With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) as to the wages being paid to workmen in Canadian mills, I submit to him and to the House that we must take into account, not the nominal wages, but the real wages the workmen receive; that is to say, the purchasing power of the money which they receive in this country as compared with the purchasing power of the money which the workmen receive in Great Britain, and if that is taken into consideration I think we shall find that the two sets of workmen are practically on a par. In that connection I would like to submit to the same hon. member and to the House that it is in the interest of the manufacturers that the cost of living, which is enhanced in this country by tariff duties, should be reduced. That will make the production of manufactured goods cheaper, and will not only enable our own people to get these goods cheaper but will also enable our manufacturers to compete to some extent in the foreign market.

With regard to the whole situation it seems to me that we ought to have some kind of fundamental principle to which to refer our specific acts. If we are going to adopt the principle and policy that every particular industry has got to be made to pay, and if we are going to subsidize them by state action until they do pay, then the only thing to do is to have a fair deal all round. The farmers say, and I think they could prove with absolute certainty, that under present conditions they cannot produce wheat, particularly in our western provinces, and make ends meet. If we are going to follow the policy with regard to them that we have followed in the case of some of the manufacturers, we shall have to give them a subsidy or bounty on their wheat. I think a farmer could make a nice little profit with a bounty of 50 cents a bushel on his wheat. If we are going to adopt the principle, make it fair all round. But I submit that the whole thing is unsound, and if we are going to follow that principle we shall get led into all kinds of difficulties. I would like to see this government, as I have stated on previous occasions recognize that there are a lot of industries like people walking on stilts. They have to be got down to the ground, and they should be got down as quickly as possible, and then we shall have a condition where industries that are natural to this country will be developed, and industries that cannot be made to pay in this country will not be maintained as parasites on the successful and indigenous industries. I think there has been, and is now, a good deal of fallacy in regard to a number of these questions.

Just one other point before I sit down. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) stated that in his opinion domestic competition would regulate prices, and therefore we did not need to take account of the tariff. I submit that under the protection of the tariff it is almost inevitable in a great variety of industries that manufacturers should get together and agree on prices, and pretty soon we have no competition. If we could maintain real active competition among the manufacturers, then the protective duty would not be so serious, but the fact of the matter is the tariff is an encouragement to combines, and pretty soon we are up against the situation where there is not any competition and the consumers are exploited for the benefit of a monopoly. If we could preserve competition it would not be so very serious a matter, because all profits tend to the same level, but where you have no real competition, and I do think that in many, many lines we have had no real competition at all, it is a very serious matter to maintain the tariff.

Resolution No. 1 agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

2. Resolved, that the Customs tariff, 1907 be further amended by adding after section 8A the following as sections 8B and 8C:—

8B. The Governor in Council may authorize any Minister of the Crown to enter into negotiations with any authorized representative of the government of the United States with a view to the making of a commercial agreement between the two countries on terms that may be deemed mutually beneficial. Any agreement so made shall be subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada.

8C. If the President of the United States, under authority of the United States Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce by fifty per cent the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say:—

Cattle; wheat; wheat flour; oats, barley, potatoes onions; turnips; hay; fish as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719 and 720 of the said Tariff Act of 1922, the Governor in Council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on similar articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States.

Mr. FIELDING: I move to strike out the words "by fifty per cent" after the word "reduce" in the second line of paragraph 8 C.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) offered a suggestion in regard to an amendment here. If anybody in his behalf would like to take the matter up, I have no objection. It was on the second reciprocity resolution. Perhaps we had better wait a few minutes.

Mr. MANION: I have no desire to hold up the resolution, but I would like the minister to wait a few minutes, in case the hon. leader of the Opposition might wish to say something.

Mr. FIELDING: Very well. We can go on to another item.

Resolution stands.

Customs tariff—Schedule A:

3. Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter sixteen of the statutes of 1910, by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1914, by chapter five of the statutes of 1914 (second session), by chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1919, by chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1921, by chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1922, and by order in council, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items:—83a, 99, 134, 135, 143a, 168, 235, 242, 281, 328, 348b, 365, 374, 386, 441a, 442, 469, 586, 638a, 670, 690a, 710b, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and to repeal section 1 (i) of Order in Council, P.C. 16/1556, dated fifth day of June, 1912, designated as item 760 of The Customs Tariff, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:—

Mr. FIELDING: I wish to make a slight correction in paragraph 1 of resolution No. 3. I move to amend the resolution as follows:

That item No. 242 be struck out, and that items 581 and 581a be inserted after the item 469.

Amendment agreed to.

Customs tariff—Hemp seed for agricultural purposes:—British preferential tariff free; Intermediate tariff free; General tariff free.

Mr. FIELDING: The first item in this resolution is 72, "Hemp seed for agricultural purposes," is free under all the tariffs.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Customs tariff—Potatoes when imported from a country which imposes a customs duty on potatoes grown in Canada, per 100 pounds, British preferential tariff 20 cents; Intermediate tariff, 35 cents; General tariff 35 cents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is slightly more than the previous rate.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a mere change from bushels to per 100 pounds, and the figures are believed to be the exact equivalent, within a fraction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Slightly over.

Mr. FIELDING: Possibly so.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Prunes and dried plums, unpitted, per pound: British preferential tariff ½ cent; Intermediate tariff ⅔ cents; General tariff ⅔ cents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the effect of this change?

Mr. FIELDING: In the first item just read there is no change, but the next item, which we might read in connection with it, needs an explanation. That is the duty on raisins and dried currants, which I mentioned as having relation to the possibility of business with Australia. It will be remembered I explained to the House that, although the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) had not been fortunate enough to conclude an agreement with Australia, he had reason to believe a change of this nature would go a long way towards inducing the Australian government to make an arrangement with us, and for that reason the proposal was made that "raisins and dried currants" should be made free from Australia—free under the preference—while the duty of 3 cents, which is an increase, is to be imposed under the intermediate and general tariffs. On further consideration it occurs to us that while the object is a commendable one, we have this situation; that it may be some time before the Australian government will manifest their concurrence and offer any return. We propose by way of amendment to let that duty stand for the present, with the condition that we may bring in the new duty by proclamation by the Governor in Council; that is to say, when we get any intimation from Australia that she is willing to reciprocate this new duty will be imposed. In the meantime the old duty will remain. There has been some criticism in regard to this on the ground that it is a substantial increase of duty. The object I have already explained. As some months may elapse before we can get the Australian government to take any action, we think it is wise to make a provision that the duty for the present shall remain unchanged, and that the other duty shall come into effect only on proclamation of the Governor in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely after the trip of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), we are not still without any results at all? If I remember rightly, the minister, by a policy of discreet silence and wise looks, rather led us to believe that he had made considerable progress in Australia. Is he not yet ready to disclose just the extent of that progress? Is the whole result of his visit to be that he is able to advise us to put a duty on raisins and currants.

Mr. ROBB: The Australian government will meet next week and we shall hear what they have to say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would it not be well to hear what our plenipotentiary has to disclose in the meantime?

Mr. BUREAU: It would be very undiplomatic to disclose it.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend must exercise a little patience.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am led to infer that the extent of the progress made is indicated in the speech of the minister. Can we not get any further information? What does he expect to get from Australia when he goes back? Is all that he is looking for something that can be gained by giving Australia a preference on currants and raisins? Is there nothing else that would be more adequate compensation for what he expects to get by way of concessions from Australia? I have not seen very much in the way of tariff reciprocity or tariff reduction in evidence in the Australian policy of late, not on the part of the Labour party, nor of the Liberal party, nor of the Country party. The minister has been to Australia, and if he has not forgotten his impressions because of the length of the journey he took coming home, surely he can give us some idea of what the nature of this Australian treaty will probably be.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will have to exercise a little further patience until our Australian friends have time to meet and to submit their proposition to their parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So as yet we have not got to the extent of even a proposition. The minister, in the midst of an election in Australia, went all the way around by the Fiji islands, called on Australia, received their hospitality, made speeches at their banquets, came back through the southern tepid waters, sailed along the coast of China—

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —not too far away, I hope, to be admired by the aborigines on shore. Then he bathed his intellect in the ancient lore of India, came along the Suez canal and, I suppose, explored the recesses of the Nile, possibly anticipated the march of Britain's aristocracy into the tombs of the Pharaohs. Finally he came home, and all we can get is that we are waiting for a proposition from Australia.

Mr. BUREAU: My right hon. friend knows that you cannot disclose diplomatic relations without the consent of the other party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May we know who is likely to be the next missionary to Australia? From what I hear in this debate the chances appear to favour the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. BUREAU: I wish they would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What itinerary would he likely take?

Mr. BUREAU: I will consult my right hon. friend. He knows his geography so well and seems to have enjoyed those various climates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never seen them nor felt them.

Mr. BUREAU: Then I will not consult my right hon. friend. He is drawing on his imagination.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We attended to business when we were in power. With us the matter was not one merely of globe-trotting and pastimes of that sort. I think, however, the committee can readily conclude that there was no result whatever from the visit to Australia, and judging from the preparation being made in this budget, little hope may be entertained.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is eloquence.

Mr. GOULD: I am pleased to note that my right hon. friend is pressing this point with the minister and the government, because, while he stated that nothing was secured, the fact remains, according to the item under discussion, that we have received an extra three cents per pound duty, or an increase in price to the consuming public. Upon that basis it is not for us to suggest that other ministers should go next year, but rather we would suggest that they should all be kept at home. If that is a means of paying expenses, it is very expensive on the rest of us, particularly in the West, where not being able to grow apples and other fruits, we buy raisins and this article appears very frequently by compulsion on our tables. Why try to induce our Australian cousins to enter into a treaty with us if a treaty of this nature is going to be more expensive to us? If that be the case, we shall do without the treaty and build up a Canada of our own, or as the old phrase goes, attend to our own business absolutely, because I do not believe it is good policy to pay a price to get a treaty such as is indicated by this item. Possibly if this item should pass without any criticism whatever, other ministers might be inclined to go next year and bring us back further concessions of this nature. We have been protesting for a long time against this principle, and I protest at the present time against this thing of going any further.

Mr. BANCROFT: I am glad the government has decided not to put into effect this increase of 250 per cent in the tariff tax on raisins and currants. This would mean, I believe, an increase of about 4 cents a pound to the consumer in Canada on this staple article of food. Based on last year's consumption, an increase of 4 cents a pound would mean $1,489,538 that the people of Canada would have to pay more for raisins and currants because of this duty if it goes into effect. Last year we purchased over 30,000,000 pounds of raisins from the United States and only 280 pounds from Australia. If we purchased all the raisins that Australia produces, this would supply only one-third of our requirements.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be some treaty.

Mr. BANCROFT: Yes, it is quite a treaty. This new tariff means that we would tax the people of Canada approximately one and one-half million dollars for the purpose of hauling raisins and currants seven thousand miles from Australia. I am glad the government is not going to put this new duty into effect, at least for the time being.

Mr. EVANS: I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) to give us some idea of the raisin business in Australia. This seems to be one of the most foolish items that has come out in the budget this year. Since we purchase so little from Australia, this thing looks to me like an excuse to raise the general tariff to three cents a pound. There is no excuse for this duty, by which we increase the price of a commodity which is so much needed by rich and poor alike. There is simply no excuse for making such a treaty on this basis with Australia, since the Australians cannot supply us with anything like the quantity we need even if we take all they raise. The minister might give us some idea in regard to that industry in Australia.

Mr. ROBB: The Australian crop of raisins is considerable and is increasing yearly; and especially in the Madura district and in other parts where returned soldiers have been engaged, they have been producing a splendid quality of raisins in large quantities. There is such a bulk of raisins there now that some difficulty is being found in marketing them, and as hon. gentlemen may have noticed, they have been urging the British government to give them a preference in this direction. While it is true that in the tariff we are proposing to increase somewhat the duty on raisins, hon. gentlemen have lost sight of the fact that we are making them free in the British preferential list; that is to say, if raisins come from Australia or any other British possession they will enter Canada free. Bearing that in mind, it might be well to consider the policies of other countries in regard to this particular commodity. If my hon. friends want to have raisins absolutely free from any customs duties, I do not know where they could go to find a tariff that would suit them. Let me put on Hansard the duties levied in certain other countries. For example, in the United States there is a tax on raisins of 2 cents per pound; in Mexico 3 cents; in the Argentine republic, 3 cents under certain conditions and 5 cents under other circumstances; in Brazil 7½ cents per pound. Free trade Great Britain has a tax on raisins of 2¼ cents per pound and gives under the British preference 5/6 of the total rate. So that after all we are only increasing our tariff by ¾ of a cent more than the rate that now obtains in Great Britain, and we are going one better by making them free on the preferential list. Belgium levies a rate of 2¾ cents per pound; Italy, 3⅓ cents a pound; and a number of other countries have rates in proportion, ranging from ½ cent up to 7 and 8 cents a pound.

