of the House, to have members of the Government yelling across the floor at you. That is very difficult.

However, I would like to propose that we take five minutes to deal with the Bill of interest to veterans. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Hees) is here. He has been waiting patiently all day. We had an understanding that this Bill would be dealt with earlier. I think the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis) made an error in the order of the business for today. In order to facilitate the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I suggest that we take two or three minutes to deal with this Bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is there consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

VETERANS APPEAL BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-66, an Act to establish the Veterans Appeal Board and to amend other Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before speaking on Bill C-66 I would very much like to thank my hon. friends, the Member for Hull—Aylmer (Mr. Isabelle) and the Member for Beaches (Mr. Young), for their gracious assistance in seeing this legislation passed through all stages today. I appreciate very much the attitude of all Members of this House and their kindness in allowing this important Bill to come before the House. I also wish to thank the Government and Opposition House Leaders who so kindly and generously agreed to see this legislation brought forward before the summer recess.

Hon. Members will be aware of the substantial progress that has been made in reducing delays in the disability pension process. In the last two and one-half years the time required to process pension applications has been cut by well over half. At the same time, a far greater percentage of decisions are going in favour of the veteran today than was the case previously.

These very satisfactory results have been achieved in the face of an almost 100 per cent increase in case load. It is quite a remarkable feat for any operation to double its work-load while slashing its turnaround time by over half. Bill C-66 will help us to continue to achieve these kinds of results for veterans and their dependants.

We are proposing that the Pension Review Board and the War Veterans Allowance Board, two independent quasi-judicial boards, be merged into a single Veterans Appeal Board. In this way we will be able to make maximum use of our existing resources without diminishing existing appeal rights for veterans in any way whatsoever.

This merger is necessary because the Pension Review Board is under considerable strain as its annual case load has increased by nearly 100 per cent from 1,335 to 2,654 applications in just three years. Hon. Members will appreciate that as veterans grow older their disabilities tend to become more serious. That is why more and more pension claims are coming forward each year.

By way of contrast, the War Veterans Allowance Board carries a lighter work-load as veterans grow older. This is because war veterans allowance is an income-tested program. Once veterans reach age 65 they become eligible for Old Age Security benefits and so are much less dependent on Veterans Affairs for income support. The result is that the number of appeals coming before the War Veterans Allowance Board has dropped by 73 per cent in the last three years.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, at present the War Veterans Allowance Board has more person-year resources than the Pension Review Board. A combined Veterans Appeal Board will permit us to concentrate our resources on the area where they are most needed—pension appeals. Hon. Members should also be assured that no Public Service layoffs will result from the merger. Any public servants not required at the new board will be transferred to other areas of Veterans Affairs.

I am also glad to report that this legislation meets with the approval of the major veterans' organizations. Indeed, the National Council of Veteran Associations recommended the merger some time ago and the Royal Canadian Legion has publicly endorsed the proposal. Both associations were consulted prior to the development of Bill C-66.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we are asking the House to approve a measure which will streamline our pension process to enable us to provide better, more efficient service for now and in the future.

I again wish to thank all Hon. Members for their very kind co-operation in permitting the passage of this legislation through all stages today. Such co-operation is a superb example of the very high esteem in which Canada's veterans are regarded by their elected representatives.

I thank the Members of the House for their co-operation very, very much indeed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my colleagues—at least the Liberals, of course—for having so generously agreed to debate Bill C-66 which, for all practical purposes, establishes the Veterans Appeal Board.

Mr. Speaker, as the Official Opposition critic I am very pleased to make a few comments on this subject. First I want to thank the Minister for giving me the documents required to study this piece of legislation to set up the administrative mechanism which I am sure will contribute to meet the needs of veterans in an effective manner.

I can say that we support this essentially administrative measure, and we are impatiently waiting for the new omnibus bill which we have been promised for next fall and which will update the 27 laws dealing with veterans affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I think this approach reflects the sound management of veterans affairs since there will be a merger—the purpose of this Bill—of the War Veterans Allowance Board and the Pension Review Board. As we all know, veterans do grow old like everybody else, and since War Veterans Allowance Board benefits are simply an income supplement of sorts for those who needed them, for those who at age 65 are more or less transferred to the income supplement section of the Department of National Health and Welfare, naturally the work of this War Veterans Allowance Board loses some of its importance. The WVAB also had more staff than the Pension Review Board which has an ever increasing workload, and at the same time it had much fewer employees than the War Veterans Allowance Board.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is sound management. I think the Minister . . . I don't know whether this is one of the results of the Marin Commission, but I do think that improving management is a step in the right direction. There is also the considerable savings involved in a merger of these two boards, probably as much as $400,000, and I hope that amount will be given to our veterans instead of being paid back to the Treasury Board or put in the revolving fund to be spent on other employees or other purposes. I am sure veterans will continue to get the same service, perhaps more efficiently.

I also noted that as far as staff was concerned, Pension Review Board Canada and War Veterans Allowance Board Canada had a staff of fifty-eight employees. I have been given the assurance there will be no jobs lost and that employees who can no longer be employed within the former boards will be transferred to other jobs in the Department. So I think this is a very wise decision, an administrative decision that is both economical and efficient, and I am sure that the veterans who acted on the Minister's suggestion to submit their claims to the Review Board if they thought there was a worsening of their case or that they could in some way benefit from certain pensions through the Department of Veterans Affairs will agree.

I am sure that this merger, the regrouping of these two entities will generate greater efficiency, as I believe is the purpose, in addition to saving the Department considerable sums of money. And here again, I would ask the Minister whether the money thus saved could be spent on other programs, on veterans who need it and who have given so much of their lives to their country. I hope they will finally get some tangible reward that will make their lives more comfortable, especially if we can finally provide them with some pleasant moments every year.

• (1510)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democrats, particularly the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young), it is an honour to make this presentation in response to Bill C-66 and the comments of the Hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Hees).

I want to indicate why there is such a spirit of co-operation and willingness of all Members of the House to essentially break the Standing Orders to accommodate the Minister and Bill C-66. The Minister makes it a habit, in a true spirit of Parliament, of involving his critics in his decision-making and the processing of legislation. I know that the critic for the Liberal Party and my friend, the Hon. Member for Beaches, have always indicated on every occasion how much they appreciate working in co-operation with the Minister of Veterans Affairs to ensure that the lives of veterans are made as comfortable and positive as possible in our country.

If other Ministers, particularly other chairpersons of standing committees, operated in that same co-operative spirit, the business of this House would flow much more smoothly. It would be much more productive and the level and quality of parliamentary debate and discussion would be elevated. I hold up the Minister of Veterans Affairs as a model for his colleagues to follow.

Bill C-66 brings together the War Veterans Allowance Board and Pension Review Board under a new umbrella organization called the Veterans Appeal Board. We believe that it is an appropriate step at this time. We recognize that this particular initiative has been approved by the Royal Canadian Legion, other organizations representing veterans, and the National Council of Veterans Associations.

With their endorsement, we feel comfortable that now is the time to proceed with this as expeditiously as possible. We also recognize that there are improvements yet to be made to the War Veterans Allowance Act. The Minister has indicated his intention to bring forward amendments to the veterans' legislation in the fall, to further improve Canada's treatment of our veterans.

We look forward to continuing our co-operation with the Minister of Veterans Affairs to ensure that Canada's veterans are fully recognized for the sacrifice they made on our behalf.

We look forward to working co-operatively with the Minister when he brings forward his omnibus Bill which will essentially bring together as many as 27 different Acts that refer to the veterans who served Canada so gallantly in the past. We must never forget the contribution they made.

We appreciate being able to work with the Minister in such a co-operative way on behalf of Canada's veterans.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that I am sure all Members would agree that the Minister has been doing an excellent job, along with the official critics of both other Parties. The Minister has certainly been responsive to all MPs and the letters that have been written on behalf of veterans. It is certainly good to see such great co-operation between a Minister and Members of Parliament from both sides of the House, and the excellent manner in which the critic for the Official Opposition and the critic for the NDP have been able to work with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Hees).

There is one point I want to make on a personal note, in dealing with problems of many constituents. Other Members have mentioned that they have experienced the same problem. It concerns the situation of a veteran who qualifies for a disability allowance and a judgment is made by the appeal board to pass a lump sum payment on to the veteran. If the veteran has received a pension from a private pension scheme all along, sometimes, as a result of the additional amount of money to be paid as a result of the judgment by the Veterans Appeal Board, the private pension firm wishes to recover some of the money the veteran has received over the years.

Perhaps by putting this on the record some way can be found to assist those veterans, some of whom have been involved in court battles with the private pension firms in this country. This could include paying their legal fees or assisting them in some way.

With those few words of appreciation to the Minister and critics of the other two Parties in the House on behalf of back-bench MPs, I will conclude my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

• (1520)

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I have just a brief point of order. The other day the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) made the point as the Speaker read through the various motions which are on the Order Paper, all having been stood by the Members, about that happening each day, and it occurred to me as the Chair went through 44 clauses of a Bill which had consent to clear all stages, that it was perhaps a little redundant to have the person in the chair—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the Hon. Member should have raised the point at the time. It is redundant now.

PRIVILEGE

APPLICATION OF THE PROVISIONS OF S. O. 57 TO THE DEBATE ON THE REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Speaker: On Friday last, just before the House adjourned, the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) renewed notice of his intention to move a motion under Standing Order 57 in relation to Government Business No. 5.

If the closure motion is moved and adopted later this day, the result will be that at one o'clock Tuesday morning all debate on the motion for the reinstatement of capital punishment will end and the House will divide on the motion and any amendments thereto.

On Friday, June 19, the day after the Deputy Prime Minister first gave notice of closure, the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) rose on a question of privilege, arguing that the Deputy Prime Minister was making illegitimate use of the rules of the House. The Hon. Member for York Centre, in his argument, referred to a ruling by the Chair on April 14, 1987, and asked the Chair to apply the same logic used then to the present situation.

When the Chair ruled on April 14, the House was at a standstill. Routine Proceedings were, for several days, totally taken up by dilatory tactics that were a matter of grave concern to me. I refer Hon. Members to page 5120 of Hansard, where I reported my dilemma as follows:

> The House is nevertheless facing an impasse which it has been unable to resolve for itself. There comes a time when the Chair has to face its responsibilities. When circumstances change and the Rules of Procedure provide no solution, the Chair must fall back on its discretion in the interests of the House and all its Members.

Further, on page 5121 of Hansard, I said the following:

> I repeat my conviction that the entire question of the use of dilatory motions during Routine Proceedings needs to be examined and that no procedures should be sanctioned which permit the House to be brought to a total standstill for an indefinite period. Division bells are no substitute for debate.

If Hon. Members have taken from my ruling of April 14 that the Chair would, in the future, exercise discretion on any or all of the rules of the House, they have misunderstood the letter and the spirit of the ruling. The discretion I exercised on that day was in the context of an absolute lack of any guidance in the Standing Orders—I repeat, in the context of an absolute lack of any guidance from the Standing Orders—or in the precedents, or practices, or conventions of this House. Nor was there any direction from the House itself, at that moment.

The Hon. Member for York Centre and the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) were skilled advocates in the arguments they presented on June 19 last. The Chair appreciates that it may be very difficult for Hon. Members on both sides of the capital punishment debate to focus only on the Speaker's role at this time. It is essential, I might add, that the Chair refrain from showing sympathy with one side or the other on such an important national debate. What the Chair must now address is, quite simply, the terms of Standing Order 57, which have been unchanged since 1913.

Notice of closure has been given 23 times since 1913; it has been moved and adopted 19 times. It is not a new Standing Order, even if only infrequently used. This present situation is not without precedent. Closure has been used by all Parties while in Government; it has been used after much, and after very little debate. It remains to this day a procedural avenue available to the Government. By and large, the timing of its use becomes a political issue, but some debate clearly must have taken place. Thus, the timing of closure in debate is clearly not a procedural matter.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) referred to the British practice which is quite different. The application of closure in Westminster cuts off any further debate. The British rule is very severe, and that is why their Standing Orders authorize the Speaker to refuse the motion if he finds it abuses the rules.

[English]

The British practice, which has been referred to, is quite different. When closure is applied in Great Britain no further debate can take place. In our Commons, debate continues after the adoption of the closure motion until 1 a.m. on that sitting day. The British rule is more severe, and thus their Speaker is given by a specific Standing Order the discretion to refuse the motion. The Canadian Commons has not given its presiding officer such discretionary power.

I have reviewed all of the arguments put forward by the Hon. Member for York Centre, the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St.

Barbe (Mr. Tobin), and the Hon. Member for Burnaby. Politically speaking, I can understand their concern; procedurally speaking, as your presiding officer, as were many Speakers before me, I am without authority to intervene when a Standing Order is used according to our rules and practices.

The House has adopted Standing Order 57. The House must accept its consequences, if it is invoked. The Hon. Deputy Prime Minister, having given notice at a previous sitting, has so far complied with the terms of Standing Order 57. If he chooses to move the appropriate motion later today, I shall have no choice but to put the question to the House.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PRESENTATION OF THE EIGHTEENTH REPORT OF THE CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 101, I have the honour to present to the House the Eighteenth Report, in both official languages, of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS—TENTH REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs in relation to the smuggling and tax evasion of those bringing motor fuel into Canada.

The committee makes a number of recommendations, principally directing the Department of National Revenue to reinstate the licences of independent dealers in petroleum products who have successfully passed a history of audit, and introduce a new system whereby new entrants into the field will obtain a licence by filing a letter of credit to ensure that they can and will pay tax due.

The committee calls upon the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre) to investigate the pricing of motor fuels since the recent Budget, to determine what anti-competitive behaviour there has been, if any, by the major refiners in the country.

AGRICULTURE—THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the standing committee on agriculture to which, pursuant to Standing Order 99(2), the committee requests a comprehensive response.

This report is a study on the tobacco-growing industry, Mr. Speaker, and of the communities affected by the decline in that industry. This industry is in decline, and the decline is damaging farm families and the communities, and some of the decline is caused by government policy on smoking and by taxation.

This report makes recommendations that could ease the transition that is occurring and, in doing so, could benefit all depressed communities in Canada.

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, on the subject matter of Private Member's Bill C-234, the Missing Children Search Act, to which the committee requests that the Government respond prior to September 1, 1987.

• (1110)

The committee recommends that the Criminal Code be amended to ensure that searches for missing children are properly and expeditiously carried out and to make it an offence to fail to report a missing child or to fail to assist in the search for a missing child.

AGRICULTURE—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture dealing with farm input costs. Pursuant to Standing Order 99(2) the committee requests that the Government table a comprehensive response within 150 days.

MULTICULTURALISM—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism, in both official languages.

In this report, Mr. Speaker, your committee wishes to point out that many Canadians still face discrimination and that the human and economic resources inherent in the linguistic and cultural diversity of Canada have not been utilized to realize the full potential of Canada's multicultural, multiracial society. There is an overwhelming need to move ahead now with specific measures to integrate multiculturalism into all aspects of Canadian social, political and economic life.

The Standing Committee on Multiculturalism therefore puts forward major recommendations to accomplish this and asks the Government and all Hon. Members to give these recommendations their serious consideration.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) ACT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls) moved that Bill S-5 (from the Senate), an Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, be read the first time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a Bill that will amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons. It is straightforward and will clear up any confusion that may exist with respect to prohibited classes of individuals entering marriage. This matter has received full consideration and has been passed by the other place. I hope that it receives speedy passage in the House.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION DEALING WITH STRIP CLUBS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition to the House signed by some 45 people in the Windsor area. It calls on the federal Government to amend the Criminal Code to make it possible for provincial Governments to more easily deal with the problem of the proliferation of strip clubs, a problem concerning many in the Windsor area.

This petition, while signed by some 45 people, represents petitions signed by some 20,000 people in the Windsor area calling for the kind of action spelled out in the petition. In this regard, there will also be petitions presented by my colleagues from the Windsor area.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition to present which calls on the Government to make changes to the Criminal Code which will delegate to provincial Governments the capacity through their liquor licensing laws to regulate and to control strip clubs in the City of Windsor and, of course, elsewhere in the Province of Ontario.

This subject has been of great concern to the citizens of Windsor for many months. I am very pleased to present this petition from approximately 50 Windsor residents, which petition represents a much greater number of people who have also signed petitions in this city.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues from Windsor in tabling a petition signed by some 50 people from the Windsor area representing some 20,000 people who have signed similar petitions. They are concerned about the proliferation of adult entertainment parlours in that city, particularly with respect to the apparent involvement of criminal elements in this activity. They seek the enactment of legislation which would allow the province to pass laws regulating and governing the manner of dress or degree of nudity of persons employed by or in establishments providing adult entertainment.

OPPOSITION TO NEW SYSTEM OF TAXATION OF NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition in which the petitioners express their opinion that the new system of taxation of northern benefits hurts people, especially in the communities of Thompson and Wabowden, that the taxing of northern benefits is heavy-handed and complicated, taking away benefits intended to compensate employees for loss of amenities.

The undersigned call upon the House of Commons to direct the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to reconsider this system of taxing northern benefits as part of tax reform. This petition is signed by people from Thompson, Wabowden, Lynn Lake, Leaf Rapids, Flin Flon and The Pas, Manitoba.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it my honour and pleasure to present a petition from more than 400 Canadians from places such as Toronto, Whitehorse, Vancouver and other parts of British Columbia, Alberta, Winnipeg, Windsor, Smith's Falls, Perth, London, Ontario, Kelowna, Halifax and Ottawa.

• (1120)

The petitioners are very concerned for the many people who are driven by persecution to seek safety in Canada and for the breakdown of the previous system of refugee determination.

They support the proposal put forward by the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration a year and a half ago, which had all-Party support and was also endorsed by the Canadian Council of Churches, many members of the Bar Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, and others.

They urge that Parliament enact legislation which will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings for refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada, and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

I also have a petition signed by more than 600 Canadians from all over the country—Toronto, Ottawa, Vancouver, other parts of British Columbia, Newfoundland, and Alberta. They point out that the Government's proposed legislation, Bill C-55, fails to meet the demands of the public and the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration.

Therefore they urge Parliament to ensure that Bill C-55 will be withdrawn and to substitute therefor legislation embodying the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of claims of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every applicant in Canada, and the right of appeal on the basis of fact.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW BY THE CCN OF RENTAL INCREASES FOR LA MAISON D'AMITIÉ

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, once again, it is my duty to table some twelve petitions signed by people from my riding who wish the House would be kind enough to help La Maison d'Amitié, a francophone non-profit organization which looks after women and children in distress.

Mr. Speaker, those people are presenting a petition in which they humbly state that according to a report made public by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, one woman out of eight is subjected to psychological, economic, sexual or verbal violence by her spouse; that at a time when the Government should act instead of cracking down, the National Capital Commission intends to raise the rent for La Maison d'Amitié, the only non-profit francophone organization for women and children in distress, by more than 3,000 per cent; that the Prime Minister himself stated recently in the House that the problem of battered women is one of the most serious social and legal challenges facing us today; therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the National Capital Commission to reverse its decision to raise the rent and to continue, as in the past, charging the symbolic sum of one dollar.

[English]

OPPOSITION TO NEW SYSTEM OF TAXATION OF NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table today a petition signed by northerners who are concerned that the new system of tax deductions for northern residents has been unfairly applied, that the taxing of northern benefits is heavy-handed and complicated, and that it taxes away benefits intended to compensate northerners.

OPPOSITION TO CHANGES TO PATENT ACT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have upwards to 100 petitions which I would like to table today, signed by residents from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta, British Columbia, and the Northwest Territories.

The proposed changes to the Patent Act will directly affect all Canadians who are not protected by private or government medical programs.

Whereas the federal Government's proposals will raise the already high cost of provincial health care programs; whereas the monopoly granted to innovative pharmaceutical companies will prevent competition from generic companies, will result in an increase of drug costs and prices, and will severely restrict the ability of average Canadians to buy necessary prescription drugs; and whereas the proposed changes to the Patent Act are another example of the Canadian Government's concession in the free trade negotiations with the United States at the expense of every day Canadians, the petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to reject these proposals with regard to the amendments to the Patent Act which will inevitably increase prescription drug prices for all Canadians.

OPPOSITION TO NEW SYSTEM OF TAXATION OF NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of northern Canadians, pursuant to Standing Order 106, who are of the opinion that the new system of tax deductions for northern Canadian residents have been applied in an unfair way and leave out many communities which ought to be included in terms of being able to take advantage of special northern deductions.

They believe that the northern benefits system is heavy-handed and complicated and taxes away existing benefits which were in fact intended to compensate employees working in northern Canada because of the loss of amenities they experience.

They ask the House of Commons to direct the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to reconsider the system of tax measures when the tax reform study takes place, since he promised to do so in the 1987 Budget.

SUPPORT FOR THE REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Sid Fraleigh (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of citizens of Ontario and Canadians from across the country 1,425 signatures calling upon Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment in Canada.

These signatures, which now total 29,904, represent the strong will of Canadian people on this important issue.

Mr. Patrick Crofton (Esquimalt—Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 1,043 Canadians from across the country, urging Members of the House to support the motion before it calling for the restoration of capital punishment.

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of citizens from across Canada 1,014 signatures calling upon Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment in Canada.

The signatures, which now total 31,961, represent the strong will of Canadian people on this important issue.

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions on behalf of citizens of British Columbia and other Canadians from across the country including 1,000 signatures. They call upon Parliament to pass a motion favouring the return of capital punishment in Canada.

These signatures, which now total 32,961, represent the strong views of the Canadians who signed these petitions on this important issue.

Mr. Paul Gagnon (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present on behalf of citizens of Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Ontario, and Alberta—Canadians from across Canada—1,255 signatures calling upon Parliament to pass the motion favouring the return of capital punishment.

These signatures, which now total 34,216, represent the strong will of the Canadian people on this important issue.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present, pursuant to Standing Order 106, a petition signed by 3,493 people from my riding and elsewhere in Alberta, asking Parliament to vote at one o'clock tomorrow morning in favour of capital punishment.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House of Commons the final number of petitions which have been received by various Members of Parliament, bringing the total, despite temporary disruptions in the postal service, to 39,256 persons from across Canada. They urge Parliament to support the reinstatement of capital punishment at the appropriate time during our vote at one o'clock tomorrow morning.

These signatures were collected by the Canadian National Police Association, the Ontario Provincial Police Associations, the Victims of Crime, Citizens Responding to You, and Citizens United for Safety and Justice.

They urge Parliament to vote in support of a return to capital punishment in Canada for certain acts of planned, deliberate murder, and the killing of police officers and prison guards.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in response to what the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has just said. May I just point out that I have had a question on the Order Paper since February 20. It really seems a long time, and I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary might have an answer tomorrow, if not today.

• (1130)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I believe, to Question No. 85, we have made inquiries and I was promised last week that we would have an answer before the end of the session. I will reiterate that request and see if I can get it.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise):

That the debate on the motion in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Government Business No. 5) respecting capital punishment and any amendments thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those against will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more that five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, although I regret the closure procedure, I think, as you said this morning, it is quite within our rules. I wonder if the Government and other Members of the House would give unanimous consent to sit through lunch hour to allow some of our Members who have not spoken a chance to speak, perhaps, in that additional hour?

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want the record to show very clearly that even with the hour that will be given to us by sitting through lunch hour, we still would not have the opportunity to hear all those who want to be heard on this subject because of the closure motion which was just adopted.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my Party, I want to say as well that because of the fact that 82 Members of Parliament have yet to have an opportunity to speak on this issue, we certainly would like to at least take advantage of the one hour extension.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order raised by the spokesman for the Official Opposition. I would like to point out that opportunity was given to his Party when it turned down the opportunity to sit all weekend and speak.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I am not clear whether consent was given to sit during the lunch hour or not.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair took it that there was consent. There were some points of order following in order for Members to make their positions clear, but I took it as consent.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed from Thursday, June 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, the question of capital punishment has been a very difficult one for me these past few weeks. I am, as you can see, Sir, speaking near the end of the debate. I followed very closely the comments made on both sides of the subject before making up my mind.

As you know, Sir, this is the first of two possible questions which will be put before Parliament. The first is whether this House will support capital punishment in principle. If the resolution is passed, the second question would ask Parliament to consider specific amendments to the Criminal Code. Both are intended to be free votes, that is, those votes on which a Member can follow his own conscience. With that I agree.

During the election campaign of 1984 I indicated to the voters of Niagara Falls that the Progressive Conservative Party was committed to a free vote in the House of Commons on this subject. I thought it was a good idea then and I still do. At the time I indicated to the voters of Niagara Falls that I would vote in favour of capital punishment. It was not an easy decision to make then and it certainly has become more difficult as we approach the time of vote.

I would like to say a few words about the preliminary issues concerning this topic. Something which has been discussed many times in Parliament and in the media is the responsibility of the Member of Parliament on difficult subjects such as this. There are those who say that a Member of Parliament should in most cases reflect the views of his constituents. On the other side, many would argue that a Member of Parliament should always follow his own conscience even if his views differ from those of his constituents.

I do not believe that the role of a Member of Parliament is as clear cut as those two options would seem to indicate. I think every Member of Parliament has a duty to do whatever he can to seek out the opinions of his constituents so that he can be as fully informed on a particular subject as possible.

I have received many letters on both sides of the issue of capital punishment. I have read them all and have tried to give them all due consideration. They have been very helpful. Most public opinion polls tell us that capital punishment is supported by a majority of Canadians. I would guess that while there is still a majority, it is not as overwhelming as it was a year or so ago.

Why do I say that? Because for me and all other individuals who think carefully on this, it is very difficult subject and certainly one which tears people apart. But at the same time, it is a question society must decide. I have an obligation to inform myself as to the thoughts and opinions of my constituents. I must weigh them carefully, but I believe that in the end I must act in a way responsible to myself and in the best interest of the people I represent.

I would like to say a few words about the conduct of this debate. I said earlier that questions such as this tear people apart. That is most unfortunate. I have noted in some of the speeches on this subject an excess of rhetoric on both sides. One of the most unfortunate facets of the debate is the imputation of wrong or bad motives by one side to the other. For instance, I disagree with those retentionists who characterize abolitionists as "bleeding hearts" who would wreck the criminal justice system and let killers out on the street. That has not been helpful. On the other hand, I disagree with those abolitionists who question the sincerity of those who would support the motion. It is wrong to suggest that their decision is based on a whim or that they are just simply rubber-stamping the uninformed views of their constituents. I am sure that most Members like myself have spent many hours thinking about this subject with a view to doing what is best for our country.

For those who support the motion and for those who oppose it, the subject of deterrence is always raised. I have heard and read a plethora of statistics, all attempting to either prove or disprove on the basis of statistics that capital punishment does or does not deter individuals from murdering other individuals. I reject that kind of analysis. I would guess that the statistical base in Canada is too small and our history too short to prove anything one way or the other.

In addition, trying to compare American States which have capital punishment with those which do not, is like comparing apples and oranges. There are just too many factors to make the analysis simple or reliable. To prove complex human behaviour on the basis of such statistics is chancy and something I will not even attempt. At the same time, it has been widely suggested that sanctions, penalties or punishment itself is a deterrent to certain behaviour. Whether the gravity of the punishment is a deterrent is another question. I would guess that the kind of individual who is prepared to murder another individual is not going to be deterred by the threat of capital punishment, but there may be exceptions.

One of my colleagues pointed out that in the Emanuel Jacques murder in Toronto, the case of a 12 year old boy being systematically abused and then murdered by several individuals, one of the killers indicated that if he thought he might himself be executed he would not have carried out the gruesome act. God only knows if that is true. Therefore, I must look at other arguments put forward as to why capital punishment should be returned.

One argument that I think has been made effectively is that capital punishment is necessary to restore public respect for the criminal justice system. I am sympathetic with those who believe that respect for the criminal justice system in Canada is declining. I think, as well, that the consequences of that can be devastating if people come to the conclusion that penalties for breaking the law bear no relation to the crime.

• (1220)

Respect for our court system is what separates us from those countries where law and order has broken down completely. The rise in vigilantism on this continent is an alarming trend. The growing belief that the criminal justice system does not protect individuals is perhaps the most serious question we face in the criminal justice field. When people decide that they will take the law into their own hands, we are heading for chaos. We must do what we can to restore respect for our system of justice and to convince people that it works on their behalf as well as on behalf of the accused.

I believe for a majority of Canadians having the option of capital punishment would help to restore their faith in the criminal justice system. But that alone would not be enough to convince me of the need for capital punishment. I argue that the protection of the public from individuals who consistently demonstrate a disregard for the life of others is the only reason upon which this issue should be decided. I will give you certain examples, Madam Speaker.

It has been said in the House of Commons and elsewhere that there are 14 individuals who once having been convicted of one murder have committed another while still in prison or after their release. For those individuals who commit multiple murders capital punishment should be an option. Certainly, on balance, we owe more to prospective victims than we do to those who refuse to live by society's laws.

I am reminded of the contract killer, the individual who was described in a recent trial in St. Catharines as being ready and willing to kill anyone for the sum of $10,000. I ask the House this. How do we adequately protect ourselves against that kind of individual? It is too easy to say that rehabilitation is the answer when a person has consistently acted in a way that shows he is not prepared to live within society's laws and will continue to endanger innocent victims.

In the cases I have described we would have removed doubt as to the possibility of executing an innocent individual through the multi-layered process by which the courts review each case before sending the matter to the Cabinet and the Prime Minister for possible commutation. There is no doubt in my mind that on the narrow ground which I have described only a guilty person would be the recipient of the ultimate penalty.

Finally, there are those who say that the state has no right to take the life of another individual. I suggest that the state has always had the right to involve us in questions of this type. Surely, when the decision was made for Canada to go to war there was always the question of life and death. On the subject of abortion, Parliament has decided that a foetus or an unborn child can be aborted. That, too, is a question of life and death.

This has been a long and difficult debate for all Members of Parliament. My decision, and I know the decision of others in this Chamber, is bound to disappoint those who take an opposite view. That is one of the realities of public life. In the end, I have to make the decision. I do so on the narrow ground upon which I have indicated. If the motion is carried, I will have to assess the committee's recommendation and again decide whether it meets those criteria upon which I base this decision.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I must say that I rise on this very important day with little enthusiasm, recognizing that as I speak less than 19 per cent of the Members of the House of Commons have had an opportunity to speak on this issue and, at the end of closure today, the overwhelming majority of the House of Commons will not have had the opportunity to put on the record an explanation for the way they will vote on this critical issue of capital punishment.

I am less enthusiastic as well because, if this particular motion passes, the very grisly task of the committee will be to tour the country to determine the appropriate way to kill certain criminals. Once that is completed by the end of the summer we will then spend weeks and perhaps months debating the Bill that will flow out of that committee at a cost of millions and millions of dollars.

Quite frankly, I simply do not consider this to be the nation's priority. We should be spending the time of the House of Commons, our energy, our talents and our expertise—indeed, the finances of the House of Commons—on questions dealing with the unemployed, the resource industry, small business problems, problems facing the farm community, issues concerning young people, how to improve our hospitals and schools and the like. But, no, this is a priority that the Government has identified. I, quite frankly, feel it is a misplaced priority.

One thing that concerns me greatly is that Canada is recognized as a peaceful, law-abiding and non-aggressive nation. When we consider that hundreds of thousands of people attempt to enter Canada every year they do so because of the reputation that Canada has. Canada is seen throughout the world as a leader in the field of progressive rights and freedoms. By reinstating the death penalty Canada would, I believe, be taking a backward step and would be abrogating its international commitments to these standards.

Canada is a party to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Canada has incorporated the same values into its Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Section 12 of the Charter states that everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Canada also participates in the international community through the United Nations. The General Assembly reaffirmed on December 8, 1977, Resolution 3262 which states that the main objective to be pursued in the field of capital punishment is that of progressively restricting the number of offences for which the death penalty may be imposed with a view to the desirability of abolishing this form of punishment.

I do not have to remind you, Madam Speaker, since I know you are aware that Canada is also a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Article 6 of that Covenant states that every human being has the inherent right to life, that this right shall be protected by law, and no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life. Nothing in this Article shall be invoked to delay or prevent the abolition of capital punishment by any state party to the present Covenant".

For many years we have all recognized that people are known by the friends they keep. The fact is that in 1976 Canada abolished the death penalty. In doing so we joined with many very progressive nations around the world, largely western nations, among them Australia, Austria, Denmark, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, the Holy See, Ireland, Iceland, Italy, Israel, Luxembourg, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and many others.

If we were to vote for the reinstatement of capital punishment we would be joining only two other western nations that consider it; one is Turkey and the other being a number of states in the United States—not the entire country but a number of states. We would be joining other, if you like, communist countries, military dictatorships, tinpot dictatorships, countries such as Iran and Iraq, South Africa, the Soviet Union, Chile, Libya, and Cambodia.

Quite frankly, I think the question that Canadians must ask is this. Which set of countries do we wish to be associated with, those progressive western nations or those, as I say, which are a variety of communist and military dictatorships, with the exception of Turkey and some of the states of the U.S.? I feel that the answer to that is obvious.

I want to say that the issue of capital punishment first came into my life as a discussion way back in 1953 when the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons was established to study the whole matter of capital punishment. I was only 11 years old at the time, but I remember discussing with my father this issue and seeking his views and guidance and direction on this very critical and important moral issue facing the country at that time, as it faces us today.

At the time it was just after Easter. He drew this to my attention. He explained that we had just again recognized through our church service the fact that Jesus had been hung on the cross, the ultimate form of capital punishment, in terms of promoting suffering and pain. For days and days people hung on crosses until they expired. Jesus was also tortured while he was hanging on the cross. My father said to me at that time, "Son, what was the response of Jesus to those who were doing this to him? Father, forgive them for they know not what they do". To this day that has stuck with me. Over the years it has assisted me in maintaining my position on capital punishment, which has always been as an abolitionist.

• (1230)

It is not as though my constituents are surprised, because in 1980, and again in 1984, during the federal election campaigns, my position on capital punishment was made clear. It has been made clear at every public meeting at which it has been raised. Every letter, every telegram, every postcard, every phone call I have received on the subject have had an immediate response, with my position on capital punishment stated very clearly.

Given all of that, I do not believe that the electorate in my constituency are surprised that once again, after examining the pros and cons on the issue, the arguments made on the issue, I maintain my position as an abolitionist on this very critical issue.

The remark made by Edmund Burke more than two centuries ago holds true today; "Your representative owes you, not his industry only but his judgment, and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion".

I realize that many Members of Parliament have decided to hold polls on this issue, either straw polls or commissioned polls conducted by various polling companies. In that way they gain an appreciation of the various views of their constituents, and in many cases the majority has come down on the side of the reinstatement of capital punishment.

The trouble with that line of reasoning is that it leads to government by opinion poll. Instead of electing Nelson Riis as the Member of Parliament for Kamloops—Shuswap, the voters, if they use this approach to important decision-making, might just as well use a polling firm to conduct polls on critical issues, as opposed to having a Member of Parliament apply his or her judgment to the issue.

The assumption behind this type of polling contradicts the whole theory of representative democracy. The electorate sends people to the Parliament of Canada to exercise judgment on their behalf. As Edmund Burke put it two centuries ago, Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors but a deliberative assembly of one nation whose job it is to discuss and arrive at what is good for the whole country.

One chooses a Member of Parliament, Madam Speaker, as the first area of responsibility for that individual. The Member of Parliament who uses methods such as polling, in my opinion, belittles himself or herself in substituting the mechanical operation of a poll for individual conscience and judgment.

I know that on some occasions Members of Parliament have had to cast their ballots on the side of an issue that went contrary to the public opinion of the day. I refer to my colleagues of the New Democratic Party at the time of the imposition of the War Measures Act, and earlier than that, members of the CCF Party in respect of the relocation of the Japanese during World War II.

At the time of the imposition of the War Measures Act, the popular view in the country was that the Prime Minister was right to introduce the War Measures Act; yet, members of the New Democratic Party stood up and voted against it, against popular opinion, feeling at the time that it was wrong.

In retrospect, in hindsight, we see now that that was the appropriate position to take on the part of the New Democratic Party members; that the imposition of the War Measures Act was an inappropriate measure to take in the circumstances.

To go back to one of the more dastardly historic initiatives taken by Parliament, the decision to relocate, by force, the people of Japanese heritage from the West Coast into the interior parts of Canada, again my colleagues in the CCF voted against that measure, as popular as it was at the time. Hindsight being 20/20, we realize again that the decision to oppose was a correct one.

It is in that same mode that I shall be casting my ballot later today against the reinstatement of capital punishment.

When it comes to this issue, I think we are all agreed that there are significant changes that must be made to our judicial system, our corrections system, and our parole system. I believe that Canadians see the system not working as they perceive it should. Consequently, Canadians are looking for some way to improve the system, to bring justice back into our judicial system. People are of the opinion that, by having capital punishment on the books, this will lead to a more equitable and judicial system.

Unfortunately, such is not the case. Ample evidence exists now to prove that the reimposition of capital punishment would not fulfil some of the more obvious requirements that people ask of us. For example, when it comes to the whole matter of capital punishment, a lot of people believe that it acts as a deterrent; that the fact of having capital punishment on the books will lead to fewer murders. The facts simply disprove that.

In 1975, prior to the total abolition of capital punishment, there were 701 homicides in Canada, for a rate of 3.09 per 100,000 people. In 1980, long after the abolition of capital punishment, the number of homicides totalled 593, for a rate of 2.47 per 100,000. In 1985, there were 686 homicides, for a rate of 2.78 per 100,000; and in 1986, the most recent year for which we have statistics, there were 561 homicides, the lowest since 1973.

So, looking at the number of murders in this country, one finds that in fact the rate has decreased since capital punishment was removed as a reality in Canada. Again, seeing capital punishment as a deterrent, obviously, is inappropriate.

If all punishment has a deterrent effect, then the value of capital punishment must lie only in its marginal deterrence. The question is one of the extent to which it deters more than would a prison sentence.

Deterrence is a concept based on the assumption that crime follows the calculation of an individual's advantage. Legislators, relying on deterrence as a strategy to control crime, may increase the severity of penalties in the belief that this will increase the individual's fear of punishment, thus decreasing the incidence of crime. The question is whether sufficient knowledge is available to justify such an approach.

The validity of the literature supporting the deterrence effect of punishment has been questioned on the basis that deterrence has been used in too broad a sense to be very meaningful at all. If one looks at the facts, it is indicated very clearly that the deterrence aspect is an inappropriate justification for capital punishment.

The other issue, of course, is the risk to the innocent. Perhaps the most forceful argument against capital punishment is the danger that an innocent person may be put to death. There is no system that can ensure the infallibility of judgment. In the past, there have been cases of mistaken execution. Even with all of the safeguards in the modern context, that risk still exists.

In 1982, Donald Marshall, wrongly convicted of murder, was released from the penitentiary in New Brunswick after serving 11 years.

Aside from the possibility of false evidence in a murder trial, the crime, by its very nature, arouses emotions that carry with them the risk of incurring failures of perception in those making the decision. It has been reported, Madam Speaker, that 343 persons were wrongly convicted of murder in the United States. Again, the matter of risk is involved.

As many speakers earlier have indicated, where capital punishment is available, a jury can be very reluctant to bring in a guilty verdict, knowing that that will be the ultimate result. The fact is, where capital punishment exists, a jury will often free the accused, rather than bring in a guilty verdict which could attract the death penalty.

So, if we are interested in protecting society from dangerous criminals, from murderers, again, the evidence would indicate that capital punishment is an inappropriate approach to take.

Another reason for voting against the reinstatement of the death penalty is the inequality of justice as it is applied today. I think it is fair to say that the death penalty, in practice, is not administered with equality. Those who are executed are, for the most part, from the disadvantaged, the uneducated, or minority groups.

In the United States, where the most statistics on this issue exist, it has been found that the poor, the black, the ignorant are the most likely to be executed. Those with money or influence usually avoid the death penalty.

Incidentally, the existence of the death penalty also encourages inequality in the application of justice in the political context. There is a danger of its use under the guise of treason in the event of a dictatorship ever coming to power.

When we look at our own situation, Madam Speaker, today, while we speak, there are 12,122 people serving time in federal prisons in Canada. When one looks at the population within those prisons, one finds that 9.1 per cent are native people, who constitute only 2 per cent of the Canadian population. In other words, one in ten prison inmates is native, whereas in society they represent one in fifty.

That indicates, again, a very racial bias in our judicial system, given the significantly higher proportion of native people in our prisons than exists in our society generally.

As a New Democrat, I feel strongly that those people who will be eventually executed, if the death penalty is reinstated, are those who are poor, those who have come from a disadvantaged background and who do not have the resources to hire the best lawyers in the country. It is those who are at the mercy of the injustices of our judicial system.

I have deep concerns regarding the reinstatement of capital punishment. I want to talk about the immorality of reinstating the death penalty. The taking of human life is morally wrong for the state as well as wrong for the individual. The state should set an example by recognizing the sanctity of human life in all cases.

The international conference on the abolition of the death penalty, which concluded with the Declaration of Stockholm reaffirming that it was the duty of the state to protect the life of all persons within its jurisdiction, ought to be the rule of the day. It called upon all nations to abolish capital punishment.

The death penalty is fundamentally dehumanizing, proclaiming the worthlessness of the offender's life. It eliminates one of the three main purposes of punishment—rehabilitation. Those who choose alternatives to capital punishment support respect for all human life and make possible efforts by society to reform and rehabilitate the offenders. Philosophers such as Plato, Hobbes, and Rousseau have supported the view that virtue can be taught and punishment should be directed toward the correction of the offender. The aim should be to reform and deter criminals and to maintain public peace.

Let us consider the coalition which has come together in opposition to the initiative to reinstate capital punishment. It includes all main line churches in Canada. The Pope has indicated his position against capital punishment. The three political Leaders in Canada have indicated their abolitionist position, as have, which is interesting, the three leaders of the youth wings of the three national political Parties. On behalf of young Progressive Conservatives, Liberals, and New Democrats, they have voted and indicated their position against the reinstatement of capital punishment, to say nothing of the respect we have for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who has indicated that he is against the reinstatement of capital punishment, as well as the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark).

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Criminal Lawyers Association, the Salvation Army, Elizabeth Fry, and the John Howard Society have indicated that they are against the reinstatement of capital punishment. I could refer to a very long list of organizations, associations, and groups which we respect in terms of their thoughtful and progressive views, each one of which is against the reinstatement of capital punishment in Canada.

I could also refer to such groups as the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Anglican Church, the United Church, the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, the Canadian Unitarian Council, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Mennonite Central Committee, the Reformed Church of America, and the Religious Society of Friends, which officially support the continued abolition of the death penalty.

One might ask why. Some capital punishment proponents argue that the death penalty is necessary to convey society's abhorrence of murder and thereby affirm life's sacredness. The religious communities recognize the tragedy of murder and reach out in sympathy to those who have been deeply hurt by criminal activity. They do not believe, however, that the death penalty effectively addresses the needs of the victims of violence or those of Canadian society as a whole.

I would like to refer to a letter which I received from the parent of a daughter who was abducted and murdered just last July. In her final paragraph, she wrote:

> I do not want to be part of a society that brings up future generations with the belief that killing can be legitimized under certain circumstances. Let the message be clear and unconditional: human life is sacred; killing is always wrong.

I have another letter which I received from a person who in fact was a hangman years ago in Canada. His final paragraph reads:

> I abhor murder and feel deeply for its victims. I do not, however, want the society in which I live to be so full of hate and revenge, so unimaginative in its response to violence, that it should behave collectively no better than does the murderer among us whom we condemn. Capital punishment makes premeditated murderers of us all.

In conclusion, I simply say that I will be voting against this particular motion. For the sake of Canada and for the sake of future generations of Canadians, I hope we maintain our present progressive position on the issue.

Mr. Charles Hamelin (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, today we address the subject of capital punishment, and to me, this debate is also about freedom and responsibility. Capital punishment, as I see it, is a matter of self-defence for the people of this country.

Madam Speaker, this evening I intend to vote in favour of reinstating capital punishment in this country. I see it as my duty to take this position, and in the next few minutes I intend to argue my case as strongly and as convincingly as I can.

First I want to deal with the need for having this debate and with the commitment made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and this political party. I will then describe the kind of society we want for all Canadians, and finally, I will address capital punishment itself and the foundation on which it rests.

Madam Speaker, the past weeks' debate in the House of Commons on the issue of maintaining the abolition of capital punishment or reinstating the death penalty would seem to be a sign of political maturity. Actually, unlike what is being said by some so-called progressive intellectuals, the controversial issue of reinstating capital punishment is now more than ever before a question of the utmost urgency. Does wanting to review a decision that was made in 1976 with a slim majority of only five or six votes mean turning the clock back? Does it really mean the return, in force, of a group of people who are out of touch with Canadian reality? Does it mean the return of ghosts from the past, of a few dinosaurs who want to talk about the need for reinstating capital punishment in Canada? I don't think so. I believe that it is an excellent idea to review decisions made by Parliament with such a meagre consensus. I do, because refusing to re-examine our dicisions and our behaviour from time to time is refusal to change. Today, we often refuse to be eveluated because we do not want to change.

I would like to emphasize the Prime Minister's commitment to holding a free wote on this question. I see this as a commitment by this party and this Government. I would also like to stress the excellence of the Prime Minister's speech in which he gave us his views as an abolitionist. He did so with conviction, although I do not share his position.

Madam Speaker, the issue of capital punishement challenges the innermost values of each and everyone of us. Capital punishment also confronts us with another, very basic question, which is the kind of society we want in this wonderful country of ours. I will get back to that later, Madam Speaker.

When I was younger in years though hardly in stature, in my case so in my formative years, I had parents, a father and a mother, whose behaviour was described with a great deal of humour and wit by one of our Quebec humorists, the actor Yvon Deschamps. Whenever I had been up to no good, my mother's reaction was what you would call very decisive, while my father was more apt to lecture me when I misbehaved.

In simple terms, as Yvon Deschamps would say, my mother was decisive, in other words, she gave me a good hiding, while my father, who was more the lecturing kind, would sit me down and talk to me for hours on end. He would talk to me about maturity and responsibility. My father developed with strength and relevancy such basic notions as human freedom and responsibility. He was always emphasizing the need to measure the final consequences of one's actions. My father told me about fundamental justice and reminded me that each one of us must pay the price or reap the rewards for our actions. For him, freedom and responsibility were impossible to separate. For him, these principles were the living proof of maturity. For him, freedom and responsibility were the very basis of our family unit and the cornerstone of this country. Madam Speaker, it is in fact because of these two inseparable notions of freedom and responsibility that I consider reinstatement of the death penalty essential in this country.

Naturally, Madam Speaker, I have looked carefully at the statistical arguments of the abolitionists. Some of these arguments have a certain value, and it is true that the deterrent effect of capital punishment is not a valid argument, that the threat of having their own life taken away does not prevent criminals from committing crimes. The death penalty scares only people like you and me, Madam Speaker, it scares only law-abiding citizens, not the criminals. The criminals think about it only later, not before, unlike our policemen, who have to ask questions to the criminals before, even though the answer they might receive could be a bullet in the head.

It is also true that the argument of using the death penalty as an example cannot be supported and that the bloody spectacle of hanging, electrocution or other means of execution is more an act of savagery and voyeurism than anything else. As for me, I believe that it would be too much of an honour for the criminals to give them the front page of our newspapers or a chance to appear on television. They do not deserve that much. They do not even deserve our scorn. If the motion is adopted this evening, I would be satisfied if we used a small injection or a glass of water and a pill to rid us of those who no longer deserve the right to live.

Madam Speaker, I have also listened to the argument to the effect that we must respect human life. Is is not strange, Madam Speaker, and I would like to have some statistics about this, that the most ardent abolitionists are often those who are most in favour of abortion on demand! Such incongruous contrasts can only occur in politics. On the one hand, criminals should be protected because we must respect human life, but there is no problem in promoting the killing of new life. As for me, Madame Speaker, in all conscience, I cannot accept that a murderer should go unpunished, I cannot understand that someone who would stab an 80-year-old man 50 times to rob him of $50, or someone who raped a young girl in a moment of mental aberration should go unpunished. "Sorry, Your Honour, it was a moment of mental aberration." Then, realizing what he had done in a moment of aberration, as he realized that his victim might denounce him, he killed her. I find it incredible that we should accept such situations, even though the figures tell us that they do in fact exist. Are we going to base our justice system on statistics? Is this a society founded only on statistics?

People have always tried to establish a direct relationship between the crime committed and the penalty which should be imposed. And we would now refuse to apply the same principles to the capital crime, which this time would not deserve capital punishment! We have established in our courts of justice a code that states that for robbery X or Y, for a criminal act of such or such a type there shall be such or such a penalty. But when it comes to the capital crime, oh no! we won't apply capital punishment.

If we take the view that criminals and crime are a permanent illness in our society that absolve the authors of any responsibility, if we become supporters of Jean-Jacques Rousseau who taught that any man is good and society corrupts him, what the heck are we doing with our courts of justice? At the limit, let us empty prisons and accelerate what is now going on. At the limit, let us be consistant. Just the same, they allow self defence apparently. Even abolitionists say: In self-defence, it is absolutely normal that one defends oneself and kills one's aggressor, if it comes to that. But society as such has no right to self-defence against those who committed murders against its members? It is funny how we get ourselves an army, with instruments of death. We get ourselves an army with instruments of death to protect our sovereignty, to protect the collective vitality of Canadians on our soil. We get ourselves instruments of death and we say that in case of war it is normal to shoot at the enemy, to kill the enemy. And as Canada itself assumes the right to kill its external enemies—to kill even the enemies of its allies—and has done so in the past, when it comes to its domestic allies, its own community, it deprives itself of that right. That is utterly inconsistent in my view. You must be consistently wrong, my math teacher used to say. I had the wrong answer but was consistent in my error, but on this issue we are not consistent, and this seems illogical to me.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, it is my view that capital punishment is self-defence, defending honest citizens in this country. And there can be no claim to consistency if in the final analysis there is no possibility, in exceptional, unjustifiable circumstances, when people no longer deserve the right to live, when they are unamendable as they themselves proved it, I believe that we must at least give ourselves that possibility. I for one completely trust judges and jurys to decide in the best circumstances. This country gave itself a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Unfortunately, and this may be a reflection on the times, not many countries gave themselves a Charter of Rights, Freedoms and Responsibilities. Apparently there is more emphasis on the rights of criminals than on the rights of victims. We couldn't care less about victims finally. It is unbelievable that mental suffering is not assessed in courts of justice. That is not recognized. It is unbelievable. Recently, someone defended himself with a firearm against a criminal, and he had to spend eight months in court to defend himself . . .

Mr. Kindy: With a lot of money!

Mr. Hamelin: With a lot of money. That is unbelievable. It is topsy-turvidom!

Do I want a society based on statistics? Because robbery exists, robbery is normal? At the limit, let us encourage robbery. Many of those sociological considerations are mad. I often have the feeling that our society is bent on false progress. Is removing capital punishment really moving forward? Because in Canada any clot will come here to get impunity. Why not! Welcome! We do not kill, we are a civilized country. We will accomodate your fits of confusion. They also come up with the argument of miscarriages of justice. I would like to know how many times our policemen have failed to get criminals convicted through some faulty procedure in court or otherwise. How many times have crimes escaped punishment due to some faulty procedure, or the absence of a last minute witness?

And when the Parole Board makes a mistake, when it releases someone who commits another criminal act, does it not also bear a very heavy responsibility?

Mr. Kindy: It is negligence!

Mr. Hamelin: Is it not an amazing lack of courage?

Madam Speaker, I too want this society to be tolerant, to be respectful of our differences, but that tolerance must stop somewhere in the end, otherwise the whole system is going to collapse. In fact, it is already collapsing! There is a vital need to reform our whole penitentiary system, to review our justice system, to review the whole sentencing system. We should bring a lot of energy into that whole process, otherwise I think everything will collapse.

I am therefore going to vote with my heart tonight, Madam Speaker, in favour of setting up that Committee which will examine the best methods to carry out this ultimate penalty in the case of those who do not deserve the right to live and those who have used their freedom to deprive others of their own freedom forever. Of course, Madam Speaker, I could elaborate at lenght on the amazing problem of victims who no longer have the right to speak, who no longer have any right at all. And I think this country should at least keep this ultimate lever and not pretend that we are civilized people because we have lost that sense of responsibility and accountability. Such is my deep conviction, and it is widely shared by a vast majority of my fellow citizens. As a free man who loves this country, I want the citizens of this country, men and women, to respect as a whole the rules of the game, and my freedom should not entitle me to take other people's lives. However, ultimately in this society, it is my legitimate defense, my ultimate defense, and I have been denied that defense for 20 years.

I feel that something is wrong, that things are deteriorating, that this situation is inconsistent and unacceptable, and that is why I deeply feel, Madam Speaker, that we should at least avail ourselves of that tool of justice which is not an easy one to apply, which is a difficult one, but which bolsters our democratic system of responsibility and freedom.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, before I start my speech on capital punishment, I want to reply in part to the statements made by the Conservative government House Leader. He has stated that closure has been necessary because the Official Liberal Opposition and the New Democrats would not agree to the shortening of speeches and hence to a time frame. Everyone knows that 75 per cent of the Members of the House sit on government benches and only 25 per cent sit on opposition benches. This makes a farce of his excuse for bringing in closure on this debate.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): That's irrelevant.

Mr. Hopkins: The truth of the matter is that the Government wants to get this motion off the Order Paper—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Where was Herb Gray?

Mr. Hopkins: The fact that government Members are now shouting at me for bringing out the truth of the matter indicates that it is really hitting home. People will not be surprised by this motion for closure backed up by that weak excuse because the public no longer has any faith in this Government.

It is indeed with mixed feelings that I rise to participate in this debate on the resolution to reinstate capital punishment. This will be the fifth time that I will have voted—

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member wanted to lay the truth on the Chamber but he forgot the part about the amendments members of the Opposition were moving so that they could speak in an infinite fashion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question raised by the Hon. Member is not a point of order but more a point of debate.

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, I hope that that non-intervention will not be deducted from my time.

As I was saying, this will be the fifth time that I will have voted on this issue since first coming to the House of Commons as the Member for the original riding of Renfrew North which has since enlarged threefold and become the riding of Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke. I have voted for retention on all four previous occasions dating back to 1966.

Such votes as these are called free votes but, in my opinion, there is nothing free about them at all. The entire onus for such decisions rests on the shoulders and the personal judgments of individual Members of Parliament. Each Member of the House cannot look to Party policy as a guide in voting, nor indeed as a means of justifying the decision he or she makes. One must stand on his or her own judgment after considering and stating the merits of one's case.

There are many people who are telling us to vote for abolition. There are many people who are telling us to vote for the reinstatement of the death penalty for first-degree murder. It is my firm conviction that most of the people who are demanding the return of the death penalty are doing so because they are frustrated with the perceived or real view that the administration of justice as it pertains to first-degree murder is not being carried out to their satisfaction.

During the last debate on this issue, after which I voted for retention, we were told that a life sentence would mean 25 years without parole. That has not been the case. Many people across the country feel that prison life is too soft for the convicted and that they are out on the streets and in the countryside too soon. They are telling us that if the Government is not willing to tighten up the system and make the law mean what it says, then they want the death penalty reinstated because they see it as the only other alternative.

I have told abolitionists time and time again that if they win this vote tonight by defeating the resolution before us, they will rejoice, but it will be an incomplete victory. It will be an incomplete victory because the Government, through this inadequate resolution which is before us, has totally failed to attack and to correct the real problem facing the administration of criminal justice in Canada, which is the need for tightening up the procedures dealing with the incarceration and administration of procedures relating to first-degree murderers. If this action is not taken it will only be a matter of time before this very same issue will once again be back before Parliament. Therefore, the onus is on every Member of this House to ensure that we take action, regardless of how the vote turns out tonight, so that the administration of justice pertaining to first degree murder is carried out and means what it says.

All it will take is another serious case of murder to start off the demand once again for the reinstatement of the death penalty. All it will take is another serious parole issue to condemn the present system further and convince people that the system is not working or protecting Canadian citizens.

If those who support the reinstatement of the death penalty win the vote tonight a 15-person committee will be set up to decide which types of first degree murder will warrant the death penalty and what the method of death will be. This may satisfy the strong capital punishment supporters, but it will not solve the problem because the system is not being repaired by this resolution. I am certain that if the death penalty is reinstated tonight no Government will allow a death penalty to be carried out. That is the crux of this whole debate.

Let us consider that point very seriously because it is the basis of my thesis. There are three political Party Leaders in this Parliament, all of whom are very strongly confirmed abolitionists. I cannot see any one of them leading a Government which would allow a death sentence to be carried out. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) and his Cabinet have the constitutional right to commute a death sentence to life imprisonment.

As I said, I have voted for retention four times since coming into this House. The first vote retained the death penalty and the next two retained the death penalty for the murder of police officers and prison guards. However, I emphasize very strongly that no one has been put to death for murder in this country since 1962. That backs up the statements I have just made.

I have voted retention on this issue every time it has come up in the last 21 years. I remember the vote to abolish capital punishment which took place in Parliament shortly after I arrived here. That Bill was defeated on a free vote. The Solicitor General of the day was the Hon. Larry Pennell. I remember how terribly disappointed he was at that time. He then introduced a Bill for the reinstatement of the death penalty in cases of murder of police officers and prison guards. I supported that compromise measure and it was passed. I point out again, however, that no one was ever put to death under this legislation. Death sentences were commuted.

I am convinced that those who believe they will have won a victory if capital punishment is reinstated tonight will learn that they have not won a victory at all because the present Government and any future Government will commute death sentences. I will be surprised if anything different happens.

What is this debate all about then, Madam Speaker? Are we to vote for something if we believe it will never happen? I think I would be somewhat insincere if I did that. Or are we to vote against it and ensure that a life sentence means what it says, that the work ethic be upgraded in our prisons in order that first degree murderers, among others, must do useful and productive work to help pay for their expenses? If we consider it cruel for a prisoner to do an honest hard day's work in prison to pay for his or her keep, then we are being cruel to every Canadian citizen we expect to get up every morning and go to work.

I have attempted to formulate an amendment to this Bill which would provide for a 15-member special parliamentary committee to be appointed. Such a committee would proceed with an in-depth review of the parole system, the work ethic in our prisons, the so-called rights and privileges of first degree murderers in prison, and all other procedures related thereto. Such a committee would be charged with the responsibility of making a report recommending tougher provisions for the improvement of this particular area of the administration of criminal justice in Canada.

This must be done if we are to build respect into the criminal justice system. We need fewer bleeding hearts and more realists. I believe most retentionists and indeed most abolitionists would agree with this move. Unfortunately, the Government has not seen fit to initiate such an all-encompassing and effective review of the system, although I believe we have a parliamentary committee which is beginning to aim at that process. The Prime Minister should have made that point in his speech last week.

I want to appeal to the Government to either make a commitment or amend the present resolution accordingly before it goes to a vote. The Government still has time to make this a useful exercise, to prove to the people of Canada that the Government is prepared to repair the system.

As I have said, this is a very moving and serious speech for me in that it explains my reasons for not voting for this resolution to reinstate the death penalty in Canada because this entire debate does not attack the problem. If the death penalty is reinstated and not acted upon, this whole debate will only be looked upon as a charade. Nothing will happen. The Prime Minister will say that he brought the issue before the House and it will look as though he kept one promise. However, the fact is that it is not a serious one because, as we have seen, it is a wide open vote and the Government itself has not taken a stand on the system of justice.

The fact that this resolution puts the onus and responsibility on Parliament and the 15-member parliamentary committee which will be formed, instead of on the Government, shows how vacillating this Government really is. At the same time the Prime Minister is trying to slough off the pro-reinstatement Members on his own benches. He is, in fact, taking them for another political ride.

Some of the most hardened criminals have admitted that they would consider 25 years in prison to be tougher punishment than the death penalty. Perhaps then, for some, the death penalty is too kind. We know that child murderers and murderers of women have to be segregated in prisons because some of the other prisoners have no respect for them and their lives are in danger. These prisoners should never be let off lightly and do not deserve privileges of any kind.

A Conservative back-bench Member of Parliament asked the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kelleher) a question the other day about the parole system. The Solicitor General said that he was looking into it and attempting to implement measures. We want to know precisely what the Solicitor General has done and what commitment he will make in Parliament by way of improving the procedures of handling first degree murderers.

It is important to note how attitudes and outlooks change over the years. At the time of Confederation, the death penalty was imposed in cases of murder, treason and rape. Several Bills to abolish capital punishment were introduced up to 1950, but none were successful.

In 1953, following the introduction and withdrawal of a similar Bill for abolition, a Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons was established to study three topics, which should be noted by the House. They were capital punishment, corporal punishment, and lotteries. Thirty-four years ago, lotteries in Canada were put in the same category as capital punishment and corporal punishment.

Imagine that today, lotteries are big business in Canada, corporal punishment has disappeared, and we are still debating capital punishment.

In 1953, the joint committee of both Houses of Parliament in Canada considered the feasibility of abolishing capital punishment. Its final report in 1956 recommended the retention of the death penalty for murder, except in the case of children under 18. It further recommended that capital punishment be reviewed periodically by Parliament, and the method of execution be changed. Various Bills continued to be discussed in Parliament right up until the present time.

According to the polls, Canadian public opinion also changed over the years from a clear majority in support of the death penalty in 1943 and 1953, to a bare majority of 51 per cent in favour in 1960. By 1975, approximately seven out of every ten Canadians favoured the death penalty. That has not changed a great deal over the years.

I am convinced that if administration procedures surrounding first degree murderers are tightened, Canadians would support that because they could visibly see sound improvements being made.

Much has been stated in this debate about those great, brave words of Edmund Burke uttered to his electors in Bristol when he said:

> Your representative owes you not his industry only but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

While these sound like great, brave words, one must also check the facts. Edmund Burke did not run for re-election after he said those words, but chose to stand down.

I find it rather cynical that Edmund Burke is used as an example in this debate because I believe that only those Members of Parliament who are willing to stand up and be counted in this debate and put their sincere views on the record, then go back to face the electorate, are the ones who have the back bone to make such decisions on the criminal justice system in Canada.

I am absolutely firm in my intention to attack the system as it now exists. I want improvements to the system. I want it tightened up in order to bring back some respect for the criminal justice system in Canada. I want some realistic people administering that new system.

I say to all Members of the House that if we do not take the bull by the horns and use this common sense approach, we will be back in the House in the near future debating the same topic all over again. It will be a never ending debate that will arise every time there is a murdered policeman or rape and murder.

In the meantime, a life sentence must mean a life sentence and must include no privileges for those people during those 25 years; they must do hard work during that time. The system must be tightened up to show that Parliament has the will and desire to put respect back into the criminal justice system in this country.

Mrs. Claudy Mailly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, it is with a very heavy heart today that I stand to speak in this debate. The thought that this dreadful motion would pass and that this barbaric practice would be reinstated was so appalling to me that today, for the first time, I voted against my Government in following a procedure in the House. The reason I did so was that I did not want to do even the smallest thing to help this motion pass.

If the motion does pass, I will mourn for my sweet country. I will mourn for my young son because he will have been robbed of one of the very basic reasons why he can be proud to be a Canadian. This country has recognized that killing even by the state is unacceptable.

I ran for office because of our constitutional situation. I feared that I would hand over to my son a country divided by civil war.

He was three years old in 1970, during the October crisis in Quebec. I feared so much that this division on our constitutional question would tear my country apart and leave my child growing up in a torn country that I became involved in politics.

It was a very difficult decision. I did not like what I had seen happening in public life and did not want to be part of it. But I was so concerned that this very important question of our unity would be used for political gains, by a party that wanted to maintain itself in power by using division to do so, that I ran for office. It was a difficult election and I did not win the first time I ran. However, I won in 1984.

It was such a joy for me when Quebec finally accepted to come back into the Canadian family. However, what will all this be worth if I am faced with having to hand over to my son a country that will have been diminished again?

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, in a comment I made to one of my colleagues who advocates the death penalty I drew a parallel between the abolition of slavery and the reinstatement of capital punishment. My colleague responded gently but with deep conviction that I was mixing two elements which did not have anything in common.

And yet, Madam Speaker, both have a lot in common. In April 1966, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker stated in this House:

> Canadians conceal their pride in their country. We do not boast about it. How many of us pridefully point out that it was here in Canada that slavery was abolished for the first time in all the western world in 1803? It is an amazing record. It was 40 years before it was abolished in the United Kingdom and many more years before it was abolished in the United States. The argument that slavery was divinely appointed was still used in the days of Webster, Choate, and the other giants of the 1830's and 1840's.

The Right Hon. John Diefenbaker therefore considered that our having been pioneers with respect to the abolition of slavery was one of the glorious pages of our history.

In support of the parallel I make with the death penalty I should like to put on the record the opinion of Secretary Jean-Claude Bernheim responsible for prison matters at the International Federation for the Rights of Man and coordinator of the board of inmates' rights. He says, and I quote:

> In future, how will Canada be able to pride itself on being the defender of rights and freedoms before international authorities, particularly the United Nations Human Rights Commission, if it demonstrates so clearly that it could not care less about its commitments and its signature? Its credibility might easily be questioned, and its action against apartheid, among other things, will lose all its value.

Then there is an article entitled "Maintain the abolition of capital punishment. Canada must keep its credibility with respect to rights and freedoms."

He went on to say:

> South Africa is already making the most of our racism concerning native people. What will Canada do after executing one of them—indeed, members of minority groups and the poor are most likely to be executed—and in turn South Africa hangs a black? Will it be in a position to voice its indignation?
> Not only will the restoration of capital punishmenmt make us lose credibility with respect to rights and freedoms, but it may also signal the reinstatement of the death penalty in other countries. As a society, can we assume such a responsibility?

As the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker told us in 1966, there is a very obvious link between the abolition of slavery, a black mark against our civilization, and the death penalty.

I would also like to quote journalist Gwynne Dyer who wrote this in the Whig Standard of April 18, 1987:

• (1330)

[English]

> Ten years ago, virtually the only countries that were still killing criminals were South Africa, most of the Communist countries and a few other nations in the Third World. But now the United States is executing people again too, and Canada will shortly decide whether it will follow suit. Yet the death penalty probably makes not the slightest difference to the murder rate.

[Translation]

Indeed, our colleague from Charlevoix said so a moment ago. He favours restoring the death penalty, but he emphasized that capital punishment does not deter criminals from killing other human beings.

Mr. Dyer added:

[English]

Northern Ireland had a population of about 1.5 million people, and so has the City of Detroit. In Northern Ireland, in addition to the normal quota of murders committed by frightened thieves and angry spouses, there is a terrorist war in which Catholic and Protestant gunmen murder each other, members of the police and army, and innocent civilians. And there is no death penalty.

In Detroit, where there are no terrorists and where the death penalty does exist, there were 10 times as many murders last year (646) as there were in Northern Ireland. The murder rate in a particular society seems to be determined far more by the political and cultural traditions of the people and the availability of firearms than by the presence or absence of the death penalty.

[Translation]

On February 18, 1960, famed criminal lawyer Arthur Maloney, then a Member of the House, speaking against the reinstatement of capital punishment, against the imposition of capital punishment, quoted the words of a great writer, Anatole France. Madam Speaker, he quoted him with irony and said:

Anatole France once said that the law had a majestic equality. The law equally forbids the rich and the poor from doing the following things: from sleeping under bridges, from begging alms on the street and from stealing a loaf of bread. That may be the only thing he ever said that I will ever agree with—but it is a statement that causes one to sit back and to think. As legislators we should ponder less about the need for the penalty of death, and we should ponder more about co-operating with government to eradicate some of the roots from which crime stems; help clear up the slums in co-operation with provinces or municipalities; help build recreational centres to which underpriviliged boys and girls can come to find opportunity that they are denied at home, to find friendship and affection that they are denied at home. Those are the sorts of things we should all be doing. We should be placing emphasis on prisons; we should be encouraging a continuance of the development of the present policy to modernize and humanize those places, places in which the emphasis will be upon the reformation and the reclamation of the people who live within them, places from which the graduates will leave restored to dignity and prepared to take their place in society.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Charlevoix (Mr. Hamelin), mentioned a while ago "these unpunished crimes", the criminal who finds himself back on the street because a police officer has been unable to make a case stick and who ends up killing this same police officer. But he did not say that it was because of the flaws in the prison system. The death penalty is not going to eliminate these flaws, far from it! He mentioned also that a great many countries had not adopted a charter of rights and freedoms, and he was proud to say that we had such a Charter in Canada. But the Charter of Rights and Freedom forbids cruel and unusual punishment. I feel, therefore, that he should try to be consistent in his remarks. He mentioned finally the need to respect the rules of the game. That is why he said he was for capital punishment: A person who does not respect the rules of the game has to face capital punishment. Madam Speaker, I feel that life and death are not a game. How can anybody talk about the rules of the game when a human life is involved?

According to many newspaper clippings and articles, recent studies have shown just how discriminatory capital punishment is against the poor and the visible minorities. That is something very serious to take into account.

In an editorial published in Le Devoir newspaper on May the 1st, Pierre Tremblay stated:

Bury this pointless debate

What is more, society has duties towards all its members, including helping those who misbehave mend their ways. Capital punishment does not rectify anything; it is a refusal to face a problem by eliminating it. It is a sign of immaturity and irresponsibility.

How strange, Madam Speaker, that Mr. Tremblay and I should reach conclusions which are exactly the opposite of those reached by the Hon. Member for Charlevoix. He insisted on the need to reinstate capital punishment to show responsibility and maturity. Yet, this is the way a great many people feel—they are not intellectuals who are anxious to find something to say, as he claimed—who, like I do, love very much this country which is doing its utmost to be civilized, who love also their children very much and want to leave them a country which is better than the one they inherited. And here is what Mr. Pierre Tremblay said in another editorial:

Popular pressure. There is no mistake about it; scientific opinion polls tell us rather bluntly that a convincing majority of Canadians are in favour of reinstating capital punishment. A "convincing majority": the phrase is appropriately used in marketing, but does it define the real mission of legislators? No. Opinion polls are anonymous; they give us a picture of the average constituent who may express his deeper feelings or, alternately, simply voice his superficial prejudices. We expect from members of Parliament a more responsible conduct.

Under the circumstances, Madam Speaker, I found it gruesomly fascinating to note that according to a poll on the preferred means to execute criminels if capital punishment is reinstated, the most popular method was an injection given to the criminal so that he can die peacefully without screaming or struggling as if for example he was suffering from a fatal disease and that he was merely being given a painkiller.

When we looked at that poll, it made us shudder, Madam Speaker, because here is what it said:

• (1340)

[English]

"Most Canadians want lethal injection to replace noose."

[Translation]

If we consider the totals, those who were undecided were some 18 per cent. Those against the death penalty in that poll taken in March 1987 were some 20 per cent. Those who were in favour of an execution before a firing squad were about 1 per cent. Those in favour of the gas chamber were some 3 per cent. However, those who were in favour of that gentle and easy method were about 50 per cent. With that gentle injection, nobody will hear him scream and realize that he has died. There was a 19 per cent support for electrocution and less than 10 per cent for hanging. Therefore, as we are often told, the execution performed at early hours when nobody is around, is apparently what the people have in mind when they think about capital punishment. We are told why it is so.

[English]

"Why is it wrong to restore hanging" asks a Toronto Star article. As I said before, the death penalty is biased against the poor and the visible minorities.

"Whether somebody received the death penalty very often seemed to be a function of the quality of their lawyers," wrote Clifford Sloan, a former clerk at the U.S. Supreme Court . . . "By and large, the people who receive the death penalty are dirt poor."

The death penalty is irreversible. Since our justice system is run by human beings it is subject to human error, that is, we sometimes convict the wrong man. If we then hang him there is no turning back. Imagine if Donald Marshall, the Micmac Indian wrongfully convicted of murder in Nova Scotia, had been sentenced to death. It is bad enough that he served 11 years for a crime he did not commit.

[Translation]

My colleague for Charlevoix said earlier: "Let us trust our judicial system; I have every confidence in our legal system; I have confidence in the jury; we are acting like mature people by condemning someone to death for making a mistake." However, mistakes can also be made by condemning innocent people.

[English]

The death penalty is barbaric. Most western industrial nations, including even France—

[Translation]

—which was the country of the guillotine—

[English]

—have abolished it. The major exception is the United States, home of the Saturday night special. Other nations where it is still in practice include Iran, South Africa, and the Soviet Union, whose examples we do not normally follow.

The death penalty places an immense strain on our institutions. If it is reinstated, all death sentences will, as a matter of course, be appealed to the Supreme Court and, thence, to the Cabinet. The nine justices and 40 Ministers had better be prepared to devote extraordinary amounts of time to each and every case. If they did not, they would not be fulfilling their duties.

[Translation]

The advocates of the death penalty are therefore supporting a system of social values which can be termed moral order. This concept is often closely related to the reason of state, and involved as a kind of eraser for all political ills. At times, moral order is uncompromising towards those who go against its dictates. At others, it turns a blind eye to breaches of the most basic moral standards. Moral order is a part-time moralizer—

—according to lawyer Jean Fortin, of the Pepper & Associates law firm.

This is therefore a moral debate, Madam Speaker, where we have to ask ourselves these questions: What kind of country do we want to leave our children and grandchildren? What kind of country could we take pride in? What kind of country could we hold as an example to others? Finally, as parliamentarians, at the end of this mandate, and in the expectation of being given a second one, would we be preparing a better Canada for our children if we voted to reinstate the death penalty? I firmly believe that we would not, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is with profoundly mixed emotions that I rise to make my contribution to this debate which I think all who participate in it, whether it be for or against, must view as historic. Like the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly), I too was first elected to this place in 1984.

In facing the question of the possible reintroduction of capital punishment in Canada I feel somewhat like the pilgrim in Pilgrim's Progress. "Though with great difficulty I am got hither, yet now I do not repent me of all the trouble I have been at to arrive . . . " While I have that profound sense of sadness that this debate should ever be necessary in a society that proclaims itself or believes itself civilized, I have a pride and a profound sense of the personal privilege that is granted to me in allowing me to be part of this debate and allowing me to have my say against the possible reintroduction of capital punishment.

There has never been an execution in Canada in the 17 years that I have had the privilege of living in this country, and for eight years before that. The effects of demographics, of immigration, mean that over one-half of Canadians cannot claim to have the slightest personal memory of an execution ever having taken place in this country. They literally cannot remember the time that this was carried out in our country.

In entering this debate I would like to salute those who I see as the heroines and heroes of this debate, those who, like my hon. friends from Bourassa and Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic, have had the courage to change their views in the course of the debate as they listened to the arguments. I salute also those on the government side who, in the face of an overwhelming majority of their colleagues, have clung to, propounded and proclaimed their own faith that this is a measure that would be a stain on the country of Canada and a stain on the Government of which they are part.

I would like, too, to nail a lie that has been put about, that there has been discipline exercised within the New Democratic Party to have everybody oppose this resolution. That is absolutely false. There has never been the hint that it might be used. It is totally unnecessary. We are of one mind. That is a reason we are, after all, in the same Party.

Why the debate? I understand the reasons why, and I do not want to make cheap political points out of them. I understand that as part of the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised a free vote. I do not judge on his now fulfilling that promise. Yet, having listened very carefully to his speech, I see a man who is torn between the promise and his principles. I can only say that I am glad that this does not weigh upon my conscience as it must surely weigh upon the conscience of the Prime Minister.

Closure has now been introduced, depriving a large number of Members of this House the opportunity to speak their views on the question of capital punishment. As I do so I will not go the route of an extensive citation or exegesis of scripture, or I hope too extensive a quotation from other authorities.

• (1350)

Virtually every authority that I am familiar with has been cited already, and been cited by people who have a better knowledge, a better understanding, and a better ability to present those authorities than I do.

I should not pretend to be profoundly acquainted with the scriptures, and certainly not as profoundly as one who proclaims a Christian faith should be; nor should I claim that I am aware of the other non-Christian authorities on the subject. But, I shall hinge my argument on four quotations from scripture that speak powerfully to me in judging this question. They are, an eye for an eye, thou shalt not kill, vengeance is mine sayeth the Lord, and, behold, I give you a new law.

It is no accident, Madam Speaker, that ojo por ojo, an eye for an eye, is the name of the most dreaded death squad in El Salvador, because that is the law of vengeance.

Those who cite the New Testament in support of their argument cannot overcome the authority of the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" no matter how hard they try, because there are no qualifiers; there is nothing appended or added to that commandment. It say, and it says simply, "Thou shalt not kill."

"Vengeance is mine", sayeth the Lord, and that places in the status of blasphemer everybody who would abrogate unto themselves, or unto any organization in which they may take part, the ability to exercise vengeance.

And finally, the words of the Saviour, "Behold, I give you a new law", and indeed he did, and that law was to love.

The significance of the Bible usage and citation on the pro side of this question, I think, is unarguable. They depend far too heavily on the Old Testament over the New Testament, and they can produce only the most tangential relevance and connection between any words of the Saviour and the position that they seek to propound in this debate. They use scripture, as it was once said a drunk uses a lamp-post, not for illumination, but for support. They use scripture, citing always the authority, but not touching or yielding to the inspiration, which is after all the central difference between Christian scriptures and the scriptures of other religions. The significant difference is that the Bible is not merely a codification of the rules under which we should live, but an inspiration above all; it is a source of inspiration for those who believe, and the aspect of authority is, I believe, undeniably secondary.

Some people have said, Madam Speaker, that elected representatives are duty-bound to support measures such as the reintroduction of state killing because the majority of Canadians appears to favour it. To me, it is not the role of the Member of Parliament to become merely a mechanical device for producing, regurgitating, and onward transmission of the views of constituents. I know, and I know full well, that such a system would repel and would deter three-quarters of the Hon. Members of this House from taking up a duty under conditions which they could not exercise the moral judgment that they possess as free beings.

I believe, of course, that it is my duty to seriously consider the representations of all of my constituents, but they must be honoured in a way that reflects not only their need to be heard but the fact that they elected me to judge, to apply my own conscience, to weigh in the balance the arguments, and to make decisions.

Our country is a representative democracy. It is not a direct democracy like an early New England village or ancient Greek town, where, of course, slaves and women were excluded from consideration. While the ordinary citizen in a representative democracy may in some way feel disenfranchised on some issues, in a direct democracy they are completely at the mercy of those who put the question. Plebiscites and referenda are the traditional tools of the demagogue, the tyrant, and the skilled authoritarian, and they have no place in our parliamentary system.

In the 1979, 1980 and 1984 election campaigns, I—and the same is true of the gentleman I replaced—consistently stated my opposition to capital punishment. Even though some of my constituents may disagree with my stand on this issue, I believe they expect, above all, that I will be true to the positions I adopted during those election campaigns.

The power of this debate is such, Madam Speaker, that during its course, and before it got started, we have seen a gradual shift, not only in the mood of the Members of this House, but in the country. We have seen support for capital punishment slipping away. The surveys, one after the other, of Members of Parliament have consistently shown an increase in the forces of support for abolition and a decrease in those who seek to kill.

Capital punishment, as an act of revenge, is morally unjustifiable. All of Canada's major churches have spoken out against it. Theologians, who after all are the most expert interpreters of scriptural authorities, are almost unanimously against it.

Our justice system cannot be based on a simple retributive equity, measure for measure. We do not steal from thieves; we do not rape rapists. I do not believe that vengeance can play any part in a civilized system of criminal justice. The compassion of those who have seen their own relatives victimized by murder and who yet speak out against capital punishment cries out to be honoured in the record of this nation.

Capital punishment can never restore the life lost; it can only degrade us as a nation. It is not a deterrent. Surely the comparative experience in the United States proves that. Surely the views of the former President of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police should be considered. He said:

—it is futile to base an argument on reinstatement of capital punishment on the grounds of deterrence.

Surely that view should be listened to, as should the words of the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who said:

Where you have a penalty it should be demonstrated to be a deterrent with respect to the activity for which it is a penalty.

Because I learned history in the United Kingdom, Madam Speaker, I think of the experience there. I think of how, back in the 17th and 18th centuries, a whole panoply, a gamut of crimes were punishable by the ultimate sentence, and how gradually penal reform reduced that number and how there was in fact a reduction in crime that went hand in hand with that reform.

We are no longer in the age of Dickens, when a person could be hanged for picking a pocket. And we know that even for that trivial crime, capital punishment was not a deterrent. We have more than one authority citing the fact of the widespread pick-pocketing that took place at public executions. That is an antithesis that the "pro" forces are incapable of resolving.

Far from reducing violent crime, the facts support the view that the death penalty is part of the cycle of violence and does not address the public's need for protection.

Depending upon the base year and depending upon the use of statistics, it is very easily possible to show that murder in Canada has fallen since the death penalty was abolished.

The death penalty means that even the innocent can be executed. Miscarriages of justice have been documented in this society, in the United States, and in Great Britain. It has been reported that 343 persons have been wrongly convicted of capital offences in the past 200 years in the United States.

The death penalty is discriminatory. Those who die are, overwhelmingly, the poor, the illiterate, the uneducated, the native people, identifiable racial minorities.

The Assembly of First Nations has petitioned this Government, based on a study entitled "The Quality of Mercy", to block the reinstatement of capital punishment on the ground that if it were reintroduced, it would again fall upon members of the groups which it represents.

As the late Supreme Court Justice of the United States, Justice William O. Douglas, noted: "One searches our chronicles in vain for the execution of any member of the affluent strata of society."

May I call it two o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 21

[English]

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

CLOSURE OF DEBATE

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, today is a day of infamy. The Tories have once again broken their promise, this time about a matter of life and death.

Today the Government has shocked and outraged Members of the House by invoking closure in the capital punishment debate. I believe that most Members of the House, regardless of party affiliation, shared the views of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) when he stated in the House on February 13, 1987:

The Government wishes to have a frank debate, a full debate, and a constructive debate.

Given this statement, it is indeed hard to understand why the Government is in such a hurry to curtail debate on this serious issue before all Members of the House have been able to voice their views.

I want to point out—and I hope the Speaker will take note as well—that this debate is different from all other debates. This is not a debate between Parties. It is a debate where each Member of Parliament has views to present, and the Speaker must consider that in this circumstance each of us has an equal right to be heard—

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE

CITIZENSHIP COURT CEREMONY

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, recently the constituency of Scarborough West was honoured to host the largest citizenship court ever convened when 400 Canadians of Greek origin became citizens of this, their chosen country.

It was an inspiration to witness these people, in the presence of the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) and Citizenship Judge Suzanne Warren, take their oath of allegiance to Her Majesty The Queen of Canada as this country's head of state.

Afterwards the judicial character of the evening was happily replaced by a party spirit when ethnic dancing and singing took over the proceedings.

It was thus a visible demonstration of today's and tomorrow's Canada—many cultural traditions united around one national allegiance.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—REPORTED USE OF STRIKE-BREAKERS DURING MEDIATION PROCESS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the appointment of a mediator in the postal dispute, and we hope this means a change of heart on the part of the Government to a policy of negotiation rather than confrontation.

However, I have received a disturbing report from Montreal that in fact the Post Office is continuing to use strike-breakers for security in the delivery of mail.

We call upon the Government and the Post Office to live up to their commitment that they would withdraw all strike-breakers during the period of mediation.

The annual report of the Post Office has shown that the deficit is well in hand. It has dropped over the last year by $81 million. This excuse for confrontation with the postal unions is simply that—an excuse. The conciliator's report pointed out that the impasse in the negotiations was caused by the Government's post office plan and by its short deadline to reach financial self-sufficiency. We hope—

Mr. Speaker: I regret the Hon. Member's time has expired.

PETITIONS SUPPORTING REINSTATEMENT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to give notice to the House of a number of petitions I have received in my office over the past few days and weeks. As you know, representation through petitions has culminated in over 39,000 people across Canada expressing their views in support of a return to capital punishment.

Also I would like to advise the House that, in addition to these 39,256 names, I have also received another 5,827 signatures which, for technical reasons, do not conform to House rules for presentation of petitions. When included, these signatures now total over 45,000 Canadians.

Let me express my sincere thanks to groups such as CRY, Citizens Responding to You; Citizens United for Safety and Justice; Citizens for Capital Punishment and Justice; Victims of Violence; Army, Air Force and Navy Veterans; New Brunswick Police Chiefs Association; RCMP Divisional Staff Representatives; Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police; Canadian Police Association, and the Ontario Provincial Police Association. These groups worked very hard in circulating these petitions and deserve the thanks of many Members of the House.

I would also like to point out that the Ontario youth wing of the PC Party totally endorses and supports a return to capital punishment.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SAINT-MAURICE RIVER—PROBLEM CAUSED BY LOGGING OPERATIONS

Mr. Gilles Grondin (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, my statement today concerns the problems caused by log drives on the longest river used for that purpose in Canada, the Saint-Maurice. As you know, the river runs through vast tracts of land in the Mauricie region, from La Tuque to Trois-Rivières.

The log drive has for many years caused serious problems, both for residents on the banks of the Saint-Maurice and for the rest of the population in this region. The pollution caused by the drive has reached alarming levels, according to a brochure published by the Quebec Department of the Environment, under the title: La Saint-Maurice, une rivière en danger. The brochure says, on page 17: "The log drives carried out for many years on this waterway have had a harmful impact on aquatic life and water quality. The floating logs, with the bark and the logs that sink and accumulate on the river bottom, release harmful substances, some at levels that are toxic to aquatic life". And a little further: "The floating logs continue to have a devastating impact as far as the St. Lawrence River."