Mr. BANCROFT: Does the minister argue that the price of raisins in this country will be reduced by placing this commodity on the free list under the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think the price will be increased.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Are the Australian raisins seedless?

Mr. ROBB: They are both.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am informed by a large user of raisins in my own district that the Australian raisins are not seedless, nor are they as good as the others. I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance has set aside this particular clause for the time being. I have a telegram from certain manufacturers of mincemeat in my own district who use large quantities of raisins, and they tell me that such a duty as this will be a great handicap to their particular business. The minister has reduced the duty on the British goods of their manufacture, while at the same time it is proposed to impose a duty on the ingredients that go into that article. That seems to be cutting on both sides of this business.

Mr. FIELDING: A case of mincemeat.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is more than mincemeat so far as they are concerned. I do not know that a machine is necessary to put them out of business; that is being done pretty effectively now. The same company make plum puddings, and I fancy that the plum pudding business in Canada will go; and they will also be hurt, under the British preference, in the manufacture of jams. I heard the other day that the English people were putting a big tax on sugar. Now, when that sugar is exported into Canada in jams and in mincemeat the English manufacturer virtually gets a rebate of the tax on sugar. I should like to know whether there is any method of putting on an extra tax to meet the importation of sugar as embodied in these goods. Practically 65 per cent of the cost of jams consists in the price of sugar, and sugar in this particular case comes in practically free. It seems to me that these businesses are being injured to a considerable extent by this British preference, and it does strike me that it would not make much difference, if I were a manufacturer of this particular line of goods, whether I was hurt by my own relatives overseas or was put out of business by other means. If I am to be put out of business at all, I cannot see that it makes a great deal of difference whether it is done by Englishmen or by Frenchmen. No doubt there is a certain degree of sentiment in the former case; some hon. gentlemen might say perhaps, that it would be preferable to be put out of business by the English people.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose I said that.

Mr. FIELDING: This item must be considered in relation to the object we have in view. We have been anxious to cultivate trade relations with Australia; I think we all agree to that. The late government had been in negotiation with Australia with a view to coming to some understanding if possible in this matter. They laboured in all sincerity, but I do not think they were very successful. We have now taken the matter up and are trying to come to some arrangement with the Australian authorities. If we agree that it is desirable to make some arrangement with Australia in order that we may have access to their markets for our own products, we must be prepared to meet them in some way by making some concession. We have offered them our British preference in return for the preference they give to Great Britain, but so far they have not been willing to accept this proposal. There is a hitch for the moment, but it has been intimated to us, not only by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) who has personal knowledge of the matter, but also by others interested in the Australian business, that if we make this concession in regard to the duty on raisins and currants it will go a long way towards disposing the Australians to come to terms with us. If they are pleased to take that view, foolish though it may seem to some people, and small though the point may be, we think it is worth our while, in view of the consideration that such a concession as this may influence the Australian policy in our favour, to do what is now proposed if the sacirfice is not too great. That is the whole story. Unquestionably we want to do business with them, but so far we have not been able to. This is proposed as one way of bringing about an understanding that will be beneficial to us, and I ask the House to agree to it on that ground. In the meantime, for the reason I have stated, some months will elapse before we shall do business with them and the duty will not be imposed immediately. If they meet us in the proper spirit and concede something which we consider will benefit the whole of Canada, the question is, is this a price we can afford to pay? We think it is worth considering.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I commend the minister for coming to the conclusion that the next time he undertakes to trade he will see that he has something to trade with.

Mr. FIELDING: I am going to get armed this time and see what the effect will be on those people who find fault.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not finding fault at all. When you are trying to trade on behalf of the country as a whole with another country it is a very good thing to have something to trade with, and I congratulate my hon. friend. How this particular item works out one way or the other I do not know, but I entirely agree with the principle that he should have something to trade with, and I only regret that my hon. friend did not find that out sooner. Before adjournment at six o'clock I was saying something about what I understood my hon. friend's intention to be that, having regard to the French treaty, the relative equality between England and France was to be maintained. I would ask him to be sure that his figures are correct in respect to brandies. He will remember that he told us that cognac and armagnac are the expensive brandies and would not interfere very much in our market with Scotch and Canadian whiskies. The information I have is that having regard to the currency as well as the cost of production, the distillery cost of the cognac brandy is $3 as against $7 for Scotch whiskey and $6 for Canadian whiskey. Of course, the excise duty on the Scotch whiskey remains at $10, while the cognac brandies would take the same excise duty as our own product, namely, $9. I am further told that the cost of laying these commodities down in bulk, including distillery cost, duty, sales tax and freight, would be $19.25 for the Scotch, $16 for the Canadian, and $13.10 for the brandy. If they were bottled getting down to the usual basis of a case of twelve bottles at 1½ proof spirits, the cost would be $30.88 for the Scotch, $26 for the Canadian, and $21.65 for the brandy. Of course, after having told my friend about other figures, I hesitate to say that any are correct, but this is the best information that I have and I hope he will check the information he has with a view of seeing if his former statement is correct, for I imagine he desires to leave these commodities on a parity.

Mr. FIELDING: Although the matter has been disposed of, I am glad my hon. friend has called attention to it. I think we had better see what the competition of cognac brandy amounts to. Cognac is a common expression, but I think the cognac contemplated by the treaty is not the same article. Indeed, that was one of the points the French government attached very much importance to. They thought that a great deal of so-called cognac was not cognac brandy at all, and they did not desire a special concession for it, but they wanted to be guaranteed a fair rate for this particular cognac, which must be certified by government officials and be accompanied by their certificates. I think when that test is applied very much of the brandy my hon. friend refers to will be found not to come within the description at all. However, the information, some of which has come to me also, is rather conflicting. As the French treaty will not go into effect for some months I think we can safely let this remain for the time being and if from experience it be found that the French brandy gets any advantage over our Canadian spirits I would be prepared to give the matter consideration when this is in evidence.

Mr. LEWIS: I do not see the connection between raisins and French brandies, unless the raisins are used for home brew.

Mr. FIELDING: There is none.

Mr. LEWIS: At the same time I do feel that this is rather a weak argument to put forward in favour of a preference to Australia. Raisins have become a very essential food in the ordinary family budget, and by the time this tariff reaches the consumer it will certainly mean between four and five cents a pound extra. When we have a better product in close proximity, it seems to me a little too expensive to bring raisins all the way from Australia with a view to effecting a trade agreement which may or may not be consummated for years to come. I am glad though that the resolution is to be deferred by order in council until this agreement materializes.

Mr. LUCAS: I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) to give a list of tariffs imposed by other countries against the importation of raisins running all the way from 2¼ up to as high as 7 cents a pound. Is there any other country that gives Australia as good a market to-day as Canada in regard to a tariff duty on raisins?

Mr. ROBB: Not if we place ours upon the free list.

Mr. GOULD: Would the Minister of Finance inform the committee just what concessions the government is seeking in the Australian market which would be beneficial to Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: We offered to exchange our preferential tariff for their preferential tariff without qualifications. They claimed that that was not good enough for them. They would give us as good terms as they granted to any other country, but they would not give us the same treatment as they granted to Great Britain. It is on that point that the hitch has occurred. We have some reason to hope that the item suggested here will be an attraction to them and will remove some of the objections they have urged and result in a more acceptable arrangement.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Raisins and dried currants per pound: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, 3 cents; General tariff, 3 cents.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move that resolution No. 3 of the Customs Tariff Resolutions of 11th May, 1923, be amended to read as follows:—

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend tariff item 99b of the Customs tariff, 1907, to read as follows:—

Tariff item 99b—Raisins and dried currants, per pound: British preferential tariff, ½ cent; Intermediate tariff, ⅔ cent; General tariff, ⅔ cent.

The Governor in Council may by order in council direct that there be substituted for tariff item 99b in schedule A of the Customs tariff, 1907, the enumeration of goods and the rates of duties of Customs set opposite said item in schedule A the following:—

Tariff item 99c—Raisins and dried currants, per pound: British preferental tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, 3 cents; General tariff, 3 cents.

2. From and after the publication of such order in council in the Canada Gazette tariff item 99b as it appears in said schedule at the time of the passing of the act founded on this resolution shall be repealed and the provisions of tariff item 99c shall be substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Custome tariff—All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, not covered by tariff item No. 135, when not exceeding eighty-eight degrees of polarization, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 83 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.50; general tariff, $1.50;

when exceeding eighty-eight degrees but not exceeding eighty-nine degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 85 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.53; general tariff, $1.53.

when exceeding eighty-nine degrees but not exceeding ninety degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 87 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.55; general tariff, $1.55; when exceeding ninety degrees but not exceeding ninety-one degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 89 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.58; general tariff, $1.58.

when exceeding ninety-one degrees but not exceeding ninety-two degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 91 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.62; general tariff, $1.62.

when exceeding ninety-two degrees but not exceeding ninety-three degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 93 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.65; general tariff, $1.65.

when exceeding ninety-three degrees but not exceeding ninety-four degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 95 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.68; general tariff, $1.68.

when exeeding ninety-four degrees but not exceeding ninety-five degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 97 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.70; general tariff, $1.70.

when exceeding ninety-five degrees but not exceeding ninety-six degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 99 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.74; general tariff, $1.74;

when exceeding ninety-six degrees but not exceeding ninety-seven degrees, per one hundred pounds; British preferential tariff, $1.01; intermediate tariff, $1,77; general tariff, $1.77;

when exceeding ninety-seven degrees, but not exceeding ninety-eight degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, $1.03; intermediate tariff, $1.80; general tariff, $1.80.

when exceeding ninety-eight degrees, but not exceeding ninety-nine degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, $1.09; intermediate tariff, $1.89; general tariff, $1.89;

Provided that refined sugar shall be entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff upon evidence satisfactory to the Minister of Customs and Excise, that such refined sugar has been manufactured wholly from raw sugar produced in the British colonies and possessions, and not otherwise.

Provided further that sugar imported under this item shall not be subject to special duty when the home consumption value at the place of shipment direct to Canada is more than eight cents per pound.

Mr. FIELDING: Hon. members will note that there are two provisos at the end of this sugar item; the second of these I desire to amend. It has been the subject of consideration with the refining interests, with parties interested in the West Indies trade, and so on, and the conclusion we have adopted is to offer a substitute in the following words, which will be found in the amended resolution of May 23:

Provided further that sugar imported under this item shall not be subject to special duty in excess of three-fourths of one cent per pound.

The full limitation in the Dumping Act is 15 per cent, which, on the present value of sugar, would be at the rate of 1½ cents per pound. We have thought that is an extreme protection to give them. The figures in this item in detail are meant to correspond exactly with the old duty less a reduction of 50 cents. It is a difficult matter to work out, I think, correctly; so that as respects the general duty there is substantially no change in the relation from the raw material to the refiner. But this special dumping duty that was being applied fully to the amount of 15 per cent, or 1½ cents, we propose to limit to ¾ of a cent per pound, which will practically give a duty of 7½ instead of 15 cents. It is not all the sugar people want, but I suppose few of us get all we want in this wicked world. I think, however, it is a fair answer to their criticisms.

Mr. LEWIS: What system is in vogue for determining the degree of polarization in sugar?

Mr. FIELDING: I could not tell my hon. friend exactly, but the customs officials have had long experience in the matter and I have no doubt their system is scientifically correct.

Mr. LEWIS: Does it have to be stamped on the container when it comes in?

Mr. FIELDING: It is frequently the case that the officials have to admit the sugar without taking time to test it, in which case the custom is to collect the highest duty payable, and then after testing whatever is due to them is paid. I am assured that the testing is done scientifically, and that it is based on the long experience of the customs authorities.

Item as amended, agreed to.

Customs tariff—Malt flour containing less than fifty per cent in weight of malt; also extract of malt, fluid or not, including grain molasses—all articles in this item upon valuation without British or foreign excise duties, under regulations by the Minister of Customs and excise per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents and 35 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 2 cents and 35 per cent; General tariff, 2 cents and 35 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the same rate, is it not?

Mr. FIELDING: This is an article used by the bakers. There is a slight reduction in favour of the importer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is that it was 2 cents before.

Mr. FIELDING: The present rate is 3 cents from the United States; we make it 2.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Bisulphate of soda or nitre cake; British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a new item, I think; where is that taken from?

Mr. FIELDING: It is a new item. These articles are used in refining nickel, practically all for export, but the manufacturer is not allowed drawback on the goods exported. If it were a material used in the manufacture of the export, a drawback could be had, but it is simply an agent employed in the work, and the business is entirely for the purposes of export. This arrangement will, I think, meet the desire of the people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The reason I ask the question is that under item 210 of the tariff bisulphate of soda is free. I have the item before me: "British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free."

Mr. FIELDING: Let that item stand. I have it marked down as otherwise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be in connection with the nitre cake; I do not know about that.

Mr. FIELDING: We will let it stand for further consideration.

Item stands.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Customs tariff—Dehydrated sulphate of copper for agricultural or spraying purposes; British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is that taken from?

Mr. FIELDING: There is no separate classification for it. The present rate is in dispute; there is a difference of opinion in the department as to what it should be. However, for these spraying purposes we remove the doubt by making it free.

Mr. GOULD: I believe that bluestone is manufactured from this product.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a bluestone further pulverized, I am advised.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask whether there is any provision for dehydrated copper sulphate?

Mr. FIELDING: No; this is the only item we have on the subject.

Mr. GOOD: I suggest that the word "dehydrated" is wrong; it should be "powdered". Dehydrated copper sulphate is not used.

Mr. FIELDING: The Customs department supplied this as the correct wording.

Mr. GOOD: I think it is wrong.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, we will look into it. Let it stand.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—Liquorice paste not sweeted; British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; General tariff, 17½ per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is liquorice paste?

Mr. FIELDING: The item is divided; the raw material is made a little lower and the finished article remains the same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The raw material is reduced from 15 to 10?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Liquorice in rolls and sticks, not sweetened: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; General tariff, 22½ per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there any change there?

Mr. FIELDING: The rates remain the same.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Dry red lead, orange mineral, zinc white and white oxide of antimony. British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff 7½ per cent; General tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I move to strike out that item. That will leave the matter as it now stands.

Mr. GOULD: What will be the rate when the item is struck out?

Mr. FIELDING: Part of it is 3, 5 and 5; part of it 15, 20 and 22½, the rates remaining as at present.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, the minister was raising it in the intermediate and general tariffs; now he is leaving it where we had it.

Mr. FIELDING: Part had been reduced and part raised, but there was some confusion on the subject and we thought the safest thing to do was to strike out the item and leave the duties as they are now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is wrong there, is he not? So far as I can see, he was raising the intermediate and the general tariff on the entire class, from 5 to 7½ on the one and from 5 to 10 on the other.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a decrease in the case of white oxide of antimony. However, as I say, there has been a little confusion and I think the safest thing is to let the duties stand as they are.

Amendment agreed to, and item struck out.

Customs tariff—Crude petroleum not in its natural state .7900 specific gravity or heavier at 60 degrees temperature, when imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories, per gallon, British preferential tariff, 3/10 cent; Intermediate tariff 4/10 cent; General tariff 6/10 cent.

Mr. KELLNER: Is this an increase?

Mr. FIELDING: There was an item there of six-tenths of a cent per gallon, but there is another item of a similar character where the rate is half a cent, and we thought it the better way to drop the rate to half a cent rather than have it at six-tenths of a cent.

Mr. KELLNER: What is the idea of changing it? Was it too cheap under the old tariff?

Mr. FIELDING: It was a matter in dispute with the Customs department as to what was the process. At one time we fixed the rate at six-tenths. We found there was another item at half a cent and we thought it better to make it the same term.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that another item? The old item was:

Crude petroleum in its natural state .7900 specific gravity or heavier at 60 degrees temperature when imported by oil refineries to be refined in their own factories—

And the rate was: Free, free, free.

Mr. FIELDING: The item here is "Crude petroleum not in its natural state." It is an article which has made some advance in manufacture.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right. This is "not in its natural state." To be quite sure on that, which was the former item? The one I read referred to petroleum in its natural state.

Mr. FIELDING: 267a.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was petroleum in its natural state.

Mr. FIELDING: The producers of this claim that it was produced in the natural state, and they thought they were entitled to admission at the rate of duty for that item. It was a matter of contention with the department for some time, and we concluded that this was the best way to deal with it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It really came under non-classified, I suppose.

Mr. FIELDING: I think the explanation I gave a moment ago is the correct one. The producers claim it is in its natural state, and contended it should be admitted at the rate of duty for that item. There was a discussion, in fact, there had to be an appeal to the Privy Council on this subject, and the conclusion was that it ought to be treated as an article of somewhat advanced character not equal to refined petroleum, but not to be treated as petroleum in its natural state, and the duty is arranged to meet that condition.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Fire brick for use in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like the minister to explain this item. I understood that this fire brick under the tariff was free. My information is that there is no such fire brick made in Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: At one stage the item in the tariff read, "Fire brick of a kind not made in Canada," but there arose much contention over that. The expression "not made in Canada" sometimes leads to great confusion. It was complained by some manufacturers that they did make these things in Canada and therefore that the article should be subject to duty. Consumers say the manufacturers make something like that, but it does not serve the purpose. Fire brick is made at several points in Canada. The chief consumers, of course, will be the people engaged in furnace work, the metallic industries and so on. They have complained that the rate hitherto has been too high. There was a dispute over that and the Customs department gave a ruling which would have imposed a high duty. We have had quite a little difficulty in adjusting that, but we believe that we have now an adjustment which is really satisfactory. I beg to move as follows:

That Resolution No. 3 of May 11, 1923, be amended by striking thereout tariff item 281, the enumeration of goods and the several rates of duties of Customs, set opposite said item, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted: Tariff item 281—Fire brick containing not less than ninety per cent of silica; magnesite fibre brick or chrome fire brick; other fire brick valued at no less than one hundred dollars per one thousand; all fire brick in this item to be rectangular, the dimensions of each not to exceed one hundred and twenty-five cubic inches and for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

We are separating the item to make free for the purpose of these industries the thing which is not made in Canada. Then we say:

Tariff item 281a—Fire brick, n.o.p. for use exclusively, in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; General tariff, 15 per cent.

That is to say, on the thing which is clearly and distinctly not made in Canada we impose no duty, and on the other we make a compromise duty of 10, 12½ and 15 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What item is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. FIELDING: It is a new item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The matter was before me more than once, and my recollection is that claims were being made, just as the minister states, that firebrick was now being made in Canada, and, therefore, the duty ought to apply. While the users of firebrick claimed it was not a brick they could use at all, or else it was so far away they could not handle it, and that no action should be taken by the Department of Customs. I do not think any action was taken by that department. At any rate, no action was taken by the department under the late government. All firebrick came in free under that item. So that the effect is just as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) states, to make firebrick, which formerly took a different classification in our tariffs, bear a duty of 5, 7½ and 10 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: We had the same difficulty, just as the hon. member describes. In October last there was a decision by the Board of Customs which made it more difficult. They tried to classify it, and caused considerable discontent. I hope what we are proposing now is reasonably satisfactory to all interests.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why is it necessary to put the duty on the odd shapes? They require rectangular shapes and other shapes in construction, and why is the duty put upon the odd shapes?

Mr. FIELDING: I am told the odd shapes are manufactured in Canada. The item has been considered, an effort has been made to meet conflicting interests and I am hoping that it is going to be satisfactory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not a fact that no duty at all was collected on firebrick prior to 1922?

Mr. FIELDING: I suppose the classification "made in Canada" kept them out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no duty of any kind prior to 1922.

Mr. FIELDING: I presume my hon. friend is correct, but I cannot say offhand.

Mr. WHITE: My recollection is that there was a duty collected on circular shapes, or any other shapes, other than rectangular shapes. Now the magnesite, silica and chrome bricks are free, provided they are rectangular in shape. But if that quality is not made in Canada I do not think it should make any difference whether they are rectangular or any other shape.

Mr. CHAPLIN: These odd shapes are required in the building of a furnace just as much as the rectangular shape. When you get to the top of a furnace you require the odd shapes.

Mr. MARLER: The irregular shapes are made in Canada. Previous to 1922 they had a duty of 22½ per cent. That duty, under the first amendment of the tariff, was reduced from 22½ to 10 per cent. It is now placed at 15 per cent. Firebrick may be divided into three classes: first, the magnesite brick, silica brick containing not less than 90 per cent silica and chrome brick. These are free. The second class of brick is a brick made out of ordinary fire clay of the regular sizes. Previous to the 1st November, 1922, those were free. By the ruling of the department on that date they were made subject to a duty of 22½ per cent. I am speaking of the general tariff at the present time. That duty, under the resolution of May 1923, was reduced to 10 per cent, at which figure it remains. The third class was these irregular shapes partly made of silica clay and partly made of other clay, and these are manufactured in Canada. Those are the shapes I had reference to first. They were always subject to a duty under the general tariff of 22½ per cent. That duty under the amended resolution, is now reduced to 15 per cent. With reference to the uses to which these bricks are put; rectangular shapes are used very largely by the steel companies. The first class are also used very largely by the steel companies. and that class—that is the special brick of silica, chrome magnesite, not made in Canada—will be allowed in free. It is a distinct advantage to the steel companies. In reference to the first class, instead of the steel companies paying 22½ per cent, which they paid under the ruling 1st November, 1922, they will now pay 10 per cent. That is the resolution as regards firebrick.

Mr. FIELDING: It is 15 per cent now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Fifteen, I think.

Mr. MARLER: No, 10 per cent under the second class brick.

Mr. FIELDING: Fifteen in this resolution.

Mr. MARLER: I understood the minister to say 15.

Mr. FIELDING: It is 10, 12½ and 15.

Mr. WHITE: I think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) missed the point. It is quality that governs. as I understand it, whether the brick is rectangular in shape, or with a curved edge. So long as it is not made in Canada, I understand the minister wishes it brought in free, and I do not see why irregular shapes should not be brought in free as well as rectangular shapes, provided they are the same quality.

Mr. FIELDING: It is represented that the irregular shapes are made in Canada, and that is why the distinction is made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is on the principle of a revenue tariff.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh yes, quite so.

Amendment agreed to.

Customs tariff—328, Spectacle and eyeglass frames and metal parts thereof: n.o.p. British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. LUCAS: What was the duty on those articles before?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just the same. I think my hon. friend will agree with me there is no change at all, in so far as the general rate is concerned, except to add the letters n.o.p., and the reason the change is made is to make room for 328A. Paragraph 328A I take it, is to help the manufacture of spectacle and eyeglass frames in Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, they will all bring some revenue.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—328A, metal parts, unfinished, for the manufacture of spectacle and eyeglass frames: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 5 per cent.

Mr. LEWIS: With regard to the metal parts unfinished; does that simply mean that it is not quite put together? That is, that it is not polished or screwed or properly done, or does it simply mean in the rough?

Mr. FIELDING: Unfinished, not polished.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Brass and copper scrap: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any change in that

Mr. FIELDING: It is the same with this qualification:

But nothing shall be deemed brass or copper scrap except waste or refuse brass or copper fit only to be remanufactured in furnaces.

It is a definition—not a change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Composition metal and plated metal, in bars, ingots, or cores, for the manufacture of watch cases jewellery, filled gold and silver seamless wire and for dental purposes: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; General tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: The words "for dental purposes" are inserted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for inserting the words "for dental purposes"?

Mr. FIELDING: Part of it was free, part at 22½ per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent. This is done at the request of the Customs department to make it clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Really this is exactly as before except that all, no matter for what purpose, came in under this rate before.

Mr. FIELDING: For dental purposes did not come in. We put it in; it was not included before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did it come under before?

Mr. FIELDING: Part of it was free and part was at other rates.

Mr. KELLNER: What inspired the minister to put eye-glasses on the free list and to place a duty on dental instruments?

Mr. FIELDING: We have not put eye-glasses on the free list. My hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. KELLNER: The raw material for the manufacture of eye-glasses?

Mr. FIELDING: To encourage the home industry.

Mr. KELLNER: I would submit that there is also a possibility of a home industry in this other item, manufactured articles used in the dental profession.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Iron or steel scrap, wrought, being waste or refuse, including punchings, cuttings or clippings of iron or steel plates or sheets having been in actual use; crop ends of tin plate bars, or of blooms, or of rails, the same not having been in actual use, per ton. But nothing shall be deemed scrap iron or scrap steel except waste or refuse iron or steel fit only to be remanufactured in rolling mills or furnaces; provided that articles of iron or steel, damaged in transit, if broken up under customs supervision and rendered unsaleable except as scrap, may be entered for duty as scrap: British preferential tariff, 25 cents; Intermediate tariff, 45 cents; General tariff, 50 cents.

Mr. FIELDING: The rate is cut in two; it is one-half the former rate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a raw material. It is on that principle that the reduction is made, is it not?

Mr. FIELDING: It is one of that class of stuff that might be described as raw material.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And this, in effect, gives a wider margin of protection to the users of the material?

Mr. FIELDING: Possibly.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Rolled iron or steel hoop, band, scroll or strip, in the coil, number ten gauge and thinner, when imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories in the manufacture of cold rolled iron or steel: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Mr. FIELDING: I want to insert a word. This should read:

[Mr. Meighen.]

384b. Rolled iron or steel hoop, band, scroll or strip, in the coil, number twelve gauge and thinner, when imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories in the manufacture of cold rolled iron or steel.

There is a change there in the number of the gauge. This is an item which is a finished product in the case of one factory and the raw material in another.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The old item was, I think, free too?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was gauge number fourteen, but it is now gauge number twelve.

Mr. FIELDING: The gauge is changed; that is all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is it good policy to use a gauge? What particular gauge is meant when you use the word "gauge?" Would it not be much better to describe this in thousandths of an inch?