This is a complex problem, since stopping the log drive would cost considerable economic problems in the region owing to the high cost of shipping the logs over land.

In April 1986, an agreement in principle to control log drives was reached. However, it seems the anticipated results have yet to materialize.

That is why I ask that all parties involved, including the federal Department of the Environment, the companies concerned, and other federal, provincial and municipal authorities, meet as soon as possible in order to find a feasible solution to this very serious problem in short order.

TOURISM

ALBERTA SUMMER GAMES—INVITATION TO ATTEND

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, tourism is a $22 billion industry in Canada—a vital part of our economy. Some 600,000 Canadians in over 60,000 businesses, many independently owned, owe their livelihood to our tourist industry. In the Province of Alberta the annual value from tourism is $2.5 billion. Who can resist the breathtaking beauty of the Canadian Rockies and our national parks?

This year the County of Strathcona in my riding of Pembina is hosting the Alberta Summer Games, to be held August 5, 6, 7, and 8. Some 4,000 athletes will gather in Strathcona to compete in 30 sporting events, complemented by a major cultural festival. More than 3,000 volunteers have devoted their time.

I extend a warm invitation to everyone to come to Pembina for the Alberta Summer Games. I can assure them of a hearty western welcome.

As we say in Alberta, "Smile, you're a tourist attraction".

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WESTERN REGIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, rumours are abounding again about CN's plans to centralize its corporate structure, and CN President Lawless has been quick to deny any plan to close its regional headquarter offices in western Canada. At least, he has not confirmed the rumours.

However, we in Winnipeg are familiar with the process. We remember the denials of 1985, that the prairie region headquarters was not going to disappear, and along with it all kinds of senior jobs to Edmonton, and all the while it was actually happening. That was eventually stopped, but I am told that the jobs continue to bleed away to Edmonton in a much less controversial fashion.

I call upon Manitoba Tory Members of Parliament and all western Tories to defend western Canada, both Winnipeg and Edmonton, against any possible centralization of this sort.

While I am at it, I call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) to make good on the work he is doing to bring the new centre for viral disease control to Winnipeg as a complement to the excellent health sciences sector which already exists in Winnipeg. If Winnipeg were to get this very worth-while project, it would certainly go some way toward alleviating the sting of the CF-18.

SPORTS

TWENTY-THIRD ANNUAL QUEBEC GAMES AT VAL-D'OR

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Val d'Or is preparing for the Twenty-third annual Quebec Games, from August 7 to 16, a commitment it intends to meet out with its usual flair. The people of Val d'Or have adopted the slogan: A Heart of Gold, and they intend to live up to their legendary reputation for hospitality when they receive Quebec's young people this summer.

On this occasion, more than 4,000 participants, including athletes, group leaders and officials from eighteen sports-loving regions in Quebec, as well as thousands of local volunteers and thousands of spectators and visitors, will experience the excitement of this unique event. Twelve sports disciplines are slated for the 23rd annual Games. Competitive activities will be divided into two blocks of four days each. From August 8 to August 11, there will be track and field, bicycle racing, diving, softball, sailing and water-polo, and from August 12 to 15, baseball, swimming, pétanque, water-skiing, soccer and tennis. More than just a sports event, the Quebec annual Games at Val d'Or are a unique opportunity for Quebecers to make friends, celebrate, and discover and share new experiences. Mr. Speaker, the Twenty-third annual Quebec Games at Val d'Or will be the amateur sports event in Quebec par excellence.

PIQUETTE AFFAIR—ALBERTA LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION—POSITION OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Robert Toupin (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I was dismayed to learn about the resolution adopted by the majority of the Conservative Members of a committee of the Alberta Legislative Assembly censoring Alberta NDP Member Léo Piquette for asking a question in French, and blaming the daily Edmonton Journal for supporting the NDP Member and the French fact in Alberta.

This attitude on the part of the Conservative Members attests to their political immaturity, and constitutes an insult to and an unacceptable intolerance of Alberta francophones. The attitude of these Conservative Members shows disrespect for the freedom of the press.

On behalf of my Party and of all Quebecers, again I extend my support to the NDP Member, Léo Piquette, for his display of courage and to all Alberta francophones.

S. O. 21

TAX REFORM

IMPACT ON FAMILIES

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, each passing days sheds more light on the tax reform announced by the Conservative Government. The conclusion is that Canadian families stand to lose as a result of this exercise.

Mr. Speaker, my interpretation of the documents which were tabled is that there will no longer be an exemption for dependent children over 18 who are still attending school.

Second, a woman who is divorced, separated or widowed and whose child of 18 or more is still attending school will not be allowed either to benefit from a dependent child exemption nor to consider such child as a spouse for income tax purposes.

Third, in the case of an average income family, say $30,000, the $65 child tax credit for children under 18 does not replace the tax value of the exemption which was $710 in 1986. In fact this family will lose $120.

Finally, two families with a similar income, say $25,000, one with two children 18 or more and still attending school, the other childless, will pay the same amount of taxes.

I think that is unfair, and the President of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women was quite right to describe this reform as being scandalous.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

MUNICIPALITY OF WEST VANCOUVER—SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday Canadians celebrate the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of Canada. Out on the West Coast we celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Municipality of West Vancouver in the constituency of Capilano.

Members of the House have heard me extol the virtues of West Vancouver before. Certainly its physical beauty of snow-capped mountains and spectacular ocean vistas is unsurpassed anywhere in the country. But it is the people who have made this community truly outstanding.

The early pioneers included sawmill operators who established their businesses along the northern shores of Burrard Inlet, and community leaders such as John Lawson.

They were followed by the summer cottagers, and then with the construction of the Lions Gate Bridge in the late 1930s by growing numbers of permanent residents who gave rise to the development of the gracious homes, parks and community facilities which we enjoy today. Communities such as Horseshoe Bay, Caulfeild, Dundarave, Ambleside and Park Royal all contribute their own unique ambience to West Vancouver.

So in this time of celebration, to a community of beauty and sanctuary, a community of truly committed citizens, a community which I am proud to represent, may I send my best wishes for a happy seventy-fifth, West Vancouver.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

CITY OF TIMMINS—SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Aurèle Gervais (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to invite all my fellow Members of the House of Commons, members of the Senate, and their constituents to visit the City of Timmins during the remainder of 1987 because we are celebrating our seventy-fifth anniversary. In particular, I would like to see them come to Timmins during the period of July 23 to August 5.

Two event-filled weeks await both residents and visitors alike, from culture lovers to sports fans plus all of the folks who just want to be happy and have fun. Visitors will be able to choose from many pieces of our birthday cake.

More than 12 ethnic groups have contributed with fine traditions and hard work to make our community a better place in which to live.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that Timmins is made up of some 47 per cent of francophones. The other 53 per cent is made up of anglophones and 12 English-speaking ethnic groups so that Timmins is an exemplary town.

[English]

Since the discovery of gold in 1909, Timmins has grown to become the largest gold mining municipality in the world. A community with a modern airport and a heart of gold, Timmins is a blend of the past and present, the old and new, and it wants everyone to share the special spirit which has made it world famous.

The theme for our seventy-fifth anniversary is precious memories and, Mr. Speaker, I personally guarantee wonderful memories to anyone who visits Timmins.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

OPPOSITION TO EMPLOYMENT OF STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said last week that he would not cross picket lines. It is easy to say so. The Prime Minister may not cross picket lines himself, but he does worse, he pays people to do it for him.

[English]

The man who hires a paid assassin can be charged with murder. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) hires people to cross picket lines. How does he expect not to be guilty of crossing those same picket lines?

[Translation]

The NDP members find that their conscience is troubling them. They hesitate. They do not dare to blame the government. Mr. Speaker, it is time to understand that the Conservative party and the NDP change their mind with the weather. The hiring of strike-breakers by a Crown Corporation is unacceptable today.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF PRODUCER CARS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, producer cars were once entrenched in the Canada Grains Act and there were no limits on the number of producer cars. But this right of farmers has been eroded until last year when farmers were only permitted 10 per cent of the cars allotted for non-board grains. That was bad enough, but now that amount is being reduced to 5 per cent. If this reduction keeps on, we will soon have no cars and that will please the big grain companies that want to hog it all.

If there are difficulties at the ports, or if the problem arises because three bodies allocate cars, then deal with the items causing the problem, but certainly do not do it by reducing the number of producer cars. Producer cars are a free enterprise technique and it induces efficiency.

The Government wants our farmers to be efficient, and here we have a commission placing a roadblock that prevents an efficient operation. The use of producer cars is efficient and enables farmers to use the futures market and avoid the elevator system.

I urge the Government to insist on retaining at least the 10 per cent of cars in effect last year.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE AT DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT PLANT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, last week 4,100 production, technical and clerical workers went on strike at the de Havilland aircraft plant which is located in my riding of York Centre. The workers rejected the latest offer from de Havilland, which is owned by Boeing Corporation of Seattle, Washington, and walked off the job just 10 hours after their contract expired. There are a number of issues relating to job security about which the workers are concerned.

Unfortunately, a long and painful strike is being predicted, one which will damage the aerospace industry in Canada. The union is accusing Boeing of trying to impose U.S.-style labour relations on the Canadian plant, and Boeing claims that its contract offer is a result of the need to make the plant more efficient.

The strike must be resolved, Mr. Speaker. De Havilland has a long and proud history in the aerospace industry. Its expertise is admired and respected throughout the world, and the Dash-8 commuter plane is world market leader.

A strike is a very stressful time for management, workers, their families, and the affected communities. I urge both sides to get together to try to resolve this strike.

WAR CRIMINALS

EXPEDITIOUS PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION URGED

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, while it was late, 40 years late, our Government had the moral courage and the political will to present enabling legislation to prosecute war criminals caught here in Canada.

After a thorough and sensitive study by a commission chaired by Mr. Justice Deschênes, the Government responded to the recommendations with a made-in-Canada solution. One of the obstacles was the need to amend the Criminal Code. However, the necessary legislation was tabled in this House last week.

The legislation will permit federal authorities to prosecute persons who have committed war crimes outside Canada against non-Canadians. The legislation also prevents anyone reasonably believed to have committed war crimes from seeking a safe haven here in Canada.

From the initiating of the Deschênes Commission by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to the drafting and the tabling of the required legislation by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), this has been a very difficult process, due in large part to the acute risk of divisiveness within communities. I want to commend the Minister of Justice for his sensitivity and understanding of this most delicate issue.

I urge the Government and both opposition Parties to deal with Bill C-71 as expeditiously as possible.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—EFFECT ON FAMILIES

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns tax reform which, in reality, is turning out to be just another Tory tax grab from middle-income families.

Last week the Tory chairman of the Finance Committee warned Canadians that the middle class would be hit hard by this Tory tax reform package. We learned over the weekend that even the Minister of National Health and Welfare had to speak to the Minister about this unfair attack on more than one million Canadian families caused by cuts in the child tax benefits. Why is the Tory tax reform so unfair? Why did the Minister not look after his own affairs and advise the Minister of Finance on the unjust decision he made affecting Canadian families?

• (1420)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, most of those allegations turn on the question of the child tax credit. The Hon. Members know that below the threshold of $24,500 families with children are ahead as a result of the changes we have made. Right above the tax threshold there is a slight change, but if that is put together with the reduction in taxes because of lower marginal rates, families with children are ahead and the Hon. Member knows that.

[Translation]

ELIMINATION OF $1,420 EXEMPTION FOR STUDENTS 18 YEARS AND OLDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): If I choose to return to this injustice, Mr. Speaker, it is because I feel the Minister has failed to understand the importance of this issue, and I urge him to read the documents carefully. Because this reform he has introduced will affect over a million families who will lose in whole or in part the fiscal value of the dependent child exemption which they could claim before.

I ask the Minister: Does he feel it is fair to cut this $1,420 exemption which families could claim in respect of students who are 18 years of age or over? That is the age where children cost the most. At a time when the birth rate is dropping in Canada, does the Minister feel it is fair to eliminate this $1,420 exemption in respect of children over 18 years of age who are still attending school without replacing it with a tax credit?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that the Hon. Member has not read the total tax reform document. If he had read it, he would know that the tuition tax credit is now transferable. Under previous Governments, the deduction for tuition always had to be taken by the student who had a very low income which was rarely ever taxable. Now that is transferable to a parent or a grandparent. That is an important advance not only for students but, I would suggest, for post-secondary education as well.

[Translation]

QUERY WHETHER TAX CREDIT WILL COMPENSATE FOR FINANCIAL LOSS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State (Finance) refuses to recognize the fact that there will be no exemption for dependent children 18 years of age or over, that there will be no tax credit and that, also, a woman who is separated, divorced or widowed who has a dependent child 18 years of age or over still attending school will not be able to claim this child as a spouse for tax purposes. Therefore, I ask the Minister: Does his Government intend to change the relevant provision to reinstate the exemption for dependent children 18 years of age or over who are still attending school, or at least to include a tax credit to compensate for the significant tax loss middle income families will experience?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member can get himself stirred up by looking at two parts of the over-all package. If he were to look at the over-all package, he would find that the taxpayer he describes is way ahead. There are lower marginal rates at all levels. That plus the tuition credits to which I have referred add up to a much better situation in the specific example he just described.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to imposing taxes on Canadians, the Government does not care whom it taxes or where it goes to get the taxes. First, children's snack food, and paint, and wallpaper, and now a 10 per cent tax on long-distance phone calls and cable TV. The Government twisted the Bell telephone ad. It now reads: "Reach out and tax someone".

My question is for the Minister of State for Finance. For millions of rural Canadians there is no difference between a local and a long-distance telephone call. Is it not true that the Government will tax all Canadians for every call made to their doctors, their dentists, and their children? Is this what is called fairhandedness?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the tax on telecommunications was very carefully crafted to make sure that the first telephone in a home and local calls will be exempt. This is an extension of the Government's view that the average Canadian deserves that exemption, and he will have it after tax reform.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this is not tax reform, this is a tax disgrace. The Minister's new 10 per cent telecommunications tax will bring $1 billion into his coffers, a cost of $1 billion to the Canadian who has a second phone in his home and who wants to phone his mother, his cousin, his friend overseas, people next door, his doctor or his dentist. How can the Minister justify this new tax which is nothing more than a tax on talking?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): After listening to the Hon. Member, perhaps we should consider a tax on talking.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hockin: The Hon. Member knows, and I will repeat again, that the poor, the elderly and the disadvantaged Canadians in society will be insulated from the tax on long-distance rates by the increase in the sales tax credit. That is the basis of this reform. It is to ensure that the disadvantaged do not suffer from this tax.

WHITE PAPER—EFFECT ON CHILD BENEFITS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I would like to address my question to the Prime Minister who himself is a family man with four children. Would the Prime Minister confirm that, as a result of the changes proposed in the Minister of Finance's White Paper, a $30,000 per year family with two children will actually get $430 less in child benefits than it would have if the Government had left the system alone?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, that calculation, like calculations that were raised in the House last week, can be disputed depending upon the specific case that is being made. The Hon. Member knows that he has to look at all deductions and all clarifications. The key part of the example he gives is that the over-all rate of tax is much lower so the taxpayer is still further ahead.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, Canadians know that the over-all changes the Government has introduced punish Canadian families and the Minister knows that.

Considering that the current tax system punishes people who smoke cigarettes and drink alcoholic beverages, why has the Government felt obliged to put children in the same category under the tax system?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that that is just sheer empty hyperbole. He knows that almost nine out of 10 Canadians over the age of 65 will benefit from tax reform.

As far as families go, eight out of 10 Canadian households will benefit from tax reform. Even more important, for eight out of 10 taxpayers with incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 per year, personal taxes will fall by an average of $460. That is in the documents and is not disputed.

Finally, it is so important for the Hon. Member to realize that federal personal income tax will be reduced to zero for 860,000 Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EFFECT ON FAMILY BENEFITS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): And, Mr. Speaker, Canadians know that since the Government came to office, 850,000 people have been added to the tax rolls and increased—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: They got a job.

Mr. Broadbent: Joe is having trouble again.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Try to be honest, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: Taxes on the average family have been increased by some $1,300. That is what Canadians know.

Will the Minister agree that, as a result of the changes the Government has introduced, a $30,000 per year family with two children will be getting $430 less in family benefits from the Government than it would if the system had been left alone? That is the question.

• (1430)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the reason 840,000 more people paid tax in the past year than before is because we found jobs for them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: Nonsense.

Mr. Hockin: Not only that, but eight out of ten Canadian households benefit from tax reform including all families with two children and so on. There may be a few exceptions, but generally eight out of ten families benefit.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): A few million exceptions.

SALES TAX—EFFECT ON LOW-INCOME TAXPAYERS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance whose so-called tax reform includes yet more sales tax increases before any attempt at reform of the sales tax which the Minister himself has called "inefficient" and "a silent job killer".

The Government has raised sales taxes and broadened the sales tax base four times thus far, with new increases on food coming into effect July 1.

Will the Minister tell the House why the Government continues to depend so heavily on a form of tax which directly attacks low and middle-income Canadians with young children?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that it is through the federal sales tax credit that the Government is ensuring that the average Canadian is not hurt by increases in sales tax. This is never mentioned by the hon. lady. That is a very important part of the whole federal sales tax reform. When we bring in sales tax reform we will extend the credit still further.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance broke his promise of comprehensive tax reform when he backed away from dealing with the sales tax system. Until the Government makes its intentions clear, it should be qualifying its statements about the merits of the partial package it brought forward.

The sales tax credit, which the Minister referred to, is not indexed. It will lose value as inflation increases, thereby pushing low and middle-income families further down the income ladder. Does the Minister not realize this?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. lady wants. Does she want a federal sales tax credit or not? In her first question she took one position and in the second she took another.

Miss Nicholson: Index it.

Mr. de Jong: Tom, tell us about indexing.

Mr. Hockin: It is very clear in the White Paper on tax reform that the broader the base the lower the rate can be, the more exemptions the lower the credit. Those are the questions we wanted to put before the Canadian people. We also wanted to discuss it with the provinces to find out whether we could have a national approach.

The previous Government would probably have unilaterally decided on how to do this without consultation. Our approach is to consult ordinary Canadians as well as the provinces.

TRADE

FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of International Trade blamed Ambassador Reisman for wanting to give too much to the Americans in the free trade negotiations. Who enjoys the Prime Minister's confidence, the Minister of Trade or Mr. Reisman?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find it amazing that a Member of the Socialist Party would raise those concerns regarding alleged attacks against Ambassador Reisman. You have done nothing but attack him non stop for a year now, without any explanation, and now the socialists are defending Ambassador Reisman. When I call him to tell him that, he certainly will be relieved.

As far as the Minister's comments are concerned, she expressed a view on an aspect of a matter that is very complex. The Ambassador, the head negotiator, retains all the Government's and my confidence, as does the Minister.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER AND AMBASSADOR BE DISMISSED

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's criticism is quite severe. She said that she has had to keep the Ambassador reined in "so he doesn't give away the bath water before we've even had a chance to sip it".

How is it possible for the country to trust who speaks for the Government on U.S. trade issues when there is this kind of public disagreement and criticism? Is it not time for both the Minister and Mr. Reisman to be fired?

Mr. Riis: Joe, have you been drinking the bath water again?

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Let them drink champagne.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have now heard from the populist Party, the New Democrats. They want the Government to drink champagne.

Mr. Riis: It's better than bath water. That's the problem.

Mr. Axworthy: Actually hemlock is what was suggested.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I want to make the point on behalf of the Niagara Peninsula that it is Canadian bath water.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the serious point about this exchange is that it has become clear since the beginning of the negotiations and the discussions on the negotiations that the New Democratic Party was prepared to resort to any tactic and any argument it could to try to subvert the possibility of Canada improving our trade situation in the world through successful trade negotiations with the United States. We do not accept the idea that we should not be entering into negotiations to try to improve the lot of Canadian workers and the Canadian economy.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WESTERN REGIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Over the weekend it was confirmed that at the last board meeting of the CNR a major plan of reorganization was considered which would result in substantially reducing senior management personnel responsibilities in the cities of Winnipeg and Edmonton.

As 70 per cent of CN's operations take place in western Canada, this would be another major blow to a part of the country which is already frustrated by the actions of the Government.

Can the Prime Minister give assurances that CN will not be allowed to switch any senior personnel under its reorganization plans, or downgrade or downsize the management responsibilities which are presently located in western Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, CN has in fact denied such speculative reports. A press release was issued which states:

> Ron Lawless, the company's president and chief executive officer, said that regional offices in Moncton, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Edmonton will remain.

It continues:

> Nor will there be any relocation of company personnel, including senior officers, from the regions to corporate headquarters in Montreal," he said.
> "On the contrary, CN will maintain—and in some respects likely enhance—its regional presence, particularly in Western Canada where 70 per cent of our business is generated"—

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I remind the Deputy Prime Minister that the speculative report came from a member of his own caucus, the Member for Edmonton South.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That's not true.

CORPORATION'S REORGANIZATION PLAN

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that western Canadians have experienced two and a half years of broken promises by the CN.

Can we get an assurance that before any final decisions are made the proposed reorganization plan will be made public and that Members of Parliament from both the Alberta and Manitoba regions, plus the mayors of the cities there and the Premiers of those provinces, will be given the opportunity to look at that plan, comment upon it, and determine whether the impact will be what Mr. Lawless says it will be or what we have seen in the last two and a half years, that is, CN withdrawing from western Canada?

• (1440)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the Hon. Member wants. The speculation was escalated by a Liberal mayor who found it convenient to seize upon the opportunity. No decision of such a nature has been made and I simply quote the president, Ron Lawless, who was very clear and categorical. There is no need for me to reinforce that assurance. Clearly, the release speaks for itself.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

CONSTITUTIONAL ENTRENCHMENT

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. After the First Ministers' Conference I asked the Prime Minister what the Government would do to ease the burden of failure upon Canada's first peoples. Since then the Prime Minister has taken credit for the Meech Lake Accord which, despite its qualities, ignores and therefore insults aboriginal people. Will the Prime Minister at least tell the House when he will propose a schedule for continuing constitutional discussions aimed at entrenching the aboriginal peoples' right to self-government in the Constitution of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not take any credit for the Meech Lake Accord. The Leader of the New Democratic Party was kind enough to give a little to me, and I thank him for that. It was not a partisan gesture, nor is it being construed across the country in that regard.

Inasmuch as my hon. friend raises the question of aboriginal rights and concerns, I am sure he would be well acquainted with the vigorous effort of the Government of Canada and myself in trying to bring about a degree of justice in favour of the aboriginal peoples of Canada at the two aboriginal conferences which I had the honour of chairing. We were unsuccessful for reasons that are well known to my hon. friend.

I indicated at that time that once we got through the important negotiations which turned out to be successful in regard to the Province of Quebec, the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada ought vigorously to turn their attention again to securing a degree of justice for native peoples of Canada and that is what this Government proposes to do.

FEDERAL FUNDING OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESEARCH

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that constitutional research financing for the national aboriginal groups expires tomorrow. He also knows that without such funding they will have to break up their teams of constitutional experts.

As a sign of the Government's commitment to ongoing constitutional participation by the national aboriginal organizations, will the Prime Minister authorize supplementary funding so they are able to keep up their efforts?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say, in fairness to the Government and predecessor Governments, that no one would accuse a Parliament of Canada of having lacked in generosity in regard to the funding of constitutional research and preparation required by native groups, which is the way it ought to be. Quite properly, substantial amounts of public funds have been allocated to this purpose over the last number of years.

I would be happy to review the point raised by my hon. friend because it would be quite important and consistent that native groups have the necessary funds to make their case effectively and well.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—EFFECT OF SALES TAX

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Finance said a few moments ago that there would be a lump sum payment given by the Government to the working poor and those people on fixed incomes, to make up for the huge sales tax increases to be implemented by the Government. Upon examination, we find that the lump sum payment is not even enough to buy a good lumpfish in Newfoundland.

Does he not realize that the new sales tax increases are going to add an additional burden on these people throughout the year? How does he expect them to live under new sales taxes when they cannot even make it today? They are used to getting hammered and nailed by the Government, but this is a sledgehammer, and they are getting the shaft.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is easy to tell the Hon. Member how I expect that to occur. First, the federal sales tax credit which will be generous, the child tax credit, and the lower rate of tax throughout our White Paper reforms will produce far more income at that level than presently exists.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the sneaky summer snack attack starts in two days. There is a tax on potato chips, popcorn, and popsicles. On January 1 everything will be taxed in the household, including the kitchen sink. We hear the phrase: "Reach out and touch someone". The Minister is reaching out already and has his hands in everyone's pocket. Why does the Government want to worry the people further by saying it may now tax their food in the grocery store, the clothing on their backs, their heating fuel and their electricity?

The Minister of Finance said that all of this is to replace "this crazy quilt of taxation". Does the Minister not realize that the crazy quilt will now be replaced by a crazy carpet? The Government is on it, and they are both headed downhill.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the reason we are bringing in the federal sales tax reduction is to lower the cost of sales tax charges on the truck that delivers his popsicles, to lower the level of tax on the fuel that goes into the truck that delivers his popsicles, and to lower the federal sales tax which right now is between 11 per cent and 12 per cent on kitchen sinks.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

YOUTH

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the so-called youth spokesperson, the Minister of State for Youth, and it is very simple. Where is his program, his youth policy he promised on a number of occasions since he was appointed a year ago?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville is no doubt aware that for approximately a year, the Minister of State (Youth) has been operating within the Department of Employment and Immigration, that since that time the Canadian Government has been using 25 per cent of its Youth Innovation Program—that a $10 million initiative was announced with Canada's YMCA's, $4 million for Youth Employment Skills of Canada, that approximately half of the total Job Strategy budget—something like over $700 million are going to youth, and that moreover, youth unemployment in Canada declined 4.3 per cent since we came to power.

[English]

COMPREHENSIVE PROGRAM QUERY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. All of that sounds kind of sweet, but it does not answer the question. On March 3, March 11, and March 26, 1986, the Prime Minister promised a comprehensive program for youth in that fiscal year. Is this to be another of the Prime Minister's typical promises, one which will lose the Government yet more credibility?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friend is having difficulty absorbing the reality just set out that since September 17, 1984, youth unemployment has dropped by 4.3 per cent or 4.4 per cent; that some 840,000 new jobs have been created—

Mr. McCurdy: Where is the program?

Mr. Mulroney: Hundreds of millions of dollars are being expended specifically on programs devised by the Minister. There is hope, progress, and prosperity returning for the first time. Consider that there is more than a 4 per cent reduction in unemployment. The Hon. Member ought to be very proud of that on the one hand, and congratulating a remarkable young Minister of Youth on the other.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—FAMILY REUNIFICATION—ISSUANCE OF EXIT VISAS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park and I met with Mr. Tadeusz Mlynczak, Deputy Chairman of the Polish People's Republic. We discussed such subjects as how cultural ties could be strengthened between Canadians of Polish heritage and the citizens of Poland. The main subject discussed was the problem of exit visas and family reunification.

The Secretary of State was in Warsaw last month. How can relations between Canada and Poland be improved while, at the same time, bringing some pressure on the Polish Government to grant exit visas more quickly so that families can be reunited here in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Member for his question and for his interest in family reunification. I discussed that matter when I was in Warsaw. There are officials of the Government of Canada now in Poland discussing the conclusion of a consular agreement that would allow us to make more regular progress on family reunification questions. That is a priority of the Government which I know is shared by Members of the House.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

REVIEW COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee which was tabled today and which was extremely critical of the Security Intelligence Service and, in particular, the Counter-Subversion Branch.

The report states that too many Canadians are targeted for investigation by the Counter-Subversion Branch. The Security Intelligence Service has over 600,000 files on Canadians, over 30,000 in the counter-subversion area alone.

The report states that personal freedoms and privacy are seriously threatened. Rather than taking immediate action to protect the rights of innocent Canadians, the Minister is now proposing that another review to review the work of the review committee be implemented.

Would the Minister tell us whether he is prepared to take immediate action to adopt the recommendations of the report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee immediately in order to ensure that the rights and freedoms of individual Canadians are maintained?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious I agree with the recommendations of the SIRC report. I think they have done an excellent job for myself and for all Canadians. That is why I announced this morning the establishment of an independent review team to take a look at the recommendations contained in the SIRC report, and CSIS management and policies, with particular emphasis on the civilianization and counter-subversion concerns raised in that report.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, we do not need another review. We need action by this particular Minister.

Mr. Gauthier: Right.

Mr. Nunziata: It is obvious that this particular Minister is afraid to take action. He appears to be Ted Finn's puppet.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): The report states, and I quote from page 37:

> —CSIS is expending money and effort on too many counter-subversion targets and it is intruding on the lives and activities of too many Canadians—

It is intruding on the lives and activities of too many Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nunziata: That is the report. The review committee makes recommendations.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nunziata: In view of the serious nature of the problem and in view of the excellent nature of the recommendations of the review committee, rather than again reviewing that particular area will the Solicitor General take immediate action to implement the recommendations of the review committee? I should add—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nunziata: —that the review committee took over a year to review the counter-subversion area of the Security Intelligence Service.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious I have taken action, and very speedy action, by announcing the formation of this team to implement the recommendations contained in the report. If I may quote from the report itself, on page 3 the SIRC committee stated that CSIS:

—is an important national institution worthy of continued public support.

The dedication and professionalism of CSIS employees is impressed upon us anew at every contact we have with them from one end of the country to the other.

And I agree with them.

MANDATE OF INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Solicitor General. The report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee tabled today states that CSIS has found that a non-violent attack on U.S. foreign policy is a threat to the security of Canada. Does the Minister not recognize that the report by SIRC constitutes a very serious and damning criticism of CSIS's operations, of its failure to distinguish between subversion and dissent?

Will the Minister immediately instruct Ted Finn, the Director of CSIS, to stop spying on law-abiding Canadians who happen to disagree with United States foreign policy? Will the Minister tell him to stick to the mandate of CSIS?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, there is no evidence whatsoever in the report that we are spying on people outside the mandate of CSIS. I can assure the Hon. Member and all Members of the House that CSIS acts within its mandate as contained in Section 2 of the Act. Mr. Atkey, the chairman of SIRC, in response to a question this morning, said he found no evidence whatsoever of any warrants being issued with respect to subversive activities contrary to its mandate.

Mr. Shields: Don't let that stop you, Svend.

Mr. Robinson: Perhaps the Minister should understand that you don't even need a warrant to spy on the kinds of agencies about which SIRC expressed concern. The Minister should be aware of that.

INFILTRATION OF UNION MOVEMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): My supplementary is this, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister confirm whether a certain Marc Boivin, of the CSIS, has infiltrated the union movement in Quebec, more specifically the CSN, and in the affirmative, how can the Minister justify such an attack against a democratic organization in Quebec? How can he justify such an unacceptable attack in a free society?

[English]

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member well knows, CSIS, for security reasons, never identifies publicly who its sources are. But I can assure the Hon. Member that CSIS would not target a labour union because it is a labour union. That would be improper and illegal under Section 2 of the Act. It is not within its mandate and there is no evidence it has acted outside its mandate.

COINAGE

INTRODUCTION OF NEW DOLLAR COIN

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. On November 16, 1984, I asked the Minister's predecessor in the House if the Government would proceed with plans to produce a new Canadian one dollar coin. My request was granted and tomorrow that Canadian one dollar coin is being introduced.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: That's how it works, you guys.

Mrs. Collins: That's right. Considering the problems which have—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Take your time, Mary.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will put her question.

Mrs. Collins: Considering the problems which have plagued the introduction of such coins in the United Kingdom and the United States, can the Minister assure the House and advise us that she is making adequate plans to ensure a successful launch of the new coin and that it will be well accepted by all Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the media publicized the decision concerning this new coin extensively. Canadians have welcomed this initiative of our Government. Most of them are impatient for this very beautiful coin to become generally available.

We have prepared a promotion campaign in cooperation with the financial institutions and this coin will be put in circulation as early as tomorrow.

I am convinced that all the Hon. Members will applaud this Government initiative.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

BILL C-74—SIZE OF GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Minister of the Environment last Friday introduced with great fanfare the new Environment Protection Bill. But if one looks at the money the Government has allocated to the Bill, one finds only $37 million divided amongst three Departments over a period of five years. Why so little money? Why not give teeth to this very important measure?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Environmental Protection Act is an Act which the Hon. Member has encouraged the Minister of the Environment to bring forward. He has done that with the co-operation of the Cabinet. The Prime Minister had environmental protection in the Throne Speech. I would think the Hon. Member would have wanted to commend the Minister of the Environment for an Act which the Hon. Member, as the former Minister, was unable to get through his own Government.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Davenport, a short supplementary, please.

Mr. Caccia: I would do that if this were not a form of window-dressing.

REDUCTION IN PERSON-YEARS WITHIN DEPARTMENTS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): In order to be enforced this Bill needs teeth. In order to have teeth it needs funds. Does the Minister not realize that his own Department is losing 22 person-years in the Health Protection Branch this year and the Minister of the Environment is losing 103 person-years this year? How can the Department charge and collect the fines this Bill is supposed to impose on the polluters?

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): It is just window-dressing.

• (1500)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member says that it is window-dressing. He was not even given any building materials when he was Minister.

This Government has brought forward the Environmental Protection Act. We know that within the three Departments we can handle the Act. We also know that on the legislative basis in the Act we will go after polluters.

The question now is whether the Hon. Member will be true to his words of the past when he said that he would support the type of legislation that has been introduce. Or will he simply be against it? He always seems to have this type of knee-jerk reaction. If this Government brings in good legislation he has to be against it because it was this Government that brought it in in the first place.

BANKS AND BANKING

CHARTERED BANKS—REPORTED OVERCHARGING ON LOANS TO FARMERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance who on March 20 assured me that he was conducting an inquiry into possible interest overcharges on farm accounts by the banks. He assured the Hon. Member for Algoma on June 8 that he would table a report or have a report that week. What has happened to this report? Does the great length of time that seems to have elapsed since the study by the Inspector General indicate that the overcharges were even greater than we had first feared?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this question from the Hon. Member. The report was submitted to me last week. I have examined it. It is clear from the number of instances that this particular matter is best handled by the courts.

We have had one case in which the banks were found out of step. We have found three cases before the courts where the banks were found to be correct in what they did. Therefore each particular case seems to be individual and distinct. It seems to me best that this matter be handled by the courts.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister tell us whether he expects to change that stance given the fact that there seems to be several hundreds cases now being prepared to be put before the courts? Rather than tie the courts up, will he not change his stance and perhaps intervene if it appears that the courts are beginning to rule with more consistency down the line?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how one could change one's stance. One simply lets these cases, as serious as they are, proceed before the courts. If there were a consistent pattern of judgments in favour, for example, of farmers against the banks, then it seems to me that that would strengthen their case against the banks, and government intervention would be unnecessary. I do not see how government intervention would help at all in this instance.

THE COMMONWEALTH

FIJI ISLANDS—SITUATION FOLLOWING MAY COUP

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As a member of the Commonwealth of Nations Canada continues to play a vital leadership role in that august body. A member of that body, the Fiji Islands, recently underwent significant turmoil.

Will the Minister advise the House of developments in Fiji subsequent to the May 14 coup? Does he believe it is safe for Canadians to travel to the Fiji Islands on business or pleasure?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity last week to meet with a representative of the Governor General of Fiji who outlined to me the plans being undertaken by the Governor General to restore both a sense of national reconciliation and functioning parliamentary democracy in Fiji. In our judgment those plans have a good prospect of success. I am pleased to take this opportunity to indicate the full support of Canada for those plans by the Governor General.

With regard to the safety of Canadians, I have looked into the matter. I see no reason at all for any Canadian to have any concern about travelling to Fiji.

Mr. Speaker: The last question will be by the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—CONTRA ATTACK ON CANADIAN AID PROJECT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On June 1 I asked the Minister to protest the attack by the U.S.-backed Contras on the Canadian Farmers for Peace project in Nicaragua and to facilitate a resolution in the House demanding a stop to attacks on civilian development projects. Now that the Minister has met with U.S. Secretary Shultz on this matter is he willing to introduce the appropriate resolution today or tomorrow?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated I would in response to questions in the House, I raised that matter specifically with Mr. Shultz when we met in Reykjavik. I have asked for and have not yet seen details which the Secretary of State of the United States undertook to give me with respect to information as they have it regarding that particular attack.

I will not be in a position to accede to the Hon. Member's request today or tomorrow, and at least not before I have had an opportunity to see for myself the evidence that is promised to be forthcoming.

ATTACKS ON AGRICULTURAL CO-OPERATIVES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister knows, the situation has not improved in Nicaragua. Last week two more agricultural co-ops were attacked. The peace talks proposed by President Arias of Costa Rica were cancelled due to pressure from the United States. Cannot the Government and this Parliament do more to stop the shameful and cruel interventions in that little country?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the next step in the Arias proposals has at least been delayed. I do not think the cause of that delay is as clear as the Hon. Member suggests.

My view has been, and remains, that it is important for us as the Government of Canada to focus upon actual things that we can do rather than loud protests that we might raise. That is why we have worked as hard as we have through the Contadora process.

However, I must say that I was shocked by the attack upon a Canadian aid project that involved, among other things, the loss of life of children. There should be no doubt in the minds of the United States Government about the abhorrence on the part of Canadians of actions of that kind.

Mr. Waddell: Short supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, the time for Question Period has expired.

I wish to advise the House that I have received a notice of a question of privilege from the Hon. Member for Skeena which I will hear. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East will be raising a point of order following that. I will then be giving a ruling on a matter that arose several weeks ago.

PRIVILEGE

UNANIMOUS REQUEST BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of a motion passed by the Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry on January 22 of this year. Evidence was given more than a year ago by the Nishga Tribal Council. There was an interdepartmental subcommittee struck involving a number of Ministers in the House and their deputies. A number of recommendations came from that.

On January 22 of this year the Nishga Tribal Council appeared again as requested as witnesses before the Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry. As a result of the evidence the committee unanimously passed the following motion:

On motion of Jim Fulton, it was agreed—That the Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry have established a committee at the Deputy Minister level to report no later than June 15, 1987 with the specific objective of obtaining funds for the Nisga'a people to purchase, develop and operate a tree farm license tenure in the Nass Valley; and that letters be sent from this Committee to the Minister of State for Forestry and the Ministers of Indian Affairs, Fisheries and Oceans, Regional Industrial Expansion, the Environment and Employment and Immigration to direct their Deputies to achieve these objectives.

On motion of John MacDougall, it was agreed—That in relation to this Deputy Ministerial Committee's investigation, Bob Brisco and Jim Fulton be offered the opportunity to accompany officials to the Nass Valley.

I finally got the letters that I required from the Clerk of the Standing Committee on Friday, which was June 26, some 11 days after the committee had directed that the interdepartmental committee report back to the committee. But June 15 came and went without a report from such a committee.

The Hon. Benoît Bouchard wrote to the committee and said:

I would be most happy to appoint Mr. Gaetan Lussier to set up a departmental sub-committee.

• (1510)

The Hon. Tom Siddon, on May 29, 1987, wrote:

I am of the opinion that my Department should not participate in the review.

The Hon. Michel Côté wrote, and again I will quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it would be more appropriate were the Hon. Member to refer to the Ministers by their Ministry.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Côté) wrote:

Regarding your Standing Committee's proposal to set up a new sub-committee, I would be happy to assign representatives from my Department.

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. McMillan) wrote, on June 18:

[Translation]

"As you know, the former Interdepartmental Sub-Committee was presided by a representative from the Ministry of Forestry and Mines. These last few months, officials from this department have taken part in the discussions between the Tribal Council and the Department of Forests of British Columbia. It seems that progress has been made in meeting the claims of the Council.

I have asked the Environment Canada officials responsible for this matter to monitor the situation closely and to be available for sitting on the new committee if it is established."

[English]

The Minister of Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) wrote:

I would like to suggest to the Standing Committee that, given these developments, it would be premature to reconvene the inter-departmental group.

And I attach the full letter.

The Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight) never even bothered to write back to the committee, after five months.

When a standing committee takes a vote, Mr. Speaker—which, in this case, was unanimous, with all Parties represented—on a motion, surely there is some parliamentary value to it.

In this case, not a single Minister, not a single Deputy Minister in five months, bothered to convene the requested interdepartmental committee. In the case of the Minister of Indian Affairs, he contemptuously refused to even respond to the committee.

In this situation, I feel that my ability to carry on my duties as a Member of Parliament have been thwarted, and my constituents in this case have been treated, at best, undemocratically.

This matter surely should be directed to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure, where Ministers and bureaucrats can be held to task for such a blatant abuse of MPs of all Parties.

The final point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise is that the Nishga Tribal Council waited for one full year for the first interdepartmental deputy minister task force report. That report was incomplete. The committee then unanimously passed a vote requesting the restructuring of this subcommittee. During this period of time, the Nishga Tribal Council travelled to Montreal, where they met with Mr. George Pettie, the Chief Executive Officer of the Repap. As well, they have had meetings in Victoria, with the provincial Minister of Forests, and a whole variety of meetings related to financing the acquisition of the Nass Valley portion of Tree Farm Licence No. 1.

To be slapped in the face in this way, by five Ministries and by the Deputy Ministers involved, clearly constitutes a question of privilege. It is the kind of matter that should be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure, so that we can hear from the Ministers or the Deputy Ministers, who do not even reply to the correspondence and the unanimous vote of the standing committee. I think it constitutes a very serious threat to the reforms of this House and to the ability of any Member to carry out work on behalf of his or her constituents.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will make a very short procedural argument only. I refer the Chair, as we have on many occasions, to Beauchesne, Article 76, where we have the following:

> Breaches of privileges in committee may be dealt with only by the House itself on report from the committee.

I refer you to the decision, on December 4, 1973, of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux. The issue in that particular case was, can the conduct of committee chairman be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure as a question of privilege? The answer was that it could not. I quote from the reasons:

> It is well-established practice that committee proceedings cannot be brought into consideration or debate in the House except by way of a report from the committee . . . Finally, there are doubts as to the advisability of having proceedings of one committee investigated by another committee of the House.

I also refer you to the decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of May 10, 1972. I am looking at the reasons given by the Speaker for finding that there was not a question of privilege in relation to the issue then raised. He said:

> There is a long-established rule, and it is a tradition of the House, that matters before a committee are dealt with by that committee, and if any difficulty arises during the course of the proceedings of any hearings held by the committee, this should be indicated either in the committee's report or in the course of the debate in the House on the report submitted.

My first point, Mr. Speaker, is that there has been no report from the committee to the House which could have been concurred in by the House of Commons.

The second point upon which the Hon. Member's question of privilege fails is the matter of whether or not the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure should sit in judgment of what has been done, or not done, in another committee.

I refer you to the decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on May 8, 1974. The issue in this case was, can the proceedings of a committee be the subject-matter of a question of privilege? Can the conduct of a witness before a committee be examined by the House as a question of privilege?

Again, it was decided in the negative. I quote from the reasons given:

> —it might be very unwise for the House to decide that proceedings in one committee be investigated by another committee. It is not procedurally acceptable to raise a proceeding of a standing committee in the House under the heading of privilege except as a report.

And on May 26, 1975—and I believe this was a ruling by Mr. Speaker Jerome—we had yet another question of privilege in relation to proceedings in a committee turned down. Again, I quote from the reasons:

> There is a well-established practice that the Chair ought not to sit as a court of appeal in respect to the proceedings in a standing committee . . . In that case the procedure would be to either appeal the chairman's ruling to the committee as a whole, or to raise a debate on a motion of censure by a Member. The Committee on Privileges and Elections should not be allowed to become a court of appeal for the proceedings of other standing committees.

While I may sympathize with my colleague in his frustration in not being able to get the committee to act, I submit his question of privilege fails on the grounds that, number one, there has not been a report submitted by that committee to the House; and number two, even if that were to happen, we still have the issue as to whether or not the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure should sit in judgment of the proceedings, or non-proceedings, of another committee.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend was trying to be helpful, but all three of the rulings he cited, the two by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux and the one by Mr. Speaker Jerome, were on matters related to the proceedings in a committee.

If the point being raised were in relation to that, I would agree. I looked at Beauchesne and at some of the previous rulings. The point I am raising is that the committee conducted two years of intensive hearings. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines (Mr. Greenaway) is here. He knows that we investigated the matter of the tree farm licence more carefully than it has ever been investigated by this House or by a committee of this House. As well, it has been investigated by the ombudsman, by lawyers—it has been investigated to death.

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that the committee, quite properly, had a Deputy Ministers' group from five different departments struck 18 months ago, which group conducted a process which was found to be incomplete by members of the committee and by the Nishga Tribal Council. We recalled the witnesses from British Columbia. They came before the committee and gave another day's evidence. At the end of the evidence, we then voted unanimously that those five Ministries instruct the Deputy Ministers to reconstitute the committee and, between January 22 and June 15, re-evaluate the Tree Farm Licence No. 1 proposal and come up with a funding proposal to allow the project to proceed.

What in fact has happened is that one Minister chose not to even respond; one on May 29, decided that he did not want to participate; and—

Mr. Speaker: I might be able to save the Hon. Member some time. I think the Hon. Member made his point extremely well in his original intervention. I have the distinction that the Hon. Member is putting forward, and I will consider it.

I am always reluctant to close off interventions on an important matter, as this obviously is, but I am mindful of the other debate that is going on in this place, and I am wondering whether Hon. Members can accept that I have the point, and I will bring it back to the Chamber before we adjourn tomorrow.

The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), on a point of order.

• (1520)

EXCELLENCE OF CANADIAN WINES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was in the great riding of Niagara Falls where I had the pleasure of enjoying some beautiful Canadian champagne. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, my surprise when today, in response to a question, I heard the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) referring to Canadian wine from the Niagara Peninsula as "Canadian bath water".

I believe it is an indication of the Government's attitude. I am not surprised that the Minister, after having been lobbied vigorously by the Niagara Grape Growers Action Committee to at start at least getting Canadian wine into Canadian embassies, has failed to do so. Quite obviously his elitist Gucci taste does not include drinking the great wine of the Niagara Peninsula.

I see that the Minister is back in his place. I would like to hear him respond. I hope silent members on the Conservative side representing the Niagara Peninsula will also add their voices in concern to set the Minister straight on the beautiful nature of Canadian champagne.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order, as you will undoubtedly rule, but let me take the opportunity to indicate that the use by the Department of External Affairs at home and abroad of Canadian wine has increased dramatically since the election of the Progressive Conservative Government. Its use is considerably more extensive than it was when the country was unfortunately in the hands of the Liberal Government with its Gucci and French wine tastes.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair can completely understand why any Hon. Member who comes from a wine producing part of the country would seek zealously to affirm the fine reputation of Canadian wines.

The Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) has indeed indicated in his response that the fine reputation of Canadian wines is accepted by his own Department and that Canadian wines are being used to a greater extent than at some other time.

I think the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) would both agree that this is an interesting matter of information for Members and of debate, but not a point of order.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I rise very briefly on a separate point of order.

I accept Your Honour's ruling that this is not a point of order, but you will understand that this debate will be fermenting for many months to come.

Mr. Speaker: I might indicate that the Chair has already had a taste of it.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH STANDING ORDER 99(2)—MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have a ruling of interest to the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and some other Hon. Members.

[Translation]

I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised on May 26 by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) about the Government's response to a committee report. This is not the first such complaint, and while it does not come under the heading of privilege itself, I thought it appropriate to have this matter fully aired. The Hon. Member for Nickel Belt was not alone in feeling injured and the taking of firm positions on this matter was not restricted to a single party, as shown by the intervention of the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais).

[English]

The issue, while it cannot be classed as one of privilege, constitutes a valid point of order as it calls for an interpretation of a standing order. Standing Order 99(2) reads:

> Within 150 days of the presentation of a report from a standing or special committee, the government shall, upon the request of the committee, table a comprehensive response thereto.

The Hon. Member for Nickel Belt claimed that the Government had failed to provide a comprehensive response to the report concerned, and his case appeared to hinge on the interpretation of the word "comprehensive", which he described as the operative word.

[Translation]

I mentioned the statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) on May 15. We concluded in these terms, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank each member of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration for their work on the Unemployment Insurance Program.
> Their report was most helpful in our consideration of not only the current program but the other proposals for reform we received. The committee suggested we consider its recommendations as a package and we have done so.
> I am tabling today a letter to the Chairman of the Standing Committee reflecting the contents of my statement which will serve as the Government's response to the Report in accordance with the Standing Orders.

It seems that those paragraphs and the letter tabled in this House were the response of the Government to the Committee report.

[English]

This is the point at which the Chair finds itself in some difficulty. It is not for the Chair to determine what constitutes a comprehensive response as this would be tantamount to judging the acceptability of the response. Clearly the Chair could not examine every committee report and every government response in order to make this determination. The nature of the response must be left to the discretion of the Government and, if Hon. Members are dissatisfied, there are avenues available through which they can pursue the matter.

A similar point of order was raised on April 18, 1986, and Mr. Speaker Bosley, in his ruling of April 22, indicated as I have just done, "that the Chair would be in a very difficult position were it called upon to rule on the quality of government responses".

[Translation]

After having simply expressed their dissatisfaction, the Hon. Members for Nickel Belt and La Prairie may very possibly still feel that their grievance is well-founded. It is certainly possible for them, thanks to the parliamentary reform which has extended the powers of the standing committees, to raise this issue at the Standing Committee on Employment and Immigration, which is empowered to examine such a grievance.

[English]

Members are entitled to express dissatisfaction with government responses to committee reports, as with ministerial answers to questions, but such complaints can only be pursued through the political process. They should definitely not be raised as questions of privilege and, even when raised as points of order, there is little that the Chair can do except allow the matter to be brought to the attention of the House. This has been done, the complaint has been aired with considerable eloquence, and it could be further pursued by the committee should it see fit.

Having said that, I would point out that obviously the rule must have had some meaning. When Hon. Members feel that that meaning has not been met, then I point out that time is taken in this place because Hon. Members may feel that they have no other place to go but to air their grievance before the Chair.

As I have indicated, the committee has other ways to pursue this, but I also point out that there ought to be in my view every effort made to try to follow the plain meaning of the wording of a rule.

POINT OF ORDER

INDIAN ACT, 1985—FILING OF REPORT BY MINISTER—MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I shall now deal with the point of order raised on June 26 by the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner), since it concerns a related although not identical matter. He argued that the report to Parliament tabled by the Hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight) on the implementation of the 1985 changes to the Indian Act failed to meet the requirements of the statute on two counts. He claimed that it did not provide the complete response required by the statute and that the standing committee of this House to which the report was referred is not the appropriate committee.

I will deal with the second point first. The Act refers to a committee of Parliament, and the Hon. Member contends that this can only mean a special joint committee of both House appointed ad hoc to consider the report.

While the interpretation of statutes is not a function of the Chair, I think it can be said that any committee of this House or of the other place, or a joint committee, must be a committee of Parliament. Therefore I can find no procedural violation in the reference of the report to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development pursuant to Standing Order 67(4).

I would suggest, however, that the committee has a clear duty to examine the report to enable the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior and other members of the committee to express any concerns they may have in the light of the report.

• (1530)

As to the adequacy or inadequacy of the response provided by the report, I can only repeat what I said earlier in ruling on the question of privilege of the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). The Chair cannot pass judgment on the contents of any document tabled in this House. It cannot determine the adequacy of a report tabled pursuant to an Act of Parliament any more than it can determine whether or not a government response to a report of a parliamentary committee is comprehensive. Such complaints can only be pursued through the political process. Nevertheless, as I think I have indicated earlier in this judgment, I recognize that it is very important that they should be pursued, and in this case the appropriate forum in which to do so is the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development to which the report stands deferred.

I think I can add this, that rules have to have some meaning. While it is certainly true and procedurally correct, it is not the place for the Chair to interpret all the words in every rule that we have. It would be very helpful for the business of this place if all Hon. Members try to put as reasonable an interpretation on those words as is possible.

I thank Hon. Members for their interventions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): At two o'clock two minutes were left in the time allowed for the speech of the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry). The Hon. Member.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, the death penalty makes it harder to convict murderers. Capital punishment will make the streets more dangerous because juries are reluctant to convict if death is the penalty. A Department of the Solicitor General Saskatchewan Government study showed that from 1960 to 1974, when capital punishment was still on the books, the over-all rate of conviction was 10 per cent. From 1976 to 1982 that rate rose to 20 per cent.

Carrying out the death penalty will cost the taxpayers more than keeping a murderer in prison because when capital punishment is enforced the legal appeal process is exhausted to the limit, all the costs are borne by the taxpayer and the costs of social disruption is borne by all of us.

Some people feel that the death penalty is needed to protect police and prison guards, but more police were killed on duty in Canada when capital punishment existed. It is important to note that other occupations are at a far greater risk of death, including construction, fishing, forestry—at 50 times the risk— and mining. Instead of adopting the death penalty we should have adopted as a collective and personal responsibility of all individuals and society as a whole, the safety of all workers, including police and prison guards.

Countries with the death penalty have the worst human rights violations. Iran, Iraq, Chile, China, South Africa and the Soviet Union all resort to capital punishment. The rate in the United States, the only western country with the death penalty, is eight times that of England, six times that of New Zealand and triple that of Canada. In capital punishment countries other violence, a cycle of violence, is the order of the day. We find the profound barbarism, enforced abortions, public executions, the horrors of the Gulag, executions for holding the Baha'i faith, torture, imprisonment of children, death squads, amputations of limbs for theft offences, Saturday night specials, lynch mobs and the Ku Klux Klan. By executing murderers we do not say that "life is not cheap here", we identify Canada with the countries where life truly is cheap.

The campaign for the death penalty, Madam Speaker, ignores the real problems. It ignores the inequities, the inconsistencies and the loopholes in the criminal justice, the parole and penal systems. The death penalty ignores serious action against violent crime, the roots of which can be found in the vicious cycles of poverty and alienation. As a society, we must devote far more of our resources to education, treatment and direct attack on the cause rather than the results. We must improve treatment facilities, emphasize and promote faith as the basis for life, support crime prevention weeks and crime prevention measures, interpret and use the studies of criminogenesis which we have. We must campaign against crime not only as a problem but as a symptom.

Capital punishment is an anecdotal, cathartic, irrational, institutionalized response to a systemic, institutionalized malaise. The death penalty is a profoundly defective instrument, as either punishment or sanction. It is irrevocable, irrecompensible and is biased. It is socially divisive and it is ultimately self defeating in that it equates the punisher with the punished. The issue is not whether the cold-blooded murderer deserves to die; it is not that the punishment should fit the crime. The issue is that the treatment must respond to the problem, and the major question is, of course, should the state kill? By killing deliberately the state proclaims itself inerrant, but it degrades itself to the offender's level. It denies the possibility of rehabilitation. It commits itself to divide itself against itself. It raises itself above the moral law. It sends its servants to kill deliberately; minutely, systematically, planning to commit the very crime it pretends to rebuke.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, capital punishment is not a path leading to the future but a detour to an atavistic past without hope. The fact that we have yet to achieve civilization should never be an excuse for reverting to barbarism.

[English]

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, this is a debate in which I would prefer not to participate; I wish there weren't a need, but there is a need. I have a social responsibility, a responsibility to my constituents and a responsibility to myself to speak out on this very important issue. Briefly I will be covering the following: why I have solicited the views of my constituents, my personal opinion on this subject, the question of deterrence, the concern about our judicial system, the area of innocent victims and the ambiguity of religious arguments.

It is rather ironic that we might not be here debating this subject if, in fact, the last vote which was held in 1976 had been truly a free vote. This brings me to outline why I have elected to vote on this issue according to the wishes of my constituents. Frankly, they felt cheated in 1976 because the Bill passed by only a mere six votes. Had there not been the pressure on government Members to vote according to their leader, then in all probability the Bill would have been defeated, and today it would have been the abolitionists pushing to debate this important issue.

As I indicated a few moments ago, I will be voting according to the wishes of my constituents. I do not consider this abdicating my responsibility as a Member of Parliament.

Prior to the election the feeling about which I have just spoken surfaced. Many of my constituents approached me and wanted to know how I would vote on the issue. During the election campaign I made a promise to both the abolitionists and the retentionists that, regardless of my own personal feelings on the subject of capital punishment, I would vote according to their wishes. Frankly, this is an election promise I intend to fulfil without reservation.

I have had numerous personal conversations, have conducted two surveys, had live phone-in shows and town hall meetings on the subject, and there is no question that by far the largest majority of the constituents in my riding of Etobicoke North, from youth to seniors, want this Parliament to re-examine the reinstatement of capital punishment. I can honestly say that at no time did I get the feeling from these people that they were revengeful, rather they are citizens concerned about our justice system. They were concerned about the potential innocent victim of the serial killer or the terrorist.

Before the election I made my views known to both the abolitionists and retentionists that I favoured the reinstatement of capital punishment for some specific crimes. Although I intend to honour my election promise, I have, as a concerned citizen and as a Member of Parliament, listened to the arguments with an open mind. I must state now that I still hold to my original view. My personal position is clear. It is taken out of a concern for the sons and daughters of those who might become victims of serial killers, out of a conviction that I personally feel that when someone elects to take a life, the punishment should fit the crime.

I clearly support the reinstatement of capital punishment for a certain specified and narrow range of crimes. These include the most heinous type of first-degree murder, such as serial killing, contract killing, rape-killing and murdering in cold blood during a terrorist act. I am not, and I repeat not, in support of capital punishment for murder resulting from emotional situations like domestic quarrels known as crimes of passion. Nor am I in favour of capital punishment for those who are convicted on circumstantial evidence only. I will touch on this a little later.

A number of abolitionists attempted to focus on and draw a parallel between the debate we are having here and the recent debate carried out in the British Parliament. One thing which has not been clearly brought to the attention of the Canadian public is that the British vote was on the reinstatement of capital punishment for murder, period. I consider that to be too broad and would have had difficulty supporting it.

I now wish to address the issue of deterrence. I will not dwell on it but I would like to make a couple of comments. It has been clearly brought forth in this debate that each side can support its argument pro or con, depending on the time frame selected to draw figures from. Therefore, I honestly do not think that there is a definitive answer for the question of whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent. I will not waste my time in a statistical battle because, quite frankly, I doubt that even if capital punishment were to be proven to be a deterrent, any of the abolitionists would change their views.

Earlier I spoke of being in favour of capital punishment for serial killers and I spoke of potential innocent victims. I would, however, like to stress that capital punishment would certainly have been a deterrent to Allan Sweeney in the killing of Celia Ruygrok. It would have been the ultimate deterrent, not only in this case but in the eight other recent cases of repeat killers.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart), sent a questionnaire to 1,231 individuals serving life terms for murder in federal penitentiaries. Of the 303 responses he received on the question of whether capital punishment would have acted as a deterrent, 37 said yes. That means that 37 people would be alive today if there was capital punishment.

I would like to read a letter from one of my constituents dealing with brutal murderers like Sweeney and Olson. He wrote:

> With every right goes an obligation. It's society's preoccupation with "rights" divorced from "obligations" that is giving us a warped view of justice. The Government has a clear duty to govern and keep society safe from those who take life for their own ends rather than defend life and the right to life of all—

I would like now to turn for a moment to the concerns I have heard expressed during this debate about our justice system. In my view, and in the view of most Canadians, our system is in need of serious reform and certainly needs a bit more common sense. A life sentence of 25 years does not mean that any longer.

During this debate, I have heard a number of Hon. Members address the specific subject of justice reform. However, these same Hon. Members were with the Government that brought us mandatory supervision, something which this Government had to return last summer to toughen up. These Hon. Members were with the Government that gave us the Young Offenders Act, another piece of legislation that had to be toughened by this Government. These were pieces of legislation which made our justice system more lenient for the convicted.

The reason for my reservation is that I genuinely do not know at this point in time whether or not the view expressed on this subject by those Hon. Members who are mainly abolitionists is a commitment today because of a belief or rather because of convenience. I sincerely hope it is the former, particularly if this motion should be defeated.

Earlier I indicated I would address the matter of the innocent victim, but I consider this matter to be twofold. There is the possibility of the innocent being convicted and as well there are the innocent relatives of the murdered who are left with grief for the rest of their lives. If I personally were to pick anything to which I have given the greatest profound thought, it would be this subject.

We cannot be certain that the system will not at some point allow an innocent person to be convicted. To minimize the possibility of this, I do not support capital punishment for those who are convicted purely on circumstantial evidence. As well, I support the idea of a double jury vote. The jury would vote once to determine guilt or innocence and a second time to determine whether or not to recommend a capital sentence.

Earlier I referred to eight victims of serial killers. Frankly, I would not want to trade the lives of these eight innocent victims on the chance that one day our justice system might make one mistake.

I want to turn for a moment to the tragic side of this issue that we all too often hastily dismiss and that is the situation of the families of victims of murder. They are truly victims because they live with their grief for the rest of their lives.

A great deal of attention has been paid to the letter written by the mother of Alison Parrot, but I would like to read a letter I received from Mr. Donald Sullivan of Ajax whose daughter was brutally murdered. He said:

> It has been said that execution will not help the victim, well my family are victims also. When my daughter's killer himself was killed we felt not joy, not satisfaction, but relief. Why relief? We sat in court in Whitby, Ontario and heard doctors say that Shannon is the type of killer who, once he kills will kill again given the chance. We now know this will not happen to another young girl in the future. For this reason we felt relief.

The final topic I want to discuss is that of religion. This is somewhat like the deterrence debate, because each side can use biblical quotations to support their cases. The question I have had to answer personally is why am I at odds with my own church.

I do not necessarily think that the belief in God of the leaders of my church or of any other church, synagogue or temple is necessarily any stronger than mine or than that of any other Member of the House. I do not think that their being leaders of a church gives them a particular divine guidance on this moral issue, and I think that many church leaders are finding themselves at odds with the vast majority of their thoughtful and religious members.

I would like to take a moment to read a letter written by a member of the Second Christian Reform Church in Etobicoke. The letter reads:

> The average person does not have the money to produce slick brochures nor the chance to wrap their personal opinions with the names of committees and church agencies, but I would urge you to listen, please, to the voice of the long-suffering Canadian public, the majority of whom want capital punishment restored. We have confidence that the courts and Government will act with utmost restraint in this matter to ensure that justice is done by meting out capital punishment with due care.

As a member of the United Church, I have a great deal of difficulty reconciling the church's stand on the abortion issue with its stand on the capital punishment issue. This was brought to the forefront when I received a letter from the Reverend Robin Smith on May 8 in which the United Church's stand on the abortion issue was outlined. He wrote:

> While life is sacred, it is not as many of our national policies and practices illustrate, of absolute value.

• (1550)

It seems to me that my church is saying that the life of an innocent unborn baby is not of absolute value whereas the life of a convicted murderer, rapist, or serial killer is. To me this is unacceptable.

Maybe some day our justice system for murderers will mean incarceration for life, maybe our prisons will become escape-proof, maybe medical science will be able to guarantee rehabilitation of the hardened killer. Then, and only then, will I probably become an abolitionist. Until then I will think of the innocent victims; I will think of those young girls brutally raped and murdered. Until then, I think the punishment should fit the crime.

For those and other reasons, Madam Speaker, I intend to vote for the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grondin (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take part in this very important debate.

To me, it is a debate that will have far-reaching consequences, and I think the Canadian people have a right to expect the same attitude of all Members of this House.

I hope that each and everyone of us is conscious of the major impact the outcome of this debate will have on our country's judicial system.

There is no room for uncertainty in this debate. We must decide whether the State shall or shall not end the lives of those who are convicted of murdering an individual. This is not just another measure that can be reversed even after our decision has been made. Once that decision has been made by us all, and once judges and juries decide in favour of an execution sentence, and when finally, the murderers are executed, the decision is final and irreversible.

Today, a tremendous responsibility is put on our shoulders. This is more than just another legislative measure. It challenges the whole philosophy of our judiciary system. It is also a study of the moral values that we, as parliamentarians, should convey to all Canadians and especially to Canadian youth.

In Canada, capital punishment has been the subject of more or less heated debate for the past seventy years. And I imagine the question will be reviewed regularly in this House for many more years, whatever the outcome of the present debate may be.

This realization, however, should not minimize the importance we should give today to this issue. We are a society in constant evolution. Step by step, most of the time forward but sometimes also backward, we are constantly moving towards higher ideals. Our decision concerning capital punishment is part of this slow process. This time, are we going to take a step forward towards a legal system stamped with justice and concerned as much about respecting the right to live as protecting individuals? A legal system which through research and new experiences will compensate for the flaws which exist in the current system?

That is what I hope for very strongly and from the bottom of my heart, Madam Speaker.

I, for one, am far from having lost all hope of finding a human, yet practical, solution to this vital problem. For this reason, I will vote against reinstating capital punishment.

Our society is quite justified in wondering about the causes and effects of crime, as well as the ways to remedy them. It has every reason to consider that 630 murders a year warrant the improvement of prevention, protection, and compensation measures.

But for anyone to brandish capital punishment as the sole remedy to all our ills is immoral, useless and demagogic. On the moral level, it is not less justifiable for the state to take life than it is for individual citizens. To give the state the mandate to take away life is the same thing as killing somebody for personal vengeance. Some people have a tendency to forget this and find comfortable solace in the thought that a legislation exists to that effect.

Let us make no mistake about it—capital punishment is legal murder, nothing less!

Whatever the terms used by speakers to socially justify capital punishment, the outcome is the same. They are after the blood of those who killed.

It is not surprising then that more and more Canadians are wondering if capital punishment is indeed a solution or rather a pretence to turn attention away from the inefficiency of the correctional system in rehabilitating violent inmates.

I would be curious to know how far supporters of reinstating capital punishment would go to defend their choice.

Will you be a volunteer to serve as hangman? To introduce the poison syringe into a vein? To turn on the power to the neuron burning electric chair?

Before taking a position, this is what we should be ready to ask ourselves.

In another line of thought, we cannot accept that Canadian society meet violence with violence. The State should set an example by recognizing the sanctity of human life in all cases. Meeting violence with violence is only legitimizing the latter.

Capital punishment is still viewed by some as an effective deterrent to prevent crime and maintain law and order.

But the experience in western countries shows the best bulwark against violence is social and economic progress and the development of human rights.

As far as capital punishment is concerned, it only adds to individual violence another kind of violence—state violence.

We all feel a sense of horror and repulsion about the taking of human life. Some foul crimes are particularly more repugnant to us. That is why we want justice to be done and the authors of such crimes to be punished.

However, we must not forget that one of the main objectives of justice if to rehabilitate rather than eliminate a person. The hope of rehabilitation is not to have pity, but rather to respect human life.

The death penalty does not get to the causes, the roots of human misery, only its effects. It liberates people with good conscience from the obligation of pursuing further research and action for the improvement of the quality of life for all citizens.

Many of those who use violence had and unhappy childhood which prevented them from becoming responsible citizens.

The first thing is to try to understand, even though it is sometimes difficult.

As many other members, I received a letter in which Mrs. Lesley G. Parrot, of Summerhill Avenue, in Toronto, urged us to take her deep conviction into consideration and refuse reinstatement of capital punishment.

If it is painful for each of us to learn through the newspapers or television about the murder of a child, older people or a police officer, try to imagine what must be the reaction of a parent, a brother, a sister or a friend of the victim.

We would find it easy to understand at first if a desire for revenge lingered against the murderer.

That is why it is so touching and so convincing when you receive a message from the mother of a murdered 11-year-old girl rejecting categorically the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Like my colleague for Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic (Mrs. Killens), I would like to quote Mrs. Parrott:

> I do not want to be part of a society that brings up future generations with the belief that killing can be legitimized under certain circumstances. Let the message be clear and unconditional: human life is sacred; killing is always wrong.

I wish to thank sincerely Mrs. Parrott for enlightening us with her testimony.

I was saying that when a murder is committed, the first thing to do is to try and understand, even if it is difficult at times.

Very often violence comes out of emotional wounds, psychiatric troubles or inadequate moral development.

• (1600)

Once we have understood, we can first try to prevent and then to protect, by ensuring that the person involved does not do it again, by acting on the causes at the root of the problem.

This is how, ultimately, we will perfect our prison system and avoid the use of a punishment as cruel as the death penalty which, in the end, does not prevent in any way the perpetration of violent crimes.

On the contrary, capital punishment favors spontaneous reaction and fuels the most primitive expression, the principle of an eye for eye, to the exclusion of some reflection on the causes of this violence, on preventative and social protection measures, and on reform of the prison system.

Remember these words from the famous Soviet dissident, Andrei Sakharov, a man in a good position to know about human suffering: "I view the death penalty as a barbaric and immoral institution which undermines the conscience and the legal foundations of a society. I reject the contention that the death penalty has a deterrent effect on potential murderers. In fact, I strongly contend that the opposite is true and that brutality only leads to more brutality".

On a different perspective, it is important to know that public opinion widely overestimates the phenomenon of violence within our society. According to a Gallup poll taken in 1982, some 75 per cent of the respondents believed that more than 50 per cent of crimes imply violent actions, whereas violent crime only represents 8 per cent of all known crimes.

Two thirds of the people believe that the number of murderers has increased since 1976, while it has in fact remained relatively stable.

The more uncommon an act is, as in the case of a murder, the greater its visibility when it happens.

It is therefore no surprise that for want of adequate information, people try to relieve their feeling of insecurity by calling for harsher penalties including the reinstatement of death penalty.

People are also very misinformed on the circumstances of murders and on their authors. Few people know that about three victims out of four are killed by someone they know; instead of that, people tend to think that it happens between people who are total strangers.

On the other hand, it should be noted that 61,8 per cent of murderers are serving a first jail term.

When those people who are found guilty are paroled, very few of them commit a second crime: there have been less than six such cases since 1963. In short, the murderer who kills just anyone for no special reason is an exception, contrary to popular belief.

As public opinion is so distorted, I find it difficult to understand how some Members of this House can, with a clear conscience, use surveys carried out in their own constituency to justify their position about capital punishment.

A Member of this House recently expressed his views in these terms in a Montreal area newspaper: "I believe that my first duty is to express the will of those who have elected me as their representative in Parliament and to give a voice to their opinions."

While I respect the views of this Member and of all those who have used this argument in the House, I find it would be much too easy to invoke public opinion to avoid taking a stand ourselves and analyzing carefully all the arguments in our own minds.

We have not been elected to this House to act as puppets, but because the people of our constituencies trusted us to make decisions on their behalf.

Naturally, the opinion of those we represent is very important and constitutes a major argument in this debate, but it must not be the basis of a decision which we must make following our own conscience.

Another argument which is often used by the advocates of the death penalty is that justice should be done and that murderers should receive a punishment commensurate with their crime.

In 1962, when we had the last execution in Canada, two men were hanged in the Don prison in Toronto.

However, that same year, 40 people had been officially condemned to the death penalty. Two out of these 40 were executed. Why do you think these two individuals were executed, but not the other 38 who were on death row? The answer is obvious: our judiciary system is such that the various social classes make individual inequalities even more apparent. The poor and the destitute are definitely at a disadvantage when they seek to defend themselves before our courts. Such flaws in our judiciary system take awesome proportions when a human life is at stake.

How can we, in the name of justice, claim a murderer's life when knowing full well there is blatant discrimination against the poor and the destitute? Similar injustices are sometimes done at other levels, true enough, but let us not lose sight of the fact that we are talking about the death penalty, which is both discriminatory and irrevocable. The possibility of error is undeniable. How would we react were we to discover that an innocent man, one of our fellow citizens, has been unjustly murdered by the state we represent? There are no two ways about this, it is bound to happen sooner or later if we restore capital punishment. We would all be somewhat responsible for this. Let us reflect seriously before seeking justice through shed blood. Violence begets nothing but violence.

In a recent article published in La Presse the President of Quebec's Association professionnelle des criminologues made a statement on capital punishment in the name of his association. Here are is concluding remarks:

> To reinstate the death penalty in Canada would, to us, mean that society would be abdicating its responsibility to deal with crime and criminals. In our view, the death penalty is the easy way out from the thorough soul-searching we should engage in whith respect to the phenomen of crime. It is too easy to let a few scapegoats take the blame for all our social ills. Quite frankly, our cirme rates reflect the kink of society we are and show how far we are still removed a better world.

I believe that coming from an organization with its level of expertise, this is a very important statement and reflects a great sense of moral duty.

Today, in all countries in Western Europe, the death penalty no longer exists. Other countries such as Nicaragua, Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay have recently abolished the death penalty.

Personally, I would rather not think what the impact of reinstating the death penalty in Canada would be on the international community, at a time when other countries are abolishing the death penalty in far more dramatic circumstances. All these decisions to abolish the death penalty are part of a general movement towards a new judicial policy that makes the State responsible for protecting the individual and guaranteeing the human values recognized by the community of civilized nations.

There may still be some fluctuation, but the end result of this movement is not in doubts, and all enlightened individuals have a duty to encourage this development by speaking out against the reinstatement of this unjust, crual and useless punishment.

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Madam Speaker, because of my profound respect for human life, whatever the circumstances, I am radically and fundamentally opposed to the motion before the House today for reinstatement of capital punishment in Canada. My motives for a toal rejection of the death penalty are probably the same as those of many people who, in arguing their case, try to make a distinction between the concepts of right to life, right to justice, right to retribution, and so forth. There are no cut and dried truths or absolute dictates on a subject as sensitive and serious as capital punishment.

Madam Speaker, my philosophy is as follows: If no one has the right to voluntarily kill someone, can we, in the name of justice, and with a clear conscience, afford to execute someone as though we had some divine right to do so?

• (1610)

At a time of general concern about human rights, the question arises whether the right to life should not be considered as sacred and as a right to be respected by the legislator. In that case, it should be proclaimed that the State shall not have the right of life and death over its citizens and that society shall not have the right to dispose of the lives of its members.

Whatever people may say, the purpose of the death penalty is basically to do away with a human being. In fact, the State should set an example by recognizing that human life is sacred and that killing is wrong. By doing away with a citizen, the State does not get rid of crime, it merely perpetuates it.

Madam Speaker, in most countries where the death penalty exists, the primacy of the State over the individual is practically a dogma. By denying some of their citizens their absolute right to the respect for human life, these countries are implicitly setting a very relative value on the individual. Implicitly, they give society, or rather to State, the supreme right to dispose of human life.

Madam Speaker, increasing fear owing to crime, hostage takings and political terrorism, is not conducive to a more considerate relationship between the individual and the State.

On the contrary, fear generates a desire for revenge, a desire to kill, and increasingly we are seeing a kind of vigilantism trying to replace the authority of the State.

Madam Speaker, the death penalty is essentially degrading for the individual, since it brands the life of the guilty party as useless. It also exlcudes one of the main purposes of punishment which is rehabilitation. People who opt for alternatives to capital punishment are those who have a respect for all human life and urge society to rehabilitate and reform the offender. Therefore, any civilized society has a duty to impose sanctions that encourage rehabilitation.

We should ask ourselves the following question. Can we, in the guise of meeting out justice, take an attitude that is strangely similar to the desire for revenge? I think this attitude is indefensible and absurd. A death sentence might be useful if it would bring the victime back to life, but I don't think we have reached that stage yet.

The anger of the victims' families is, of course, legitimate and their desire for retribution may be understandable, but suffering does not necessarily give wise counsel. In my opinion, resorting to capital punishment is merely a confession of weakness and perhaps even of society's cowardly reluctance to deal with a problem that should be approached with imagination and intelligence.

Madam Speaker, what about the risk of executing an innocent man? Unlike other sanctions, capital punishement is irrepairable, of course. Judicial errors may not abound, but they do occur, and this alone says it all. No matter what guarantees our contemporary court system may provide, there is always an element of risk. The case of Donald Marshall springs to mind, wrongly convicted of murder as he was, and then released after spending 11 years in a New Brunswick penitentiary. There is no other conclusive evidence that somebody was erroneously executed in Canada, but it did happen in Great Britain, France and the United States.

Though the death penalty is punishment meted out to the criminal, it also has an impact on the relatives: all members of his family have to live with the stigma of infamy. The parents of the condemned man have to face the reality of an ordeal which punishes them beyond any kind of retribution. In addition, in certain cases justice may be thwarted when jurors envision the death penalty. For example, faced with the seriousness of capital punishment, jurors entertaining the slightest doubt may very well be tempted to bring in a not-guilty verdict. With full knowledge they may indeed prefer risking the release of a criminal rather than send an innocent man to the gallows.

From a social perspective, Madam Speaker, death penalty restoration advocates affirm that it is a effective means of intimidating or dissuading, hence a way to protect society against criminals. As it happens, there is no absolute proof that capital punishment has a deterrent effect on potential murderers.

Most of the studies which have been carried out conclude that capital punishment is not a deterrent when it comes to committing murder, or that there is no direct link between the death penalty and the murder rate. These studies seem to indicate that at best punitive verdicts play only a very secondary role in mechanisms which lead to criminal or non-criminal behaviour. It would be a lot more logical to suggest, for instance, that such factors as religious beliefs, upbringing, parental education and the influence of a given neighbourhood are much more likely to prevent or encourage someone to commit murder. Capital punishment does not prevent crime. Most murders are committed in a moment of passion or excessive fright. Some would even say in a moment of aberration.

Even if those responsible for these murders were aware of the probable consequences of their actions, these consequences would undoubtedly have only a secondary importance compared with psychological and sociological factors. Generally speaking, the criminal does not think about the penalty he might have to pay. He focuses on how to commit his crime without being caught. The famous writer Albert Camus, winner of the 1957 Nobel Prize, said the following:

> If, indeed, the fear of death is a certain fact, another certain fact is that, however great this fear might be, it has never been enough to discourage human passions. Man's instincts, which are always in conflict, are not, as our laws would have it, constant forces in a state of balance. They are everchanging forces which rise and fall successively and whose ups and downs feed the life of the spirit.

This is why, Madam Speaker, the risks taken by criminals, of whatever type, do not prevent them from committing a crime. We have the case of hardened criminals who consider the risks and come to the conclusion that their crimes have a very good chance of going unpunished. Capital punishment would not change their minds. Death does not scare criminals. For them, it is mostly a matter of their ability not to get caught, and the most cunning killers plan their murders. It is by examining the crime itself that it becomes possible to differentiate between the clumsy murderer, who leaves traces of his actions, and the cunning murderer, who eliminates all the clues. The first risks being executed as premeditation can be proven, while the second, more cunning killer could easily avoid execution.

In addition, Madam Speaker, many comparative scientific studies have shown that abolition of the death penalty does not result in an increase in the number of homicides. On the contrary, most of these studies show that, in countries where the death penalty has been abolished, abolition has frequently been followed by a decrease in the number of homicides. In Canada, for instance, criminologist Ezzat Abdel Fattah published about 15 years ago a study on the deterrent effect of capital punishment, which clearly concluded that there was no cause and effect relationship between the increase in the number of murders and the abolition of the death penalty in this country.

His study also showed that the increase in the murder rate between 1962 and 1970 was simply a component of the general increase in the rate of violent crimes, which increase was due to a whole series of social, cultural and economic factors, and not to the partial abolition of the death penalty. Nevertheless, the statistics show that the rate of first and second degree murders has varied very little in the last 25 years in Canada, going from 1.01 per 100,000 of population in 1961 to 2. per 100,000 of population in 1986. What has significantly increased is the number of criminal offences with violence, such as hold-ups, assaults, and so on.

Madam Speaker, if society wants to protect itself, it has to prevent crime by making the necessary socio-economic adjustments.

Even if it wanted to avoid the cost of making such an adjustment, it could not do so at the same time as ensuring adequate protection as its sanctions and penalties do not have the intimidating effect it might wish. In a sense, this is true for all penalties imposed, and not only for capital punishment.

Madam Speaker, we must now be creative and imaginative if we want to fight effectively against crime, and we must rid ourselves of our old ideas and methods for dealing with those we view as criminals. To fight against murder, we must not simply apply to murderers their own methods or moral standards.

Madam Speaker, in the name of which infallible principles or imperatives should we bring back the death penalty? Is it just because some of us want to give in to the basic instinct of revenge? Is it the only way of seeing justice done with any certainty?

Madam Speaker, is there no other means for those who seek justice and are trying to obtain redress?

Personally I think there is, Madame Speaker. There is admittedly no easy and ready made formula. However, I am sincerely convinced that through a sustained effort, a common will using the strength and imagination of man, it is surely possible to do justice in our society by resorting to means primasily based on a sacrosanct principle, the inviolability of the human being.

Before concluding, Madam Speaker, I should like to quote the comments of a French cardinal, cardinal Marty who said the following:

> If a man does no longer act like a man, the community must refrain from following him. Each time a human being is treated as a non human being, the entire human being is threatened. Any individual who commits an act of violence against another individual is degrading mankind. If we want to safeguard the concept of human being now threatened, we must resist the temptation of retributive anger.

I end with a double question that is worth pondering:

> Can man, that imperfect being, be expected to render perfect justice? In that respect, could capital punishment give a notion of perfection to the justice of human beings?

The answer belongs to us.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in this debate which is so important to our constituents and certainly to each of us as Members of Parliament.

As I enter into the debate today I would like to express my thoughts by looking at six different areas which I think come into play with respect to this particular subject. The first area which I want to talk about is in terms of the issue we are debating today. Second, I wish to talk about the role of the state. Third, I wish to consider the reasons for having the vote which we will have this evening. Fourth, I wish to consider the responsibility of a Member of Parliament on an issue such as this. Fifth, I want to look at the reasons for my own vote and how I will vote this evening. Finally, I want to look briefly at what I see as some of the results of the return to capital punishment in Canada.

I wish to begin by looking first at the type of issue that we are dealing with here in the House of Commons this afternoon. This is clearly an issue of conscience. It is clearly a moral decision. As with any moral decision, it makes for difficult debate and difficult decision-making. It is a difficult question for us all.

This is an issue which reflects very much on the view that we have of mankind, of the people with whom we share this country. As well, it reflects on our view of right and of wrong. It reflects on the way that we view the responsibilities of the state in a country such as Canada with the system of democracy and Parliament such as we have.

I now wish to move to the second area of my comments which deals with the role of the state. I believe very strongly that in a democracy, in a parliamentary tradition such as we have in Canada, individuals collectively take their rights and give a certain amount of those rights to the state. They give those rights to the state to do things that they as individuals cannot do. This includes the area of delivering programs that would be impossible for us as individuals to accomplish. For example, we take individual concerns and pass them on to the state.

Of course, the alternative to that is twofold. The first is to have absolute anarchy wherein every individual citizen of a country does as he or she pleases with respect to any given issue. Of course, what would then flow out of that is the whole concept of vigilante-ism. We are already beginning to see some of that demonstrated in Canada. We have seen individuals starting to act on their own, which creates difficult problems for our country. Recently, in Calgary, a man took justice into his own hands and shot someone who was attempting to rob his store. We saw a much publicized story in the United States of a man who took justice into his own hands and attacked four young men in the subway of his city.

That is one alternative of how to handle justice in society. But the reality is that in a democracy and in a parliamentary system such as we have we do not advocate that individuals take on those responsibilities and act out their own forms of justice. Instead, as individuals, collectively, we take those responsibilities and give them to the state. We ask the state to act on our behalf. This process can only work when society is satisfied that the state is acting out the kind of wishes, desires and needs that those individuals feel they want to see demonstrated in the method of handling justice. That is why I wish to move on to my third point.

The third point I have is with respect to the reasoning behind why we should have a vote this evening. I have talked about what I see as being the role of the state, which is that collectivity it comes from individuals asking the state to behave or to act in a certain way.

• (1630)

What is happening in Canada today very much brings us to a point where we, as Members of Parliament, must vote on an issue as the one we are facing today. What I am seeing out there on the streets is that Canadian society is restless, it is angry, it is frustrated. There is a sense that criminals have more rights than their victims; there is a sense that someone can commit a terrible crime and not be afraid of the punishment. The punishment does not match the crime in this country.

There is a fear among Canadians that there is an apparent increase in violence in our country.

As a result of each of these things, we find within Canada, I think, a growing sense of fear among the Canadian population: a fear that they are not being protected; a fear that the laws of the land are not delivering the kind of security and the kind of protection that the Canadian public believes it has the right to expect. Canadians, as a result of this fear, are demanding that this particular vote be taken by the House of Commons.

It is not a question of whether the Government, headed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), chooses to proceed with this vote; it is not a question of whether we, collectively, as Members of Parliament, want to see this vote proceeded with. It is very much a response to the Canadian public asking that this question be opened up and that this question be addressed in the House of Commons.

I would argue that, in view of my attitude as to what the state is in terms of collective/individual rights, that those people who make up that collective group have every right to demand that we as Members of Parliament take that vote.

The state, I believe, in these circumstances, must be responsive. It must respond to those needs of the Canadian people.

I also believe that any attempt to filibuster with the goal of preventing a decision, preventing this issue from coming to a vote, is wrong. We, as Members of Parliament, do not have the right to say that the issue cannot be decided; we have the right only to decide and to reflect our specific viewpoints on that particular issue.