Mr. FIELDING: The gauge is described in the tariff.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the gauge used?

Mr. FIELDING: Gauge when applied to a metal sheet, plate or wire, means the thickness as determined by the Imperial standard gauge. That is defined in the Tariff Act.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There are several gauges, and a matter of that kind should be put in decimals. Then you would know where you were. There are three different kind of gauges.

Mr. FIELDING: This has been in the tariff for ages, and it has apparently worked out very well.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Rolled iron or steel, and cast steel in bars, bands, hoop, scroll, strip, sheet or plate of any size, thickness or width, and steel blanks for the manufacture of milling cutters, when of greater value than three and one-half cents per pound: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; General tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: The preferential rate was 7½ per cent. It is reduced to 5 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we getting any importations now under this item from Great Britain?

Mr. FIELDING: Largely from the United States, I am advised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I thought. The real movement is from the United States. Is there any representation or hope that we may get some movement from Great Britain in connection with this item?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, we were asked to consider it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is it the price of this article that controls the duty, or is it the shape or quality of the material?

Mr. FIELDING: Three and a half cents per pound.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is the price then that controls the duty?

Mr. FIELDING: The wording is exactly the same as before.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Steel of the same size and the same gauge, but of a lower price, would not come under the same tariff item; is that the idea? In other words, the price has to be three and a half cents per pound or more?

Mr. FIELDING: Steel of a greater value than three and a half cents per pound would come under this item; of a lesser value it would not.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The price controls the duty.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Typewriters and parts thereof: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; General tariff 25 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: The words "and parts thereof" are included in this item. Otherwise it is the same as before.

Mr. GOOD: What quantity of home manufacture is there? Are any typewriters manufactured in Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: There are typewriters assembled, if not actually made in Canada.

Mr. LEWIS: Are we importing any typewriters from Great Britain at the present time?

Mr. FIELDING: Only a few from Great Britain.

Mr. KELLNER: How many are we importing from the United States now?

Mr. FIELDING: We imported 12,345 last year.

Mr. KELLNER: Would it not be cheaper for this country as a whole to eliminate this tariff entirely and pay the Canadian manufacturers of these machines a sum of money about equal to what they are making at present in this industry?

Mr. FIELDING: Would you make it generous?

Mr. KELLNER: I should think so; at the present rate we could afford to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Revenue no object.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The item is not changed, but it did strike me as a proper one upon which the theory of my hon. friend (Mr. Kellner) might be discussed. I have heard him state it many times. Surely he will not now simply accept the bare rejection by the Minister of Finance of something he has agitated for years?

Mr. KELLNER: I was in hopes that I should be able to enlist the assistance of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman could not have entertained such hopes at all, for I have never given him any reason to do so; I have never encouraged any such hope. But he has had coadjutors of the theory in this House, and I should really like to see whether he cannot get co-operation on their part now.

Mr. KELLNER: I thought that the leader of the Opposition recognized the value of my argument and that he would assist me with a good argument of his own.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see that there is any value at all in the hon. gentleman's argument, and I never did. Here is a case where the extent of a Canadian manufacturer is not yet great. While of course the typewriter is not a new machine, it is not as old as most machines, and the extent of the Canadian manufacture and the supply of the Canadian market are proportionately low. The importations are very heavy and the machines are brought in practically entirely from the United States of America. Now, if ever there was an instance where the hon. gentleman's doctrine should apply it is in the present case. Where are hon. gentlemen that they are not driving their theory home? Have they given up hope of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. KELLNER: I think I am safe in saying that the only typewriters turned out in Canada are only partly made here. On the other hand, we are importing a large number of typewriters every year, and I venture to say that the duty which the government puts upon the machines they actually use would more than cover the entire income of those plants now in operation in this country. What, therefore, is the sense of the people of Canada paying $25 more for each typewriter they use simply in order to keep up two or three very inferior industries which, in any case, it is not likely will ever amount to anything?

Mr. LEWIS: This would be a tariff for revenue, would it not?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Printing presses, lithographic presses, and type making accessories therefor, also machines specially designed for ruling, folding, binding, embossing, creasing, or cutting paper or cardboard, sheet feeding machines, when for use exclusively by printers, bookbinders, and by manufacturers of articles made from paper or cardboard—including parts thereof composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, brass or wood; machinery and complete parts thereof for printing by photographic methods on plates for use on lithographic and offset presses: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is merely a change in the wording of the item?

Mr. FIELDING: No; it is rather a broad item, and is generous to the printing craft. We are including sheet feeding machines not made in Canada, and are fixing the rates at 5, 10 and 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Stumping machines and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: What were the previous rates on stumping machines?

Mr. FIELDING: The previous rates were 15, 25 and 27½ per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the minister reducing the tariff on stumping machines in view of the possibility of a general election in the near future?

Mr. FIELDING: Stumping machines are very necessary things at election time, and perhaps the item had reference to the present campaign in Ontario.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is impossible to keep track of these items until someone says "carried." What is the number of the old item which is now described as 448c, the item we are now discussing?

Mr. FIELDING: This is a new item that did not appear before under any special classification.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How did the minister indicate the duties before?

Mr. FIELDING: The previous rates were 15, 25 and 27½ per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under what item?

Mr. FIELDING: Under item 453.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These machines previously just came under the general machinery classification,—the n.o.p. class?

Mr. FIELDING: They came under item 453. Some of these machines are made in Canada and the makers are entitled to a drawback.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Upon what do they get the drawback?

Mr. FIELDING: On the material used,—40 per cent—the same as other agricultural implements.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Machinery, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and parts thereof, for the manufacture of fish meal, stock and poultry food and fertilizers, from fish and the waste thereof: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has the minister seriously considered the advisability of putting on the free list not only the machinery for the manufacture of fertilizers, but fertilizers themselves? The raw material comes in practically free now, with the exception of acid phosphate, and I would suggest including this material on the free list, as well as the machinery that is used in making fertilizers of various kinds. I think the minister must realize how the duty on fertilizers affects the price of this commodity to users in Canada. The raw materials come into Canada free and are manufactured into fertilizers which are sold to the farmers at from $8 to $15 more than the agriculturists in the United States pay. The finished product is often shipped back from the Canadian factory into the United States where it is sold in some cases at as much as $15 per ton less than is paid for it in Canada, notwithstanding that the raw materials, the ingredients, are imported into this country in the first place. This is due to the duty, and it works a great hardship on the people, especially on the potato growers, while it brings practically no revenue to the treasury.

Mr. FIELDING: Of course, one can put up an argument in favour of putting nearly everything on the free list. The duty on fertilizers has been substantially reduced.

Mr. CALDWELL: It has been 10 per cent since I can remember.

Mr. FIELDING: My memory goes further back than my hon. friend's.

Mr. CALDWELL: No doubt.

Mr. FIELDING: If we are to have a duty at all 10 per cent is not very high.

Mr. CALDWELL: The argument I am offering is simply the platform promulgated by the Liberal party in 1919 when fertilizers were put on the free list in that proposed schedule. I wish I had Hansard of either 1920 or 1921 in which the Prime Minister strongly advocated that fertilizers be supplied the farmers free of duty in order to increase production. This was emphasized by him on more than one occasion in this House since I have been a member of it; but of course that was when he was in opposition. I had sincerely hoped that, in view of the evidence I have been able to submit to the government of the effect which the duty on fertilizers has on the farmers of my section of the country, and in view of the fact that very little if any revenue is derived under this item, something might be done to alleviate the conditions in this respect. I put those figures before the House last year, and I do not wish to repeat them to-night, but on the imports of fertilizers a very small amount of duty has been collected, due to the fact that when the American manufacturer establishes a plant in Canada he brings in his raw materials free and simply stirs them together. This duty does not even help to make Canadian millionaires. If it did I would not feel quite so bad about it. It simply helps to swell the profits of our American friends.

Mr. GOOD: I think the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has made out a very good case and I should like to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) take some action on it. He might cut the duty down to 5 per cent anyway.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh!

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with the item last passed, the minister told us that a stumping machine being an agricultural implement the manufacturer would get a rebate of 40 per cent. I think my hon. friend is perfectly right, but there is no change made at all because agricultural implements not otherwise provided for come under item 448 and we do not need this section at all. The rate there is 10, 15 and 15 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: Drawbacks come under 448c.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is 448c. It covers hay tedders, posthole diggers, snaths and a whole lot of other things n.o.p. I should have thought that would certainly cover stumping machines. If it does not, my hon. friend is wrong when he says they are entitled to a rebate of 40 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: We make assurance doubly sure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Item agreed to.

469. Well-drilling machinery and apparatus, and parts thereof, of a class or kind not made in Canada, drawn or seamless iron or steel tubing over four inches in diameter, for drilling for water, natural gas and oil, and prospecting for minerals, not to include motive power: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We had a free item to the same effect before. What is the addition?

Mr. FIELDING: The item has been broadened to include several things not included before.

502a. Staves of wood, n.o.p., not less than five-eighths of an inch in thickness, further manufactured than sawn or split but not further manufactured than listed: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; General tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: That is semi-raw material and has been reduced.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought that had been increased. Did not that take old item 502? I am not complaining about the rate.

Mr. FIELDING: No, 502 did not cover this.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What item covered this commodity before?

Mr. FIELDING: This item appeared before under 506, and the rates were 17½, 22½ and 25 per cent. We reduce them to 10, 12½ and 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Fabrics of cotton or other fibre including cord fabric weighing over eight ounces per square yard for use in the manufacture of pneumatic tires: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; General tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the change here?

Mr. FIELDING: It should be 524b. The item is as before but the wording is changed in respect to the weight.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the article weighs differently from the previous stipulation what would be the tax?

Mr. FIELDING: The rate is not changed, but I am advised that this is done at the request of the Customs department to remove any doubt as to the interpretation of the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the minister had in mind, I fancy, was to cover a respectable area of paper and make as little change in the tariff as possible.

Mr. FIELDING: There might be some reason in that. I hope my hon. friend will adhere to the view that the changes do not amount to anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They amount indeed to practically nothing. The minister made reference in that connection to the British preference, that because we contended they were trivial in themselves they therefore could have no serious effect. Well, they may be so trivial in themselves that they never reach the consumer so as ultimately to benefit or to hurt him, but at the same time they are just below the line which would make the tariff of any value to our producers, and therefore the result is serious. No one knows that better than the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FIELDING: I think we will have to assume certain things as fundamental, namely, that all taxes and all reductions ultimately reach the consumer. They may not do it today but they get there in the end.

Mr. MEIGHEN, If the minister believed that he would have a very different tariff.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, wait and see.

Item agreed to.

581. Velvets, velveteens, silk velvets, plush and silk fabrics: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; General tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I propose to amend this item by making the percentages 17½, 32½ and 35 per cent.

Sir. HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for this? Is it to carry out a promise given under the French Treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: No, there are no promises given to anybody.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apart from any understanding with France, what is the reason for the increase there?

Mr. FIELDING: Owing to many representations made to us as to inequalities in the tariff. The British preference remains the same; in the intermediate and general tariffs there is an increase and as there is an increase on velvets, velveteens and silk fabrics, my hon. friend will receive the change with joy, because he complained that we were reducing these items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was very glad to see something done toward getting this item up a little bit. I was wondering what on earth had moved my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING: I think I had occasion to say before to my hon. friend that if we reach the right destination, I am not quarrelling with him as to the way by which we travel.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has any progress been made toward finding out exactly what it means in dollars and cents—the difference in rate compared with the French treaty, having regard to the limitation of width of 24 inches? Has that been ascertained as yet?

Mr. FIELDING: The intermediate rate is changed, and in that way it affects the rate in the French treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But was there not a special rate given in the French treaty under that item? I think there was.

Mr. FIELDING: In part, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What my hon. friend is now doing, Mr. Chairman, is something which, had it been done before he made the French treaty, would have enabled him to get something of real value to the country. The old rates were 17½, 27½ and 30; those were the rates my hon. friend had before him when he was negotiating in France. He now makes the British preferential rate 35 per cent, and I think he said he was going to make the intermediate—

Mr. FIELDING: 32½.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the general tariff 37.

Mr. FIELDING: 35 on this item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now there is a fixed item—and I want my hon. friend to correct me if I am wrong—in the French treaty, of 20 per cent applying on articles not over 24 inches wide. I had some discussion before as to what the importations were of goods not over 24 inches in width, and we could not at that time get any real information. We were told that a man who was unknown had informed the Minister of Marine that 90 per cent of the imports consisted of goods over 24 inches in width—a conclusion that I very much doubted. Can we now get the truth?

Mr. FIELDING: The Customs returns do not classify this item separately, and I suppose for the present it can only be a matter of conjecture what the proper percentage is I could not tell the hon. gentleman definitely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the meantime the only thing wrong is that it is done too late.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING: 581a.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask when 581a was born? It is neither in the budget address nor in the supplementary budget that came down a week ago.

Mr. FIELDING: We are going to witness the birth of it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many budgets are we likely to have this year?