I know there has been criticism here in the House of Commons because we have had to invoke closure on this motion, rather than to have it naturally flow towards a decision and a vote. The reality, Madam Speaker, as you know, and as Members of the House will know, is that there have been several attempts to come to an agreement that would have allowed week-end sittings, extended hours. There have been any number of options considered to allow all Members of Parliament to get their voices on the record in respect of this question, always bearing in mind that the question had to come to a conclusion.

The only conclusion I can come to, after all of those options were presented and still refused, is that there are those in this House who would prefer that the vote never be taken.

I would argue that that is wrong. That is not what we have a responsibility to do. I believe that Canadian society has the right to demand that vote, and I would say that all Members of Parliament are well aware of the desire on the part of the Canadian public to see this issue addressed in this institution.

If one looks only at the polls, one will see a very clear indication that Canadians want this issue addressed. If we look at our mail, we will know that Canadians want to see this issue addressed. Just going by the conversations one has with the various people one runs into in the streets of our respective constituencies, we know that Canadians want to see this issue addressed.

The fourth area I wish to touch upon is that of the role of a Member of Parliament when he or she is faced with a vote of conscience, a vote that is difficult, and a vote that really is based on moral considerations.

I would guess, Madam Speaker, after my earlier comments, that you would expect that I would argue that the responsibility of a Member of Parliament is simply to reflect the viewpoints of his or her constituents. That is not the case. I am with Burke. I firmly believe that we, as Members of Parliament, owe to our constituents, not only the ability to reflect the concerns that they have on any number of issues, to try to reflect the kinds of desires and aspirations that they have, but also to provide leadership.

When we get into an issue such as the one we are debating today, an issue of conscience which calls for a vote of conscience, we, as Members of Parliament, are very much obligated to vote as our conscience dictates that we vote.

If we were to fail to do so on such a serious issue as this, an issue that is moral in nature, an issue that really goes to the nub of what we believe, think and feel, it would mean that we should allow this country to be run by Gallup poll. All Members of Parliament should be sent home. It would be cheaper and more efficient—and, as everybody can well attest, it would be easier on Members of Parliament. But the reality,

Madam Speaker, is that that is not what we have been elected to do. We do have a responsibility as individuals to vote our conscience on issues such as this.

Our responsibility as Members of Parliament can be embodied in four points, four things that we have to do. First, we have to lay out our reasons for our particular position on an issue of conscience.

We can do that in a variety of ways. I am engaged in one at the moment by speaking here in the House of Commons on this issue.

Another is one that all of us have used, and that is the sending of letters to our constituents. As well, we have our conversations over the telephone and on talk-line shows. There is any number of ways that are available to us as Members of Parliament to permit us to lay out our positions, our concerns, and where we want to go with this particular issue.

The second point is that it is very important that we as Members of Parliament do not hide from issues such as this. To hide from this issue would be the ultimate form of cowardice, in my opinion. It would demonstrate absolute irresponsibility, and certainly it would not be demonstrating leadership, which is what I think we are called upon to provide when we are elected to this House of Commons.

Flowing out of that, the third thing we have to do is to vote, and we have to vote our principles and our own beliefs.

The fourth and final point that I think we as Members of Parliament have in terms of our obligations is to be accountable for that vote. In other words, when Albert Cooper stands in this Chamber and votes as his conscience dictates, he must be prepared to accept the consequences of that vote. If my people at home are not satisfied with the way in which I vote, they have every right to reject me at the next opportunity, and I accept their right to do that.

I wish to touch briefly on my own reasons for my vote this evening. I shall be voting this evening in favour of capital punishment, and in favour of the motion before us.

I think each of us, in coming to grips with an issue such as this, set out for ourselves a set of standards, some sort of moral guidelines that we feel are essential and which we use in coming to a decision or conclusion.

For me, the standard of values that I have used is the Bible. I am not about to go into a great theological sermon—first of all because I am not qualified; and secondly, I do not think anybody would be particularly interested in what I might say. But I do want to make a couple of points that I think reflect why I have come to the conclusion that I have in supporting this motion.

First of all, I think the Old Testament is very clear. It calls for, and condones, capital punishment. I do not think there would be much dispute among Members of Parliament on that particular issue. Where the dispute would arise is when we start to look at the New Testament, because there, of course, it is not so specific. But I believe that the New Testament is consistent with the Old; therefore, what is condoned in the Old Testament is also considered acceptable in the New Testament.

I have often found it intriguing that Jesus Christ who knew that one day he would be a victim of capital punishment never took it upon himself to talk about the state's right to inflict that punishment. I wanted to place those two brief arguments before the House.

Also I want to say that I reject, as part of my decision-making process, the arguments of deterrence and revenge. Even though they may well be justification for capital punishment, they are not reasons upon which one can base his or her decision to reinstate capital punishment.

I believe we need a system of justice, a system where the punishment fits the crime. I believe that we as individuals are responsible and accountable for our own actions. If we take a specific action, we must be prepared to pay the price of that activity. I also believe that the state has a right to go to war to protect its soil and its citizens and that when the state goes to war it has the right to kill if necessary to provide protection of its people. I further believe that the state has the right to take life as punishment for a crime should the state decide that it would be proper punishment.

I support capital punishment for professional killers, for multiple murderers, for those involved in sex and torture murders, for the killers of prison guards and police officers, and for terrorists. I support capital punishment where there is no doubt of the crime. If after the due process of law an individual is found guilty of the crime, I believe the state has the right to give him or her the ultimate penalty of capital punishment.

The sixth point upon which I wanted to touch very briefly is what will happen as a result of the potential return of capital punishment in Canada. I have heard the argument made by many legal friends that more juries will acquit rather than convict someone and that as a result more murderers would get off from their crimes. I would say so be it, that does not bother me particularly, because one of the beauties of our process of law is that in terms of a crime, such as one which calls for capital punishment, the individual faced with the charges has the right to a process that calls for a jury or judgment by his or her peers. It is that group which has the option, when the crime is considered horrendous enough, to require the ultimate punishment.

I see that my time has almost expired. In conclusion let me say that the last few weeks have been very difficult for a number of my colleagues. I mention this because it is important for the Canadian public to understand. It is difficult for my colleagues and friends who do not support the majority opinion of their constituents. It has been difficult because they have had to stand and be counted on this issue. For many of them it has been a difficult, frustrating, and tense time.

I admire my friends who have stood in the House knowing full well that their constituents and many other people in the country would not support them. I see them as men and women of leadership and courage. Many of them will be facing constituents who are angry and frustrated with them. I would ask those constituents to keep in mind the fact that the very people who had the courage to stand in the House and make speeches which were not in the majority opinion are the kind of people we should have in the House of Commons.

The next time we face a moral issue I may well not be in the majority position. However, I hope I have the same kind of courage as many of my friends have had.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I begin by saying that I am not in favour of capital punishment and that I will not be supporting the resolution brought forth by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) and seconded by his Parliamentary Secretary.

At the outset I want to say that this debate is important to all Canadians from coast to coast and to various interest groups with varying opinions on the subject matter. However, it is somewhat sad that we as parliamentarians, who happen to represent Canadians in the highest court in the land, will not have sufficient or additional time to debate the substance of the reinstatement of capital punishment.

A few Members have spoken and a few more will speak in the remaining hours, but it goes without saying that a majority of Members would like to participate, but the Government's closure motion precludes a free and open debate on a very important subject matter.

I have profound respect for Hon. Members opposite who have an opposing view to mine because they have been true to their convictions, as has the Hon. Member who has just spoken. I would not at any time want to question, nor to put in doubt, his integrity or judgment on the subject matter. Equally important, I hope Hon. Members opposite who share a different view on this important matter will not question my integrity or my convictions with regard to the reinstatement of capital punishment.

I begin this debate by going back to the comments of Edmund Burke who has been referred to many times in this great Chamber by members of all political Parties. To paraphrase Edmund Burke, he said that we owe our judgment to our constituents. It is my view that the majority in my constituency is perhaps in favour of reinstating capital punishment. However, I was not elected to the Parliament of Canada to be a rubber stamp. I was sent here by my constituents for a variety of reasons, one of which I believe in deeply and profoundly, that is, that I was sent here to exercise my judgment on their behalf.

Intellectually, I cannot morally accept the arguments in favour of reinstating capital punishment. Politically, it may not be feasible to be against the reinstatement of capital punishment. I say to those across the land who want to use this issue for political purposes to defeat Members of Parliament who are against the reinstatement of capital punishment that I am prepared for the fight, no matter what is the fight.

This is a debate which ought to occupy the minds of all Canadians and all Members of Parliament. In order to exercise our judgment, it only seems appropriate, logical, and inevitable that the governing Party would want to give ample opportunity to all parliamentarians to address the substance of the reinstatement of capital punishment.

What have the experts said? What have we heard in this great Chamber with regard to the pros and cons of the reinstatement of capital punishment? I want to talk about those experts, Madam Speaker. I will conclude my remarks about a real life situation in my constituency, in my province, affecting constituents and Canadians in that region of Canada. What of the experts? I go back some years ago when I had an opportunity as a student of law to hear some great orators. One of the best was the former President of the Conservative Party of Canada who came to Dalhousie Law School. I was the chairman of the speaker's committee. Arthur Maloney gave a speech before a body of young men and women who had differing views regarding the reinstatement of capital punishment. He said, as only Arthur Maloney could say, "Have you ever walked with a client to the gallows? Have you ever held the hand of a man or a woman who has been sentenced to have their life done away with?" That ought to go to the moral fibre of every Member of Parliament in this House.

It is one thing to say in the halls of Parliament or in the coffee shop that intellectually, yes, there are probably some reasons for which we ought to favour the reinstatement of capital punishment. But the question must remain. With the reinstatement of capital punishment, will it achieve the objectives of the previous Hon. Member in deterring homicides in Canada? Will it achieve the objectives of the Hon. Member who is leading the charge in this House for the reinstatement of capital punishment to prevent crimes against victims? The answer, and I say it with great respect to those Members, is no.

What of the experts, Madam Speaker? In the June edition of Psychology Today, Dan Archer, who has studied the subject matter of capital punishment and its effects for some 14 years and has surveyed in excess of 80 different nations, asked: "Does the death penalty deter potential killers?" In his judgment the answer is no, it does not. The death penalty does not deter homicidal criminals. When a nation does violence to human beings by conducting wars and executing criminals, it incites citizens to more criminal violence than they would otherwise commit, so the state can make violence the coin of its realm.

It is interesting to note that in examining the surveys conducted in the United States and of the various states in the United States only one that I can come across, only one, would hold a differing view. I wish to read into the record Isaac Ehrlich, a professor of economics at the State University of New York at Buffalo, who has claimed to have found evidence that the death penalty deters killers. That is the only one, Madam Speaker. Archer goes on to say in his article, and I point out for Members opposite:

—not one of the other 50 odd U.S. studies of the deterrence hypothesis has produced evidence that the death penalty deters murderers. "In a mature social science you don't draw conclusions from a single study because that study could be fatally flawed for any one of a host of reasons. Instead you should draw your conclusions from the preponderance of evidence. And in my view, the overwhelming pattern in deterrence research shows that the death penalty has no effect on the homicide rate".

That is the view of an expert on a study done in the international community on capital punishment with 14 years of research, not three days and three nights, but 14 years with untold hundreds of thousands of dollars spent.

I do not want to go into the litany of information that is available to all Members of Parliament with regard to what happened in that particular state and how the death rate has gone up. I do not want to get into those arguments because I think we miss the principle when we start getting into small, isolated statistics. But they are important nevertheless, both intellectually and from a practical perspective.

The arguments of the experts that I have had an opportunity to read and peruse have all come down on the side that the death penalty or the reinstatement of the death penalty does not deter homicide. I have failed to find in my research and I have asked law professors, students of law, sociologists and others, to provide me with opposing arguments. Perhaps that shows a flaw in my character or, indeed, in my legal training, that of trying to come to my conclusion by obtaining facts and information on both sides of the argument. I have not been able to find those.

In this empty Chamber today, and I wish those in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment were here in larger numbers because I want to relate for their benefit a true but yet an ever sad story of the Canadian justice system.

In the early 1970s in a community just outside of Sydney, my home, a young man by the name of Sandy Seale was murdered in a park. Sandy Seal lived several miles from my home. He was a young coloured man, an athlete. I remember this just as though it were yesterday. The tensions in that community, the rumblings and the rumours were rampant. As a young Canadian I was scared, scared of what was going to happen. If you only knew the geography of that area of Canada, Madam Speaker, you would understand why. But they found someone to lay a charge against. He was not the son of a prominent doctor, he was not the son of a prominent lawyer. He was a native, and I am speaking of Donald Marshall. An elderly man was subsequently charged with the death of Sandy Seale, some 11 or 12 years later. As young people, we used to go to the rink and pass this elderly gentleman all the time. But because in 1971 the criminal justice system was flawed, a young Canadian had to spend not one, not two, not three but 11 years of his life behind bars. Do you know what it is like, Madam Speaker, to spend even three hours behind bars?

We hear Hon. Members in this Chamber say with conviction and sincerity: "Well, you know, got to have it, never mind the fact that it does not deter anyone, but we still got to have it". I say that that is one living example of why this great Parliament ought not to reinstate capital punishment.

One would be surprised by the number of Canadians who have been charged and convicted for crimes they have not committed, not because our police officers, our judges or our prosecutors are bad but because of the theory of innocent mistake. There have been many theories about why the Donald Marshall case happened as it did, but let the fact remain clear to each and every Member of the House that an innocent man spent 11 years of his life behind bars, institutionalized for a crime he did not commit.

I cannot in good conscience vote for this motion. I cannot intellectually accept or consent to having someone die at the hands of the state. Some will say that there are other cases where guilt is clear-cut. Is it really clear-cut? Is that the kind of society we as Canadians wish to have, a society that kills, that commits homicide. Because that is what it is. Hon. Members can play with the etymology of words to say that it is not really homicide, it is revenge. However, it is homicide and we ought to remember that.

I would urge the House to look at the facts. There is no deterrence attached to the reinstatement of capital punishment. Yes, there are numerous cases, far too many to mention, of the state making a mistake by convicting an innocent man for a very serious crime.

I will conclude by again referring to the Donald Marshall case. What a tragedy it has been for him and for his family, but also what a tragedy it has been for our criminal justice system! An innocent Canadian was behind bars for 11 years of his life for a crime he did not commit.

Finally, I would paraphrase the words of Edmund Burke. For evil to prevail, all that is required is that good men do nothing. I would hope that good men and good women will vote against the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Madam Speaker, I value the opportunity to rise to share with you some thoughts on why I find myself unable to support the motion before the House. I have given this matter a great deal of thought. I cannot recall exactly when I became an abolitionist, exactly when I felt that capital punishment should not be a part of Canadian society, but I have been one for a long time.

This matter was raised seriously with me when I was seeking the candidacy for my Party in Nepean—Carleton. There were candidates who presented themselves for nomination who supported capital punishment. Members of my Party decided on balance on a candidate who had other views, all the while knowing where I stood on the issue.

At every turn during the 1984 election campaign, at every all candidates' meeting and at hundreds and hundreds of doors at which I presented myself, I was asked where I stand on capital punishment. With all the truthfulness I could muster, I shared the fact that I was not a supporter of capital punishment.

I want to share with you as well, Madam Speaker, the fact that my community is no different from any other community. From the enormous amount of correspondence, telephone calls and times it has been raised in town hall meetings, I suspect that the feelings of the residents of Nepean—Carleton are no different on balance than the feelings of those from other places in Canada.

Superimposed upon that, of course, is the fact that my community has lost one police officer in the last five years and saw two others seriously wounded in the line of duty. That of course tends to deepen and, I think, magnify the concern over capital punishment.

I need to share with my colleagues the fact that I have probably spent more time researching this issue, the aspects of deterrence and vengeance, than I have on any other issue since I became a parliamentarian. When I talk to people who are either supportive of capital punishment or opposed to it, I find that the roots of their feelings run deep, that there are philosophical differences that are complex and sometimes contradictory and at other times difficult to understand. However, regardless of which side of the argument they are on, when I talk to people, I find that they have common concerns. They are deeply concerned about violence in our community. They are deeply concerned about the judicial system. They are deeply concerned about the parole system. They are deeply concerned about a tax on police officers.

So we all agree, I believe, on the cause. What we disagree on is the solution.

Looking across Canada to see who commits murders or homicides, we find that 40 per cent of all murders occur within family units and with people being intimately known to one another. Between 70 per cent and 80 per cent of all homicides are committed by people who are acquainted with their victims. These acts of violence are sometimes acts of persons who are emotionally disturbed. Sometimes they occur during an emotional outbreak, a family quarrel of one sort or another. Sometimes they are carefully planned by professional criminals who probably have no fear of getting caught. Other times they may be an act of panic during another crime.

If you look at them carefully you will see that many of them relate to people who grew up in situations of poverty. They involve young people who are among the disadvantaged in our communities, the underprivileged. Some of them may relate to alcoholism and drug abuse. However, none are happy situations.

I would like to share with you something which happened when I was a young person growing up in Nova Scotia. Through the press I followed the case history of a murder which occurred in a small community there. A person was ultimately charged with the crime and the trial was reported in great detail in the local press. Every person in that community seemed to become a member of the jury. In that public jury there was no unanimous conclusion. One could walk the streets of small towns in that vicinity or go into any dance hall or beer parlour and find divided opinions. Yet, the jury of the day convicted that person.

I recall the appeals that were launched. I recall the plea for leniency that went out. I recall the community waiting for a message from the Prime Minister of the day that the sentence be commuted. That message never came. There was no joy in the community, there were only sobs.

I have spent a considerable amount of time talking to as many cabinet Ministers as possible who were involved in the last public hangings in Canada, those being two in 1962. Of course, I was unable to speak with all the cabinet Ministers who were involved in the process. However, I asked those to whom I was able to speak what kind of discussions went on within the cabinet chamber. I asked what kind of dialogue went on among the Ministers and the Prime Minister. Colleagues, my feeling is that that situation left a mark on the conscience of every one of those persons with whom I chatted. Every one of them recalled those moments in 1962 with a great deal of clarity and a great deal of concern.

As a result of those discussions I have reached the conclusion that I do not want my Prime Minister ever to be put in such a position. I do not want my colleagues in the Cabinet ever to be put in such a position. I do not want future Prime Ministers or future cabinet Ministers to be put in such a position either, a position in which they must decide between life and death, between right and wrong. I do not want to be part of a Parliament which endorses the restoration of capital punishment.

We are really talking about something far deeper than capital punishment. We are talking about the kind of society we want to have in Canada, the kind of environment we want our young people to grow up in and our grandchildren to be part of. Do we want a violent society? Do we want to reward and counteract violence with more violence? I do not want to build that kind of Canada and I do not want to be part of a Parliament which does that. I do not want Canada to be associated with countries such as Iran, South Africa, Saudi Arabia or the U.S.S.R., and I could list many others. I want to build a society which is warm and generous. I want people from outside of Canada to look upon us in a certain light.

In any discussion about capital punishment there is always the aspect of deterrence. We can never discuss this issue without talking about deterrence. On both logical and statistical grounds the argument is difficult to support. Studies in Canada, the United States, Great Britain, Holland and 30 or 40 other jurisdictions around the world, done by people from different political systems and different religions and races, inescapably conclude that capital punishment has no apparent influence on the homicide rate.

In Canada, for instance, homicide rates have decreased since the abolition of the death penalty. In 1975, there were 3.09 homicides per 100,000 of population. In 1985, the rate was 2.6 per 100,000, and in 1986 the rate was 2.1 per 100,000. The rates have actually fallen over the last ten years.

Those who advocate the return of capital punishment have an enormous responsibility on their shoulders. I will return to that in a moment. However, very few supporters of capital punishment believe any longer that it is a deterrent. They now raise their arguments on other issues.

Colleagues, there is the aspect of vengeance. Most active homicides are too terrible to describe and too terrible to tolerate. I understand that. One can understand how, in the moments of grief which follow such gruesome situations, families and friends can experience vengefulness, a rage, or ill will toward an individual or society. However, revenge does not right a wrong, it does not break the cycle, it does not heal the basic hurt, and it does not solve the problem.

In addition to the aspect of deterrence and revenge one must also ask oneself about equality in our justice system. How fair is it? How consistent is it? I have talked to many lawyers about this. They tell me that some Crown attorneys and some defence lawyers are better than others, that juries are not always predictable, and that more convictions involve the poor and the underprivileged. There are fewer convictions of the rich. Furthermore, the attitudes of trial judges differ a great deal across Canada.

Trial lawyers point out that it is impossible to guarantee consistency. It is impossible to have a system that is infallible. If you come to the conclusion that it is impossible to have an infallible system, the responsibility of those who want a return to capital punishment is enormous because the act of capital punishment, the death penalty, is so final and irreversible. How do we respond if we make a mistake?

In this century, 343 people in the United States have been wrongly convicted of crimes punishable by death. Twenty-five of them have actually been executed. Can we afford that? I suggest that we cannot.

Of all the parameters in this debate about which I have been anguished the most, it is probably that relating to police officers and prison guards, particularly in relation to my community. They are the front line individuals in the defence of our society. They are the enforcers of our values. If there is one group in our community that is to be given any benefit of the doubt, I suggest it is they.

Professor Waller of the University of Ottawa points out that a policeman's job in comparative terms is not particularly risky. There are jobs such as those involving miners, loggers, and oil rig workers which are ten times more dangerous. However, that is not the point. Policemen and prison guards lay their lives on the line for the safety of you and me every day and every night. Police officers received calls at unknown and unpredictable times to go into unpredictable situations in which their lives may have been in danger. I have witnessed such situations personally.

Let us look carefully at the analysis of police homicides in Canada over the last 24 years, from 1962 to 1986, the last year for which we have available statistics. Apart from some small aberrations, the homicide rate among police officers has been fairly constant at a time when the population has been growing dramatically and when violence and drug and alcohol abuse in Canada have been growing as well. There is no evidence in those statistics that can lead one to the conclusion that capital punishment provides safety for the life of police officers or acts as a deterrent in those particular cases.

Perhaps there are a number of alternatives that should be considered. Clearly, we can take steps to improve our judicial system to make sure that sentencing is more consistent and relates more equally to the crime involved.

I have absolutely no doubt that the parole system in Canada can be strengthened. It is appalling to read in the newspapers about someone who has been convicted of the type of crime with which we are concerned being told in the same breath that this person will be eligible for parole in just seven years, as so many are.

We can probably do much more in the area of gun control. Professor Waller of the University of Ottawa contends that the gun control legislation we enacted in 1976, ten years ago, has saved some 500 lives in Canada in that period. Gun control legislation is one vehicle by which we can help protect the lives of police officers and ordinary citizens.

We must also be concerned with the whole area of family violence. It is one situation in which many homicides occur. There are many things we can do to reduce and control family violence. One solution is to find the causes of family violence and unhappiness. A family disturbance is one of the situations most feared by police officers.

The crime rates across Canada reveal that many of those involved in crime are young people. I believe we can do much to help them by improving our education system, providing better recreational facilities, helping them to develop careers and helping to solve the problem of school drop-outs.

In closing, I repeat that I am unable to support the motion before us today. I do not want to be part of a House of Commons that supports capital punishment. I want to build a better society for Canada because life is precious and sacred. I want to be part of a community which cares infinitely for each individual.

In the course of the weeks and months that lie ahead, I will use whatever strength and skill I have to improve our judicial system, our penal system, all those things associated with the criminal justice system.

I want to leave the House with this final thought from Jeremy Bentham who said:

> The state affects the conduct and actions of its own citizens more by the standard of its own behaviour than by the penalty it inflicts on others.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I believe this is the fourth occasion since 1968 that I have risen in the House of Commons to speak to this subject. It is a subject that none of us relish but one with which either society has demanded or Members of Parliament have decided we must deal.

I am indebted to my colleague and friend, the Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), who sent a letter he received to Members of Parliament. It is dated May 11 and states:

> Mr. Reid, I am a resident of your riding, I am a police officer with the Ontario Provincial Police, and I am also against the restoration of the death penalty.
> Those people that speak on behalf of the law enforcement community concerning the death penalty, do not speak for the silent majority of police officers.

We are also indebted to my colleague, the Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), who sent all Members of this place a letter from a man who is now a resident of Saskatoon. He said on April 9:

> In April, 1965, I was the Chief Keeper (Director) of Saskatchewan's only prison with a gallows. In that prison was a man who had been convicted of murder and sentenced to die by hanging. My job was, among other things, to ensure the condemned man was kept in good health and did not take his own life. It seemed society was not so much interested in his death as it was in killing him.
> I was, in fact, a paid employee of the state, required by law to participate in the ritual killing of a human being.

I believe that what we do is what we are. The test of civilization in any society is how it treats its sick and poor, its disadvantaged, and yes, even its offenders, both civil and criminal.

This motion fulfils a commitment by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to a free vote on the issue of the death penalty. He made that commitment during the 1984 election campaign. I fully appreciate that it is a commitment he is honouring, but I submit that it is a commitment that was, at that time, designed to pacify and satisfy the large element in his Party and among the public who understandably wanted to lash out for an ultimate solution to the worst offenders of all, those who murdered.

• (1730)

Surely the Prime Minister must know by now that the attempt to be all things to all people sadly weakened his own stand and that of many others, including those of the churches. He should know by now that the matter is not just political, but moral. His excellent speech on this matter illustrated that. But he has allowed his Government to function in a manner which sadly belies and denigrates the excellent case he made against the death penalty.

If my memory serves me correctly, he implied that all Members should have a chance to speak and vote on the death penalty. His Government's action in cutting off debate just denigrates the arguments he so ably put forth, because only about 100 out of 279 Members will have an opportunity to speak on either side of the argument.

I do not relish singling out the Prime Minister on this matter. In fact, I congratulated him on his speech. But if, as the Leader of our country, he really believes what he says, and I think he does, he should not have allowed the procedural process outlined by his Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), to have taken place.

As my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), put it so aptly, in Canada we are not a violent people. I was saddened to hear two or three Hon. Members in this House, two Members to my left and one Member to my right, speak up when my colleague, the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom), called for volunteers to be the executioners. Two or three government Members readily volunteered. I invite those hon. gentlemen to apply for the executioner's job in a place like Russia, Chile or any other totalitarian nation where, I am sure, they would be welcome.

The motion itself, and the way in which it was presented under the rules of this House, makes it a palpable farce since the Leaders of the three Parties are all opposed to capital punishment. But because the Leader of the government Party proposed a free vote, we are now faced with this farce. If it passes, a committee will be established to travel about the country on a ghoulish investigation into which way is the best way to put someone to death, and for what reasons. No matter what the committee comes up with in three months or six months from now, I doubt very much whether its report will ever see the light of day in this Parliament or in the next one, no matter who is governing.

While this country has a million people unemployed, hundreds of thousands going to food banks, which is a nice word for soup kitchens, when we need housing and a host of things to reduce the causes of crime, we must deal with this matter. I think that it does not speak well for the priorities of this Parliament and the Hon. Members in it.

Crime rises in direct proportion to the number of unemployed, to the increased numbers in poverty to an increase of those who are functionally illiterate, to the number of those who have been short-changed by our society because they are poor, natives or are of some minor ethnic origin. These people do not happen to fit in with the mores and practices of a western, white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant society. Those who did not receive an equal opportunity for an education, those who grew up in a violent home and those who have been so short-changed by society, know not what they do. There is no sure cure unless we do more, much more to destroy the causes of crime of all kinds.

It does not matter whether we pass or defeat this motion, murders will still occur in lesser numbers, the same number or larger numbers. Surely this Parliament should be directing its attention to reducing the causes of crime. We fail to provide conditions to reduce crime and murders. Our police forces are under-manned and under-financed. I speak as one who represents the home of the RCMP. We used to train 400 excellent officers. Two years ago we were down to 40. We are now starting to climb back up. But the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have a lot of catching up to do and they are forced to do that in the name of reducing a deficit, in the name of cutting back on government expenditures. The police forces of our provinces and municipalities are held back. Their capability to do a better job is reduced because of cut-backs, restraint, and the elimination of funding for churches, for volunteer organizations, for parole officers, and for education and training, all in the name of restraint. The same applies to how families live. Our schools and universities could do better with each student. The system breeds the vigilante syndrome, the Texas cowboy practice of the immediate and irrevocable penalty, hanging. As the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Member for Prince Albert, said: "They have not hanged a rich man yet".

While we discuss the death penalty in this Parliament, hundreds of thousands line up at food banks, the modern day version of soup kitchens. We have a million more Canadians living below the poverty line than we did just a few years ago. Tens of thousands are either homeless, jobless or otherwise disadvantaged. We have driven them to the last resort. We have driven them to desperation. Some murders are committed by those who are mentally deranged, but most crimes are committed by those who were not born that way but were brought up in an environment which took them down that path. Those who turn to crime are those who have been short-changed in a society which puts a priority on greed and selfishness: "What is in it for me? And the hell with everybody else. It is a state of mind which flies in the face of everything that is decent in each and every one of us. The clamour for the death penalty is nothing more than an appeal to the worst in all of us. And all of us have some bad in us. For Christians, it flies in the face of the teachings of Christ.

We create criminals and murderers, they were not born that way. This motion is before us because of that crass appeal to so-called initiative, self-reliance and to apply the same standards to people who are left out of conditions and opportunities to grow, prosper and exercise their initiatives and their self-reliance in an egalitarian society.

I wish to say to my friend, the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), that a Member of Parliament has to be more than a one or two-issue MP. Is all he has to talk about death and metric?

If the Hon. Member can no more than subscribe to whatever is the majority view of his constituents, or what he perceives to be the majority view, on a couple of his own pet peeves, it seems to me that that kind of representation in Parliament is one of those basic appeals to the worst in all of us—greed, selfishness and revenge. It is the urge to feel better if someone gets hung. It is some sort of vicarious and puerile peeping Tom satisfaction when some murderer goes to what they call their "just desserts"—death.

I will not be party to that, no matter what, no matter which way the majority of my constituents feel. If it is logical to take a poll of constituents on capital punishment, and every Member of Parliament votes exactly that way, then it is equally logical that we take a poll on every issue that confronts the Government and this Parliament.

In that event, it follows, quite logically, that MPs would then vote according to those wishes of a given day in any given year on any given issue according to the views of the majority of their constituents. If we are to do that, then what do we need Members of Parliament for? With our technological capacity today we can specially equip every telephone and television set in Canada and let the voters have their say from one day to the next on one issue to the next. Then you, Madam Speaker, and the Clerks at the Table and the Governor General could tally up the results and sign new laws.

Surely, in the evolution of society Members from all Parties now oppose the death penalty. Some 10, 15, 20 years ago that was unthinkable, just as many other matters that we now have in place in society were unthinkable. Now, more and more Canadians want a society that is more tolerant, more compassionate and more understanding of the causes of crime. There is more determination and commitment to eliminate those causes, eliminate those conditions which drive people to do the terrible things which they do.

I would rather that a thousand proven murderers spent the rest of their lives in jail than to run the possibility, no matter how remote, of any one innocent person being put to death. We are not from the bygone ages of the Old Testament, or even from the ages of the New Testament. Those were the Scriptures of those times. Men and women—civilization—has grown. We are of a new age, of a new testament, a new testament to decency, humanity and civilized behaviour. We must oppose even the countenancing of the death penalty in our society.

I pray that our children and our children's children will perpetuate that and enhance the condition of all our citizens so that the things that cause crime and criminal behaviour will be substantially eliminated.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion to reinstate capital punishment. There is no joy in having to vote on this issue. I respect the opinions and the way every Member of this House will vote. However, I made a commitment during the last election, when asked on approximately 600 occasions, that I would vote for the return of capital punishment when the free vote was held.

I really wish that our country had grown, that our society had grown to the point at which we did not need to have this vote. However, I feel it is now absolutely essential.

I can tell Hon. Members that 31 years ago as a young policeman I spent six years with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Three Members of this House, the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), the Hon. Member for Mission—Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain) and myself are all former policemen. Some 31 years ago in northern New Brunswick I was called out in the middle of the night to search for a 14-year old girl who was missing. I found that girl, raped and murdered. I did not sleep that night, nor did I sleep the next night. I firmly believe that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder.

I do not believe it is a dereliction of my duty to have conducted a survey. Some time ago I conducted a survey within the riding of Mississauga North. I received 9,000 replies. Of those 9,000 replies 81.3 per cent of the respondents told me that they were in favour of the return of capital punishment as an option. I believe that figure may have changed slightly. There may now be a lessening of that number. We are told that 68 per cent to 74 per cent of the people across Canada want the protection of capital punishment on the books to be used with discretion. I believe that we need to have this.

I have had meetings with priests and ministers in my area. I have talked and told them my reasoning. I have been on open-line shows for two and a half hours at a time. On these shows 74 per cent of the callers were in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment. I have met with Amnesty International. Believe me, I can listen to their arguments. I have listened to the arguments of the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) who spoke a few moments ago. He stated that the poor and the disadvantaged would be the ones who would be most affected.

I refer Hon. Members to a black Senator from Missouri who in 1971 when he was asked to vote for a moratorium against the death penalty said: "I realize that most of the people executed will be poor and black and helpless. But I also realize that the victims are poor and black and dead". He was speaking the truth, Madam Speaker. We have to protect our society.

• (1750)

Next, let me deal with the deterrence aspect. Is capital punishment a deterrent? We can use statistics any way we want. Statistics can show that the murder rate in Florida is higher than the murder rate in Wisconsin. It does not mean very much. There has been a steady growth in murders over the years.

From the year 1867 to 1949, there were 1,100 convicted murderers in Canada, 55 per cent of whom were executed. From 1949 on, there was a gradual decline, with the percentage executed going down to 30 per cent, to 20 per cent, and to 10 per cent. In 1962, we had the last execution in Canada.

In 1976, on July 14, this House voted to abolish capital punishment; but its gradual decline had been going on for a long time. From 1914 to 1976, a period of 62 years, there were five votes, with the country ultimately deciding to abolish capital punishment in 1976. But we have had some brutal murders in this country since then.

People talked about the possibility of erroneous execution. Frankly, that frightens me. But I have enough faith in our criminal justice system to overcome that. I believe that the appeals process will provide every opportunity to the person being tried to prove his innocence. I do not believe much chance is given to the victim.

I have with me a list of premeditated murders that I would consider might be included in any Bill that might come forward calling for the reinstatement of capital punishment in this country, and they are: serial murders, contract killings, hostage killings, kidnap victim killings, and the killings of police officers and prison guards. We must protect our peace officers.

Capital punishment is not punishment but justice; it is not vengeance but protection—and the people demand protection.

On the subject of protection, we are not adequately protected under our present system. The killer who is jailed for life has one option to prison, and that is to escape. He has nothing to lose in killing again. Anyone who comes into his path during an escape attempt is vulnerable.

And even if that inmate is not interested in escape, what does he have to lose if he kills a guard or another inmate?

If policemen are expected to be in the front line, they must be given all of the protection society can offer. They say we are failing to protect them. I have a brief here from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. It is a brief that solidly supports the reinstatement of capital punishment. It is a very informative brief, and it is one that I have read three times. I hope other Members have read it.

To quote Mr. Paul Walter, President of the Metro Toronto Police Association, the recent killings of law enforcement officers "reinforces what we've been telling the public and the legislators for a very long time: the criminal element has little respect for anything, but he does have a natural instinct to survive".

It is imperative that we address the subject of capital punishment in detail as a possible option of protection for society. We owe it to our citizens and the law enforcement people who are responsible for protecting them.

I should like to say a few words on the sanctity of life, Madam Speaker. Great discussions have taken place in this House on this subject.

Capital punishment puts the ultimate value on human life. Because each citizen's life is precious, the state puts the ultimate premium on it. A country that puts murderers to death is telling the world that life is not cheap in that country.

If the penalty for rape were lowered, clearly it would signal a lessened regard for the victim's suffering and personal integrity. It would cheapen their horrible experience.

Consequently, when we lower the penalty for cold-blooded murder, it signals a lessened regard for the value of the victim's life.

It is by exacting the highest penalty for the taking of a human life that we affirm the highest value of human life.

I said at the outset, Madam Speaker, that there was no joy in having to vote for the reinstatement of capital punishment; but I believe that after this vote is taken, we will have come to the realization that we must do something with our criminal justice system.

If the motion calling for the reinstatement of capital punishment, in principle, passes, then a parliamentary committee will consider the types of murder for which one may be subject to execution, and the method of execution.

While that may be ghoulish, it is something that the citizens of this country demand.

If the motion is defeated, it will be the duty of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General to study our criminal justice system, with a view to ensuring that those who give up their right to live in our society by virtue of their behaviour should be held properly accountable.

During the spring break I had brought to my attention the fact that an individual who, in 1974, had raped and murdered two young girls, and who had been sentenced to three 20-year terms, was out on unescorted day passes 11 years later.

When this type of thing can happen, there is something wrong. The protection of the people is of paramount importance.

I think the lines are clearly drawn for tonight's vote. I do not expect that anyone will be swayed by listening to anything I might have to say, any more than they were swayed by the statements of the former speaker. But I want to go on record as stating that we must protect the public, and I believe that this is one way in which we can make a clear statement to the Canadian people that this Government stands for justice, and justice is what counts.

Tonight I will be voting in favour of the return of capital punishment, Madam Speaker, as an option.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Will the House allow me to call it six o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson) will be the first to be recognized once we resume the debate on this motion.

[Translation]

It being 6 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 13(5), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on the motions for third reading of Bills C-21 and C-42.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1986

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West) that Bill C-21, an Act to exempt certian shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Competition Act, to repeal the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West)) which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

• (1830)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne: Pursuant to order made Friday, June 12, 1987, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, order! The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) has risen on a point of order. The Chair would appreciate hearing what he has to say.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Last week when we had a vote which infringed on the hour set aside for Private Members' Business there was unanimous consent of the House not to see the clock and to consider Private Members' Business for a full hour. I wonder if you would seek the unanimous consent of the House to do the same on this important Private Members' Business?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent that Private Members' Business should be considered for a full hour?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

An Hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the efforts of my hon. colleague across the way. As it is my motion which is before the House, I appreciate his assistance and the initiative he has taken in asking that this very important matter be given the full consideration which it deserves. I, therefore, support my hon. friend's suggestion that we seek unanimous consent to consider Private Members' Business for a full hour.

Mr. Gauthier: It has been done.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In all justice, the Chair will ask the question once more. The first time I did not receive unanimous consent. It may be that after hearing the interventions of the Hon. Member some Members may wish to change their opinion on the subject. Is there unanimous consent that Private Members' Business be considered for a full hour?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Boyer: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do not have unanimous consent.

TRADE

ADVISABILITY OF ELIMINATING SOFTWOOD LUMBER TAX

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of instating an exclusion from the 15% export duty on softwood lumber for all Maritime-produced lumber exported to the United States, and of effecting an increase in the stumpage fees charged by British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec thereby eliminating the need for the 15% export tax on softwood lumber.

He said: Madam Speaker, may I inquire whether there was unanimous consent for the—

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Corbett: I think it is indeed unfortunate, Madam Speaker, that there are some Members of the House of Commons who do not consider this motion, which seriously affects the softwood lumber industry in the maritime provinces so significantly, to be of sufficient importance to merit debate for a full hour. I am absolutely amazed that there are some Members who do not appreciate the very dire circumstances which this issue could cause in the maritime region.

• (1840)

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, since the House has decided in its wisdom not to set aside the full hour, and recognizing that the Standing Orders provide the Hon. Member with 20 minutes in which to make his presentation, I wonder if we could at least have the understanding of the Hon. Member to take less than 20 minutes in order to allow some time for opposition Parties to lend their support to the Hon. Member's initiative. I know there are others who would like to support him in his initiative.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, I will do my best to capsulize my comments and leave some time. The Hon. Member will be aware that I have spent some time preparing this, since it is on my initiative that this motion comes before the House.

The motion I have presented to the House calls for the Government to redress an unfair situation that exists in legislation for many softwood lumber producers in the maritime provinces.

The December 30 decision taken by the Government of Canada imposes a 15 per cent surtax unilaterally across Canada. Twenty companies across Canada have been exempted from this surtax and five of those were in New Brunswick.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am terribly sorry to have to interrupt the Hon. Member. We have 20 minutes to listen to a Private Member's Bill. I think each and every Member of the House should extend the courtesy of allowing him to present his Bill and allowing the Chair to hear him.

Mr. Corbett: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The 20 firms that have been excluded from the 15 per cent export tax were previously excluded from the U.S. countervail action and have maintained their exemption from this export tax.

The decision to impose a national export duty crippled the competitive position of maritime softwood exporters as they are now required to pay not only the highest stumpage fees in the country, but an additional penalty of a 15 per cent export tax. Maritime softwood producers do not feel that this situation is equitable, nor do I. It is their position, and rightly so, that as the highest stumpage fee payers in the country, they are being unfairly penalized by a decision to rectify a problem that they were not part of and certainly did not create.

The U.S. countervail action specifically stated that: "Provincial softwood stumpage programs in Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta are subsidies". At no time during the countervail proceedings were the maritime provinces ever mentioned as being part of the problem or a concern by either the U.S. wood producers or the U.S. Department of Commerce.

It is a general consensus among maritime producers that, indeed, the Americans would have been agreeable to an exemption for maritime softwood producers under the countervailing duty action or, indeed, by a negotiated agreement. It is generally agreed that the Memorandum of Understanding that was signed on December 30 is the best possible solution under a very desperate and extremely difficult set of circumstances. Maritime softwood producers have honoured and respected the agreement and acted in accordance with its obligations.

Nonetheless, there is a very real concern that the inclusion of all maritime lumber producers but five could have a considerable negative effect on the maritime lumber industry. The effect of the 15 per cent export surcharge to date has been minimal, but that is because the present strength of the domestic market has allowed these producers to sell their product within the country. Unfortunately, it is anticipated that this will not be a long-term endowment and that they will encounter difficulties in the not too distant future.

There are 123 mills in Nova Scotia and 93 mills in New Brunswick. Some 22,000 people are directly and indirectly employed in sawmills in the maritime provinces and 6,000 are directly employed in New Brunswick. There is a great concern among maritime lumber producers that many of the smaller sawmills, 40 of which are the only serious industry in their communities, will face serious economic threats to their very survival as a result of the tax. Some 11,000 maritimers are employed by these mills.

I have a case study that has been provided to me by the New Brunswick Government. It is an impact study of the Juniper Lumber Mill of New Brunswick and the Canadian economy should the mill be closed down. That company employs about 400 people, and the residents of Juniper and the surrounding areas obviously rely very heavily on the continual operation of the Juniper Lumber Company.

If this mill were to shut down, it could result in the loss of 1,000 indirect jobs, for a total loss of 1,400 jobs in a market that only comprises a total of 1,685 jobs. The cost to the provincial Government for a two-year period as a result of this shutdown would be estimated at $2.4 million. It would cost an additional $6.7 million to the federal Government in the same period. It is a clear indication of the very real impact that any closure in the small communities would have on the area.

We believe that the maritime lumber yards that were not included in the exemption are no longer shipping to the United States. Fortunately, the local market has been able to absorb their goods, but this is not expected to last.

Industry predictions calculate that if the maritime softwood lumber is not provided with a blanket exemption from the export tax, some 4,000 jobs could be lost in the region. This region is currently struggling to create jobs and build a strong economic base. It is an area that is economically handicapped at best. We anticipate that the export tax will have several long-term debilitating effects on the sector. First, of course, the unexempted softwood lumber producers have already lost their American market because the tax effectively eliminates their profits.

We are concerned that when the domestic market is no longer strong enough to absorb all the products currently being supplied by those producers which previously shipped to the United States, there will be an influx of products from markets west of the New Brunswick and maritime borders. Local markets for maritime producers will be swallowed by western imports—I am speaking of everything from Quebec west—and to add insult to injury, those western imports will be subsidized by transportation subsidies.

The maritime saw-log market for private woodlot owners, which number some 66,000, is obviously threatened by cheaper domestic imports. In a letter of concern to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), I wrote:

> The Government of Canada is sympathetic to the economic and job-creation difficulties of the Atlantic region and have led the way to enacting programs and policies to help New Brunswick and the other Atlantic provinces more fully realize its potential.
> However, to place our softwood industries in a position where we lose a favourable competitive advantage, thereby forcing shut-downs and increased unemployment, are not the economic rewards that this Government is committed to achieve.

I submit that thousands of jobs in the Maritimes are dependent upon a healthy and competitive lumber industry. We must ensure we put in place policies that are going to result not in job losses but in job increases. The loss of a competitive position and continued regional disparity is just not acceptable.

• (1850)

The Senate committee has called for a revision to Bill C-37. The legislative committee which studied the Bill has called for a revision to Bill C-37. There are numerous provisions in place in the Memorandum of Understanding which would allow the Government to move at this particular time to negotiate with its American counterparts. I would like to refer briefly to some of the measures which are related to in that Memorandum of Understanding under "Replacement Measures".

The Government of Canada may reduce or eliminate the export charge on the basis of increased stumpage or other charges by provinces on softwood lumber producers. The Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America will consult semi-annually and otherwise at the request of either Government regarding any matter concerning this understanding, and six months from the effective date of this understanding, the two Governments will consult regarding the information exchange under the understanding. The date of the Memorandum of Understanding, Madam Speaker, is December 30.

It now becomes quite obvious that the Government is in a position to renegotiate this agreement. I would suggest that the Maritimes should now press on through the Government to claim exemption exclusion from the export tax, based on the conditions I have just related from the Memorandum of Understanding.

I note the Minister, when I introduced the motion, recognized my concerns. I want to assure her that the people of New Brunswick are grateful that five New Brunswick softwood producers have been exempted, and they represent a substantial 92 per cent of the market which is exported to the United States. But that does not alleviate the situation of those other 40 small producers which are seriously threatened when the local market dries up by the importation into the maritime area from west of our borders, as I have previously stated.

It is my position, and the position of my colleagues and the workers in the area, whose livelihoods and economic futures depend on a strong competitive position and equal access to the huge American market, that all maritime softwood producers be given the competitive footing they are rightly entitled to receive.

As so often has been stated by the maritime softwood lumber producers: "The Maritime Producers are not part of the problem, we should not be part of the solution". I would like to complete my remarks there, Madam Speaker, in order to give my colleagues an opportunity to address this important issue as well.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Madam Speaker, I am certainly aware of the clock and I want to leave a few minutes for my colleague from the New Democratic Party who would like to comment on this very interesting proposition with which, of course, we are in total sympathy. I would ask the Hon. Member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Corbett) where was he when we presented amendments in committee asking for this very same thing and his colleagues in the Conservative caucus voted against us to a man? Where was he in the House of Commons when these very measures were brought forward and his colleagues, to a man, voted against them?

We have seen hypocrisy in the House of Commons before, almost daily from the other side of the House, but now a member of the Conservative caucus stands up and says it is time we did something about an exemption for the maritime lumber producers, when he and his colleagues were responsible for the Bill in the first place, and were responsible for voting down the amendments and were responsible for turning down any effort to make any redemption.

Mr. Corbett: I was responsible for this motion. Where were you when I was looking for your support?

Mr. Axworthy: Let me quote the Cabinet colleague of the Conservative Member from New Brunswick, the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew). I quote from the Moncton Telegraph Journal: "New Brunswick wins big, Merrithew says of Accord".

Mr. Corbett: Where is your motion, Lloyd?

Mr. Axworthy: I would suggest to the Hon. Member that he may want to talk to his colleague from New Brunswick, who is in Cabinet, who supported this agreement, who was the initiator of it. He now has the gall to stand up and say: "My colleagues and I think it is a good idea we get an exemption". Certainly one of his colleagues does not think so. The Minister of State for Forestry does not think that is the answer. He was the one who put this agreement in place right from the start.

We know that the trade agreement on softwood lumber is probably the worst trade agreement this country has ever made with another country. It is not just the people in the Maritimes who are suffering. People in British Columbia, Manitoba and Alberta have had no answers whatsoever to their problems. Our lumber industry is facing an additional 15 per cent in costs, amounting to $600 million. We have inequity after inequity. We have created the worst possible conditions for ourselves. We agreed to the definition of a subsidy on the grounds that the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) and the Minister of State for Forestry said this will provide for our protection against future action.

Now we have Congressman after Congressman introducing amendments in Congress to provide further restrictions on Canadian resources based upon the softwood lumber agreement this Government signed, because we capitulated and agreed it was the proper definition that when we provide a stumpage fee rate, that is an unfair practice. So the Government signed that agreement. This Government brought in the legislation. Now we have a Conservative Member of Parliament saying it is no good.

I would simply say to that Member of Parliament that he had many opportunities in the past to make his voice known, to make his case known, and it seems to me it is now a little after the fact. While we are very happy to support his motion, I would ask him why he did not support what we were doing in committee when we brought in amendments of this kind? Why did he not support us in the House and why did he not vote against the Bill, as he should have and as all Members on that side should have, and say to Canadians from the Maritimes—

Mr. McCain: Cheap politics.

Mr. Axworthy: The Hon. Member talks about cheap politics. The cheapest politics going on in this House right now are Members of Parliament on the Conservative side who voted with their Government against their constituents when this Bill was brought forth. That is the cheapest kind of politics.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I have long supported the Maritime exclusion, but I join with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), in pointing out the hypocrisy on the other side of the House. I do not think any maritimer should be sucked in by this. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry and I sat on that committee for weeks and weeks listening to witnesses from the Maritimes.

Mr. Corbett: We were all listening.

Mr. Fulton: And that Member for one was not one of the ones who came and sat regularly on that committee. He happens to be one of the Members of this House who did not support the maritime exclusion when the amendment was brought before the committee, nor did he support it here in the House. He voted in favour of the legislation without there being a maritime exemption.

Let me read what the Minister of State for Forestry from the Maritimes had to say. The article in the Moncton Telegraph Journal is headed: "New Brunswick wins big, Merrithew says of Accord", and I quote:

> Merrithew said Canadians scored wins in six areas—including the exemptions from the tax for 20 Canadian companies, five of them from New Brunswick. The companies were also exempted from a preliminary ruling on a proposed U.S. duty that sparked the negotiations that led to the tax.
> "New Brunswick wins big" an exhausted Merrithew told a news conference upon his return to his Saint John riding yesterday. "The five companies exempted in the agreement account for more than 80 per cent of the lumber this province exports to the U.S.
> He identified the five as J. D. Irving Ltd., Fraser Inc., Dead River Ltd., Fawcett Lumber Co. Ltd. and Devon Lumber Co.

That is the Minister of State for Forestry. He is a Conservative Minister from the Maritimes and he said: "New Brunswick wins big". He said that the five big companies got off the hook, they get the exemption. It is all the little guys. The Hon. Member is pretending. He is going to go back to the Maritimes and say: "Oh, I had a Private Member's Bill. I was out there fighting for you. I was fighting for the exemption". He never raised his voice in this House. He never raised his voice in the committee. He never came to support the Maritimes when they were there to be heard on this issue. The record speaks for itself. That Member and his Conservative colleagues from the Maritimes—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to move that the debate continue for another 25 minutes. That is not the same as the last motion. I think it is a shame that we cannot have this full debate. I move we debate it for another 25 minutes. I ask unanimous consent for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair did ask earlier tonight that by unanimous consent the Bill be given the full one hour. I did not have unanimous consent. Therefore I cannot come back on that decision of the House.

• (1900)

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The motion was for one hour. My motion is for less than one hour. But it will allow the debate to continue a little bit longer for a very worthy subject. My motion is for 25 minutes, which is still less than one hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair would very much like the House to understand that the Chair is very conscious of the extreme importance of the subject matter being discussed. The Chair does not mean in any way to dismiss the request of the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). However, the question was asked earlier and there was not unanimous consent. Therefore at seven o'clock the time expired.

Mr. Fulton: On the same point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business—

Mr. McCain: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that all Members involved in this debate were done with their remarks prior to seven o'clock by about one minute or one minute and a half, in connection with direct debate on the subject matter, is the motion then deemed to have been accepted by the House or rejected by the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I rose to interrupt the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) because the time had expired. Hon. Members will find from looking through Hansard or consulting the televised portion of the proceedings that the Hon. Member for Skeena's speech was interrupted because the Chair rose.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Am I to take your interpretation of the course of events, then, that the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), a member of the New Democratic Party, talked out this motion and did not allow it to pass, a motion which would have greatly assisted the softwood lumber producers in the Maritime region of Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the Chair knows, I had only two minutes to speak. Ordinarily, Members have 20 minutes to speak. The Hon. Member is just diddling around.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please. The time for Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 7307).

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Madam Speaker, I rise today to lend my voice in resolute opposition to the reinstatement of capital punishment. Though it is always a privilege to speak to the nation and to my constituents in this Chamber, it is with sadness that I am now compelled to do so on this issue.

It is a tragedy that the ugly issue of state execution should once again be brought before this House. It is obvious that the Government has taken this opportunity to use this debate in an attempt to distract attention from the great many problems facing Canadians as a result of the Government's incompetence.

It is my feeling that the call for the reinstatement of capital punishment is an understandable but illogical reaction to the brutality that we see all too often in Canada. I am certain that every Canadian is enraged and disgusted at the thought of criminals such as Clifford Olson and the horrible acts he has committed. It is in reaction to big headlines that people's attitudes toward crime are formed. Their fears are understandable, but I believe somewhat exaggerated.

According to a 1982 study carried out by the University of Toronto's Centre of Criminology, almost 75 per cent of Canadians believe that violent crimes make up about one-third of all crimes committed. The reality is that violent crimes account for only 5.7 per cent of the total. Moreover, almost two-thirds of Canadians believe that the murder rate has increased since the abolition of capital punishment in 1976. However, a report from the Solicitor General's department has shown that the rate has reflected no significant changes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), when he spoke the other night, reinforced that argument.

In the year prior to the complete abolition of capital punishment there were 701 homicides in Canada, a rate of 3.09 per 100,000 citizens. In 1986 that rate had dropped to 2.87. Obviously, misinformation has created a great deal of panic in the population.

It is the duty of every Member of this House to speak clearly and directly to Canadians. I am sure that as people follow this debate it will become abundantly clear that capital punishment is both unnecessary and unjustifiable. Much will be said about the responsibilities of Members of this House to their constituents, to the nation as a whole, and, indeed, to their own consciences. It is my belief that the needs of my constituents is the most important concern I have to address. It is the needs of one's constituents that must take priority.

However, it is important to separate what is needed from what is merely desired. We have all seen polls, and Members who spoke prior to me mentioned this, that indicate that a majority of Canadians want to return to capital punishment. Since the public has been misinformed, it is not our duty here to follow the demands of the public. On the contrary, it is our responsibility to make use of this debate to try to educate the public and to show rational and moral leadership in maintaining the abolition of capital punishment. We must assume the confidence of our constituents and move forward according to our judgment. If this is not done and Members of the House turn instead to vote in a manner designed only to meet the demands of the polls, then Parliament will have dealt a great blow to the progress of the country. The cycle of revenge will have begun.

It is the tradition of our justice system to provide three functions in its work. Punishment must be a deterrent. It must be a form of retribution and it must encourage rehabilitation. Capital punishment falls hopelessly short of meeting any of those three required principles. The evidence and statistics relating to the death penalty as a deterrent are completely clear—capital punishment is not a deterrent.

I fail to see what overwhelming deterrent effect can be created by institutionalized killings. What example can be achieved? Are we showing people what to expect if they take another's life, or are we setting an example of how to react when one is wronged? State executions of criminals hardly seem like an effective method to show how wrong it is to kill.

It is hard to argue that the death penalty is not a decisive form of retribution. Some will claim it is the ultimate retribution. The problem here is that dead criminals cannot be rehabilitated. Since there is no rehabilitation, the entire society loses something. A lost life will never again contribute to society. The execution of a criminal has never brought a victim back to life. Capital punishment can add nothing but revenge to society. Under any careful examination there is no way to interpret it as a positive step.

When I was born in Freeland, Prince Edward Island, I was immediately given and privileged with all the rights, freedoms and liberties to which the citizens of this great country of ours are entitled. Of course, I was also instantly subject to the laws of the nation.

• (1910)

No one would dispute the right of the Government to remove a person's right to freedom within a society if that person has committed a crime. Prison sentences remove the criminal element of society. These people have forfeited rights they once held. However, the right to life is something that no government can logically or morally take away. Simply put, the Government cannot take what it has not given.

I cannot hold myself, as others have, as a leader in morality on this issue. Instead, I follow the initiative and concern expressed to me over the last few months by at least 30 different religious bodies, ranging from national organizations to tiny church groups.

I should like to thank these groups for their guidance in this most difficult issue that this Parliament is faced with. These people believe, as do I, and as do, I believe, all Canadians, in the sanctity of each and every human life.

The Canadian justice system cannot, and should not, be used by the Government as the arbiter of death. The possibilities of error are endless; and once an error is committed in this context it cannot be undone. There have been many cases in our legal history where people who were hanged were later found to be innocent, or at the very least convicted on false evidence.

We have, of course, as has been cited by many Members of Parliament, the Donald Marshall case and the John Wildman case, both of which remind us that while we do have a good justice system, it is not an infallible justice system. Other problems could and would arise within the justice system as a result of the implementation of capital punishment.

It is widely believed that jurors trying murder cases, given the choice between bringing down a verdict of guilty with a death penalty and a not guilty verdict, come down on the side of a not guilty verdict. As former Crown counsel Alan Cooper explained: "If you talk to the average guy on the street, he talks tough. But when it actually comes down to his making the decision, he won't do it."

When a jury has the opportunity to hang a man, they rarely do it; and because they do not want death sentences, the possibility—and I emphasize "the possibility"—is that some of the guilty will go free. There is always a threat with jury trials of wide-ranging inequities in terms of who is sentenced to death and who lives. Studies have shown that the death penalty has traditionally been used more frequently in cases involving racial minorities and the poor. That is something that has been brought out by other Hon. Members during the course of this debate. And this is another sad irony, because, as we have seen, it is the same people who suffer most in our society.

The death penalty is, and has been, a measure that is used to attack a symptom rather than the cause of the problems in this country. Desperation is at the root of a great deal of crime, and we should be attacking the cause. Instead, we are focusing our attention today in this Parliament on the effects of these crimes of desperation.

Certainly there are criminal acts, as we have seen, that are both horrible and unexplainable; but, these are the exception rather than the rule. It would be impossible to expect that our justice system could completely and unerringly separate the criminal monsters from those who are nothing more than sad tragedies. If one innocent person is to die unnecessarily, as would surely happen, then we are, each and every one of us in this Chamber, to blame, and we will have lost one more precious life in the name of blind justice.

Let us hope that neither Hon. Members of this House nor the public at large have any doubts about the result of the return to capital punishment. The fact is, some people will die: people who may have been falsely convicted; people who are consumed with guilt and who long for repentance; people who are, and who were at the time of their crime, without any control of their minds. In fact, who can say that any man who kills another in a civilized world is not insane?

There will also, undoubtedly, be people who die who could have enriched us, helped us, and even taught us many things, after a sufficient time of imprisonment, leading to repentance and rehabilitation. History is full of great men and women who spent a part or even much of their lives imprisoned, only to return as functioning and contributing members of society.

In our own nation, we have the example of Roger Caron, a man referred to by his fellow prisoners as "mad dog", who returned to society to educate and warn our youth and to advocate fair treatment of the inmates of our prisons. I ask Hon. Members, are we really so morally bankrupt as a nation, so resigned to our inability to rehabilitate people and so thirsty for revenge and spectacle that we should return to the death penalty? I certainly hope not. As a nation, we have traditionally strived to better the fate of our fellow human beings. We are recognized as a world leader in the fight for human rights.

We certainly have nothing to gain in joining such countries as South Africa and Chile, which have institutionalized and advocated capital punishment as a practical measure to curb unrest in their societies.

The problems of this country have always been solved through knowledge, hard work, and compassion. It is our duty to help the victims of crime in as many ways as possible; but it is also our duty to punish and rehabilitate the criminals themselves. It may well be that we need judicial reform. I, for one, would advocate stronger judicial reform. It is difficult to see a person who has been charged and convicted of first-degree murder out on parole after only a very few short years.

This Parliament, before going to capital punishment, the taking of the life of an individual, should try at least one other method, that being a stronger and more effective sentencing regime. We certainly do not need a justice system based on revenge.

It will be said in this House that we should return to the death penalty as a measure of government cost-saving. We hear that argument being put forth by people across this country. People say that it costs a great deal of money to keep these people incarcerated. This argument is also false. As well, it is disturbing. A study by the State of New York has shown that there is no money to be saved by executing criminals. The long line of appeals that accompany a death sentence more than offsets the money spent on the incarceration of the criminal. Quite apart from that, it is revolting to think that we could consider killing people in order to save relatively tiny sums of money; or, for that matter, any sum of money.

Perhaps those who use this argument would consider letting people starve to death—another good way of saving dollars. The Government would be better using this precious time, I believe, to implement a fairer tax system, if money is the main issue.

In closing, I should like to urge Hon. Members to look deep into their hearts to find their position on this grave issue. I think the immorality of the death penalty will be easy to see. I urge Hon. Members to feel the weight of their consciences, as I have. If we reinstate capital punishment, we will be doing so on behalf of all Canadians, and any executions which follow will be carried out in the names of a people who deeply believe in the sanctity of life.

I urge Hon. Members to think of the logic being applied here. Does it make any sense to kill to show the wrongness of killing? I do not think so.

I will be voting against the motion, and I will be doing so with a clear mind and a hopeful heart.

I should like to conclude with a quote from a letter I received from one of my concerned constituents, a Mr. Carroll Kadey, from Ellerslie, P.E.I., who has mindfully stated the truth of this issue. I quote:

> For one human being to take the life of another is a great tragedy.
> For society to execute a human being is barbarity.

I have stood for Parliament in two elections, 1980 and 1984, Mr. Speaker. When asked my position on capital punishment, when asked whether I would vote for the return of the death penalty in Canada, I said, on the occasion of both campaigns, that I could not.

• (1920)

Last evening I attended a state dinner in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, which was hosted by one of our cabinet Ministers, the Hon. Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), and had an opportunity to have a long chat with the former Member for Egmont, the Hon. David MacDonald, who is now Canada's Ambassador to Ethiopia. My position has been clear for many years, and it was reinforced when a poll was taken on who would vote for and who would vote against the reinstatement of capital punishment. Mr. MacDonald said that he was glad to see me voting against the reinstatement of capital punishment. He said that he had done the same on many occasions, and that previous Members of Parliament for Egmont were also abolitionists. I informed him that I had read his speeches in Hansard, which he gave over the years with great consideration and care, and that I took much from them.

As did other Hon. Members, I asked the following question in my householder: "Are you for or are you against capital punishment". In my riding of Egmont I sent out 18,000 householders, and I received back something less than 200. The breakdown was something like 102 against reinstatement of capital punishment and 96 for its reinstatement.

I understand that Members of Parliament are really very concerned politically and otherwise, but there are times when we must show moral leadership. We must live with our own consciences. While we work very hard as Members of Parliament in every way we can to help our ridings and our constituents, there are some issues—and this is one of them for myself; I am also a pro-lifer—on which we must vote with our consciences. I must live with my conscience, and I hope all my constituents will understand and respect me for it.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate. I suspect that for many Members of Parliament it is one of the most difficult debates which we have faced in our careers as parliamentarians and as elected leaders in our respective communities. It is not an easy debate; it is not an easy subject.

It deals with very deep-felt emotions which we experience as human beings living in this day and age. It deals with various intellectual arguments relating to something about which we as members of the human community feel very strongly, that is, our collective security or ability as individual human beings to live our lives in a society free from random violence and death. It deals with a question which affects each of us to the core regardless of political or religious beliefs, regardless of all things which separate us as human beings. This debate touches us in terms of what we share as human beings.

I am referring to the question of what we do with those in our midst who commit what is surely the most awful crime of all, that is, the taking of the life of another human being. How do we prevent that? How do we minimize it? How do we treat those who have committed that crime? These are the questions in this debate. These are the questions which individual Members of Parliament have attempted to answer.

I should like to deal with some of the intellectual questions dealing with the logical side of the issue. Some of those who call for the restoration of capital punishment use the argument that it is a deterrent, that the state being able to put to death a murderer will deter such crime.

The truth of the matter is that that logical assertion cannot be proven. Most intelligent and reasonable people would admit that there are no statistics whatsoever to support the contention that capital punishment is a deterrent. As various speakers during the debate have pointed out, in many instances we could almost make the opposite assertion. In certain jurisdictions which have done away with capital punishment the homicide rate in fact has declined over the last number of years. The argument that it is a deterrent is not a valid one.

Another argument is that it protects society and that society needs this protection. Logically I do not think that argument holds water. Quite often, as the Law Society pointed out, the opposite can occur and the courts would be loath to convict someone of such an offence if it meant his or her execution. In certain instances a court will in fact adjudge manslaughter rather than first degree murder. Along with the notion that restoring death penalty protects society, one could also make the case that it endangers society by allowing people out who should not be allowed out.

I think the most important argument by those who want to see a return to the death penalty is the retributive justice argument, in other words, vengeance or revenge, that a member of our human family has committed such a horrifying act or acts that he or she deserves to be killed. This is perhaps the most potent of all arguments used, and I also reject it.

There is no doubt that when we read gruesome details of mass murderers like Clifford Olson that there is a certain sense of deep-rooted revulsion which we all feel, a sense of wanting to put the SOB out of his misery. We feel a sense of anger that such an awful act has been committed, that young, innocent children, at the stage of beginning to live or to discover life, have been killed by a demented animal who is a human being, a member of the human species. I think we all feel that we just want to kill the person. That part of our nature as a human being comes out, the one that wants revenge, that response of anger.

I understand that because I feel it myself. Any member of our human family will feel it. It is normal. Yet there is another part of us that calls out and helps us rise above that feeling of anger and wanting to kill for revenge. Surely that part of us that calls out is the better part of our nature. It looks at events in terms of cause and effect, of nature and seeks to understand and put reason where there was anger and pure emotion. It is that part of us that wants to make certain such things never happen again and realizes that in order to do we must understand. That is what this debate is about, not only how we as individuals react but how we as a collective society, as a civilization, act. What part of our nature will we call forth as a community, as civilization?

In many ways this debate is a debate about how consciously leaders of our community decide what type of a civilization we will have. I submit that feeding emotion tonight will be an affirmation that the community called Canada tries to achieve a higher level of civilization, a higher level of conduct, one more motivated by attempting to understand rather than one of pure emotional reaction. That in large part is what this debate is about. How do we see ourselves as a community, as a society? How do we see ourselves as individual members of that society?

I have heard arguments that what we have to do is vote according to the wishes of our constituents. That is compelling. Practically speaking, we are all politicians and we all want to get re-elected. There is that part, of course, but there is a loftier part as well which has some validity. One attempts as a representative of the people of one's constituency to reflect the people's desires and wishes so that this, indeed, is a representative democracy. That is understandable, Mr. Speaker. But very often we have to forget that from time to time. A few weeks ago I was engaged in a radio debate over the telephone with my colleague from Saskatoon East. The Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ravis) stated that he would support capital punishment because that is what his constituents wanted. He had done his poll, and had the responses to his householders, and had decided what he was going to do.

Let me tell you about Saskatoon East, Mr. Speaker. It is a seat which the New Democratic Party represented in the previous Parliament and we will probably represent again in the next Parliament. The polls seem to indicate that the constituents in Saskatoon East want a change in their representative. I posed a question to my colleague from Saskatoon East. If I went into his riding, conducted a poll and was able to demonstrate to him that the majority of his constituents wanted him either to change Parties or resign and allow somebody else to run, would he do so. He was not quite into doing that. I told him that in a poll I would probably be able to demonstrate that the majority of his constituents were against Bill C-22, while he voted in favour of it.

I asked him would he consider, using that same argument that he was using to support capital punishment, and now vote against Bill C-22. Of course, he was not quite prepared to do that either. Our system of Government and Parliament operates in a certain way. Yes, as practical politicians and politicians wanting to represent our constituents we try to stay in tune with the desires of our constituents. We have to do more than that because there is more than that to this job. Otherwise our system of government just would not work. I suggest that the argument that you have to do what your constituents ask you to do is not a valid one.

What is it that our constituents are asking us to do? Yes, public opinion polls have shown that a 60 per cent range of the Canadian public want us to restore capital punishment. Apparently the polls also indicate people do not feel quite that strongly about it. I have detected an amazing change of mood over the last number of years.

When I fought my first election in 1972, capital punishment was a question I was asked about quite often on the doorsteps. Yet the mail I have received is by far from those who are opposed to returning capital punishment. I suspect that people are not as convinced that capital punishment is going to be the answer. I certainly feel in terms of the public impression that I get from my constituents that they are not as concerned and not as adamant now as they were before.

I suspect that most of my constituents, even those who favour restoring capital punishment, would not look kindly on me if I happened to vote according to how they want. I suspect that I will gain more support by standing here and stating what I deeply believe than if I were to change. I think our Canadian electorate is mature. I think people respect the consciousness of Members of Parliament more than they would respect one Member who would just vote according to what some poll indicated as to how he or she should vote.

The one other area on which I wish to touch is how can we make our society more secure? After all, those who want to see capital punishment restored and those who are opposed to it all agree on one thing. We want to see a safer and more secure society. We want to live our own lives with our loved ones, dependants and so forth in a more secure community. By rejecting capital punishment, it will force us to look more into the causes of violence. By not restoring capital punishment we close the door to the easy way out. We must begin to recognize the conditions that produce sick people. We must begin to examine very carefully our justice system that allows, in some cases, people who are sick to be at liberty and to commit heinous crimes again.

I remember the case of a demented person killing nurses in Saskatoon in the late 1970s. This person had a history of mental illness and sickness. He had killed farm animals and had done sick things. Yet we have devised no way as a society to keep tabs on these people, to treat these types of people, to treat them and make certain that they are never in a position to inflict harm and horror again..

• (1940)

Again, in the case of Clifford Olson, he was a sick person who fell between the slats of provincial and federal jurisdiction, the bureaucracy. We must examine that but we must also examine the roots of violence.

We must accept that we are living in a day and age of horrendous social, psychological, economical and technological change. Individual human lives are in freefall. Many children are being raised by single parents who are poor and have to work, come home, fix supper, change diapers and simply physically do not have the emotional and physical strength to give love, attention, concern and all those things that make us normal human beings. A breeding ground for psychopaths is surely one way of describing the wasteland of our civilization and culture today.

Then, of course, there is the influence of the mass media and the violence and number of deaths portrayed hour after hour. Children are brought up on television, the biggest babysitter and biggest source of information right there in front of them. It gives them violence, violence, violence. Is it any wonder we produce violent people? Does anyone think that killing those violent people will solve the problem of violence? No, it will just feed on it and more violence will beget more violence.

If we are really concerned about stopping violence, we must address the question of how we can maintain individual freedom of expression and still cut down on the amount of violence to which our youngsters are exposed. By saying no to the question of capital punishment, we force ourselves to address the real causes and will hopefully achieve some solution so that we can live in a safer and sound world.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting and in a sense dreading this moment for 11 years. Ever since I witnessed the last debate on capital punishment in 1976, I have wanted to place my views on the record in the House of Commons and cast my vote on this critically important albeit wrenching issue. This is the most difficult speech I have ever had to make. However, when the free vote is recorded later this day, I will vote in favour of the motion to reinstate capital punishment in principle.

I may, however, be voting from a perspective not shared by other colleagues on all sides of the House. My gut feeling tells me that we should put the death penalty back on the statute books at once. My head tells me that this country will never again see another person executed even if we do restore capital punishment in principle later tonight. Let me explain my reasons for obeying my gut instinct rather than my realistic rationale.

Eleven years ago, I sat up there in the Parliamentary Press Gallery, the third-floor balcony overlooking this place, and I listened carefully to many stirring speeches through countless hours of debate on the abolition of capital punishment. Incidentally, there were stirring speeches in 1976 but there have been very stirring speeches in 1987 as well. I commend many of my colleagues on both sides of the House for some of the profound and in some cases moving speeches that they have made.

As a television journalist for some 22 individual stations across Canada, I had to monitor the proceedings carefully. I provided filmed interviews with Members of Parliament to their hometown television channels along with commentaries reflecting the views of MPs on both sides of the death penalty issue from all sides of the House. I was exposed to all the arguments that we have been hearing during this debate and, I will confess, as an objective journalist I felt comfortable in my officially neutral role. Still, I held the personal view that the death penalty was considered a mere formality on the statute books, a provision that no Government had used since 1962. It was certainly an ultimate solution that no Liberal administration had contemplated, nor would the Trudeau Government of the day do anything but commute any death sentence coming before it.

Back in July of 1976, the conventional wisdom in the Liberal Government and in the media of the day was that the abolitionists would almost certainly carry the vote and it turned out to be an extremely close vote, as I predict it will be tonight. However, it was anything but free back in 1976. Mr. Trudeau's Whips were on with a vengeance and all kinds of carrots were being dangled before government MPs immediately prior to the 1976 roll call on capital punishment. That brings us to the present debate and the conduct of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

I want to put on record that I can rarely recall hearing a more powerful and persuasive speech made by any Prime Minister than the one delivered by the Right Hon. Member for Manicouagan here in the House one week ago tonight. His thoughtful and obviously deeply felt address on capital punishment ranks with those contributions of Arthur Maloney and the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. I believe history will applaud the Right Hon. Prime Minister's speech regardless of the outcome of the vote tonight.

The fact that I am allowed to stand here in my place and disagree philosophically with my leader says something else about this Prime Minister. Soon after I became a Member of Parliament, I got used to hearing former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau say that he would see to it that the issue of capital punishment would never again come before Parliament as long as he was in charge. Well, Pierre Trudeau is mercifully no longer in charge of this Parliament, not on the government side in any event, and that is another reason that I have a towering respect for this Prime Minister. He keeps his word. The capital punishment issue is indeed before Parliament. The matter will be dealt with one way or another during this Session. This highly controversial and intensely personal matter will be allowed to come to a truly free vote later tonight.

I might point out that the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), a former Prime Minister, also promised from 1976 onward that there would be a free vote in this House. He too will be able to participate in that vote tonight.

In any event, my own personal view back in 1976 was that capital punishment was abolished for political reasons and with the political clout of the Government of the day. My personal view in 1987 is that this House should restore the death penalty in principle but that while this Prime Minister is exerting no political pressure on his Progressive Conservative colleagues, I still have a journalist's sense of scepticism and perhaps realism that this Government and any future Government many years down the road will not likely resort to the ultimate penalty even if the House of Commons does approve the motion in principle tonight.

Let me answer the obvious question which is: "If you think that this or any future Government will automatically commute any death sentence that comes before it, why in heaven's name don't you vote for continued abolition? Wouldn't that be more realistic?" The answer is no on two counts. First, it is because of my duty to my constituents which I consider extremely important and second, my personal responsibilities and my conscience.

To vote against this resolution would be a betrayal of the constituents of Hamilton—Wentworth. Through four successful federal election campaigns and following extensive polling of my riding recently, I am convinced that my gut feeling is totally in tune with the vast majority of the people I have the honour to represent. Just as an example of that, last fall on CHML Radio's open-line show, Mr. John Hardy got in touch with five or six Members of Parliament from the greater Hamilton-Burlington area. We were all on an open-line program where we received calls from listeners. Present were the Hon. Members for Lincoln (Mrs. Martin), Burlington (Mr. Kempling), Hamilton West (Mr. Peterson), Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), and in the absence of a Member of Parliament for Hamilton—Mountain, I represented that constituency along with Hamilton—Wentworth. The results of that poll were 75 per cent in favour of the restoration of the death penalty and 25 per cent against. I communicated those results immediately after the radio program.

Some of the arguments put forward were interesting. They included the following: "We have to consider the families of the victims, the survivors", "Capital Punishment is a deterrent", "Life does not mean life, it is only 25 years. This punishment is not severe enough". I am quoting directly from some of the people who called in on that program. Others said: "The prisons are too lax, they're too soft, they're too comfortable".

The comment of one caller in particular got to me. He was a police officer who referred to the Prime Minister's comments last fall that "emotions are too high now to have a free vote on capital punishment". Immediately after that police officer was murdered, when emotions were running so high in the House of Commons, was possibly not the time to have a free vote on capital punishment. However, the officer made the point that police officers continue to be murdered and there is no time in between these deaths to cool off.

The concerns of the people of the greater Hamilton—Wentworth region are much like mine and can best be expressed in the words of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. Here is what Canada's thirteenth Prime Minister, a long-time abolitionist, wrote in his book, One Canada:

> Society must be protected from those who kill for profit or who regard murder as an occupational hazard in the commission of robberies or kidnappings.

The people of Hamilton—Wentworth and I worry about the fact that society treats the killers better than we do the victims' relatives. I can say as a former newsman that it certainly seems as though we give people who have gunned down Popes, presidents and policemen more publicity and more consideration.

There is an overwhelming impression in my part of the country that people who have murdered before are quite likely to murder again while on parole. There is a fear in my community about how people can be properly advised when these killers are back out on the street. The solution, they say, is surely not after the fact—the solution is before the fact.

My first reason for voting for this motion tonight is that I have great respect for my constituents and for their views. When we are asked to pass judgment on an issue as complex and important as this one, I have absolutely no hesitation whatsoever in asking for and relying on the guidance and advice of the people of Hamilton—Wentworth.

My personal reasons for supporting the motion do not stem from the point of view of bloody-minded revenge and retribution, although denying the "eye-for-an-eye" approach to the capital punishment question seems to mean that it is all right for a criminal to give someone the death penalty but in fact society—you or I—cannot render the same death penalty to the criminal.

Let us face it, Mr. Speaker, a great many Canadians approach this issue out of a deep-seated revenge on behalf of relatives who sorrow for the rest of their lives as a result of deliberate acts of violence against society such as blowing up an airplane, smuggling in guns to blow away prison guards, beating to death convenience store employees, gunning down policemen, shooting up banks, or bombing embassies. It is not difficult for many people to give vent to such an "eye-for-an-eye" emotion and philosophy. From those outraged by such grizzly offences you often hear: "Hanging is too good for them".

What is more difficult to accept, however, are the dispassionate, legalistic and selected biblical arguments and passages used by some organized churches, many academics, many criminal science specialists, many media people, and others who completely ignore the peoples' views on this life and death issue.

Just as I am not quoting statistics at length in these remarks—for I think statistics can be proved to use anything and manipulate any argument, as we have seen during this debate—neither will I quote the Bible to Hon. Members because the Bible can also be quoted to prove anything if you are prepared to lift the text out of context.

I am, however, a Presbyterian by upbringing and the Judaeo-Christian tradition is the major source and the wellspring of western civilization. The recent Maclean's

Decima poll on how Canadians feel about capital punishment specifically points out that religion does have a bearing on attitudes about the death penalty with Protestants in general, and Anglicans in particular, more likely to lean toward capital punishment while Catholics tend to lean toward the abolitionist point of view.

According to Michael M. Ferguson of Moncton: "The orthodox Christian tradition has generally emphasized three key points: First, the state has in principle the right, within limits and for good cause, to take life. Second, it is a question of prudence when and where the state should, if at all, exercise that right. Third, there is no definitive Christian position on the matter, and the individual, if properly informed, is free to make up his or her mind. The Jewish tradition does not appear to me to take a materially different position than orthodox Christianity, and in our own time the State of Israel retains the death penalty".

This is all to demonstrate that my own upbringing has contributed to a personal philosophy which is not out of line with my countrymen of similar backgrounds. This is not to say, as a Member of Parliament, that I cannot also demonstrate leadership and use my conscience and intelligence to operate independently from my traditional upbringing. My parents will confirm that I have gone that route many times before. This is, as many of my colleagues have expressed eloquently during this debate, a matter of conscience, a moral question, and I have analysed it in the way I have described.

My reason for supporting the motion tonight, while a "gut feeling" and a responsibility to my constituents, also amounts to something else, something far more immediate and urgent than the prospects of this country actually returning to executing people which, as I have already pointed out, will not likely happen.

My vote will be cast as a plea to this and future Governments to dramatically tighten up our parole system and our sentencing procedures. My Winnipeg friend, Frank Crockett, was quoted in Maclean's as saying, "If I had some assurance that a 25-year sentence meant 25 years, then I'd have no hesitation in saying, 'Don't bring back the death penalty'". Well, I am not as lenient as Mr. Crockett, but he does express the frustration of many of my constituents.

There is something fundamentally wrong with a system which allows a confessed murderer back out on the streets 24 or 30 months or three or five years after sentencing. As my mother said to me just this afternoon on the phone from Vancouver, "They're out in no time flat". A life sentence is a joke, Mr. Speaker. If we are not going to have capital punishment, we must build into the system a deterrent so the sentences given out for premeditated murder and the killers of police and prison guards and terrorists must be respected. We have heard during this debate that there are murderers in penal institutions who will kill again because they have nothing to lose. There are statistics to show that killers on parole will kill again.

It is my firmly-held belief that if this motion is defeated—and at this hour it could be even by the slimmest razor-thin margin—abolitionists will heave a sigh of relief and society will revert to the status quo. Canada's parole system will continue to make a mockery out of the administration of justice where first degree murderers are concerned. My view, my preference, is that with the death penalty once again on the statute books the sentencing of killers of police, prison guards, children, terrorists—whomever the committee selects to qualify for capital punishment—will have their sentences commuted to life imprisonment. Then a Government will be compelled to justify to the Canadian people that the lesser life sentence is respect and if not, why not.

Even if this motion is lost this evening, whichever way it goes, we as parliamentarians have a duty to ensure that one way or another we will bring an end to open season on those who protect society. In the interest of law and order, and as a grim and forceful reminder to would-be killers that the ultimate penalty is once again on Canada's statute books, I will be rising in my place later tonight to vote for the motion in principle to reinstate capital punishment.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech by the Hon. Member for Hamilton—Wentworth (Mr. Scott). I could not help but grimace somewhat at what I think are flaws in his logic. At the conclusion of his speech he said that he felt we should be tightening the parole system and sentencing and that he would be against the death penalty if we did so.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): I did not say that.

Mr. Berger: He said that his vote was a signal to the powers that be that we should be tightening the parole system and sentencing. I would ask him, therefore, why are we debating capital punishment? Why not debate the issues that he says are the real problem with our criminal justice system?

He seemed to be very concerned about recidivism, the number of convicted murderers who will be let out of prison because of eligibility for parole and may kill again.

I was not aware that there was a very high rate of recidivism among convicted murderers. I suggest that he put any facts he has on the record because he did not do so during his speech.

Indeed, I have a concern about the parole system and sentencing which I will address during the course of my remarks. The particular case that I plan to talk about did not apply to a convicted murderer. This was a person who murdered, and one of the contributing factors may indeed have been the leniency or some of the anomalies in our present prison system. The person about whom I will talk is someone, according to his record, who had committed a series of crimes, but none of which were violent. This raises a problem of how one deals with a person who could potentially become a murderer.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thought there was no longer any opportunity for questions and answers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions and comments. All speeches are 20 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, from the outset I should like to say that I do not agree with the restoration of capital punishment, and even less with this resolution. I would also express my regret that this debate should even be taking place. I have no praise for the Prime Minister. The Hon. Member for Hamilton—Wentworth (Mr. Scott) who has just spoken commended the Prime Minister for allowing a free vote on this issue. But why this vote? Why take up the time of the House for this useless debate? If, as suggested by the Hon. Member for Hamilton—Wentworth, we are not going to reinstate the death penalty, then why not instead debate the real and serious issues facing our society today?

Mr. Speaker, had we devoted as much effort to study the sources of violence in our society, we would be further ahead.

Here are some of the questions which deserve our attention. What should we do to improve our penitentiaries? What should we do to have better control over firearms? I have yet to see this Government take the lead in this respect. How can we reduce the violence we see on television every day? What can we do to gain better insight into family quarrels, alcohol and drug abuse?

These are questions we ought to debate, these are the kinds of problems whose solutions might help us reduce violence in our society.

At the beginning of my remarks I should like to thank all my constituents, particularly those who wrote to me about this mater. I received about ten personal letters and more than 150 postcards, all of them against capital punishment.

Therefore I think I can safely say that I share the views of at least some of the residents of my riding of Laurier.

[English]

I want to deal briefly with the question of public opinion. This question was addressed by a professor of criminal law at McGill University in an article published today in The Gazette.

I addressed the question of public opinion several weeks ago when I spoke to Bill C-55 dealing with the determination of refugees in Canada. In my speech on second reading I pointed out that the very first argument the Minister brought to bear in support of Bill C-55 was that public opinion supports Bill C-55. As Professor Sklar asked in The Gazette today: "How many have read Bill C-55? How many understand it?" While the legal community is unanimous about some of the provisions, their views widely contradict the views expressed by the Minister.

How many have carefully considered the arguments about the value of the death penalty as a deterrent? How many have reflected on the U.S. experience that the death penalty is applied in a disproportionate manner to minorities and the poor? What if public opinion changes? Do we invoke the death penalty one day and revoke it the next if the public's view changes?

I would also point out that majorities in Canada supported the internment of Japanese Canadians during the war. The majority of public opinion presumably supported keeping Jews out of Canada in the 1930s and 1940s, and presumably supports keeping out refugees today if one can believe the polls that have been published lately.