Mr. FIELDING: As many as may be necessary to get things correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will be quite a number.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We cannot be here all year.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move that resolution No. 3 of the Customs tariff resolutions of 11th May, 1923, be amended by adding thereto the following provision:

Resolved, that tariff item 581a, the enumeration of goods and the several rates of duties of customs set opposite said item be struck out of said schedule A and that the following item, enumeration and rates of duty be inserted in said schedule A:—

Tariff item 581a—Silk cloth woven in the gum, not boiled or bleached, measuring not less than twenty inches in width when imported for the purpose of being dyed and finished in Canada, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Excise: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; General tariff, 35 per cent.

That involves what I may call non-technically the first process of manufacture, which is advanced at the next stage. It is to meet the conditions of the dyeing industry of the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not seen the resolution but if I understand the minister aright, I agree with him; the only thing wrong about it is that it is done too late.

Mr. FIELDING: Better late than never.

Amendment agreed to.

Customs tariff—Artificial silk yarns of filaments or artificial fibre silk yarns or filaments produced from a form of cellulose obtained by chemical processes, not more advanced than singles, not coloured artificial silk tops and waste or artificial fibre silk tops and waste produced from a form of cellulose obtained by chemical processes: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; General tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move that this item be struck out and that the following items, emumerations and rates of duty be inserted:

583a. Artificial silk tops and waste or artificial fibre silk tops and waste produced from a form of cellulose obtained by chemical processes: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent, General tariff, 10 per cent.

583aa. Artificial silk yarns or filaments or artificial fibre silk yarns or filaments produced from a form of cellulose obtained by chemical processes, not more advanced than singles, not coloured: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; General tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: 583aa applies, I understand, to artificial silk yarns and 583a to artificial silk tops. The latter will be to give a protection to those who convert the tops into yarn.

Mr. FIELDING: The first process of manufacture is always subject to a lower rate than the others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thoroughly agree. I cannot help but turn my mind back to the principle that is being adhered to, a principle that I strongly and consistently support.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is it the intention that this duty shall become effective at once or after the yarn is made here?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, but there will be a drawback up to the 1st of July, 1924. In the meantime there will be drawbacks, but those who are obliged to get this from other sources will be able to do so.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In other words, until the factory is here ready to make the goods?

Mr. FIELDING: Until sufficient time at which it is expected the factory will be in operation, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose that will cover everything in the whole list, will it not?

Mr. FIELDING: These two items of artificial silks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is really being done is to divide the old item in two.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You make your tops, which is largely your manufacturers' raw material, 5, 7½ and 10 per cent, and then you increase the more advanced and perfected article, the really manufactured article, as shown.

Mr. FIELDING: 12½, 17 and 20 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose that was done because the gentlemen concerned thought there was not enough protection in what my hon. friend had provided for them before.

Mr. FIELDING: There are quite a number of people, I believe, who think they have not enough protection. Possibly he was one of them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend would know definitely. If he does not want to tell me, I am perfectly content to take his refusal.

Mr. FIELDING: They all wanted more.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will put it this way to my hon. friend: Did he have representations made by these gentlemen who want to get this new industry in Canada, a perfectly proper thing to do, that the rate which he gave on artificial silk yarns or filament of 10, 12½ and 15 per cent was not enough to enable them to carry on.

Mr. FIELDING: I think they did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And as a result he made the change?

Mr. FIELDING: As a result of a consideration of the whole subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite so. Will they go on now with the further concession given?

Mr. FIELDING: We hope so. We cannot guarantee it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course, that is all that can be said. What I mean is that they have not the feeling that nothing can be done. They left full of hope that they may do something?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, I think they expect to do something.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite so. So my hon. friend by giving a bit more protection hopes to secure this new industry. Now in connection with the manufacture of yarn, has my hon. friend considered the position of botany yarn in connection with these items and the drawbacks which apply to these items?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, the matter has been before us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the botany yarn be protected?

Mr. FIELDING: There is no change in the duty.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At present there is practically no protection of botany yarn. I want my friend to tell me if I am wrong in what I now say: The botany yarn, which is the finer and better yarn to-day has no protection because there is a rebate to the manufacturers that use botany yarn of I think 98 or 99 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: Ninety-nine per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is to-day a duty without the drawback on the Bradford yarn. There is no rebate there to the manufacturer. I think I am right in that. The botany yarns are, of course, yarns which are more expensive and make more finely finished hosiery than do the Bradford yarns, which make the rough stockings.

Mr. FIELDING: It was one of a number of cases in which protection was desired, but we were not able to see the wisdom of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has a protection now, only it is taken away in connection with the rebate which is given.

Mr. FIELDING: It has been there for some time. It is not a new item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no, it is not a new item at all, but the manufacture of botany yarn in Canada is a comparatively new thing. I think my hon. friend will agree with me on that. In fact, I do not think botany yarns were produced in quantity in Canada since before the war. Since then we have had a large number of spindles put in, and there is to-day practically enough installed to spin all the botany yarns that we are using. Now these botany yarns are spun from imported wool tops. They are the finer yarns, and combined with that yarn is an artificial silk top. Now the wool tops come in free. The artificial silk tops did come in free, but now they will not. The artificial silk top that is used in connection with the preparation of botany yarns is really waste. It is broken up. It is not used for the purpose of binding at all. It is no good till incorporated with the good wool, and when incorporated it gives the gloss which the better kind of hosiery has. I want to point out to my hon. friend what he is doing with this legislation. I just want it to be known that we know what we are doing, that is all The value of the wool top, speaking generally—market quotations will change a little bit—is $1.30 a pound. The value of the artificial silk top is 72 cents per pound. Now my friend will follow me: As the value of the yarn is chiefly composed of wool, that is, these imported yarns, instead of artificial silk, the result is that under the drawback item the imported yarn will get a drawback of 99 per cent of the 12½ per cent duty that applies on these yarns from England, while the Canadian spinner has to pay duty on his artificial silk tops. I just want to ask my friend if he thinks it is fair to leave that 99 per cent drawback there, which as he points out is an old thing, in the face of an absolutely changed circumstance and condition, unless his protective policy is that it is only a new industry to be protected, and that the spinners of this botany yarn because they are here—because there cannot be anything inherently wrong in connection with botany yarn—because they are here and because they have a large enough investment to supply the country should receive no protection, while the new industry does. There is no escape, as I see it, from the situation. If that 99 per cent drawback is maintained, I think the other manufacturer should have to get along without the 99 per cent rebate in view of what my hon. friend is now doing.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to inquire from the minister what the determining factor is in arriving at the 60 per cent drawback on artificial silk yarn. Why 60 per cent?

Mr. FIELDING: These are all matters of fair adjustment. I do not know that I can lay down any absolute principle to govern all matters of drawback. They vary.

Mr. CHAPLIN: During the process of establishment of this plant the manufacturers of this particular article will be paying 100 per cent duty and getting 60 per cent drawback. Consequently, they will be paying a duty of 40 per cent. In other words, if the duty is 10 cents they will be paying 4 cents.

Mr. FIELDING: I think we will have to take it as it is, Mr. Chairman.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like my friend to tell me on what ground he thinks that the spinners of botany yarn should be put in a position not nearly as favourable as the position of their foreign competitor. Previously there was no trouble. It is true they got no protection whatever, because there was the 99 per cent drawback, but my hon. friend turns round, and, putting a duty on these artificial silk tops, places them at a direct disadvantage, in so far as their competitor is concerned.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend argues that that is what it means. He may be right. I cannot decide it off-hand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister has not had an opportunity of considering the effect of it, I would like him to hold the item till he can consider it.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think it is worth while holding the item. If, in any of these items, as we go further, we find anything that requires a correction, I shall not be afraid to ask for the correction, but I do not think anything can be gained by holding the item over.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister suggest anything against what I have said? There is the drawback of 99 per cent. There is the fact that the man who imports these yarns and uses them in manufacturing gets the drawback. Every single pound of botany yarn brought in is for the purpose of manufacture. There is the further fact that my hon. friend, under this arrangement which is being made for the purpose of helping one line of manufacture—and I am not quarrelling about that, it is perfectly right—in maintaining the drawback which is applicable to botany wool, is simply saying "To the extent of my new tariff on artificial silk, you, the Canadian producer of botany wool, shall be put at a direct disadvantage in your own country." If my hon. friend can show me any way in which that result does not follow, I will abandon the point immediately. But there is no question about it. Surely my hon. friend has not considered it.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend is exceedingly anxious for me to hold the item over, I will do so, although I am bound to tell him that at this stage the opportunity of reconsidering these things is not as good as it was a while ago. If he wants it held over, I am content.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to hold my hon. friend here for any length of time. If he says that he cannot change anything, very well; but we might as well know what we are doing. We are saying that Bradford's cheaper wool, which makes the stockings of the school children and the workers, gets no drawback, so that while the spinner of Bradford wool here gets protection, the spinner of these botany yarns shall have no protection, and not only shall have no protection but shall be at a disadvantage because the 99 per cent rebate shall be continued. If my hon. friend will not do anything else, in order to keep botany yarns going—and I do not suppose he has anything against botany yarns as botany yarns,—will he not say that the rebates on botany yarns shall be no greater than the 60 per cent drawback which he is now putting on artificial wools?

Mr. FIELDING: I prefer to let it stand rather than answer questions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It might come up on the discussion of the drawback, because it really should come up there.

Mr. GOULD: I would like to interpose a remark at this stage. We have listened to these tariff discussions between members of the two old parties, and we have a right to assume, at least, that these members are authorities upon questions of the tariff. Now I have had the honour of being in this House for four sessions, and I have never yet heard any argument advanced by either of the old parties why any tariff should exist, and I have a right to ask, and I have asked, and I ask now again, what investigation has the present government made to find a justification, or to ascertain why a tariff should be 10, 12, 15, 20 per cent or any percentage whatever? I have argued, and I have made the statement time and again, and wish to repeat it now, that the only thing that is in evidence at the present time is that certain institutions come and ask for these things, and, in so far as investigations by the powers-that-be are concerned, I think the people of Canada have not yet been furnished with any evidence to prove a justification or a warrant for the government of the day granting this tariff. If the evidence were given to the people it might clear up a lot of misapprehension providing that evidence does exist; and until the investigation takes place I am sure the people will not be satisfied. There are two sides to the question, the people who receive the duty and the people who pay it; the people who pay have a right to know what justification there is for a change of this kind being made.

Mr. MARTELL: Whom does the hon. member regard as the people of Canada—the people of Assiniboia, or the people of Canada generally?

Mr. GOULD: I think the question is not worth answering.

Mr. MARTELL: That is the opinion of my hon. friend, and the answer comes from a worthy source, because he does not know Canada. He wants Assiniboia to be Canada.

Mr. GOULD: I do not wish to enter into a controversy with the hon. member concerning my knowledge of Canada or his knowledge of Canada, or my conception of the people or his conception of the people, or my conception or his conception of what is right or wrong. I do not think the matter should be exactly judged by the hon. member. I speak absolutely from conviction, as an individual who possibly has paid quite as much in tariff taxes as the hon. member. I would not be afraid to wager that I have paid ten times as much as he has, and that is one of the reasons why I am ten times as sincere in my convictions as the hon. member.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member is speaking from his own peculiar narrow standpoint.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Artificial silk fabrics or artificial fibre silk fabrics produced from a form of cellulose obtained by chemical processes or of which artificial silk or artificial fibre silk is the component part of chief value n.o.p. British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; General tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I propose to amend this item by making the tariffs as follows:

British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; Intermediate tariff 32½ per cent; General tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister would not expect any comment here, but I have been wondering, for several items back, what had become of that noble band of "facing-in-the-right-direction" tariff people, and "a half loaf better than no bread." They seem to have fallen into somnolence.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. MARTELL: This item is carried, the same as other things are carried by the chairman without members having an opportunity for discussion.

Customs tariff—Manufactures of artificial silk or of artificial fibre silk produced from a form of cellulose obtained by chemical processes or of which artificial silk or artificial fibre silk is the component part of chief value, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; General tariff, 37½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any further amendment in that item?

Mr. FIELDING: It is made to agree with the silk item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no further amendment?

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend states that the advance of 5 per cent in both the intermediate and general tariffs was to put them in line. If that was all why has the minister to raise this one too? I fondly suspect that the real reason was that the men in the business satisfied my hon. friend they could not get started unless they got that protection. I suspect that is the real situation, just as we found in connection with the former item. Does my hon. friend not agree with me that that is the real reason?

Mr. FIELDING: Would that not be a legitimate one?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: Then let us carry the item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend admit the reason?

Mr. FIELDING: No, I admit nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know in which direction the minister is facing. I think it is in four directions all at once.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Coal, anthracite and lignite; anthracite and lignite coal dust; coke: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Mr. FIELDING: The word "lignite" is included. That is the only change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was lignite not previously 50 cents?

Mr. FIELDING: That has a bearing on the American tariff. The American tariff includes anthracite and other coal in one and these items are so arranged that, perhaps, there may be on this particular item, reciprocity. The American tariff is so arranged that, perhaps, they could admit anthracite and lignite reciprocally. We have no anthracite to sell; but it is the desire of the coal mining industry in the West that these things be put together with the expectation that this might lead to the Americans reciprocating, because of the terms of the American tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Needless to say we do not import any lignite from the United States.

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the reason, but we do not import any lignite from the United States and never will to the end of time.

Mr. FIELDING: No, but if we had any reciprocity in this particular item, it would have to conform to the American tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the duty on bituminous coal?

Mr. FIELDING: Fifty-three cents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister had importunities from the minister without portfolio, the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) for an increased duty on coal?

Mr. FIELDING: No, these hon. gentlemen with the characteristic modesty of the Bluenose have not asked for any increase.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Modesty was not so characteristic during the campaign of 1921.

Mr. FIELDING: Did they ask for an increase?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They ridiculed the duty on coal we had been maintaining as nothing at all, and they wanted something worth while for Nova Scotia.

Mr. FIELDING: I never heard of that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister apparently never heard it and he has not heard it yet.

Mr. MARTELL: Nova Scotia has never got anything from either party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has been said that the sin of ingratitude is worse than the sin of witchcraft. Where is the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell)?

Mr. MARTELL: He is from Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I heard about the silence of the sixteen. Their silence is relative; they are silent largely compared with what they were. But this small duty on coal was ridiculed by those stalwarts of the faith. How is it that they now allow the minister to sleep at night and to keep the duty of 53 cents on coal.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In the days when my right hon. friend was Prime Minister of this country and had to do with the management of the railways, they spent $12,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing coal, and $9,000,000 of that went to purchase American coal. That scene has been somewhat changed. In 1921, the coal miners of my county were going without work; their families were going without food, while my hon. friends, in their management of public affairs, were purchasing coal from the United States. Under this government, that situation has been reversed, and in our province to-day all our coal mines are working to the fullest possible extent of their capacity. We have reversed the situation. The public interests of this country, including the railways, are purchasing coal in this country, and our coal miners are enjoying better conditions than they have enjoyed for the last ten years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is highly interesting and edifying. In the days that the hon. member speaks of when the large purchases were made, everyone was employed in Nova Scotia. They were selling their coal the world over.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, selling it the world over. They could scarcely get it out fast enough. My hon. friend is referring to later on. At that time there were some out of work, but there was very little unemployment. I venture to say that there is as much coal being purchased to-day outside of Canada as there was in 1921, and by the railways too. As a member of this government to boast of never interfering with the railways, and then to come to this House and proclaim that they have altered the purchase of coal by the railways, my hon. friend is very consistent.

Mr. MARTELL: What member of the government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister without portfolio, the acting Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MARTELL: He is a pretty good fellow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1921 we did not interfere with the operation of railways; we allowed them to buy where they could buy the cheapest; but we said to the extent necessary to provide work in Nova Scotia, buy at the price you can buy from the United States, and we out of the treasury of Canada will make good the difference, so that the railways might be free to make the best business bargain they could. They bought at the price they could buy in the United States, and we paid large sums out of the treasury of Canada in order to keep men employed in Nova Scotia. I venture to say that to-day the railways are following just the policy they did then, and that the government is not doing anything to help keep men at work in Nova Scotia. I would be glad indeed if it is the fact that there is a greater coal production in Nova Scotia; but such is not due to any action of this government, nor is it a fulfilment of the pledge which the hon. member made to move for an increased duty on these articles in the House of Commons.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): As regards any pledges I made to my constituents, I am prepared to go to my constituents and to deal with them. My right hon. friend, with his usual method of drawing a herring across the trail, goes back to war conditions and talks about what his government did when they were working under a War Measures Act, as though that were the situation to which I was referring. I was referring to the situation of 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Part of the time the hon. member was.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I was referring to the situation of 1921. In that year, while contracts were made by Mr. Hanna, a gentleman who was appointed by my right hon. friend's friends to operate that railway, with our coal mining industry in Nova Scotia, they absolutely refused to take the quantities of coal for which they made contracts. In 1921-22, out of twelve million dollars worth of coal purchased for the government railways—I am not speaking about the Canadian Northern or the Grand Trunk—my right hon. friend's friends purchased nine million dollars worth from the United States, while as I say in the county of Cumberland, and in my constituency, men were out of work and the women were without food. That was the situation then, whereas to-day under a policy which has been inaugurated by Sir Henry Thornton, all the coal that can possibly be mined in Nova Scotia is being sold to the Canadian Government railways of this country and to business enterprises at home and abroad. My right hon. friend assented to a contract which was made by Mr. Hanna in 1921, by which he undertook, for a period of three years, to purchase a million tons of coal annually from a certain coal mine in the state of Ohio. Last year, before the Public Accounts Committee, when we asked for information in regard to that, Mr. Hanna declined to produce the contract. That was the situation. As a result of the public confidence that has been renewed in our province as a result of the carrying out of a proper policy by the men who are now dealing with the affairs of this country, as a result of the general renewed improvement of business throughout Canada, the mining industry of our province is in a better condition than it has been in ten years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I recognize the difference in the angle of discussion adopted by the minister when he rose this time. It is now Sir Henry Thornton who made the change; it was not this government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My right hon. friend, with his usual ingenuity is proceeding to quibble. I said that he had allowed Mr. Hanna to purchase coal in the United States; he had never said that he should not do so whereas we asked that it should be purchased in Canada whenever possible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first time the hon. member said that this government had changed it all. Yes, Mr. Hanna ran the railways under our government in practice just as well as in profession. I venture to make this statement, although I have not the figures before me, not having looked into them—because we shall have a discussion later—that as large a proportion of American coal is being purchased to-day as was purchased before.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): For what purpose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the railways.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member is quibbling again. I said the Canadian Government Railways; I was not speaking of the Canadian National Railways or the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is quibbling now? What counts to the miner is how much is bought for the railways; he does not care whether the coal goes to the Intercolonial or to the Grand Trunk. The thing that counts is what coal is bought for the railways; that is what counts to the province of Nova Scotia. I venture to hazard the statement I have just made, without going into the figures, because we can get them—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): All right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —that there is being bought to-day as large a proportion of coal from the United States as was ever purchased. I do not wonder that there are not as many coal miners now as there were before; as a matter of fact, there are not as many artisans now as there were previously, although these are the days of halo and glory and business prosperity as described by the member for Pictou while they are described by hon. members around him as well as in other parts of the House as the days of the greatest exodus the country has known since the time of Mackenzie.

Mr. NEILL: Unfortunately I missed the earlier part of the debate, but perhaps the minister would not mind repeating, if I apologise, the explanation if he has already given it, as to why it is necessary to ask the House to put on the free list two-thirds of the coal produced in Canada and not the other third. Roughly speaking, coal comprises anthracite, lignite and bituminous coal. Anthracite has been on the free list for some years, and lignite apparently is now being made free. What line of reasoning does the government pursue by which it finds it advisable to put these two coals on the free list and abstain from making bituminous coal free also?

Mr. FIELDING: Does the hon. member think it should be on the free list?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: I am afraid I could not agree to that. We get a revenue out of the duty, not to mention other considerations.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think that is a good answer; if it is, would not the same factors apply to anthracite and lignite? The condition in regard to revenue is the same, no matter what kind of coal is involved, so that the question is not primarily one of revenue at all. What differentiates between lignite and anthracite on the one hand and bituminous coal on the other? That is the point on which I should like to have information for the people in the West.

Mr. FIELDING: The differentiation, if I may use the word in this connection, began a great many years ago when the so-called National Policy was established in 1878-79. Bituminous coal was then made dutiable while anthracite was made free, and that has been the condition ever since. Sometimes the fact that a thing has been in existence is a good reason that it should be continued. At all events, that is the history of this matter, as my hon. friend no doubt knows.

Mr. NEILL: That does not explain why we are putting lignite on the free list now.

Mr. FIELDING: I have explained that.

Mr. NEILL: Possibly I was too dense to grasp it. I still think that the same conditions that apply to two-thirds of the coal that is produced in Canada might well apply to the other third. Earlier in the resolutions we see power taken to the government to send a representative to Washington to negotiate reciprocity. That of course is a pure gesture, because we know that the government has power to do that without any legislation. It has been done before quite recently, and it was done years ago without legislative authority. But there is a species of reciprocity now offered to Canada, and only one species, which is on the statutes of the United States. I find in the budget speech a suggestion that the President of the United States might enter into any reciprocal arrangement with Canada without going to congress which I very much doubt. But there is, under section 315, if I remember rightly, a very distinct pledge on the books of the United States to-day and which cannot be gainsaid, which provides for reciprocity in one particular. It is not at the whim of the president or of any one man; it is there as a matter of law, and provides that if Canada takes off this duty of 53 cents the United States will take off a similar duty on Canadian coal coming into that country. That is an absolute open offer to reciprocity of which there can be no doubt to-day. It is there as a matter of fact, and it would be a real earnest of our genuine desire to have a larger measure of reciprocity with the United States if we accepted and put into force this particular offer which is now available right at our hands. I may explain that like most hon. members I have a selfish motive in this matter, only I have the honesty to avow it, and that is that if this duty were removed it would materially assist the coal miners in British Columbia, because the market for our bituminous coal in British Columbia is in the United States and we are handicapped by this 53 cents per ton which largely benefits the province from which the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) comes. So that it is a question of British Columbia being penalized for the benefit of the beautiful province of Nova Scotia for which and for whose representatives I have the very highest regard. I do think, however, that they should also let British Columbia have a fighting chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a very pertinent question, which I think the minister should answer. Reciprocity with the United States is really the goal of his ambition! Here is a chance to start. The United States has offered reciprocity in bituminous coal. Why does the minister not meet that government in this resepect?

Mr. FIELDING: Do you wish it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. The minister has never heard me talk reciprocity here, but he has heard himself do so. Now, here is a chance for him to put his principles into practice, and he is urged furthermore by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). Why does he not start? Reciprocity, according to the minister, is a virtue in itself, and a real crime was committed because we did not secure all the reciprocity on earth in 1911. Well, here is the United States knocking at our door asking for reciprocity in coal. Why does the minister not meet them?

Mr. FIELDING: I am afraid the United States in selecting one particular item and offering us reciprocity in connection with it is not taking very sound ground. At all events that is the way it impresses me. I do not think that the United States should be allowed to pick out one particular item for reciprocity, and an item that does not suit us in Canada. The majority of the Canadian people have agreed that there shall be a duty on bituminous coal, and I understand that the hon. gentleman takes that view himself. We are therefore both agreed on that point. Why should we allow the United States, then, to select one item in particular and ask for reciprocity in respect of it? It may be clear to my hon. friend that there is justification for this course on the part of the United States, but it is not clear to us. It is simply a difference in point of view, I suppose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's argument boiled down is this, that reciprocity is all right so long as you keep away from coal. He puts in his reciprocity proposal six or seven things and says, "Come to us on any of these and we will meet you, but for the life of you, don't mention coal, because while reciprocity is a splendid thing in other respects, it is bad so far as coal is concerned." Now, the House will get the measure of the minister's sincerity in the matter of reciprocity. I do not wish to dispute his sincerity at all; that is to say, I do not question his sincerity in regard to wheat and wheat flour in which he wants reciprocity, nor his sincerity in not wishing to have reciprocity in coal. He is equally sincere in either case, but the House will get the measure of the value of reciprocity as such in the mind of the minister. All that he has given us on the merits of reciprocity as a principle now goes up into the air; it amounts to nothing at all. It is defeated by what he says right now in respect of coal. In a word, you must take every single article on its merits, you must look to the future as well as to the present, and there is no special virtue in reciprocity with the United States merely because they are a great nation immediately opposite us.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend for his purpose attributes something to me which I never said. He says that I am in favour of reciprocity in connection with everything but coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, you did.