The real question is whether the public's views are the right answers to these questions, or do Members of Parliament have a different duty in dealing with these questions as part of our responsibility to the people who vote for us? In that respect, I would simply quote what Professor Sklar said about elected representatives in the last sentence of his article:

> What we need, ultimately, is that they protect us from our prejudices, not legislate them.

In supporting the abolition of capital punishment in his speech to the House on June 15, 1976, Prime Minister Trudeau argued that the only basis to justify capital punishment is on its value as a deterrent. He said:

> The crux of the question before us is whether execution is an effective and therefore justifiable weapon for the state to use in order to deter potential murderers.

• (2010)

In other words, is hanging a good way for society to defend itself? It may surprise some people in the House or the public to know that the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau said that capital punishment could be justified if there were evidence that executions were likely to deter other murders. This would ensure that a human life was not being taken capriciously. In other words, it would ensure that state-sanctioned killing would accomplish some worth-while social purpose. There was no such evidence in 1976 and there is no such evidence in 1987. Indeed, all the evidence is to the contrary.

As the Leader of our Party, the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner) said in his speech on April 27, even the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police no longer argues that capital punishment is the only effective deterrent. In the civilized world there is no evidence to show that capital punishment has had any significant impact on the murder rate. At 2.1 murders per 100,000 people, last year's homicides rate in Canada was the lowest in the past 15 years. It was 2.9 murders per 100,000 people in 1976 when capital punishment was abolished. If we look at the United States, we see its statistics show that those states which imposed the death penalty report a higher number of homicides than do other states where it has been abolished.

Like other Members of this House, I have had contact with the families of murder victims. One of the most difficult things I have had to do as a Member of Parliament was to meet with a certain Anibal Tavares, the father of a nineteen-year old student by the name of Emmanuel who was murdered in March, 1985 while resisting an armed robbery in the family's dépanneur or convenience store in my constituency. This young man worked for me in the last election campaign. I went door to door with him.

The murderer in that case pleaded guilty and was sentenced to life imprisonment. He will be eligible for parole in 10 years. I met with the Crown prosecutor after having met with the father on a few occasions and asked him a number of questions the father had put to me. He discussed with me the difficulties he faced in obtaining a conviction.

There was no witness to the crime. In the words of the Crown prosecutor, it was a perfect crime. However, the murderer talked to others who provided information to the police which led to his arrest. There was some question in the Crown prosecutor's mind whether this evidence would lead to a conviction. He was not sure whether the persons whom the murderer had talked to would turn up at the trial. They were not exactly reputable persons and there was no guarantee they would turn up. He also was not sure whether their testimony would hold up under cross-examination. His main objective was to get a murder conviction. He had to weigh the possibility of going to trial and not obtaining a guilty verdict because of the risky nature of that procedure versus obtaining a guilty plea by the accused prior to trial.

I met with Mr. Tavares, the father, on a number of occasions since his son's murder, as I explained. As can be expected, this man was absolutely shattered by his son's death. His anguish and his views have been reported several times by the city columnist of the Montreal Gazette who reported that Mr. Tavares lamented the death of moral principles, the death of justice in our society, and claimed that the state was responsible for his son's murder. The laws of the land, he argued, border on complicity, and the rules of evidence favour criminals. I guess I should not have to point out that Mr. Tavares also favours the death penalty. His views partially stem from the fact that his son's murderer was a person who had a lengthy criminal record. From 1980 to 1983, he had eight convictions from assault to break and enter and possession of stolen goods. As a young man he was convicted and sentenced to probation. His sentences increased to six months, nine months and 12 months in prison.

Mr. Tavares, in my mind, is fully justified in asking why this individual was on the street in a position to be able to murder his son. I believe that the previous record of this murderer testifies really to the failure of our criminal justice system. I do not mean to absolve this individual from responsibility for his actions. However, I think we have to recognize that prisons very often do not rehabilitate criminals. The prison system, on the contrary, probably often hardens criminals. A young man convicted of a relatively minor offence comes into contact with hardened criminals and upon leaving prison perhaps is involved in a criminal world which leads to further and more serious crimes.

Prisoners, I am convinced, are often ill-prepared to return to society. I have met some convicts who have been released from prison and who have come to see me in my constituency office. They go on welfare because they have no training and very few support systems outside the prison world to help them to become independent again in our society. The care and attention which is given to victims of violence is undoubtedly inadequate.

Another question I could mention is that our criminal system, as was mentioned by the previous speaker, has undoubted weaknesses. There are many problems. Sentences are not proportional to offences. Punishment is not certain. We imprison far too many people, indeed, a much higher proportion than in other countries.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if you followed a seminar which was organized for parliamentarians about two months ago which dealt with many of these problems in our criminal justice system. Unfortunately, that seminar was very poorly attended. I think there were only about five or six Members of Parliament who attended that particular seminar. Capital punishment will not solve these kinds of problems. Capital punishment, in my mind, is too simple an answer. It is an admission of failure. I have faith in the human spirit. I have confidence in our ability to take positive steps to protect human life and to reduce violence. I would suggest to Members of the House who may be wavering, if indeed there are any Members who are still wavering, that they consider the problems which have been raised in this debate. Yes, there is a need to reduce violence in our society, but I believe that if they reflect carefully on many of the difficulties we face in our prison system, and if they reflect carefully on the many types of things we could do to reduce violence, they must come to the conclusion that those alternatives are far better than returning to capital punishment and reinstituting a system under which violence can only beget further violence.

In conclusion, I would like to quote indirectly the parish priest in the Portuguese community in my constituency who spoke at the funeral of young Emmanuel Tavares. He stated that it was in the hands of young people in particular to do something about it, not to waste his life but to make it into something positive, to do something to prevent this kind of tragedy from happening again.

I am firmly convinced that it is in our hands. It is within our power and it is within the ken of Canadian society to deal with these issues and minimize violence in our society so that we see those kinds tragedies happen less often than they do at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to say that my position on capital punishment was taken long ago and it is well-known to those who have known me since my early youth. It may be a matter of family upbringing or religious upbringing. It may be the kind of education I had in various classical colleges in Quebec. It may be the fact that I have been a member of the Bar since 1969 and have acted as defence counsel in criminal court for fifteen years, until my election as a Member of the House of Commons. In any case, it means that today, I cannot speak out in favour of this motion and will vote, without any reservations, against the motion and against capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, from the very outset, I have tried to explain, without ever trying to hide them, my own views on capital punishment to my constituents. I asked them to write and tell me why they were for or against reinstatement of capital punishment—not that they would influence my own position, which was pretty firmly anchored, although you never know—to find out what their arguments were and to be able to give them the real facts. Many times in conversations with friends, associates, lawyers and some of my constituents, I realized that their opinions were based on facts that were inaccurate. And after our discussions, they would start wondering, and after a while, they would reverse their views.

I therefore asked my constituents to write to me. I received several hundred letters, and 820 or 86 per cent of my correspondents were against capital punishment, mostly for religious reasons. I told them I would send them a copy of the speech I would make today and some material we were sent by various agencies across Canada. I wrote to the others, who gave me their opinion based on facts that were often incomplete. Many wrote to me later to thank me for sending the material, and some actually changed their minds. That is one reason why in voting on this important issue, a Member should not be guided by the polls alone.

A poll is an attempt to find out what people think at a given moment, without providing information or making distinctions. We had 75 per cent of Canadians in favour of capital punishment only a few months ago, but this percentage has been coming down gradually, so that today, there would be 61 per cent. In Quebec, the last poll showed that a majority of Quebecers are now against capital punishment, probably because of the public debate that has taken place. If there had been a real referendum, if every Canadian citizen in each province had been able to vote personally for or against capital punishment, that citizen should have done what every Member has done, and that is, get the information, study the facts, read all the documents available, form an opinion and then vote. We would then have the real, enlightened view of Canadians. But since that process would have been very costly anyway and the Government chose to go through the House of Commons, which is quite appropriate, a Member of Parliament has an obligation to vote according to his conscience, after carefully going over the facts.

I therefore do not share the view that Members of Parliament should vote according to surveys. Suggesting that is a false perception, a mistaken view.

When I state I received letters from constituents I have tremendous respect for, those letters reflected the same concerns that are now expressed in various analyses, the Maclean survey for instance which just appeared in June 1987. But certain analyses we saw, as reported in that excellent study The Death Penalty by The Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, according to people generally, the general public perception is that 50 per cent of all crimes are violent. But the facts are different. It is not true to suggest that every second crime is violent in Canada. Only 8 per cent are. Those 8 per cent are a far cry from the public perception of 50 per cent. Two Canadians out of three believe the murder rate increased. That is wrong, the murder rate did not increase. Since 1976, when capital punishment was abolished in Canada, the murder rate declined from 3.09 per 100 000 citizens to 2.78 per 100 000. The rate declined since capital punishment was abolished in Canada. Those facts are self eloquent. Therefore, it is incumbent on those who believe capital punishment is a deterrent to prove it. The Prime Minister said so. They should prove that. The onus is on supporters of capital punishment to prove it would be a significant deterrent. But the facts, statistics point to the contrary.

How many times do I hear—and I am going to refer to police officers, and I will digress in my speech to refer to police officers. I followed very closely the contribution made by the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) last Thursday. He was a police officer before he came to this House a few years ago, and he always supported capital punishment as a requisite in Canada, but now he just made a vibrant plea against reinstating capital punishment. I want to tell the Hon. Member for Bourassa that I admire his great courage. I admire his courage because personally, over these last few months, I had a number of opportunities to discuss the matter of capital punishment and I know the man's courage, his convictions. I listened to his speech, it does him honour. He will agree with me that statistics show the number of police officers killed in Canada has not increased since capital punishment was abolished.

Let us look at the years 1966 through 1975—in ten years, 38 police officers were killed in Canada. Let us now look at the ten following years: 37 were killed. So, since capital punishment was abolished, one police officer less has been killed, while the number of police officers doubled in Canada. So, abolishing capital punishment certainly has not resulted in more police officers being killed as such. Of course, police officers are there to protect our lives and property. This is why we respect and love them as such. But because he is a police officer, this is no reason to reinstate capital punishment. The rate of police officer deaths in the line of duty is far from being one of the highest in Canada. If we looked at statistics as such, we would see that the mortality rate among police officers is in the vicinity of 9 per 100 000, as against 157 for fishermen, 119 for forestry workers, 83 in mining, 32 in the construction industry, for construction workers in our constituencies, etc.

Mr. Speaker, penalty is not a deterrent but rather the degree of certainty of being caught when committing a crime.

You are signaling that my time has almost expired. A number of Members want to speak. Well, I will skip a few things in my speech, Mr. Speaker, because I would like to refer to something of real significance to me, because of course I am directing my comments to my constituents, but also to Members in this House who might not have a firm position as yet.

Capital punishment is not the solution. The solution is to prevent second offences. The solution is to ensure criminal rehabilitation. And the solution as such is to reduce the crime rate. And how do we go about that, Mr. Speaker? By reforming sentencing. Perhaps by making sentences more severe or by amending them to find a more adequate formula. Also by amending parole. And the Law Reform Commission suggested the Government should undertake such a study immediately. And the Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General promised to study that as early as next fall. So it happens, Mr. Speaker, I defended people in murder cases and rape cases. I acted as consel for 74 defendants before jury in my professional life, and I can tell you that I was always surprised when a young guy 23, 24 came to my office with a record of convictions that long who just committed a robbery, and when I told him: OK, this might get you a few years in prison, his surprised look of anger shower he was thinking of seeing another lawyer.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the record certain individuals have, you realize people do not become criminals overnight. They do not become murderers overnight. You will not find one individual who one day is pure as lamb and the next day will go and buy a gun and cartridges, load the gun, go to a bank and kill a guard or someone else. That is not the way it happens. Before that he appeared before judges. For a first offence, he raised a smile. For a second offence, he was committed to his parents. For a third offence, he was reprimended. For a fourth offence, he got a fine, then probation, then a second probation. Finally, for a seventh or eighth offence, the judge sentenced him to 60 days' prison to be done over weekends. Often this is where the young fellow is criminalized. He is simply criminalized. It is just as if as a society we put a gun in his hands.

And now you would like to hang that young fellow, you would like to send him to the electric chair. No. It is my view that there is a lot of alternatives in our society before we come to such a difficult solution. It may not solve all murders either. I hear some of my citizens suggest all murderers should be sentenced. There are crimes of passion. We know that some 80 per cent, I think it is over 80 per cent of people who commit murder as such kill someone who is close to them. A spouse, a wife, a husband, a child. A friend, a neighbour. Somebody close. It is not an implacably planned and premeditated murder. This applies to the greater majority of murders. There are a great many solutions other than capital punishment to try and reduce the homicide rate in cases of this kind.

There is also the real amateur. The amateur does not think. He reacts immediately, spontaneously, as such. And he is often found by the courts guilty not of first degree murder, but of second degree murder. Therefore, not a murder punishable by the death penalty.

We are thinking therefore only of premeditated murders as such. I challenge anybody to find someone who has been found guilty of a planned and premeditated murder and who had no previous criminal record. I think that is where the solution lies. It is by working on sentencing, on rehabilitation and parole, making its conditions more severe.

• (2030)

Mr. Speaker, Canadians just cannot understand how a criminal who has been sentenced by a judge to 12 years in prison can obtain day passes after seven or eight months or be paroled after two years. They just cannot understand that. They do not find any reason for that. Criminals should get lighter sentences, but at least they should spend in prison three quarters of their sentences.

Canadians no longer understand the justice system. They can no longer make head or tail of it. Because of that, they are asking today for something which is worse, capital punishment, as though this was the universal remedy.

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude immediately by saying that Canada has made tremendous efforts over the past few years—I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) who is here today could vouch for that—to serve as an example for all other countries in the world in the area of human rights. If we should reinstate capital punishment in this country, how would countries such as Iran, the U.S.S.R., all the other countries which violate human rights—I do not refer to these two countries in particular—would react when they find out that Canada had reinstated capital punishment?

Mr. Speaker, as a civilized nation, we have to be against capital punishment just as we were against flogging, quartering, against the use of the wheel and the garrotte. Mr. Speaker, an error is always possible: 79 per cent of Canadians agree that a judicial error is possible. And when we know that it would be possible to sentence to death an innocent, we should not take a chance.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge all my colleagues in the House to vote against reinstating capital punishment.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to put my views with respect to the question of capital punishment on the record. And, of course, it is not the first time I have spoken on this issue, though it is certainly the first time I have spoken in this House on the issue. I spoke in a public forum in Winnipeg with regard to capital punishment. Members from all three political Parties were asked to attend and to address the issue of capital punishment, and I accepted on behalf of my Party to attend. There was a representative from the Liberal Party in attendance. Unfortunately, in that situation there was no representative of the Progressive Conservative Party.

I welcome the opportunity this evening to address this issue. The question that I think needs to be answered is: Why is this issue before us? Is it because there is an overwhelming case in favour of capital punishment? Is it that, after weighing all of the evidence for and against capital punishment, one comes logically and without a doubt to the conclusion that capital punishment is necessary in Canada? Or is it because of politics, because of public opinion polls, because of politics at leadership conventions?

I think that, really, is the question that we need to ask ourselves. We need to ask why it is that we are voting on this issue, and why it is we are voting on it at one o'clock in the morning. Why are we debating this issue deep into the dark of the night? Why can we not face up to this issue in the full light of day?

I want to deal with the question of whether there is a case for capital punishment on its merits, not in terms of public opinion polls or whether or not it is popular. I would like to look at its merits from a couple of basic perspectives. Will capital punishment work? Is it the right thing to do? Is it just? Is it moral? Is it principled? Then I will close my remarks by talking about how we are dealing with the issue and how it needs to be dealt with.

First I will turn to the question of whether it will work, whether it is something that will be effective. If we in the House choose to reinstitute the policy of capital punishment, will it be effective for society? Will it work? What will it do? If there is a case for capital punishment, it must be that somehow it will protect Canadians, that it will protect society, that it will make us more secure.

I have thought about an interesting question in this regard—are Canadians, in terms of their security, any worse off since the abolition of capital punishment? The statistics demonstrate that there has been no great rise in capital crimes following the abolition of capital punishment. There has been no great increase in the number of murders in our society, if we look at the facts, the statistics. That is one crucial question which I have asked myself.

Another way of looking at the question is: if capital punishment is reinstated, do our constituents really believe that three years or four years down the road they will be better off, that they will be more secure when they walk the streets, or that they will be subject to less violence? Common sense tells us, no. It would be a very pale ending to the motion before the House if people really believed that with the reinstatement of capital punishment they would be more secure as they walked the streets of their neighbourhoods.

I return to the question of whether capital punishment will work and protect society. Will capital punishment affect the behaviour of people? Will it actually stop people from committing murder? If a punishment is to affect human behaviour, we must be certain that the punishment will be carried out consistently every time the crime is committed. A fundamental weakness with capital punishment is that it is an uncertain, indefinite, unsure, and unlikely punishment. If punishment is to affect behaviour, it must be certain.

The punishment is uncertain because juries are very reluctant to convict people of capital crimes when they know the punishment will be death. The juries, the people asked to carry out this punishment, hold back from imposing the final sentence and refuse to implement it. They convict people of lesser levels of crime. Common sense tells us that the existence of capital punishment will not provide society with greater protection.

I want to give another example of why capital punishment cannot work. Many of us are parents. Many of our constituents are parents. When we deal with children we know that they make a distinction between our words and our actions. We can tell children not to do something or we set down rules for them. However, if they do it and we turn our backs, we do not enforce the rule, they will not pay any attention to it because it does not affect their behaviour. If society establishes a rule that one who murders will be murdered and then does not carry it through, it has no impact, it does not affect behaviour, and therefore it does not protect society.

I would like to see a society in which people feel more secure when they walk the streets, are better protected, and are free from violence. Therefore, we must ask the following question: If capital punishment will not do that, are there other ways to arrive at that situation? Are there other ways to look at the question of violence in society? Are there other ways to look at the insecurity which people feel as they walk the streets?

I think there are more fundamental ways which require long-term work in order to achieve the result. Achieving a secure society in which people are free from violence is not a short-term effort. We should not be turned away by the fact that the process will be a long one.

There are things which we as a Parliament and as Canadians need to look at. We should be reviewing our policing policies. Is it effective to have police in inner cities in ridings like mine simply patrolling in automobiles? Would it make more sense and would senior citizens feel more secure if they had police on the beat, walking the streets and showing a presence? Would they feel greater security when they meet someone on the street who threatens them? We need to look at our policing patterns.

We need to look at the question of sentencing. We need a parliamentary debate in that regard. Many Canadians are alarmed when they see people convicted of brutal crimes and then hear about them walking the streets a very short period of time thereafter. We should enter into a very legitimate debate with regard to sentencing, and we could do it without going down the road of reinstating capital punishment.

We should also look at how parole is handled in society. There are policy areas which need to be examined without going down the wrong highway. At the same time, policing and sentencing do not take place in a vacuum. Certainly policing does not take place in a vacuum. I believe we need to look at our community development policies.

It is not enough to have a policeman driving a car or even walking the streets. For policing to be effective, it must take place in the context of a community. Many of our communities have been devastated by economic trends in society. We need effective community development policies so that we have genuine neighbourhoods, so that neighbours know each other, so that policing policies can operate within a community context.

We also need to look at social conditions which incubate violence. We need to look at how to eliminate poverty in society so that it does not become a breeding ground for violence. We should seek ways of building a better society. We should build a society upon co-operation rather than upon violence. I believe that the argument in favour of capital punishment falls down when we ask the question of whether it will work to protect society. We need to look at alternative ways to build a secure security in which people are free from the fear of violence.

I come to the next question, namely, is capital punishment the moral thing to do? Is it the right thing and the just thing to do? My answer to that is no, because fundamentally it comes down to a question of values. What value does one place on human life? It is because I believe in the sanctity of human life that I think capital punishment, the taking of human life, is wrong. All of the great religions of the world teach that the taking of human life is wrong. If we ask the question of whether capital punishment is the right thing to do, I think our answer has to be, no.

Let us look at this from another perspective. Is this the moral or the right thing to do? If society chooses to kill people, if society chooses to impose the death penalty, or if society chooses to hang people, what kind of an example are we setting for members of society? What kinds of values are we teaching? I suggest the obvious, namely, that we are teaching disrespect for human life. We are teaching violence. We are teaching revenge. These are not the values that we wish to teach if we want to build a society based on moral values.

To decide whether this is the right thing and whether capital punishment is just and moral all we have to do is to look at where we get the model for our own behaviour from. Where do we learn our own values and behaviour? Do we learn them from the great moral teachers of all time, from Jesus, from Mohammed and all of the great religious leaders? Or do we turn to a killer as the model for our own behaviour? Surely that will tell us whether capital punishment is the moral or the right thing to do.

Is capital punishment fair? Based on the statistics that exist in the United States, capital punishment is patently unfair because it falls much more heavily upon the minorities, the blacks and the visible minorities throughout the U.S. In Canada, I am not familiar with the statistics, but having checked into Canadian jails and penitentiaries, which are disproportionately filled with native people, who are a very small percentage of our society, it is clear to me that if we have capital punishment then the minorities, the native people, the blacks, and visible minorities will suffer this penalty disproportionately to those who are in the majority of society.

Another thing that concerns me is the possibility of error. Once one implements capital punishment, there is no way to reverse it. We know there are volumes of cases in the American experience in which juries and judges have made mistakes and imposed the wrong penalty. If one imposes the penalty of death, there is no way to reverse it. We already have some experience in Canada in which Canadian courts have made mistakes. Surely we do not want to fill our own volumes of books with irreversible mistakes.

Why are we dealing with this whole question of capital punishment? Is it because of the merits of the case or is it because of politics? Judging capital punishment on whether it works to protect society, capital punishment fails. I come to the conclusion that we are dealing with this question because of politics, because of the politics of a leadership convention. That was the way in which a future Prime Minister was able to get the votes in order to lead his Party. That is the politics with which we are dealing.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is a falsehood.

Mr. Keeper: We are also dealing with this matter because of the politics of polls. We have a governing Party that is at the bottom of the pit in the polls. Some Members of that Party see this matter as a way to recoup. I believe we are dealing with this issue because of politics.

How do we deal with this question? Do we deal with it as a matter of public opinion, of politics, or do we deal with it as a matter of personal conscience? I think the behaviour of juries demonstrates to us that it is a matter of personal conscience. When ordinary Canadians read about cases in newspapers, they tend to come to the conclusion that a person should be convicted. When they hear the evidence as a jury, they tend not to want to impose capital punishment. This tells me that the matter is one of conscience. Why ask Members of Parliament to do what juries will not do? Why ask Members of Parliament to do what Prime Ministers have refused to do?

This matter of capital punishment is a matter of conscience. We should deal with it accordingly and we should vote against its reinstatement.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the issue of capital punishment. It is a subject that has been debated now for many days. We have heard those who are for it and those who are against it. All sorts of arguments have been brought forward, arguments that are certainly valid in one instance and the other.

I listened to the speaker who preceded me who told us about the sanctity of human life. No doubt human life is extremely valuable. But because of its sanctity, nobody has the right to take it away. If a criminal kills somebody, there should be an adequate punishment for that deed. We hear the bleeding hearts saying that we should not take human life.

Mr. Orlikow: Like your Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

Mr. Kindy: But the state has an obligation to preserve human life. The state does it by having a constitution. Section 7 of the Constitution tells us that we should preserve life, liberty and security of the person. For that reason, the state, as such, has an army to defend it from outside invasion to preserve democracy and it has a police force to preserve it internally. If somebody attacks the good order of government, he is violating some law. Naturally, taking somebody's life, whether it is for the state or for an individual, is a very serious offence, but the state, because it has to protect the individual, has the right to do so.

We can bring up all kinds of statistics for and against capital punishment. If I look at the year 1961, the rate of murders was 1.1 per 100,000 population. In 1962 the last execution took place. The Government gave the signal that it did not intend to apply the law. From 1962 to 1976 the rate increased to 2.81 per 100,000 population, it more than doubled.

The Government had given the signal that it would not apply the law of capital punishment. Once that signal was given, the number of crimes increased and we had to increase our police forces. Some minutes ago, I listened to the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin) tell us that between 1966 and 1976, police forces had doubled. Because the crime rate increased, there was a necessity for more police forces.

The Leaders of the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the NDP are abolitionists. Naturally it will be extremely difficult even if the motion passes to apply the law because Cabinet as such could commute the sentences. Our debate, although it is extremely important, is one that I think will not have much consequence.

There are other arguments against capital punishment. Some argue, for instance, that it is the disadvantaged and the poor who do not have a chance in our justice system. I would like to mention two cases. Mr. Buxbaum in Ontario had the most expensive lawyer and was convicted of the first-degree murder of his wife. A politician in Saskatchewan, a former Minister of Energy in that province, was convicted of murder. I believe that that argument does not wash. It does not hold water.

Recently, on June 22 in the City of Calgary, a young girl, 17 years old, a high school graduate, was killed and her body found nude in the streets of that city. We do not talk about the victims enough. It is the victims we should consider. We should consider the sanctity of life and we should not take an innocent life.

I will vote for the reinstatement of capital punishment. I hope that most Hon. Members in this House will do the same. The feeling in Canada is that our justice system is too lenient. A person murders someone and in a couple of years is eligible for day parole and is eligible for complete release after a few more years. That is a tragedy.

I recall that a father of one of those murdered girls came before the Justice Committee to testify. He said: "I was walking down the street and who do I encounter but the murderer of my daughter. I was not even advised that he was on day parole and that was only three years after he was convicted". It is for that reason that the people of Canada want the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Those who tell us that we can reform our justice system, make it more efficient, have been saying those things for many, many years. The fact is that our justice system is deficient. There are always the bleeding hearts who will argue that the criminal is a criminal because of his upbringing, because of his family background, because he was not treated properly by society. However, this does not give him the right to take an innocent life.

Today we will vote on whether or not the state has the right to take someone's life, the life of a person who has committed a murder. I am not talking about simple murderers but about people who commit serial murders, about professional killers and about terrorists. Those are the people who, if put back into society, would repeat their acts. Therefore, we have to consider that the only solution is to bring back capital punishment.

As a physician, I had the opportunity to see people who had killed others. I remember an instance when a lady came into my office who had destroyed her youngest daughter who was seven years old. She was liberated and was walking the streets again. A year later, she committed another murder. She killed her son. One can argue that that person was mentally sick, but even if she was mentally sick, she should have been in a psychiatric hospital or in jail.

We must look at the consequences of giving parole to someone. Today, a life sentence is not a life sentence. People get off much sooner than that. Even if we change the system, there will always be bleeding hearts telling us that these people should be released. For that reason and for that reason only, I believe that the state must act. Tonight, at one o'clock, the vote will take place. If you consider all the arguments which have been brought forward for and against, you cannot argue but that they are balanced. However, the will of the people should prevail. Statistics from across Canada show that 60 to 70 per cent of Canadians are in favour of the re-establishment of capital punishment. Mr. Speaker, we will vote at one o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the floor in such an important debate, particularly after the speaker and my friend who has just explained his position in favour of restoring the death penalty.

I had drafted a few notes, but instead I will use the arguments he made to justify the reasons why we ought to reinstate capital punishment to demonstrate that these arguments should be used instead to prove that the death penalty is not the solution to the problems he raised.

I will not refer to statistical data which might indicate that the number of murders in Canada may have gone up or down because of the death penalty. I will not refer to statistics which show that the crime rate is higher in those Americans states where capital punishment is the law of the land than in the others where it has been abolished.

My hon. friend has just explained why most people, when responding to a questionnaire or a survey, are in favour of restoring capital punishment.

First he cited concrete examples of convicted murderers who have been released a few years after being so convicted. Apparently this is why so many Canadians are frustrated. The only alternative when confronted by the lack of initiative is altogether natural and normal. People react and say to themselves: Since our prison system is inefficient, since our courts are inefficient, and since there are no other solutions available, let us go for the ultimate option, hanging. Let us hang convicted murderers.

But when we get around to talking to our fellow citizens, in my riding or anywhere else in Canada, and we ask them: Do you really want the treatment an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, they say no. Would it be that you seek revenge at all costs because someone has killed? Do you want to kill him too?

When debating capital punishement, we ought to keep in mind the thousands of Canadian workers who died, for instance, as a result of accidents on construction sites because the boss wanted to make money so he took a chance and did without safety scaffoldings to protect workers, so there were accidents and workers died. Are we going to hang this man who risked the lives of workers to make a few extra bucks? We see this happen in mines and in many industries. If we decide that we want an eye for an eye, we shall also have to kill employers who voluntarily decide to risk the life of their workers, whatever means of execution we choose. We would then go back to the law of the jungle, and I am convinced that my hon. friend who has just spoken and all Canadians would be against such a system.

What Canadians cannot accept, and I agree with them, is the inefficiency of our parole system. What the hon. Member clearly showed was that the father of a murdered child was not disappointed to know that the criminal who had killed his child was not dead himself, but disappointed and discouraged to see that the murderer had been set free before being convicted, and this is what the population cannot accept.

If we say that the problem is caused by our penal system and by the easy access to parole, then we should talk about that problem and take action to correct it. I find the present situation unacceptable and I can understand that the public would react spontaneously by requesting reinstatement of the death penalty. However, I cannot understand such an attitude on the part of a parliamentarian who should represent the population. Why are most retentionists in favour of reinstating the death penalty? Some say that, since our penal system is not working, we should capitulate and kill the criminals. Others say that it costs a lot of money to run our prisons. Such views are dangerous. Elected parliamentarians who judge such issues as the life of an individual on the basis of cost, if they are still here in the year 2000, might find that it costs a lot of money to keep our increasingly large ageing population in senior citizens' homes. Faced with dramatically high costs, instead of looking for new solutions, these people will capitulate as they are now doing in the case of the death penalty as they have no ideas about how to reduce the crime rate and the costs of running our prisons, and they will say: We need euthanasia to get rid of the sickest and the oldest because we have to reduce costs. This is a danger in a society if we, especially as parliamentarians, accept for monetary reasons, the idea that we can take away the life of someone else. This is very serious.

And the other people were saying: In my riding, most are for this. I remember that no so long ago, most people were against deindexing old age security pensions and there were not many Conservative Members who would stand up and say: Canadians are against this, Canadians are against that. People were following the leader. And now, all of a sudden, in an effort to attract attention, to justify for some reason, not to displease the Prime Minister, they come up with this argument which I feel is worthless. Because from now on, all of those who are using this argument will have to carry out surveys in their own ridings, whatever the subject matter of the debates may be. If their constituents tell them to go to the left, they will go to the left; if they tell them to go to the right, they will go to the right. This is sheer nonsense. If Canadians elected these people, especially those in the Opposition—those opposite were elected with the wave, with the swing of the pendulum, a great many of them will leave the moment the pendulum swings the other way—it is because they felt they had leadership, they could stand up and say: You are asking for such or such thing. Let us take the case of the death penalty. I think it is the duty of each Hon. Member to tell his or her constituents: You are right to seek more severe penalties. But the more severe penalties you are seeking does not mean necessarily to go and take someone's life. And then to ask them how we are going to kill murderers I feel is going a little bit too far. Assuming most Hon. Members are in favour of reinstating capital punishment, will they accept tomorrow to become executioners? It is easy to delegate powers to others, to appoint them and say: You are going to use hanging to kill this man. It is easy to say. But when we get on an individual basis, because of my experience as a social worker in my area, working to stop juvenile delinquency . . . You know, the people who get involved with organized crime know that sooner or later they will end up in a coffin. It is as easy as this, and they know it is one of the gang who is going to do them in; this is not reason enough to stop them from getting involved with organized crime. Remember in Chicago, Al Capone, they did not stop him because of the death penalty, but they managed to destroy his empire by convicting him of income tax evasion. What I believe, and I invite the Prime Minister, before we proceed to vote—since this debate, in my mind, is pointless and people who think that it will solve the violence we have witnessed lately in convenience stores are mistaken. The death penalty will not solve that problem, it will change nothing. For those who think that this debate will solve the problem of assault and robbery on our senior citizens, I say that the death penalty is no solution. And this debate will not resolve the issue. For those who expect solutions to theft, to violence, to crime and delinquency among our youth or to drug abuse—this debate will bring no solution.

I would have liked to see the Prime Minister, in his speech, go beyond saying that he was against capital punishment and say why he was against it. I would have preferred to see the Prime Minister commit his Government—in this debate, which he allowed for political reasons, so to speak, because he was railroaded into it by two or three Members from his party and because this is what made him win the party leadership, as one NDP member has observed. But we must admit that whatever the reason for the debate, he could have committed himself and given the reasons and that he will be the one to blame if the debate on abolition of capital punishment is lost this evening. The reason is that the Prime Minister could have won over five or six Members from his party who now intend to cast their vote in favour of reestablishing capital punishment. Those MPs would have voted against the motion with assurance that, as soon as the session will resume in September, their party, their Prime Minister, their Government would put forward bills to improve the parole system, and a program or bill to stop juvenile delinquency or to improve our prison system, and programs to rehabilitate people convicted for a first occurrence of shoplifting or a first hold-up. That kind of guarantee would have given the Conservative Members confidence that the criminal justice system would be corrected. But unfortunately the Prime Minister just said, as any other parliamentarian, that he was against capital punishment. But the difference with him is that he has power. He is the Prime Minister. As for the Conservative Member who spoke before me, I just feel that he might have changed his position if he had been given the guarantee that the justice system would be corrected, that people convicted for heinous crime and sentenced for 25 years would stay in prison for 25 years. I feel that that kind of statement would have satisfied that MP and that he would have changed his vote. But that was not to be, unfortunately. I think the Prime Minister still has an opportunity to do that before the vote in order that at 1 o'clock tonight the majority of members reject the reinstatement of capital punishment.

I would like the Members to ask themselves why there is so much violence. For what reason are there so many robberies? We have to start at the root. Why is it that young people, in spite of all they read in the papers and see around them, will still go the wrong way? The reason is a lack of incentive, a lack of community organizations in most of our ridings all across the country, to help young people in trouble. I believe the Government to be somewhat responsible because programs like Katimavik were probably not the breeding ground for prime ministers but some of those young people would get an education that way, they learned how to work in teams and acquired a sense of responsibility, of respect toward their fellow human beings, a sense of sharing. However, unfortunately, the Government has failed to accomplish something for our youth and for future generations; it has done nothing to stop juvenile delinquency. What has the Government done to prevent and eliminate drug trafficking which is a primary source of violence, robberies, hold-ups, and murders? Drug trafficking is one of the major causes of what is happening in Canada. It is much more difficult to control this form of organized crime than to simply hang the poor who get caught and allow the big shots responsible for all this trafficking to key their network in operation and to cash in on it.

Why has the Government failed to bring in real measures? Instead of this debate launched in January or February in the House, where about half the Members had an opportunity to make their views heard, why has the government not develop a strategy to improve, as I was saying a while ago, our national parole system? Why are we not tougher with those who deserve it and more tolerant with those who deserve our tolerance? Also why not introduce mechanisms with appropriate financing to help those who for various reasons go astray once? It happens once, they get caught shoplifting, or being an accomplice is a hold-up and often one wonders why?

It is the lack of money, and these people are often sent to jail with other people having a lot more experience, and nothing prepares these young people to return to society when they have served their sentence, or sometimes the only persons who await them when they are out of jail are people who, under the pretext of helping them, will perhaps bring them back in a shady environment, where they will graduate into criminality, into violence, into drug trafficking and into shylocking.

When I was working in the social field, Mr. Speaker, with the help of the Royal Bank we opened the first community branch in Canada. And it is funny to see an institution as the Royal Bank establishing itself in a 100 per cent French speaking community as the Montreal—Sainte-Marie riding and working in the social field. One of the first things we tried to do was to free people from shylocking, people who had needed say $300, a father who had wanted to do as other fathers for his daughter's first communion and who needed $300, not borrowed from the bank and to be repaid such-and-such an amount a month for a year, but to be had right away and to be repaid in full three weeks later when he got his cheque. As the banking system does not work that way, he would go to the shylock—as we say in English—and get his $300. That would cost him $25 a week, and then $50 and the like. People that do shylocking take advantage of those poor people and continue to lend them money. When those young people are unable to pay, they are told: "Well, you are working at such and such a place. If you do not want to have both legs broken, bring me some goods." They are not really thieves but they want to help their family and when they try to solve their problems, they are caught.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running out. I should tell you that I have known people with records. I worked with young people and I must say that on two occasions, when I was responsible for a recreation centre where a dance was held with a minimum of discipline which was enforced, two young guys came with daggers to stab me because they did not like how I ran the place.

I had two options. I disarmed them. I was strong enough to defend myself, but the young guys thought that I would call the police to have them jailed. On the contrary, I took charge and gave them responsibilities. The delinquency among young people can be due to their family or the lack of trust at school. They cannot succeed like others. They feel ignored and I must tell you that, given my practical experience, if you trust these young people—even if they seem to be the rough and tough kind, it is very often out of defiance—if you know how to give them some responsibilities in their field, they can change, they can learn to respect others.

But, if you alienate them, they are lost; if I had called the police, these two young men would never have come back to the community centre. They would have continued to patronize the tavern. Others would have taken advantage of them and today, perhaps, they would be in a penal institution. The truth is, they have served a short time, but they are now rehabilitated. They have been educated.

Mr. Speaker, my time is up. I would like to conclude by saying to Hon. Members who are in favour of capital punishment: I strongly invite you to change your vote and join us in a campaign, the strongest campaign ever mounted in Canada, to force the Conservative Government to set up programs to make sure that people sentenced to a term in prison actually serve their term, but that those who must be withdrawn from the prison system and trained, are taken care of.

[English]

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise tonight to speak in this very important debate. I am aware, as are all Hon. Members, that the entire country is watching us with interest this evening. There is no other issue before this House which has commanded such interest and concern for most Canadians. Most Canadians have knowledge of, and a real interest in, the outcome of this debate on capital punishment. Tonight we will vote on a motion proposed by the Canadian Parliament to establish a committee to examine the reinstatement of capital punishment. If this motion is passed, the committee will draw up legislation to present to this House dealing with offences punishable by the death penalty as well as the method of execution. If the motion does not pass, the subject dies with it for now.

I say "for now" because I do not believe that the question of whether or not Canada should have a death penalty will ever really be resolved. Capital punishment is not a new issue, nor do I believe it is one which will ever completely disappear. Since Confederation, Canadian legislators have been faced with a constant barrage of opinions about the death penalty. The first of many abolition Bills was introduced in the House of Commons in 1914. In 1953, another abolitionist Bill was introduced and defeated in the House. Again, in 1962, a Bill to abolish capital punishment for all offences except treason was introduced in the House of Commons. This Bill was defeated but, nevertheless, 1962 saw the practical if not legal abolishment of capital punishment. It was during this year that the last two executions were carried out in Canada.

In 1966, a multi-party Private Member's Bill calling for the abolishment of capital punishment was defeated again. However, the next year a Government Bill was passed which abolished capital punishment except in the case of murder of prison guards and policemen, for a five-year period, that is. As all Hon. Members are aware, this legislation was extended for another five years in 1973 by the Government of the day. Finally, in 1976, a Bill abolishing capital punishment was passed in the Canadian House of Commons. Since then more than 40 Private Member's Bills have been introduced calling for the reinstatement of the death penalty.

Historically, then, it would seem that this is not a subject which has any sort of easy resolution. However, the prevailing constant I have been able to find on this subject is that the majority of Canadians have traditionally supported the death penalty. Although the degree of support varies, it has not fallen below the majority in favour for all these years. There have been times of fairly significant increases in public support for capital punishment, but over-all, since before the 1976 legislation abolishing capital punishment, public support for capital punishment has been at around 65 per cent or 70 per cent of the population.

It is significant to note that even with this constant public support for capital punishment, the Government or Governments of the day have traditionally moved in the opposite direction toward abolishing and maintaining the abolishment of capital punishment.

There is no doubt that hard choices must be made. The decision made by myself and my colleagues in the House this evening will certainly be the most difficult any of us will ever make in this House. There have been enormous pressures put upon Members of Parliament from citizens representing both sides of the issue. We are all familiar with the often quoted passage from Sir Edmund Burke concerning the role of an elected representative. Similarly, we have all heard dismayed citizens refer to the tyranny of the majority. I have been urged by many organizations and individuals to vote not with public opinion, but according to my individual conscience. Personally, I cannot accept that argument.

It is my belief that the subject of capital punishment is radically different from any of the amendable decisions a Member of Parliament is called upon to make. An understanding of the subject does not require the availability of great amounts of technical information. One does not need to be a statistician or an accountant to understand how the death penalty affects all Canadians. It is a very personal concern. It is not a technical concern. I believe that there is hardly a person in Canada who does not hold a personal and informed opinion on the subject of capital punishment.

Canadians have a great understanding of their wants and needs as they relate to their personal security and safety. I cannot and will not ignore the concerns of my constituents. Additionally, I do not buy the argument put forward by some that the Canadian public is too uninformed or emotional to decide for itself on this issue. If the people of this country cannot have their voices heard on this very important subject, then just exactly what is our system of government all about? Can we seriously justify our actions and our consciences by smugly determining that we, as legislators, know better than our constituents?

I do not believe it is my role as an elected representative to think or decide entirely for my constituents that the death penalty is or is not a valid punishment. I do not believe, and cannot accept, that on this subject I am any more informed or knowledgeable than the people of Sarnia—Lambton, the people I was elected to represent. It must be remembered that in the time of Edmund Burke, this type of sentiment perhaps had some validity. Mass communications were an unknown in Britain in 1774. Illiteracy ran at about 90 per cent. The majority of Britains were uninformed and cared little about any issues other than those of a local nature. The thrust of political philosophy in those early years of democracy was predicated on the belief that there were two classes of people, those who ruled by virtue of their higher intelligence and fine morality and those who were meant to be ruled. But this cannot hold true today. The people of Canada are among the best informed of any country in the world. We are not illiterate, nor are we ignorant.

It is the Canadian people, not Members of Parliament, who sit on juries in murder trials. It is the Canadian people who live in fear for the safety of themselves and their families. It is the Canadian people who have demanded and who deserve the right to be heard on this very important subject. It is the Canadian people who live in my constituency, those whom I was elected to represent, whose voices I carry to this House. I would not have it any other way.

I was most interested to discover that the illustrious and oft-quoted Sir Edmund Burke also had this to say about public opinion:

> I am not one of those who think that the people are never in the wrong. They have been so, frequently and outrageously, both in other countries and in this. But I do say, that in all disputes between them and their rulers, the presumption is at least upon a par in favour of the people.

That is the other side of the oft-quoted Sir Edmund Burke.

What has also amazed me over the years is the number of people who believe, and I must say this belief is centred exclusively around this particular subject, that to allow the will of the majority of Canadians to prevail is tantamount to tyranny of the minority by the majority. It seems that it is only on the subject of the death penalty that this sentiment is so loudly expressed. These same people do not appear to be proponents of the philosophy on any other issue.

Well, what others call the tyranny of the majority to me is democracy. It is not always perfect. Nor does it always have the desired results. But it is the best that we have to offer.

I would like to share with the House the words of Sir Winston Churchill on the subject. He said:

> Many forms of government have been tried, and will be tried in this world of sin and woe. No one pretends that democracy is perfect or all-wise. Indeed, it has been said that democracy is the worst form of government, except all those other forms, that have been tried from time to time.

Democracy provides for the will of the majority to be heard. It is through the will of the majority that I was elected in 1984; and it is this majority that I have pledged to serve.

I receive dozens of letters daily from my constituents, not only on this subject but on a multitude of concerns and issues. I respond with an in-depth analysis and highly explanatory letters on the questions which I am asked by letter, by telephone and by people who come to see me. I believe I represent my constituency to the best of my ability, with diligence and interest, with my constituents' opinions at heart.

It is certainly no different on this subject. During the 1984 election campaign I stated publicly that I was in favour of capital punishment for the unequivocally proven first degree, premeditated murder of police officers and prison guards. But

I would be more severe, or less severe, in that instance based on the dictates of my constituents. I will not retract from that pledge.

The written and verbal submissions to me from September, 1984, have indicated a strong support for the reinstatement of capital punishment among the residents of Sarnia—Lambton. Of 3,500 responses to a recent questionnaire on capital punishment, some 88 per cent of the respondents were in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment for first degree, premeditated murder. Additionally, over 77 per cent of those who responded were also in favour of the death penalty for the killing of law enforcement officers and the murder of children. I believe that in addition to this survey the cards, letters, and telephone calls, the personal interjections that I receive supporting capital punishment, give me a mandate to vote in a positive way on the motion that is before us tonight.

If the motion passes and the legislation is tabled in the House of Commons, I have also pledged to my constituents that I will arrange for a professional survey on the acceptance of the actual Bill. The survey will be conducted in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton when and if legislation is tabled. This survey, combined with representations I expect to receive in the future, will determine how I will vote on the actual legislation if and when presented.

I have received some very disturbing letters and calls from my constituents on the death penalty issue. I have read letters from senior citizens who have broken faith with their churches over the issue. I have talked to and received submissions from families who have some very, very personal involvement in the issue. I received a heart-wrenching letter from a young boy who had a very close friend brutally murdered a few years ago in Sarnia—Lambton. I have spoken to parents afraid for their children and to other parents who feel that further violence may not be the answer, but that clearly something must be done.

It would seem to me that the majority of Canadians, whether or not they favour the death penalty, are deeply concerned about safety and security in our country. Statistics show our society has an increasing number of violent crimes. It seems to many Canadians that law and order has been suspended. Clearly, through their support for capital punishment, the majority of citizens are indicating their belief that their lives are not being afforded sufficient protection. Throughout the many letters that I receive daily are comments such as "insufficient sentences", "parole too easy to qualify for", "inadequate supervision of parolees", and the most common "what about the rights of the victims?"

It is my strong belief that the majority of Canadians deserve to be heard. We must remember that this motion could be the first step in a lengthy legislative process. Nevertheless, it is an important step in the recognition of the rights of Canadians to be represented in the Parliament of Canada.

My constituents have given me a mandate, and I intend to vote for them this evening. It is with conviction to democracy and to the recognition of the very personal issue in the minds of Canadians that I will cast my vote this evening on behalf of the residents of Canada and, in particular, the residents of Sarnia—Lambton.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise with regret, regret that as this session of Parliament closes for the summer we should have to debate and make a decision on whether or not to legislate killing when there are so many very positive reforms that we should be considering and with which we should be dealing. I regret that many parliamentarians with very firm and sincere conviction, I now, feel that we should move backward in history to restore the death penalty. Perhaps my greatest regret is that there are also parliamentarians for whom I have great respect and who, in their own conscience, perhaps are neutral or even against killing by the state but who have made a decision to vote for the reinstatement of the death penalty because of a survey of their constituents.

Perhaps a positive aspect of this debate is the change which has occurred in public opinion which seems to have resulted, I think, from Canadians having learned more about the facts. They are perhaps considering the issue somewhat more rationally as opposed to only from an emotional point of view. They have realized that killing by the state is no solution to the murders which we all deplore.

As the debate has continued and more and more Canadians have weighed all the facts and all the moral arguments, support for the death penalty has declined. Support for the death penalty is now at its lowest since its abolition in 1976. I think it is a shame that the Government is forcing an early vote on this matter since it is clear that as time goes by Members of Parliament, like all Canadians, are having an increasing number of reservations about the death penalty.

• (2150)

The recent Maclean's/Decima survey of 1,500 Canadians shows that, of the 61 per cent of Canadians who are in favour of capital punishment, only 36.7 per cent are convinced that Canada should bring back the death penalty, with 24 per cent only leaning toward the idea. As well, the poll indicates that 33 per cent of Canadians are not fully committed on the issue, and that over one-quarter of those, or 10 per cent of the whole population, might change their minds. So, it is evident that the population as a whole does not have a rigid position on this matter. One of the positive aspects of this debate, and one reason why we should not have had closure, is that the trend is moving toward the rejection of capital punishment.

I hope that this trend will cause those Hon. Members who took surveys of their constituents to reconsider. We all know how volatile polls are, and particularly so on such a volatile issue as the death penalty.

I am concerned that the Government has imposed closure on this debate, something which runs contrary to parliamentary reform rules, the rules for a free vote, which this is. I am convinced that even more Canadians would have reconsidered their position on the death penalty had we proceeded in a more thorough manner, delaying further debate on the question until the fall.

In reviewing all of the information that I know we have all received on this issue, I have found that some of the most moving testimony has come from the mothers of children who have been murdered. These women have written to us, attesting to their realization that the death penalty will not bring back their children. They appeal to Members of Parliament to vote against the reinstatement of the death penalty. They do not believe in a society that supports killing, in any form.

Many of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party have presented facts as to why we unanimously oppose a return to the death penalty. The Coalition Against the Return of the Death Penalty has done a great service to our country in that it has provided documented evidence to show that we should not kill people to show that killing people is wrong.

I want to tell my own constituents this evening, and anyone else who will listen, why I personally feel so deeply in respect of this question. Coming from British Columbia, I know how very upset the people of British Columbia were following the Olson killings. In our anger and fear, we wanted retribution, and even revenge. I must confess, I felt this way myself.

But the facts show that killing a murderer will not prevent further brutal crimes from occurring. We need other measures to prevent violence and killings. As well, we need to protect the public through more effective policing and sentencing. In addition to assisting the victims of crime, society needs to take steps to rehabilitate criminals, where possible.

I am against the death penalty because I am morally against killing in any form. I agree with all three party Leaders, all of whom have said that, as a civilized nation, we must not give the power to the state to kill. The reinstatement of the death penalty could lead to the execution of an innocent person. We are all aware of Donald Marshall, who spent some 11 years in prison before being proven innocent.

We have heard many religious arguments as to why capital punishment is wrong; why it runs contrary to all Christian values. We have ample evidence that capital punishment is not a deterrent. In fact, the murder rate in U.S. states which have capital punishment has gone up, whereas it has gone down in those which do not have the death penalty.

Some people are so angered and frustrated and fearful when someone is murdered that they seek vengeance. That is understandable. But the state itself, in a civilized society, cannot practise vengeance. Violence begets violence. As Gandhi said: "The trouble with an eye for an eye is that it leaves the whole world blind." As a social worker, I know very well that sociopathic personalities can rarely be rehabilitated; but it is wrong to deny the possibility of rehabilitation to all.

History shows that where the death penalty is in place, it is the poor and members of racial minorities who are hanged or electrocuted. Rich murderers can afford the best defence, while penniless persons are condemned to death row. It is also a fact that there are fewer convictions against murderers where the death penalty exists. In that circumstance, the justice system operates differently.

Those who support the return of the death penalty want the state to have the most awesome power of all, the power to take a human life. New Democrats do not believe that the state should have this kind of power over its citizens. The death penalty has no place in a civilized democracy. With the exception of most states in the United States, western democracies have rejected the death penalty.

What kind of countries have the death penalty? Very centralized, top-heavy, undemocratic countries, often with brutal dictatorships. South Korea, South Africa, Chile, Guatemala, the Soviet bloc countries, those are the kinds of countries that have the death penalty. Those are the countries where there is legalized cold-blooded murder conducted by the state. Is that what we want in Canada?

During the course of this important debate, we have heard many compelling arguments about how inhuman and brutal the death penalty is. Disturbing accounts of past executions have been read into the record. These are accounts from our past.

I invite Hon. Members, and anyone who may be listening, to read The Handmaid's Tale, a novel by Margaret Atwood. I wish I had time to quote from it this evening. In that book, Margaret Atwood describes, in very dramatic terms, what can happen in the future when a state adopts a policy of "salvaging", pursuant to which people are forced to witness public executions.

Not long ago, I heard a Member of this Parliament express the opinion that women who have abortions should face the death penalty. When I heard that, I was left to wonder what we might have in store for us if we should reinstate capital punishment in Canada! The death penalty does not stop murders. Based on the U.S. experience, it appears that the death penalty does not even decrease the number of murders. There are, however, other steps that we can take which will decrease the number of killings.

Let me relate to you an example from my own riding of Vancouver East. For years the people of Vancouver East have been crying out for measures that will lead to a decrease in the number of murders in downtown Vancouver, murders in which the weapon is usually a knife. We have asked for the banning of knives in public places.

Over the years, many constituents have been murder victims at the hands of someone carrying a knife. Thus far this year, six out of twelve murders in Vancouver have involved knives, and a similar trend is reported in other cities across the country. These murders take place during moments of passion.

Often alcohol is involved. A fight takes place at a bar, or on the street; a bit of pushing takes place, and a knife is produced. In the heat of the moment, a murder takes place.

The death penalty will not stop this type of murder. Banning knives will, or it at least will decrease the number of murders. But, the people of my riding have got nowhere in their quest for action to reduce the number of murders. I call upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), once again, to investigate this situation. I ask him to consider the request for amendments to the Criminal Code that will prohibit the carrying of dangerous knives in public places.

This is a debate about how we view ourselves as a nation. Do we want to be a nation where the state conducts cold-blooded murder? I say no: no to death and yes to life.

Citizens must be protected, and murderers must be committed—for a lifetime, if necessary; but state murder of murderers is no solution. It denigrates all of us, as we ourselves become killers. It is immoral; it is wrong.

Let's direct our energies, instead, toward working for life, for humanity, and for a better society. Let's try to reduce violence and hate on TV and in society. Let's help children to grow with love and security, and reasonable limits, such that they become socialized human beings who care about others.

• (2200)

Let's provide necessary services and guidance at an early age for those who lack inner strengths or are emotionally disturbed. Let's offer young people positive alternatives to homelessness, drugs, prostitution, crime, and a terrible incidence of suicide. Let's get on with positive programs to deal with child abuse and domestic violence which can lead to death and murders. Let's start a serious war on poverty, on unemployment, and on hopelessness which is the chronic state of far too many Canadians.

I say from my heart to all my colleagues in the House, let's be proud tonight that we have reaffirmed the importance of life while we sat in our time as Members of Parliament in the House. Let's do a noble thing together tonight. Let's refuse to go backward to reinstate the death penalty. Let's vote instead in large numbers against this motion and for a better society in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, I have made a number of important speeches since I began my recent political career, but this one will be one of the most important ones, and I therefore wish to dedicate it in all sincerity, first of all to my colleagues in this House who do not share my views, then to my constituents in the riding of Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup and to all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, editorial writer Carl Thériault at the weekly newspaper the St-Laurent Echo, who is well known in my riding, concluded an article on the death penalty in the May 7 issue this year with the following words, and I quote:

> The issue may be a very personal one for each Member of the House of Commons but it is also a refletion of how the collective attitudes of a nation have changed. A country like Canada has always been known for its balanced opinions based on facts rather than on the emotional content of certain problems.
> The death penalty is a good example. We can only hope that Canadian parliamentarians will continue to live up to this honourable reputation.

Mr. Speaker, my speech on this very important question will try to reflect the attitudes and purpose supported by this philosopher from my region.

From his conclusion we realize he does not side with the majority who, in my constituency as in many areas in Canada, in answer to a flat question: " Are you for or against?" have to come up with a bold answer, with no possibility of tempering their views as required by such a difficult subject, and without having had an opportunity to think the matter over before making such an outright choice, for or against.

Mr. Speaker, in support of my choice I would like to bring the view of another eminent citizen of my constituency of Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, judge Jean-Paul Bérubé, the dean of Sessions Courts judges in Quebec. He summed up the matter of capital punishment a few months only before being appointed to that court. In a now defunct local newspaper called Le Renouveau, when the late John Diefenbaker's Conservative Government was considering indeed abolishing capital punishment, Mr. Jean-Paul Bérubé wrote, and I quote:

> Abolitionists claim that capital punishment is absurd, it prevents a criminal from redeeming himself, it repares nothing; it does not intimidate criminals, let alone detersing them; finally, what if a court error leads to an innocent being executed, that error is beyond repair, and then society as a whole is responsible.

And the lawyer concluded with a quote from a French priest, who for some time was a Member of France's Parliament, a firm abolitionist, who stated during a debate on the abolition of capital punishment, and I quote that extremely intense comment which clearly defines the challenge before this Parliament: He used to say: "Capital punishment is an illusionary and dangerous defence. It attacks the effects of crime and not its causes. It is an easy way out which excuses the legislators from addressing the real problem, that of prevention and possible rehabilitation".

Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time that we try to sum up this vital issue. The first time I remember dates back to the Diefenbaker government which had opened the debate on this issue. I had been impressed by an argument which I could not quote exactly now but which meant that capital punishment would deter neither the murderer who plans his crime because he is convinced he is clever enough to escape justice, nor the murderer acting out of passion who, in a moment of uncontrollable emotion, acts without thinking twice, nor the hired assassin who kills in cold blood for a price which has nothing to do with the risk of capital punishment. So that, in the end, the only people really intimidated by this legislation are those who will never kill.

Mr. Speaker, even if I am perfectly aware that most of my constituents would give a positive answer to the question "Are you in favour of reinstating capital punishment?", I am convinced that this would be a quick and hasty answer, resulting from an excessive self-defence reflex, which following discussion, could be restored to more reasonablable terms. I am convinced that by meeting personally with these respondents, I could easily bring them to the positive sentiments expressed by the editor, the jurist and the theologian I quoted a while ago. In short, we should not fall into the trap of sentimentality which could distract us from the real issue, the root of crime. By approving retribution, our conscience is clear but no more. As legislators, our sense of responsibilities should carry us further.

Mr. Speaker, I always been unable to believe that capital punishment sets an example for potential criminals. As a result of what historians have told us about the death penalty as retribution and what we have seen in historic films and documents—if we go back to earlier times, we realize that there is some logic in that argument. The death penalties were publicly carried out and that was an important aspect of the example to discourage eventual criminals. However, with the development of our civilization, those public scenes of torture were disapproved and progressively, retribution by the state for even the most contemptible crimes was questioned. The executions are now carried out more secretly and less brutally. I think that this refinement was developed to make the execution easier, the previous torture being replaced by the painless execution and to observe a greater discretion, the public place being replaced by an isolated corner of the prison in the presence of a few official witnesses because the executioners were not very proud of themselves. And surely the abolitionists are not so proud either since to my knowledge those who are demanding the reinstatement of the death penalty do not complain about the effectiveness of the procedure nor about the discretion of the execution. Tell me where is the exemplarity?

Mr. Speaker, greater experts than myself on the matter have tried to prove that that penalty does not act as a deterrent, and they have succeeded in proving it since capital punishment was abolished in Canada. Others had referred to the irremediable guilt feeling owing to the concern about a possible miscarriage of justice. I agree this last argument has its merits. Novels, political writings and films have made heroes of criminals executed after being convicted of crimes for which the death penalty was given at the time, while afterwards, people started having second thoughts. I am convinced that the quality of our judiciary system, based on the presumption of innocence, has reduced this risk considerably. However, these are reasonable and genuine arguments we cannot ignore.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that the death penalty does not protect the public against potential criminals. We have all, from time to time, read reports in the media on series of murders of policemen on duty and more recently, of convenience store owners. Executing these murderers would do nothing to protect policemen or store owners. Actually, people who rob convenience stores without killing, people who commit their crimes without killing policemen are still around and are a potential danger when we are talking about violent acts. An armed thief who commits his crime without killing a policeman or a convenience store owner is not any less dangerous than the thief who used his deadly weapon when he was caught in the act. One will be sent to jail and the other will be sentenced to be hanged. And what kind of additional protection does hanging the second criminal afford society? I don't believe in this argument, because, as I said before, the death penalty would only have a deterrent effect on someone who would be afraid to commit the crime leading to the murder. The other guy, who is involved in a crime where he will be able to escape or who is a professional criminal, is usually afraid of nothing, even if his life depends on it, whether it means being shot down by a policeman exercising his responsibility as the protector of the public or by an executioner with a legitimate mandate to do so. It doesn't make much difference to him.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me to my very real concern which is how we ought to punish acts of murder. How do we deal with this evil at the source? My answer to that is by seeking a better distribution of wealth in our country and the gradual building of a juster society. I became involved in active politics, inspired by a great Canadian who is committed to these goals, our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). Since my election, I have done my best to meet these objectives, first, by being receptive to the grievances of my fellow citizens and by looking for the maximum of benefits within Government programs to meet their expectations, second, by working at developing new programs to meet this objective, and third, by supporting the major legislative proposals of our Government which I believe can contribute to this end, such as the tax reform proposal announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), to name but one.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore express the wish that my colleagues who advocate reinstatement of the death penalty will reflect on this more constructive approach, which they would surely be able to convince their fellow citizens to support, by taking the time necessary to reflect and argue on such a crucial issue instead of giving in to the temptation of first impression arguments steeped in feelings of revenge and especially helplessness. Indeed, I have to say that I find the attitude of the advocates of the death penalty fatalistic and steeped in a feeling of helplessness at endowing our country with more equitable social programs, and in this regard, our colleagues opposite should perhaps reflect on our expressed intention to bring about a better distribution of our social programs by giving less to the better-off and more to the poor at the risk of making certain exceptions to the universality principle.

You see, Mr. Speaker, when I read in the newspapers that two senior citizens, who have lived together for 40, 50 or 60 years and who have raised eight or ten children can feel so much hate for each other that it leads to the death of one of them, my feeling of helplessness does not make me want to punish these acts of violence by a return of the death penalty, but look for means to improve the standard of living and well-being of these victims of poverty. One of the solutions which I still find reasonable would be to give more to senior citizens whose only income is the old age security pension and to give less or even nothing at all to those pensioners who have the good fortune of benefitting from the generosity of our system.

I still regret the demagogic comments of certain apologists of the universality principle who put a check on this will for greater social justice, and I find this a good opportunity to express my views even more forcefully.

Mr. Speaker, when I hear, as we often do from our media, about youths who, in a moment of despair, have killed convenience store owners or a pedestrian for a measly $100 and even less sometimes, my feeling of helplessness does not lead me to promote a return of the death penalty, but to try and find how I could promote a better distribution of our wealth to avoid such situations. Indeed, I firmly believe that no criminal is born bad. Evil, cruelty, immorality and a tendency to crime are probably weaknesses which exist in human nature, but they develop when the social environment promotes such weaknesses more pressingly than the more humane and positive feelings which must be present in all the right-thinking people that we are to speak about the right to life and death of these criminals who deserve our consideration and attention, whatever we might blame them for. None of us here can lay claim to perfection and set himself as absolute judge to decide whether they will live or die, although it may appear legitimate, because supported by the majority, that the state should impose such a penalty for the most odious crimes.

There is no doubt that this very legitimacy would result from a survey which would ask the following question: "Would you be in favour of Parliament adopting legislation to improve the lot of the disadvantaged?" by directing this question to the same people who were asked: "Do you agree that capital punishment should be reinstated?"

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that a great many citizens who are in favour of reinstating capital punishment base their choice on the notion that it would be less expensive for the state to execute murderers than to pension them for life.

Well, I have been particularly impressed by the fact that economic analysts have shown that this popular belief is unfounded, to a large extent.

First of all, only a very small proportion of prisoners would be sentenced to death and executed. Then, what is generally meant by the expression "annual cost" of keeping a prisoner is obtained by dividing the total cost to the Canadian Penitentiary Service by the number of prisoners. Then we realize immediately that removing a few of them each year would have no more practical impact on this cost than on the total cost to the penitentiary services.

Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker. Everything seems to indicate that a prospect of a death sentence would make procedures longer and more complex. The appeals, the pleas for clemency, and the execution process would prove still more expensive for the Canadian judiciary system.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that Canadians who are watching this debate will realize that reinstating capital punishment would not result in a significant reduction of the financial burden to society.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make submissions with regard to this very important issue facing the House of Commons and Canadians. Unfortunately, a great number of my colleagues will not have the opportunity to express their points of view here in the House. That is because the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) decided to invoke closure this morning, notwithstanding the fact that he promised, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) promised and other high-ranking officials in the Conservative Party promised that we would have a full and open debate on the subject.

• (2220)

We have no alternative but to vote on this motion tonight. I consider it unacceptable, given the serious nature of the issue before us, that the Government should invoke closure, thereby denying a great number of individuals an opportunity to express their points of view.

In less than three hours, the House of Commons, consisting of 279 Members at this time, will be called upon to decide whether or not capital punishment should be reinstated, whether or not the Criminal Code of Canada should be amended to provide that the death penalty be reinstated. There is no question that the vote will be a close one. It will be the closest vote there has been in the three years of this particular Parliament and it will likely be the closest vote there has been in the last number of years.

The burden of proving to the House that capital punishment should be reinstated rests on those who are in favour of reinstating capital punishment. In my submission, the advocates of capital punishment have not discharged that burden. They have not convinced Members of the House to support capital punishment. They have not provided the necessary evidence to convince Members that capital punishment is in fact a deterrent. Is it any wonder that a number of those who previously supported capital punishment no longer support it today? They have been convinced that capital punishment is not the answer.

Those who have changed their views, those who previously supported capital punishment but who will in less than three hours vote against it, ought to be commended for the position they have taken. In effect, it has been a tough decision for them. It has been somewhat tougher than it has been for those of us who have always opposed capital punishment. We as Members of Parliament should congratulate those Hon. Members for their wise judgment on this particular issue.

With regard to those who advocate capital punishment led by the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), it is clear that they have lost the battle. If I were a betting person, I would bet at this point that the motion to reinstate capital punishment will be defeated. Even if it is not defeated, it is clear that the vote will be a close one. It is clear that public opinion has moved somewhat over the last number of months since this resolution was tabled in the House of Commons. Canadians in increasing numbers have been convinced that it is not the right thing to do.

When the time comes for me to cast my vote on this resolution, I intend to vote against it. I intend to vote against the reinstatement of capital punishment for a very simple reason. I will vote against it because it is wrong. It is wrong to kill a human being. Capital punishment in my view is the mark of an indecent, uncivilized and immoral society.

To reinstate capital punishment is to revert back to the law of the jungle, to the law of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. Vengeance is the only justification for the return of capital punishment. In their heart of hearts, those who argue for capital punishment know that it is not a deterrent. Later on in my comments, I will look briefly at some of the statistics to show that in fact it cannot be proven on a balance of probabilities that it is a deterrent.

To take human life is wrong. It is interesting to note that a great many of those who support the reinstatement of capital punishment are opposed to abortion. That is a somewhat hypocritical position to take. Those very Hon. Members who rose in the House of Commons and argued in favour of capital punishment rose a few short weeks ago to argue about the sanctity of life. It is somewhat strange for those Hon. Members to decide all of a sudden that human life is no longer sacred, that in certain circumstances human life can be taken. I suggest that if it is wrong to kill an innocent unborn child, it is wrong to kill a human being.

It is interesting to note as well that a few months ago, I put a question to the Hon. Member for Peterborough in committee. I asked him if he would execute Colin Thatcher, and he did not answer me. Mr. Thatcher, a former politician, a former cabinet Minister in the Saskatchewan Government, was convicted of first-degree murder. One would have thought, given the fanatic nature of the beliefs of the Hon. Member for Peterborough, that he would not have hesitated to say that indeed, Colin Thatcher ought to be executed because he was convicted of first-degree murder and the Hon. Member supports capital punishment for first-degree murder. It is strange he did not say that Colin Thatcher should be executed. I asked myself why he did not say that Colin Thatcher should be executed and it is because in his view, Colin Thatcher does not fit the mould of a convicted murderer.

It is clear that as far as the Hon. Member for Peterborough is concerned, the debate is lost. I take solace in the fact that even though the motion to put together a committee composed of 15 Members might carry, I am convinced, given the closeness of the vote, that we will never see legislation to bring back capital punishment carry in this House.

Eleven years ago, this matter was decided here in the House of Commons by a very slim margin. The arguments were made 11 years ago both in favour of and against capital punishment. Parliament, in its wisdom, decided not to restore capital punishment at that time. Why are we here again 11 years later talking about capital punishment?

We know that the Prime Minister made an election promise and we know that he has not kept too many of his election promises. However, one of the promises he made was to have an open, free vote here in the House of Commons in spite of the fact that he is opposed to capital punishment.

I commend the Prime Minister for the position he has taken. I am appreciative of the fact that he took the opportunity a few days ago to speak in the House of Commons, but it was wrong for him to make that promise. If he was in fact a true leader, if he was as principled as he says he is, he would not have allowed this matter to be debated again.

• (2230)

It is not often that I agree with the Prime Minister but I agree with the position he has taken on this issue. I agree with his words:

> —we uphold one simple principle: the inherent dignity of a human being, the inherent worth of a human life. I will resist with all my strength, all of my life, any action that would diminish that reality and would lessen that value.

A few weeks ago the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) said:

> I believe the state must aspire to a higher ideal than simply killing people who cannot be fitted into our scope of conduct.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party a few short weeks ago said:

> In coldly taking the life of a murderer, the state would simply compound the real unacceptability of the original violent act.

Eleven years ago former Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau said:

> Are we, as a society, so lacking in respect for ourselves, so lacking in hope for human betterment, so socially bankrupt that we are ready to accept state vengeance as our penal philosophy? To retain (capital punishment) in the Criminal Code of Canada would be to abandon reason in favour of vengeance; to abandon hope and confidence in favour of a despairing acceptance of our inability to cope with violent crime except in violence.

It is obvious that even if capital punishment were reinstated it is unlikely that any responsible Prime Minister, any reasonable, rational Prime Minister, would ever allow another human being in Canada to be executed.

Some of the advocates of capital punishment say that they must respond to their constituents. Yes, public opinion polls have been somewhat consistent over the years, although in the last number of weeks and months those in favour of capital punishment, according to the public opinion polls, are fewer in number.

Notwithstanding the public opinion polls, I firmly believe that Canadians do not support capital punishment. Why then, when asked, do they say that they support capital punishment? It seems to me that one of the reasons people indicate that they support capital punishment is their frustration with the criminal justice system.

We all know that the criminal justice system is not perfect. There is cause for concern with regard to the charging of individuals, plea-bargaining, actual criminal trials, sentencing, incarceration, parole, and mandatory supervision. The debate on capital punishment has become a lightning rod for all the disillusionment, disappointment, and disrespect which exists with regard to the criminal justice system. There is, unfortunately, cynicism developing among Canadians which must be addressed.

I am convinced that if we as parliamentarians used our collective wisdom and collective political will, we could improve the criminal justice system which is so imperfect. I believe that we as parliamentarians have a duty to study the system, to educate and sensitize people to the issues, and to seek to create a consensus with regard to specific reforms.

Some of the areas which I feel merit serious attention include sentencing, plea-bargaining in the trial process, alternatives to incarceration, the correctional system including correctional philosophy, institutional programming, inmate accommodation, prison construction, the role of the correctional investigator, release procedures involving the correctional services and the National Parole Board, post-release programs and accommodation, the role of voluntary organizations such as the John Howard Society, victims of crime including their right to information, property restitution and impact statements, the public's perception of crime including the role of the media, public legal education, the effect of the Charter of Rights, and other issues as well.

Is there any wonder that there is disrespect for the criminal justice system when a person like Allan Sweeney, who was convicted of murder, was erroneously released by the National Parole Board only to commit another murder? There are those who suggest that if he were executed the first time he would not have been released to commit the second murder.

Well, Mr. Sweeney may have committed the actual physical act, but the responsibility for the death of Celia Ruygrok is not that of Mr. Sweeney alone, but of the system. The system failed Celia Ruygrok. She could be alive today if the National Parole Board had all the information before it. It is clear that in that particular case the National Parole Board did not have the necessary information to decide whether Mr. Sweeney ought to have been released. The system failed. Rather than talking about capital punishment we should be talking about ways to improve the criminal justice system to ensure and enhance the safety of Canadians.

Those who support capital punishment make a number of arguments. The main argument they make is that capital punishment is a deterrent. As I indicated, it clearly is not. Almost all of the studies that have been conducted indicate that capital punishment is not a deterrent. It is plain and simple. Canadian statistics, as well as U.S. statistics, show that it is not. In 1975, the year before Parliament repealed the death sentence, there were 701 homicides which include murder, manslaughter and infanticide. In 1983, seven years after abolition, there were 682 homicides. A more important statistic is the rate of homicides per 100,000 of population. In 1975 Canada's homicide rate was 3.09 per 100,000. By 1983 it had fallen to 2.74 per 100,000.

Those who argue that capital punishment is necessary to protect policemen are also without supporting evidence. In the five years before abolition 19 policemen were murdered compared to 18 in the five years after abolition.

The statistics from the United States also punch big holes in the deterrence theory. Presently 38 states have the death penalty on the books. Yet, as a nation, the United States registered a homicide rate of 8.3 per 100,000 compared to our figure of 2.74 per 100,000. The Americans have capital punishment in 37 of the 50 states. Would you rather live in the United States than in Canada? I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you are shaking your head. Most Canadians would agree with you. We do not have capital punishment in Canada yet we have one of the safest societies anywhere in the world. We have probably the highest rate of incarceration anywhere in the western world, but we also have one of the lowest crime rates anywhere in the world. We ought to be proud that the rate of violent crime is so low compared to that of the United States and many other western nations.

Those who support capital punishment erroneously argue that violent crime is on the increase. The statistics dictate otherwise. In effect, violent crime has not increased. If anything, it has decreased. It is still possible in downtown Ottawa, Toronto, Edmonton, Montreal, Vancouver, or Halifax to walk down the streets late at night and feel safe that one will not be mugged, robbed, raped or in any way assaulted. One just cannot do that in Detroit, Los Angeles, New York, Chicago, or Miami. We have every reason to be proud that we have such a low crime rate.

• (2240)

There are those who argue that we should reinstate capital punishment on the basis of cost. That is the most disgusting argument one can think of. They argue that it would be cheaper to execute, to kill a human being, than to incarcerate a human being for 25, 30, or 40 years. Since when do we put a price on human life? It is wrong to suggest that if we execute individuals it may be a saving to the state. It certainly does not hold any persuasive power, yet there are those in the House who suggest that as a reason for reinstating capital punishment.

There are those in the House who support capital punishment and honestly believe that retribution, vengeance, is a reason to reinstate capital punishment. I say it is wrong to have retribution or vengeance as the basis of our criminal justice system. If an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, were the basis for our criminal justice system, why would we not cut off the hand of a thief or physically harm others who do physical harm to their victims?

You have indicated that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. In closing I want to ask those who have not yet made up their minds, in spite of the fact that we will vote in a short period of time, to vote against the resolution that is before us. To vote for the motion would result in this country being one of the very few countries in the world that presently have capital punishment. To vote for the motion would return Canada to the law of the jungle and would return Canada to an uncivilized, indecent and immoral society.

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on capital punishment. Let me say at the outset of my remarks that I support the re-establishment of capital punishment in Canada. I do so as the result of a personal conviction I have had all my adult life. I believe that the basic issue is protection for society. Most people will realize and agree that society is demanding more protection. There are many people in our society who resort to violence as a means of enforcing their will over others. This is evident from the large number of robberies that are reported every day in the national press. This happens not only in the large cities, but throughout Canada in the small cities, down to our small towns and villages.

I approach the re-establishment of capital punishment as a necessary step to providing society with protection.

If our system of jurisprudence is considered objectively, it will be seen that it more than adequately protects the rights of the criminal. The murderer is informed of his rights. He is given the counsel of a lawyer who protects the criminal's interests. He also has the right to appeal to a higher court. Society bends over backwards to protect the rights of the accused. This is more than a murderer gives his victim whom he deprives of the most basic right, the right to live. That victim has none of the benefits given to his killer whose act is final. That victim has no jury, no lawyer, and no appeal.

When I state that I support capital punishment, I am, of course, referring to capital punishment for first degree murder as described in the Criminal Code. Section 212 to Section 215 of the Criminal Code defines first degree murder as, first, all planned or premeditated murder, second, the killing of a police officer, third, the killing of a prison guard and, fourth, the killing of one or more persons while committing another offence such as rape or theft. I do not favour capital punishment for second degree murder or manslaughter.

I want to read into the record some comments from the June 8, 1987 edition of the Swift Current Sun, a newspaper published bi-weekly in Swift Current, Saskatchewan. These comments are made by a Mrs. Ruth Lee-Knight who lost a daughter last August in London, England.

She makes several points in this article that I believe are very relevant. She makes them as the mother of a victim. She states:

> I do want to raise the consciousness of people so they have a fuller picture of crime and what it does to its victims. I would ask that everyone, before coming to any conclusion about how society deals with murderers, becomes a little acquainted with what victims endure. In decision-making people should recognize the hard fact that the victim's family has a life's sentence imposed on them with no chance of parole or early release.

She goes on to make some other very valid points, particularly dealing with the increased public awareness of the sentencing and the reality of how the system works. She says:

> Hopefully this will lead to a general tightening up of bail and all forms of early release for violent offenders.
> Many who oppose the return of the death penalty are the same people who have lobbied so successfully over the years for the rights of offenders and they are well organized in their efforts. Many operate on government funds and our concern is that, because of their resources the Canadian public will be presented with only one side of the issue as they have in the past.

She concludes her article by again making reference to the organized groups or individuals who make statements regarding the suitable punishment for murderers. She states:

> For the most part they are far removed from knowledge of pain caused by such individuals for the lifetime of the victim's family. They are not close to a murdered victim, never knew anyone who was murdered, don't appreciate all that dies and is lost forever to the world when a special person is murdered by a criminal who has nothing to offer, yet lives. Many of these groups or individuals speak from a position of ignorance and yet are taken seriously.

I want to spend some time talking about the purposes of the remedial and corrective measures. One of the main concerns in considering the problem of abolishing or retaining capital punishment is whether or not the crime demands the penalty or whether the penalty is suitable for the crime. There is no doubt that in graduating the offences the punishment is also graduated proportionately on a reasonably equitable basis. However, the more serious the crime, the more difficult it is to evaluate the punishment inasmuch as more criteria for the evaluation of the commission of the crime enter into the picture.

In reviewing many sociological, historical, and philosophical texts, there is no doubt that the principle of punishment for an offence has never been questioned. However, there are many diverging and varying views on the nature of punishment and the intention of the punishment.

Today's permissive elements consider punishment as revenge or the paying of a debt in proportional amount to the offence committed, and feel that it is wrong. Rather, according to the soft sciences, society should try to reshape an individual or to understand the commission of the crime and to take constructive measures to rehabilitate.

● (2250)

This philosophy may be a laudable one which may work in some instances, but practical experience has shown beyond a shadow of a doubt that some people who choose to ignore the laws of society simply cannot, will not and do not want to be rehabilitated, and the only alternative which society has openly demanded time and time again is the absolute assurance that the crime will not be repeated.

As a basic principle, an individual who will not abide by the laws of society should be removed from that society and dealt with in a proper manner. The proper manner might well vary according to the individual and the crime committed, graduating to the severest punishment for the worst offence. There is no doubt that the taking of a life is, indeed, the worst offence that can be committed. The severest punishment has traditionally been death. If one is to consider the purpose of remedial and corrective measures from the rehabilitation point of view, then death as a penalty is of little value. On this premise, some question the value of the death penalty, identify it with revenge, and say that it is hardly a corrective measure because of its finality. But the death penalty and punishment are not of their nature vengeful.

Punishment is more related to a forceful remedial action, one that will have a marked corrective effect and be so shocking to the recipient or to others that the act which merited the punishment will not be repeated if only because it attacks the self-preservation instinct and the natural desire to freedom of the offender.

Inasmuch as rehabilitation has its place where there is an assured chance of success, society has nevertheless unequivocally rejected the experimental attitude and has expressed the unqualified desire that the principle of maximum punishment, as opposed to the principle of rehabilitation, be retained so that, where applicable, the severest penalty, as a penalty will be applied.

The value of rehabilitation and punishment as separate ideas and methods in the field of corrections has long been debated. Some quarters feel that the idea of punishment as being vengeful is not proper. However, I submit that in this instance they have erred in removing punishment and substituting rehabilitation. Both have their value, but they are dependent upon the nature of the individual as well as the nature of the crime and what society expects by way of protection for itself, as a whole, as well as protection of its individuals.

This brings in the next facet in the evaluation of actual and contemplated corrective measures in rehabilitation and punishment. In either case, it is stated without argument from any quarter that the object is the prevention of crime and that the exercise or measure taken must have a deterrent quality. The quality of deterrence can be looked upon from two aspects, the first being repetition and the second being prevention. Following up on this premise, which is tenable even using the arguments of the abolitionists, the only penalty that can achieve the maximum deterrence from repetition of the crime and that would prevent crime is death. The principle of rehabilitation, so called life imprisonment or other measures, in the eyes of society, if not in the eyes of sociologists and others, has not proven adequate.

This issue of deterrence should not be decided only on the deterrent factor but must be a consideration. Nevertheless, there is much evidence to show that capital punishment is a deterrent. Paul Gascon, the executive secretary of the Public Service Alliance, which represents penitentiary guards, reported that the six guards taken hostage in the Kingston penitentiary riot in 1971 may owe their lives to the existence of capital punishment. He said: "The inmates were told that if a guard was killed, the responsible people would be hanged".

Criminal sanctions do not stop all crimes, but there is no question that the vast majority of Canadians want these sanctions and are convinced that they do deter some from committing crimes ranging from theft to murder. I believe it is imperative that our laws stress personal responsibility for one's actions. This assumption is a basic tenet of our civilization. I believe we must always take into account all factors surrounding the commission of a crime when sentencing a convicted criminal and thereby sometimes reducing a sentence. However, I do not accept the claim that every murder represents a failure of society and that society must acknowledge its guilt.

The other issue raised over and over by those supporting the abolition of capital punishment is that an innocent individual may be executed. This straw man raised by abolitionists is an illogical argument. It is probably very much less than the possibility that a criminal may commit another murder while serving a long prison term, or later when on parole. There is not one example of a person executed who was found later to have been innocent by a court or Government in Canada. However, it has been reported that convicts on parole and mandatory supervision in Canada were responsible for 41 murders and 27 manslaughter offences. One of the leading abolitionists in the United States, Adam Bedau, has stated: "It is false sentimentality to argue that the death penalty should be abolished because of the abstract possibility that an innocent person might be executed". He cites a study of the 7,000 executions in the United States from 1893 to 1971 and concludes that the record fails to show that such cases occur. The main point, however, is that if government functioned only when the possibility of error did not exist, government would not function at all. Human life deserves special protection and one of the best ways to guarantee that protection is to ensure that convicted murderers do not kill again. Only the death penalty can accomplish this end.

We have also heard over and over that juries may not want to convict someone of first degree murder. This is also a foolish argument. In trials for murder where capital punishment is the penalty for first degree murder, prospective jurors can be excused in such instances if they are opposed to capital punishment. I would like to quote from an article by the Mayor of New York, Edward Koch, on April 15, 1985 in the periodical The New Republic. He states:

> Everyone wants his or her rights, and will defend them jealously. Not everyone, however, wants responsibilities, especially the painful responsibilities that come with law enforcement. Twenty-three years ago a woman named Kitty Genovese was assaulted and murdered on a street in New York. Dozens of neighbours heard her cries for help but did nothing to assist her. They didn't even call the police. In such a climate the criminal understandably grows bolder.

He went on to say:

The death of anyone—even a convicted killer—diminishes us all. But we are diminished even more by a justice system that fails to function. It is an illusion to let ourselves believe that doing away with capital punishment removes the murderer's deed from our conscience. The rights of society are paramount. When we protect guilty lives, we give up innocent lives in exchange.

When opponents of capital punishment say to the state: "I will not let you kill in my name", they are also saying to murderers: "You can kill in your own name as long as I have an excuse for not getting involved."

It is hard to imagine anything worse than being murdered while neighbours do nothing. But something worse exists. When those same neighbours shrink back from justly punishing the murderer, the victim dies twice.

Successive polls over a number of years have shown conclusively that an overwhelming majority of Canadians are demanding the return of capital punishment. I firmly believe in my heart that capital punishment is a deterrent and it does provide an element of protection for society. I have made my position on this issue very clear ever since I sought the nomination in 1984 and later during the 1984 election campaign.

In closing I would like to say again that I will be voting in favour of capital punishment for all of the above stated reasons.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time in 11 years that I have had the opportunity to participate in a debate such as this. The motion that is before us tonight poses a problem for us. Where do we want Canadian society to go? Do we want to take Canadian society back to the Dark Ages? That is what the supporters of this motion are asking us to do. They want to take us back to an uncivilized society.

It seems to me that what we ought to be doing is spending our time in building and developing a concerned society, taking a look at violence in society, whether it be violence in a dark alley, violence in the home against the wife or children, or whether it is violence on the hockey rink or on the playing fields.

How much of our resources do we put into research concerning violent behaviour? What is it that causes people to behave in a violent fashion? What identifiable tools do we have, what methods and means do we have to assist those who are involved in early childhood education to assist youngsters with respect to dealing with their feelings and expressing them in a socially acceptable way?

We can vote in favour of this motion tonight. We can take Canada back, back to a time in history when violence was the response to violent behaviour. Indeed, we think it is barbarous today the way we treat schoolchildren when they misbehave, to beat the tar out of them. We give them the strap. The strap is supposed to tell them they should not behave violently. What this motion is asking us to do is to kill people who kill people to make other people not kill. There is something missing in the logic which escapes me. It is the same with respect to the way we treat young children. We respond in a violent way to a child who does not behave in a socially acceptable fashion. We hope that that child will grow up to behave in a sensitive, loving and responsive way.

I want to tell Hon. Members that that has not worked. This motion, if passed, will not work. The supporters of this motion would have us turn back the clock on human civilization.

If the motion is passed, what will happen is an admission of defeat. That is why we have kept the strap in the schools. It is for corporal punishment, which is an admission of failure, that the only way that one can maintain order and discipline in the class-room is to have the strap handy in the drawer. The first son of a gun who steps out of line, the teacher just takes him outside and lays into him. It seems to me that that is an admission of failure. It is an admission of failure on our part. Capital punishment is an admission that society has failed and that, in fact, the murderer has won. He has reached beyond the grave and he has won. The dark side will have won.

It seems that the arguments I have heard from the supporters of this motion say somehow or other that by passing it and bringing back the rope we will create a safer society. That is a false sense of security. All the statistics and all the evidence that has been amassed and presented in the House over the last several days clearly indicates that there is no relationship between having capital punishment on the books on the one side and murder on the other.

It is a nice, easy way for parliamentarians to stand here in the wee hours of the morning and vote for this motion to bring back hanging. We can then walk out of here feeling self-righteous that we have created a safer society and we will not have anything to do anymore. We can pack up our books. We do not have to pay attention to the problem anymore.

That is the challenge for those of us who are going to vote against the motion. It means that we have to keep on seeking to find better ways of dealing with violent criminal behaviour.

I suggest that locking them up in some maximum security prison and throwing the key away is not the way either. I also suggest to Hon. Members that there is a greater challenge for us. Should this motion carry tonight, and I sincerely hope it will not, the streets of any city in Canada will not be any safer. No home in Canada will be safer. No family will be safer.

In fact, by having capital punishment on the books it may very well ensure that murderers get off because juries will be loath to convict when they know—

Mr. McCurdy: They don't want to make a mistake.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. The whole idea of not making a mistake remains uppermost in their minds. They may very well be hesitant to bring in a guilty verdict.

As I look back and read popular press, I ask myself who it is who is really hung for murder. It is not the rich, not at all. When a policeman carrying out his peace-keeping duties is murdered by a criminal we all correctly feel a loss because, collectively, we have experienced one.

I live in a mining community and for years and years we have known that corporations gave no concern to health and safety on the job. In fact, workers died on the job. But nobody in this country prosecuted a corporate owner of a mine.

In fact, some very interesting information was published by the Federal Law Reform Commission which issued a report last month. It stated in its report that employers who make workers risk death or serious injury should be subject to a proposed new offence of endangerment. The report also stated that as many as 3,600 Canadians die each year from cancer caused by workplace pollution. There are 175 health and safety inspectors in Labour Canada for all of Canada. But imagine 3,000 people dying in the country each year because, in fact, the environment in their job was not safe.

If I were to say to the movers of this motion that capital punishment should be applied to the corporate bigwigs of this country, those who turn a blind eye to the health and safety of workers on the job, they would immediately say: "Hold it; hold it. This wasn't meant for those people. Those are good citizens. Those are productive citizens. They contribute to the life of Canada." No one ever talks about that kind of white collar homicide, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that those the movers of this motion want to hang are those who belong to minority groups, to the poor.

If this House of Commons this evening votes in favour of bringing back capital punishment, bringing back the rope, we would be accepting a culture of violence; we would be sinking into a state of barbarism. I, for one, will not cast a ballot to take Canada down to that level.

If this motion is in fact passed, a committee will be established to study the question of capital punishment. We have already spent a lot of time on this question over the last several months. That would have been time better spent in trying to find more positive and progressive ways of dealing with violent behaviour, of dealing with crime in this country.

Some of those intending to vote in favour of this motion have said that they will do so on the basis of the majority of their constituents wishing the reinstatement of capital punishment. Those constituents sent their respective Members of Parliament to Ottawa because they believed them to be intelligent and thoughtful. They considered that they had the ability to read and to draw some positive conclusions.

For those Hon. Members to say now that, while they themselves are against capital punishment, they will vote in favour of it on the basis of how their constituents feel, is an insult to their constituents. To take that position is an abrogation of the responsibility of an elected representative in a parliamentary democracy.

We are not delegates. If one were to extend that argument to its logical conclusion, we should take the same position on tax reform, and other matters. We would be mere puppets. We would turn over to the poll takers what is rightfully the responsibility of Members of Parliament, that being to deal with the issues facing society: social programs, tax reform, free trade. Truly then it could be said that the poll takers would be the legislators of the nation. I know that Percy Shelly said that poets are indeed the true legislators of the world. But to say that the poll takers should be the legislators is ridiculous. As much as we love Angus Reid these days, I would hardly want to concede to Angus Reid the responsibility of legislator of the nation.

We have a responsibility to our constituents to think a problem through. We have an obligation to read the appropriate material relative to a given issue, and then to cast an intelligent decision based on the facts that we have assimilated about it.

Indeed, our constituents are much wiser than we are. To those Hon. Members who take the position that they should vote in accordance with the view held by the majority of their constituents, I say: Be not faint of heart, you who hide behind polls. If you are thinking of re-election, the polls show that 73 per cent would not regard a vote on capital punishment contrary to how they feel about it as a reason to vote against their Member in the next election. I realize that that is only a poll, but certainly it indicates very clearly that our constituents are very wise; it indicates that they understand the process very well.

I have said that we have two choices, Mr. Speaker. As we go along the road, it forks. We can take the fork that takes us in the direction of Chile, Iran, and the Soviet Union—societies that are not noted for their human rights, societies that are not noted for progressive thinking in terms of how to deal with violent behaviour. We can go down that road. But, I am not prepared to travel down that road along with those who have proposed this motion. I am not prepared to go down that road. There is a better road, one that offers us greater security, and that is the road toward a more enlightened way of dealing with violent behaviour.

We have recently had brought down a White Paper on Defence that calls for expenditures over the next 20 years amounting to some $200 billion, and certainly the defence of our country is a legitimate undertaking. But how much are we spending to defend the country internally? How much of our Gross National Product are we prepared to commit to a study of the cause-effect relationship between poverty and violent behaviour, between unemployment and the effects of that on one's behaviour?

Are we prepared to spend a greater portion of our Gross National Product to defend the very nature of our democracy?

The answer is no. That is not something that we talk about in this place. But boy, we can sure whip off $200 billion for the military. I know that those expenditures will span 20 years, but I have yet to see a projected figure with respect to the kinds of studies in behavioural sciences that we should be engaged in, the kinds of studies that are required in the field of education. Indeed, there is a great cut-back going on in the educational field.

This is no time for governments to step back. The challenge is in this area, and we are not going to resolve it by quick fixes such as hanging. The rope is not going to resolve the problems which are connected to deep-seated human behaviour. For example, we have a housing crisis in the country, yet we seem to avoid spending and focusing on that particular problem. We have had reports on child care, one of the areas to which we should be paying very close attention. Our children should be number one.

• (2320)

I hope that my remarks will have caused those who have proposed the motion to think long and hard in these closing minutes before we vote, because to go the way of this motion is to go down that long, dark road from which there is no return.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties, and we are making excellent progress toward the completion of the legislative package with which we will deal tomorrow. I say without hesitation that it is thanks to the co-operation of the Liberal House Leader and the New Democratic Party House Leader.

I think Your Honour would find unanimous consent to put the following motion and also unanimous consent for the motion itself:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, when the House adjourns this day, it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 30, 1987 at ten o'clock a.m.;

Provided that:

At ten o'clock a.m., on that day, the House shall proceed to the consideration of "Routine Proceedings";

Upon the completion of "Routine Proceedings" the House shall proceed to Government Orders;

The House shall continue to sit between one o'clock p.m. and two o'clock p.m. to continue consideration of Government Orders;

At two o'clock p.m. for the remainder of the day's sitting, the provisions of the Standings shall be in effect; and

No later than 8 p.m. the Speaker shall suspend the sitting to the call of the Chair for the purposes of Royal Assent if necessary or adjourn the House as the case may be.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the Parliamentary Secretary to introduce the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, what the Deputy Government House Leader has read out certainly reflects our discussions.

I want to make clear that what he is proposing is subject to our Standing Orders which call for us to adjourn tomorrow until the appropriate date in September.

Mr. Lewis: Yes.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I just wanted to make sure that there was no doubt about that.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly our intention to facilitate the passage of a number of Bills on the last day of the session. However, I want to say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader that we have not had an opportunity to see those Bills including the farm Bill, the changes to the Farm Loans Act. Therefore, at this point it is difficult for us to make a determination on how we will proceed in terms of expediting the passage of that Bill or not until we have had a chance to see it.

I encourage the Parliamentary Secretary to provide us with a copy of the Bill at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. I made no reference to what would pass or fail tomorrow. My colleague is correct. I have already discussed the matter with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), and I believe he will be getting in touch with the spokespersons for the various Parties to look after the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REINSTATEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That this House supports, in principle, the reinstatement of capital punishment and directs that a special committee on reinstatement, composed of 15 members, be established, hold hearings and make its final report to the House no later than three (3) months following the adoption of this motion, such report to provide recommendations on:

(a) which offence or offences should carry the death penalty, and in what circumstances;

(b) which method or methods should be used to carry out the penalty of death, and in what circumstances;

That, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), this special committee be hereby appointed as a committee to prepare and bring in a bill no later than three months following the adoption of this motion, founded on the committee's recommendations on (a) and (b) above; such a bill shall be the object of a separate and distinct report of the special committee, and such a report shall be its final report;

That such bill, when reported from such special committee to the House, be deemed pursuant to Standing Order 107(1) to have been introduced and stand on the Order Paper, in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business"; and that, when the said bill has been read a second time, it shall stand referred to a Legislative Committee;

That the Striking Committee be empowered to name the Members of the special committee, provided that once the Striking Committee report is laid upon the Table, it shall be deemed concurred in;

That the special committee have the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned;

That the special committee be empowered to report from time to time and send for persons and papers, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the committee and to retain the services of expert, technical, professional and clerical staff;

That the special committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the appropriate staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the special committee be eight (8) members for any vote, resolution or other decision; and that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof whenever six (6) members are present;

That any substitution of membership on the special committee be made pursuant to Standing Order 94(4); and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when the special committee is ready to issue its final report and the said bill, the special committee shall present its report and the bill to the House by filing them with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the Table, and the bill shall then be deemed, pursuant to Standing Order 107(1), to have been introduced at the first sitting of the House thereafter and to stand on the Order Paper in the name of the special committee chairman, for first reading at the next sitting of the House; and that subsequent House stages of the bill be considered under "Government Orders", with the bill standing under the heading "Government Business".

And on the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p.7307).

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House of Commons calls for a vote in principle concerning the death penalty. In essence, what we are being asked is whether there is any crime, any combination of crimes, or any circumstance that would warrant execution of the perpetrator.

Mr. Nunziata: No.

Mr. Winegard: We are being asked if we believe it is appropriate for first degree, premeditated murder.

Mr. Nunziata: No.

Mr. Winegard: I think I can do without the Hon. Member's interjections. Most of the House was good enough to remain silent while he had his say. I think it would be appropriate for him to let the rest of us have our say.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Winegard: Is it appropriate for treason? Is it appropriate for terrorism? Is it appropriate for killing police officers and prison guards? The motion is one of principle only with detailed committee study to follow if the motion is carried.

This is, as most Members of the House have said, a very difficult issue, not only for us but for every thinking person in our society. It pits husband against wife, brother against sister, parents against children, and it has certainly engendered hundreds and thousands of letters on each side of the issue to Members of Parliament.

I have made no secret of my wish to see the death penalty restored as a possible form of punishment for the most atrocious killings. I would include certain instances of premeditated murder. I would also include repeated incidents of killing, even though the murders were not premeditated. As well, I think the terrorist who planted the bomb on the Air India flight should be executed.

My reason is simple. I believe the taking of a human life through premeditation or repeated violence deserves a punishment that fits the crime. I would not condemn to execution in every case even those people who commit first degree murder. If they are guilty, I believe the judge and jury should be able to take into consideration all the circumstances and the background before sentencing.

I will say more about these matters later, but let me move on to some of the issues people have raised on this subject. A common statement is that the state has no right to take a life. This is a statement which I believe cannot be substantiated. The state has always had the right and responsibility to protect life, to defend individual rights, and the right of self-defence, even at the cost of taking another life if necessary. If one agrees that the state has the right to take a life, then one must also agree that such action may involve the killing of a guilty killer or an enemy.

I am unable, as others have said in the House, to find anything in our laws or moral code to substantiate the comment that the state has no right to take a life. When I was a young man it was the state which urged me to take a life if necessary to defend the country.

There are some people who recognize the right of the state to take a life but believe it is wrong to do so for any individual crime or for any series of crimes that do not jeopardize the total security of the state. That is interesting logic because it tells me that the security of the state must not be jeopardized but that the security of the individual does not rate so highly.

Capital punishment often becomes and is a moral issue. This morality is much more difficult to define. Some feel strongly that it is morally wrong to execute regardless of the crime. There are many of us who believe that it is morally correct, morally justifiable and morally responsible to execute when the crime is heinous, chances of rehabilitation are extraordinarily low and when that dangerous criminal may kill again.

• (2330)

Let me move on now to another point often made by people who support the abolitionists' position. They say that execution is anti-Christian. I do not believe that to be the case. One of my good friends, who is well versed in the New Testament, has reminded me that St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, namely, in Romans 13 Verses 3 and 4 talks about punishment and the ruler's right to punish offenders. I quote:

—he is God's servant for your good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword in vain; he is the servant of God to execute his wrath on the wrong-doer.

The reference to sword indicates that Paul does not make the assumption that force is always contrary to God's will. It was John Calvin, the father of Presbyterianism, who wrote in his commentary on Romans the following interpretation:

—they armed with the sword, not for an empty show, but that they may smite evil doers.

There are many who say we should forgive even the most violent murderer. Forgiveness is something which can and should be applied in our personal lives for those who do wrong against us. It does not forego the importance, indeed the necessity, of punishment. Punishment is a necessary part of our life should we do wrong. The issue is what form that punishment should take. More of that later, Mr. Speaker.

Several speakers in the debate have made the point that many churches have publicly called for the continuance of abolition. Many church leaders say that execution is wrong. I acknowledge the right of the church to preach what it believes to be correct. It did so during the Second World War and ministers from the pulpit urged me and many others to do our duty and go forth to kill the enemy. I do not think God has changed, but somehow the message is different, depending upon the circumstances.

In the debate in this House so far, much has been focused on the fact that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. Some have gone so far as to say that the murder rate has decreased in Canada since capital punishment was abolished.

Those who use statistics such as the over-all murder rate do not acknowledge that figures available from Statistics Canada show that the number of people charged with first degree murder has increased substantially since 1976 while the number charged with second degree murder has decreased. But figures may be made to tell us anything we wish, and although I hold no major brief concerning the importance of capital punishment in deterring murder, I would not rule it out as a deterrent in individual cases.

I believe that murder and other crimes deserve punishment. I quote Lord Denning, master of the Roles of the Court of Appeals in England, to a British Royal Commission on Capital Punishment:

Many are inclined to test the efficacy of punishment solely by its value as a deterrent; but this is too narrow a view. Punishment is the way in which a society expresses its denunciation of wrong-doing: In order to maintain respect for the law, it is essential that the punishment inflicted for grave crimes should adequately reflect the revulsion felt by the great majority of citizens for them. It is a mistake to consider the object of punishment as being deterrent or preventative and nothing else . . . the truth is that society insists on adequate punishment because the wrong-doer deserves it, irrespective of whether it is a deterrent or not.

These are important words, because respect for the law is an important part of our society. If the law does not take into account the wishes of the vast majority, the law falls into disrepute. We come back then to the question of the form of punishment.

I have heard people say that if you wish to take a life for a life then surely you must punish by rape for a rape, et cetera. This, I believe, is not a very sound argument. In fact, Sir, it is a rather silly argument. It would imply, for example, that when you ground your children for a week because they stayed out too late with the car, the appropriate punishment would be to force them to stay out late with the car for a week, or that the appropriate punishment for failing to attend school and playing hookey, as I did so often, would be to insist that they stay away from school.

People who support capital punishment in principle are sometimes called vengeful and vindictive. We have heard these phrases in the House during this debate. When does any punishment become vengeful and vindictive as opposed to being just and appropriate to the crime? Some have said, even here, that the appropriate punishment for these kinds of murder is to keep people in jail for life with no possibility of parole. Like George Bernard Shaw, I would consider that vengeful and a form of punishment much worse than execution. To deprive someone of his or her freedom and to do it in a circumstance where the individual is without hope seems to me a protracted form of cruelty and torture, particularly in a society which values freedom so much that it sent hundreds and thousands of young men and women to face death to protect that freedom.

The question arises as to the susceptibility for error and that it might be possible to execute an innocent person. No one can deny that such a possibility exists. There are no known cases in Canada with the possible exception of Mr. Coffin, and that remains open to debate.

The case of Mr. Marshall, often quoted in this House, was not one of first degree premeditated murder and therefore, in my opinion, does not have a real place which is relevant in this debate. Nevertheless, the chance of error is a factor and one that should cause us to think long and hard about the restoration of the death penalty. To those who use this argument, may I be allowed to give the other side of the coin?

Without capital punishment, it is certain that innocent people will be killed because some people repeat violence, and there are instances of murder and manslaughter taking place while people are out on parole or after they have escaped from prison. There are also regretful instances of prison guards being cut down by people serving sentences for murder.

How can one in conscience say "Save the murderer but risk another innocent life"? I will vote for the return of the death penalty because I believe life is important and that, until we manage, as we all wish, to change society and human nature, there is a need for punishment that fits the crime.

Whatever the outcome of the vote tonight, we will all accept the decision of this House. That is what democracy is all about. But let there be no wringing of the hands on the one hand nor shaking of hands on the other. Each of us owes it to our society to find a better way to protect the life of the innocent than we have today.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fairly obvious for those people who are in the gallery tonight that most Members already have their minds made up on this issue and, in fact, those who are putting their positions for or against in many cases are putting their position for the record. It is for that reason that I would like to spend a few moments on the process, the process in particular, because we have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) state in this House only a few short days ago that to him the whole notion of capital punishment was "morally repugnant."

One would think that the notion of moral repugnance would reflect the position of the Government and how it would have treated the debate from start to finish. Yet we are aware that the same Government that claims that capital punishment is morally repugnant has in fact put a muzzle on Members of Parliament from all sides of the House who would like to speak their piece on this issue. In fact, we are faced with a closure motion which means that on my side of the House, to date only 22 Members have had an opportunity to speak. That is a little over 50 per cent of them.

I see in the Chamber here tonight the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi), for example. Has he had a chance to speak on this most important issue? No, he has not because the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) have chosen to invoke closure on an issue which they claim is morally repugnant to them. If that is so, why closure? Why the muzzle? Why the decision to curtail debate in this most insidious way? It is a guillotine motion and it is appropriate under the circumstances.

I think we must examine the process. Let us look at what we are being asked to vote on tonight. It is not simply the question of the principle of capital punishment but if this motion passes, we in the House of Commons will set up a parliamentary committee that will travel from one end of the country to the other to examine whether people should die by poison, by arsenic, by hanging or by the electric chair. The committee will determine which particular ghoulish and garish form of capital punishment is the most appropriate. If the Government and the Prime Minister were truly serious about involving Parliamentarians in this debate in an effective and complete way, they would have supported the motion which would have permitted this resolution dealing with whether or not we support the principle of capital punishment to be debated across the country.

If this motion passes tonight, we will see the ridiculous spectacle of a travelling parliamentary committee going from St. John's, Newfoundland, to British Columbia asking the people not whether or not we should invoke capital punishment but how it can be carried out. When we moved an amendment which would have permitted Canadians to have input on the question of to kill or not to kill, it was defeated by an overwhelming majority of government Members, including those who say that they are abolitionists.

We must examine the hypocrisy of the process. I for one during the last federal election knocked on doors throughout my riding and was constantly confronted with this statement: "The Conservatives will bring back the noose so I'm going to support the Conservatives". On the government side of the House, the Prime Minister has said that he personally abhors capital punishment and finds it morally repugnant. Yet he has set in motion all the wheels that will permit the return of capital punishment.

If the Government truly finds that capital punishment is morally repugnant, why has it set it up as number one on the agenda? Why has it determined that of all the problems confronting the country, the problem that deserves our attention in the House and as part of a travelling committee is the question of capital punishment? Is that moral leadership? Is that the kind of leadership we can expect from someone who made a wonderful speech last week but when it came time to show leadership and to allow Canadians themselves to have input into whether or not we should have capital punishment, he snuffed debate. He snuffed it by closure and he snuffed it by way of a resolution which asks Parliamentarians not to ask the people about the principle of capital punishment but to ask the people whether we should kill by way of poison, of the noose or of the electric chair.

So I think the process has been a sham and a farce. The senior leadership of the Government has stated that they are abolitionists, they are opposed to capital punishment. Yet at every opportunity, they brought forward instruments which aid and abet the cause of the return to the noose.

I say shame on the Prime Minister who had a chance to show moral leadership. He had a chance during the last federal election to tell the people of Canada that he does not support capital punishment and he will not assist in any way the return of capital punishment as long as he is the Prime Minister and leader of the country. That is the challenge he faced, but instead he attempted to go before the people during the election campaign and say that he will bring in a free vote and will reopen debate. He turned his back on the kind of moral leadership he should have shown. Instead, he reopened the debate which we felt had been closed many years ago.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Because he believes in Parliament.

Ms. Copps: The Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) said it is because he believes in Parliament. Last week the Prime Minister said that capital punishment was morally repugnant to him. If he is the leader of this country, he should not facilitate in Parliament the return of capital punishment, something which he claims to find morally repugnant. It is inconsistent and hypocritical.

Mr. Dick: What is your opinion?

Ms. Copps: My opinion is the same one I stated when I was out on the hustings in 1984. I did not attempt to buy votes with some kind of a phoney claim about capital punishment. I went to the people of my riding and told them that if they believed that their Member of Parliament should go to Ottawa and support capital punishment, they should not vote for me because I will never support a motion which will lead to death and murder, whether it be by poison, by the electric chair or by the noose.

Back in 1984, I stated the way I felt. I invited the voters of my riding to look at all three candidates and to make their determination. If they wanted to send to Ottawa someone who would merely be a voting machine and would merely look at the opinion polls, see that 61 per cent of the people are in favour of the death penalty and ergo must support the death penalty, then I suggested that they send another representative to Ottawa. My responsibility as a Member of Parliament is to be in a position to examine all of the ramifications. Indeed, all of those ramifications involve the question of whether or not the death penalty is a deterrent.

Even those who support the death penalty have agreed that at best, the argument of deterrence is a specious one. In the United States, the very states that have embraced and indeed encouraged active use of the death penalty by way of the electric chair are the very states in which there is the highest murder rates. I look to Louisiana, Texas and Florida where there are murder rates of over 14 per cent.

One need only look at bumper stickers in Florida reading: "Only free men carry guns" to see the violent attitude which is enshrined in their commitment to capital punishment. That translates itself into the way they live their lives on a daily basis. I cannot believe for a moment that there are Members of Parliament who would want to adopt the kind of jungle justice which unfortunately has become all too rampant in certain states in the United States.

The other question we must examine is who dies in states where capital punishment is embraced. We need only look at Amnesty International's recent report to realize that in fact it is a horrifying lottery.

• (2350)

If you happen to be black and have killed a white person, your chances of dying by the electric chair are so many times greater than if you happen to be white and have murdered a black person. If colour is an issue, as was so aptly demonstrated by Amnesty International's examination of who died in the United States, how can we, in conscience, reintroduce in Canada a system which quite clearly discriminates, potentially on the basis of gender?

We know, for example, that women are responsible for 14 per cent of violent crimes. Yet, the number of women who have died by way of the electric chair in the United States is very small because traditionally society has not sent women to the electric chair. Do we want to reintroduce a system which would discriminate on the basis of race or gender?

The Member for Guelph (Mr. Winegard) dealt with the question of the possibility of error. There have been instances of people going to the electric chair by mistake. It has been wrongly decided to send people to the electric chair.

As our constituents listen to this debate here in the Chamber tonight or in their homes across the country, they must consider the fact that they are asking us to make a decision about pressing the button, about administering the deadly chemical or, potentially, putting the rope around someone's neck. I ask them in good conscience whether, if they were put in the position in which we are tonight of having to make that decision, they would be as eager to say yes as they are to respond to the public opinion polls.

I firmly believe that when Canadians have a chance to examine this issue and consider the experience of what has happened in states in the United States in which they have continued capital punishment as compared with the states in which they have abolished it, and to study the ramifications of a system of institutionalized murder, they will start drawing back and reconsidering their views on the death penalty.

That is why I am so disturbed that the Government has invoked closure on this very important issue. That is why I am so disturbed that the Government has not permitted a parliamentary committee to examine the principle. It has asked the committee not to examine the principle but merely to look at the methodology. I believe that as Canadians have a chance to examine these issues in greater detail they will join those on all sides of the House who feel that they cannot support the reinstitution of capital punishment in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I already had a few comments on the matter of the process and I am horrified the Government tonight decided to impose closure on such an important matter. I am also horrified the same Government will not let us travel across the country as a Parliamentary Committee to ask the people what they think of the principle of execution.

What they are asking us to do is simply vote on the principle tonight, and then travel from province to province examining whether we are to kill by hanging or electric chair. That is barbaric indeed, Mr. Speaker. Because I believe that when

Canadians have an opportunity to get a closer look at that, as we did as Members of Parliament, when they have an opportunity to look at the American experiences in various States where capital punishment still exists, we see that in those States, for example, murder rates are much higher than in other States where life is respected and capital punishment was abolished.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if all Canadians could have been here in our place tonight, whether they would be ready to press the button, to say: Yes, we will kill, we will institutionalize murder in Canada.

Because I think that when Canadians get a closer look at the American experience, the experience in other countries, as soon as Canadians see that capital punishment strikes much harder at Indians for instance, blacks, minorities and the poor, Mr. Speaker, we can see that people will not be prepared to accept surveys favouring capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all Members in this House who have not yet made a decision, although I think most of us already made a decision, I urge them to see that such a resolution should never pass if we are to be called civilized people. Otherwise we are not civilized. We are reverting to the law of the jungle.

As far as I am concerned, as a Member of Parliament, even if that means losing this next election, I will never accept the law of the jungle because we have a civilization and we want to put an end to capital punishment.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, at the moment when I speak and at the time it is, I will have been the Member who spoke both on the eve and on the day of the vote itself, and I think that even though all Members did not have an opportunity to rise on this issue, a fact which I deplore, I might add, the truth of the matter is that most if not all arguments have been made with respect to this motion.

I do not pretend to have anything new to add to what has already been said, let alone hope to help our few undecided colleagues make up their mind. Still I would simply and briefly express the modest inspiration I drew from this motion.

Mr. Speaker, I was anxious to have a say in this debate not only because of its unique character and because it is a non-partisan issue, but especially because of its humanitarian nature.

A non-partisan vote, a free vote, the freedom to decide whether capital punishment should be restored: the death penalty is the ultimate punishment meted out to someone who has taken somebody else's life. The basic concept which flows from this is the notion of ransom, or retribution, convince others not to do evil, separate the bad citizens from the others.

In this day and age, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the economy of life is somewhat deregulated, confused, just as inflationary as the life of the economy. Indeed, health and ecology have now become the haven of morality and the only consensus of so-called liberal societies, so much so, Mr. Speaker, that today smokers are confined to isolation.

Since the turn of the century we have democratized death by turning our citizens into warriors and applying the concept of war, which may have prompted Malraux to say: "A life is worth nothing, but nothing is worth a life".

The murderer does not put much value on life, so can society in turn put little value on the murderer's life?

We do not need capital punishment to render true justice, and this is indeed the basic reason why I intend to vote against the motion under consideration.

Without being history fanatics, we must however look at past experience both at home and in other democracies to find that the facts suggest imposing capital punishment is largely determined by the whims of the judicial system, for instance the inclinations and qualifications of Crown prosecutors, the capacity of the accused to retain a good lawyer, the skill or qualifications of the defence attorneys.

In the past, Mr. Speaker, capital punishment was used disproportionately and unfairly against the poor, the socially underprivileged, people from ethnic or racial minorities.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the State has a duty to protect the lives of all its citizens, and as the criminologist André Normandeau so aptly said in an article published in La Presse on March 12, 1987: "In the light of the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, all citizens are equal and respect for life knows no exception."

The State cannot give itself the right to kill, that would be an incroachment against human rights.

Canada is perceived internationally as a leader in the progressive area of rights and freedoms. By reinstating capital punishment, Canada would be taking a step backward, and while abrogating its international commitment to those standards, it would be imposing a clearly immoral concept and negating that sacred right to life enshrined in our Charter.

Mr. Speaker, we must aspire to a much higher ideal and, while admitting the public's legitimate concern about our criminality, I am convinced that the answer to that fear is not capital punishment. A response with an act we forbid is inconsistant to say the least. If we want to reduce or prevent murders, we must deal with deeper concerns such as economic inequities, alcohol or drug abuse, which is a major factor in road accidents, and an appalling rate of suicide including a majority of young people.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, if the rate of manslaughters reaches 2.7 in 100,000 people in Canada, it might be important to remember that the rate of suicide is 13.8 in 100,000 people also.

Nothing has shown at any rate that the demise of capital punishment in the past 10 years has resulted in an increase in the number of manslaughters. And no one has proven that capital punishment, if it were reinstated, would have a deterrent effect here or in other countries.

In short, Mr. Speaker, this debate has taken place hundreds of times in every civilized society since the end of the Second World War. No new facts or unique discoveries have enhanced it in the past few years: in the United States, where this punishment was reinstated in several states, experts in that field have not been convinced that it had any measurable social impact.

The application of death penalty is not only discriminatory, it is irrevocable. Our justice system is human and therefore fallible. Similarly, and due to the wide range of specific circumstances surrounding an offence, individuals who commit murder are very unlikely to be deterred by the consequences of their crimes even if those consequences include the death penalty.

To be meaningful, a punishment should create a memory. A child is punished so that he will remember that a specific gesture, a specific behaviour is wrong, and he will not do it again. A punishment supposes the ability to think. There probably exists also a social memory, and even the least hardened criminals may be sensitive to the deterrent power of capital punishment, but they are not those this motion is aimed at. Again, Mr. Speaker, would it be fair to reinstate the ultimate penalty in Canada while ignoring the complex causes of crime which we must address if we want to create real justice in Canada?

In this troubled age, when our value system has been affected by many changes in the last few decades, we have the duty as individuals, as groups and as governments, to make immediately the decisions necessary to deflect, divert or channel these turbulent flows of changes.

As a Member of Parliament, I must naturally consider the requests of my constituents. However, I also have the right, the duty and the responsibility to act in their best interests by looking for effective solutions to the problems which concern them. It would be doing them a disservice to opt for a quick, ineffective and illusory solution.

Mr. Speaker, such a debate has the disadvantage on the one hand of polarizing opinions, but on the other, it also provides a great number of possibilities for effective political and social action.

If we take refuge in a low level of solutions or challenges, neither individuals nor institutions will be able to face the high diversity and fast-paced changes which must go hand in hand with evolution.

In my opinion, our only option is to vote against the motion if we want to transform our insitutions to face these new conditions. This is the price of the passport which will open up the borders of a viable and reasonably compassionate future. To cross this border, we should certainly not try to eliminate those we feel incapable of changing or view as hardened criminals, but we should instead use our imagination and our ability to prepare our own future, our future as a country and our policy for the future.

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the question before the House this evening is important for Canada's future.

Many of my constituents are opposed to the reinstatement of capital punishment in Canada, and today, the debate on the death penalty is again being discussed in all the media. In 1976, the Canadian Government decided to abolish the death penalty. With many Canadians, we thought that this country had written a major page in its history that would show the world our concern for achieving a greater degree of civilization.

Today, our society can hardly backtrack and go back to a system that tries to substitute one evil for another, without undermining the very basis of its moral strength: its respect for life, for all human life. The gesture of John Paul II who forgave his aggressor helps us understand that in a society like ours, there is always room for forgiveness. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in Canada and in this House, there are Canadians and Members who have forgiven the murderer of one of their loved ones.

I received many letters from my constituents, including a letter from Msgr. Duchemin, who said:

> The death penalty is a punishment that is unfair, unjust and above all irreversible. Its use increases contempt for human life and lends a false legitimacy to our propensity to seek revenge.

Mr. Speaker, I have to admit I also have constituents who are asking for reinstatement of the death penalty because they are convinced there is a lot of crime in this country. They see acts of violence on television and dozens of reports in the newspapers. Obviously, how to punish such crimes is one of the first things that comes to mind.

Deep inside every human being, there is a powerful instinct that drives him not only to defend himself but to seek justice. It is true that this instinct has been demonstrated in the past, through wars, slavery, torture, discrimination against race, individuals and nations. Although there are still vestiges of these cruel customs, we can say that in recent years and centuries, a better understanding has developed of the dignity of human nature.

The idea of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" would probably come to most of us if someone attacked our nearest and dearest. Our immediate reaction would probably be to vote for the death penalty, and not necessarily an easy death. It is precisely for this reason that it is forbidden to take the law into one's own hands, that we have theoretically objective and impartial judges and jurors to make such decisions. Before restoring the concept of pure and simple vengeance in our court system, we ought to give it serious thought and consider to what extent we might stand to lose more in the long term. As punishment, Mr. Speaker, the death penalty is the most absurd option. Punishment is meted out as a corrective measure. Attitudes can be changed, and even if our prisons often fail to rehabilitate, the system has proven successful now and then. We do not kill someone to teach him how to live. Where the debate takes a more serious turn is when we consider the protection of society and the risk presented by repeat offenders. In the majority of cases the most dangerous individuals are precisely those whom an honest judge will never sentence to death.

Mr. Speaker, I am against restoring capital punishment, but I want to make it clear to the people of Abitibi and to the Government that I look upon murder as a very serious crime and that federal and provincial government authorities must do everything possible to reduce and prevent murders, and to protect each and every one of us.

I fail to understand Canadians and Members of this House who want to reinstate capital punishment. Surely there are among them some who are so afraid of death that they would prefer a quick and sudden death to death at a set time for which we would have time to get prepared, like those who will be sentenced to hang if capital punishment is restored.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, a court system cannot be based on vengeance. And I conclude: We do not kill someone to teach him how to live. I will be voting against the reinstatement of the death penalty.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is with great honour that I take part in this debate tonight. It is a crucial one in the life of this particular Parliament. It is also one which separates individual Members from their Party disciplines and policies.

When the Parliamentary Secretary introduced the motion a short three months ago, he quoted from Edmund Burke, an 18th century politician and philosopher who outlined many of the principles by which we govern today. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner), in his speech immediately following, also quoted the same lines, so too did my Leader, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) when he spoke to the House on that first day.

Last Monday night, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) used the same arguments, as did many Hon. Members throughout the course of the debate. I would like to repeat those words because I believe they describe the decision-making process we have been going through and hopefully will complete sometime within the next hour. Edmund Burke said: "Your representative owes you not his industry only but his judgment. He betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion". What Mr. Burke was saying was that, as a Member of Parliament, I owe the people of Thunder Bay—Atikokan more than just my time and effort. I owe them more than just the opportunity to have their words repeated in this Chamber. I owe them my judgment and my well-thought out, reasonable conclusions. That I believe is why they elected me as a Member of Parliament in 1984. Like Edmund Burke, I believe it is up to us as parliamentarians to present the complete picture, not just opinions or gut feelings. It is my job as a Member of Parliament to listen to the voices of my constituents, weigh the facts and offer my judgment.

My job does not end there, Mr. Speaker. The scientist sees an object and ponders the obvious. The object is broken down and analysed. From the individual parts, the scientist distils the essence of that object. Therefore, the scientist presents the reality of the object and not just the immediate appearance. In this debate on the return of capital punishment, it is our job to be like the scientist.

My constituents in the riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan, like the constituents of other Members of this House, have a problem. Murder and crimes of violence are occurring in our society. The quick solution many people see is to kill the murderers, then others will not be killed. Therefore, in their minds, the problem is solved. But the problem cannot be solved that easily. Killing one murderer does not prevent another from committing the same crime. Even Charles Dickens, citing the statistics of 167 persons who were under the sentence of death at that time, including 164 who had witnessed the public execution, had wondered whether it was a craving for notoriety which produced the incentive and impulse to commit murder.

State execution does not help the family of the murder victim come to terms with its loss. Even more important, it does not bring the victim back to life. The problem, therefore, has not been solved. As parliamentarians, as social scientists, if you will, we must distil this problem in our society beyond the obvious gut solution. We must break it down, distil its component parts and reach a final solution, one which will actually work.

Let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, what causes murderers to commit their crimes? Do we understand the pressures which result in crimes of passion, or anger, or poverty or desperation? Even in the case of those premeditated, planned murders, is death the only solution for the prevention of future murders? Can we rehabilitate? Is death the only way to protect society from a murderer repeating the crime? Instead of looking at the obvious, we should be spending our time in this Chamber looking at the parts and answering the questions I have outlined. My constituents agree. They have told me they believe it is honourable to explore the reasons for crime and the means to eliminate it beyond the obvious solutions.

Jennifer Tett of South Gillies, Ontario, said: "Why not turn our energies to confronting the causes of increased crime? Killing someone for revenge or public safety is not an answer. Eliminating the underlying reasons for the violent crime is where debate belongs". How can we as a national community create the conditions where murder is not encouraged, where it is not tolerated? How can we create a society where the taking of life is a thing of the past? Perhaps in my community we can start by taking violent newscasts from Detroit off our cable television and replacing it with those of communities to the south of us which have a different approach, different lifestyle and different society. We can work to protect and nurture the family unit in whatever form, because for an individual without an emotional support system, and without ties of family love, murder becomes so much more casual and without implications.

Murder becomes without implication in the sense that there is no room for grief, no sorrow and no remorse. We must put in place support systems for those too mentally ill to understand or accept the gravity of the frustration and danger they carry with them. We can do more than just react. We can prevent. We must find ways to stop violent crime before it occurs. Instead of thinking about methods of execution, we should be thinking of methods of rehabilitation.

How can our prison systems rehabilitate? How can they modify behaviour? How can they instil the sanctity of life above all else? Why instead do our prisons presently breed viciousness, bitterness and hostility? Why do they further ingrain those feelings of frustration and alienation which may have promoted crime in the first place? Why are we successfully educating those convicted of minor offences so that when they are once again free in society they can read and write and will have mastered a marketable trade and skill? Do they understand how to conform to society's wishes? Do they have an understanding of their legal rights and obligations in such a way that their earlier experiences do not land them in even more trouble? Is the answer to merely confine them for a time, only to release them into a society where they perceive crime as necessary for survival or find it the only alternative to welfare or begging?

Are we to ease them out with the appropriate and real personal skills and resources which allow them to redefine their role in society? Graham Saunders, another resident of South Gillies, wrote to me telling me that the present legal system needs massive reform. He also reminded me that the reinstatement of the death penalty should not be part of that reform. I agree. Instead of thinking, let alone planning, methods of execution, we should be thinking of ways to reform our penal system. It should do more than just enforce periods of inactivity and incarceration between bigger and more severe crimes. It should assist those who begin in a disadvantaged situation, whether through poverty or emotional deprivation, to overcome their handicaps and take their rightful and productive place in society. Instead of talking about killing to avenge, why are we not talking about helping to heal?

I have often received letters from the families of those children lost to men like Clifford Olson. They cry out for relief from the pain of their loss. Some of them see this relief coming from the murder of the Olsons of this world. I cannot change those feelings. I can empathize with their hurt, but I cannot accept their solution. There are others, however, whose children have been violently and permanently taken from them who, due to their strong Christian belief, beg for forgiveness for the guilty and reject capital punishment as a solution. Yet at the very same time in very loud voices they ask—no, they demand—for changes that will reduce the dangers to other children and other humans in the years to come. They cry out for change. That, too, is my cause.

• (0020)

Something else I would like to add comes from a constituent of mine, Mrs. Mary Richardson, who lives in Thunder Bay. She said:

> A desire for revenge is indeed normal on the part of people who have been outraged by murderous acts. But let us not confuse human feelings with moral truths.

We must, as a society, work to eliminate the number of society's children who are taken from us through violent acts of other human beings. Instead of pretending to protect society from murder by institutionalizing it, we should be protecting society through a re-examination and redefinition of our justice system. Murderers, rapists and others convicted of violent crimes should not be allowed out on parole. They should not be allowed back into society until we are firmly satisfied that they understand the gravity of their wrongs and, most important, will not repeat them.

We must do more to protect society and society's keepers. One of the first steps would include a return of two person police patrols throughout this land, along with drastically increased funding for our police forces. That means a greater expenditure of tax dollars at all three levels: federal, provincial and municipal. We must put our money where our mouths have been if we truly believe in protecting our protectors. We must ensure that our prison guards are adequately trained, that there are enough of them and that they are not put in situations in which they will be weaker than those they guard. We must ensure that transition counsellors and halfway workers are not put at risk.

Celia Rygrok, the young halfway house worker recently murdered in Ottawa, should not be invoked as a reason to reinstate the death penalty. No one told the halfway house or the people who work there that the parolee who murdered her had a history of violence against women. Instead, her tragic story should eliminate a system full of cracks which allows people such as Allan Sweeney, the parolee who murdered her, to fall through.

For violent offenders, the sentences available to the judiciary and the extent to which they must be served must be, on the one hand, appropriate to the crime and, on the other hand, they must be deemed to be sufficient protection to society, especially the victim population.

Our incarceration system should have gradual levels of confinements, to return criminals to society in a supportive and watchful manner.

Mo Douglas wrote to me from Thunder Bay saying that a sentencing policy could be put into place that would "emphasize reparative rather than retributive aspects of justice, and promote responsible alternatives to the death penalty."

Can we as parliamentarians honestly say that we have examined all the pieces and that we understand all the implications of the pro-capital punishment stance? Or are we, as Burke warned us, betraying our constituents by limiting ourselves to reflecting their opinions? Even those opinions are not sending as clear a message as some would have us believe.

A recent poll, the results of which were printed in this week's Maclean's magazine, began by stating that 61 per cent of Canadians polled said they supported or leaned toward the death penalty. In fact, only 37 per cent of those who said they favour capital punishment were convinced that it is the best solution. A full 24 per cent were only "leaning" toward that final solution.

Also, individuals may have developed their own view on the issue only to have that belief challenged by an event or personal experience. One of my Thunder Bay constituency assistants, a good friend, Rosemary Cox, had for a long time supported the death penalty and therefore the return of it. However, this spring she was called up for jury duty in Thunder Bay. Not only was she selected but she became the foreman of the jury. As a result of that personal experience as a member of the jury and as its foreman she has changed her mind on capital punishment. She no longer supports the return of the death penalty. She said:

> As a jurist I was presented various bits and pieces of information and with them asked to construct a picture of what possibly occurred.
> There were conflicting bits of evidence that required a subjective decision to choose this bit and ignore that other bit. There were holes in the picture to be filled in by each jurors' subjective imagination. No one's life should depend on subjective opinions.

We owe our constituents our judgment and perception of the whole, not just the parts, and definitely not just the easy, obvious solution.

I would now like to turn to the words of our future, our young people. Last Tuesday evening as I left the House at ten o'clock I was greeted by a small group of students from Niagara-on-the-Lake. They handed me a leaflet, and this is what it states:

> What the Students from Niagara on the Lake say
> We are students from Niagara District Secondary School in Niagara on the Lake, and we are opposed to the re-introduction of the Death Penalty.
> We believe that the death penalty is barbaric, and a cruel and unusual form of punishment. We believe that the death penalty destroys life and the moral fabric of our society.
> We believe that it is not a deterrent to murder. We believe that the risk of error is great enough to make the death penalty an unacceptable punishment.
> We ask you as young people who do not have a vote, that you members in whose hands our future lies, will give us a Canada free of the death penalty; a Canada that can hold its head high among the civilized nations of the earth.

Last night, at my summer camp in Thunder Bay, there was a group of young people who were there to attend my daughter's seventh birthday. I was watching the news while they were gathering in the living-room to play cards. The item about tonight's vote came on and they asked me what my stance was. I told them that I would be speaking against the return of capital punishment and voting against it. They said that that was great. They paraphrased the phrase that a number of people have been wearing proudly on their chests. I saw some of those people in a restaurant where I was having supper tonight. They said: "Why kill people who kill people to show that killing people is wrong?"

I believe that this debate has been, on the whole, necessary and beneficial, particularly if we defeat the motion tonight. It has brought up those questions that are of a deeper nature than just capital punishment. It has put our whole penal system under the spotlight. It has forced us to take good long looks at it. It has also forced us as individuals to look at our moral commitments to our constituents.

I would like to conclude my remarks with another quote from Mrs. Richardson who said:

> Please do what you can to uphold moral decency and to prevent regression to a retributive model of justice. Also, as you have the opportunity, please point out to your parliamentary colleagues, that it is not the function of the judicial system to be the conscience of the Canadian people.
> The judiciary is not at fault in this regard. It is the people who must cease expecting the law to tell them what they ought to do, as well as what they ought not to do.
> Our country's leaders must help their constituents to understand the consequences of that most prevalent notion that 'it's wrong if you're caught, and right if you're not'.
> Please throw your weight in the direction of educative measures to prevent violence.

I wish to speak for an additional moment directly to those Members of the House who are legitimately undecided as to how they will vote later this morning. There are times when we know that voters go into the ballot-box or the voting booth in general elections and do not make up their mind until the last minute. But in this case Members of the House will not be choosing who sits in this place but whether or not we will return the country to a state in which we will kill those convicted of capital crimes.

If the vote is as close as people on both sides of the issue suggest it will be, it is conceivable that one of the undecided Members will actually make the decision. I wish to ask them this. If the decision goes in favour of the return to capital punishment can they in all conscience decide now in the last minute to vote in favour of it? Should they not be deciding to err on the side of life, to err on the side of caution and say no, no to the return of capital punishment?

In conclusion, to Mrs. Richardson, Mr. Saunders, Ms. Tett, the young people of Niagara-on-the-Lake, my daughter Susan and her friends, and the constituents of Thunder Bay—Atikokan and the people of Canada I would like to say one last thing.

• (0030)

I have listened to the arguments, seen the easy solution, and have rejected it. I will not support capital punishment, and I will not vote for it. I urge all Members of this House to consider their respective positions and, when called upon later this morning to vote, to vote no, no, no on this life and death issue.

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the motion before the House is both complex and emotional in nature. It has aroused a great deal of emotion both here in the House and across the country. My constituents have written in great numbers on this issue, both in favour of the motion and in opposition to it. Both sides have presented extensive and well researched points of view. Some argue that capital punishment could well result in the death of an innocent person. There is no reported case of this ever having happened in Canadian history.

Early in my life, I had the experience of being the foreman of a jury in a capital crime trial. The jury process is very complete. In this particular case, the charge was reduced to manslaughter. From that experience, I can only conclude that justice is well served by our current jury system. While I have stated that there is no reported case of an innocent person having been wrongfully executed in Canada, there have been several cases where convicted murderers have killed a second time.

The question in the motion we are considering this evening is a difficult one, and one which requires Members of Parliament to study both sides carefully. I have been on record since 1984 as favouring the reinstatement of capital punishment for certain crimes. During the federal election campaign of 1984, I stated my position publicly, that position being that I would vote in favour of capital punishment for capital crimes. I took that position publicly at the time so that when the electorate went to the polls, they would know how I would vote on this important issue, as my Party had stated that there would be a free vote in Parliament.

I feel that I have given this issue careful consideration, not only in the past few months but throughout my political career, a career which has spanned more than three decades. One of the positions I held was that of a police commissioner. I also served on the Court House and Jail Committee of the Welland County Council when warden of Welland County in 1960.

I gained a great deal of respect for the work of policemen and jail guards, whose work is so often difficult, life-threatening, and thankless. The statistics gathered on capital crimes are based on police reports. I believe those reports are the best source of data we have and are as accurate as possible.

Because the death penalty has not been used since 1962, I think the best way to look at the statistics is by starting with 1962, rather than 1976, when the death penalty was formally abolished. With respect to policemen killed in the line of duty, the numbers go up and down over the years. According to the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, the number of policemen killed was as high in 1984 as it was in any year since 1963.

The numbers I find the most shocking are those having to do with murder in penal institutions. These figures point, unmistakably, to the inability of our prison system to deal effectively with murderers through imprisonment. The annual rate of homicide within Canadian penal institutions has risen by 400 per cent since 1976.

Since the abolition of the death penalty, we average across this country about 11 murder victims a year in our penal institutions. This compares with an average of two murders per year prior to abolition in 1976. This is appalling. It shows, quite effectively, that when murderers are given life sentences, they have nothing to lose, under current practices, by repeating their crime.

I have no intention of reciting some of the horrible, grizzly circumstances by which innocent people are cold-bloodedly killed each and every year in this country. We have heard a few already. We read the papers. We know the stories. We are all afraid, at some level of our being, that this could happen to one of us, or to one of our family, friends, or colleagues.

We "street proof" our children; we don't take unnecessary chances; and we believe in the essential good which exists as part of our human nature. But, we cannot ignore the exceptions. We cannot ignore the horrifying fact of people who have no conscience, people who will kill for money or to feed their own perversions.

Serial killers, whether they operate within the prison system, or out on our streets, must be punished. We owe it to their victims—people our system could not protect. There is no defence, no court of appeal for the innocent victim of a murderer acting with cold premeditation.

I believe the death penalty also has the potential to act as a deterrent. Not all of the time, of course, but enough of the time that I believe that we will be saving innocent lives through its reinstatement. Mr. Neal Jessop, President of the Police Association of Ontario, points out, quite truthfully, that it is impossible to prove that the death penalty is a deterrent or that it is not a deterrent.

Opponents of the death penalty often quote statistics from 1976 to 1985, when the number of murders in Canada remained virtually constant: 701 in 1976, and 704 in 1985. They will say that because there was no significant change in the number of murders during that period, capital punishment is therefore not a deterrent. However, if we examine the longer time frame, from 1962 to 1985, we can come to a much different conclusion. The last year that executions took place in Canada was 1962, and in that year there were 265 murders.

In the years between 1962 and 1976, all of the death sentences were commuted. So that while the abolition of the death penalty here in Parliament did not take place until 1976, in actual practice no executions took place in Canada during this much longer time period.

Opponents of the motion, who argue that capital punishment is not a deterrent, base their case on a selected nine-year period between 1976 and 1985, during which period they will say the murder rate did not increase, following the enactment of the 1976 legislation abolishing capital punishment. It can also be argued that everyone knew that capital punishment would not be used during the earlier 14-year period between 1962 and 1976, and during that period the murder rate increased dramatically.

Having been in public life through those years and having served as the chairman of the Welland City Police Commission from 1965 to 1971, I well recall the broadly-felt view that the growing lack of discipline associated with the move to relax our laws was in fact contributing to the rising murder rate. Certainly, the murder rate increased coincidental with the capital punishment debate in Parliament, a debate which began here in 1966. In that year, the murder rate was 250. Over the next nine years, it increased yearly: 338, 375, 391, 467, 473, 521, 546, 600, and finally, 701 in 1976.

Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being. The death penalty is punishment for such a crime only after the full exercise of the justice system—a system in which accused murderers are given the right to counsel, to cross-examination, to a trial by an independent and impartial public jury, and to appeal. Laws have been created to protect citizens from anti-social harmful and murderous acts. Those who participate in unlawful behaviour risk punishment by a court of justice.

My position is: the death penalty where justified, that being the case of first-degree murder, where the action has been planned and premeditated. I believe that this is a just penalty for such killers, and I have confidence that this Parliament and our judicial system will ensure that such a penalty is never used indiscriminately; or, in any case, where there is any doubt of a person's innocence.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place to participate in this important debate this evening. I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak, but nevertheless I am not happy that such an occasion is necessary for Members of Parliament.

Let me say at the outset that as one who opposes the return of the death penalty in the country, I respect the views of all Members of Parliament who have spoken on this day and past days on the question of capital punishment. I cannot believe, after weeks and months during which the question has been before us and Members have had time to reflect upon it, that there are any in the House who may not share my view, who are for capital punishment, and who speak for it with anger in their hearts and vengeance in their minds. I accept the word of Hon. Members who support a measure which I believe to be Draconian and not worthy of society in 1987 and say that they support it on the basis of capital punishment being a deterrent. If I do that, I then must ask my colleagues who support capital punishment on that basis whether in fact in the cold light of day we can truly say that capital punishment is a deterrent.

I have a confession to make in the House tonight. I am one of those who some time ago did not know how I would speak this evening or how I would vote this evening, because I was assailed by two things. I was assailed by a concern that I do what is right and by a concern that I remove the emotional baggage all of us in society carry whenever we hear of a crime being committed in which a human life is lost and see it objectively. As a politician I was one of those who wondered what my constituents wanted me to do. Quite frankly, as a politician I was one of those who wondered how I spoke and how I voted would affect my future as a parliamentarian, my re-election; I was counting votes.

I understand tonight those who are in the House, even as I speak, who have not made up their minds. I understand those tonight who, even as I speak, are not sure than when the bell rings for the division how they will vote.

I want to address my comments to them, because for the vast majority of us in the House who have considered this question and made up our minds, our votes are pretty well registered for or against. The reality at this late hour, some 15 minutes or 20 minutes before we vote, is that the scant few in the House who are not quite sure, who are still wrestling with the question of capital punishment, will decide for all of us and for the country whether or not we take the first step down the road to a return of capital punishment.

My Leader spoke some weeks ago in the House on this question. He reminded us of the words of the famous British parliamentarian, Edmund Burke, who told us that our representatives owe us not just a reflection of the views of their constituents on any given day or week but their best judgment. It was that reminder which sent me out to see beyond taking merely the pulse of my constituency, or taking merely the pulse or temperature of the country on a given day on a given question, and asking myself a hard question, whether or not I had given my constituents, as a Member of Parliament, the benefit of my best judgment.

In applying that kind of criteria to myself, one who was doubtful and one who was unsure, I concluded that beyond cosmetic concerns, at least in my case—and I do not apply this to Members who may have an opposite view—I could find no fundamental reason to support the restoration of capital punishment.

There were those who would seek biblical references for the restoration of capital punishment, those who would latch on to the biblical phrase "an eye for an eye" and say, "that is good enough for me; let's restore capital punishment".

I have received correspondence in my own province from the Divisional Commander of the Salvation Army, from the Right Reverend Martin Mate of the Anglican Church of Canada in Newfoundland, from Archbishop Alphonsus L. Penney of the Roman Catholic Church in Newfoundland, and from the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Newfoundland,—from diverse and varied religious organizations which cannot condone nor will interpret the Bible to give comfort to those who would use it to justify a return of capital punishment.

I have also heard from the Newfoundland Association of Social Workers which is indeed working with individuals and families in stress, those who have fallen on the wrong side of the law, those who live in economic and social circumstances which breed and often give rise to violent crime, and is opposed to capital punishment.

Many Hon. Members have said that if we restore capital punishment we can ensure that it is at least a deterrent for those who have committed murder once that they will not murder again. Those who are opposed have said that if we bring back capital punishment we may put to death an innocent person and therefore it is wrong. The issue is not whether or not we ensure that somebody who has murdered once will never murder again or that we be careful not to put to death an innocent person. That is not the issue.

The issue is whether we as a Canadian society in 1987 will find it necessary to throw up our hands in defeat, to say that our criminal justice system is flawed and beyond reform, and to respond to the will of what I call the pack—the will of the pack. All of us have experienced that whenever emotions run high.

I think Canadians who have thought about the matter, not with their hearts and with their stomachs in the grip of the horror of the crime of a loss of a life, want us as parliamentarians to see beyond a simple emotional response. They want us as parliamentarians to reflect the Canada of 1987. They want us as parliamentarians not to throw up our hands in defeat, in frustration at a criminal justice system which is perhaps flawed. They want us not to take the simple solution or the easy route merely to move that capital punishment be restored and to seek some tribal remedy to the ills of our criminal justice system. They want us to tackle the hard questions. They want us to ensure that the punishment fits the crime.

• (0050)

I have heard from a Margaret McDonald of Portugal Cove Road, St. John's, Newfoundland. In her letter in opposition to capital punishment she quotes from the Bible:

> I also ask that you would seriously consider the following:
> "I am now giving you the choice between life and death, between God's blessing and God's curse, and I call heaven and earth to witness the choice you make. Choose life."

For those Members in the House who more than any of us bear the burden of decision in this debate, for those who still are not sure as we stand here a scant 10 or 15 minutes before the vote what kind of choice they will make this evening, I say to those Members that I understand the struggle they have. I understand the forces that pull them one way or the other. I ask those Members who are going to decide this issue tonight to search not the front page of The Globe and Mail, to seek not their answer in what their constituents told them last weekend, to seek not their answer in what a pollster told them is popular this day or this week. I ask them quietly in the dying minutes of this debate to go away somewhere quiet and to consult their souls, to consult their consciences and to ask themselves whether or not they could truly say that capital punishment, if it is restored, will be a deterrent, and if in bringing that kind of deterrent—and I reject the notion that it is a deterrent—back to this nation, Canada, it will improve the lot of this society.

They must ask themselves what kind of a message Canada will send as the only country in the western world that will have, as part of its criminal justice system, such punishment, state-sanctioned murder. What kind of message will we as Canadians be sending to the world? More important, Mr. Speaker, what kind of message will we be sending to the children of Canada?

It becomes a cliché and perhaps a tiresome one some days to say that the children are the future. To borrow the phrase of the Haida Indians of British Columbia, we did not inherit this land from our ancestors, but we borrow it from our children. Let me say that in borrowing it from our children, let us be mindful of what kind of society we shall leave them. Let it be a civilized compassionate society that believes it can be better, that it can grow, not a society that throws up its hands in frustration and says that the state must have the right to murder as a way of responding to a criminal act of violence.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): The Order of the House is clear. No Member shall rise to speak after the hour of one o'clock in the morning and all questions shall be decided forthwith. But the question before us is not simply whether this House approves in principle the restoration of the death penalty. It is whether we will rise to express the best in ourselves or do the reverse. The question is what should the impact of the power of the state be on an individual life? The question is also how Members of this House will deal with this kind of fundamental matter.

I ask Members of this House to consider my views and those of others that the evidence does not support the argument that the death penalty is a deterrent to murder. I ask the Members of this House to consider my views and those of many others in recognizing the imperfections in our own criminal justice system, such that there is the risk of error, irreversible error, if the penalty of death is invoked. I ask the Members of this House to recognize that the restoration of the death penalty will put Canada in the company of Iran, Iraq, South Africa and the Soviet Union. Surely not good examples for us when it comes to justice.

I ask Members of this House to recognize that most of those in this country who are calling for the return of the death penalty are actually expressing concern about violent crime in Canada and whether our criminal justice system deals effectively with it. They must recognize, as we recognize, that the death penalty is not the answer to concern about violent crime. In modern times, it has not been the penalty invoked on conviction for all such crime.

In calling for a vote against this motion, I say that we have to recognize at the same time the concern of Canadians about violent crime and the link with it of possible imperfections in our criminal justice system and make a commitment to review that system and be ready to make improvements in it so that there is effective prevention of crime. If that is not possible, that there is then swift arrest, trial and meaningful punishment by way of imprisonment for those found guilty.

I take seriously the views of those that are different from myself on this basic question. I say to Members of this House that we must recall, in the closing minutes of this debate, that here it has long been established that we do our best for our constituents and for our country when we exercise our best judgment on fundamental questions of the kind we are dealing with today, the question of whether the death penalty should be restored.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is the opportunity for all of us to bring together the best of heart and mind, of conscience and judgment. Let us listen to the voices deep within that call upon us to strive to do the best for our country and its people.

I call upon Members of this House to reject this motion. In rejecting this motion, it will mean striving for the best in our society and for ourselves. Surely we can do no less. I say that the Order calls upon us to vote. We cannot put off the decision any longer. Let us listen to those voices within us. Let us listen to those voices calling upon us to do the best for ourselves and our country. Let us join together to vote to defeat this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, before we conclude this debate, I would like to say that I believe Hon. Members had an opportunity to express their views.

Before we vote, Mr. Speaker, I think that all Members should personnally search their conscience and, should they vote according to their conscience, knowing my colleagues, I am confident that they will all say no to capital punishment. I am convinced of it.

Some Hon. members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I believe that as good and conscientious Members, all of us in this House should have a unanimous vote: No to capital punishment!

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In order to facilitate the vote tonight and to make it as clear as possible, the Hon. Members of the House will know that we are first going to vote on a motion moved by the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) seconded by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). I am suggesting that you seek the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw that motion so the only vote we will have today is on the main motion.

• (0100)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the Hon. Member to withdraw the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Nystrom) withdrawn.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 57, it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

The question is on the motion of Mr. Mazankowski, seconded by Mr. Lewis.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the Members.

• (0120)

And the division bells having rung:

Mr. Speaker: Before reading the question to the House, and having regard to the special nature of this vote, it would be my intention to proceed with the taking of the division by rows, as was done on Monday, June 8, 1987, when the House disposed of a previous amendment.

Therefore, as is customary, Hon. Members in favour of the motion will be asked to indicate their position first, followed by Members who are opposed.

[Translation]

I would ask all Hon. Members in the first row, on my right, who support the motion to rise together. The clerk will call their names. He will start with the Hon. Member closest to the Chair, who will resume his seat once his or her name has been called and recorded.

[English]

When the taking of names of Hon. Members in the first row to my right has been completed, I will ask Members in the second, third, fourth, and fifth rows on my right to proceed in a similar manner.

I will then ask Members in the first row to my left, regardless of their Party affiliation, who are in favour of the motion, to rise and remain standing until their names have been called, and I will carry on similarly with the other rows on my left.

Once the votes of Hon. Members supporting the motion have been completed in this manner, I will then invite Members in the first row to my right who are opposed to the motion to rise. I will proceed similarly through the remaining rows on my right, and then follow the same procedure for Hon. Members to my left.

It bears repetition that the taking of names of Hon. Members in every row will begin with the Hon. Members seated closest to the Chair and will continue consecutively along to the far end of the row. This will be so to my right, regardless of rank, and it will be so to my left, regardless of rank or Party affiliation.

During the taking of the vote I would ask all Hon. Members to give the very greatest co-operation and courtesy so that the vote will be taken without any error.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Mazankowski) which was negatived on the following division:

POINT OF ORDER

REFUSAL TO ACCEPT PETITION—MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am now prepared to rule on the point of order raised on June 15 by the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) concerning a petition he had hoped to present on child care.

The petitioners were calling upon Parliament to provide the provinces and territories with the immediate short-term funding to expand non-profit child care.

The Clerk of Petitions advised the Hon. Member that his petition was out of order because it entailed public expenditures.

[English]

Let me say at once that the advice given to the Hon. Member by the Clerk of Petitions was totally supported by long-standing precedents. Citation 685(3) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition states:

> The House will refuse to receive any petition that directly asks for a grant of money out of the public revenues unless such grant has first been recommended by the Crown.

This citation is substantiated by all previous editions of Beauchesne in even greater detail, and also in all four editions of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure.

In addition, we have numerous precedents on the record in the form of Speakers' rulings, dating back to May 7, 1868.

There was one case, on May 19, 1947, where the Speaker allowed a petition praying for an increase in old age pensions, but this was because the Governor General's recommendation had already been signified to a Bill having the same objective.

An important ruling of June 7, 1972, emphasized that the Chair was obliged to ensure that petitions conform to "the historic practices and usages of the House". The Speaker added, and I quote:

> At many times the House has shown itself willing to waive its rules, however strict, to allow the introduction or the passage of a measure it desires, but it has consistently refused to do the same with petitions.

Like so many of our practices, this is one we inherited from the British Parliament. It has been governed by a Standing Order of the British House of Commons since 1713, and the financial initiative of the Crown was rooted in parliamentary procedure long before then.

We must, however, remember that at one time all legislation originated with a petition, and the practice of originating expenditure by means of a petition accompanied by a Royal Recommendation was not an unusual occurrence in the British Parliament.

On page 794 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition, it is indicated that "the regular use of petitions for initiating expenditures has lapsed", and the British House of Commons now has a Standing Order which prevents the reception of petitions proposing public expenditures in all circumstances.

It is interesting to note, however, that until 1963, a petition from the British Museum for a grant in aid was presented annually by the Home Secretary, who signified the Royal Recommendation.

Faced with such a weight of precedent, the Chair feels unable to reverse a long-standing practice, about which there is no doubt whatsoever. However, I have great sympathy for the argument made by the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), an argument which, as Hon. Members will recall, was fully supported by the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis).

The right to petition Parliament is fundamental to our parliamentary system, and it is not unreasonable to assume that the remedy, in many a situation, could only be found through the expenditure of public funds. A petitioner is entitled to petition for relief in a burdensome situation, so that a mere change in wording could well render a petition in order which might otherwise be out of order. A petition praying for the enactment of a measure which would provide the relief being sought might avoid the restriction imposed by our practice.

[Translation]

Personally, I think that a petition does not fall into the same category as Bills, and that if it seeks to change the current practice, however deeply anchored in history it may be, the House ought to consider this procedure. This is the kind of question which the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure might very well entertain, and I intend to draw the attention of the committee chairman to my ruling.

[English]

I would say to the Hon. Member for Churchill and the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary that this is certainly a matter in respect of which the Chair can say, despite the deep and long history, which makes it very unwise for the Chair to unilaterally change the practice, the House should consider the practice again; and if the House wishes to make changes, it is perhaps time to consider doing so.

I thank both Hon. Members for their interventions.

PRIVILEGE

UNANIMOUS REQUEST BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Ordinarily the Chair does not like to proceed with a ruling if the Hon. Member who has raised the matter is not in the Chamber. However, I hope the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) and other Hon. Members will forgive me doing so this morning because it is the last day before the summer adjournment.

I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised yesterday by the Hon. Member for Skeena. He gave a most lucid account of a sequence of events that took place in the Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry, a sequence of events which resulted in the failure to implement a resolution adopted by the committee.

The Hon. Member claimed that the departmental inaction he described impeded him in the fulfilment of his duties and therefore infringed his privileges. Hon. Members will remember that in that case there was a unanimous committee decision to ask a number of government departments to form a committee to proceed to consider and do certain things which the committee wished them to do. As at the date on the application of the question of privilege yesterday, no action had been taken by the departments mentioned to fulfil the unanimous motion of the committee.

The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis), while arguing that the Hon. Member for Skeena did not have a valid question of privilege, nevertheless expressed his sympathy with his colleague's frustration. The Chair can also sympathize with Hon. Members who in trying to get things done find themselves frustrated by the bureaucratic process. We must, however, recognize that the bureaucracy also has its point of view and when it fails to act there may sometimes be good reasons for it.

However, this is not a matter for the Chair to judge. The Chair can only address the claim of privilege. The practice and precedents in a case of this kind are very clear. The Chair cannot deal with a matter arising from the proceedings of a committee unless the committee makes a formal report to the House, except, I suppose, in some very exceptional circumstances to which I have alluded at another time.

The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council referred to Citation 76 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition and to various rulings of the Chair which support the well established principles concerning privilege in relation to committee proceedings. I myself gave a ruling on December 16, 1986, which was consistent with the practice I have indicated. I must therefore rule that the complaint raised by the Hon. Member for Skeena does not fall within the limits of privilege, but this need not deter the Hon. Member from pursuing it by other means.

STATUTES OF CANADA

REFERENCE OF DRAFT BILL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a copy of the Government's proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

There have been consultations and I believe that if Your Honour seeks unanimous consent to refer this draft Bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General you will find that such consent exists.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister has made a proposal and indicated that there is consent.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of the Bill. I have had a quick look through it and I agree, on behalf of the Official Opposition, with the procedure proposed by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: It is okay.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—EIGHTH AND NINTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the eighth and ninth reports of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

The eighth report deals with Volume I, Sections 2 and 3 of the 1986 Public Accounts of Canada and, in particular, the reservations of the Auditor General concerning the borrowings of Crown corporations and the consolidation of assets, liabilities, revenues, and expenditures of Crown corporations. The committee has requested a government response to the recommendations in paragraphs 7 and 15 of the report.

In its ninth report the committee notes that it has been examining the radar modernization project of the Department of Transport and will continue to do so. However, the committee wishes to state its concerns with the inadequacies in the requirements definition process, the benefit-cost studies, and the impact of the cost control process of the Treasury Board Secretariat.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I take it that consent will be sought later this day but that consent is not given now to second reading of that Bill.

Mr. Lewis: Consent to proceed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I am saying that the Hon. Member is seeking consent. We are not giving consent now.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) assist the Chair? I take it that what he is saying is that there is consent now to proceed to second reading of the Bill later this day, but not necessarily consent then to proceed at that time any further. Is that what the Hon. Member is implying?

Mr. Gauthier: No, Mr. Speaker. I see my House Leader in the House right now. I will defer to him. What I was saying to you, Mr. Speaker, is that if consent was sought later this day we may give it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) could assist the Chair.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I had to leave the House for a few minutes. I believe that we are dealing with Bill S-11?

Mr. Lewis: And a companion Bill.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Yes, and the companion Bill. I believe we had discussed dealing with them together. I am sorry I had to step out of the House when this was being presented. I think what you have in mind is consistent with our discussions.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-263, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (contempt of court).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, the law of contempt of court in Canada is in very bad disrepair. I am moving an amendment to the Criminal Code to try to improve it.

I am influenced very much by legislation brought to the Order Paper by the former Government which has not become law. I am thinking also of a decision recently in Toronto involving Harry Kopypo who was found guilty of contempt of court and had a serious penalty imposed upon him but was not allowed in his own defence to prove that the allegations he was making were true. I am not making the point that the allegations were true. I think Canadians were surprised to find that in that type of a situation the truth was irrelevant and not something that could be pleaded by an accused. This amendment, which I commend to the House, I hope will become law during this Parliament.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved:

That the fifth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on March 20, be concurred in.

He said: Madam Speaker, I rise today to seek the concurrence of the House in the fifth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which was tabled in the House on March 20, 1987. At the outset, I should mention that my co-chairman, Senator Nathan Nurgitz, already moved and secured the concurrence of the other place in this report on May 6, 1987.

This report, which was unanimously adopted by members of all Parties on the committee, deals with the by-laws made by Indian band councils pursuant to the Indian Act. As Hon. Members will know, this Act delegates important law-making powers to band councils. The by-laws made by those band councils typically cover a wide range of matters of local Government on the reserves from property zoning to the sale of intoxicants. The by-laws affect all those who reside or do business on reserves in their every-day lives and occupations.

If Hon. Members would turn to Appendix "A" of the report which is before the House, they would find a list of the law-making powers which Parliament has delegated to band councils. By-laws made pursuant to those powers are subject to review and scrutiny by our committee in accordance with Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act.

From 1982 to 1985, our committee reviewed each bylaw made by band councils. We found that a great number of these by-laws did not conform to the scrutiny criteria which we had been using with the approval of both Houses. Unfortunately, we also encountered difficulties in pursuing the problems which were identified. The reasons behind these difficulties are detailed to a greater extent in the correspondence which my colleagues and I exchanged with the responsible Minister. That correspondence can be found in Appendix "B" to the report.

On the basis of its experience, the joint committee came to conclude that its review of by-laws made under the Indian Act served, and I quote from our report: "a limited practical purpose at best and may not even be entirely appropriate when one considers that these by-laws are made by band councils whose members are democratically chosen by the people they represent".

On this basis, the joint committee decided that it would not review band council by-laws on an individual basis in future and that it should submit this decision to both Houses. We felt it important to draw this to the special attention of the Houses and to ask that they concur in the committee's decision to limit in this way the manner in which it will discharge its responsibilities under Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act. As stated in our report, committee members believe that this approach respects the fact that these legislative decisions are those of democratically elected representatives.

The report also recommends that the Statutory Instruments Act be amended so as to exempt band council by-laws from the examination, registration and publication requirements of the Act. The requirements which otherwise apply to the regulations made under the federal legislation are of little practical value in the case of by-laws made under the Indian Act. In fact, most of the by-laws made by band councils have now been exempted from those requirements through Order in Council. We are recommending that those exemptions be formalized by Parliament.

In our system of Government, it is expected that administrative authorities who exercise law-making power, whether it be Ministers or band councils, will exercise those powers in accordance with regulatory control mechanisms designed to ensure that the resulting laws are fair, reasonable and authorized by law. As I mentioned earlier, the joint committee's experience with by-laws made under the Indian Act has shown that there are substantial problems with the manner in which those powers are sometimes exercised by band councils.

The Indian Act does contain some regulatory control mechanisms which are intended to avoid this. For example, a number of by-laws are currently subject to disallowance by the Minister of Indian Affairs (Mr. McKnight). We have found, however, that there are serious problems not only with some of the band council by-laws but also with the existing regulatory control mechanisms. In this respect, the report lists a number of suggestions which are designed to improve the law.

Two specific amendments to the Indian Act have been recommended. First, we recommended that the Act be amended to guarantee the right of those living on reserves to adequate notice of new by-laws and the right to have access to those by-laws. Second, your committee believes that the Act should prohibit convictions for breach of a by-law unless it is shown that reasonable steps have been taken to bring the law to the attention of the person who is charged.

As for the existing power of disallowance of the Minister under the Indian Act and the more general question of adequate regulatory control mechanisms, the committee received assurances from the responsible Minister that his Department was preparing a disallowance policy and a review of the jurisdictional scope and administrative treatment of by-laws. We recommend that these documents be referred to the appropriate committees of the Houses for study.

In the last few days, I myself have spoken with officials of the Minister of Indian Affairs. I hope there will be a response to the statement I am making now along the lines I have suggested.

Finally, in the course of the preparation of the fifth report, it came to the attention of the committee that about 100 by-laws made under Section 85(1) of the Act had not been registered as required by law. These are penal by-laws which prohibit or regulate the sale or consumption of intoxicants on reserves. Legally the consequence of not having registered these by-laws is that no person may be convicted of violating those prohibitions. This rule of law was set down by Parliament in Section 11 of the Statutory Instruments Act.

• (1040)

Notwithstanding this rule, the committee was informed that a number of Canadians have been convicted for violating some of these by-laws in using intoxicants on reserves. You will agree, as I am sure all Members will, that these unlawful convictions of Canadian citizens are a matter of grave concern so far as the rule of law is concerned. Because of this the committee has recommended that the Government take all necessary remedial measures vis-à-vis those individuals who have been unlawfully convicted. The particular recommendations of the committee in this regard will be found in our report.

In conclusion, I want to reiterate that this report represents the consensus of all members of the joint committee representing all Parties in this place. This committee has a long and well-established tradition of doing its work in a completely non-partisan fashion and the report I have tabled and on which I am moving concurrence reflects this tradition. The recommendations we have put before you are reasonable and non-contentious. They are designed to improve the law and the processes under which native people govern themselves. The report, as I mentioned at the beginning of my intervention, has already been concurred in unanimously in the other place and I ask for similar support from Members of this House.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in responding to the Hon. Member, I want to say that I followed the committee's work as it relates to Indian and northern affairs. I watched the proceedings closely.

The report of the joint committee outlines their concerns with the manner in which the Government deals with by-laws enacted by band councils pursuant to various provisions of the Indian Act. The concerns of the joint committee focus on the need to ensure that band by-laws are fair, reasonable and valid, and that they comply with or are properly exempted from provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act.

Particular concern was noted with problems related to convictions under the intoxicants by-laws passed pursuant to Section 85(1) of the Indian Act. In the last fiscal year 1986-87 some 68 band councils passed 99 by-laws. Of those, 74 dealt with general topics, five with financial matters, and 20 with intoxicants. In total the department recorded over 2,200 by-laws passed by band councils under the terms of the current Act.

There is particular interest on the part of the Government in the powers of Indian bands to enact by-laws as these powers are consistent with the Government's strong commitment to advance and promote Indian self-government. As part of the over-all review by the department of the functions of the Lands, Revenues and Trust sector of the department, a comprehensive review is being carried out on the by-law making process. The review is being conducted by the office of the Comptroller General and results are expected in another year. It is anticipated that the review will come forward with recommendations for improvement of the by-law making process in areas within and outside the purview of the report.

The report also calls into question the validity of band enactments and the processing of same. In addition, it emphasizes the need to ensure that if the requirement to comply with the Statutory Instruments Act was removed, steps would be taken to ensure that persons affected by the by-laws were given notice of such by-laws and that convictions under by-laws were subject to proof of such notice.

As joint chairman of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, the Hon. Member certainly recognizes the complexities raised in this report. The department is in the process of reviewing the report in consultation with other concerned departments. In accordance with the committee's request a comprehensive response to the report will be tabled in this House within the required time frame.

For reasons I have just identified, including the fact that the Government is in the process of preparing a full and complete response, and as provided for in the Standing Orders, I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties and I think you will find there is unanimous consent to revert to presenting reports from committees for the presentation of a report.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

REQUEST THAT NCC REVIEW THE RENTAL INCREASE FOR LA MAISON D'AMITIÉ

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I should like once again to table 11 petitions concerning the Maison d'Amitié, a home for women and children in distress. In view of the fact that the House will be adjourning later this evening without any concrete action being taken by this Government for the Maison d'Amitié or other homes which will have to close once again due to the lack of money, I ask the Government once again to allow the Maison d'Amitié to maintain its rent at the nominal fee of $1 until the implementation of a national policy which would effectively solve the problems met by a million women and children victims of family violence.

The petitioners, Madam Speaker, humbly state that according to a report made public by the Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of Women one woman out of eight is subjected to psychological, economic, sexual or verbal violence by her spouse. At a time when the Government should act instead of cracking down, the National Capital Commission intends to raise by more than $3,000 a month the rent for the Maison d'Amitié, the only francophone non-profit organization in the area for women and children in distress.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), stated recently in the House that the problem of battered women is one of the most serious social and legal challenges facing us today; therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the National Capital Commission to reverse its decision to raise the rent and to continue, as in the past, charging the symbolic sum of one dollar.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT CHILD CARE ALLOWANCE FOR HOMEMAKERS

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, I should like to present to the House a petition signed by some 1,000 residents of my constituency of Châteauguay. Those residents are asking the Parliament of Canada to grant a child care allowance for homemakers. Indeed, they are asking a small allowance which will not increase the burden of taxpayers but will be reallocated from subsidies to child care centres and from the program to promote the status of women.

[English]

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS AT ARMED FORCES BASE AT GOOSE BAY

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition signed by a number of residents of Toronto concerning the low-level flight training of pilots of NATO countries at the NATO Forces Base in Goose Bay, Labrador.

• (1050)

The petitioners are concerned that this program disrupts the way of life of many of the native people there and that better employment could be found for those native people in their traditional activities or in modern ones such as tourism and mining. They also point out that this activity is a provocative and aggressive war-fighting action which tends to endanger world peace.

Therefore, they petition Parliament to ensure that all low-level flight training at Goose Bay Canadian Forces Base will cease and that negotiations with NATO for the establishment of a larger base there will cease.

This brings to more than 1,170 the number of people who have petitioned Parliament on this matter.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition from a number of residents of Toronto with regard to the matter of refugees who have been coming to Canada seeking safety from persecution and finding that our system has been overloaded, broken down, and subject to intolerable delays. They therefore recommend that Parliament adopt the proposal put forward by the all-Party Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration and supported by such national groups as the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Bar Association and other groups.

They ask that Parliament enact legislation which will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings by the claimant in Canada, and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

This brings to more than 1,650 the number of petitions received on this subject.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I have a petition from people in many parts of Canada concerned that the Government's Bill C-55 would threaten Canada's traditional commitment of assistance to refugees because it sets out measures designed to keep most refugee claimants out of the country as opposed to ensuring that genuine refugee claimants are given protection.

Therefore, they petition Parliament to ensure that Bill C-55 will be withdrawn and that a new Bill will be brought in embodying the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of claims of refugees before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to these hearings for every applicant in Canada, and the right to appeal on the basis of fact.

This brings to more than 820 the number of petitions received on this subject.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 84, 85 and 144.

WESTBANK INDIAN BAND

Question No. 84—Mr. King:

1. For the fiscal years 1985-86 and 1986-87 to date, did the Westbank Indian Band receive funds from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, if so, for each year, by program, in what amounts?

2. For the fiscal year 1986-87 to date, have funds been agreed upon which remain unpaid and, if so, by program, in what amounts?

3. If the difference for any program between funds received in 1985-86 and funds received plus those yet to be received in 1986-87 is greater than 10 per cent, what is the reason for the difference?

4. Have new contribution agreements been signed by the Westbank Indian Band during the 1986-87 fiscal year to date, and, if so (a) what are they (b) which of these replace previous agreements?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. In fiscal years 1985/86 and 1986/87 the Westbank Indian Band did receive funds from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows ($000's):

Program	Actual 85/86	Paid to Feb. 28/87	To be paid 86/87	Total 86/87	Per Cent Change
Social Development	1053.2	1036.4	–	1036.4	(2%)
Education	83.6	75.7	18.0	93.7	12%
Band Government	181.7	167.0	17.0	184.0	1%
Community Infrastructure	50.3	45.0	3.0	48.0	(5%)
Economic Development	56.9	67.9	–	67.9	19%
Lands & Membership	241.7	98.1	–	98.1	(59.4%)
Capital	70.0	129.4	17.6	147.0	110%
Total	1737.4	1619.5	55.6	1675.1

2. $55.6 to be paid, see breakdown by program in above table.

3. Reason for difference of funding in any program between 1985/86 and 1986/87 exceeding 10 per cent is as follows:

Program	Per Cent Difference	Reason
Education	12%	Increase in the number of post-secondary students due to Bill C-3
Economic Development	19%	Project specific funding greater in 86/87
Lands & Membership	(59.4%)	173.7 funding from H.Q. for land management not allocated in 86/87; also Sec. 53 and 60 authority granted in 85/86 so start up funding provided in 85/86 not provided in 86/87.
Capital	110%	Project specific funding greater in 1986/87.

Starred Questions

4. Annually, new Contribution Agreements are signed by the Westbank Indian Band and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to flow funds for all of the various programs of the Department for which the band is eligible. This was done in 1986/87 for the Westbank Indian Band and similarly for all bands in the B.C. region.

The agreements do not replace previous agreements as such, but do include any funding commitments which may span across two fiscal years (e.g., a Capital Project).

The Contribution Agreements signed during 1986/87 are as follows:

Local Services Contribution Arrangement (for all Operations and Maintenance programs).

Capital Housing	60.0
Capital Infrastructure	87.0
Economic Development	67.9

INTERNATIONAL TIN COUNCIL

Question No. 85—Miss Nicholson (Trinity):

1. Has the Government contributed to the operation of the International Tin Council since the Council's default on its debt in March, 1986, and if so, in what amount?

2. Has the Government been made party to any legal action arising out of the default of the ITC and, if so, how much (a) has been expended by the Government for legal advice (b) does the Government expect to spend?

3. (a) Has the Government taken any action to bring to an end the default of the ITC (b) does it propose any such action that would limit the Government's legal liability to persons who have suffered loss and damage from the default?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. In 1986-87, the Canadian contribution was f47,817 (approximately $95,000).

2. (a) Yes. In 1986-87, f200,899 (approximately $402,000).

(b) The future amount for legal advice is impossible to estimate as it will depend on the evolution of the litigation before the courts.

3. (a) Canada has assisted the ITC in its efforts to find a solution.

(b) No, Canada is not responsible for the debts of the ITC.

CANADIANS KILLED IN MEXICO

Question No. 144—Mr. Minaker:

From November 1, 1984, to April 1, 1987, were any Canadians in Mexico (a) killed as victims of criminal actions (b) assaulted or had other criminal offences committed against their persons or property and, if so, (i) how many (ii) in each case, what was the name of the town or city where the act occurred and were criminal charges laid?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The following Canadians were killed or injured in Mexico, as a result of criminal actions, since November 1, 1984. To our knowledge criminal charges have been laid only in the case of Mr. Placide Dodier.

Killed or assaulted	Place	Date
Danna Mart Fujikawa — murdered	Guadalajara	January 25, 1985
Tamara Fujikawa — assaulted	Guadalajara	January 25, 1985
James Stobbard — mugged: officials claimed he was hit by a bus	Mazatlan	September 9, 1985
Paul de Luca — shot and killed	Reynosa	February 6, 1986
Danny Douglas Clark — shot and killed	Puerto Vallarta	March 17, 1986
Ham Boehni — killed in hit and run accident	Ciudad Jurez	April 15, 1986
Placide Dodier — shot and killed	Matamoros	April 28, 1986

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 141.

FAILURE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK

Question No. *141—Miss Nicholson (Trinity):

1. Is the Government being sued as a result of the failures of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank and, if so, what individuals or other bodies have instigated legal action, and on what grounds?