Mr. FIELDING: I say I am in favour of reciprocity with the United States broadly and generally. I do not suppose we would have reciprocity in everything. I am prepared to consider a fair reciprocity treaty with the United States, and possibly it may include coal. Everything would depend upon taking the treaty as a whole, not letting Uncle Sam select some particular item and say he will give us reciprocity in that. That is the situation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As one interested in the production of Canadian coal, I shall always remain utterly unperturbed by the minister's threats that we will ever have reciprocity in coal while he is Minister of Finance. Reciprocity in cattle, wheat, wheat flour, oats, barley, potatoes, onions, turnips, hay, fish—he specifies there about eight articles and he says to the United States, "As far as those are concerned I am an advocate of reciprocity; but as far as coal is concerned I am not." I say that the minister by his position to-night clearly exposes to the House that reciprocity in general with the United States has no particular argument in its favour at all—that you may be able to pick out an article where it will be of benefit to us, you may be able to pick out others where it will not be. In a word, much that he has said in the way of declamation and general statement of his devotion to the principle of reciprocity is entirely destroyed by his attitude with respect to coal. However, we will come to this article when we return to No. 2, and I am going to have something to say about it, particularly when I compare it with the minister's proposals in 1911.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman says he is going to come back to these resolutions, but while he is dealing with them he might as well deal fairly with them. He selects a resolution mentioning cattle and several other things, but he ignores the general resolution before that declaring the willingness of this country to enter into a fair, general treaty of reciprocity with the United States. And he says, "Oh, you are only proposing reciprocity in these few things." What are these few things? In the first place—we may possibly have to repeat the discussion—there is a broad, general declaration of the willingness of the people of Canada to enter into a reciprocity agreement, not qualified by any limitations. How broad it is to be depends upon the terms of the agreement, and that is a matter which would necessarily go to Congress. But we have said, "There is something which we could do without waiting for Congress. The United States government has authorized the President to make reductions on certain things." Perhaps we could get the United States government to make these reductions now or at an early date, and we select the things most important. I hesitate not to say that the most important item to-day to make —I will not say a reciprocity agreement, for it is not such a broad question, but if we wanted to make a temporary arrangement with the United States to-day I say there is nothing the people of the western provinces are more interested in than cattle, and that in eastern Canada there is no item we are more interested in than fish. We take a few items which we all want to send to the United States and we say, if the United States will meet us on these things we will make corresponding reductions, not waiting for Congress to act. Why these particular things, it may be asked. Well, because these are the particular things which above all others are troubling the people of Canada to-day. That is the position; not as stated by my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will tell the minister why I referred to that. Just as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said, the only clause in the minister's reciprocity proposal is clause 8C. The preceding clause is only a gesture. He does not need it. He would be just exactly in the same position if it was not there at all.

Mr. FIELDING: Did they need the same thing in 1879?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. FIELDING: But they used it, and for good reasons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. It is a gesture and nothing more.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Why was it put in the National Policy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume for just the same purpose as the minister uses it now: it was a dead letter then and it is a dead letter now.

An hon. MEMBER: They were fakirs then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, the minister says we select those things that we need—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Will my hon. friend permit me a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He never permitted me one in my life.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I will be very glad to start all over again. Does my hon. friend say that the clause with regard to reciprocity which was part of the National Policy of Macdonald and Tilley was put in without any intention on the part of those great men to carry it into effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all. I say if it was worded as this is—I presume it was, my hon. friend says so—it was a gesture and nothing more and did not change anything in any degree whatever.

Mr. MARTELL: What was it put there for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Neither does this. The United States says on a long list of articles—and these in 8C are only a few of them—they give the president power under certain conditions to reduce the duties. The minister selects about eight and says, "On these that suit us we will meet you;" and he asks for power from this parliament to do so, but he takes care to exclude other commodities, thereby confessing to this House and the country that his general declamations of devotion to reciprocity with the United States really amount to nothing. If it would be a good thing in these, why would it not be in coal?

Mr. FIELDING: If that is so, why not in everything?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it is not. I do not believe in it at all. I do not think we get anywhere by any extensive reciprocity agreement with them. But when the minister says, "It is all right in these articles and all wrong in coal," he declares to the House that the principle he has been arguing for all these years is really nothing but air.

Mr. LOGAN: I should like to remove from the minds of hon. members a misconception with reference to the duty on coal. We in the Maritime provinces are getting rather tired having people continually throwing at us that all we desire is this wonderful duty on coal. What is the duty on coal, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MARTELL: A bagatelle.

An hon. MEMBER: A Martell.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LOGAN: When the duty was put on coal some years ago it was made specific, and when it was fixed at 53 cents a ton, coal was worth about $2.25 a ton. To-day coal is worth over $5, and the duty instead of increasing, as it would have had it been ad valorem, remains the same. The result is that this wonderful duty we are supposed to be so anxious about in Nova Scotia is to-day a 10 per cent duty. That is the protection that our Nova Scotia coal gets. That is, if the law were enforced as was intended by those who enacted it. But what are the facts?

Mr. MARTELL: It does not protect us at all.

Mr. LOGAN: The importer buys his coal at the United States colliery as run of mine, and has it screened there so that it is divided into screened and slack coal. This is brought into Canada and he pays a duty of 53 cents a ton on the screened and 15 cents a ton on the slack coal, with the result, as I am credibly informed, that to-day this imported coal is paying an average duty of less than 35 cents a ton, or about 7½ per cent ad valorem. Now, does my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni or any other gentleman on the other side of the House consider that a 7½ per cent duty is a protective tariff? It is not even equivalent to a tariff for revenue. In fact it is not even half of a tariff for revenue, as we generally understand that phrase.

Let me call attention to one other thing. During the last three years of the right hon. gentleman's administration there was brought into this country from the United States over half a billion dollars' worth of coal, and the average loss in exchange during that time was about 8 per cent. Multiply $500,000,000 by 8 and you have a loss to this country of $40,000,000. It might as well have been thrown into the sea; yet no one seemed at that time to be very much alarmed or to be considering seriously the development of our own coal resources.

Personally I am fully convinced that there should be a duty on anthracite coal. If we are going to tax the poor man's coal, even at 7½ per cent, why should we allow the rich man's coal to come into this country free? As a revenue producer nothing could be better than a tax upon anthracite coal. I consider therefore, that it should be advocated not only to encourage the buying of our own coal but to give us a substantial revenue. Our coal has been proved to be equal to anthracite so far as domestic needs are concerned. This has been proved beyond a doubt in the committees of this House within the last few weeks. I say we should collect a revenue on imported anthracite coal; for in doing so we collect it from the people who can afford to pay, those who are well off or comfortably off. But let us have the last of this talk of protection on Nova Scotia or New Brunswick coal when we are only collecting a duty of 7½ per cent on American coal.

Mr. NEILL: It is very evident that the coal producers of Nova Scotia must be in a very prosperous condition when we find the hon. members for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) and Hants (Mr. Martell) disparaging the duty as small and saying that 53 cents a ton is a mere bagatelle. I trust they will join with me in suggesting that it be taken off for the benefit of British Columbia. I assure these hon. gentlemen that British Columbia would receive that bounty with the deepest gratitude; they would not look a gift horse in the mouth and say, "This is only 53 cents." I say we would be only too glad to have it; we would regard 53 cents as a substantial assistance and would be pleased indeed to receive what these hon. gentlemen do not seem to appreciate very highly.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? We have no coal in the county of Hants; there may be coal lying dormant there, but we have not any coal mines. The hon. member for Hants is as far as possible, theoretically at least, a tariff for revenue man only. I am not advocating a tariff for the protection of any industry, but we hear too much about this question of protection for the coal industry in Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia, prior to confederation, was able to run all her affairs with about 7½ per cent duty. To-day the only thing you can point to that we have any protection on at all is coal, and it is very little protection we get on it. The hon. member for Cumberland may have coal in his constituency; if he has, he has as much right to protection as any other industry in Canada, and 50 cents on a ton of coal in Nova Scotia is not half as much protection as other industries are getting in this country which are making the people of Nova Scotia hewers of wood and drawers of water. My hon. friend (Mr. Neill) is very frank when he says he wants protection; I believe he would admit himself that he is a protectionist. Comox-Alberni has no coal, therefore he is not very much concerned about protection; if Comox-Alberni had coal he would be preaching protection. There is a small duty on coal in Nova Scotia. The people of that province are prepared to accept free trade in everything; we are prepared to take the duties off coal so long as you take them off everything else.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman said he would like to ask me a question; would he mind stating it? If he does not wish to do so, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee but I really must repudiate the suggestion that there is no coal in Comox-Alberni. I think it is a slander on the representation I have given to that district in the House in the last two years when I am told at the end of my days that there is no coal in Comox-Alberni!

Mr. GOULD: I would like to add a word, not particularly about coal but in relation to the sentiments expressed on the question of reciprocity. When the Minister of Finance rose to reply to some suggestions that have been made, he stated that it was not right to single out one item. Well, so far as reciprocity is concerned one does not need to confine himself to one item, having regard to the present attitude of the American people. I would recall the minister's attention to the fact that boots and shoes, which everybody in Canada must use, are allowed to enter the United States free of duty. When the minister was compiling the list here it might have occurred to him or to the government to have included boots and shoes, because that would have materially affected the carrying out of the principle of reciprocity concerning which the minister seems to be so anxious. Likewise, agricultural implements may enter the United States free of duty, and we might mention quite a number of other things in connection with which the American Congress has gone on record as making a standing offer of reciprocity. I contend that in good faith we might accept this half loaf or quarter loaf offered us at the present time by the United States government. If we are really desirous of promoting the spirit of reciprocity we have a splendid opportunity to do so now, in a measure at least. There are undoubtedly other items which could form the basis of a reciprocal agreement with the United States when the time comes, but I repeat that we might well take advantage of the opportunity now offered by the American government in the legislation at present on their statute book.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) has raised a very interesting point. He is quite right when he states that the American tariff imposes no duty on boots and shoes, and, I believe, no duty on agricultural implements. He says to the government, "Now, if you are in earnest, if you really mean what you say when you assert that because the American tariff is generally high we must therefore maintain ours, why do you not at least do what they do in boots and shoes and in implements?" His argument, based as it is on the pretensions of the government, is to my mind, irrefutable, and I would especially like to hear a reply from the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). Let us test his sincerity in this matter. His constituency is filled with boot and shoe factories. There is the American market open, a market of one hundred and ten million people, free to the manufacturers of boots and shoes in his constituency. If the government are only waiting for American reductions in order to have our own duties reduced, just think of the opening that is left them now in boots and shoes. I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia will press until he really exposes the actual mind of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and many other hon. members around him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is very kind to the industries of Quebec. Indeed our first aim is to get reciprocity in natural products. When it comes to manufactured articles, boots and shoes will be treated like the others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Treated exactly as the others.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to delay passing the item but I was hoping for some explanation from my hon. friend from Hants, but I am afraid he has gone out of the Chamber. It is not so long since there was a very disastrous election in this country, and I happened to be travelling down in my hon. friend's province. I was handed a very neatly printed little pamphlet which told what my hon. friends were going to do in the matter of boots and shoes when they came into power, and my right hon. friend to my left (Mr. Meighen) was represented as being a sort of monster of injustice because every poor woman who bought boots and shoes for the family had to pay fifty cents, all because of the wicked Mr. Meighen, and if she had the merciful Mr. King as premier it would only be thirty cents. There was going to be a very sharp reduction in the cost. Last year I noticed the tariff gave some little advantage in respect of English boots and shoes. There are some imported, but very few, and they are not of the ordinary cheaper variety. I do not fancy there has been any very great relief to the suffering housewives in Nova Scotia because of any experiments tried on the tariff last year, and I was regretting the absence of the hon. member for Hants from the House at this moment. I thought I might learn from his eloquent lips just how these women in the province of Nova Scotia are being consoled for the utter failure to implement the promise of cutting down the wickedness of Meighen at fifty cents to the mercy of King at thirty cents.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Customs tariff—Hat sweats; hatters tips and sides when cut to shape. The articles in this item when imported by hat and cap manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of hats and caps in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; Intermediate tariff, free; General tariff, free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is slightly extending the wording, I think.

Mr. FIELDING: The item is substantially the same except that hatters' bands are taken out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are dropped?

Mr. FIELDING: Dropped from this item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where are they put?

Mr. FIELDING: They come under tariff item 575.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is 25, 32½ and 35 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the net effect of this is to put a duty on hat bands of 25, 32½ and 35 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: It would be 27½ per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the net effect of this change. This will be good news to those who talk about the "step in the right direction."

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Emery wheels; carborundum wheels and stones, n.o.p.; manufactures of emery or of carborundum: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; General tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the change here?

Mr. FIELDING: No change except that n.o.p. is inserted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us the effect of that?

Mr. FIELDING: The next item will show.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is item 670a.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Carborundum wheels or stones not further manufactured than moulded and burned: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; General tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a reduction there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are carborundum wheels?

Mr. FIELDING: They are partly manufactured stone brought in from the United States to be finished in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no reduction then on the finished article?

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Sticks or canes cut into suitable lengths for umbrella, parasol or sunshade or walking sticks, further manufactured than in tariff item 672 but not further finished than bent, when imported by manufacturers of umbrellas, parasols, sunshades or walking sticks for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; General tariff, 15 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any change there? Is the effect here to put on a new duty or to change the nomenclature?

Mr. FIELDING: Part of it is a reduction, and part of it is free. This is put in at the suggestion of the Customs department. They have had difficulty in administering the former item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The former item was free altogether.

Mr. FIELDING: No. 17½, 22½ and 25 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The old item 672 read:

Ribs of brass, iron or steel, runners, rings, caps, notches, ferrules, mounts and sticks or canes in the rough, or not further manufactured than cut into lengths suitable for umbrella, parasol or sunshade or walking sticks when imported by manufacturers of umbrellas, etc.

It seems to me that the effect is—I have no doubt my friend finds the industry requires it—to take these sticks or canes off the free list—they were free before under all three tariffs—and to put on a tariff of 10, 12½ and 15 per cent in its place.