2. Has the Government sought legal advice and taken legal action and, if so (a) who is advising the Government or acting on its behalf (b) what amount has been expended for this purpose (c) are further expenditures contemplated or anticipated and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the answer is as follows:

(1) The Government is presently involved directly or indirectly in three suits as a result of the failures of the Canadian Commercial Bank (CCB) and the Northland Bank. The first two suits are in relation to the Financial Institutions Depositors Compensation Act, S.C. 1984-85 c.51 whereby the Nova Scotia Savings & Loan Company and the Saskatchewan Co-op are suing the Government. The issue of these suits is whether or not the promissory notes that each institution held from the CCB are deposits within the meaning of the Act and therefore whether or not the Government owes them compensation under the Act. The other legal action was initiated by the Bank of Montreal against Her Majesty in respect of the March 1985 Participation Agreement. The Bank of Montreal essentially alleges negligence on the part of the Government in respect of the information made available to the bank prior to participating in the Participation Agreement.

(2) The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC), on behalf of the Government, initially sought some advice from the law firm of Tory, Tory, DesLauriers and Binnington in respect of the Nova Scotia Savings & Loan and Saskatchewan Co-op actions. However, that action is now being handled by the Department of Justice. The fees paid to Tory, Tory, DesLauriers and Binnington were $300 and no further expenditures to non-government agencies in respect of the pursuance of those suits are anticipated.

With respect to the Bank of Montreal suit, both the Department of Justice and the law firm of Campbell, Godfrey and Lewtas are acting on behalf of the Government, with the Department of Justice acting as solicitor in the matter. The law firm of Campbell, Godfrey and Lewtas has been retained because of its familiarity with the circumstances surrounding the CCB situation and the demands made upon the Department of Justice. Therefore, a combination of personnel from the Department of Justice and Campbell, Godfrey and Lewtas represents the most efficient use of personnel in these circumstances.

The expenditures thus far have been $1,186.66 in respect of payments to Campbell, Godfrey and Lewtas and it is difficult to predict at this point in time whether further expenditures will be made.

Madam Speaker, I would ask that all the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to a motion moved on June 10, 1987, as reported on page 6963 of Hansard. The motion was adopted by the House. It was as follows:

> That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the Cape Breton Development Corporation's five-year plan.

I pointed out in a previous intervention on June 17, 1987, that that was not what was produced by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis). At that time he tabled in the House only a summary of the Cape Breton Development Corporation's plan. I made it very clear in a previous intervention that I was requesting the full plan as that is what I believe the motion requests.

At the time of my earlier intervention I was told by the Parliamentary Secretary that he would look into this matter and give me an answer. I think June 30 would be an appropriate day for me to get an answer on this.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend and I are engaged in a question of semantics. The Government did in fact table the summary of the Cape Breton Development Corporation's corporate plan. There are certain things in the over-all specific plan which are confidences of the Privy Council. It is custom that only summaries of corporate plans of Crown corporations be tabled and made public. I think you will find, Madam Speaker, that the Government has complied with the statute in this case.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, the motion is quite clear. It speaks of "a copy of the Cape Breton Development Corporation's five-year plan". There is no reference whatsoever to the words "summary", "executive summary" or any other condensation of that plan.

Recognizing the amount of business that has to be done by the House today, I would like to give notice of a point of order and would like to have a ruling at some time in the future on what the motion which was passed by this House requires of the Government. I submit that the motion is quite clear and does require the tabling of the entire five-year plan. I ask for a response from the Chair, perhaps in early September.

RIGHT TO LIFE OF THE UNBORN—PROTECTION OF CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—North Delta): Madam Speaker, I thank Hon. Members for giving me this opportunity to present a petition on behalf of residents of Port Coquitlam, Langley and Surrey which says, in part, that all human beings are deserving of legal protection from unjust attacks upon their lives and that the present law regarding abortion does not provide such protection, wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code so that unborn human beings are protected by law from abortion.

The petition has been duly certified by the Clerk of Petitions.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-56, an Act to amend certain Acts relating to financial institutions, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1100)

Mr. Hockin moved that Bill C-56, an Act to amend certain Acts relating to financial institutions, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to speak briefly on third reading of Bill C-56, an Act to amend certain Acts relating to financial institutions.

The Bill contains an important new provision to permit federal financial institutions to own securities dealers. We are all aware that financial institutions are eager to take up the challenge offered by the opportunity to become more involved in the securities industry, and I expect this development to greatly strengthen the capitalization of Canadian securities dealers. The power to own a securities dealer will also be available to foreign-owned federal financial institutions operating in Canada. Although entry is not guaranteed and, in considering applicants, we will look at the extent to which Canadian institutions have access to the home jurisdiction of the applicant, the Bill makes it possible for foreign-owned federal financial institutions to operate in Canada.

The Bill will also strengthen supervisory powers. Specifically, it will give the Superintendent of Financial Institutions the power to issue cease and desist orders to institutions engaging in unsafe or unsound business practices, as well as the power to revalue real estate assets or assets secured by real estate, for the purposes of determining compliance with solvency tests. Regulatory standards applicable to insurance companies are also being strengthened.

I would also note that the clauses which were in Bill C-56 pertaining to ministerial approval of changes in ownership of financial institutions have been withdrawn, but they have been introduced as a separate Bill this morning.

This decision was taken for two reasons which I would like to make clear at this time. First, I was aware of the fact that the industry and parliamentarians wanted more time to consider the share transfer approval provisions. Introduction of the provisions in a second Bill provides that opportunity.

The second reason is that I was acutely aware of the importance, both domestically and internationally, of moving forward with the other provisions of this Bill without delay.

I hope Hon. Members of the House share my views on the need for rapid implementation of these measures. The financial deregulation which is very much in the news today is made possible in large measure by this Bill. I would urge the House to give Bill C-56 third reading as expeditiously as possible.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, when I spoke during second reading of Bill C-56, I mentioned that my Party had agreed to a short debate at that stage so that the Bill could go quickly into committee. At that time we had been given to understand two things: First, that it was necessary to move quickly because Bill C-56 contains the measures complementing the Ontario Government's initiative to open up ownership of its securities industries set to take effect today, June 30; second, we were given to understand that there were no surprises in this Bill. Apart from the securities proposals, it contains measures carried forward from Bills and draft legislation first introduced as long ago as 19 months and amended slightly.

On that basis we agreed to a brief debate on Bill C-56 at second reading. However, I pointed out in my speech of May 29 that the Government has fallen into a disagreeable habit of dragging its heels on introducing legislation, then attempting to have it rushed through the House and through committee with assurances that everything will be all right if the Opposition just agreed to pass it.

As responsible opposition Members, we readily co-operate to expedite legislation in cases of urgency when it is clearly in the national interest to do so. But all too often, since the present Government came to power, the House has been presented with legislation requiring careful examination and considered debate, and we have been asked to deal with it quickly, without the opportunity to judge for ourselves that the Government's assurances have any validity.

The Bill to put together the bail-out package for the Canadian Commercial Bank is a prime example. We were asked to give that quick passage on the basis of government assurances which we later found to be absolutely worthless. The Government did not have the facts or did not choose to tell the House.

Given that history, it is perhaps not surprising that when Bill C-56 was examined in committee it became clear that there was more to it than met the eye. I refer to the measure which has now been lifted from the Bill, giving the Minister power to review and block transfers of share ownership of financial institutions.

This was not a new proposal. As I said in my speech at second reading, the proposal for a process of ministerial review was in two earlier Bills which were never passed, and in draft legislation before that. However, the proposal as it appeared in Bill C-56 was greatly changed and had a reach far beyond anything we could have anticipated.

Prior to Bill C-56, the proposal had been for a process of ministerial approval, or veto, of share transactions that would result in control of a financial institution or an increase of shares in a financial institution exceeding 10 per cent. The amended version, which appeared in the now deleted Clauses 10, 44, and 51 of Bill C-56, went far beyond the notion of control and resulted in a requirement for ministerial approval in any situation where a person or associated group acquires more than 10 per cent of a financial institution or increases its holding to more than 10 per cent of any class of shares in a financial institution. The seemingly innocuous amendment—this portion of the Bill which had been played down by the Minister and his officials—in fact introduced a new and quite extraordinary breadth to the measure. It prematurely raised important public policy issues that should not be rushed through in what we had been given to understand was a housekeeping or mechanism Bill.

The Bill set at 10 per cent the threshold at which share transactions would be subject to ministerial approval, but the broad definition of "associated persons", as it applies to the transfer of ownership proposals, would have meant that transactions would become subject to review in companies that had only a marginal connection with the financial institution.

The committee heard some graphic examples of hypothetical share transactions that would be subject to review under former Clause 10 because somewhere in the corporate family tree was a federally-regulated financial institution.

There are two problems with this: First, what the Bill attempted to do; and second, the manner in which it was attempted.

That one small change in the predecessor Bill, which became Bill C-56, would have so amplified the ministerial review process as to enable full implementation of the Government's policy, as described in its December, 1986, discussion paper pertaining to the participation of commercial enterprises in the ownership of financial institutions.

• (1110)

The commercial links policy is something I expected, as I believe most Members of this House expected, to see in the draft Bill which is to appear later this summer and which is supposed to contain all the major public policy proposals, including the Government's over-all policy on ownership of financial institutions. The Government has said it intends to release a draft Bill, hear public response on its major reform proposals and then come back with a Bill in the fall.

However, what appears to have happened with Bill C-56 is a subversion of that process whereby something which should have been in the upcoming major piece of draft legislation was instead craftily insinuated into Bill C-56, which we were told was a "no surprises" Bill that had to be passed quickly to allow the securities deregulation to proceed on June 30, today.

I have maintained from the outset that the Government would have done better to table all its reform legislation at once so that the various proposals could be examined in context. Indeed, the Minister, in appearing before the finance committee on Bill C-42 and Bill C-56, said they need to be placed in the context of the upcoming third legislative package which we have not yet seen. The fact that the Minister and his department are not apparently well enough organized to provide us with that context is no justification for this attempt to bring in by the back door an important policy proposal which deserves more examination and debate than we have been able to accord it under the rushed conditions imposed by the Government.

Essentially, that is why the members of the finance committee were not willing to approve the Bill as it was and why they insisted on the removal of three clauses. I am pleased that the Minister finally agreed to that removal. As it is now, Bill C-56 more closely matches the description given by the Minister in one of his appearances before the finance committee.

Bill C-42, which has already been passed, realigns the structure of the supervisory system and the deposit insurance system. Bill C-56 primarily sets out new powers for the Minister and the chief regulator within this new system.

I will not go into great detail about these new powers and provisions to which I referred in my speech at second reading. They include the power for the regulator to issue cease and desist orders against institutions carrying on unsafe business practices and the power for the regulator to get independent valuation of real estate assets held by financial institutions. The Bill also raises the financial standards of federally-regulated insurance companies and clarifies the conditions under which a mutual life insurance company is deemed to be a Canadian company. These are proposals we regard as sound and necessary and we do not oppose them.

The measures I have just mentioned are those which give Bill C-56 the character of a "mechanism" Bill. The one remaining exception to that, now that Clauses 10, 41, and 55 have been removed, are the measures allowing federally-regulated financial institutions to own securities dealers.

I raised a number of concerns about this at second reading of this Bill and, based on what the finance committee heard from witnesses who commented on these proposals, and on more recent events in the industry, it seems that we have here yet another situation where the Government is being overtaken by events. Having waited so long without acting, it is now moving ahead in a way that raises a lot of questions about how much thought has gone into its course of action.

For example, late last week the Government approved by Order in Council a share transaction, the effect of which will be to give the large New York based investment house of Goldman Sachs and Co. a Canadian subsidiary. This has been done through a provision of the Bank Act. Although Goldman Sachs and Co. is an investment house, it is deemed to be a "foreign bank" because it happens to own a merchant bank incorporated and carrying on business in the United Kingdom. Since the parent company is considered a foreign bank, it could go ahead and buy out all the shares of the new corporation, Goldman Sachs Canada Ltd. without having to go through Investment Canada.

In this roundabout but perfectly legal way, a large international investment dealer has arranged direct access to the Canadian market. Of course, the plan hinges on the passage of Bill C-56. All this manoeuvring is explained in a regulatory impact analysis statement which is attached to, but not part of the Order in Council. The impact statement says that undertakings have been provided by Goldman Sachs and Co. in respect of this arrangement and it directs further inquiries to the Office of the Inspector General of Banks. However, from inquiry at that office it seems the undertakings will not be made public.

I wonder how long the Government thinks it can continue in this furtive fashion? I understand that yet another Order in Council on a similar basis will be passed today. How long does the Government think it can continue to make these cosy, private deals, its private undertakings which are not made public without having the other companies raise the issue and demand disclosure?

Foreign firms are now lining up to participate in the Canadian securities industry, yet there is no clear policy in place with regard to ownership of Canadian financial institutions. We have just seen an attempt to bootleg into C-56 a very far-reaching ownership proposal without any warning or public debate. It did not succeed, but what we have left is a proposal which originated not with the Government of Canada but with a provincial Government, and which will allow banks, including foreign-owned Schedule B banks, trust companies and insurance companies to establish their own securities subsidiaries or to acquire 100 per cent ownership of an existing Canadian securities dealer as of today, June 30. Foreign firms will be allowed to participate as well. They are to be held to a maximum of 50 per cent ownership in the first year, rising to 100 per cent as of June 30, 1988.

I understand the Investment Dealers Association of Canada has 50 new applications for membership, more than half of them from large international security firms. According to Bill C-56, foreign firms must have ministerial approval to enter the Canadian securities industry, but the Bill does not set out any criteria under which approval would be granted or denied. Given the magnitude of the changes in store, it seems not only logical but imperative that there should be some criteria and that they should be set out in the legislation.

We are on the threshold of major change, starting today, June 30, with the opening up of the Ontario securities industry to new domestic and foreign participants. In the United Kingdom, the experience was called "the big bang". Whatever we call it here, it is certain that after today we will be seeing new activity and new levels of competition in the industry.

The question I have to ask is this. Is the Government ready for it? I have said there is no government policy regarding ownership of financial institutions. Neither do we see any criteria or guidelines to determine which foreign institutions will be permitted entry to the Canadian industry.

At this point only one province is affected but all provinces have securities industries which are provincially-regulated. At this point, when we are taking a first step onto the world stage to compete with international firms, it is appropriate to ask if the Government is giving any thought to the establishment of a national securities regulator, not to replace the Provincial Securities Commission but to speak for Canada outside her borders and to regulate the international calibre of competition we will have in our domestic markets.

The Minister did not seem very receptive to the idea when it was raised in committee. He said he did not want to alienate the provinces by putting the idea forward prematurely. But that is surely an untenable argument given that the provinces are now up in arms about the federal-provincial agreement with Ontario which was negotiated without consultation with them and which they feel the Minister would like to apply across the board. I understand that on June 11 nine provinces reached an interprovincial securities agreement which is their response to the Ottawa-Ontario agreement.

It seems to me that this is not a time for the Minister to back off. Canada is the only industrialized country in the world without a national securities regulator. It is not a new idea by any means, but I am inclined to think that it is an idea whose time has come, of course, after careful negotiation with the provinces.

Another concern which relates to the criteria for foreign firms and the possible functions of a national securities commission is that of access for Canadian institutions which want to do business outside Canada. This is also something that I raised in my speech at second reading. A number of witnesses who appeared before the finance committee and the Senate banking committee mentioned it as well. Some were of the view that reciprocity should be made a criterion for approval, or a condition for foreign companies to enter the Canadian market. Others thought that the next best thing would be for Canadian firms to be accorded national treatment. For example, a Canadian bank in Britain would be on the same footing as a British bank.

This is a matter of some importance, even urgency, because in Bill C-56 the Government may already be setting up situations that will put Canadian firms at a competitive disadvantage. For example, this Bill will allow foreign-owned Schedule B banks to own up to 100 per cent of a Canadian securities dealer in Ontario—50 per cent today and 100 per cent one year from now. Some American banks may well receive approval to do so. However, there is no legislative provision in the U.S. for Canadian banks engaging in securities activities under Canadian law to do the same thing in the U.S. Thus the American bank has the broader power.

The Minister says that Canadian access to overseas markets will be a factor in his considering applications from foreign firms. I would have preferred a firmer statement of what the Government is doing now and what its intentions are in the future.

There are great changes in the offing. There are opportunities and potential benefits for Canada in moving to liberalize our securities markets. But in order to maximize those benefits for Canadians the Government must demonstrate that it has the capacity, the ability and the drive to manage change fairly and effectively.

To date, there has not been much evidence of this. The reform process has moved in fits and starts, buffeted by outside events and repeatedly dropped to the bottom of the Government's agenda. Nevertheless, I still have hope that the draft Bill, the final piece of legislation, will indeed be released in the next couple of weeks and that we may proceed to consider it early in the next session.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, Bill C-56 now before us on third reading is the second part of the financial package of three Bills which deal with financial institutions and which members of my Party have agreed with the Minister to allow to go through before we rise for the summer. The deadline is, of course, June 30, because of the actions of the Province of Ontario.

A major provision of the Bill is to allow banks and other financial institutions, including co-ops and credit unions, to own securities dealers. I find this interesting and disturbing. One can see that the investment industry in Canada, having elected one of its number to be Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), will in fact disappear as an independently Canadian-owned entity in a matter of days, if not perhaps in a matter of a few weeks or a few months.

Today's news is that 35 per cent of Wood Gundy has been sold, or has been agreed to be sold, to the First National Bank of Chicago. The Minister may want to inform the House at some point whether or not this sale has been approved by the Government since this takeover surely has to have some form of federal approval. However, I am sure that the partners in Wood Gundy are rubbing their hands in glee because for 35 per cent of the company they have received something in the order of five times book value. Therefore they have been extremely lucratively paid for giving up effective control of the company. Once 1988 rolls by, I am sure the First National Bank will move on to take full control.

What is interesting and of concern is that there has been no breath of objection from the Government, despite the fact that a Canadian bank would not be in a position to take control of a major securities dealer in the United States. The banking legislation in the United States prohibits that. Not only does it prohibit such a move, it inhibits a Canadian bank which has a securities subsidiary in Canada from operating and doing banking operations in the United States.

The Minister said that some form of reciprocity would be involved. But it is not clear to me that that is being applied in any serious way whatsoever.

The Bill as we have it before us provides new powers to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. These are powers which, with hindsight, would have been very helpful. We are closing the stable door after the horse has fled in connection with the demise of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank.

The Superintendent, who takes over from the Inspector of Banks, will have the power to issue cease and desist orders, to impose new values for real estate assets, that is, to force an institution to revalue its real estate assets, or to reassess the values, or to revalue them directly. These are useful powers. They involve a continuation of regulation at a fairly intense level.

My Party has raised some concerns over the degree to which the oversight is being exercised almost entirely by the regulator and the limit of degree to which there is any outside influence in terms of public scrutiny that will allow the public, in the form of depositors, investors, and borrowers, to reach a judgment themselves about the financial stability of institutions with which they do business. Nonetheless, these powers are acceptable.

The area which caused controversy in committee was with respect to Clause 10 and related clauses that dealt with the commercial link policy of the Government. The Government's December 18 White Paper indicates that the Government has decided that commercial links to financial institutions are wrong under any circumstances. That is not quite it. They are actually wrong under any circumstances, to the extent that new commercial links are to be forged, but existing commercial links which allow Imasco and Power Financial and groups such as that to have the major stake in financial institutions are protected. Those are grandfathered. The only restriction is that 35 per cent of the control of financial institutions will be required to be widely held rather than being handled in one hand, in the hand of one commercial group. But 65 per cent can remain in the hands of a particular group. That is simply inadequate as far as New Democrats are concerned.

We are concerned that the Government's policies are being released in dribs and drabs and that we do not yet know exactly what the Government has in mind in terms of its ownership policy. We have the White Paper which we have indicated is inadequate. It has been criticized in many quarters. The Government has not indicated whether it is shying away from it or not.

What it has done, or what it did propose, was a series of measures that were slipped in through the back door, as my friend, the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), pointed out just a few minutes ago. The first version was extremely offensive. It meant that by judging that commercial links exist at any time there was a more than 10 per cent shareholding going into associated companies, as well as upstream and downstream, and that the web of ministerial control over what one assumes would be relatively normal business activity would be so widespread as to be ludicrous.

• (1130)

The people from Power Financial pointed out that their subsidiary, Consolidated Bathurst, was engaged in a joint venture with the Government of China for a pulp mill in eastern British Columbia. Since the Minister's power of oversight would have stretched to any associated company and any of its activities, that would have meant that the Minister would, theoretically, have had some oversight function on that project, and the Government of China would not have been able to pursue the creation of a new steel mill, the opening of some kind of new financial institution in China, without the approval of the Minister of Finance of Canada.

I presume that that approval would not have been sought. It would be ludicrous to expect a sovereign Government to have to come, cap in hand, to Canada in respect of something which it was doing within its own country.

But, this would also have been the case with all of the commercial investments which are controlled through the investment fund of the Quebec Pension Plan. It would have possibly been the case with the Government of France because of its interrelationships with certain commercial and financial operations here in Canada.

The Minister does not listen very well. He failed to be sensitive to the concerns of the members of the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs. Even when it is the New Democrats that are saying that a particular measure seems to be unworkable when applied to the business community, I think that any Minister of Finance should hold back and say, "Look, this isn't just a new realism coming from New Democrats; something must be really wrong with this."

Instead, the Minister rolled back and came back with a 50 per cent rule. But that, at the same time, would have been oppressive because it was still not clear how it was going to be applied. It also applied, if I recall correctly, to any increase in shareholdings over the 10 per cent level—and that did not seem to make sense. The only good thing about it was that the intrusion into associated companies had been sharply cut back.

I would be concerned that the Minister might in fact, having exercised his right of review, accept certain takeovers of financial institutions which I would have found objectionable, speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

On the one hand, we did not know what the Minister was going to do with this power; the power was unnecessarily intrusive. Finally, the Minister accepted the reality of the situation, which was that this Bill would not be available in time for the "Big Bang" in Ontario if Clause 10 and the related clauses were not withdrawn. The Minister tried to dress up his withdrawal, but in fact that is what actually occurred.

On this particular question, I should like to point out that the Government's present policy, which grandfathers existing commercial interests, is, I believe, shortsighted, unrealistic and impractical with respect to the future establishment of new financial institutions.

A financial institution, even a small one, needs a substantial amount of capital. That capital, if it is not to come from existing companies, has either to be raised in the market or to come from wealthy individuals. The Minister's view has been that those wealthy individuals, or any shareholders with more than a minimum shareholding, have to have no commercial links at all. For a small institution, it seems to me that that may well be very difficult.

That is the dilemma the Government has got itself into. It is not prepared to be tough and to insist that large financial institutions must be widely held and cannot be controlled by any one interest, be it commercial or non-commercial. The Government, on the one hand, therefore, permits the concentration of ownership for large institutions but, at the same time, inhibits the creation of new financial institutions.

Since some financial institutions are going to disappear, through adverse business circumstances, through merger, through acquisition, there has to be, I would assume, a supply of new financial institutions to take their place. The Government's view seemed to be that those financial institutions should mainly come from the foreign-controlled sector. A godparent for a new financial institution would be permitted if it were a foreign company, even if it had commercial links outside of Canada. The Government was only looking at commercial links within Canada—a position which seemed to me, at best, contradictory and rather strange.

I should like also, Madam Speaker, to raise the concerns of New Democrats—and these are concerns that I have enunciated at some length during previous debate on this Bill and on Bill C-42—that while the Government is concerned about commercial links, it is, on the other hand, open, without a great deal of thought, to permitting financial institutions to own securities dealers. These securities dealers will doubtless engage in promoting stocks, in underwriting, and in giving investment advice, and that kind of thing.

Even though the Government says there will be all kinds of Chinese walls, as they are called—and we should get a different term for that—even though there is a segregation of the different activities, nonetheless there will be people working for the same enterprise, some of whom will be promoting different bond issues or share issues, or recommending the acquisition of different shares, at the same time as others working within the same corporate group, within the same bank or financial institution, will be lending, reviewing the credit worthiness, or in certain cases calling on a particular enterprise, a borrower, to shore up its equity, to get its ratios better, to do an issue, or something like that, because they are getting into a risky kind of situation.

The insurance companies have assured us that the way that they deal with this problem is, quite simply, by not allowing conflicts of interest to take place. Therefore, they do not allow companies to which they lend money to also do business in terms of having insurance coverage with the same insurance company.

The corollary for the banks would be that if a bank is involved in lending to a particular company, its securities subsidiary should not be involved in underwriting, in promoting the shares, or in any other way dealing with the securities of that particular company. That, it seems to me, is a true Chinese wall. But, a situation wherein one group of employees is meant not to know what another group of employees is doing, is, it seems to me, weak and subject to abuse.

Suppose, for example, that Dome Petroleum was going through its current travail at a time when the banks had the authority to do underwriting through securities subsidiaries. In that circumstance, would a bank not have some temptation to have its securities subsidiary engage in underwriting because the bank was feeling hopelessly exposed because of the lending that it had made to Dome, realizing that that lending was in fact not prudent? That is the kind of conflict of interest with which the Minister has not yet dealt.

I recognize that the Bill which has been tabled today by the Minister with respect to the ownership of financial institutions allows retroactivity; but these other questions have in fact not yet been addressed.

I wish to comment on a couple of other issues which concern me in this whole area of the financial package. One is the question of the deregulation of financial dealings internationally and the reaction we are seeing here in Canada.

Canada is one of the G-7—but only just; we are one of the seven largest industrial countries, but only just. We have an active and efficient capital market—more active and more efficient than a number of the other major western European countries. As well, we have a banking system which also is quite efficient compared, let us say, to the American system, where it is much harder to clear cheques and to make the payments system work.

In our securities industry, however, we have 10 securities authorities. Now we have 11, because the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has taken on certain responsibilities.

The Minister and the Government have entered into some agreements with Ontario which have provoked, quite rightly, concern and upset in the other provinces, which feel that the federal Government deals only with Ontario and does not realize that there are other securities bodies across the country. However, when we deal internationally we will be talking with the authorities of other countries, not with one voice but with 10 or 11 voices. That is a very serious concern.

• (1140)

It is my view that in addition we impose unnecessary restrictions and problems on Canadian corporations and companies which must have securities vetted, reviewed, and approved, not by only one securities agency but by many, at the very least by the Ontario Securities Commission and probably by the Quebec, Alberta, and British Columbia securities commissions. Theoretically they could require the approval of new securities by 10 agencies across the country. That kind of situation occurs in certain areas of the United States as well. It is not defensible there, and it is not defensible here.

I believe that a national securities agency should be a priority of the Government of Canada. I also believe that such a securities agency should in fact be able to provide—and there must be some co-operation with the provinces—one-stop approval of new securities issues and underwritings for companies which consider themselves to be national, or for companies which expect that their securities will be traded not only in Canada but also in other countries.

I have no objection to there continuing to be securities regulation at the provincial level so that if a company in British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, or northern Ontario wishes to have its securities traded only in one jurisdiction, or possibly in a couple, it needs to meet only the requirements of the particular jurisdiction, not what might be more stringent requirements of a national securities body. However, I would expect that Bell Canada, Northern Telecom, Imperial Oil, and other such organizations would generally get their securities approved at the national level, and I think that is how it should be.

This is not a move of excessive centralization. As the Hon. Member for Trinity pointed out, every other major country has a national securities agency, and Canada is very much out of step in not having one. We need to look at it very seriously.

I am concerned as well in terms of the interests of regulators and of investors. Why is it that Canadian investors, financial journalists, of which I used to be one, and the public at large can learn more about many companies by going to the Securities and Exchange Commission and looking at the K-10 documents, the file documents which are issued on a regular basis, than they can get from our securities commissions and other agencies in Canada? I think that is ludicrous. The standard of disclosure is not adequate in Canada. It could be made more adequate, particularly for national companies, if we had a national securities agency.

The whole question of how federal and provincial supervision will work in a deregulated environment is still not adequately addressed. I would cite with concern the inadequacy of the federal and Ontario supervision which preceded the collapse of Greymac, Seaway, and Crown Trust in Ontario. It was a situation where the two levels of Government were saying, "After you, Alphonse" and effectively letting those agencies go by the board.

I should like to conclude by saying that one major area not addressed in the whole financial package is not that of the interests of large investors, deposit-making institutions, and so on, but the interests of ordinary Canadians—small businesses, farmers, and people who simply must deal with banks. I hear complaints all the time from my constituents. They ask, how come when I put a cheque in the bank because I just got paid I cannot get out any money for five days and, in the meantime, I have to pay my rent and the rent cheque bounced? How come when I get a welfare cheque I cannot get that welfare cheque honoured quickly and when I go to the bank they look at me and treat me like dirt? Why is it when I am running a small business that my business is harassed by my local bank manager and I have no means of redress, and at the same time the banks make all those loans to Brazil which are worth only 75 cents on the dollar, if that? They make those huge amounts of loans abroad but they are not prepared to help small businesses establish themselves in Canada.

I have heard people say that they have businesses, that they employ 25 people in a restaurant, that they have seven people working in a small manufacturing concern, or that they opened a store which provides a lot of employment in a particular community, and they ask why they are being harassed. Whereas, if they were Conrad Black and needed $500,000 to make some fancy financial deal, which would probably be financed with their tax dollars because of some tax dodge, they would have no problem, and would only have to make a couple of telephone calls to set up the necessary financing.

Many people who are active in the economic life of the country are very right to perceive that there is something severely wrong in terms of who gets what out of the banking system and out of the financial system.

I took pains to look at whether or not there was some redress for people with these concerns. I discovered that the Inspector General of Banks, who is now the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, now has an ombudsman in his office. However, this operation is so obscure that when I raised the need for such an ombudsman function in the office, the official, Michael Mackenzie, said that he did not know it existed. We found out that it existed, but it could only be brought into play on a kind of moral basis after the business, the farmer, or the depositor concerned had appealed to the very last level within a bank.

In other words, if they are going down the drain, if their business is being driven to the wall, if their loan is being called, if the mortgage on their house which they had to give as security is being cashed in, if their wife and kids—and this has happened—are being forced out of the family home because of the action of the banks involved, they must launch an appeal with the bank president who will basically tell them to get lost. They will not even know about that, because they are too busy trying to rescue what they can from the particular situation. Then they go to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and say "Can you do something", and he will say, "We may have an office, I am not even aware of it".

When the Government of Canada makes policies on behalf of banking and financial institutions, it should look not only at the needs of a handful of Titans on Bay Street, or a handful of large corporate conglomerates which are being given grandfathered status, at the same time as the competition that might dethrone them from their commanding heights is being inhibited, it should look also at the needs of ranchers in Alberta, wheat farmers in Saskatchewan, small business people in Manitoba, fishermen in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, people trying to set up small industries in northern Ontario, depositors and ordinary consumers in Ottawa, welfare recipients in Toronto, and people like that.

The test of a financial system is not whether it aids big business, the forces of a capitalist society in a capitalist economy, but whether it also aids and serves the needs for ordinary people from coast to coast. I am not satisfied that that is the case now. I am certainly not satisfied that the Government understands that part of its mandate, or that part of the reason people kicked out the Liberals and put in this gang was precisely because they wanted that kind of sense from the Government of Canada.

I see that my time is up, but I should like to refer to the Party which you, Madam Speaker, have the honour to represent.

• (1150)

[Translation]

The Party you have the honour to represent has dropped so low in the polls because it has served the interests of corporate Canadians on Saint-Jacques and Bay and reflected those of small business people, farmers and average Canadians.

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Madam Speaker, I do not intend, nor does my Party, to hold up the adoption of this Bill on third reading. I have a few comments to make, because I think this is a very important piece of legislation that contains a number of provisions that will have some very long-term consequences for this country's economy and especially for the financial sector.

Last night or rather this morning, at 1 a.m., I was delighted with the results of the vote on capital punishment. Today, however, I confess I do not feel the same elation upon seeing that Bill C-56 will receive the approval of this House on third reading, considering the Government's majority.

Madam Speaker, June 30, 1987, is a day that will go down in the history of the financial sector in Canada, but as I see it, there is a very negative side and an extremely dangerous one for Canadian sovereignty.

I am very disappointed that an issue as important as this one has not received the attention it deserves in this House. It was the Government's decision to finish the debate on capital punishment at any cost before the House adjourns today. This means that today, in order to avoid administrative chaos in the financial sector, we have to pass Bill C-56, to swallow it, much as one would swallow a bitter pill.

Madam Speaker, Bill C-56 has a number of aspects with which I totally disagree. My colleague from Trinity pointed this out, we said so on second reading and we said so in committee. I wonder how many Conservative Members in this House are aware of the impact Bill C-56 will have on financial institutions and Canadian sovereignty in this respect.

My colleague from Trinity referred to the expression used in Great Britain when their institutions were deregulated. I am referring to the Big Bang. On day X, the whole financial sector was deregulated so that financial institutions could engage in any field of activity, ownership was practically free of controls, and so forth.

Comparing the Canadian situation with that in Great Britain is of course like comparing an elephant with a mouse. That is because the situation in this country with respect to financial institutions and especially investment and securities dealers is quite different, and our position is different as well.

However, I say to the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) that his policy is ill-conceived and inappropriate, given the state of development of our financial institutions. He is acting hastily and he is acting in such a way as to complicate the administration of financial institutions. He is in fact selling part of the Canadian control of our financial institutions to foreign interests.

Since it came to power, this Government has preferred to ignore the issue of Canadian sovereignty and the fact that it is important for a country to control the major components of its economic, financial and social levers.

June 30 opens the door to the purchase by foreign-owned companies of any securities dealers, and it also creates chaos as far as the regulation and monitoring of securities-related activities are concerned.

Last night on the news we heard that 30 per cent of our biggest securities firm had just been sold to foreign interests. My colleague referred to the Goldman Sachs transaction. Everybody knows that the big investment and securities dealers, Nesbitt Thomson, Burns Fry, Levesque Beaubien, Geoffrion Leclerc—that all these firms or least most of them have already received offers or are negotiating either with the major banks or with foreign firms to sell an interest in their firms.

Madam Speaker, no wonder this should happen. In case the Minister is discouraged, I will not unduly hold up his Bill, but at least he will let me draw the attention of Conservative Members to what the Government is doing.

I wish we had more time to raise this issue and ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to hold a free vote in the House. I maintain that if all Hon. Members had a clear explanation about Bill C-56 it would be rejected, something like in the case of capital punishment.

This Government has forsaken Canadian sovereignty in all sectors, and today we are witnessing a repeat performance in the field of financial institutions.

Madam Speaker, last evening I listened to the Investment Dealers Association of Canada President explain that one of Japan's brokerage firms—Nomura, among the best in the business—has more capital than all Canadian financial institutions put together. Can you imagine, before breakfast Nomura could buy all our investment dealers before breakfast without affecting its cash flow to the extent that a phone call to the president would be warranted. That is the kind of situation Bill C-56 will create in the investment brokerage business.

Our institutions have been built over the years by successive generations, and they have made a name for themselves in North America and throughout the world, but now they might be swallowed whole by the likes of Nomura, Solomon Brothers, Merrill Lynch, Shearson Lehman, and certain German firms. Not only are we going to relinquish the ownership of a financing tool of Canadian companies which could act independently with respect to borrowers and lenders, but we are now going to have a system where the major Canadian or foreign banks, which at the same time are bondholders or buyers of preferred or ordinary shares, will float their own issues through a brokerage firm they own.

We have been told that there is a kind of wall separating the various financial institutions. I do not want to question the good faith of the players in this field, but you would have to be very naive to think that such a condition will not create problems, especially in an economy as restricted as this country's.

I have mentioned large firms such as Japan's Nomura, but there are also many other corporations in that country which have a large capital and which can provide competition. Japan has a population of over 100 million inhabitants. It has a strong economy. The same is true for the United States. There can be large accumulations of capital in some financial institutions.

However, in Canada, with a population of 25 million people distributed from sea to sea, a financial concentration creates apparent or real monopolies, which means that there is no real competition in many regions of this country. If you go to small Quebec towns, you may find the Caisse Populaire and the National Bank, and even the National Bank may be closing down some of its branches to move to the larger regional cities. In towns with a population between 3,000 and 6,000, there is virtually no competition. Does anyone believe that the merger or addition of large institutions will bring more competition to these regions? This will certainly not happen under the provisions of Bill C-56, which allows financial institutions to acquire 100 per cent of ownership in securities brokerage firms.

Not only are the regulations not ready yet, and there has been a federal-provincial conference on the monitoring and control of financial institutions, especially as far as securities brokers are concerned, but we shall now have two types of regulations. When a Canadian bank decides to open a securities brokerage service as part of its operations, this will come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance.

If the same institution decides to own or purchase a subsidiary corporation, this will come under provincial jurisdiction. As though this was not sufficiently complicated, there will now be a conflict with Ontario and the other Canadian provinces about how these financial institutions will be regulated.

The provisions contained in Sections 2, 12 and so on, which allow insurance, loan and trust companies to the purchase securities brokerage firms, have been put together without any negotiation with other countries. No reciprocity agreement has been negotiated with the United States.

The Minister of International Trade (Miss Carney) and Ambassador Reisman are now negotiating with the United States. There has yet been no agreement in these free trade negotiations; nevertheless, the Minister of State for Finance has already introduced Bill C-56 which will allow any American firm to purchase such Canadian firms as Nesbitt Thomson, Burns Fry and Dominion Securities. As there is no reciprocity, if a Canadian bank purchases control of a firm such as Nesbitt Thomson or Wood Gundy with operations in the United States, the bank will have to cease its operations in the United States because the Steagall Act, which is still in force in the United States and not about to be amended, prohibits the banks from having investment operations in the United States at the same time as regular banking operations.

No reciprocity has been negotiated and the whole Canadian market is made wide open to the United States. Moreover, the market is open to non-banking financial institutions. Of course, if an insurance company buys the control of Wood Gundy, that has no impact on the activities in the United States. But if the Royal Bank buys it, the Royal Bank has to stop operating in the United States. There is no reciprocity between banks, and we will allow that two Canadian corporations, either a bank, an insurance corporation, a trust company, a loans company be treated differently if they bought the control of stock brokers.

That kind of policy makes no sense, Madam Speaker. I said so to the Minister in committee, and I will repeat it once more for conscience sake, and I wish all Conservative Members in this House could know the real impact of that legislation. The Minister is impatient because I am taking my few minutes. But it will not be said that as a Member in this House and as one who worked in financial institutions I will let Bill C-56 pass without at least calling the attention of Canadians and Hon. Members on a legislation that makes no sense. And if you could only see, Madam Speaker, the kind of powers this legislation is giving the Minister, or at least the kind of powers he sought to have! Financial institutions in Canada, and fortunately the work done by my colleague for Trinity and a few others convinced the Minister at least to withdraw Clauses 10, 41, 52 on business ownership.

Financial institutions in Canada, had the Minister of State for Finance have his way, would have been regulated from the office of the Minister of State for Finance. So much for a Conservative Government which supposedly supports private enterprise. He would have been bigger than a czar, because he wanted control over any transactions by firms in the United States or China involving shares of a company because more than 10 per cent of the shares of that company was owned by the Caisse de dépôts et placement or the Canadian National Pension Fund.

I don't know who in the Department of Finance does the planning or drafts legislation concerning financial institutions, but I never saw such irresponsibility both as to form and substance. And I tell the Minister of State for Finance that the impact of the Bill that will pass on division, in order to save time—we oppose the legislation because of the clauses I pointed to—will have significant impact on business concentration, business regulation and on Canada's political sovereignty and its ability to give a direction to its financial institutions, because in an area as important as stock brokerage, we are moving fast to 100 per cent foreign ownership, and I oppose that trend in the legislation. I would like to tell Members in this House that the impact of the Bill is far-reaching, it appears negative to me, it seems to be contrary to Canada's long term interests and the independence of our financial institutions. They suggest that kind of deregulation will allow our corporations to expand, but the expansion will not occur in our corporations, Madam Speaker, it will happen, in the foreign corporations that will be taking us over. When Nomura will buy a controlling interest in a major corporation, when Shearson Lehman or Merrill Lynch or somebody else will purchase our major firms, when the new owner of Wood Gundy or Nesbitt Thomson will be Nomura or Shearson Lehman or a top German firm, Madam Speaker, do you think that they are going to move their decision making centres from Germany, Japan, New York or London to Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver? We will become subsidiaries of these financial institutions, and instead of developing in the area of brokerage or financial mediation, Canada will become subservient to foreign countries. I just cannot accept that. I want to say so at least once before the Conservative majority seriously jeopardizes the independence and sovereignty of our country.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I have listened to the speech made by the financial critic of the Liberal Party. I think he raised a number of points which are certainly very interesting. The fact is, however, that although he says that this Bill has neither head nor tail, he will allow the House to adopt it, for it goes without saying that it will adopt it today. I have a question for him: If he objects so much to Canada being sold to the Japanese, the Americans or the Hong Kong people, how can he let the House adopt this Bill without discussing it further?

Mr. Garneau: Madam Speaker, you have here the example of an Hon. Member who is going to vote for the Bill without knowing what is in it. Because if we did not allow the House to adopt this Bill today, in view of the decisions which have already been made by this Government, the resulting chaos might be even worse, because there have already been commitments made by some corporations, and there has been all this publicity initiated by this Government that the Bang would start on June 30, and there would be no legislation. As there are now only 40 of us in the Opposition, even if we held a debate for three days or four nights, this Bill would be adopted just the same because the Conservatives are going to vote blindly for this Bill and the only thing we could do as the Opposition would be to add to the chaos that the Minister himself will be creating. It is therefore a matter of responsibility. If there had been only a couple of seats between us and the governing Party, I would certainly have started this debate and tried to convince two or three Conservative Members to vote against this Bill. But we have to accept the fact that although we may have all the right arguments, there are simply not enough of us. I do not want to create a greater chaos than the one which will exist beginning at midnight tonight.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AND DUTIES RELIEF ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties and I think you would find that on the next Bill to be dealt with, Bill C-69, there would be unanimous consent for the reference to be to Committee of the Whole House rather than to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there such unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-69, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, I have a few comments on the Bill and it should not take too long.

The Bill provides for four categories of tariff changes. The first involves those changes undertaken to reflect the changing needs of the private sector. An example is the duty-free entry being accorded mobile veterinarian clinics. These clinics are basically pick-up trucks with a box on the back outfitted for veterinary purposes. They are not made in Canada and the Government received representations in favour of duty-free entry from the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association and numerous individual veterinarians, including I might add the five Members of this House who are also veterinarians. Removing the duty on the clinics will enable veterinarians to better serve their clientele.

[Translation]

The second type of tariff amendments contained in this Bill, Madam Speaker, are those which implement the recommendations of the Tariff Board phase II report on tariff items concerning goods made and not made in Canada. These recommendations concerning the measures we are adopting in that respect result from a commitment made by Canada at the Tokyo Round of the series of multilateral trade negotiations.

[English]

For years one of the significant features of the customs tariff has been the determination of rate of duty based on whether or not the goods are made in Canada. Generally imported goods which are also made in Canada attract a higher rate of duty. However, our trading partners objected to this approach because of the uncertainty created for their exporters. Determination of whether goods were deemed to be made in Canada was an administrative decision made by Customs, and the status of goods can change with little notice. They argued for identifying the goods that were determined to be made and not made in Canada. Therefore, in return for freer access for some of our exports to major markets, Canada agreed to undertake a review of its "made-not made" tariff items. The matter was referred to the tariff board for study and public comment, and its reports and recommendations were issued in two phases. Most of the tariff board recommendations have been implemented by previous legislation. The tariff changes encompassed by this Bill complete the outstanding statutory changes required as a result of our Tokyo Round commitments.

The Bill also contains items related to certain aspects of the tariff component of the Government's response to the U.S. action on cedar shakes and shingles. I am certain Hon. Members will readily recall that in response to the U.S. imposition of a 35 per cent tariff on Canadian exports of cedar shakes and shingles we imposed higher rates of duty on a range of goods, originating principally in the U.S., through the introduction of a notice of a Ways and Means motion in the House last June. We also acted to tighten controls on the export of cedar logs and bolts, and these actions were not taken lightly. We needed to send a strong message to the U.S. about its protectionist acts and we had to guard against the loss of Canadian jobs, and this we accomplished.

The action taken by the Government totally achieved its purpose. The restrictions on the exports of cedar logs and bolts protected the competitiveness of the Canadian industry while the tariff measures demonstrated that protectionist action on the part of the U.S. cannot be undertaken without cost to it.

However, I am also certain that Hon. Members will recall that in his Budget Speech of February 18 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) announced that, having made the point to the U.S. about protectionist action, the tariff component of the Government's response was being withdrawn. He announced effective February 19 the previous rates of duty in effect immediately prior to June 6, 1986, would be restored.

Since the legislation to enact the motion of last June has not been considered by Parliament, this Bill amends the customs tariff to give effect to higher rates of duty on certain items commencing June 9, 1986. It also restores effective February 19 the rates of duty that were in place prior to June 6 of last year.

[Translation]

Finally, Madam Speaker, this Bill includes a number of major technical amendments to the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act. Among other things, it is aimed at achieving conformity between the French and English versions of these acts.

[English]

I might also add for the benefit of Hon. Members that two of the technical changes to the customs tariff are being made to reflect recommendations received by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

In conclusion, the amendments contained in this Bill to the "made-not made" tariff items, and to some of the items involved in Canada's response to the American action on cedar shakes and shingles, give effect to important trade policy decisions. The Bill also responds to the evolving needs of Canadian manufacturers in the business community, as well as to recommendations of the joint committee. As such the Bill deserves the support and timely consideration of all Hon. Members.

• (1210)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Madam Speaker, I want to follow the example set by the Hon. Minister in offering short and succinct comments on this legislation. If I was a member of the Conservative Government I would want to keep my comments as short as possible because this Bill is the end result of what can only be called the great shakes and shingles retreat. That is one of the more ignominious chapters for our Government which has set new standards of ignominy over the past two and a half years.

You will recall there was a time when this House was reverberating with the brave words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) as to how the Government was going to retaliate with force and effectiveness against the unconscionable actions of the U.S. in imposing a 35 per cent tariff on our shakes and shingles industry. He had Americans trembling in their shoes with expectation. Then came the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) with his bold announcement that the Government was going to impose new tariffs on tea-bags, Christmas trees and, of course, books.

That raised a question about what there is in the Conservative mind that does not want people to have fun. The Government now has a tax on watching television. It has put a new tax on talking to your grandmother by long-distance. Of course this all began with the tax on books. I could understand it if it was some insidious conspiracy designed to broaden illiteracy in Canada. I presume the Government feels that the less people know about what is going on, the less critical of the Government they will be.

However, if you can believe it, it was employed because the Minister of Finance's logic is that you can retaliate against a totally unfair, stupid and irrelevant action by the President of the U.S. by putting a tariff on books and thereby substantially increasing costs for Canadian book publishers. In fact it put that industry in jeopardy.

That was one of the more bizarre episodes of this blueprint we have watched unfolding. There is a kind of masochism in the mind of the Minister of Finance that if we only flagellate ourselves by putting tariffs on books or cable television or taco chips somehow Canadians will be cleansed. They will somehow feel better for having to pay more for some of life's small pleasures. It is a kind of puritan orgiastic cleansing.

We can only be thankful this morning that once again the Government has had to correct itself. Once again it is retreating, covering up, and overcoming what was a very clearly stupid mistake. Of course we will support it because we said right from the start that retaliation made no sense. We can only conclude that the Minister of Finance suffers from a certain time lag because it took him six or eight months to come to the same conclusion.

Before returning to my seat I want to say that there is a lesson to be learned here. It is one that is not often expressed in this House. Tariffs can be a good thing. Tariffs can be a very useful instrument of economic policy. They can be a very important part of industrial economic policy if used in an enlightened, imaginative and managed way. While constantly beating their breasts the Conservative Members say that they are trying to achieve a tariff-free zone between Canada and the United States.

• (1220)

We saw the deplorable performance of the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) last week as she tried to defend the indefensible, saying that the Government was somehow going to maintain the safeguards in the Auto Pact while eliminating the tariff, never drawing the logical conclusion that if there are no tariffs there are no safeguards. Somehow that small formula escaped the mind of our Minister for International Trade. I can understand why. As we know, she and the chief American negotiator are not on speaking terms. It may, therefore, be more difficult to communicate on these matters.

This is true as well in the field of agriculture, for example. One of the few areas of stability in the present agricultural crisis with regard to grain is the supply management or marketing boards. The Canadian Wheat Board has had a two-price wheat system. In the Okanagan in the interior of British Columbia there have been seasonal quotas on imported vegetables and fruit. Similarly, there have been certain tariff preferences on wine and other products. This is necessary because those are vital Canadian industries which must be protected against a flow of cheap commodities from other countries being dumped into Canada.

One of the great vacuums in the trade policy of the present, short-lived Government is its total misunderstanding of the use of the tariff system. That is why there is failure in our trade policy. There is no orchestration or integration of the various aspects of market and tariff development to give a sense of coherence to enhancement and stimulation of Canadian industries, the growth of which we want to encourage.

With particular reference to this Bill, with regard to computer parts we forget that in the Tokyo Round we paid for free access of our softwood lumber products to the United States by giving the Americans preferential tariffs, which amounted to virtually no tariff on computer parts. When we negotiated the Tokyo Round we put a price on the table which we thought was reasonable and we paid that price. Then the United States slapped a countervailing duty of 15 per cent on us.

Rather than standing up to the Americans and saying that we have paid the price by giving them free access to computer parts, which is a multibillion dollar industry, again in the perverse logic which only Tories understand, we put a tax on ourselves. Once again we forego the utility of using our tariff system as a clear part of our trade policy, as the previous Government did in negotiating the Tokyo Round by lowering tariffs on computers in order to get access for softwood lumber. That was forgotten.

The problem may be that for Conservative cabinet Ministers history began on September 4, 1984. They pay no attention to anything that happened before then.

I take this opportunity to serve notice that we decry the lack of a coherent trade policy and the fact that we have Bills such as this. One moment the Minister of Finance moves a Ways and Means motion to put tariffs on tea-bags, Christmas trees and books. The next minute he takes it off with no apparent trade-off in between. What did we get from the Americans as a result of this? What possible trade-off was there? What value was received? The only value received which we can see is that finally, after much pressure, Canadians were allowed to read books without an increased cost. However, we then conceded on softwood lumber as we conceded on patent Bills and are now conceding on investment.

I believe Canadians are concluding that the imbroglio between the Minister for International Trade and the chief U.S. negotiator is only symptomatic of a much broader confusion, lack of purpose, and lack of coherence in establishing an effective and proper trade policy. I do not know if the Minister of Finance is going to elope with the Minister for International Trade, but I wish they would get together and start working out something in common so that Canadians will know that a trade policy will have some meaning and purpose to it.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I, too, wish to say a few words on Bill C-69, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act. It is no wonder that in the dying hours of the last day before summer recess the Government brings in something which it does not want to have fully debated or fully exposed in this House. The Government is in retreat with its tail between its legs, and the less said about this Bill the better it will be for the Government.

As the Minister pointed out, one of the measures in this Bill is to rescind the steps the Government took in response to the American step of slapping a 35 per cent tariff on Canadian cedar shakes and shingles. We remember when that major unilateral action was taken by the United States. It shocked and outraged Canadians and the Government had to do something. At that time the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) stood up in this House and with great gusto announced that Canada was not going to take it, that we were going to do something in return, that we were going to teach the Americans that they just cannot treat us this way.

Then the Government acted. It slapped a tariff on books, it slapped a tariff on tea-bags, and it slapped a tariff on Christmas trees. In fact, the Government hit itself and then hit itself and then hit itself again. As the spokesperson for the Liberal Party pointed out, there was a masochistic tendency in what the Government did. The tariff on books hurt Canadians more than it hurt the Americans. The tariff on Christmas trees had the potential of hurting Canadians more than it hurt Americans because we ship a lot more trees south than are shipped north and if we slap a tariff on American Christmas trees the Americans will slap one on Canadian Christmas trees. The products of hundreds of small operators close to the border would have been at a disadvantage on the American market.

Through Bill C-69 the Government is lamely admitting that the actions it took back then were counter-productive and were hurting Canadians and Canadian industry. Today the Government has its tail between its legs and is introducing this legislation which quietly withdraws the measures it took earlier.

• (1230)

Of course, the situation has not changed with respect to the American tariff on cedar shakes and shingles. If the story were not so sad, it would be amusing. The Government is like the mouse that came out and did not even roar.

This situation is also frightening because it is an indication of the Government's attitude when dealing with trade issues and disputes. It is obvious that the Government did not have a coherent strategy to effectively deal with these unilateral actions originating in the United States. It is obvious that the Government was scrambling to find some way to counteract the American imposition of a tariff on cedar shakes and shingles. The fact that it imposed a tariff on Christmas trees, books and tea-bags is an indication that it chose anything in a desperate act to show that it was taking action. The Government's measures were not a result of a coherent policy that had been thought through, or the result of a plan that was meant to maximize the effect on the United States and minimize the adverse effects on Canadians.

Mr. Hockin: It worked.

Mr. de Jong: The Hon. Minister says that it worked. It frightens me when a Minister of the Crown states that it worked because the Americans have not withdrawn their tariff while we are withdrawing our counter measures. How can the Government claim that it worked?

If those in charge of negotiating a free trade agreement with the United States believe that this measure has worked, I am frightened for the future well being of this country. If the best they can do to counter the American action on cedar shakes and shingles is to slap a tariff on books, Christmas trees and teabags, which later had to be withdrawn, then heaven help us when they draw up a free trade agreement.

All Parties have agreed to have one Member speak to Bill C-69 and not roast the Government too thoroughly over this legislation. We have agreed to allow the Government to proceed with this Bill, with its tail between its leg, in order to retract the most inappropriate action it took earlier. Hopefully the Government will have learned a lesson.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (For the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion) moved that Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a Legislative Committee.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe you will find that there is unanimous consent to have the Bill proceed to the Committee of the Whole rather than a Legislative Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Indeed, Madam Speaker, there has been consultation and we agree.

Mr. Manly: Agreed.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the House today on Bill C-63.

The purpose of this important Bill is to amend and improve the Small Businesses Loans Act, which has already produced good results, by expanding its scope to make fishermen eligible for the loans guaranteed under the Act.

If we look at the number of loans granted so far, we find that this Act has been extremely useful. Since the program was introduced in 1961 and until March 31, 1986, 210,533 small business loans were approved for a total value of $5.1 billion.

During the 1985-86 financial year, 23,593 loans totalling a little under $738 million were approved, while the average loan was worth $31,273.

The loans may have various configurations, depending on the recipients, who may be manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, service companies, building contractors, transit companies or telecommunications firms.

• (1240)

[English]

Companies and individuals are eligible to borrow for purchase of land, renovation of their premises or construction of new facilities, or for the purchase, installation or modernization of equipment. In many cases, these have been new entrepreneurs, just starting out.

Guaranteed loans under this legislation also help existing businesses to modernize, to expand and mature into larger and more profitable operations. This means more jobs for Canadian workers and growth for our economy. We in this Government see the private sector as the engine of economic growth. At the same time, we have an important role to play. It us up to us to provide the necessary start-up incentives and appropriate support for the development of business.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the small business sector is essential to the Canadian economy. It is a fact that small businesses create 70 per cent of the new jobs in this country, and in certain regions even 100 per cent, while according to the latest estimates, small businesses employ more than three million Canadian workers.

Canada has over 760,000 small businesses, which are responsible for most of the creativity, innovation and entrepreneurship that exist in this country. Much of our advanced technology is developed by these same small businesses.

The Government wants to promote this spirit of entrepreneurship and innovation and help new or existing small businesses to prosper. The Government has made a commitment to Canadian entrepreneurs and it intends to keep it.

[English]

The promotion of entrepreneurship requires first and foremost a favourable economic climate. We have delivered on that with lower interest rates, greater employment and a continuing low rate of inflation. In addition, the two budgets presented by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), contain many incentives for the small business sector and created a better environment for business. Increased investment in small and medium-sized businesses has been encouraged through specific initiatives.

[Translation]

Last month, we implemented an action plan to reduce the red tape burden imposed by the federal Government on small businesses. In addition, the Minister of Finance tabled a White Paper on Tax Reform on June 18 which will be of great benefit to Canadian small businesses.

The new taxation system provides incentives for all Canadians since it will be fairer and will include lower rates, but the rate for small businesses on the first $200,000 of income has been lowered to 12 per cent and is 16 points lower than the rate for general corporations, which has been brought down to 28 per cent. The tax reform proposals provide even greater incentives for small businesses, whose contribution is essential for job creation and economic growth.

[English]

The amendments proposed in this Bill are changes designed to streamline the regulations, make the Act more flexible for entrepreneurs and, in the long run, encourage banks and other lending institutions to make wider use of the program in order to help more small businesses grow.

[Translation]

The other major change will extend to fishermen the benefits of the Small Businesses Loans Act. From now on, Madam Speaker, Canadian fishermen will have access to a sounder program of guaranteed loans which will establish a better balance between their credit needs and the requirements of commercial loan institutions.

Thanks to the Small Businesses Loans Act, our fishermen will be able to obtain loans at the same low interest rates which were available to them under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, that is to say, the prime rate plus 1 per cent. They will be able to use them not only to purchase boats and equipment, but also to purchase pieces of land, something they were not authorized to do under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

This Bill recognizes the important role fishermen play as an integral part of the small business industry in Canada:

Clearly the Federal Government did not make this decision without previously seeking the advice of the provinces it is likely to affect most, namely the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and British Columbia. Of course, it has also held consultations with commercial credit loan establishments.

The various parties have welcomed this Bill. At its meeting held in St. John's on April the 12th, the Atlantic Regional Council raised no objection to the option it had been presented with, nor did the Pacific Advisory Regional Council, at its meeting of June 15, 1987.

Madam Speaker, the purpose of these amendments is to increase the amounts made available to fishermen. Under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, the Loan Guarantee Program had a budget of some $30 million, while the relevant program under the Small Businesses Loans Act has a budget of $2.5 billion. This amount will be shared among a larger number of potential borrowers, but it is nevertheless much greater than the one made available to fishermen before.

[English]

The amendments contained in Bill C-63 will benefit all small businesses when it comes time for them to borrow money. They will be helpful to fishermen just as they will be beneficial to the store-owner, the fabric maker or someone involved in a service business. For all these people, the program will continue to provide a dependable and stable source of guaranteed credit. It will give them the financing they need to make the most of their opportunities.

[Translation]

That is, therefore, the reason why I recommend this Bill to all my hon. colleagues in the House.

[English]

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Madam Speaker, I want to make some comments on Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, at second reading.

Of course, this Bill weighs very heavily on what happens to fishermen. Most of the Bill pertains to removing fishermen from the Fishermen's Loans Improvement Act and putting them under small business. I believe it is another installment of the Government's strategy to squeeze every last dollar out of the fishermen of this country.

We have seen a progression of these things since September, 1984. In my opinion, and in the opinion of the Official Opposition, the Government has gone out of its way to penalize our fishermen, especially those who are most vulnerable, and I speak here of the inshore fishermen.

I want to briefly review part of the record of the Government since 1984. Right off the bat, in November, 1984, the Government wanted to eliminate or, in the Government's jargon, "privatize" the Vessel Insurance Program. This is a program which has been in effect and has helped fishermen for many years. Those of us in the Opposition, especially my colleague, the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), fought that move very hard. It was because of the efforts of Members of the Opposition and Members who support and represent fishermen, the Maritime Fishermen's Union, the Eastern Fishermen's Federation and the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association, who all expressed dissatisfaction with the Government's intention to cancel the Fishing Vessel Insurance Program, that the Government has stalled that intent, and in the last few months we have not heard too much about the insurance program. However, one thing the fishermen have noticed, and have brought to my attention and I am sure to the attention of my colleagues who represent the fishing ridings, is that the premiums under the Fishermen's Insurance Program has gone up to the point where it is almost as cheap to go to a private insurance company and get insurance there.

Once again, while the Government, at least to this point in time, has not eliminated the program, it is allowing the premiums to rise to a point where it is very doubtful that fishermen will be able to afford these premiums. They are getting very expensive.

• (1250)

In February, 1986, the Government and the current Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) slashed the Fishing Vessel Assistance Program, better known as the vessel subsidy program. This is a program which was in place to help fishermen either purchase new vessels or upgrade the quality of their existing ones. It is a program that recognizes that fishermen sometimes have a lot of problems setting aside enough savings for a large investment. Some Conservative Members may argue that provincial loan boards already provide enough assistance to fishermen. However, it should be noted that not all provinces have such loan boards. For instance, B.C. is a province that relies totally on federal initiatives in this respect.

I would now like to turn to some of the actions of the Minister of Fisheries and the Government, actions which they have taken over the last year and one-half to two years. For instance, the former Deputy Minister of Fisheries, Dr. Art May, was relieved of his duties. He was a Deputy Minister who knew the fishing industry. He knew the science of the fisheries and good fisheries management principles. Obviously, that was not in the Government's interests so it changed the Deputy, moving him to one side. It appointed someone who looked at the fishery with a view to cost benefit analysis, someone who, in my opinion, has no understanding whatsoever about what small fishing communities have to go through and how they are so reliant upon the fishery and the fact that sometimes the fishery has to be helped out by Government in order just to keep those communities alive.

The Minister then took steps to help large companies. I refer specifically to the Bayshore tuna deal that had been rejected by the Minister's own Atlantic Bluefin Tuna Advisory Committee. However, the Minister gave a quota of 401 to Bayshore Limited which it then sold to Japanese vessels. My understanding is that the Minister has asked for proposals for more such ventures.

To make matters even worse, there was the Canada-France agreement on quotas and boundaries. I am sure that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate, will have a great deal to say on this issue since it affects him so greatly. Of course, it affects all Atlantic Members of Parliament, not to mention the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. However, my colleague from Gander—Twillingate certainly dug into this issue and kept it to the forefront over the last three or four months.

In order to get France to sit down to discuss the possibility of sending the St. Pierre and Miquelon boundary dispute to international arbitration, Canada agreed to give France certain quotas, including future quotas of northern cod. Of course, the deal was hatched in the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). The Minister of Fisheries was not even consulted before the deal was signed. The Province of Newfoundland and Premier Peckford were completely ignored in the final negotiation.

As an afterthought the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), the regional Minister for Newfoundland, who was originally ignored but who was able to kick up a fuss, based on the prodding of other Members of Parliament from Newfoundland who shamed him into acting, went to the Prime Minister to say that we have to show at least some presence in terms of dealing with the fishery in Atlantic Canada. The Minister, of course, forced the Prime Minister to sign a letter which would make him the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

That was not good enough. The Minister of Transport decided that we were into a heck of a mess here and something had to be done about it. So he made a video featuring himself, including a great cameo appearance by the other Minister of Fisheries. Afterwards, the Province of Newfoundland was covered with pamphlets which went into every home. On March 5 the Minister of Transport told CBC radio that his propaganda project would cost only $40,000. However, newspaper reports indicate that the video and pamphlet cost Canadian taxpayers about $200,000. We now know that the Minister of Transport does not like his job very much. We also know he would rather be the Minister of Finance, but I am afraid he has ruined his chances with the splurge on these videos. Of course, he came in five times over the expected budget.

This is typical of the Government's hypocrisy. While cutting back on fishermen, the Government and its Ministers spend freely on their self-promotion. To add insult to injury, the other Minister of Fisheries had to pick up half the cost of the public campaign of the Minister of Transport. We seem to have many ministers of fisheries in this House. We often think, will the real Minister of Fisheries and Oceans please stand up?

Under this Bill the Fishermen's Insurance Loan Program is being taken out of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and given over to small business under the auspices of a new Minister who has no control whatsoever over management of the fishery. A fisherman who now gets into trouble because of climatic conditions, or poor fishing seasons, or whatever, will not be able to go to his own Minister, the Minister who should be responsible for him. This Bill is the final nail in the coffin for fishermen as it relates to their Department of Fisheries and their Minister.

In looking at some research I did with respect to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, in 1980, I found out what the present Minister of Fisheries, who was then a critic of fisheries, said at that time. He said that he would like to offer some observations on Bill C-28, which was the Bill to extend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. He then said:

> Of course my criticism is always positive. We think that the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has been a relatively successful program. It is the kind of program that puts the burden of initiative upon the fishermen themselves. We commend the proposal in this legislation which will increase the ceiling in terms of individual loans. It will extend the repayment period from 10 to 15 years, and it will create a ceiling on loans over the next three-year period of $250 million.

The Bill which is before us does the opposite. This Bill ignores the ceiling for individual fishermen. It reduces the ceiling from $150,000 to $100,000. Something less than 10 per cent of fishermen have loans over $100,000. However, I must point out to the Government and to the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Valcourt) that with the growing costs of fishing enterprises, boats, gear, and so on, these costs are increasing annually. One cannot set up much of a fishing enterprise even as an inshore fisherman for under $150,000. Of course, the term of repayment has been brought down from 15 years, which was the case under FILA, to 10 years.

• (1300)

Once we go into Committee of the Whole on this Bill, it is my intention to ask the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Valcourt) to accept an amendment that will reinstate the ceiling of $150,000 for loans. Given that there is a cap of $2.5 billion for small businesses, I am sure that this amendment would not cause any problems. I feel confident that the Minister could accept that amendment. It would in fact be an improvement to the Bill. Also, I would ask that he accept an amendment extending the term from 10 years, as it is under the Small Businesses Loans Act, to the 15 years that was available under FILA.

Those two amendments would go a long way toward making this Bill more acceptable to those of us in the Opposition, particularly those of us who represent fishing communities.

My criticism of the way in which the Government is treating fishermen goes further. I have already mentioned some of the programs that have been cut, slashed. One of the main programs on which this Government has backed off in terms of financing is the Small Craft Harbours Program.

I know the Hon. Minister had occasion recently to visit Val Comeau and during that visit the fishermen gave him a very hard time—and rightfully so. There is not nearly enough money in the Small Craft Harbours Program. This year, the funding amounts to $47 million.

The Fisheries and Oceans Committee, for the last three years, has been asking this Government to put much more funding into small craft harbours. My colleague from the New Democratic Party who sits on that committee will know exactly what I am talking about. There was unanimous agreement on the part of the Fisheries and Oceans Committee that much more money is required for small craft harbours.

The Deputy Minister of Fisheries told the committee that if there was no more funding that there would be 150 wharfs and harbours closed in this country, 13 of which would be in my own Province of Prince Edward Island.

That is a sad commentary on this Government and how it is behaving toward the fishermen of this country.

I go back again to the Canada-France agreement, in which we have almost every Department of Government involved but for the Department of Fisheries. It is the Department of Fisheries that should be representing the views of the fishermen of this country in respect of that agreement. In External Affairs, the left hand never knows what the right hand is doing. The Minister, who should be responsible for dealing with fishermen and the concerns of fishermen, the one who should be standing up for the fishermen of this country, has let that slip out of his hands.

An article in one of today's newspapers makes the point that we are witnessing the disintegration of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion.

Since the coming into power of this Government, the Department of Fisheries has been downgraded to the point of being almost a branch Department.

Yes, the Minister does have a car, and he does have a driver; but very little else. This Minister of Fisheries is not standing up in Cabinet for the rights of the fishermen of this country.

On the West Coast, we have the issue of Kemano, where they are talking once again about lowering water levels. Once again, the Minister is not standing up for the fishermen on the West Coast.

We are left with a lot of frustration, not only with the Minister and with Bill C-63, but with the way in which the Department is falling behind. It is one Department that should be front and centre. With a little bit of support from this Government, the fisheries industry could generate thousands of new jobs.

Every time the Americans threaten us with another tariff, this Government, being as weak-kneed as it is, simply removes another program—and in this case, it is a program that has been beneficial to fishermen.

To repeat, the two main issues in respect of this Bill are, first of all, that it reduces the ceiling for loans to fishermen from $150,000 to $100,000, and second, that the term of the loan is reduced from 15 years to 10 years.

It is our hope that the Minister will be able to accept the two amendments proposed, thus taking us back to the situation under FILA.

The proposed legislation carries with it yet another burden for fisheries, that being a new registration fee, a fee that is set at 1 per cent of the fishermen's guaranteed loan. Fishermen will have to pay this fee up front. For a fisherman facing emergency repairs, the fee would take scarce money out of his pocket.

Apparently, the revenues derived from this fee will go toward administrative costs. That is what the Government tells us. But fishermen, like other citizens, already pay taxes to the Government.

There is an interesting wrinkle to this. With the 1 per cent fee, the $18.8 million in loans under FILA in 1985-86 would have resulted in revenues of $188,000. The Nielsen task force found that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans spent only $97,000 on administering the FILA program. Therefore, the new user fee will pay for the old program, twice over.

Once again, we have a situation that is blatantly unfair to our taxpaying fishermen.

This Government, with its sweeping majority, is going in the direction of user fees. It wants cost recovery on everything.

It is not right that this type of fee should be charged to our fishermen.

The Minister, in his remarks, said he was pleased to bring fishermen into the Small Businesses Loans Act, and he went on to praise the Act on the basis that it does have a larger cap over-all. But it is a step backwards for fishermen. I want that to be clear on the record.

It is my hope that the Minister will be able to accept the amendments, which I shall have delivered to him. I told his Parliamentary Secretary last evening that I would have these amendments here this morning. Once the Bill is referred to Committee of the Whole, it is my hope that those amendments can be dealt with, and adopted.

The other problem I have with this Bill is the timing, with the Bill having been brought in on the last sitting day before we break for the summer. This Bill should have gone to the appropriate legislative committee for detailed study. But we in the Opposition are caught. We know that there are people out there who are depending upon loans. We know that. We know that they need this legislation before the summer.

• (1310)

I guess half a loaf of bread is better than no bread. The Government knew that FILA was to terminate on June 30, and it brought in Bill C-63 for second and third reading at this late hour. We hope the amendments will be accepted and that we can go along with part of it. However, I give the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, wherever he is, fair warning not to try to do it again on the last day before a summer recess.

We have no alternative today. If it is not approved, Canadian fishermen will have to wait until the House reconvened in the fall to obtain loans.

It is not a good piece of legislation and we oppose it. However, we know that time is of the essence. The Government is not playing a fair game with our fishermen by bringing legislation, which requires improvement, into the House on the day before we recess. Certainly fishermen will remember and understand the dilemma faced by all of us on the opposition benches.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few remarks on Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

I am sure Canadian fishermen are already very aware of where they stand with the Government. They are aware that it pays very little attention to their needs, cuts back on their programs, and squeezes them for every possible nickel.

They have seen the underfunding of different fisheries programs. Small craft harbours had to beg for funds. They finally received a $100 million allocation, which I am sure the Minister will use where it will do the most good for the Conservative Party but perhaps not the most good for fishermen and their communities. They have seen increases in licence fees and in wharfage fees. They have also seen an underfunded Salmonid Enhancement Program.

Now, on the final day of June when the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act expires, the Government brings in a piece of legislation which it wants passed immediately, otherwise the entire loans program for fishermen disappears.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was first brought in in 1955. Over the last 32 years, some 18,198 loans have been made under the program, to a total of over $246 million. There has been a number of claims where fishermen have been unable to make their payments, some 611 claims totalling $13 million. Also there has been a number of extensions of the program over that period of time. The last one took place in December, 1986, and the Conservative Government is allowing to lapse a program which was designed specifically to provide funding for fisheries improvements, a program which was specifically for fishermen and their communities.

Often the program was improperly or inadequately funded, but at least it was their program. They knew the amount of funding available to them and how to obtain it. Now it is being assumed under a much larger program and there is no certainty in terms of how much of the funding will go to fisheries improvements.

Some fishermen have expressed a concern that under the Act they will be designated as small businessmen. Some of them question the implications in terms of unemployment insurance if the Government once again decided that it wanted to change the system. We know that Canadian fishermen waged a fight to keep the Government from cutting back their unemployment insurance. Some of them are now concerned about being designated as small businessmen for the purpose of obtaining loans and whether it will mean that they will also be designated as small businesses in terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

There is much concern that the new program will not meet the needs of fishermen, and we will not have the time to examine it at any length in committee. It is being pushed through at the last minute.

The Minister has known for over a year that the program would lapse and that a new one was needed. The Bill was only tabled on June 8. There is no time for changes, which reflects the very low priority which the Government gives to fisheries. We are expected to push it through all stages on the very last day before the summer recess. As the previous speaker mentioned, we have very little choice but to agree, because some kind of loan program is necessary even though the program provided in Bill C-63 is inadequate and inferior to the previous one.

As I said, the previous program was not properly funded. On December 15, 1986 the House, in a method similar to the one being used today, passed a six-month extension to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, and by January 15 the $30 million which had been provided was gone; all the money was gone in a month. This is a clear indication of inadequate funding. No money is available for fishermen who want to plan for improvements in their operations. They were told to be patient. They were told to wait. They were told to go to the end of the line. They were told that the Government would get around to them eventually. Now, on the last day of June, the Government is finally getting around to the fishermen. We are spending just a few minutes to rush through this piece of legislation, because if we do not do so there will be no program in place for them.

We see very clearly in the Nielsen task force the direction in which the Government wanted to go in terms of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. It wanted to get rid of it. In part the task force indicated:

> —the Government should consider termination. The major thrust of the study team's recommendations is for less federal government intervention in response to true market forces. To the extent that financial assistance is required by fishermen, this can be obtained from provincial loans boards or financial institutions. The determination of whether assistance should be based on sound economic business considerations.

The Government felt that the process could be taken care of by what it calls true market forces. I am not exactly sure what it means by that. However, if we leave our basic industries to what the Government considers to be true market forces, there will be no basic industries left and unemployment rates will be even more unacceptable than they are now.

The task force suggested that the Government should look at provincial loans boards or at financial institutions. The difficulty in obtaining loans was the reason the program was created in the first place. To suggest that it was not needed is completely wide off the mark.

I should like to sketch briefly the differences between the two programs—the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act which expires today, and the amendments which will cover fisheries improvements under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Admittedly there is a great increase in the total amount of money available under the program. However, how much of it will be directly available to fishermen? There is absolutely no guarantee. There is no statement in that regard. There is no mechanism of which I am aware that will monitor how much of the money goes to fishermen. We would like to see some guarantee of at least the amount of money that was available to fishermen under the old program. Again we note that while the fishermen's program has been rolled into the larger program, there has been no increase in funding for the new program. We wonder how more people are supposed to share the same amount of money from the same old pot.

• (1320)

The maximum amount of money that was available to fishermen for borrowing under the old program was $150,000. Under the new program, that amount has been reduced to $100,000. This is a decrease at a time when we all know the cost of everything is going up. Why the decrease, Mr. Speaker? Why is the Government saying to fishermen that there is only two-thirds as much money available to borrow as under the old program? At least 3 per cent of the loans under the old Fisheries Improvement Loans Act were over $100,000. Nothing above $100,000 will be available now. Why is the Government producing a program that is less satisfactory at a time of rising costs? Perhaps the Minister can answer that question.

Again, the maximum loan under the old program would cover 100 per cent of the proposed investment. Today it covers only 80 per cent of the proposed investment. Again we have a poorer program.

Fishermen faced with costs for getting their equipment ready for a season or for repairs often have difficulty coming up with the 20 per cent that has to be put up front before they can get a loan under the new program. Why is the Government bringing in a program that is less satisfactory for the needs of the fishermen than the old program?

The repayment period under the old program was 15 years. Under the new program it has been cut to 10 years. We all know that fishermen often have to deal with cycles that sometimes last more than one or two years. Often there are several bad years and if the fishermen have to have all their payments squeezed into a 10 year period it can be very difficult. Why was the maximum payment cut from 15 years to 10 years? The Government is not primarily concerned with the needs of the fishermen, but it must have some other agenda with which it is dealing.

The government guarantee of this loan program drops from 100 per cent to 85 per cent. On top of all of that, there is now a registration fee, a fancy term for a user fee, of 1 per cent. This money has to be up-front, so that the cost of the program is an additional 1 per cent. There is less money available to individual fishermen for loans. There is a shorter repayment period. The Government guarantee has dropped from 100 per cent to 85 per cent. Loans can only cover 80 per cent of the proposed investment.

In every single way, Mr. Speaker, this is a poorer program than the old one. Why is the Government changing it? Why was the Government not prepared to bring in a properly funded program for fisheries improvements? Why is the Government trying to suggest to Canadians that somehow it is dealing with the needs of fishermen by incorporating them under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

This program does not meet their needs anywhere near in the same manner as the old one. The Government is cutting back and is indicating the very low status it gives to fishermen. It is very obvious that the program is not an improvement. We will let the Bill go through because today is the last day. Unless this program goes through there will be nothing available, and it is better than nothing.

We are not happy with the low priority which the Government gives to fisheries. We are not happy with the way in which the Government has abused the rights of fishermen by taking away a decent program and giving them one that does not meet their needs.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Government has decided to close down completely the federal Department of Fisheries and to get out of the area of matters that deal with fishermen in other areas. I do not know why, and I am sure no Member of this House can tell me why we have had since 1945 a guaranteed loan program for farmers, and since 1955 a guaranteed loan program for fishermen. All of a sudden in 1987, the Government of Canada decides to discontinue completely the guaranteed loans program for fishermen but is keeping the guaranteed loans programs for farmers. We have yet to see the Bill. I understand the farmers' Bill will be presented some time today. I imagine we will see a fee built into it whereby the farmers will have to pay something back to the Government of Canada for the privilege of getting a guarantee at the banks, but it still does not answer the question: Why pull out of the program designed for fishermen?

It is an interesting question. The budget for the Department of Fisheries, as our fisheries critic from Prince Edward Island has pointed out, has deteriorated substantially. It is reduced more than any other budget of the Government of Canada.

You have, Madam Speaker, a Bill before this Chamber today that is a real slap in the face to the fishermen of Canada. You have a Bill here that says that no longer will there be a guaranteed loans program specifically aimed at fishermen. The Government of Canada found itself in quite a spot in that all of the guarantees for loans out across Canada had been used up, that is, the quotas to the banks. The fishermen were left with phone calls from the banks saying, "Look, your loan is no longer guaranteed because the Government of Canada—this Tory Government of Canada—says that we have gone over our limits and now we must demand payment in full tomorrow, says the letter from the law firms in British Columbia, from the law firms in Nova Scotia, from the law firms in Prince Edward Island, from the law firms in Quebec, from the law firms in Newfoundland and Labrador to the fishermen". It is, "payment in full immediately or we will seize your property, your house, your car and everything else".

The Government of Canada decided not to extend the guarantee on the loans. That was a conscious decision made by the new Tory Government elected in 1984 because it was going to leave fishermen out in the cold and not provide them with that extra bit of guarantee because times were bad. This Bill says the word "fisheries" will be excluded under the definition of business enterprise under the Small Businesses Loans Act. The only reason fishermen could not get loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act before was that the word "fisheries" was covered under the Fisheries Improvement Loans program.

A person can go to Avco or Household Finance or anywhere like that and he does not have to put down a fee to get a loan, although he does have to pay an incredible interest rate. However, no one is telling that person that he will only be loaned 85 per cent of the money and he will have to pay 1 per cent of the loan up front to the Government of Canada for the privilege of walking over the doorstep to get a loan.

This piece of paper before us today is not worth anything to the fishermen of Canada. It is a reflection of the attitude of the Government of Canada toward fishermen. The Government tells fishermen that it is moving away from all responsibility for fishermen. This has been displayed in every single action the Government has taken.

Today on the East Coast of Canada, the French fishing fleet is overfishing as much as it wants and the Canadian Government is scared to death to even board those boats. It is afraid, it is shaking in its shoes. The Government will board a Canadian boat if a fisherman is overfishing, but it will not board a French boat. If the French flag is up, beware, do not go close to that boat. If the American flag is up, beware, do not go close to that boat. Perhaps the Government might board a Spanish boat because Spanish boats proceed only at about eight or 10 knots, but it will certainly board Canadian boats.

For example, on Friday night the Government closed the quota on capelin, the small fish that are primarily sold to the Japanese market. Fishermen throughout eastern Canada are outraged today because there is capelin, in the water, there are buyers who want to buy the capelin but the fishermen are not allowed to catch it. Why? Because the Government says that fishermen are only allowed to catch 15,000 metric tonnes of capelin this year because it thinks that this is all the market can bear.

It is funny, but the Government forgot one thing. It forgot that it gave the Russians 17,000 metric tonnes of capelin and the Russian boats off the East Coast of Canada are able to catch as much capelin as they want right up to December 31.

Mr. Henderson: We're saving it for them.

Mr. Baker: We are saving it for the poor Russians. There are even Russian boats that are willing to come into Canadian harbours on the East Coast to buy capelin from the fishermen, but the Russians can catch the capelin because they have a quota of 17,000 metric tonnes. The Canadian fishermen are not allowed to catch capelin to sell to the Russians because their quota of 15,000 metric tonnes is all caught.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) was in eastern Canada for the last three days. I think he showed up in Ottawa last evening. I understand that he is trying to address the problem. Certainly, though, there appears to be a total lack of communication. If there is any reason for what the federal Government did about capelin, then that has not been communicated properly to the fishermen of eastern Canada. I do not know how that action can be explained, but there must be some reasoning behind it somewhere. Capelin is considered to be an under-utilized species. If it is under-utilized, the Government will give some to the Russians, some to the EEC and some to this nation and that nation. But here are the Canadians with their quota cut off.

That is the attitude of the Government of Canada toward fishermen. It took the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program that gave loans to fishermen who were trying to make a living, trying to get by day to day, trying to feed their families, and cut it off, the only loan program for fishermen. The Government will not even allow government guarantees on loans but if the fisherman pays a fee, the Government will give a guarantee on 80 per cent to 85 per cent of the loan at the big bank. That is incredible. It is an absolute joke.

An Hon. Member has just handed me a note saying that the farm Bill which will be introduced has a user fee attached to it. That Bill will be introduced in the Chamber very shortly. Under that Bill, $5.5 billion is in circulation. There are only a couple of farmers in my riding, but there is $5.5 billion in circulation and the Government is now saying that it will make farmers pay a fee in order to get guarantees. The Small Businesses Loans Act collected in this past financial year $7.5 million from that fee in order to pay some of its expenses. Imagine the fees the Government will now collect from the farmers of Canada under a Bill that will be introduced in this Chamber in a few moments.

What is the default rate on farm loans? Of the $5.5 billion that is in circulation, the Government has had to pay less than $15 million on defaults. If what the hon. gentleman just passed to me is right, the Government will make a windfall profit on every loan it guarantees to the farmers of Canada after the Bill is introduced this afternoon. I would advise Hon. Members who are interested in loans to farmers—and I know, Madam Speaker, that we are dealing with loans to fishermen—that I doubt I would let that go through without a lot of debate.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader has worked this out right to the second. He brings in the Bill on the last day of sitting, a Tuesday after everyone sat in this Chamber practically all night and everyone is tired and sleepy. He brings in the Bill at the last minute and says: "Well, this happens to be the last day of the month and if you don't pass the Bill, there ain't going to be no more loans for fishermen or farmers or anybody else".

One could ask why he did not bring this Bill before the House sooner. He brought a lot of nonsense into the Chamber before. Farmers and fishermen will now ask their Members of Parliament how they allowed the Government to make them pay money out of their own pockets for loans.

Imagine going into the bank and saying: "I would like to get a loan," and the bank manager saying: "Well, in order for me to lend you some money, you have to give me some money". That is the law passed by the Parliament of Canada on the last day of June, 1987. The farmer will look at the bank manager and say: "You're crazy. If I had money to give you, I wouldn't be coming in here to get a loan". The bank manager will say: "Well, you had better write to your Member of Parliament because he passed the Bill".

I do not know what is going on here. I imagine it is an extension of the user-pay policies of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), but there is something radically wrong with the Government of Canada. There is something radically wrong with us. I do not know, maybe you could make a ruling. We cannot sit tomorrow. We have to conclude our proceedings today. Perhaps the Chair can figure out some way to communicate to all our farmers and fishermen the fact that the House did not appreciate what the Government and its House Leader have done with these two Bills.

I leave Hon. Members with this suggestion. I would certainly not pass either one of these Bills with just a flick of the wrist. I would consider an extended debate on each one of these clauses.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to comment on Bill C-63. I share some of the concerns expressed by my friends and colleagues today. It is unfortunate that we have only a few minutes on the last sitting day to discuss an issue as important as small business in Canada.

The purpose of the Bill is to cover the fishing industry under the Small Businesses Loans Act and replace the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program. As has been expressed by previous speakers, this is a wrong-headed approach to the problem fishermen face in raising capital for vessel and other equipment acquisition and improvement. The improvement loan program has been quite suitable over the years. I suppose these changes reflect government philosophy, which is to make it more difficult for people to acquire capital. The philosophy is that if you have the money, you can participate in resource extraction. If you do not, even though you may have years of experience in the industry, you cannot participate. It is interesting that at the same time the Government is providing this borrowing mechanism for the fishing industry, it is creating a situation which is leading to chaos. Fishermen will have great difficulty in making an adequate living, much less repaying existing loans. Some of those difficulties were mentioned by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly), as well as other members in the Official Opposition.

Some years ago we had a royal commission studying the West Coast fishery headed by Peter Pearse. That commission developed a plan which would have removed most fishermen from the industry. It would have given the fishery to a limited number of wealthy individuals. The plan put forward by the commission indicated that the fishing industry was chaotic. Too many boats were chasing too few fish. Limited access was the idea. Of course that makes it hard to make a living. I think that over the years the people involved hoped the Conservative Government would make a commitment that the Liberals never would make, that the Pearse plan would be stopped. That has not happened. Instead we see an acceleration, which is driving small fishermen out of the business and weakening the coastal communities concerned because they are being cut off from the industry.

It is interesting to note where the Government has taken this industry. First we have the development of plans which work against fishermen. On the West Coast the Minister instituted a new consultative body called the Pacific Region Advisory Committee. That replaced the previous ministerial advisory committee. It has now become a political mechanism. If you support the right political Party, you can give advice to the Minister. Instead of representing the people who fish off the West Coast of Canada on a proportionate basis, you have a committee composed of a few wise persons. I use the term "wise" advisedly. In some quarters a wise Conservative might be viewed as a contradiction in terms. Nevertheless, this committee is highly politicized and does not represent those who fish off the West Coast. It certainly does not represent them with any weight.

The unfortunate part of all this is that there will be little if any consistency in the advice the committee gives to the Minister to develop fishing plans. Neither will there be continuity. After the next election the Conservative Government will no longer exist and another committee will replace the present one. We will then lose any kind of continuity, something that is absolutely critical when you are dealing with fishing cycles of up to four years and conservation cycles of up to 20 years. The industry is being made more unstable at the advisory level.

In addition, when local and regional advisory committees are appointed they make recommendations to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Instead of following the advice of those who have the knowledge and experience, people who have done this for generations, the Department chooses to ignore the advice and impose its own decisions. Those decisions are often politically motivated, and I will give one example.

There is a sports fishing corridor in Rivers Inlet. That corridor was opposed by the Central Coast Regional Advisory Committee. Yet the Minister chose to go ahead. Unfortunately, that sets a precedent for other coastal areas and that is a bad precedent contrary to the advice given. The whole business of planning and operations in the fishing industry has been dislocated, to say the least, by the Government.

The next problem in the industry is the whole business of allocation. It is a very serious matter. I understand the Minister stood up before the British Columbia Wildlife Federation and indicated he was prepared to turn two species of salmon over to the sports fishing group, the cohoe and the chinook. That is completely unacceptable. Traditionally the spring and cohoe salmon have been fished by both sports fishermen and commercial fishermen and native people. There is no doubt that with proper management and proper enhancement those species can be available for all. Any Minister who decides to court favour with one small group of commercially oriented sports fishermen is in serious political trouble. Such a view of allocation based on political affiliation and on a small group making a loud noise will lead to serious political consequences.

With regard to small craft harbours, fishermen who make small business loans are being bashed into the ground through additional costs and impairments in the fishing industry. How can you make your payments on a loan if you cannot fish? The Government is talking about developing a landing tax. Peter Pearse proposed that in order to get rid of small fishermen you simply increase the landing tax to the point where marginal fishermen can no longer stay in the industry. You simply charge them more and more to moor their vessels. You do not provide adequate harbours in order that people can moor their vessels and repair them near their homes.

In short, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister are creating enormous problems for people in the fishing industry by causing them to travel great distances to store their vessels and have them repaired. Right now moorage fees, the condition of harbours, the user costs associated and the inadequacy of them on the coast of British Columbia are becoming a major problem.

In places like Port Hardy, Campbell River, Saltery Bay and the Comox Harbour area in my own riding there is a definite need for harbour upgrading and improved parking and service facilities, which would be a major enhancement to the local economy and the fishing community.

There must be infrastructure development for fishermen. There is need for cold storage plants and processing plants in communities in order to develop a focus for those communities. A great deal of concern has been expressed about the aquaculture industry on the coast of British Columbia. That industry needs infrastructure in the form of small craft harbours to load and unload material. It needs cold storage areas and processing plants to prepare for trans-shipment of the material.

The same thing is required by the commercial fleet. A major storage plant in the community of Port Hardy for the storage of herring, halibut and salmon would mean that a small community which is undergoing major traumatic experiences of a single industry town could benefit through an enormous increase in fish storage and fish processing capacity as well as a substantial increase in employment. Many other areas along the coast of British Columbia would benefit from cold storage facilities.

With regard to the Salmonid Enhancement Program, there was an announcement recently by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) that the Government would continue to fund this program on the coast of British Columbia at an extremely modest and inadequate level. There is tremendous potential for the enhancement of salmon on the coast of British Columbia. The present stocks, which were developed through hatcheries and the development of incubation systems and spawning channels, are a major achievement of previous Governments. The stocks are being maintained at a certain level per year.

However, the Conservatives are now talking about privatizing those facilities. They are talking about using those facilities as suppliers for the aquaculture industry in certain areas. They are talking about funding them from landing taxes. The Government of Canada is attempting to evade its responsibility to ensure that the resource of wild stock salmon, which has been an economic boon to the West Coast of Canada and, indeed, all of Canada for many years, is maintained and improved. More money is needed.

Several years ago the Government decided to put $5 million into job creation on the coast of British Columbia under a MILAP program. That program encouraged a number of projects under the Salmonid Enhancement Program which have been very successful. They received funding for a couple of years and developed their projects. After the projects began to run they were suddenly cut off. Due more to the efforts of dedicated individuals than any policy of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, it has managed to squeeze out some funding to provide small amounts of assistance here and there.

However, the Minister has not recognized that those projects contribute substantially to the wealth of the West Coast of Canada and that of Canada as a whole and are worthy of government support. Under the MILAP program projects were developed on the northern end of Vancouver Island in Port Hardy, around the Oyster River, at Quadra Island and at Gold River. They were given seed money to develop and then were cut adrift.

Those stocks have become important. They serve the commercial fishery and the communities in which fishermen live, which, in turn, serve all businesses in those communities. It is critical that that continue for the continued development of salmonid enhancement.

Another issue is that of resource inventory studies. What is the point of investing a lot of money in salmonid enhancement projects if you are going to allow logging in critical areas which will destroy the streams and wild rearing areas? The Rivers Inlet and Owikeno Lake areas definitely need an integrated resource management study and a course of action planned in co-operation with the federal Departments of Fisheries and Oceans and the Environment and the provincial government agencies.

The herring industry on the West Coast is in a critical condition as well. Representatives from the industry as well as fishing groups recently appeared before the Committee on Fisheries and Oceans. They pointed out that the multiple licence system is a serious problem which has put many people out of work. It has harmed many communities and tends to decentralize the control of fishing companies. A small number of fishermen benefit from a major and wealthy resource. Multiple licences and the area licensing scheme have compounded that problem.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans must have a registry of those who have the right to fish herring. From that registry a rational transfer system must be developed which would prevent the company from grabbing control of it and prevents the Department of Fisheries and Oceans from implementing the Pearse regime which would throw most of the people involved in that industry out of work and place that entire resource in the hands of a few wealthy individuals who may not be fishermen.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

JOB REDUCTIONS IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, once again CN has struck in Cape Breton. It has abandoned another three jobs, put other workers on pre-retirement leave, and has said that these jobs it has abandoned are not necessary.

When one questions the Government it says that CN is making the decision and, as a Crown corporation, must be right that the jobs are excess. However, that is not the case.

CN is deliberately misrepresenting the situation in Cape Breton and the Government is supporting it. Two labourers and a clerk will be laid off. One of the labourers is 50 years of age, with 24 years of experience and seniority in his particular bargaining unit. This Crown corporation is getting rid of people who, at this particular time, need funds for their mortgages and families. Yet this is allowed to continue time after time.

When will the Government begin realizing that the people in this country are important and that Crown corporations owe these people at least the right to have security in the community in which they have spent so much of their lives?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CALL FOR REFORM OF PENAL SYSTEM

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, early this morning in a free vote Members of Parliament voted against the reinstatement of capital punishment by a count of 148 to 127. Parliament has spoken. However, the majority of Canadians—certainly the majority of the constituents in my riding of Edmonton East—ask for capital punishment. What now, Mr. Speaker? Life must go on.

People are asking for protection. People are asking for justice and for fairness in the judicial system. Violent crimes should no longer be the norm, the law should work in favour of law-abiding citizens, not the criminal.

It is imperative that we turn our attention to the reform of the penal system. We must devote all of our energies to ensuring that Canadians are provided a safe living environment and that the parole system is reassessed, that a life sentence means just that, and murderers are not permitted back on the streets to kill again.

EXTERNAL AID

CANADIAN'S CRUSADE TO ENSURE CLEAN WATER IN THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, as we celebrate Canada Day tomorrow, we think of features of Canadian life most of us take for granted. These include things such as safe drinking water, customary in Canada, but the exception in the Third World.

Michael Lubbock is an 81-year-old Canadian who wants to change this. Through his non-profit organization, Watercan, Lubbock crusades to bring clean water to the Third World.

Contaminated water is the cause of many diseases, including diarrhea which is the number one child killer. Lubbock began raising money for Watercan by asking municipalities to send out with their water bill an informative brochure and appeal for funds. Mayor John Savage of Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, adopted the idea. By last April, Dartmouth residents had donated more than $5,000 to Watercan. Given this success, CIDA provided Lubbock with $50,000 in operating funds and agreed to match future contributions two for one.

The first development agency to tackle projects funded through Watercan will be CUSO in Zambia, Ghana, and Nigeria.

I commend Michael Lubbock for his initiative, and Mayor John Savage of Dartmouth for his vision and action. I hope other communities in Canada will follow their lead so that people everywhere can enjoy clean water.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEED TO IMPROVE RULES GOVERNING PAROLE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, those who are against the restoration of capital punishment celebrated a great victory yesterday. Unfortunately nothing has been done to allay the apprehension of all those who wanted measures to reduce crime, all those who wanted convicted murderers to be really punished.

Mr. Speaker, I would now urge all Hon. Members who voted against the reinstatement of the death penalty to bring pressure to bear on this Government so that as soon as the session resumes in September it will introduce legislation to improve the penal system, make sure that the rules governing parole are stricter, as suggested by the previous speaker, protect the lives of Canadians, and set up a better societal integration procedure with respect to paroled inmates.

Hopefully, Mr. Speaker, we will continue the fight to improve the quality of life for all Canadian men and women.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CRIMINAL MATTERS

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, today's statements have a common thrust. Last evening we voted on a very important issue. I am pleased we were able to settle the question, for the workload of the House will be somewhat lighter. Hopefully we will now be able to tackle the real issue, criminal matters. A number of my colleagues dealt with this topic during the capital punishment debate. We have to fill the gaps in our system with respect to indictment proceedings, sentences, or the administration of our parole system.

Many problems are still unsolved concerning these flaws and as the elected representatives of the Canadian people we must ensure that our country remains a good place in which to live. So we still have a lot of work to do and I hope we will come to grips with these problems as soon as we return in September.

Finally, a happy holiday to everybody and particularly to you, Mr. Speaker, for you have been doing an outstanding job since your election. Happy holidays!

DEMOCRACY

THE PEOPLE'S VERDICT

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, totalitarian philosophy is based on the Government knowing best about everything and thus telling the people what is good for them. Democracy is the very reverse, wherein the Government endeavours to the best of its ability to find out what the people want and then reflects the thinking of the people in its administration and legislation.

I have no use for totalitarians, whether they be fascists, communists, socialists or anything else. This group believes that once they are elected they are suddenly given extra brains and super powers. In a democracy it is the very reverse, or should be, where the members of the Government seek the views of the people they represent and reflect those views in the administration.

Real democracy existed at its origin, where everyone went to the assembly. This evolved to where the people elected representatives to carry their views to the powers that be. The trend in Canada is getting further away from real democracy and closer to totalitarian views. I deplore this trend and my only consolation is that the people will have the final say when they cast their ballots. The people know best.

BANKS AND BANKING

CHARTERED BANKS—OVERCHARGING ON LOANS TO FARMERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in response to my questions in the House yesterday, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) stated that the Government would not be willing to intervene or investigate interest charges during the early 1980s when many farmers signed bank notes at fixed interest rates and were charged floating rates amounting to huge interest overcharges.

The Minister has a report from the Inspector General of Banks which he will not make public. However, he says that the non-intervention decision is based on three court cases which ruled against the overcharges.

I want to point out that I discovered which cases the Inspector General and the Minister are using as their basis for reports. They all involve interest charges well in advance of the changes to the Bank Act in 1980, and are therefore totally irrelevant.

Since that time the Supreme Court of Ontario ruled in the Wilford case, and recently ruled in the Smeltzer Farms versus Royal Bank case, on the side of the farmers, saying that the banks had indeed overcharged these people. In the Smeltzer case it has even refused to permit a bankruptcy procedure by the bank because it had acted improperly.

LABOUR

CRITERIA DEFINING ISOLATED POST

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the regulations clarifying the criteria for isolated posts in Canada, in terms of the Treasury Board Directive on Isolated Posts (1977), are being reviewed this year. The authorities of the municipalities concerned, the unions and workers in our remote regions in Canada must make every possible effort to ensure that the same criteria are maintained, especially those for social isolation, and I am thinking of the particular case of the municipality of Joutel in Abitibi.

We all know that the new system for providing tax relief for northern residents, which has been in effect since January 1, 1987, has been very well received by all workers. The new provisions are fair and reasonable.

Mr. Speaker, it is my duty, speaking on behalf of the unions, companies and all other parties concerned, to intervene in order to obtain a fair deal for workers in northern Quebec and all Canada's isolated areas.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

EFFECT OF NEW MAIL DELIVERY POLICIES IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the policies of Canada Post are becoming more ridiculous by the day. For instance, in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, only one home owner, the Simpson family at 380 Brophy Avenue, does not receive door-to-door mail delivery. Yet each day a letter carrier walks by and delivers mail to a nearby apartment building. On April 14 I wrote to the Minister responsible for Canada Post but all I received in response was a form letter. He did not even bother to investigate.

Canadians from coast to coast are fed up with the policies of the Conservative Government which are forcing Canada Post to cut back postal services to our taxpaying citizens. I quote from a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Federation of Prince Edward Island Municipalities:

> The new delivery policies are discriminatory as new subdivisions will not receive the same benefits as an already established subdivision.

I urge the Minister to review the Simpson case and give that family what they deserve, good postal service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO STAFF AND PAGES

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, each year at this time, as Members of Parliament begin to think of summer recess and a break from the daily business of the House, it is essential that we pay tribute to those people who have faithfully and efficiently assisted this House in carrying out its tasks over the past year.

On behalf of all my hon. colleagues I would like to take this opportunity to thank the messengers, the Commons postal staff, the cafeteria staff, the restaurant staff, the committee staff, and all the other House of Commons staff for making our jobs so much easier.

I would also like to pass on my warmhearted thanks to the 42 pages who have clearly demonstrated their commitment and dedication to hard work.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ravis: While attending university full time, these young men and women cheerfully and enthusiastically serve the Members of the House. As this term quickly comes to an end, these 42 pages will continue to follow a road that has already pointed to a future of leadership and achievement. I wish them good luck in their future endeavours.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CRITICISM OF PROPOSED NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) introduced the new Canadian Environment Protection Act. I would like today to express my concern that some of the headlines concerning the Bill may cause Canadians to take too much comfort in the actions of the Minister. I see headlines such as: "Tough New Environment Act". The fact is that except for the emphasis on fines, if we take a good look at the Bill we see it is not a very tough Bill after all.

When we look at the fact that there is so much ministerial discretion involved, so much devolution of powers to the provinces with respect to how the Act will be enforced and administered, when we consider the persistent exclusion of important areas of concern such as pesticides and radioactive substances, when we consider the failure to include an environmental Bill of Rights or to give individual Canadians a standing in the courts with respect to environmental concerns, when we consider all those things it becomes clear that the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is not the comprehensive piece of environmental protection legislation the Minister of the Environment has been promising.

Therefore, I ask Canadians who are concerned about the environment to look at the fine print and not take too much comfort from what has happened so far.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

COMPOSITION OF MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, if we were asked to define the socialist Members of this House, I think we could say this is a group where each member has his own very narrow, very limited, very marginal and very eccentric ideas on one particular subject.

The fact that these people can be in the House of Commons of Canada is the price Canadians have to pay for living in a democracy.

If the socialists want to get beyond the stage of undisciplined snivellers, their party will have to take positions that are more in line with the background and philosophy of life of all Canadians.

Meanwhile, we would like to know when and how the socialist Leader will comment on what was said by the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) about Canada's defence, without overlooking the positions taken by the Members for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) and Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), and his Party's resolutions on NATO and NORAD. I may refer to the resolutions passed at the March, 1987, Convention, Resolution B.4.3—B.1.1. paragraphs (8) and (9).

Instead of camping out in Quebec this summer, the socialist Leader should put his house in order and discipline his troops.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

FUNDS AND MANPOWER NEEDED TO ENFORCE NEW LEGISLATION'S PROVISIONS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the environment protection Bill introduced in the House by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) on Friday looks good on paper as far as it deals with new chemicals. However, no matter how well written, it cannot stop pollution without monitoring and enforcement.

To implement the Bill the Government has allocated only $37 million over five years to be split between three departments, the Department of the Environment, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Justice. This $37 million is further divided between assessment of new chemicals, administration of the Act, and enforcement.

In addition, in 1987 the Department of the Environment has already lost 106 person-years and the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare has lost 22 person-years. In the face of these facts, how can the Government ensure effective enforcement?

How can the Government impose $1 million a day fines without the means to enforce the law? To be convincing, the Minister must make adequate funds available for enforcement if this Bill is really going to protect the environment and Canadians.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MATERNITY BENEFIT PROVISIONS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is always a rush in the House at the end of June to pass legislation. As a result, quite often we do make mistakes in the passage of legislation and such an occurrence took place in 1984 when we made changes to Part III of the Labour Code. At that time we tried to guarantee that women who were on maternity leave, who would normally be receiving benefits paid by their employer, would continue to receive those benefits. Since then we have had a decision rendered in a case with regard to Bell Canada where the opposite has been decided.

Since Labour Canada promised the women of this country they would continue to receive paid benefits while they were on maternity leave, I call upon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) to keep that promise and to act quickly to ensure a legislative change is made.

POLITICAL PARTIES

HAMILTON MOUNTAIN BY-ELECTION—PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE CANDIDATE'S BROCHURE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, some of us are going on vacation, others are going on the war-path. I am going on the war-path in the riding of Hamilton Mountain to make sure that Elizabeth Phinney is the next Member of Parliament. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, who is not going to be invited to participate in the Conservative war-path. I have here a copy of a brochure from the Conservative candidate on Hamilton Mountain. Surprisingly, the only Prime Minister he mentions is the former Prime Minister, the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark).

I looked through the brochure and could not find a picture of the current Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). I could not find a mention of the current Prime Minister. There is not a single picture. No wonder the Prime Minister is not welcome on Hamilton Mountain. If he comes there he is going to be a liability and he will make sure by his presence that Elizabeth Phinney is the next Member of Parliament for Hamilton Mountain.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—RELATIONS BETWEEN MINISTER AND AMBASSADOR

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as we adjourn, hopefully, for the summer, I am sure all Members would want me to echo what an Hon. Member has just expressed, namely, our gratitude to the pages for all their dedicated work during the session. We wish them well in their careers. I extend the same to all Members of the Chamber on both sides of the House.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the escalating public feud between his Minister for International Trade and the chief trade negotiator, Simon Reisman. In a somewhat garbled metaphor given to the Vancouver Sun, the Minister accused Mr. Reisman of going too far in seeking the biggest deal he can. Mr. Reisman, in his characteristically subdued fashion, has responded to the Minister by admitting that there have been tense moments between himself and his Minister.

The Prime Minister said yesterday of this dispute: "There are, and there should be, differences of opinion on different aspects of the file". I submit to the Prime Minister that on a file of this magnitude, and of this high level of government service, a mandate so critical for the future of Canada, there is no room for this kind of public feuding between the two senior officials in charge of the dossier. Why has the Prime Minister not settled this public dispute? If the negotiations are in such disarray right at the top of Canada's team, why does he not call the whole thing off and regroup?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend is of course quite right when he refers to the complexity of these negotiations. This is an enormous burden and a great challenge for the negotiator, even one of the tremendous talents of Ambassador Simon Reisman, aided, supported and guided as he is by a tremendous Minister, the Minister for International Trade.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Both of these very devoted Canadians carry great responsibilities in a very complex and difficult area, made no less easy every day by constant sniping and attacks from members of the Opposition who seem to believe that they are favouring the American rather than the Canadian position in this matter. That has added to the burdens of both people principally responsible.

They would both be less than human if, in a matter of this complexity and this seriousness, from time to time there were not modest differences of opinion on given aspects of the file. But I can tell my right hon. friend—I can assure him and reassure him—that apart from the obvious competence with which the matter has been handled great harmony prevails.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I bet, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the Prime Minister use his celebrated negotiating skills, first to introduce the Minister to Mr. Reisman once again, and then bring them together.

[Translation]

REPORTS TO PREMIERS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Mr. Reisman indicated that at the First Ministers' Conference, the provincial premiers, would, in his own words, receive "a fairly complete report" of the negotiations, but not necessarily on the details of the negotiations or on items such as a draft agreement.

Will the Prime Minister ensure that the provincial Premiers receive a report on the issues, a full report, and when does he intend to give Members the same information that U.S. Congressmen and Senators receive from their negotiators on a regular basis?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I don't know what kind of information is passed on to U.S. Congressmen, but I can inform you that meetings with their negotiators are less frequent than the meetings held by Ambassador Reisman with the Minister and their colleagues at the provincial level, as has already been pointed out by each of the premiers.

In almost every case, the information received is complete, and there is a high degree of satisfaction with the way negotiations are proceeding, especially in terms of the involvement of the provinces.

As for the meeting with the premiers, I can give my friend the assurance that the premiers will receive a full report on all negotiations.

[English]

POSITION OF UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope that is true. I submit to the Prime Minister that the Members of the House deserve a report as well, at least to bring us up to speed with respect to being able to assess these negotiations in a fashion similar to that of the leading members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives who are receiving reports from their negotiator. We are completely in the dark. The Prime Minister wonders from time to time why he gets the reaction he does—it because we are not able to evaluate what is going on.

Last week the Prime Minister said and admitted that he had received a letter—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We are hearing from the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead. We will get to him in a minute.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): As Joe Louis once said of Billy Conn, he can run but he can't hide.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members will know that members of the public who are watching this will not know what has been going on. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it was a late night.

The Prime Minister refused to reveal the contents of a letter from the President of the United States in which the President expressed his refusal to agree to a compulsory trade dispute mechanism. Has the Prime Minister now replied to the President making it clear to him that any trade proposal which does not contain a compulsory trade dispute mechanism and meaningful restriction on the unilateral right of the United States to countervail will not be fair, will not be free and will not be acceptable to Canadians?

If the President has not agreed will the Prime Minister instruct his Minister for International Trade and his chief negotiator to call off the negotiations immediately?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Jimmy Coutts wrote recently in The Toronto Star that the Liberal Party has, among other things, no position on trade. That is being made very amply clear. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition seems determined to sabotage these talks one way or the other.

I tell the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that in our judgment these talks are vital for the creation of jobs in Canada. A comprehensive trade agreement with the United States is a very important instrument of economic progress.

We have been negotiating with the United States at all levels, and I think we are making considerable progress. Whether we will be able to conclude an agreement, as I have always indicated, I do not know. This is a serious matter. There are very serious difficulties to overcome. My right hon. friend has indicated one of them.

From the beginning I have expressed the view that for a free trade document to contain an instrument that would allow the triggering of unilateral reprisals against one of the signatories is self-defeating. I have expressed that view repeatedly. It seems to me fundamentally inconsistent to seek, on the one hand, a liberalized document of trade, and on the other to allow that document to contain instruments that vitiate that very notion.

Indeed, I have responded to the President of the United States. I have very clearly conveyed to him the point of view of the Government of Canada, first, when he was here in Canada, then in Washington, and most recently in Venice.

As I have indicated to my right hon. friend time and time again, and I will do it one final time today, the Government of Canada has undertaken very difficult and, as Premier Bourassa has said, risky negotiations which are indispensable for the future of Canada. We are ready to take the risk to see if we can get a good deal for Canada. If we can, we will bring it forward for the consideration of the House. It will create the kinds of jobs that Canadians truly need.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S VIEWS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister questions arising out of his remarks. He has referred to the devoted public servants, the Minister for International Trade and the chief negotiator.

I would like to quote to the Prime Minister comments they have made recently. The Minister for International Trade said of the chief negotiator: "He is going nuts". The chief negotiator replied back that he thinks he might elope with the Minister for International Trade, which is probably full proof of the original assertion of the Minister.

The fact of the matter is we have two very clear differences between the Minister and the chief negotiator about the mandate for the trade agreement. Has the Prime Minister called these two chief officials together and asked them to get on the same track, to have the same mandate and the same approach toward negotiation?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the quote that the Hon. Member has selectively read to the House. I can only add to that that in terms of the selective quotes to which he refers I was expressing my empathy for the Ambassador—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: He has gone nuts, that is right.

• (1430)

Miss Carney: I was pointing out that the Ambassador's job is different from that of the Cabinet, and that he is operating in conditions different from those which existed in the past, because this Government has the greatest consultative mechanism any Government has ever brought forward for any negotiations of this kind.

I pointed out that the Ambassador must not only deal with Cabinet, but with the provinces, with the business sector, and with our consultative mechanism. This advice goes into his office within 24 hours, and naturally, this puts a lot of pressure on him when he has to negotiate within a limited time.

I think it is useful for the House to know that these are the most different negotiations—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: —in the sense that we have such a huge consultative mechanism, a mechanism that puts enormous pressure on the Cabinet and on the Ambassador and his colleagues.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, after listening to that reply, I, too, have sympathy for the chief negotiator. I think they both need a rest, Mr. Speaker.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): If I may, I should like to ask a further question of the Prime Minister.

He said, in response to the Leader of the Opposition, that he believes that it is absolutely essential that there be a major change in the trade remedy laws of the United States as part of any liberalized free trade agreement, and that he has indicated that kind of concern to the President on several occasions. I believe he has said that he has even written back to the President.

If, as part of the negotiations, the President replies and says that the United States is not prepared to make a major alteration and give Canada exemption to the trade remedy laws, is the Prime Minister prepared to pull away from those negotiations, recognizing that it would be a bad deal for Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very hypothetical question and, of course, it shall go unanswered. I can tell my hon. friend, however, that indeed it seems inconsistent to me, on the one hand, to profess a desire to seek a comprehensive free trade arrangement and also, if it were the case, to express the view that there should be retained the capacity for triggering unilateral reprisals against your trading partner with whom you would propose to sign the agreement.

To me it would have the effect, or could, depending, I suppose, on the approach and the wording, of vitiating the very notion of a free trade arrangement itself. And so we would want to examine all of this very carefully, as we are doing. It is part and parcel of a very complex negotiation which, notwithstanding some of the difficulties, is moving along quite well.

ENERGY

DOME PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Energy. There are three things happening today. First of all, the proposed takeover of Dome Petroleum by Amoco will be settled one way or the other today. Since none of the major creditors has agreed to it, that is almost certain to be a negative.

Secondly, the rescheduling of the debt for Dome by its major creditors terminates today, which will set in place, perhaps, a very unfortunate financial happening within a matter of weeks; and third, the Parliament of Canada will recess for the summer without the Government of Canada having taken any leadership to provide a solution to the Dome problem.

Given the earlier two events, that is, the termination of the rescheduling of the debt arrangement and the almost certain announcement that the Amoco deal has not been agreed upon, what is the current state of affairs affecting thousands of jobs, particularly in western Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me draw the Hon. Member's attention to the fact that the negotiations between Dome and its bankers have been ongoing, I think, for something like five or six years. These deadlines have come and gone. It is part of the over-all negotiations.

I think, though, the Hon. Member should feel comforted by the fact that the international price of oil is up. That has put Dome in a healthier position. It has put it in a position where it is able to maintain better relations with its banks, thereby avoiding some of the problems to which the Hon. Member has just referred.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows that that soporific nonsense isn't a solution to the very serious problems of Dome and all of the thousands of jobs that are directly involved.

I would like to ask him—

An Hon. Member: What arrogance.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Since a CP wire story this morning has the Minister of Energy saying, about the Dome situation, that he is tired of Canadians seeing it as some kind of sporting event, and according to the Minister of Energy the Government has "a fundamental interest and responsibility in this", my question to the Minister is this. When is the Government going to live up to its responsibility, get the major players involved, including the chartered banks, including the management of Dome, to come in here, into Ottawa, and get a Canadian solution to this Canadian problem, before there is a disaster?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada does have a responsibility, and that is to respond to offers such as the one that Amoco has made for Dome to ensure that the conditions of the offer are consistent with the objectives of Investment Canada.

The Minister of Energy has stated quite clearly the list of those areas of Investment Canada that we are interested in as a Government, to ensure that any deal that is made will be for the benefit of all Canadians.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INTERVENE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, since billions of dollars are involved in this deal, since there are some 50 million-plus acres of some of the richest, in potential, lands in western Canada are at stake, since there is a short and long-run Canadian interest at stake, will the Minister now give us assurance that immediately—and I mean within a matter of days, not weeks—the Government of Canada will sit down with Petro-Canada, with the other major players involved, and develop a Canadian solution, before Dome goes completely under?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I presume that the Hon. Member, when he makes that suggestion, is going to tell us exactly where Petro-Canada is going to get the $5 billion or $6 billion that would be required to do that.

Mr. Broadbent: Hopper has already told you where he can get the money, and you know it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Is the Hon. Member saying that we should raise the deficit by $5 billion or $6 billion, thus leading to a substantial increase in inflation? Is he going to take the approach that the previous Government took, and slap a five cent or ten cent tax on the price of a gallon of gas in order to allow Petro-Canada to buy it?

An Hon. Member: Raise the price of gas.

An Hon. Member: What are you doing?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Or would he raise taxes? Would he raise taxes to—

Mr. Broadbent: It is your responsibility. What are you doing?

Mr. Riis: There are thousands of jobs in western Canada at stake. What are you doing?

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance is right, the Government does have a responsibility, and it is about time that the Government lived up to its responsibility with respect to Dome Petroleum and the proposed takeover by Amoco Canada.

The problem is, after tonight, this company, Dome Petroleum, could go into bankruptcy, and thousands of jobs could be lost; and we may not be able to have other bidders come into the picture until the end of March of 1988.

In the meantime the whole question is left up in the air. What the Government is actually doing is forcing this company into bankruptcy.

Is that the Government's responsibility? Is that what the Government sees as its duty to the Canadian public—

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. MacLellan: —giving away the resources, and getting nothing in return for them?

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

An Hon. Member: How did it get into this position in the first place?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not going to be fooled by the outrageous rhetoric of that Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Where was that Hon. Member back in 1980, when the Government that he was supporting took the action that put Dome Petroleum on the skids and put it in the position that it has found itself in for the past five years, hanging on by its fingernails because of the policies that were brought in as a result of the National Energy Program.

An Hon. Member: Supported by the NDP.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Hon. Member would do just as well to sit on his hands and not say a word, because he has a sad history with the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

• (1440)

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the Government is completely ignoring its responsibility to the Canadian public. It is refusing to move to ensure that other bids are brought in for the purchase of Dome Petroleum. Is the Government saying—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will have noticed that the Chair made some indication to the Minister that there is a limit on answers, and I would also want the Hon. Member to put his question succinctly.

Mr. MacLellan: Is the Government saying that it refuses to do anything, that it will not intervene in any way to safeguard the future of Dome Petroleum for the Canadian public and the resources which Dome Petroleum has in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asked whether we will take our responsibilities. Yes, we will take our responsibilities.

We have said that our responsibilities under the Investment Canada Act are to ensure that a deal, if it is concluded with Amoco, will be consistent with the requirements of Investment Canada, that is, that the deal will be of net benefit to Canada. That is the responsibility we are taking as a Government.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

ISSUANCE OF CONTRACTS—KICKBACK INVESTIGATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. When Members of Parliament reconvened on January 19, at the beginning of this session of Parliament, we were informed of the Oerlikon affair which lead to the Bissonnette investigation. Then we had the Gravel investigation, the Stevens investigation, the Place Vincent Massey investigation, the Peloquin investigation, and a number of others. Today we learn of the Progressive Conservative fund kickback investigation.

My question to the Prime Minister is simply this. When is this going to stop? When is it that we will see a Government that gets away from this messy way of doing business so that we are not doing investigations, and gets on with governing the country as it should be governed?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister of External Relations): Presumably, Mr. Speaker, my colleague is referring to last night's television news report. I should like to tell him that last fall when I was made aware of possible allegations I immediately asked my Department officials to get in touch with the RCMP, and the investigation is now under way.

Mr. Speaker, I might add that if my colleague carefully listened to or read the news report he would know that these allegations have to do with what may have been a deal between two individuals and simply do not involve the Government or CIDA.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we have heard it time and time again. We have had investigation after investigation. The news reports say that this situation in terms of making payments goes on with contract after contract.

GOVERNMENT INTEGRITY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. The people of Canada are sick and tired of investigation after investigation after investigation. They want this nonsense to stop.

When will the Prime Minister do something to start building integrity in the Government and bring this nonsense to a close?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister of External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I might remind my colleague that I said on several occasions that the CIDA contract selection process is quite open and very clear. Last winter I had the opportunity to issue a brochure which was sent to all my colleagues and all businessmen to provide a clear explanation about the contract selection process, and I would urge my colleague to come to CIDA and see for himself why I am so proud of the way contracts are awarded, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

QUERY CONCERNING PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF ALLEGATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the same topic, the one reported in the media of a 5 per cent kickback scheme, part of which is to go the Conservative Party as compensation for receiving government contracts.

When was the Prime Minister made aware of the case reported on national television last night? What specific measures did he order his Ministers to undertake to ensure this kind of activity is cleaned up and does not recur in his already tarnished Government?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister of External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that the RCMP are investigating. Perhaps he ought to wait before passing judgments.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, it is not the system which is at fault, but the people involved.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. On May 26, 1986, in reply to a question I had asked in the House about the 5 per cent kickbacks, we were told that there was no such system and that the Government would not investigate. In view of the new facts which have now come to light, is the Prime Minister willing to request a public inquiry on the contracting policy of his Government and the allegations of kickbacks for the Conservative Party? Will there be a public inquiry, yes or no?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister of External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that the contracting process of CIDA is very open and very clear. Since the Hon. Member does not seem to be aware of this, I invite him to come and check at CIDA how contracts are awarded. This is done very honestly and the firms which deserve contracts get them.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE—SUSPENSION OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who ran for office on the basis of his reputation as a labour negotiator. The Prime Minister will know that the appointment of a mediator in the postal dispute brought the hope of a settlement. Right on the heels of that we had the firing of 40 letter carriers which has clouded the negotiations.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether he considers this action to be the result of stupidity, incompetence, or deliberate sabotage of the negotiations?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this action of suspension, I believe, and not dismissal of employees, was undertaken by Canada Post. The Government was not involved in the decision. I understand that it is in keeping with the spirit and terms of the contract which has now lapsed.

A commitment was made in writing by Canada Post to the unions that while the contract is no longer in place it will abide by the spirit. It is abiding by the spirit in this instance. Apparently there is a time limit between the action and the response of discipline, and the Post Office, I am told, had to act within that time period.

Mr. Keeper: Surely the withdrawal of the strike-breakers was an attempt to create a climate conducive to negotiations and the firing of 40 letter carriers destroys that climate.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CORPORATION'S ACTIONS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister face up to this issue and tell the House whether he feels the Minister responsible for the Post Office, who is his appointee, or the President of the Post Office, who is also his appointee, is responsible for this destructive action, or is it he himself who is responsible for this two-faced approach to the negotiations at the Post Office?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the first question the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out that a mediator is now working with both parties trying to bring about a negotiated settlement, for which I hope he, along with everyone else in the House, would wish.

It does no good whatsoever to the process to have issues from the bargaining table raised in the House in a prejudicial, inaccurate fashion. I wish the Hon. Member would give Mr. Kelly and the negotiators an opportunity to reach a settlement and would not keep muddying the waters.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

RIGHT TO USE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF ONE'S CHOICE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. We had a very unfortunate incident in the Alberta legislature recently. A francophone Member was denied the right to speak in French in the Legislature of Alberta. A Committee of the Legislature was asked to look into the matter and told Mr. Léo Piquette, Alberta M.P.P., to apologize for using French, his official language. I want to ask the Prime Minister what he intends to do to help francophones across Canada and especially francophones outside Quebec, in the provinces, to obtain recognition of their right to use the official language of their choice where and when they please.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are going to work together with the Fédération des francophones hors Québec and the provincial Governments, and with language minorities wherever they happen to be, to promote their rights at all times. These are some of the realities that led to the substantial amendments to the Official Languages Act that were tabled last week. I think my hon. friend who has always been most vigilant about the official languages question will basically approve what the Government has done. In fact, our purpose is to create a climate more conducive to having this very important reality accepted everywhere in Canada, the reality of the Official Languages Act and all the consequences thereof.

RIGHT TO USE OFFICIAL LANGUAGES EVERYWHERE IN CANADA—OPPORTUNITY TO PUT PRESSURE ON ALBERTA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, considering the insult—and it is an insult—to all francophones in this country, considering the threats Mr. Léo Piquette received, which went so far as to restrict his right to speak and even mentioned the possibility of imprisonment, fines and possible expulsion from the Legislature, and considering the intent of the Meech Lake Accord, the Official Languages Act and the latest version tabled last week, which provides that the Secretary of State has an obligation to urge the provinces to promote, assist and protect, I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is he prepared to call the Premier of the province, to put pressure on his Alberta cousins and friends, so they will finally understand, once and for all, that French and English are the official languages of this country—

Mr. Malépart: No way he has to apologize!

Mr. Gauthier: —and that Canadians have a right to use both languages and that it is unthinkable that a francophone should suffer any restrictions in Alberta, any more than an anglophone would in Quebec? And I ask the Prime Minister to take action.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I personally find it unacceptable that a Canadian should be asked to apologize for using one of the official languages. The spirit of the Meech Lake Accord makes the broad assumption that the people and the leaders of this country will act with generosity and openness of mind with respect to the implementation of all linguistic measures. Members of this House know perfectly well that these may be difficult questions and that it takes a great deal of leadership to build a country in terms of the realities we all accept.

Personally, I would ask, as Prime Minister and, I assume, speaking on behalf of all Members of this House, I would ask the Members of the Alberta Legislative Assembly, which, if I am not mistaken, has Conservative, NDP and Liberal Members, to intervene, to join in the same spirit of generosity and openness of mind in seeking an honourable solution to this thorny issue and especially, to do so with full consideration for the interests of minorities, because as far as we are concerned, minorities are to be protected and respected. I think this is entirely normal and in line with our most fundamental values.

NATIONAL PARKS

ESTABLISHMENT OF SOUTH MORESBY AS NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question and, I would hope, congratulations are for the Prime Minister. It appears that the unanimous voice of Parliament has been heard out west. British Columbia, as I understand it, has accepted the $106 million federal offer to designate South Moresby as a national park reserve. There are two added conditions, which I wish to put to the Prime Minister, both of which I think are achievable.

One, the B.C. Government wants the federal Government to open a Parks Canada Pacific region office in Vancouver, which I think is reasonable and needed; second, that the federal Government hold discussions with British Columbia on a ferry subsidy for British Columbia.

Will the Prime Minister accept this settlement in general since essentially the main components are those given in writing by the Deputy Prime Minister to Premier Vander Zalm two weeks ago?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Hon. Member announced the settlement I was wondering whether he had had a call that I had not had.

While there has been a lot of work done—and we have been making some progress—there has been no settlement. I spoke with the Premier of British Columbia today. We hope to continue to make progress but the matter has not been resolved. There are outstanding issues with which we are attempting to deal. We have made progress in some substantial way but much remains to be done. I think the original comment by my hon. friend was perhaps premature.

PRESS CONFERENCE HELD BY BRITISH COLUMBIA PREMIER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just prior to Question Period I received a call from a senior federal government official who advised me that the Premier, as is often the case in British Columbia, had held a press conference regarding this matter, that he has accepted the $106 million federal offer and the only other two conditions which B.C. wishes to have met are totally achievable and reasonable.

Will the Prime Minister address himself to those in the House? Is he prepared, which I understand Parks Canada is, to open a Pacific region office in Vancouver, and hold discussions with B.C. regarding ferry and transportation matters in the Province of British Columbia?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not being a British Columbian I did not know that successful negotiation depended upon catching the Premier's scrums. We have been in close touch—

Mr. Broadbent: It does.

Mr. Mulroney: It does?

Ms. Mitchell: You have got it, brother.

Mr. Mulroney: That is probably why he has been so successful.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: We have had very good dealings with the Government of British Columbia. This is a very important national issue which has been treated as such by the Government of British Columbia and by the Government of Canada. We have made, as my hon. friend knows, some substantial progress. There remains some obstacles which we hope to overcome. We are pursuing this vigorously very much in the national interest. As I indicated, I had another conversation with the Premier just about an hour or an hour and a half ago, and no doubt we will talk again.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATUS OF BILL C-35

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns the status of Bill C-33, an Act to amend the Public Service, Armed Forces, RCMP and Supplementary Retirement Benefits Acts which Bill was first read in the House in December, 1986. It is certainly an important issue in the national capital region and I am sure throughout all ridings in the country.

Since I have had many representations from individuals and unions on this important matter, will the Government move forward early in the fall with the Bill as it now exists, or does the Government intend to make any changes to the Bill?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. colleague, and for that matter his constituents and all affected employees, that we intend to move early in the fall with the Bill in its present form.

REVIEW COMMITTEE REPORT—INFILTRATION OF VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS BY FOREIGN SPIES

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee tabled in the House yesterday.

The report confirms that hostile foreign spies have infiltrated some voluntary organizations in Canada and that these organizations are receiving substantial funding from hostile foreign Governments. Will the Prime Minister indicate which Canadian organizations have been infiltrated and which organizations are receiving funding from hostile foreign Governments? Will the Prime Minister not agree that innocent Canadians belonging to these organizations have a right to know and, indeed, all Canadians have a right to know?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what report the hon. gentleman was reading, but it certainly was not in the report with which I am familiar.

I can tell the hon. gentleman, as I told the House quite clearly yesterday, that the only activities carried on by CSIS are carried on within its mandate as given to it under Section 2 of the Act. If the Member has any evidence that CSIS is not acting within its mandate under Section 2 of the Act, I would ask him to give me some evidence of it.

REQUEST FOR IDENTIFICATION OF VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Minister has not read the report. The evidence is at page 30 of the report. I will quote it for the Solicitor General.

Mr. Marchi: Go slowly.

Mr. Nunziata: "We have learned in CSIS briefings that hostile foreign intelligence services have, indeed, infiltrated some organizations and that substantial funding from foreign sources has been detected".

The Solicitor General has just displayed his abysmal ignorance and irresponsibility with regard to his particular Ministry. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he will immediately indicate to Canadians which voluntary organizations in Canada have been infiltrated by hostile foreign spies. Will he not agree that Canadians have a right to know which organizations have been infiltrated by these hostile Governments?

• (1500)

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we have before us the annual report of SIRC which renders a valuable service, and that is the purpose of that organization. We are investigating any allegations. As I told the Hon. Member, a review team has been set up to look into these allegations to see whether or not they are correct and to recommend procedures that will clear up any concerns that may have been raised in the SIRC report.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REGIONAL PRINTING CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Printing firms in Saskatchewan, throughout the west, and indeed in the Maritimes have been concerned about the amount of federal government printing business performed in their regions. Can the Minister tell the House if any progress is being made in that regard?

Hon. Stewart McInnes (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am persuaded that the Minister of Supply and Services deserves the collective applause of all Members of the House for her attempts to regionalize printing and other procurement practices. In this regard, she has requested and indeed required that all Members' monthly booklets be printed and distributed in the regions. I am happy to report to the Hon. Member that Mid-West Litho was the high tenderer on a contract to do a great deal of printing in the west—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McInnes: —and it is expected that $10 million worth of printing will be moved to the regions this year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES SAILOR'S ALLEGED RAPE OF WOMAN IN VICTORIA

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Canadians are outraged, first that an American sailor who allegedly raped a Victoria woman avoided apprehension by boarding his ship, and second, that both Canadian and U.S. military officials said yesterday that if the crime had been more serious, such as murder, the suspect would have been handed over to Canadian authorities. Does the Minister share the view that alleged rape is not a serious enough crime to force apprehension of a suspected rapist?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I of course do not share that view nor, I imagine, do the people the Hon. Member presumes to quote. The facts of the situation are that, in accordance with the strict interpretation of international law, the U.S. naval commander involved took back on board ship the alleged perpetrator of this act. That is in strict accordance with law. It is not, however, the normal practice.

The recourse open to us would be to trigger extradition proceedings. That can only be done in response to a request by the Government of the Province of British Columbia. If we receive such a request, we will act upon it.

PROTECTION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the Minister's response and his prompt action. As he knows, rape is a criminal offence in Canada.

I wonder what action the Minister would take immediately with the British Columbia Government to ensure that other visiting sailors are not above Canadian law and that our citizens are protected under our laws.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we will make the necessary contacts with the British Columbia Government and, in addition to that, we will remind American naval commanders and commanders of other vessels that might dock in Canadian ports of the usual practice, which was not followed in the case to which the Hon. Member makes reference.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton East has one question and then we will have to close Question Period.

INDUSTRY

FUTURE OF FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the potential loss of 1,300 jobs at a Firestone plant in Hamilton that only four short years ago received $13.5 million in federal funding. Three weeks ago the Minister said he was on top of the dossier. He will no doubt be aware that, as of this moment, management at Firestone is preparing to have some of its machinery taken out of the Hamilton plant and shipped off to Des Moines, Iowa.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister prepared to move immediately to force Firestone to cease any attempt to remove any equipment from that plant until we have had a chance to do an assessment of just how much of that machinery comes from the federal Government's $13.5 million, or is his promise that the dossier is being looked after just more idle talk like the Moncton shops promise he made to the workers in Moncton?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion I will take that question as notice. Perhaps with her connections with the Liberal Government in Ontario, the Hon. Member may want to make representations there as well. I think in fairness that there is a certain responsibility for this matter that could be levelled on its shoulders as well.

TRIBUTE TO PAGE STAFF

Mr. Speaker: Because we are quickly approaching the customary time of summer adjournment, I am sure all Hon. Members will wish to join me in an expression which has already been made in this Chamber, an expression of appreciation to all staff members of the House for their exceptional efforts on our behalf during the past parliamentary year.

Our sincere thanks must go to the Parliamentary Pages for their attention to our immediate needs within the Chamber. I think all Hon. Members would agree that the young people appointed to serve us as Pages have consistently shown themselves to be worthy representatives of Canadian youth of whom we have so very many reasons to be proud.

[Translation]

Speaking on behalf of all Members, I bid them goodbye and wish them every success with their studies and in their future careers.

[English]

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I should also add that the usual reception will take place in Room 16 commencing at five o'clock and the Pages, of course, are very welcome. Hon. Members will have a chance to meet with them once again, and I thank Hon. Members.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS—MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Before we move on to other matters, which I know the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) wishes to do, I do want to rule on a question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) and it will take just a few minutes.

[Translation]

I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised on Friday, June 19, by the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques. The basis of the Hon. Member's complaint is his assertion that misleading information was provided to the House concerning the government's White Paper on Tax Reform.

[English]

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) had stated quite clearly that the White Paper was not a Budget, and that statement was several times reiterated. However, on June 17, the day before the tabling of the White Paper, the Minister said:

> It is quite clear that a Ways and Means motion will be tabled tomorrow evening.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), in answer to a question asked on June 18, confirmed that the White Paper was not a Budget. The Prime Minister's exact words were:

> It sets forth the general thrust of government thinking, but it is not a Budget in the sense that it does not, per se, take effect the very same day pursuant to a Ways and Means Motion.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques pointed out that the White Paper was indeed accompanied by Ways and Means Motion implementing a number of tax changes.

[English]

There is no doubt that the White Paper sets out a very extensive plan of tax reform. Although it is yet to be implemented by a Budget presented in the form of the annual financial statement to which we are accustomed, the White Paper, as I said in a previous ruling, has important budgetary implications. It was, as the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques noted, accompanied by a Ways and Means motion. However, that motion was not designed to implement the full content of the White Paper. The motion was limited in its effect and I would point out that Ways and Means motions are regularly tabled throughout the session. They are not restricted to the presentation of a Budget.

• (1510)

For this reason I do not think we can regard the tabling of a Ways and Means motion as in any way extraordinary simply because it coincided with the Minister's statement and presentation of the White Paper.

[Translation]

It was argued in the course of the discussion that, because of the budgetary implications of the White Paper, it should have been treated as a Budget statement and therefore be subject to a six day debate. The rights of Members, it was argued, have been infringed because they have been denied the debating opportunities normally associated with a Budget. This in itself is not a question of privilege but rather a point of order. However, it is clear that in the view of the Government, the White Paper is a set of proposals as distinct from a Budget. There was no intention of presenting a Budget and therefore under our rules, the claim to a six day debate could not be sustained. However, this would not rule out the possibility of an extended debate through negotiation by the House Leaders.

[English]

To return to the question of privilege, the Chair, while appreciating the concern expressed, cannot find any grounds to justify according the complaint precedence over other business. If some Hon. Members feel they were misled, they have avenues available to them to pursue their complaints. I would emphasize that it is possible to be misled without being deliberately misled. As Hon. Members know, if there were any suggestion of dishonest motivation, which in this case there was not, the only course would be to give notice of a substantive motion setting out the accusation in precise terms. The fact is that we are faced with a political issue on which views are deeply divided. This is not an unusual situation in this House and, unless any action were taken to infringe our right of free debate and free expression, we are not dealing with a matter involving privilege.

To conclude, I think it is fair for the Chair to observe that if one considers the two statements made there is some basis for Hon. Members to feel perhaps that the situation was not as clear as they might otherwise have wished it to be. I thank the Hon. Member and others for their interventions.

ALLEGED ACCOSTMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I raise a very serious question of privilege. When I attempted to leave the Chamber less than two minutes ago I was physically accosted by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) and called a liar. I expect both an apology for the physical accostment and the use of that word.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has raised a very serious allegation. I might begin by asking the Hon. Member if this alleged incident was in or out of the Chamber.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, one of the Pages gave me a phone message and I went and picked up line two. I was just hanging up the phone when the Minister came up behind me, called me a liar, and then grabbed me. He is lucky I didn't loosen his teeth.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I guess the first thing I should note is that it is the last day of the session. I also note that the Hon. Minister has come into the Chamber. Perhaps he could adequately and satisfactorily resolve the problem by making a statement.

Point of Order—Mr. Clark (Yellowhead)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would like to respond to the concern raised by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). I would begin by indicating that I would not be one to physically accost another Hon. Member, certainly not a fellow Member from British Columbia, and one who could probably do a pretty fine job on me if I were even to attempt to do something.

Mr. Oberle: I don't know about that.

Mr. Siddon: Second, I did not call the Hon. Member a liar. What I referred to the Hon. Member was my concern over a statement he is alleged to have made in British Columbia. To quote from a Canadian Press story datelined Terrace, British Columbia, it reads:

> New Democrat Jim Fulton said Thursday in his home riding that "Siddon has initialled a tentative agreement with the Aluminium Company of Canada regarding water flows in the Nechako River in northwestern British Columbia." He went on to say, "The deal will allow Alcan to release only half the amount of water that fisheries department scientists calculate is needed to ensure the survival of salmon stocks in the river."

Furthermore, in a statement in this House last Thursday the Hon. Member for Skeena said, and I am quoting from page 7601 of Hansard:

> The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) has now sold out to Alcan with a private deal on water flows at only one-half of what his own scientists filed in court as the minimum required.

I categorically say to this House that there has been no agreement signed with Alcan regarding the Nechako water flows or the river diversion project. There are discussions under way of which the Hon. Member was apprised in a full briefing yesterday. No document has been initialled. In that respect, if he stands up in this House and alleges there has, then I could say he is misleading this House.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to put my seat on the line that in the lobby the Minister called me a liar, and he had bloody well better withdraw it.

Mr. Friesen: Oh, wonderful!

Some Hon. Members: Grandstanding!

Mr. Speaker: We are faced with an allegation by an Hon. Member that another Hon. Member has called him a liar outside the Chamber, as well as there being some physical altercation. There seems to be disagreement between the Hon. Member and the Hon. Minister as to what took place. There is certainly a disagreement between them with respect to another matter. Whatever was said was not said in the Chamber and the Chair did not hear it. Neither did other Hon. Members. Whatever happened, happened outside the Chamber and was not seen by the Chair or by other Hon. Members.

I invite both the Minister and the Hon. Member, who are both well and favourably known to the Chair as fellow British Columbia Members of Parliament, to retire perhaps to one or the other of the lobbies—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: —and perhaps settle their differences, ensuring that in whatever way they do so they stay out of the Chamber.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POINT OF ORDER

SUGGESTED CORRECTION TO STATEMENT OF MEMBER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) prefaced important questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) with a rendition of events in my Province of Alberta which may not have been correct. As I understood it, he suggested that a Member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta had been censured by that assembly for using French in the Legislature. My understanding is that the censure had to do with a failure to uphold the authority of the Chair. I think that is a material difference about which the House and the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier, who has now taken his seat, would want to take note.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister responded to a question of principle. He clearly indicated the attitude of our Government with respect to the official languages, as well as our commitment and determination to promote the expansion of the official languages. As a Member from Alberta, I have been in a position to see for myself that my Alberta colleagues here in this House and the great majority of my fellow citizens in Alberta share this attitude of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I consider that the Minister is raising a point of debate, but since he took the floor I should like to point out to the House that the work done by the Member for Ottawa—Vanier in this case is based on reports and letters to the Speaker of the Alberta Legislative Assembly, to Mr. Piquette of Alberta, to an impressive number of people, associations and representatives of such various interest groups as the Fédération des francophones hors Québec, Alliance Québec, and other groups.

I accept the remark of the Member, namely that when MLA Léo Piquette spoke French in the Chamber he was called to order by the Speaker who said: In English, please. Then Léo Piquette had to comply. The matter was referred to a parliamentary committee on procedure and Standing Orders. The committee demanded that Mr. Piquette apologize. And that is where the matter stands today.

Reports in yesterday's Le Devoir, La Presse and other newspapers indicate that it was Mr. Piquette who said yesterday, in answer to a question, that he was 80 per cent uncertain as to whether he would apologize for having used his mother tongue in the Chamber. I happen to know that sanctions which may be used against Mr. Piquette range from a fine to imprisonment, and even the suspension of his parliamentary privileges. And this is due to the fact that the Speaker intervened and directed a parliamentary committee to review the whole question of official languages in Alberta.

I am not passing judgment on the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly. I am seeking the assistance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) with respect to the application of a basic principle, and the Prime Minister, being one of those who has been generous and understanding over the years, will surely agree with me that the right to speak French or English anywhere in this country is a basic right of all Canadians. I would suggest that a Member of a Legislative Assembly—in Ontario, in Quebec, in Alberta, or elsewhere—has the right to speak in his mother tongue without being harassed by his colleagues.

So, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see what the point of order which was raised is all about, but if we are to debate the issue I would be prepared to share my notes with the Minister and tell him why I raised this question in the House today. It is a matter of national interest, it is a question which concerns minorities and which happens to be the subject of a parliamentary initiative on the part of the Government which introduced a very important bill last week, a measure which, at first blush, I am very pleased to support.

There is no doubt that Mr. Piquette's rights were encroached upon, I believe they were. So it becomes a point of debate as to whether his rights were encroached upon, and I think so. Must he apologize? I do not think so.

• (1520)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) for their remarks. I know that they are completely at one in terms of the general principle. The Right Hon. Secretary of State was clearly rising to indicate that the facts were complex and that perhaps not all the facts had been brought forward in the questioning earlier of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). I thank both the Minister and the Hon. Member for their interventions.

PERMANENT AND PROVISIONAL STANDING ORDERS

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH STANDING COMMITTEE FOR THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with the House Leaders opposite and I think you would find a disposition of the House to accept a proposal which would amend the Standing Orders and have the effect of establishing a Standing Committee for the Disabled and the Handicapped. I think this is something all Hon. Members would welcome.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The proposal is as follows:

That Standing Order 89(2) be amended by inserting after the line "(d) Consumer and Corporate Affairs" the line:

"(e) Disabled and Handicapped" and that all subsequent lines be relettered accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Mazankowski) have the unanimous consent of the House to move his motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express the appreciation of the Liberal caucus that this move has been made to establish a permanent committee on the disabled and the handicapped. I commend the Government for this move. In addition, that particular committee has always displayed a very fine spirit of nonpartisanship. I want also to commend you, Mr. Speaker, for the outstanding leadership you have given in this field in terms of making the House of Commons a more accessible and fairer place for the disabled and the handicapped to enjoy and participate in.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille).

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the remarks of the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) and express my appreciation and that of my caucus to the House Leaders of all Parties in the House for agreeing to establish the Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped as a permanent committee of the House.

This was the unanimous request of the committee as well as of disabled individuals and organizations representing them who have appeared before this committee over the years.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to express my appreciation and that of the committee for the full support that you have given to the committee and to the issues with which that committee deals.

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my appreciation to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) and my colleagues in the other two Parties with regard to this move. Indeed, it is a milestone in the awareness in this country of handicapped and disabled people. Those in the field understand fully that in the next five to seven years there will be a revolution with regard to the way in which handicapped and disabled people will be able to gain access to and participate in our society. The standing committee will be a major vehicle through which those changes will be mirrored. I, therefore, want to thank the House for its participation in this issue.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Minister. Under the circumstances, perhaps the Chair can observe for the record that all Hon. Members join in the general sense that that which we have just heard with regard to the handicapped is indicative that Hon. Members in this place are seriously working toward the resolution of these problems and a better life for these of our fellow Canadians. It is of significance that this matter has obtained the unanimous support of all Members of this place.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following Bills, without amendment: Bill C-15, an Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act; Bill C-21, an Act to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Competition Act, to repeal the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof; Bill C-42, an Act respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system; and Bill C-66, an Act to establish the Veterans Appeal Board and to amend other Acts in relation thereto.

PATENT EXTENSION (ASPARTAME) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

On the Order: Private Members' Business

June 29, 1987—Consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-259, an Act to extend the terms of a patent relating to a certain food additive.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This proposal requires the unanimous consent of the Chamber.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have a question. I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary who introduced the Bill can give us some explanation as to the public interest in the Bill. A spokesperson for the Consumers' Association of Canada expressed concern over the legislation, and then a spokesman for the manufacturers of soft drinks indicated the same thing, and a spokesman for the Canadian Food Manufacturers Association, Mr. Don Jarvis, took a similar position. Mr. Speaker, I wonder, if, before giving unanimous consent, the Hon. Member could possibly explain how the public interest was protected in the Bill.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I appreciate the Hon. Member's concern in terms of trying to seek clarification. I would not be opposed to a very short, succinct, two-minute clarification as to what the intent might be, but I check for your guidance as to when you will call for unanimous consent for this Bill to be heard in the Chamber. That is the key.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I want to re-emphasize that we must have unanimous consent. I am preoccupied with this Bill. It concerns Aspartame, a cancer-causing drug, and we are giving an extension for five years to a company, with unanimous consent of the NDP and Liberal Parties. The critic for the NDP, who is the critic on the Patent Act, suddenly lost his principles. I cannot give unanimous consent to that Bill.

Mr. Speaker: The Bill cannot proceed without unanimous consent. I notice a number of Members rising. I take it from what the Hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) said, that at least at the moment he is not prepared to give unanimous consent. The Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy) has indicated the same thing.

Mr. Dingwall: As well as I, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As well as the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) and others.

However, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) was seeking the floor. I will hear him.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make a short intervention. I am disappointed that things have deteriorated to this extent. I cast the blame right at the desk of the Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy).

If he is going to be straightforward with Members of the House, he will know that this originally was a decision made by the coming together of the three political Parties. The best information we had at the time indicated that this was an appropriate initiative to support.

It was in the best spirit of the House that the Conservative Party, Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party worked together. That Member is essentially casting allegations against selective Members. I want to make it very clear that that might not have been the best decision we made collectively in the House, but it was made unanimously and that Member supported it.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion has been made that we proceed with this Bill. It cannot be done without consent. I will put the question to the House. Is the House prepared to give unanimous consent to proceeding with this Bill?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: That ends the matter. I do not need to take any more points of order on this particular matter, but I will certainly recognize the Hon. Member for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier).

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of the Bill, I approve the comments made by the New Democratic Party, which stated this was a collective Bill in this House. However, the Bill now before the House is not the same that was introduced previously. What we now have before us at this point, the amended Bill, is not the same legislation that passed the other day in this House and that eventually was turned down by the Senate and that came back in amended form.

Mr. Speaker, I am tremendously sorry that the long arm of the Liberal Party in the Senate blocked the bill and sent it back in amended form, it would have been possible to be fair both to the business side and the justice side, but since we cannot have unanimous consent in this House, I must yield to its will.

However, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that people in LaSalle and Ville-Émard will remember for a long time the long arm of the federal Liberal Party in the Senate that blocked job creation in the constituency for people in LaSalle and Ville-Émard. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, we will remember that when the time comes. Happy Confederation Day!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It may very well be a matter of regret for some Hon. Members that consent could not be obtained. Clearly, however, consent has not been obtained and that is the end of the issue. The Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) is seeking the floor. I will hear the Hon. Member.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, I just want to add my voice of concern to the issue that is now before the House. As the House will recall, it was brought before the House just two weeks ago. It was received at first reading on one day, and the second day that it came before the House it passed second and third reading.

I believe substantial concern has been expressed by various Members in the House and, with all due respect to our friends from the NDP, my experience of yesterday shows that they obviously cannot be trusted to favourably put forth a position—

Mr. Speaker: All that was before the House was a very simple proposition, it is that this particular Bill be allowed to proceed.

For whatever reason, there is not consent. It may be a matter of regret or something else, but that is the end of the issue. I would ask Hon. Members to co-operate in not rising further on that particular matter.

I know that the Hon. Member for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier) has very strong feelings on the matter. He has expressed himself. I think that is all that the Chamber can deal with at this time.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Côté (Langelier) that Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to deal with Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

First of all, I should like to say that we are getting used to seeing this Conservative Government coming up at the very last minute with amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. Earlier in its mandate, in the Spring of 1985, the former Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Valcourt) had introduced a Bill to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act not for the purpose of improving it, but for limiting the possibility of Canadians taking advantage of this legislation to help finance small businesses.

What the Government was proposing at the time was to limit the amount of the guarantee. Previously, we had small businesses loans which were fully guaranteed by the Government but because of the amendment introduced by this Conservative Government in the Spring of 1985, the small businesses loans were guaranteed up to 85 per cent only. Madam Speaker, we indicated at the time that such a measure would reduce loan activities. Statitics now available show that we were right.

If we refer to the last report which the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion published on April 15, 1987, we see that, between April 1 and December 31, 1986, 6,780 loans were granted by chartered banks to small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act for a total amount of $557,196,962.

Compared with the same period in 1985, when there had been 18,444 loans totalling $560,133,192, there had been a considerable decrease between 1986 and 1985. This was following the Government's amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Today, this Conservative Government is asking us to approve, very quickly as usual, a Bill calling for the merging under the Small Businesses Loans Act of the legislation which used to make it possible for fishermen to obtain loans to improve their equipment and operation.

If we compare both legislations, the old one which is expiring today and the new one which will come into force tomorrow, the $30 million global ceiling will be replaced by a $2.5 billion global ceiling.

But the difference is not that overall ceiling, concerning which the Government even at that point, in 1985, stated: Come now, we are increasing that big ceiling. What does that give us, a higher overall ceiling, when in fact all the other requirements do not allow Canadians to use the benefits in that act, which means less use? And we see immediately that under the previous act, one could have loans up to a maximum of $150,000, but that has now been reduced to $100,000.

We see for instance that the term to repay, which was 15 years, is now reduced to 10 years. And there is, of course, as I said, that famous 85 per cent guarantee, which used to be 100 per cent. Not to mention, of course, as previous speakers emphasized, the 1 per cent that must be paid up front to get those loans. But that is subject, Madam Speaker, to small business loans to the fishing sector declining sharply, more so than in the so-called SMB sectors.

This is why we oppose the legislation, Madam Speaker, and will introduce amendments to correct those gaps. I hope the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism—and this is one of his first opportunities as Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism to take part in the discussion of a Bill he is directly responsible for—will support our amendments, which of course would give us an act that at least will meet in part the needs of Canadians.

I would like to take this opportunity to state that on this side of the House, in the final report our task force on small businesses released this month, we are still expecting the Government report, the report of the task force that was established in 1985.

We are still waiting for the official report, although we were able to obtain a photocopy of this report which was printed in 1986 and which the Government is still refusing to make public.

I should like to say that in this report, it is clearly indicated that the Small Businesses Loans Act was to be amended to provide for a $150,000 ceiling instead of the $100,000 ceiling.

Therefore, in regions such as the Maritimes and British Columbia, as well as such distant Quebec regions as the Gaspe, the guarantee will amount to 100 per cent instead of 85 per cent. It is possible that in urban areas it will be easier, in view of the greater number of financial institutions.

In this report, therefore, we have established . . . we suggest the principle of having a guarantee ranging from 85 per cent up to 100 per cent, based on the regions and the needs.

I ask the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, both during this debate and his study in committee, to consider this proposal and amend this Bill to make it more practical for its users.

For the time being, I conclude my remarks on this, but I will certainly have the opportunity to make others both in committee and at the third reading stage.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I want to praise the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Valcourt) for his initiative and his dedication to small businesses.

The fact remains that small businesses are the foundation of our industry. The larger corporations are not there to help us.

What surprises me, for instance, is that recently . . .

• (1540)

[English]

I would say what astonished me lately is that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) had supported Bill C-259—

Mr. Riis: Point of order.

Mr. Kindy: —and it was a big corporation he was supporting.

Mr. Riis: I simply want to encourage you, Madam Speaker, to encourage Hon. Members to stick to the topic being discussed. We are debating the extension of the Small Businesses Loans Act. The Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy) is going back to a decision the Speaker made a few moments ago. He has to learn the rules of Parliament. I would advise him to sit down and open up the Standing Orders and read them. I suspect he is capable of that. I would urge him, if he is going to be a parliamentarian, at least to learn the rules of Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy) is just about ready to join the two propositions together.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I am surprised that when referring to small businesses which are the backbone of our society, because they create more jobs—that is why I am in empathy with them—and I think the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism is doing an excellent job—but I cannot help mentioning larger corporations which are certainly important but which do not create quite as many jobs as small businesses do.

That is why I referred to the Monsanto Company of St. Louis, Missouri, which, I think, is an international company which is supported by the New Democratic Party. I find this quite surprising.

I wish to conclude on this and congratulate again the Minister.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member who has just spoken, I am sure inadvertently, is misleading the House with respect to important legislation. That Hon. Member could indeed have spoken or voted against the legislation to which he is now speaking. I suggest that he end his hypocrisy and explain to the House why he is not prepared—

Mr. de Corneille: Order.

Mr. Robinson: —to tell the truth on this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question regarding Bill C-251 was settled earlier. We are now discussing Bill C-63.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is as follows: Mr. Valcourt (in the name of Mr. Côté (Langelier)), seconded by Mr. Epp, moves that Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to a Committee of the Whole. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Adopted on division.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 78, I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

• (1550)

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-63, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Clauses 1 and 2 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 3

Mr. Baker: Madam Chairman, can the Minister please explain what the purpose of Clause 3 is?

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Chairman, the present wording as stated in paragraph (3)(2)(d) is identical to that shown in Clause 3(1) except for the words "under this Act and guaranteed loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act". This amendment will require loans outstanding under FILA to be combined with those outstanding under the SBLA when determining whether a borrower has reached the $100,000 loan limit under the SBLA. That is the purpose of the clause.

Mr. Baker: Madam Chairman, can the Minister tell me whether or not a loan outstanding under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act would be a loan that is guaranteed under the Act? I am asking this question because the banks have gone over their limit for the past several years. Does this Act mean that the loans that were issued that are no longer under federal government guarantee are taken into account under the new Bill?

Mr. Valcourt: The short answer is no, Madam Chairman.

Mr. Baker: Madam Chairman, if the answer is no, then what loans would come under the Act? There are no loans out that are guaranteed after the limit was surpassed by the major lending institutions. In other words, would a fisherman who had a loan out, let us say on the North Shore of Quebec, who has been notified by the banks over the past two or three years since this Government came into power that his loan is no longer guaranteed by the bank because the limit has been reached now have to go back and get some life insurance on the loan because the federal Government no longer guarantees the loan? In other words, is the Minister saying that that is then not taken into account? Why would he take into account something that is guaranteed by the federal Government? There is nothing guaranteed by the federal Government under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act right now. I am asking the Minister what is guaranteed if the limits have been surpassed.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Chairman, I never thought I would have to explain to my learned friend, the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate, how this Act operates. When a loan is made under the Small Businesses Loans Act the lender has to meet certain criteria. He has to make a business decision, which any banker must make, whether or not he will make a loan and have it guaranteed under the Act. There is no red tape. There is no bureaucracy here. It is a banker making a decision to lend or not to lend money to a fisherman. If he decides to grant a loan and seeks to have it registered under the Act, then when it is registered the loan is guaranteed.

The question of limit only arises when the cumulative guarantees taken all together reach a certain stage. Right now, for example, under the Small Businesses Loans Act the authority under the Act to give guarantees is $2.5 billion. I do not know exactly but we may be at $1.3 billion right now. So loans out there may be granted and registered up to the limit of $2.5 billion. But those who were turned down by the lender, they were not guaranteed. But those which have been registered and which comply with the regulations and the Act are guaranteed and they cannot be affected by a subsequent reaching of the limit under the Act or the regulation.

I hope that I am clear on this.

Mr. Baker: Under the old Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, which the present legislation will replace, a fisherman could receive a $150,000 loan. Under this legislation he can receive only a $100,000 loan. Does this mean for all fishermen who have, as the Minister puts it, loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program, that now they have reached their limit and they can no longer get a loan under this legislation?

We have the best drafters of legislation probably in the world. It is not the drafters who are at fault. It is the people who fed them the information who are at fault, the policy-makers. There is no such thing as somebody who has a guarantee under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. There is no such thing as going in to a bank and getting a guarantee in writing under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. There is no such animal alive in the federal Government. There is no such thing.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act covers the banker. If there were a slip of paper that showed that a fisherman had a guarantee under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, then I would take all of those fishermen now into court and sue the Government of Canada for not respecting its guarantee. The reason they cannot do that is because the Government of Canada says that it guarantees the banks up to a certain limit of pay-out.

• (1600)

Beyond that, all of the bad loans made by the banks are no longer guaranteed by the federal Government, and the federal Government will no longer make the payments to the bank. The result is that there is no fisherman who has his loan guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

How would one know whether a loan was guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act? If you go to the banks and ask for the number of loans guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, they are unable to tell you. They would not know which loans were guaranteed. If there were two loans, one taken out 10 years ago and one taken out 5 years ago, both in default, whichever loan went into default first would be covered under the guarantee, and only provided the federal Government has not already paid out the full amount under that guarantee. So, there is no one who is guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in respect of any loan at any chartered bank in this country.

How do we tell someone that they qualify for a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act because the limit under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has not been reached? There is no such thing. There is no such thing as a guarantee under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act because one does not know whether it is guaranteed until it goes into default, and it is then only guaranteed if the banks have not already collected from the federal Government the limit it sets on those guarantees. In other words, there is no such thing as a fisheries improvement loan that a fisherman has that is guaranteed by the federal Government. There is simply no such thing.

Each individual bank, under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, has moneys that it can put out by way of loans to fishermen; but if a given bank puts out beyond 10 per cent of the total amount allocated for such loans and there is a default in excess of the limit that it has, then the loans are no longer guaranteed by the federal Government.

When a loan is taken out, the fisherman does not get a sheet of paper saying that his loan is guaranteed by the federal Government. If they had that, I could then say to all of the fishing enterprises in eastern Canada which have received letters saying that their loans are no longer guaranteed that they would have another remedy. These enterprises have simply received letters from the banks saying that the loans that are outstanding are no longer guaranteed because the banks have surpassed the guarantee level.

If I had a sheet of paper setting out that fisherman X has a loan guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, I could then sue the federal Government on the basis of that guarantee.

Mr. Valcourt: Sue for what?

Mr. Baker: All of those 1,500 fishing enterprises could sue the federal Government if they had such a piece of paper. If they have in their hands a piece of paper saying that their loans are guaranteed and the bank turns around and demands payment now because they are no longer guaranteed by the federal Government, they could then sue.

Mr. Valcourt: Sue for what? They are the borrowers.

Mr. Baker: The Minister has asked a very interesting question. Perhaps I can explain it to him.

An Hon. Member: Good luck!

Mr. Baker: In the case of a fisherman who took out a bank loan for the purchase of fishing gear and the fisherman then went into default on that loan, the bank could move in and seize his gear. Because of the bad year in the fishery, the fisherman cannot make the payments. He has no choice but to let the bank take the gear. The bank would then put that gear up for sale, and the proceeds from the sale may only amount to one-third of what it is owed. In that situation, the bank then goes to the federal Government and requests, under the guarantee, the balance of the loan outstanding. In other words, the banks make a claim under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Let's assume for the sake of the discussion that the bank in question is the Royal Bank of Canada. The Fisheries official then requests of the Royal Bank information in relation to the lending period in respect of which the loan was issued and the amount of money that the bank has received under the guarantee in that same lending period.

If the amount received by the bank is under the limit that it has been assigned under the guarantee, the Government of Canada would then issue a cheque to the Royal Bank of Canada for the balance of that loan. However, if the Royal Bank of Canada has gone over the limit established in the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, the federal Government then takes the position that the guarantee no longer applies.

In that circumstance, the Royal Bank is not going to sit back and accept the loss of two-thirds of the loan. It would only do that where it is a default on the part of a lender from another country. The bank, in that circumstance, will then go after the borrower for the balance of the loan. It will turn around and say to the fisherman: "You took out a loan with us which went into default, and we were only able to recover one-third of the amount of the loan from the sale of your gear. Because we have gone over our limit under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, the federal Government refuses to pay us the balance under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act guarantee. As a result, we have to collect the balance from you. Either you pay up in 30 days, or we put an attachment on your property; we put an attachment on your home. We want the money now. We want the cold hard cash."

And the letters go out. In one case, there was a demand for $20,000; in another case, $30,000; in another case, $50,000; and in another case, $60,000. All of these individuals are making payments now as best they can, under whatever arrangements they could make with the chartered banks. All of the chartered banks are now doing this, every blinking single one of which is covered under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. In all, they are collecting from some 1,500 fishing enterprises in eastern Canada. As to how many there are in British Columbia, I do not know. I imagine there are quite a few.

The Government of Canada could have extended the guarantee. In light of the hard times in the fisheries sector over the last three years, it could have decided to extend the guarantee to cover all loans. But no such action was taken. We had a Progressive Conservative Government in power.

An Hon. Member: Bad news.

Mr. Baker: This Government refused to cover the loans. It took the position that it was no fault of the Government's that the banks had surpassed their limits under the guarantee. So, it chose to do nothing. In fact, it now brings in this Bill, doing away with the entire Fisheries Improvement Loans Program.

I come back to the question: What, for goodness sake, is in this Bill? This Bill says that one can get a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Program if one does not have a guaranteed loan under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. How does the fisherman know whether or not his loan is guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act unless he defaults? The Bank will not tell him whether or not it is guaranteed. The bank itself does not know until he defaults and a claim is made. There is no such thing as a guarantee. What is contained in the clauses of this Bill, Clause 2, Clause 3, makes no sense at all.

How do we, then, arrive at the amount of money? If a gentleman goes into a bank and asks for a $50,000 loan, the bank takes out the Act and says, "Do you have any guaranteed loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act?" The fellow says, "I don't know". Then he is asked with which bank he was dealing when he got his gear, whether it was the Bank of Nova Scotia or some other bank, and then he is told to check it out because they do not know.

If nobody knows whether it is guaranteed, if the person does not know whether it is guaranteed until he defaults, and if he does not know whether he will receive his payment until he defaults, how can it be in the Act?

I would like an answer to that very succinct question.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Chairman, I do not know whether I have the time to explain all the details of the Act to the Hon. Member. He seems to believe that the loans made under the Act are not tracked down. When a loan is made it is registered, and when it is registered, it is considered to be a guaranteed loan under the Act. If there is default and if it has met the criteria established by regulation, which the bank has, it will be covered in the case of deficiency.

The Hon. Member seems to think that this is only triggered in the case of default and that there is no tracking beforehand. There is, and this is why, at a given point in time, the Department can tell the banks to stop, that they have reached the limit of guarantee, not of defaults. When we look at the defaults under the Act, we see that there is very little. The Department can inform the bank that the limit of guarantee has been attained. This is because they are being tracked, and that should provide the Hon. Member with his answer.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Chairman, as I indicated to the Minister in second reading, I have a few amendments to propose. Before doing so, I would like to indicate that the old Bill has a 100 per cent guarantee and that under the Small Businesses Loans Act there is an 85 per cent guarantee. Perhaps the Minister could assist me before I put my amendments, because there is no specific paragraph or clause in Bill C-63 which mentions the difference between the 100 per cent guarantee and the 85 per cent guarantee.

Mr. Valcourt: Are we on Clause 3, or can the Hon. Member deal with any section of the Act?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Hon. Member's question should relate to Clause 3.

Mr. Gagliano: Before putting my amendments I would like the Minister to clarify the difference between the 100 per cent guarantee and the 85 per cent guarantee. It cannot be found in Clauses Nos. 3, 4, or 5—anywhere in the Bill. Will fishermen have a loan guarantee of 100 per cent or 85 per cent? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Valcourt: When a Bill before the House intends to modify only certain sections of the Act, only those sections are reflected.

The section about which the Hon. Member is talking is in the Act but it is not one of those which are being amended. I cannot tell him how he should procedurally try to make an amendment in this regard; it is not my job.

Mr. Gagliano: Then I will move my amendments. I regret that we cannot get more information. This is the type of thing that happens when we pass Bills at the last moment. The difference between a loan guarantee of 100 per cent and one of 85 per cent is very important, especially where fishermen are concerned. However, because of the technical problem, we are unable to present a specific amendment to the portion dealing with the loan guarantee. Hopefully we will have another chance to come back to it.

Therefore I move:

That Bill C-63, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 5 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"one hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

As I mentioned earlier, this is to ensure that the limit of each loan will be $150,000. As the Small Businesses Loans Act now stands it is $100,000, and we propose that it should be $150,000 as was the case before under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I think we should take this opportunity to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act in that regard. The amount of $100,000 was set under the Act in 1980. If we take into consideration only the inflation from 1980 to 1987, it is normal that it should be $150,000.

I hope the Minister will support such an amendment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the Hon. Member have other amendments which he wishes to introduce at this time?

Mr. Gagliano: Yes, Madam Chairman. I move:

That Bill C-63, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 19 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"knowledge, did not exceed one hundred and fifty"

It is a technical amendment which goes along with the one I proposed before. Also I move:

That Bill C-63, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 24 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"not more than fifteen years after the date of"

This is to comply with the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act so that they have 15 years to repay their loans, since it is a reasonable length of time on a long-term loan. Under the Small Businesses Loans Act it is 10 years, so I have moved that the 15-year term should apply in the case of fisheries.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: To facilitate everyone, and with the permission of the Hon. Member, perhaps it would be easier to change the order in which he presented his amendments. Perhaps the first one could be the one striking out line 19 at page 2, followed by the one striking out line 24 at page 2, and finally the one striking out line 5 at page 3. Do I have the agreement of the mover and the seconder to do that?

Mr. Gagliano: Yes, Madam Chairman. I apologize. The amendments have been passed back and forth between my colleagues and I, and we must have inadvertently changed the order.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Chairman, before we consider the amendments, I would like the Chair to rule on whether they are in order.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair considers that the amendments are receivable. Mr. Gagliano moved:

That Bill C-63, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 19 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"knowledge did not exceed one hundred and fifty"

Is the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate.

Mr. Baker: Madam Chairman, I think the original motion is in the name of the official fisheries critic for the Official Opposition, the Hon. Member for Egmont.

• (1620)

Mr. Lewis: Madam Chairman, for my clarification, I heard you call the amendment and I heard the noes. Then the Hon. Member rose to speak. I want to know whether the Member is speaking on the amendment that, in my opinion, was just lost or is he speaking on the next amendment?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I did read the first amendment and asked the question before realizing that someone was rising on debate. We are debating the first amendment.

Mr. Baker: Madam Chairman, the Hon. Member will realize that you have to put the question before there can be any debate. Always. The question is put and then debate takes place. There cannot be any debate without the question being put. The Chair was absolutely correct in what the Chair did.

The first amendment, as I was saying, is proposed by the Member from Prince Edward Island, the official critic, the Hon. Member for Egmont. The Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou proposed the amendment in his place because he is the small business critic for the Official Opposition.

The amendment is very important because it maintains the limits that were present under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program which is being discontinued by the Government and is being replaced by the Small Businesses Loans Act, which is a loans program for all small businesses in Canada regardless of what they do, whereas the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program was a specific loans program which had a specific responsibility toward fishing enterprises. Under that particular Act, the fishermen will lose their guarantee of up to $150,000 because under this Act the limit is $100,000. That is the main purpose of the motion proposed by the Hon. Member.

The other reason that this amendment is so important is that the guarantee is not as great as it was under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program. As well, no fee had to be paid under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program. By replacing one clause and one of the conditions to what they were under the original Fisheries Improvement Loans Program, which this particular Bill replaces, I suppose is trying to correct a wrong that has been dealt the fishermen of Canada by the Government in doing away with its loans program, knowing full well that the Partner Loans Program for farmers will be dealt with in this Chamber in a few moments time. But fishermen are wondering why there is a double standard for primary producers.

From 1945 there was the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act came 10 years later, in 1955. For the past 32 years everybody has operated on an equal footing. The farmers and the fishermen were guaranteed under legislation of the Parliament of Canada that they could walk into a bank and get a loan. Now, only the farmer will be able to walk into a bank and get a loan under the Farm Improvement Loans Program, which is to be dealt with in this Chamber in a few moments time. The fishermen will be left out in the cold. The fishermen will be left out in the boats all by themselves. They wonder why the double standard.

Why did the Government of Canada pick on the fishermen? Why did the Government set the fishermen adrift? Why is the Government dealing with the farmers in just the opposite way by letting them have their own loans program and guarantees? The fishermen of Canada have a right to know why. The Government of Canada gives them no reason. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism stood in the House and said, "This is what we have to do. We cannot give them $150,000 anymore, just $100,000. We cannot give them 100 per cent guarantees, only 80 per cent to 85 per cent". Now when the fishermen walk into the banks, they have to pay to get a loan. When the fishermen go into a bank now, out of their own pockets they will have to lay down some money for the fee that has to be paid by the bank. The bank will not charge the fee. The bank will pay a fee in order to take advantage of the loans program to secure 85 per cent of their loan. The bank will see 85 per cent of $100,000 and consider for what type of individual. The banks will consider it a fishing enterprise, and note that fishing enterprises defaulted substantially in the past five years. The banks can say, "We all reached our limits, so why loan fishermen money at such a risk when we can loan money to someone who is not in the primary end of production but somebody who deals in nightclubs, for example? Why should we loan money to fishermen and take such a chance? Besides, fishermen will not have the fee to pay the banks anyway. Fishermen will probably turn to the finance companies.

Fishermen ask, why the double standard. Why is it if this Act will replace the old one that the limit is $100,000 and not $150,000? I know the New Democrats are anxious to have a few words about this atrocious Bill. I know the New Democrats are going to speak up now.

Mr. Nowlan: Give them a chance.

Mr. Baker: There is the Member from Nova Scotia who is concerned about his Nova Scotia fishermen. Here they are being discriminated against by the Government of Canada. The Member for Nova Scotia will not take that. He will stand up in a minute and he will criticize the Government of Canada. He will demand what the Hon. Member here proposed a few moments ago, namely, raise the limit to $150,000. The Member from Nova Scotia will stand up and do that because he is not going to take it on behalf of the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: Will you sit down so I might stand up?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: If that is a promise, I think perhaps I should sit down, Madam Chairman.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Chairman, I watched my friend, who is one of the more vibrant persons in the Opposition. I have been most entranced with what he has said and I agree with a lot of what he has said. I am awfully glad he sat down, and I am going to sit down too.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Chairman, it is not often that I get a chance to speak on a fisheries matter. I do not know or claim to know a great deal about the fisheries. I do note that there is a principle being used in this Act that the Government is attempting to implement in the other improvement loans acts, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and I want to say a few words about the principle. I think it is a bad principle on which the Government is embarking with user fees which attempt to pay part of the cost of insuring the loan insurance which the Government provides to the lending institutions.

With the Farm Loans Act, which we will be coming to, the Government is proposing initially to put a half of 1 per cent of the loan into the insurance fund. The same principle is being applied here with the Fisheries Loans Act. For all parliamentarians, whether fishermen, farmers or those responsible for speaking on behalf of fishermen or farmers it is an even larger principle, namely, the principle being enshrined in these acts. It is one of permitting the Minister and the Government of the day, whatever day it might be, to change the particular fee to any level the Government wishes. It is listed nominally at half a point, but the Bill then goes on to explain "Or other rate that the Minister or the Government of the day may determine".

• (1630)

That is not exactly consistent with parliamentary process. The function of Parliament is supposed to be to authorize the Government to levy taxes, but it does not normally levy taxes with an open-ended agreement. It does not meet once a year and say: "Here is authority to collect whatever taxes you want." There is usually a limit to the amount permitted by the Act. This Bill and the Farm Improvement Loans Bill which will perhaps follow later on today has no such limit on the Minister or the Government. It simply gives them authority to set that particular fee, and that is a form of taxation, I submit. I think it really stretches the practices and usual procedures of Parliament. That was why I wanted to speak on this particular aspect of the loans Bill and to call attention to the same principle which is being attempted to be applied in other loans Acts that may be presented to the House later this day.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Gagliano) negatived: yeas, 12; nays, 22.

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Chairman, I simply want to point out that Members are going in and out during divisions. Some Members came in during division, which is irregular and contrary to the Standing Orders. I hope this practice will end before the next divisions.

Mr. St. Julien: Madam Chairman, it is the same thing on the Opposition side. I saw Members going in and out. They are doing the same thing on the other side.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The question is now on the second amendment. Mr. Gagliano, seconded by Mr. Baker, moved:

That Bill C-63, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 24 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"not more than 15 years after the date of".

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Mr. Baker: Madam Chairman, this motion was originally put by the official critic for the Official Opposition in the name of the Hon. Member for Egmont and then, during debate on the Bill, was put by the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou, who is the critic for the Small Businesses Loans Act. This amendment attempts to take back one more of the things that were removed by this Bill but were originally in the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, and that is the period of time required for repayment.

The Government has imposed more restrictions on the borrowing of the money. It has imposed a fee upon the borrower and has told the borrower that he will have to fix up with the bank the remaining 15 per cent that the Government cannot guarantee, and then the Government turned around and said that even though he cannot borrow as much money, he has to pay it back in a shorter period of time. That is why the fisheries critic and the small businesses critic of the Official Opposition proposed this particular amendment. They were simply trying to get back a small portion of what the Government removed from the loans program that was designed for fishermen and had been in place for 32 years.

The other instance when this amendment becomes very important is when the amount of the repayment will increase substantially, and this will cause the bank to want payment more quickly during bad seasons. The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has no such arrangement. In the off-season when the ice was in all around the coastline and fishermen could not get out and could not make payments to the bank under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, there was always a mechanism for the Government of Canada to talk to the banks and make arrangements for fishermen to pay when they could afford to pay during that season. Under the Small Businesses Loans Act, no such arrangement will be made. The fisherman will either have to pay up or he will lose his equipment, his boat or whatever he borrowed money to purchase under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Unless the Government turns around and says it will guarantee 100 per cent of the loan and it will lengthen the period for repayment, then I believe that fishermen will not be issued any loans by the chartered banks in Canada. This motion would simply give back what the Government is again taking away at a bad time for the fishermen of Canada.

I would say that not one Hon. Member should disagree with this amendment. What earthly reason would someone have to disagree with it? Would it be loyalty to the Parliamentary Secretary to the government House Leader or to the Minister responsible for small businesses? What reason would even the Minister have for turning down this amendment? There is no reason whatsoever. However, I am sure he will now rise to tell us why he is opposed to this amendment. It is his Bill. He should at least tell us why he is opposed to stretching the repayment period from 10 years to the 15 years fishermen were always used to.

I would also expect the standard support from members of the New Democratic Party for this excellent amendment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those opposed to the motion please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Gagliano) negatived.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: We shall now move to the next question. Mr. Gagliano, seconded by Mr. Baker, moved:

That Bill C-63, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 5 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"one hundred and fifty thousand dollars".

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those in favour please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Gagliano) negatived.

• (1640)

Mr. Baker: Point of order. I wonder if the Chair can explain why it changed the pattern of voting on this clause.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: There were two ways of doing it. The first time I did not call the yeas and nays and count the votes. If Hon. Members had wanted a count I certainly would have asked for it. As I was told the amendment was negatived on division a count was not necessary.

Shall Clause 3 now carry?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion) moved that Bill C-63, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When shall the Bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Valcourt (for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Madam Speaker, this Bill receiving third reading is one of the worst Bills presented to the House of Commons probably in this century.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: It is a black mark against fishermen. I am surprised at certain Members from fishing provinces where hundreds of fishermen thought they had guarantees from the Government. They do not have money to spare. They are not rich people. They do not get a guaranteed income like Members of Parliament do. They do not get a salary cheque every month. They are at the whim of the weather, the fish, international affairs, the French, American and Russian fishing fleets, and the European Economic Community. Now we see the Government of Canada removing the only guaranteed loans program they had. The Government has removed the guarantee and put in a fee. It has created two classes of primary producers. We have just dealt with the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program and told the fishermen of Canada what we are going to do with them, and in a few minutes we are going to deal with the Farm Improvement Loans Program. The fishermen's program is thrown clean out the window.

You will notice that the two programs are almost identical, only one word is different. Yet that one word makes a big difference to the Government. The Government has said it is going to throw one Act out the window and reinstate the other one. The fishermen are going to wonder why.

Does anyone really believe that under this Act the fishermen in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland or P.E.I. are going to get a loan from a bank manager? Why would a bank manager issue a fisherman a loan under this piece of paper here? They will not. There is no 100 per cent guarantee. They are not going to issue the loan anyway because fishermen in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland today by the hundreds have been foreclosed on. They thought they had a guarantee under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program.

I must admit the banks are not being fair to the Government. They are telling the fishermen that the Government is at fault. The Government is not at fault. The Government had a limit for the banks and the banks should have known that. Yet now we have the ultimate movement by the Government of Canada to do away with the entire loans program for fishermen, but not the loans program for farmers. That will be re-enacted in a few moments in this Chamber.

The fishermen's program is now gone and one wonders why. There is only one conclusion I can come to. Apart from trying to save money, apart from the fact that the Government did not want to extend the guarantee to those poor fishermen who could not meet the demands for payment that they received in letters from big law firms—big law firms—

Mr. Horner: You said that.

Mr. Baker: Yes, I said it and I will say it a hundred times—from big law firms. They sent out these letters to the poor fishermen and told them to pay up in 30 days or they are going to be taken to court and their property seized. Instead of doing something about that under the program, the Government of Canada throws it out the window and says "We are going to cover fishermen under the Small Businesses Loans Act". That is the purpose of this Bill before us today.

The truth of the matter is that fishing enterprises were always considered under the Small Businesses Loans Act. If you are into aquaculture you get loans under that Act. Fishing enterprises were not covered substantially because of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program which held that better guarantee from the Government of Canada.

There is no need for this Bill at all, but the Government could not just leave it and say it is going to extend, because both the fishermen and farmers loan programs end today. Today! The Government could not say it was only going to extend the Farm Improvement Loans Program. It could not say that because that would be too blatant, too absolutely atrocious for the fishermen of Canada. No, the Government said that with the conclusion of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act it would officially put them under the Small Businesses Loans Program like any other business in Canada.

Today the fishermen of Canada are wondering why they are being tossed out the window with their loans program. This is only the continuation of long disregard by the Government for the fisheries of Canada. Fishermen of eastern Canada from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland know that foreigners are overfishing and that nobody will do anything about it. They have seen it for years. They know how bad it is now because no one will touch the French fleet. It is off bounds.

A 64-foot 10-and-one-half-inch Nova Scotian longliner was recently arrested for fishing in an area in which a boat has to be 65 feet in order to fish. It was an inch and a half too short. It was dragged into port in St. John's, Newfoundland, from Nova Scotia. The fisherman was fishing off the Grand Banks next to an American skipper. The fisheries officer said that they could not board the American vessel because the Americans are not members of NAFO. It is a Canadian resource but we do not arrest Americans. The Canadian skipper asked why they were arresting him. The fisheries officer said they were arresting him because he fell under their authority.

While the fellow was being dragged into port in St. John's, Newfoundland, he passed some of the French fleet fishing with no licence. The fisheries officer said that they could not touch them because that area was in dispute. The skipper asked why they were catching him if the area was in dispute. The fisheries officer said it was because he is a Canadian—not American, not French, but Canadian.

That is the attitude which prevails. Fishermen will not take it anymore. Last weekend their capelin quota ended at 15,000 tonnes and the Russian quota started at 17,000 tonnes. There are seven fish plants in Newfoundland today saying that they want to buy capelin because they have markets in Japan and Taiwan. The federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans said that it is sorry, but the quota was 15,000 tonnes. The fishermen said, "Yes, but you call it an under-utilized species". The federal Fisheries Department said that that is why it was given it to the Russians.

So the Russians can now start their quota at 17,000 tonnes and fish until December 31. The poor fishermen are sitting back, not allowed to catch capelin although they have licences, because the market quota is gone.

Today the Government of Canada has introduced another Act. The Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) and the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) will have a few words to say on that farm Bill. We are all anxious to see what is in it. I am sure there must be something bad in it because the Government is introducing it at the last minute. Maybe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) has more influence in Cabinet than has the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon), although I doubt that.

After 30 years the fishermen lose their guaranteed loans program. After 42 years the farmers will have theirs renewed and we will see in what form in a few moments. The Bill on which we are about to vote is not good for the fishermen of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think if you were to seek it you would find unanimous consent to revert to the introduction of Bills.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-83, an Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

CUSTOMS ACT

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue) moved that Bill C-80, an Act to amend the Customs Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this legislation. The purpose of this initiative is to enable the Government to improve working conditions in facilities at international bridges and tunnels with priority being given to Windsor, Ontario.

As Hon. Members know, these facilities have become outmoded over the years. Working conditions have deteriorated. It is necessary that the Government take action, if required, to improve working conditions and facilities to modern-day standards.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House welcome this Bill, especially in view of the interest which has been shown by the City of Windsor to have it passed. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the Opposition House Leader, has been advocating and working for the advancement of this Bill. We hope the Bill will receive speedy passage through the House this afternoon.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our caucus, and especially on behalf of the Members for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) and Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy), I would like to express our desire to have this legislation passed. We think it is necessary, not only to protect the right of the City of Windsor to ownership of the tunnel in the future, but also to improve working conditions for the people working there at this time. Many of us have seen television programs showing the deplorable condition and what is happening at this time. It is important that we use the strength of the Canada Labour Code to make sure that there are safe working conditions. If the owners of the tunnel are not willing to do it, the Canadian Government should.

WINDSOR-DETROIT TUNNEL—ACQUISITION BY CITY OF WINDSOR

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent) moved that Bill S-11, an Act respecting the acquisition, operation and disposal of the Windsor—Detroit Tunnel by the City of Windsor, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The proposed Private Bill cannot be called without unanimous consent.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties and I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to send the Bill to Committee of the Whole at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to sponsor Bill S-11, an Act respecting the Windsor—Detroit Tunnel. I am pleased that the Opposition Parties and the Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy) and the Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) in particular are allowing this Bill to pass today.

This Bill will allow the City of Windsor to purchase the Canadian half of the Windsor—Detroit Tunnel in 1990. This agreement was signed on April 24, 1928, between the City of Windsor and the company, following a Private Member's Bill of the Parliament of Canada, being Chapter 83 of the Statutes of Canada, 1927, to allow the tunnel to be built.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that our Party also supports this Bill, especially in view of the interest demonstrated by the City of Windsor, which requested that this legislation be passed by Parliament.

Our House Leader, the Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), has advocated and worked in favour of this legislation. We hope that it has easy passage through the House this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-78, an Act to increase the availability of loans for the purpose of the improvement and development of farms and the processing, distribution or marketing of farm products by co-operative associations, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is unanimous consent that the Bill be referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-78, an Act to increase the availability of loans for the purpose of the improvement and development of farms and the processing, distribution or marketing of farm products by co-operative associations, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

Shall Clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—Short title

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, in the interest of conserving time, I will be as brief as possible. However, I think we slipped from second reading into Committee of the Whole perhaps more rapidly than all of us expected.

In all fairness, I might say that immediately after receiving a copy of the Bill this morning, within 15 minutes I had arranged for a full briefing meeting with my two opposition critics and supplied them with all the information that I have.

I feel it would be appropriate for me to point out the changes in Bill C-78. Basically, there are six changes. Number one is a very beneficial change for Canadian farmers in that the borrowing limit has been raised from $100,000 to $250,000. The second significant change in this piece of legislation is that we propose to extend the definition of a "farmer" to include producers who have off-farm employment. I think the benefits of that particular change should be evident to all.

Number three, the other change which will be of benefit to Canadian farmers would be that the Bill would propose a refinancing option. In our consultation with the banking community and with some 40 odd groups in the agri-food industry, the observation was made that it would enhance the legislation if they could consolidate existing farm improvement loans and consolidate debts as well.

The fourth change is another significant change in that it would extend the opportunity for co-operatives. As many Hon. Members will know, there is a lot of processing activity that goes on in the country and also a lot of marketing activity. I think Hon. Members could reflect for only a moment or two within their own regions, within their own constituencies, and probably identify a number of farm co-operatives which could take advantage of this change.

The other change is a small minimal user fee of one half of 1 per cent. It should be noted that this change would mean a charge of $50 per $10,000 loan and there would be a $500 charge for a loan of $100,000. That is a once-in-a-loan-time fee.

The other change I want to note is that we are proposing in the Bill, as a shared risk provision, that the guarantee be to the extent of 95 per cent.

I thought it would be appropriate for me to make these few remarks at this time. I remind Hon. Members that this initiative will better serve the farm community by maintaining the prime plus one interest rate, by adding new financing options, by including producers with off-farm income by more than doubling the borrowing limit and by extending access for farm co-operatives in order to encourage processing and marketing initiatives. No doubt Members opposite will have some questions. I would invite them to make their remarks and pose their questions, and I will do my best to respond in as much detail as possible.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act which are being proposed here today, making it the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act, are being presented at a time when Canadian agriculture is facing the worst financial difficulties since the 1930s. The Farm Credit Corporation is broke. Legislation should be brought forward to put the Farm Credit Corporation on a sound financial basis. The mandate of the Farm Credit Corporation should be spelled out more clearly, as has been requested by all the Ministers of Agriculture across this country.

The corporation is in a negative equity position of some $120 million. It has arrears of another $355 million. I think the Minister should be giving some kind of commitment this afternoon that he will be addressing all of the problems of the Farm Credit Corporation and not just the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act which is before the House today. The Minister extended the life of the Farm Improvement Loans Act in December. He said he would be bringing forward a Bill with lots of time for consultation and discussion with the industry. Consultation with the Opposition Parties started this morning at about eleven o'clock. We now have a major Bill, with major implications, before the House and really no indepth consultation except a short briefing this morning.

I think it is important that when the Minister is bringing legislation before the House again that he be forewarned that we want time for consultation. I think there needs to be time for the agricultural community to make representations on legislation of this nature.

This legislation has some good things in it. It increases the limit from $100,000 to $250,000. It gives more guarantees to small lending institutions such as the Caisse Populaire and those smaller institutions. There is coverage, of course, for co-operatives. There is coverage for part-time farmers, although that was de facto allowed before. There are some glaring errors or lack of coverage in this Bill. For instance, it does not cover consolidation of operating loans and production loans. There is no help in that regard even though many farmers are facing serious financial difficulties in that respect.

The clause on page 5 of the Bill seems to discourage banks and lending institutions from giving a loan, even though they do have the opportunity of a loan guarantee if they would not normally give a loan to an individual producer. The coverage of the loan by the guarantee of the Government of Canada would only be 95 per cent whereas before it was 100 per cent. This means that banks which will not give these loans unless one is a very good friend of the banker will be that much more discouraged. Either that, or they will have to cover a lesser percentage of the assets which are being guaranteed. So that 95 per cent rather than 100 per cent guarantee will be a further discouragement to banks to give these loans, even though they are at preferred interest rates. That is a major loss or lack of benefit in this Bill.

I think we need to be looking at instruments or mechanisms to force the banks to give these loans if in fact the farmers are going to be able to get them. Surely by the end of the summer, if this legislation passes today, we will have a clear indication.

In Clause 7 we see that the amount of loans which can be given out of $1.5 billion is not increased even though co-operatives will be able to borrow up to $3 million additional money. It may well be that the limit will have to be enlarged in the years ahead if the co-operatives make use of this legislation on a massive scale. Otherwise, the farmers will not have any funds available under the provisions of the legislation to do that.

As I mentioned, there is no provision in the legislation before us today to force banks to give these loans. It is great to have a program of Government guarantees but if banks will not give the loans, it is really not of much use. I think it is important that the Government exercise whatever moral suasion it has, whatever power it has, to ensure that the banks provide these loans to producers.

I have heard of farmers who have gone to banks, told them the legislation is there and asked why they cannot get the loans. The banks give a litany of excuses. They say their quota is all used up or they do not know anything about it. They do their best not to utilize the Farm Improvement Loans Act because they receive only 1 per cent above prime, whereas under the menu of various kinds of farm loans they have available, they probably pick up 2 per cent or 3 per cent above prime. Clearly there is a need for this legislation but there is also a need to ensure that the banks make use of it.

There is no provision in this legislation for a fixed rate of interest. At a time of low inflation it seems to me that we should be trying to secure a fixed rate of interest under this legislation, perhaps for a five-year period, since most of the loans are small loans. The average loan is some $13,000.

The Minister is introducing as well a fee of one-half of 1 per cent or larger, whatever the Government would set by regulation, for the use of these loans. So not only does the farmer pay 1 per cent above prime, he pays one-half of 1 per cent to the Government of Canada as a service fee. It seems that at a time of severe financial crunch we should not be bringing in more user fees of this nature. On a loan of $250,000, the maximum a farmer would be required to pay in terms of a service fee would be $1,250. That is clearly beyond all reason at a time when Canadian agriculture is facing serious financial difficulties. I will certainly want to address this matter when we come to the clause of the Bill which deals with it.

I believe the coverage under the legislation for loans will be set at 80 per cent. The maximum loan a bank will provide for farm loans, that is, for assets, will be 80 per cent compared to 75 per cent for equipment. The present provision is 90 per cent for land, which will be reduced to 80 per cent. The present provision for equipment is 75 per cent, which will be raised to 80 per cent. So there is some improvement. But the amount of a loan that can be provided against assets for land will be reduced by 10 per cent, which is certainly a lessening of the benefit.

The existing legislation runs out today. The Government should have brought in this legislation several weeks ago when proper public hearings could have been held, when farmers could have come before the committee to analyse the issue more thoroughly. However, in spite of its lack of suitable provisions as regards restructuring of working capital and so on, as well as the introduction of the one-half of 1 per cent service fee, I think we would like to see the legislation go forward this afternoon. Without it farmers across the country who want to use farm improvement loans for the next two and a half months when the House is recessed will not have them available.

I have some questions which I would like to put to the Minister. Is the Minister prepared to bring in, by regulation, five-year fixed-rate loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act? This is something which would be extremely beneficial. I would like to know whether the Minister is willing to make that type of commitment today.

I would also like to know when the Minister will bring in legislation to regularize the desperate financial situation in which the Farm Credit Corporation finds itself. It has gone into a negative equity position. It needs restructuring. When will the Minister implement the 9 per cent interest rate which was proposed in the national agriculture strategy by the Ministers of Agriculture and which was approved by the First Ministers last December?

Can the Minister respond to some of the questions which I have asked when he gets to the point at which he will respond to questions on clauses of the Bill?

Mr. Wise: Perhaps I should take this opportunity to respond, Mr. Chairman. The Hon. Member for Algoma has raised questions on two subject areas. One is directly related to the Bill and the other is directly related to the Farm Credit Corporation.

It should come as no surprise to anyone why the financial liability of the Farm Credit Corporation is not as favourable as it once was. I think we have to draw the attention of Members to two of the main reasons for this. One of the main reasons is the fact that the previous Government's cabinet directive to the corporation gave it no choice but to be the lender of last resort. When it was given that mandate, not by choice but by the directive of the previous Government, it assumed some higher risk loans. That is one of the contributing factors.

The other reason is due to the refinancing that was necessary, again, by people who found themselves in some very difficult financial situations when interest rates, again under the previous Government, went from 10 per cent to 24 per cent. That in itself is an added input cost of well over $2 billion. Perhaps that is really as significant or even more significant than the shortfall that we have in grains and oilseeds.

The only measure that the previous Government took in response to the situation was the introduction of the special farm assistance program which assisted some 2,000 clients of the Farm Credit Corporation. However, additional costs were borne by other FCC clients. Since assuming office, we have introduced a special interest rate conversion program which amounts to a $80 million commitment. We have also introduced the shared-risk mortgage, the commodity-based loan and farm debt review legislation. We have also introduced farm debt review boards which are working, and working very well. We have also introduced the Canadian Rural Transition Program.

We have every intention of keeping the Farm Credit Corporation in business. The Hon. Member also mentioned another measure dealing with equity financing. The Hon. Member for Algoma will know, since more than likely he was a participating member of the study conducted by the Standing Committee which made a recommendation to the Government, that we are now dealing with that recommendation. We will have to respond to the House within a certain timeframe with respect to it. So we will be meeting that timeframe and responding, I think quite positively, with respect to other measures that could be taken with respect to equity financing. As the Hon. Member knows, there are other partners involved. We have been working with the provinces, primarily Saskatchewan and Alberta. This subject matter will be further discussed when I meet my provincial counterparts the second week of August in Quebec City.

With respect to the five-year fixed rate, yes, we are favourably inclined to give that matter serious consideration. I suppose that my only personal thoughts would be that if we do deal with it by regulation then that would leave the option open to the farmer. I suppose everyone thinks that he or she might have greater accuracy on crystal ball gazing, but hindsight and history have shown that quite often when one gets into crystal ball gazing one is quite often wrong. Again, I think probably the farmer in consultation with his banking institution might be the best two parties to determine whether or not they enter into an agreement with respect to a fixed-rate interest rate or whether it be on a floating basis.

Are we favourably inclined to looking at a regulation of that kind? The answer is "yes".

Mr. Foster: I find it interesting that the Minister talks about the five-year fixed rate. I point out to him that even at the bottom of the recession, 1981-82, a time when the inflation rate was 12 per cent, interest rates on FCC loans were running in the 16.75 per cent range. The interest rates today under FCC's long-term loan program are running in the order of 7 per cent. So, actually they are less than they were in the worst of the recession.

I am interested in the Minister's comment with respect to equity financing, and whether the Government will be bringing forward legislation on that or whether it will be done by Order in Council. Exactly how will the Minister be doing the equity financing? Will he be establishing federal farm investment trust legislation and, if so, will he be doing so first thing in September? Given that that was a matter of major concern in the recent study on farm input costs carried out by the Standing Committee on Agriculture, I would ask him to speak to it.

The Minister has been quite critical of the mandate of the Farm Credit Corporation under the previous Liberal Government. This Government has now been in power for three years, and it has not yet changed that mandate. It has undertaken a strategy with the provincial Governments which would see a much broader mandate for the FCC, with long-term interest rates of 9 per cent, as put forward in the agricultural strategy paper, and yet the Minister has declined to say exactly when he will be addressing both the financial problems of the FCC and the matter of the renewed need for a different mandate.

Clearly, the kind of situation we had in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, when land values were rising at 18 per cent a year, is very different from what we have seen over the last two and a half years, when land values across the country have declined by some $17 billion.

It seems to me that it would be very helpful for Canadian farmers if the Minister could indicate exactly when he plans to bring in an outline of the new policy in respect of the Farm Credit Corporation, taking into account the serious fall in commodity prices, as well as the decline in the value of farm lands.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether the Hon. Member is advocating a return to high inflation or not. Listening to the first part of his argument, I am almost tempted to believe that that is what he is advocating.

Mr. Foster: Real interest rates.

Mr. Wise: I ask the Hon. Member to check with any Canadian farmer as to his or her preference between the 1981-82 interest rate level of 24 per cent and the—

Mr. Foster: The FCC rate was never at 24 per cent.

Mr. Wise: —and the 1987 interest rate level, which is less than half of the 1981-82 level. I am sure he will get his answer.

We have lowered interest rates six or seven times since coming to office—

Mr. Foster: Not on FCC loans.

Mr. Wise: I know that there is a call for additional dollars for the Farm Credit Corporation for lending purposes. On the other hand, my hon. friend should know that because of the depreciation that has taken place in land values, as well as the financial difficulties in Canadian agriculture today, less land is changing hands, with the result that the demand for additional dollars for lending purposes by the corporation has been reduced, and reduced significantly.

I draw the Hon. Member's attention to the reduction that took place between 1982 and 1984. He will find that at that point, the demand had diminished from about $400 million or $500 million to about $285 million. That reduction took place at that point. The Government has every intention to continue to support the Farm Credit Corporation. It has every intention to supply the necessary funds required by the corporation to carry out its lending responsibilities.

When we came into office, $1 billion was required to operate the Department and pay the support programs. Since coming into office, some 471 initiatives have been delivered to the farm community, delivering over $6 billion. Even if we compare the last year of the previous Government, $1 billion, this year we will probably pay out $3.5 billion, or perhaps as much as $4 billion. So, we have increased expenditures by 350 per cent, 400 per cent.

If you apply that to your own household budget, your own farm operation, and if you, by necessity, have had to take 300 per cent more dollars and put them into another area, you simply haven't got money for everything. But, there is no question, nor should there be in anyone's mind in the country, that this Government is addressing those problems. The record stands unchallenged and unmatched by any other government in the history of the country. We will be providing the necessary support for the Farm Credit Corporation in order to ensure that it fulfils its responsibilities across the country.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Minister could tell us what justification he has for adding a user fee of what he says is one half of one per cent, but which I point out to him could be much more. In the way the Bill is worded, there is no limit.

I draw his attention to Clause 12(1)(b) on page 9 of the Bill, where he will see that the fee can be set at one half of one per cent of the amount of the loan, as he described in his opening remarks. However, it goes on to say:

—or such other fee as is prescribed or calculated in the manner prescribed.

The "manner prescribed" is subject to regulation, and we do not see that in this Bill. We do not see any guarantee, so to speak, that the fee could not be 1 per cent, 2 per cent, or even 5 per cent. This constitutes one of these forms of taxation that I referred to in my remarks on the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Parliament is usually quite loath to grant to any Minister or any Government an open-ended type of taxation. Perhaps the Minister could describe, for future legislators, what he sees coming out of this, and put some distinctions to it.

It may be that the matter may have to be referred to committee for later clarification. I do have an amendment which I will be moving, and we can discuss it at the time I move it. I have discussed it with the Minister. My amendment calls for the fee to be limited to one half of one per cent, with that becoming the cap.

I would like to have the Minister's thinking on this, with a view to reassuring those out there who feel that they may find themselves subject, in the future, to a much greater fee than the one half of one per cent, which is the present intention.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, there would be no purpose in my attempting to baffle or mislead my hon. colleague over this particular matter. He knows too much about agriculture. As well, he has taken a special interest in this particular piece of legislation, as has the Member for Algoma.

• (1740)

We have quite honestly and quite legitimately made an effort since assuming office to enter into a reasonable, common sense cost recovery plan. It has been difficult in agriculture, but we have advanced in certain areas in consultation with the industry. We have sat down with them, around the table, and we have done some additional cost recovery in those areas that were in a position to absorb. In other areas—and seed potatoes is an example—that were not in a position to absorb much of the cost recovery, the degree to which we cost recovered the services we provided to the industry was considerably less.

We have an obligation to the nation to do everything we possibly can to reduce the deficit. Even though we have increased expenditures in agriculture by 350 per cent, we still have a responsibility to do what we can in the area of cost recovery.

Yes, there is a cost recovery factor, and I think it is reasonable. I do not know how much smaller it could have been and still have been in keeping with the Government's over-all commitment to introduce a cost recovery fee. As I indicated before, it is not great but it is new and it is there.

It will be $50 on a $10,000 loan, and it will be $500 on a $100,000 loan. I think that scale or schedule is ample evidence that it is not that heavy. It is a one-term application. Farmers can have the option of either paying the $50 on the $10,000 loan or rolling it into the loan.

I know what the Hon. Member wants. I would like to agree with it. However, Members of the House will realize that it is impossible for me to agree with what he is suggesting and what he is proposing in the amendment. It is no secret—it is public information and public knowledge—that because of the priority we place on agriculture there are some special provisions in the Bill, and the cost recovery fee would be a prime example.

We know that there are some very serious difficulties in the primary sector. We also know that if we apply a cost recovery fee, it could be about two percentage points. We are not doing that. We are looking at the last 40 years, and we think that a cost recovery fee of one-half of one per cent would be a reasonable one.

I know the Hon. Member is signalling a warning. I am getting the message loud and clear. He is telling me that he will be in his place, day in and day out, if there is an adjustment 12 months or 24 months from today or if any future Government decides that it should be adjusted. We will do everything possible to maintain as long as we can the one-half of one per cent cost recovery. We hope that Canadian agriculture will have some better economic times in the near future.

However, I heard the Hon. Member's message loud and clear. It is about the third time I have received it from him today.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, I should like to spend a few moments speaking generally about the Bill.

It is a revision of the farm improvement loans provisions which have been available to Canadian farmers for some 42 years. It increases the loan limits from $100,000 to $150,000. It continues to offer loans to farmers at prime plus one per cent. It is now being extended to off-farm income farmers or farmers who receive part of their income off farm. This was probably being done by many lenders, but it will now become legal.

It is now possible to refinance loans under the purview of the Act. It cannot be used to refinance loans which were taken out to purchase fertilizers or fuel. However, if part of the farmer's loan portfolio was for building a fence, repairing a building, or repairing some machinery, he could turn part of the existing loan over into a farm improvement loan and spread it over a five-year to ten-year period.

I welcome the inclusion of co-operative ventures. A group of farmers can now borrow up to $1.5 million. I see this being used for processing operations and ventures of that kind in small communities. Perhaps it is an improvement that it provides capital over five years of $1.5 billion. It is not an increase, but it permits the Act to function without the necessity of returning on an annual or semi-annual basis to Parliament for its funds.

The amount of loan guarantee is being reduced from 100 per cent to 95 per cent. Lenders who find that they have lost money as a result of a loan will only be guaranteed 95 per cent of the loan instead of 100 per cent. It is a shared risk option which I find acceptable in that it will perhaps make the lender a little more conscious of what loans he is providing. However, in these times when lenders are already super cautious, it will add a bit more caution.

What I find objectionable about the Bill is a user fee being imposed on farm loans. Although the Minister explained that one-half of one per cent would be adequate to cover all the losses in the last 42 years, I think it was an unnecessary item to add to the farm scene at this point in time.

What I am most strenuously concerned about—and I will attempt to move an amendment later—is the fact that it leaves a wide open opportunity for the Government to impose user fees at a rate higher than one-half of one per cent. This means that those of us who take our job seriously in Parliament are breaking our own tradition. It is the role of the Parliament of Canada to understand the limits of taxation on Canadians, whether they are farm borrowers, fisher people, or whatever. I submit that this kind of legislation does not live up to parliamentary tradition because there are no limits to the amount of tax the Government can levy under this particular provision. I assume it will be dealt with in time by the appropriate committee which looks at our procedures. However, I regret that a Minister of any Government would submit this kind of legislation without a clearly established cap or limit so that we would not have to continue this constant paperwork and loading up committees unnecessarily. I caution the drafters of Bills, particularly the Government and its Ministers, not to repeat this procedure.

I have another complaint to make while I am on the subject of process. This is the third year agricultural Bills have been presented to us just before the summer recess. This Bill is the ultimate in terms of presenting a Bill just under the wire. The Bill did not even exist until this morning. We did not have the usual time to absorb it.

• (1750)

It is normal for this House to have the Bill come before it the next day. We have allowed it to go through the House very quickly. We have agreed to let the Bill go through all stages even though this particular business of a user fee with no limit is potentially a very contentious kind of thing and we should perhaps have had the advice of witnesses before a committee before permitting it. I flag the issue and hope that the committee on rules and procedures—I know that is not the proper title—will catch it and refer it back to this House along with a long list of other procedures and other things to be corrected. Meanwhile, I will attempt to have the House agree to correct this item in a few moments.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4—Payment of Lenders' Losses

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, this clause provides that only 95 per cent of the farm asset value will be guaranteed. This means that the bank or lending institution will have to cover 5 per cent.

Could the Minister table all the correspondence that he has received from farm organizations as well as any studies which he has done as to the impact this provision will have on the number of loans which banks will provide? Specifically, I would like to know whether the lending institutions are saying, as I suspect, that in the past the Government has guaranteed the loan 100 per cent. Even with that situation where there is absolutely no risk whatever to the lending institutions, because the Government covered the cost 100 per cent, we had great difficulty in getting the banks to grant these kinds of loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. What correspondence does the Minister have from lending institutions and what studies carried out by the Department does he have which would indicate, as I suspect, that lending institutions will just be that much more reluctant to give farm improvement loans if they are not covered 100 per cent?

Can the Minister table that information and tell us what studies have shown with regard to the availability of a farm improvement loan when the Government is guaranteeing only 95 per cent of the loan as compared to 100 per cent.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, I am not so sure just what correspondence it would be reasonable to table. I would prefer to take the Hon. Member's question as notice. We will check with the Department and see if we have in our possession information that will be helpful to the Hon. Member. Certainly it would be available to him. There is no intent on my part whatever of withholding information.

I can recall though in the consultations we have had with some 40 odd agricultural groups that suggestions were made that these were possible changes we would be considering and that they should utilize the opportunity to respond. I cannot recall any farm organization doing that, although no doubt there were some that expressed a concern about this.

It is no secret that the banks would prefer a 100 per cent guarantee. I think what the Hon. Member is really asking is something that perhaps might be on our minds as well, namely, that that will depend on what happens in the future. It will not be, on reflection, on anything that has taken place in the past but a review of what will take place in the future. Then we will review that to see whether or not it has had any effect.

I have my doubts whether the provision will have any serious effect on the banks' willingness to participate in the program. I am sure that all Hon. Members of the House, regardless of what side they occupy, would like to see Canada's chartered banks participate to a greater degree in the Farm Improvement Loans Act. We encourage them to participate. Because this Bill has some new provisions, it is expanded, enhanced and its availability will be greatly improved, particularly on the co-operative side. We will be doing a little more advertising than has been done in the past. Hopefully that will overcome any shortfall or any reluctance which the banks might have. But would they prefer 100 per cent? Sure they would, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have a point of order with respect to Private Members' Hour. I think it would be appropriate to do it now before we get to the hour of six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I will leave the Chair now and report progress.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, we are making good progress this evening. We still have Bills C-62, C-70, C-83 and C-64, all of which we have had agreement on among the House Leaders and which will be proceeded with this evening. It is my understanding that the Hon. Member who was scheduled to have a Private Members' Hour today has notified the Table that he will be unable to participate. Subsequent to discussions that we have had among the Parties, Mr. Speaker, you will find there is unanimous consent that notwithstanding any other standing order, that the House not now proceed with Private Members' Hour today in order to allow for the continuation of business.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, we are certainly prepared to agree to dispense with Private Members' Hour. I do want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis) a question with respect to Bill C-71, the legislation which would facilitate the prosecution in Canada of war criminals, including those who have evaded justice for many years.

As I understand it, this Bill has the support of all Parties in the House. Is the Parliamentary Secretary prepared to accept the offer which I know that my House Leader has made on behalf of our caucus, and I believe has been made as well by the House Leader on behalf of the Liberal Party caucus, that we proceed with this legislation through all stages in the House today? We are prepared to move forward on this legislation, to adopt it in the House, to deal with it in Committee of the Whole and to waive the requirement that it be dealt with in a legislative committee.

Is the Parliamentary Secretary prepared to accept that offer so that the long overdue inaction of a succession of governments on this fundamental question of justice can finally be dealt with?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I do anything else, I must cancel the Private Members' Hour. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, very briefly on the point of order, I take it that the Table has done its utmost to try to find a replacement for the Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Dorin) whose hour it was today. I take it that we will be protecting future Members' use of this hour by exercising all measures and expediency to try to replace those people who cannot for reasons, which can be understood, be here to exercise their rights to use their hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will take that as given. Private Members' Hour is cancelled by consent. I will now recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis).

• (1800)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I was choosing my words as carefully as I could when I indicated that there was agreement among House Leaders that Bills C-62, C-70, C-83 and C-84 would proceed, time permitting. One would hope that we could expedite matters and get through not only the Bill which is presently in Committee of the Whole House but also those items.

I would tell my hon. friend that I have every intention of proceeding thereafter on things on which we do not have complete agreement and those are Bill S-6, Bill C-51 and Bill C-71 in that order. We have every intention of reaching them. The only constraint I have is time. One will appreciate that we are all trying to co-operate and deal with the items of business as expeditiously as possible. That means sharing the time available among those who wish to participate in the items of legislation to which I have referred.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. On behalf of my Party, I would like to say that we are willing to deal with Bill C-71 this afternoon through all stages, depending upon the mood and the will of members of other Parties. As far as we are concerned, we would like to see this Bill go through and we will co-operate by trying to pass it through all stages this afternoon. I am sure my hon. colleague from York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) would be in agreement with that.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I heard the Hon. Member from the New Democratic Party and the Hon. Member from the Liberal Party suggesting that you should pass Bill C-71 in all stages. I have reservations about it and I will not give unanimous consent. I feel that it is an omnibus Bill that deals with the Criminal Code, the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and therefore should go to a legislative committee and be studied thoroughly so that it will become a good piece of legislation.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, there have been many consultations among members of all Parties during the day today in the hopes of recognizing the importance of getting that Bill through all stages today and satisfying the concerns expressed by members of the Conservative Party who continue to have reservations about the Bill. I would hope that in the time left to which the Parliamentary Secretary referred before that Bill is called, it might be possible to resolve those concerns so that the agreed procedure to which the Liberal Whip referred could in fact be followed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Exactly. I will hear no more points of order on Bill C-71. If there are negotiations to take place, they should take place not on the floor of the House of Commons but behind the curtains.

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-78, an Act to increase the availability of loans for the purpose of the improvement and development of farms and the processing, distribution or marketing of farm products by co-operative associations, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Wise—Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: We were on Clause 4.

On Clause 4— Payment of lenders' losses

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, the point I was trying to make with the Minister is simply that the banks want a 100 per cent guarantee but our concern is that if they only have a 95 per cent guarantee, these loans will not be made available. I would have assumed that the Department would have done some kind of assessment on that and that is what I am asking for. I hope that he would be able to provide us with exactly what his officials are advising him about these farm improvement loans not being available.

The second point I want to raise deals with paragraph (h) of Clause 4(3). As I read it, this is a new section which suggests that the lender should exercise the same care and prudence in granting and administering the loan as he exercises in granting and administering, in the ordinary course of his business, loans in respect of which this Act does not apply. Does that mean that the bank will only make loans available if they would provide a loan without the guarantee? If that is the case, people who cannot get loans directly from the bank because of their financial situations would not be offered loans by the banks under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. That suggests to me a real barrier.

Perhaps the Minister's officials could advise him if that clause will mean that loans will only be made available under the Farm Improvement Loans Act when a bank would normally provide a loan under its own auspices and take 100 per cent of the risk itself. It seems to me that that is quite a new idea and I wonder what the impact of it will be.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, first, my officials indicate that they really do not have any quantitative assessment of what the impact will be of 100 per cent versus 95 per cent. Second, they also advise me that after consultation, they do not think that this will be detrimental.

This is not a new provision. It was in the old Act. It is simply a change in the wording of Clause 4(3)(h) which has been strengthened to clarify that lenders are to exercise the same care and prudence with farm improvement loans as they do with their own loans.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat concerned about the fees being imposed in this particular clause. I therefore propose to move the following motion:

That Bill C-78, be amended in Clause 4 (3)e(i) by deleting line 41 to line 3 inclusive at pages 4 and 5.

This would have the effect of removing the ability for fees to be levied under that clause of the Bill. I so move, seconded by my friend, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

The Deputy Chairman: Debate is on the amendment moved by Mr. Althouse. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Althouse) negatived: yeas, 7; nays, 18.

Clause agreed to.

• (1810)

Clause 5 agreed to.

On Clause 6—

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, again in an effort to clean up the Bill and get rid of the prescribed fees and charges, I move, seconded by Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon):

That Bill C-78, be amended in Clause 6 by deleting lines 18 through 21 at page 7 inclusive.

Amendment (Mr. Althouse) negatived.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 7—

Mr. Foster: Could the Minister explain why the limit of $1.5 million is not being increased when the program is being expanded to cover co-operatives which will be able to borrow up to $3 million each? There are literally hundreds of farm co-operatives and if they all borrow $3 million each we would soon reach the limit of the funds available.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, we paid particular attention to that area this morning during our briefing session with the two opposition Members. The information received from the departmental officials is to the effect that this would not be a problem because we would start the program off with about $700 million. It is very doubtful whether there would be difficulty with a lack of capital for lending purposes even though we include the co-operatives in this Act.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 12—

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to Clause 12. That clause says the Minister is not liable to make any payment to a lender in respect of any loss unless the lender has, at such time as is prescribed, paid to the Minister a fee of one half of one per cent of the amount of the loan or such other fee as is prescribed or calculated in the manner prescribed. I move, seconded by Mr. de Corneille:

That Bill C-78, be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 32 to 36.

That would eliminate the need for a fee under this Act.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) negatived.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, since the House has refused to agree to any of our amendments which would do away with the user fee entirely, I would like to make one last attempt at an amendment in a slightly different direction, that is, to do what the House normally does and put a cap on the spending the Government can engage in and stop what I consider to be an open-ended proposal in this Bill at Clause 12(1)(b) which permits the Minister not only to be paid a fee of one-half of one per cent of the amount of the loan but which goes on to say:

—or such other fee as is prescribed or calculated in the manner prescribed.

I submit that this permits the Minister or any future Minister to go up to 1 per cent, 2 per cent, 3 per cent or 4 per cent, or any other per cent. That is not usually the role played by this or any other Parliament in enacting legislation. In order to avoid having this legislation come before the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, which will find this Bill is not very well drafted, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp):

That Bill C-78, be amended in Clause 12 by striking out line 35 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor: "the loan or such other lesser fee as is prescribed."

By inserting the word "lesser" in the appropriate place the effect would be to place a cap on the fee to be charged.

Amendment (Mr. Althouse) negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 15—

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, I would just point out to the Minister that we have at the end of Clause 15 wording which limits the amount of the Government's liability to 95 per cent of the loan. That is well written and makes it very clear that the Government will not be liable for more than that amount. I commend that sort of writing to him and wish he had done that with the rest of the legislation. The motion which was just defeated would have been consistent with the rest of the legislation, and I again point out that I believe the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments will eventually have to deal with this one of these years.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

• (1820)

On Clause 26—

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Minister would explain why he is adding "or a farm electric system". Is there a particular aspect of the present legislation which is inadequate? It seems to me that the Farm Improvement Act generally deals with all kinds of farm improvements, whether buildings, equipment or whatever. Why is this amendment being made?

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, electrification has always been eligible for a farm improvement loan. I am advised that the definition was changed in the new Act. The definition did not specifically refer to the electrification of farm operations. So, a special reference had to be made to amend the Bank Act consequentially.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 33 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to take a few seconds to put on the record my sincere thanks and appreciation for the co-operation I have received throughout the day from my colleagues across the way, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) and the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties. I think you would find unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

That notwithstanding the usual practices of the House, if the House is not sitting when the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources is completed, the committee shall present its report by filing it with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the table.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I think we will need further consultation on this. Perhaps we can return to it at a later time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is, therefore, not unanimous consent.

FORGIVENESS OF CERTAIN OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE DEBTS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Monique Landry, (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs), moved that Bill C-62, An act relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the Governments of Togo and the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and also to the former East African Community, be the second time and, with unanimous consent, referred to a Committee of the Whole.

She said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank all Members of this House and, of course, the two opposition Parties for deciding to consider this Bill and help expedite its passage today. I must say I greatly appreciate your co-operation because this is a very important and pressing matter for the the Government of Canada.

The purpose of this Bill is to forgive the debts incurred or assumed in respect of official development assistance to several African countries including Togo, Mauritania and the former East African Community.

I shall, if I may, outline briefly what is at issue here.

In the context of the North-South dialogue that took place at the Conference on International Economic Co-operation, in 1977 Canada decided to cancel debts incurred in respect of official development assistance by twelve countries included on the United Nations list of least developed countries. In December of that year, the Parliament of Canada enacted this decision.

The Canadian measure was favourably received at the international level. Obliging the poorest countries on this planet to repay their loans was having a negative impact, both on the countries themselves and the international economic situation. Canada was among the first countries to both recognize this fact and take concrete measures to deal with the situation.

Ten years later, Canada is still leading the way in finding solutions to the problems of the neediest nations in terms of debt and development, especially in Africa's sub-Saharan region.

In February 1986, we announced that Canadian official development assistance would no longer be defined in terms of loans but in terms of grants. This meant that developing countries would no longer be placed in a debtor position vis-à-vis Canada. Since the money would be given in the form of grants, these sums would not have to be reimbursed.

However, more had to be done. The sub-Saharan countries were faced with an unprecedented human and economic crisis that had taken on incredible proportions.

In May 1986, my Government therefore announced to the United Nations a five-year moratorium on the development assistance debts incurred by Sub-Saharan African countries which had implemented structural readjustment programs. This meant that these countries did not have to make any payments to Canada for a five-year period. The non-repayment period could also be extended by another five years if the economy of these countries showed no sign of recovery, and this up to the year 2000 if necessary. The entire international community, and especially the African countries, welcomed this decision as being generous and humanitarian. Indeed, it reasserted the role of Canada as concerns the critical situation in Africa.

This Bill is the result of the official decision made by Canada in 1977 to cancel the development assistance debt of countries on the least-developed countries list established by the United Nations. Since then, two other African countries, Togo and the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, have suffered such an economic crisis that they have been added to the list. To ensure that our policy as concerns these countries remains consistent, the Canadian Government believes that the development assistance debts of Togo and Mauritania must also be cancelled, as well as that of the former East African Community. I remind Hon. Members that this Community consisted of three countries of which two, Tanzania and Uganda, are also on the least-developed countries list.

I therefore hope, Madam Speaker, that the House will give all its attention to this Bill. It involves our international reputation. Also, and most important, these countries are being crushed by a virtually unpayable debt. We have to offer them an opportunity to recover. This is the purpose of this Bill.

• (1830)

[English]

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, Bill C-62 deals with forgiving debts owed to Canada by a number of least developed countries which are not now in a position to repay their debts to Canada and will not be in a position to do so in the foreseeable future.

I am delighted to be able to have played a role in getting this Bill before the House and hopefully passed during the closing moments of House business before the summer recess begins.

We in the Liberal caucus want it to be passed now, before the la Francophonie and Commonwealth summit conferences are held so that Canada's credibility can be maintained in the area of international development assistance.

We are certainly pleased that the Government has brought this Bill forward at this time. We in the Liberal Party have pioneered official development assistance programs for many years now. As we know, not all of the assistance programs or loans of Canada's official development assistance programs are successful. Inevitably, some programs are not a complete success and some programs are failures.

We also realize the plight of the least developed countries. Indeed, the debtor countries involved in this Bill have suffered severe set-backs for some time now. Widespread drought and disease, and declining world prices in the staple cash crops they export has exacerbated the financial and social problems they face and rendered their debt retirements an impossibility.

In 1977, Canada announced that it was retroactively converting all these least developed country ODA loans to grants, as the Minister explained, and that in the future aid to these countries would be provided on grant terms only.

Togo and Mauritania did not benefit from the Canadian measure because at the time they were not identified by the United Nations as least developed countries.

However, Togo was added to the list by the United Nations General Assembly in 1982, and Mauritania was added in 1986.

Togo owes $16.6 million and Mauritania owes $4.2 million. The East African Community, or EAC, dissolved in 1977. It was only in May, 1984 that the three countries were able to agree on sharing the EAC liabilities according to a formula devised by a World Bank mediator, in an amount of approximately $47.4 million. Those countries are Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda.

I am happy to point out that the financial costs of this legislation are nil. Decisions made at the time of the February, 1986 Budget mean that this debt forgiveness action involves no change in net ODA, no additional outlays and no additional impact on budgetary deficit.

In conclusion, I wish to express that we are pleased with Canada's policies on moratoriums on debts to least developed countries which are suffering so greatly from commodity price losses, from drought, and from many other social problems, including occasional invasion from outside.

I must add a sombre note and point out that Canada has been committed for years to the attainment of a .7 per cent of GNP as the ultimate goal of our official development assistance. We are gravely disappointed that the Government has been so very slow to implement the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) promise to increase Canada's ODA funding to .7 per cent by 1990. In fact, these figures have been greatly revised in a negative direction. It would appear that he is quick to promise but not agile in delivery. This is another broken promise which we deeply regret and which is particularly sad, as we go to the Commonwealth summit and la Francophonie conferences. I hope we will be able to anticipate some announcement there that will alleviate this decision.

In any case, on behalf of the members of my caucus I take pleasure in supporting the Bill which is now before the House for final approval.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I also will be very brief in my remarks. We in the New Democratic Party wish to express our support for this Bill, an Act relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the Governments of Togo and of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and also to the former East African Community.

It is obviously an important issue, and the whole question of Third World debt is something that has been receiving more attention lately. It is with some regret that we are speaking about this on the last day of the sitting when, at 6.35 p.m., there is just over an hour left to deal with four or five pieces of legislation. I wish the parliamentary calendar had provided for this legislation earlier so that we could discuss the wider problems along with the specific legislation.

Having said that, it is the intention of our caucus to pass this Bill through all stages this evening. We are pleased that there is some recognition of the fact that Third World debt is not only faced by countries in Latin America where most of the attention is presently focused, but an important issue facing African countries as well.

While the debts of those countries tend to be smaller in absolute figures, they are quite often larger in terms of debt—GNP ratio and in terms of debt-export earning ratio. It is a situation in which these prospects faced by many of these African nations and others are very great and something which the House of Commons should be considering.

As the Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) said on behalf of the Liberal Party, it is important to note that the Government has not kept its commitment of money for official development assistance. There was a promise to achieve .7 per cent of GNP. That was delayed until 1990, then postponed until 1995. Now it has been postponed until the 21st century.

Despite all the problems facing Canada, such as high unemployment in some of our regions, we are still a rich country and we, of all nations, could afford to do better. I wish the House would not spend the time on this legislation but on the whole topic of Third World debt and make a commitment to do a better job for Third World countries.

[Translation]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, when I look at Bill C-62, I wonder whether it is the general policy of this Government to cancel debts. Is this a special case or will this policy be extended to other countries? If this is a precedent and there are other such cases, we could find ourselves cancelling all foreign debts, and our treasury would soon be in trouble.

On the one hand, if these countries are having major difficulties, I can, understand that we might want to cancel their debt for humanitarian reasons. On the other hand, I am wondering if it is now open general policy to say that if a country is unable to pay back its debt, this debt will be cancelled.

About a year ago, I visited Peru, which owes something like $450 million to Canada. This country is also under-developped and quite poor. Are we going to do the same for this country at some time in the future?

I think that we should have a discussion on this issue and that it would probably be a good thing to refer this Bill to a legislative committee where it could be discussed and improved.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Do I have the unanimous consent of the House for the Minister to answer the Hon. Member?

Some Hon. Members: No. Question.

• (1840)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Am I to understand there would be unanimous consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kindy: No. I have a reservation. I asked a question and somebody said they could not give me the answer, so I am not giving unanimous consent.

Mr. Lewis: I suggest to my hon. colleague that if we were to proceed to Committee of the Whole House, upon the appropriate clause being read, it would be appropriate for my hon. colleague to ask the Minister the question at that time.

Mr. Kindy: I understand the explanations of the Parliamentary Secretary, but his attitude was certainly not conducive to my getting an answer. Therefore, I am going to refuse unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Perhaps the Chair could be of some help. It was not possible at the time the Hon. Member requested an answer from the Minister for the Chair to recognize the Minister again during second reading. Certainly the Minister could answer all questions should the House decide to study the Bill in Committee of the Whole House, but I need unanimous consent.

I wanted to explain the reason why I could not give the floor to the Hon. Minister.

Mr. Kindy: So I will give my consent and, if the House agrees, it is unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the Chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I would like to repeat my question and ask the Minister whether it would be Canada's general policy to forgive the debts of all less developed countries.

Mrs. Landry: Yes, Madam Speaker. I would like to say briefly to my hon. friend what I mentioned earlier in my speech, namely that at the special conference at the United Nations in 1977, Canada decided to forgive the debts of the least developed countries appearing on the UN list. At the time, the following countries were exempted from repaying their debts: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Benin, Botswana, Laos, Malawi, Mali, Nepal, Niger, Tanzania, Uganda and Upper Volta.

A Bill was passed previously in this House to forgive the debts of these countries. However, at the time, Togo, Mauritania and the East African Community were not among the least developed countries. Since they have now been added to the list, we believe it is appropriate, since these countries are experiencing problems today, to make the provisions of the same Bill applicable to them as well, but to do so, we have to table a new Bill. We are doing so simply to bring everything in line with the decision made at the time in 1977, so that we can extend the same treatment to Togo, Mauritania and the former East African Community. Their debt was endorsed by three countries, namely Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya, and we are therefore cancelling that part of the debt.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that: Bill C-70, An Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act and to amend other Acts in relation thereto, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When shall the Bill be read the third time? Now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cadieux moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Debate. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux).

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity to speak about Bill C-70, which aims at providing every Canadian administration with a Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System.

[English]

As Minister of Labour I am particularly gratified to see the WHMIS legislation brought forward during this session of Parliament. The year 1987 marks the twentieth anniversary of the Canada Labour Code and, historically speaking, is an especially appropriate time to strengthen the protections for Canadian workers who have to handle hazardous materials.

Let me explain why I strongly believe Canada and Canadian workers need the WHMIS program. Each year many more working days are lost through occupational accidents and illnesses than through industrial disputes. One specific cause of these losses is an area that is directly addressed by the WHMIS legislation: the presence of chemicals and other materials in the workplace which are hazardous to the safety and health of workers who use them.

[Translation]

Workers are certainly entitled to know which material they are handling. However, the employers themselves have often little or incomplete knowledge of the dangers of some of the substances or products used. Those in the best position to have such information are the manufacturers and distributors.

That is why, Madam Speaker, Canadian federal, provincial and territorial occupational health and safety organizations have asked the assistance and participation of the federal Government in developing a single national standard for the use of hazardous materials in the workplace.

A record number of consultations took place to define this national standard. These consultations lasted over four years and required the utmost in co-operation from the federal, provincial and territorial authorities, the industry and the unions.

[English]

Over this period, the tripartite consultation phase of the WHMIS project addressed and resolved complex technical, social and legal issues. A consensus was produced, a genuine consensus with the full and active support of all participants—a truly significant achievement.

The WHMIS proposal contained in Bill C-70 provides for an orderly means of communicating information about hazardous materials from manufacturers, suppliers and importers to employers and employees.

[Translation]

Distributors and importers of hazardous materials will from now on have to provide labels and material safety data sheets at the time when such materials are sold or imported. As for the employers, they will have to ensure that their employees are provided with sufficient information and adequate training programs.

I believe that the WHMIS program is pratical, effective and realistic. It will allow Canadian workers to enjoy the protection they deserve. It will also be fair to manufacturers as it will improve the quality and quantity of information on work-related hazardous materials.

What is unique about the WHMIS program is that all the participants, who represent varied interests, have given it their full support. It confirms in practice the commitment of this Government to the consultation process. This is an excellent piece of legislation which will protect Canadian workers in all provinces and territories while reflecting the interests of both the unions and the employers.

It is therefore important that Bill C-70 become part of our statutes.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Speaker, I too would like to comment briefly on Bill C-70 which sets up WHMIS, the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System. I must confess that my Party was consulted when this Bill was being drafted, a gesture we appreciated. From the outset our Party thought that a measure intended to protect workers against workplace hazardous materials would be a welcome addition to our Canadian legislative arsenal.

We thought the Bill was adequate, but we decided to consult other people to make sure that it would meet with the approval of some of the people or companies that would have to live with it. This is why we got in touch, among others, with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association where we were told they had been consulted about the drafting of this legislation They said they agreed with it. The same thing goes for the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association which, of course, is directly affected by this measure.

We did the same thing with the unions. We called on the Canadian Labour Congress and other union organizations and found out that they too—through their representatives—had been consulted by the Government and were in agreement with the contents of the Bill.

Therefore we on this side of the House agree that this Bill should pass quickly this afternoon. We believe that a Bill which provides for the classification of workplace hazardous products, chemical and others, in accordance with clearly established and desirable standards, we think that certain WHMIS provisions such as labels to warn workers who will be using these products are a necessity and that the material safety data sheets which will also provide additional information are a good idea. We believe that the WHMIS must also be noted for its employee training program.

Finally, since it also contains measures to protect trade secrets by allowing certain exemptions when revealing the contents of certain matters might cause economic damage likely to be detrimental to a company, there will be exemptions to protect the manufacturers of such products. It seems to me this legislation is well balanced and this is why we on this side of the House thought we would facilitate its adoption in the House today. Indeed, Madam Speaker, this is why I resume my seat immediately.

• (1900)

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on another piece of legislation today. This particular piece of legislation will ensure that there is proper labelling of hazardous goods in the workplace.

As was mentioned by other Members who spoke on second reading of the Bill, in committee, and in the House today, it is the result of a consultative process. It has received the agreement of the major shareholders, if I could use that term—the Canadian Labour Congress, the chemical industry, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and others.

It was an important process. It brought forward legislation which was basically good and met the needs of both labour and management. However, I do not believe that Parliament should be a rubber stamp, regardless of who has been involved in the consultative process.

We took the committee system seriously. We listened to the witnesses who appeared before us. As a result we discovered that a number of amendments could be made to the legislation without destroying the co-operative approach. They were amendments to strengthen the legislation without destroying the consensus.

As a result of the work by members of our caucus and as a result of the agreement on the part of the Government, two very important amendments to the legislation were accepted in committee. The first was to ensure that there was an actual implementation date. We have seen legislation pass through the House and the Senate and have waited years to have it proclaimed. Therefore I was very pleased to see the Government put forward a motion which included the implementation date of October 31, 1988 or sooner.

The other amendment accepted in committee ensured that certain chemicals which come under other Acts would be exempt from the legislation and that there would be legislative review of those exemptions in two and a half years. It was an important amendment to the piece of legislation.

I was quite happy with the co-operative approach of the Government and the fact that it accepted those amendments. As a result, the House is producing a better piece of legislation and we certainly support its passage at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, Bill C-70 is certainly a very useful Bill, not just for the worker and for protecting the individual but also for industry. The Bill was tabled here in the House by the Minister and I think he is to be commended, because it is a very comprehensive piece of legislation, some forty pages long, its provisions cover just about every product, and the Government is certainly to be commended for tabling this Bill and I think it should be passed as soon as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the Parties and I believe Your Honour would find unanimous consent to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs rather than to a legislative committee.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Tom Hockin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-64, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, a related Act, the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today on second reading of Bill C-64 which will implement a number of changes to the Income Tax Act. The Bill has a number of merits which I am sure will be evident to Hon. Members of the House.

Bill C-64 will implement measures that will bring about a better management of government operations and public resources. One of these is the new requirement, effective January 1, 1988, for employers to remit to the Government twice monthly the deductions they make for their employees on account of personal income taxes and contributions to the unemployment insurance fund and the Canada Pension Plan. These deductions are now remitted monthly.

It is important that these measures be legislated as soon as possible in order to give corporations enough lead time to make the necessary administrative changes.

Bill C-64 contains the measures necessary to implement the income tax changes in the February 1987 Budget along with a number of tax changes. To avoid confusing these income tax amendments with those which are part of the tax reform initiative, it would be desirable for the Bill to be passed through the House as soon as possible. Passage of this important Bill before the summer recess would allow Hon. Members to devote more of their time and efforts to an examination of the tax reform measures during the summer and fall.

[Translation]

The Bill also contains the amendments to the Income Tax Act tabled in January by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) for the purpose of establishing international banking centres in Montreal and Vancouver. The Minister clearly indicated at the time that the purpose of this very selective incentive measure was to patriate to Canada certain banking activities being conducted abroad. It will not adversely affect other banking operations currently taking place in Canada. In fact, I believe this initiative will complement the measures we have taken to increase the competitiveness of the Canadian financial sector.

[English]

As I mentioned earlier, this Bill is an important part of the Government's ongoing agenda for economic renewal. It will implement a number of important changes and represents a wide-ranging process of consultation with interested individuals, organizations, and other Governments.

This is why I trust that Bill C-64 will receive the full and swift support of Members of the House.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, let me first say that I am relieved the Government has agreed that the Bill will be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs rather than to a legislative committee.

Bill C-64 contains a number of very complex measures. It is based upon a Ways and Means motion which, with the technical notes alone, came up to about 15 pages. The Bill itself contains a couple of hundred pages.

For the Government to suggest that complex and technical measures of this kind would have been appropriately referred to an ad hoc legislative committee rather boggles the mind. In the same way, for the Minister to come in with the Bill on the last day the House is sitting and ask for rapid passage of a Bill with such complex measures also rather boggles the mind.

Of course we are prepared to facilitate the Government and let the Bill be referred to committee this evening, especially now that we know it is going to a specialized committee.

• (1910)

Let us look at some of the measures that are included in this Bill, measures that go back to the February 18, 1987 Budget. Somehow these measures have become urgent at 7 p.m. on June 30, the last day for the House to sit. No similar urgency has been shown since February 18. We have measures here that deal with the special tax on corporations that distribute surplus to their shareholders as proceeds of disposition of shares. We have new rules relating to retirement compensation arrangements, rules which should be discussed carefully and on which witnesses should be called. We have new rules to give effect to certain tax treaty provisions which allow for tax deferral in Canada.

Particularly important, we have here the rules relating to the acceleration of the remittance of source deduction, that is, the compulsory deductions from salaries for Canada Pension, income tax, unemployment insurance and the like which instead of being remitted monthly, as a result of the February 1987 Budget, must now be remitted fortnightly. That is smoke and mirrors for the Government which will have the effect once only of decreasing its deficit by a billion, making Government figures look better because of an advance payment.

In this Bill before us, Madam Speaker, there are also quite heavy penalties for employers who do not remit. There is the possibility of garnishee. There are a number of serious measures here that require serious attention by a committee that requires witnesses to be called. For the Government to try to smuggle this measure in in the last hour of the last day of this House is not very responsible.

This Bill also makes the 3 per cent surtax announced in February, 1986, permanent. While we knew that the surtax was permanent, we have proof in this Bill. Perhaps here, in order to set the context, it may be useful to look at the astonishing amount of taxation that has been imposed on Canadians since the Government came to power.

In 1984-85, if we add up the income tax on individuals and sales tax, we find an astonishing $36.8 billion, which amount is expected to grow in 1988 to 1989 to $59.1 billion. Look at the effect on families with young children. For a married couple, two wage earners, two children earning $15,000 a year, their total tax increases add up to $470 for the tax year 1987. For a married couple, two wage earners, two children, earning $30,000 a year in the year 1987, they will pay an additional $966.

Where have all these increases come from that bear on individuals? We had partial deindexation in the 1986 taxation tax year. We have seen the 3 per cent surtax on all taxpayers which was effective on July 1, 1986, the temporary surtax on high income individuals about which perhaps we do not have to be too concerned, but we have seen the elimination of the federal tax reduction which was effective in the 1986 tax year on middle and low-income earners and have seen changes to the marital exemption for the year of marriage in the 1986 tax year and the elimination of the Registered Home Ownership Savings Program effective May 22, 1985.

As well as that is the astonishing load after load of sales tax increases: 1 per cent increase in the rate October 1, 1984, a further 1 per cent increase in the rate January 1, 1986, and a further 1 per cent increase in the rate April 1, 1986. The sales tax base was broadened July 1985 and it will be again tomorrow, July, 1987. Sales tax was moved to the wholesale level May 1, 1987. We have seen tremendous increases in excise taxes and so on and on.

I mentioned earlier the question of the early remittance of the compulsory deductions. This particularly hits small businesses. It also hits municipalities and municipalities have suffered considerably at the hands of this Government. The excise tax on fuels is increasing the cost of transportation. The increased sales tax is putting the costs up for municipalities. The additional remittances fortnightly instead of monthly are increasing the paper burden. So you have cities like Toronto saying that as a result they may have to increase property taxes very substantially, something which is harder on the lower and middle-income family earners who are just barely getting by paying mortgages.

Against all of this background of loading taxes on low and middle-income earners, we find that the Government has slid into Bill C-64 measures on the international banking centres which might more properly be called the bankers' relief act.

We find that the bankers who have not asked for it are about to be given tax gifts that may go up to $100 million a year. The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs advised against the establishment of international banking centres as proposed by the Government because the measure, as proposed, is unlikely to create jobs or increase banking activity in Canada unless the Government also moved on withholding tax. The IBC proposal is limited to loans and deposits. Profits from securities, trading, letters of credit and foreign exchange operations will still be taxed. The banks did not request this legislation, but the legislation could result in up to $100 million annually in tax savings for them and tax losses for the Crown. One witness, a tax expert in banking taxation whom we had before the finance committee said:

If I were still a bank taxman, I would be sitting down figuring out what kind of business we would put in (the IBC)—make a profit, tax free, marvellous. Our shareholders would love it.

The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs expressed itself unequivocally in favour of measures to stimulate economic development in Montreal and Vancouver, but the Government's proposal will not do the job. Employment creation will be minimal and the proposal does nothing to help finance international trade for which both Montreal and Vancouver are particularly well placed.

The finance committee had two recommendations. First, that the Minister broaden the current IBC proposal so as to include more financial transactions when it might be useful. Second, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) look into the question of withholding tax because we had much evidence that the withholding tax is the real barrier to bringing back into Canada some of the business that is now done in the Cayman Islands and elsewhere. The Government chose to ignore that advice and it chose to go ahead with this measure, which is clearly inadequate as a regional development measure. It is going to bring high costs to the Crown without creating jobs and without creating economic activity. Why? Because it is considered to be a public relations gesture to please Montreal and Vancouver.

I would suggest that the inhabitants of Montreal and Vancouver are much more astute and they are not going to be taken in by this kind of window dressing. If the Government were serious about increasing economic activity, particularly in the financial sector in those two cities, it should go back to the drawing board and produce a serious measure which this is not.

Finally, I return to the question of why the Government is giving a tax break to the banks at this time, a tax break the banks have not requested. The Government is introducing tax reform which is supposed to eliminate tax breaks. Why is it giving an unasked-for tax break to banks when it is loading taxes onto individuals and young families in an absolutely unprecedented way?

We would like to see this complex Bill referred to the Finance Committee. Not only the measures concerning international banking centres but all the measures that concern retirement planning, the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act should receive serious and careful scrutiny in a situation where witnesses can be called and hopefully where some amendments will be made so that come the fall, we will have a more sensible Bill that we can support.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, it is again a pleasure to have a chance to speak in the House on a piece of legislation. On behalf of my caucus, I would like to indicate that we support sending this legislation to the Finance Committee. Even though some elements of the legislation have received study by the committee, we believe that there are aspects of the legislation in its final form that deserve a more thorough review.

Regarding the refundable sales tax credit, we believe that the measure before us is wholly inadequate to meet the needs of lower-income families and we support the National Council of Welfare's calculation which shows that to fully offset the burden of the new federal sales tax on low-income Canadians, a sales tax credit in the order of $400 per adult and $200 per child would be required and that for a couple with two children, a sales tax credit of $1,200 would be required. Furthermore, we believe that the failure to index these credits to inflation will erode their value over time and will quickly put many more poor Canadians back on the tax rolls.

Our research has calculated that as a consequence of the last three Conservative Budgets and the economic statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), Canadians are paying over $20 billion more in new sales or excise taxes or will be paying that much more by 1990. Average Canadian families are paying $910 over and above what they were paying prior to 1984. We believe that that is completely unacceptable.

As a result of the Conservative Government's taxation policies, the discrepancy between what the rich are paying and what the poor are paying has actually been increased. At a time when the Minister of Finance is talking about tax reform, we believe that these measures will not do anything to adequately meet the concerns of average Canadians and their families.

The personal income tax surtax which was being paid by those in the upper-income levels is now being applied to the majority of taxpayers. That will result in more income for the Government but again, in a way that is unfair, unbalanced and will shift the burden of taxation from the rich to the low and middle-income earners. As a result of that, we have trouble supporting this particular aspect of the legislation.

As I mentioned, the surtax will affect all families. The result will be that people with incomes of $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 per year will pay the surtax, and we believe that is completely unfair. The idea of an income tax surtax is that it should apply to those Canadians who receive the most and have the greatest ability to pay. The measure that is before us at this time certainly does not do that.

The third aspect of the legislation before us is the intent to set up international banking centres. While we recognize that there may be some merit in that, we believe that there are some legitimate concerns. Obviously citizens of Vancouver and Montreal see some potential for job creation within those cities, but again, there is no indication from the information that has been given to us to date that there will be any real increase in jobs. We have heard numbers as low as eight being used in public. The economic benefits of that are low.

In addition, as we all know, taxes paid by Canadian banks are already abysmally low. The banks are not paying their fair share of the tax burden. This legislation creates a situation in which they will be able to find even more tax loopholes in future. We do express some concern over that and look forward to the committee hearings. People who are in favour of banking centres in these cities will have a chance to express their beliefs and those who have concerns will also have the opportunity to do so. As well, representatives from cities that are not included in this special tax regime will also have a chance to make their proposals and express their concerns.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-6, an Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, at the outset, I want to thank my counterparts for their co-operation on Bill S-6. I will be very brief today.

This Bill is an Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act. It has gone through the Senate. The problem first arose some time ago. Back in 1977, Labatt's Breweries of Canada developed a new beer product called Labatt's Special Light containing 4 per cent alcohol. At that time, it was the view of the officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the product was labelled, packaged, sold and advertised in such a manner that it was likely to be mistaken for light beer for which the maximum alcohol content was set at 2.5 per cent by legislation.

That matter went through the various stages of the court system and eventually went all the way to the Supreme Court. It became known as the light beer decision of the Supreme Court. With my reputation for being opposed to tobacco, impaired driving and drugs, I am pleased today to be on the other side and to do something for those who want to drink Labatt's Special Light and other such substances.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp (Provencher): To make a long story very short, the court ruled that certain Sections of the Food and Drugs Act were ultra vires. For this whole period of time, this matter has been before us. Canadian manufacturers, breweries and consumer groups have all been abiding by a system known as the food recipe system. On the other hand it has not allowed us to force it, for example, on imports.

• (1930)

These changes would allow us to remove the uncertainty in the private sector over the status of federal food products standards. They will permit amendments which reflect new technology and facilitate the handling of our international obligations in this area. It will put us back into the stream where we have usually been and allow us to protect both Canadian consumers and manufacturers.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I had about a three-hour speech prepared. However, in the interests of time and in the interests of guests who I have here from Florida, Mark Garcia, his wife Barbara and their daughter Mandy, I will cut this very short.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Copps: I concur with the Minister in that we hope this Bill will address certain concerns expressed through the Supreme Court decision. I only ask that the Government and whoever develops these Bills to please try in the future to make the wording a little cleaner and crisper. Just for the record, I would like to read Clause 1 of the Bill into the record to let people know how hard it is sometimes to follow government rules because we cannot even understand them. I was reading this and trying to figure out what it meant. It says in part:

> (2) Paragraphs (1)(b) and (c) do not apply to an operator of a conveyance that is used to carry an article or to a carrier of an article whose sole concern, in respect of the article, is the conveyance of the article unless the operator or carrier could, with reasonable diligence, have ascertained that the conveying or receiving for conveyance of the article or the possession of the article or the possession of the article for the purpose of conveyance would be in violation of subsection (1).

You can understand why the average taxpayer gets confused. Nonetheless, the substance of the Bill is supportable and we will support it.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on this Bill as my Party's representative on food and drug matters. I suppose had he been able to be with us tonight, our spokesperson for consumer and corporate affairs would have led off the debate.

We see this Bill as a tightening up of the legislation governing the labelling and production of food additives. We think it could be quite useful to the manufacturers of food products to protect them from the kind of additives which might not be permitted in Canada but which may be imported from other countries or, as the Bill says, from other provinces. It gives the federal Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs the kind of power it feels it needs to monitor shipments of food from one jurisdiction to the other, whether it be a country or a province, with the objective of taking samples of the food to be tested to find out whether the additives used in that food or beverage meet the standards of Canadian law.

As the Minister pointed out, this came about because of a bit of a jurisdictional argument regarding Labatt's so-called light beer. The result, after it went to the Supreme Court, was that the old Food and Drugs Act was ruled to be inadequate for the kind of monitoring the federal Government felt it had to do. These amendments are an attempt to clarify that and tighten up the law. We think this rather short Bill should go to committee to permit the food industry importers and manufacturers of food products an opportunity to assess the proposal and see whether this meets their requirements as well as those of Canadian consumers.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the Government for having brought forward this Bill. Quite frankly, I think the Liberals screwed the whole situation up by allowing this matter to go to the courts. What the Government is doing now is cleaning up a mess the previous Liberal Government had created.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): We are doing it for all the beer drinkers.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am a light beer drinker and when any Government starts tampering with the percentage I get very, very—

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I am not.

Mr. Rodriguez: I know that the town of which the Minister was a councillor is still dry. It is only appropriate that he should be bringing forward this Bill tonight.

Mr. Althouse: No axe to grind.

Mr. Rodriguez: No one can accuse him of a conflict of interest. Far, far from it.

I want to congratulate the Government for clearing this matter up. I particularly like Clause 6.1(1) which says:

> The Governor in Council may, by regulation, identify a standard or any portion of a standard prescribed for a food as being necessary to prevent injury to the health of the consumer or purchaser of the food.

In the past we have been notoriously lax on this question of food additives. I remember when red dye used to be inserted into meat to make it appear more red to the consumer. That clause gives me a lot of confidence that we now have someone in charge at the switch who can make decisions consistent with the health of the purchaser of the food.

I have another concern which this Bill does not cover. As the Minister is in a mood to listen to representations on the question of beer and alcohol, I understand there are certain beers we cannot get in Ontario.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Ontario liquor laws.

Mr. Rodriguez: The Minister says it is the Ontario liquor laws. I want to send him a clear message. He should sit down with his counterparts in the Ontario Government and try to clear up some of these problems. We are talking about free trade with the U.S. and we do not have free trade in this country between provinces. I go to Nova Scotia and like to drink Moosehead beer. Yet in Ontario we cannot get it. That points up a problem with respect to free trade in Canada. We have barriers to free trade between the provinces. Since the Minister cleared up this mess which the Liberals created, maybe he ought to go and look at what can be done to alleviate the problem with respect to the free movement of food in Canada.

I remember another problem where McDonald's could not bring in hamburger buns from western Canada. They ended up buying American buns because they could not bring Canadian buns across provincial borders. I am using this opportunity because these are things the Government and the Minister should be aware of.

Mr. Kaplan: Point of order, Madam Speaker. Normally I would not intervene but there are only 20 minutes left and I wonder if the Hon. Member, while he is telling us about the NDP perspective on hamburgers, realizes there are other Bills we were hoping to get to before eight o'clock this evening.

• (1940)

Mr. Murphy: I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. In response to the concern of the Member of the Liberal caucus, it is certainly our intention—

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Did I hear the hon. gentleman say "the chairman of the Liberal caucus"?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. The Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has the floor.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I certainly apologize to the incumbent chairman of the national Liberal caucus. I certainly did not want to create any rebellion in the ranks.

Mr. Prud'homme: We have enough, thank you.

Mr. Murphy: However, to respond seriously to the concern of his colleague, the Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) will be our last speaker on this Bill. We will then allow it to proceed to Committee of the Whole, to pass through all stages prior to eight o'clock, and to allow the next piece of legislation to be brought forward.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I was specifically referring to the hamburger buns because I think the Minister is in a receptive mood to hear suggestions. The Government is hell-bent to create free trade between Canada and the United States and we cannot move hamburger buns between provinces. Can you believe that? I cannot believe that for a minute.

This looks like a very small Bill but I have become very leery of Bills slipping through in the dying hours of a sitting and giving the Government power. I have complimented the Government on this Bill, but I see something missing from it. As an example of the power that the Government has been given, it can:

—enter any conveyance that the inspector believes on reasonable grounds is used to carry any article to which section 6 or 6.1 applies and examine any such article found therein and take samples thereof—

What about having search warrants? We are giving officers of the Crown a lot of power, the power to seize.

I also see that there is a lack of any process for appeal. If I believe my product is all right and the inspector thinks I am in breach of this—

Mr. Wise: These are amendments to an Act.

Mr. Rodriguez: I know these are amendments to an Act.

Mr. Wise: There is another part to the Act.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right, there's another part of the Act. However, I want to point that out to the Minister because he has brought this Bill forward and he is certainly not an expert on beer. I wonder whether he has taken that into consideration.

What about penalty clauses in case someone contravenes these sections? I will be asking these questions when we go into Committee of the Whole. I want to satisfy myself that we are not giving the inspectors undue powers and that we do have penalties which can act as a deterrent to people putting products on the market which have been declared unsafe for consumers and purchasers. I will ask those questions when we get into Committee of the Whole. I know the Minister will be forthcoming with his answers.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order before we get to the "Bunsmaster" of the New Democratic Party. There have been discussions among the Parties and I think you would find unanimous consent for the passage of a motion. We are seeking unanimous consent to proceed upon the understanding that the critics for the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party on Energy, Mines and Resources be provided with a copy of the report to which I will refer prior to it being tabled. I move:

That notwithstanding the usual practices of the House, if the House is not sitting when the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources is completed, the committee shall present its report by filing it with the Clerk of the House provided that the report shall then be deemed to have been laid upon the table.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent for the motion of the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 78, I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

House in Committee of the Whole on Bill S-6, (from the Senate) an Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act—Mr. Epp (Provencher)—Mrs. Champagne in the Chair.

On Clause 1—

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Chairman, I posed some questions when speaking earlier. I ask the Minister to respond to my questions with regard to the penalty clauses.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Madam Chairman, the Member for Nickel Belt asked about the penalty clauses. The penalty clauses are incorporated in the Food and Drugs Act. These are amendments to the Food and Drugs Act and do not change the scope or extent of the penalties presently in the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Chairman, is there a process for appeals?

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Madam Chairman, the answer to that question is similar to the answer to the first. There is an appeal procedure under the Food and Drug Act. However, quite frankly, in terms of the seizing of products and the appeal process, it is not an appeal process similar to that which we are used to in a judicial sense because of the type of product that would be seized and the shelf life of products. Therefore there is a sensitivity there.

However, we have found, through working with our inspectors, the consumers groups, and the retailers and wholesalers, that there is a reasonable balance in the approach and the sensitivity of inspectors. However, I cannot put forward an appeal process outside of the Food and Drugs Act presently constituted. It is not similar to that with which we are familiar in a judicial system.

Ms. Copps: Madam Chairman, I realize that it characterizes the NDP to run off at the mouth. I was sitting outside and could not believe my ears. I know that the former Liberal Government was responsible for many evils—

Mr. Murphy: Agreed.

Ms. Copps: My back was burning—

Mr. Murphy: I rise on a point of order, Madam Chairman. If the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain—or Hamilton East—would like to move a motion to that effect, I am sure she could get unanimous consent for it.

Ms. Copps: Madam Chairman, I understand the Freudian slip of the tongue about the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain because when September comes the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain will be sitting on this side of the House among the Liberals.

However, I will be brief because we have all agreed that this is a measure which should be passed and will be passed. Why are they wasting our time coming up with spurious arguments, complaining about a decision of the Supreme Court?

• (1950)

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Madam Chairman, the Hon. Member is right in the sense that the Cabinet of the former Government had instructed the drafting of this legislation back in 1983. It died on the Order Paper.

My concern is not with the past. My concern as Minister of National Health and Welfare is that we have the ability to enforce that which Canadians are now following voluntarily in terms of the Food and Drug Act. Others who might be importing goods are not necessarily bound by that morally or legally. That is my concern.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Chairman, how does the Minister intend to enforce the transport of food between provinces? Will inspectors be at the border? What will happen if there is free trade with the United States? Will there still be no free trade between provinces?

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Madam Chairman, we have food inspectors now. I do not have the exact number, but there are approximately 550 to 570 across Canada. We do this inspection now.

This amendment allows us to do it legally, which we have been doing otherwise, and were doing prior to the Supreme Court decision. That remains in place.

In fact, we are finding that the industry is very much interested that inspectors have this power legally in order that the industry is also protected from practices being used without the power of law which we had earlier.

In terms of free trade, I believe that if there is a trade agreement, obviously conditions under the Food and Drugs Act and other import Acts relating to health and safety of Canadians would be in place.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 1 carry?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Epp (Provencher) moved that the Bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When shall the Bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp (Provencher) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE, IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976 AND CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Citizenship Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a very important Bill. Indeed, it is an historical Bill which I have the honour to present for second reading.

Unfortunately, without commenting on what has transpired here, due to the circumstances of the business of the House, we find ourselves with five minutes within which we are expected to deal with a Bill that I believe is very important and which has been developed by all Members of the House in a spirit of non-partisanship and co-operation that I believe is important for legislation of this sort.

I had rather hoped that we would make progress before the summer recess and, indeed, today I was in receipt of a package of amendments that were presented to me and which have been cleared by members of the Opposition in discussions with members of all Parties.

These amendments constitute a package which involve very important concepts and fundamental questions with respect to the operative sections of the legislation.

Indeed, my friend, the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), spoke to me this morning with respect to a particular provision. I have had an opportunity to discuss this matter with my staff to try to determine whether or not there was a possibility of having these matters dealt with today. Regrettably, I have come to the conclusion that the amendments, some of which affect the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act, and which I would be required to discuss with my colleagues, the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard). It is important for us to deal with this matter carefully. I could have rejected the amendments, one of which would have made this legislation retroactive rather than retrospective.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the importance of this legislation, and in view of the fact that there appears to be a consensus among the Parties with respect to the matter, I would seek unanimous consent at this point, given the hour, that we proceed with this legislation notwithstanding the clock, until it has received and completed second reading.

In view of the fundamental importance of dealing with this matter expeditiously, I would seek unanimous consent for us not to see the clock in order that we might complete second reading of this important legislation.

Message from the Senate

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House might be amenable to the suggestion made by the Hon. Member. However, in the spirit of co-operation, there are other Bills that other Members would like to pass. I wonder if the Hon. Member would be agreeable to passing Bill C-83 as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There seems to be negotiations taking place on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Prud'homme: To say the least.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There are some messages I would like to read to the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I am here in all seriousness to try to do the right thing with respect to this legislation. I can assure Members of the House that this is a matter of very great importance to the Government. I am not going to have the matter dealt with in a slapdash, haphazard manner.

I can assure the House that I will call on my House Leader to make arrangements to have this matter brought up at the earliest date when this House reconvenes. It will be a priority matter for us. I want to deal with this legislation and we will deal with it in a manner which does it justice and, I hope, in a spirit of non-partisanship that has prevailed on this. I realize there is an order of the House, Madam Speaker. I can only say that I will continue my remarks when we next have the opportunity. I hope I receive the co-operation of the House.

• (2000)

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, just so there is no confusion in the House, we are certainly not tying the progress of this piece of legislation to any other legislation in the House.

Order. the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), on a point of order.

• (2200)

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are not numerous, we back-benchers, but some of us would like to first offer you our best wishes for the summer. We would then like to thank the staff who has worked so late tonight. More especially, we would like to say how much we will miss the Pages, these young, beautiful Canadians who come from all across Canada.

Some of us may not have been kind to them at times, some of us may not have been as patient as we should have been, but by now, they know why. They know we mean well, they know we love them. I am not shy to say we love them. They are good young Canadians.

[Translation]

We wish them luck in their carerrs—

[English]

And now, I see that some of them are becoming emotional. I think some of them have tears in their eyes. Do not be afraid to cry sometime. That shows that you have passion and emotion.

We have been served very well by beautiful young Canadians. I would like on behalf of my colleagues—not my Party but my colleagues in all three Parties—to thank them for their patience with us. They knew and they know now how much we love them and how much we mean it when we say—

[Translation]

Good luck. Come back and see us, and have a good summer.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would join with my colleague in his sentiments expressed for the staff who have persevered with us today including the Table, yourself and others who have served in the chair, as well as the Hansard reporters. I would also join with my friend in saying that the Pages have seen Parliament at its best and occasionally Parliament at its worst. That is the way it goes. They have enjoyed a tremendous opportunity as young people to come to the nation's capital to begin their university education and to get an education in how this place works. They will be able to see it from two sides now. I guess there are 40 or so young people who will take a different view of Government out to the world and that is very important.

I wish you bonne chance in your endeavours and we hope you will come back and see us again. Thank you very much and enjoy the summer.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do know that earlier today, Mr. Speaker thanked the staff and our Pages. I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Lewis) for expressing what all of us feel. In my own name and in the name of my colleagues who have the privilege of sharing the chair with Mr. Speaker, I would like to give our best wishes and our love to all of you.

[Translation]

Have a good summer.

It being 10.07 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 4, the House stands adjourned until Monday, September 14, 1987, at eleven o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

At 10.07 p.m. the House adjourned.