Mr. FIELDING: No. I understand some of them were ruled free in the customs and some were dutiable. They were not all free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have just read the item.

Mr. FIELDING: I think you will find that the words are changed.

Mr. BAXTER: It looks as if it turned on bending, It says "not further finished than bent."

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—(b) Usual coverings containing goods not machinery, subject to any ad valorem duty, when not included in the invoice value of the goods they contain;

(bb) Usual coverings containing machinery subject to any ad valorem duty, when not included in the invoice value of the goods they contain: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; General tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no change here at all.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, there is a reduction in the case of coverings for machinery coming from Great Britain. The coverings there are much heavier and of a more expensive character.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is paragraph (bb).

Mr. MARLER: Is there any duty on coverings for hospital supplies? Does that come under this item?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In nearly all cases they are included in the cost of the goods, in the invoice.

Mr. FIELDING: If the goods are free there is no duty on the packages. If the goods are dutiable there would be a duty on the packages.

Mr. MARLER: Under this item?

Mr. FIELDING: Under all items, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there is a charge on any containers except when included in the purchase price. My hon. friend's own item says "when not included in the invoice value of the goods they contain."

Mr. FIELDING: The item is the same, I am advised, except that the word "machinery" was taken out.

Mr. MARLER: The reason I asked that question was this: The question came up some years ago as regards X-ray plates used in hospitals in Montreal. I understood they were dutiable, and in addition the coverings were dutiable. I do not know whether it is convenient for the minister to give an answer now. If not let it pass.

Mr. FIELDING: I will be glad if the hon. member will let it stand and I will give it later.

Item agreed to.

DRAWBACK

Customs tariff—4. Resolved, that schedule B to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1914, by chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1919, chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1922, and by order in council, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 1029, 1030, the enumerations of goods, and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each of the said items, and to repeal Order in Council, P.C. 17/846, dated the twenty-first day of April, 1922, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties be inserted in said schedule B:—

Mr. FIELDING: May I ask the committee to return to resolution No. 4?

The CHAIRMAN: That is the one we are at.

Mr. FIELDING: As to the date at which it is to take effect. However, we will return to it and the committee can go on with the other. We will let it stand.

Customs tariff—Materials, subject to drawback when imported by manufacturers of hat sweats and hatters' tips and sides and used in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: Portion duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. LEWIS: It seems to me this drawback of 99 per cent is altogether too generous. I understand it costs the government 3 per cent to collect the tariff when only one transaction is made; the drawback as I understand it, involves two transactions, and the cost to the government would be 5 per cent. It seems to me that instead of giving an over generous drawback of 99 per cent the government should take at least four or five per cent on the transaction. I do not think any drawback should exceed 95 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: The effect of giving a drawback of 99 per cent of course is to make it practically free. The argument is that it is easier for the customs to control it by way of a drawback than by making it free. You may have an article free for one purpose and dutiable for another, and if you make it free generally the privilege is abused. Experience has shown that, and it is better to make the article dutiable and grant your drawback for that part of the business in which you wish to make it free; that is the reason it is made 99 per cent.

Mr. LEWIS: Is not the transaction a loss to the government financially?

Mr. FIELDING: It virtually makes the article free.

Mr. LEWIS: It is a loss to the government just the same.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Materials: subject to drawback when used in the manufacture of articles enumerated in tariff item 236: Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 50 per cent.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Customs tariff—Sugar not above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, melado or concentrated melado, tank bottoms, sugar concrete and molasses testing over fifty-six degrees and not exceeding ninety-six degrees of polarization, subject to drawback when used exclusively in the manufacture of syrups and molasses enumerated in tariff item 140, not to include syrup and molasses produced in the process of refining sugar. Provided, however, that such drawback shall not be paid unless the claims as presented by a manufacturer at any one time aggregate twenty-five dollars: Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 30 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I move that item 1031 be struck out and that the following be substituted:

Artificial silk yarn, filaments, threads or twists enumerated in tariff items 583AA and 583B when imported by manufacturers to be further manufactured in their own factories before the 1st day of July, 1924, 60 per cent.

That item will be designated 583aa.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Had it not better be numbered with the drawback numbers, instead of being put in with the tariff numbers? Usually my hon. friend will find all his drawbacks in schedule B. Really the proper place to put that in would be as No. 1011a, because then it would be in proper contradistinction to what happens in connection with this unfortunate botany yarn. It is a drawback provision, and the drawback provision as to botany yarn is No. 1011.

Mr. FIELDING: Before the resolution is finally disposed of we will consider that suggestion.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—Oil subject to drawback when used in the manufacture of manila rope, not exceeding one and one-half inches in circumference, when used exclusively in the fisheries: Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that new?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, it is a new item. It is in the production of an item that is free that this oil is used.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Glass tubing, subject to drawback when used for the manufacture of glassware and other scientific apparatus for laboratory work in public hospitals. Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Barilla or soda ash, subject to drawback, when used in the manufacture of sal soda. Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Machinery, and parts thereof, and dies valued at more than $500 each, of a class or kind not made in Canada, subject to drawback when used in manufacturing or producing goods of a class or kind not manufactured or produced in Canada prior to the twelfth day of May, 1923: Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback 60 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the underlying idea in connection with this item? We get 60 per cent there as against 99 per cent in the others.

Mr. FIELDING: It is intended in this case to encourage the introduction of machinery not made in Canada, but machinery to be used in the creation of industries not hitherto in existence in Canada. It may be argued we should make it free, but we have in mind some of the industries which are contemplating coming in now which will have the benefit of what some people think is quite a protection, and there is no reason why we should give them protection on both. For that reason we think they should be content with a partial drawback.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Materials, including all parts not finished, subject to drawback when used in the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff item 448c: Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 40 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: That is giving the drawback on materials used in the stumping machines previously referred to.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—Copper in blocks, ingots, pigs or bars; subject to drawback when used in the manufacture of rods for use only in the manufacture of trolley, telegraph and telephone wires, electric wires and electric cables: Portion of duty—not including special duty or dumping duty—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is new also, is it not?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, that practically makes the item free.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the situation before? Had we that at all before?

Mr. FIELDING: There is one factory—I am not sure that there is more than one—making these goods, which did not get them free because they were not made in their own factory. They were not wire manufacturers, and consequently they were not able to avail themselves of the freedom. We now propose to give them an opportunity of getting a drawback no matter whether these articles are made in their own factory or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend's recollection will be much fresher than mine; but as regards the copper situation in Canada, at one time one of the things that came very strongly before me in the tariff inquiry was that in view of the protection we had on the raw material, it would have paid a manufacturer to take his plant to Buffalo for the purpose of selling in Ontario, because the duty on his raw material and his other expenses ran up to about 12 per cent as against a protection of 10 per cent, so that he was 2 per cent worse off than if we had free trade. Is the idea of this drawback to get away from that situation?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If it be to get away from that situation, why is it so much confined to these particular articles?

Mr. FIELDING: The item is the same as it was before, except that the qualification about using these bars in their own factory in the making of wire is removed. Anybody can now import copper bars for that purpose. Under the new copper policy, we hope, however, they will buy them in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is not intended then to assist the main situation at all?

Mr. FIELDING: It will change the situation in this respect, that the man who could not formerly import copper rods and bars free unless he made the wire in his own factory, can do so now. That limitation is now removed.

Mr. WALLACE: While we are dealing with drawbacks, is there any drawback on material entering into the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. FIELDING: I am told that there is a drawback under an order in council which will expire some time this year.

Mr. WALLACE: What is the amount of the drawback?

Mr. FIELDING: The actual duties paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says that it will expire.

Mr. FIELDING: I am so advised. It is an order in council for a limited period.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but the minister can have another one passed.

Mr. FIELDING: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the intention to keep the material free while the finished product is free?

Mr. FIELDING: That whole question is open until to-morrow?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To-morrow it may close and it may not.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the amount of the drawback for this last year—the whole thing?

Mr. FIELDING: I could not give that to my hon. friend now. If he is desirous of getting it, I will give him at a later date the amount paid.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—5. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the twelfth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In this connection I think my hon. friend said—at least his statement would have that effect—that notwithstanding the fact that the general resolution would come into effect, he was taking power to see that resolution in regard to artificial silk did not become effective until the company could do business.

Mr. FIELDING: Have we not effected that by the drawback?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so.

Mr. FIELDING: I will take a note of that and think the matter over.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a very serious matter.

Mr. FIELDING: Two resolutions touching reciprocity stood over earlier in the evening. If hon. members so desire, we will go on with them now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is pretty late to start reciprocity to-night. I should like the minister, when we come to the discussion, to have the information as to what list of articles, as regards the United States, the president has power to make reductions on, upon the conditions specified in their law; that is to say, upon what articles besides those enumerated in clause 8c.

Mr. FIELDING: I shall be glad to look into that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And under what conditions?

Mr. FIELDING: As contained in the American tariff?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

4. Resolved, that schedule B to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1914, by chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1919, chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1922, and by order in council, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 1029, 1030, the enumerations of goods and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each of the said items, and to repeal Order in Council, P.C. 17/846, dated the twenty-first day of April, 1922, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties be inserted in said schedule B:—

Mr. FIELDING: I desire to move that this resolution be amended by adding after the word "councils" in the sixth line the following words "P.C. 19-656 dated 25th May, 1920, and." That is an order in council that was omitted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the minister's idea in having a statute repeal an order in council? All he has to do is to repeal that himself in council. It seems to me to be cluttering up our statutes. Nobody in looking over the statutes can tell what on earth the effect is.

Mr. FIELDING: The Customs department regards this as very important. It does not lumber up our statutes much because when you are repealing a certain bill, it is not much to add a certain order in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that.

Mr. FIELDING: It is the practice, and the Customs department agree that it is necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it is the practice. It was not the practice before, although it may be now. It is true that it does not take any longer to read; but the difficulty is that afterwards when this becomes a permanent statute in our annual production, anyone who examines this statute will not know what the effect of the statute is. He will have to send down to Ottawa in order to get a copy of the order in council. It makes it very difficult to interpret.

Mr. FIELDING: If the order in council is repealed it does not matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but he does not know what is accomplished by this statute. I think it would be much better that orders in council passed by council should be repealed by council and not by statute.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand that the experience of the Customs department has been otherwise, but I am willing to look into the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

COMBINES, MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS AND MERGERS

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 54 to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers.

He said: There is a slight amendment offered by the Senate to the bill. It simply adds that the statement which must be submitted when the six applicants make application for an investigation shall be in the form of a solemn or statutory declaration. The amendment is acceptable to the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that the only amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

SINGAPORE NAVAL BASE

Mr. MACLEAN (York):

1. With reference to the proposal of the British government to expend £10,000,000 upon the creation of a naval base at Singapore, is it a fact, as stated in the British House of Commons on first of May last by Mr. Eyres-Monsell, Financial Secretary of the Admiralty, that—"This work was approved by the Dominion Conference in 1921 and it was most strongly represented by the Dominions"?

2. Is it a fact that Mr. Eyres-Monsell, at the same time and place, said, with reference to the expenditure, that—"he had great hopes that the Dominions, which had a very direct interest in the work, would see their way to co-operate with us in this direction"?

3. Is it probable that the hopes of Mr. Eyres-Monsell will be fulfilled?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would inform the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) that this question should be preceded by an asterisk so as to obtain a verbal answer.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

SOLDIERS' COMFORTS BRANCH, TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

For a return showing all cases where fines and costs have been in whole or part remitted after conviction for violation of the Income War Tax of 1917, since January 1st, 1922. Such return also showing at whose instance or at whose representation, verbal or otherwise, such remissions have been made, and also showing in each case when the law was or has since been complied with by the delinquent.

LAKE FREIGHT RATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): The Prime Minister yesterday, in reply to a question, stated that, arising out of the report of the royal commission that had been investigating the subject of grain rates on the lakes, a bill would be introduced to amend the Shipping Act so as to give power to the government by order in council to suspend the coasting laws. A great deal of evidence has been taken on this subject and the commission has submitted a report making several recommendations. What the Prime Minister promises is entirely inadequate in the light of that report. Does the government intend to bring down legislation that will fully meet the suggestions that have been offered by the commission?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend refers to certain legislation that arises out of the report, and I think it would be well for the House to wait until that legislation is brought down to see how far-reaching it is. There are features of the report that demand very careful and thoughtful consideration. The government has not thus far had an opportunity to give to the entire report the consideration which we think it merits. However, when the legislation which is based on the recommendations of the commission is before the House it will be open to any hon. member to suggest additions or amendments.

Mr. FORKE: When is that legislation likely to be brought down? I gathered from the statement made yesterday that what the Prime Minister outlined was the whole bill of fare that the government purposed submitting to the House. And, as no mention was made of many of the items recommended by the commission, I thought it well to call attention to the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope it will be possible to present a copy of the proposed bill early next week.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY

REPRESENTATION TO THE GOVERNMENT FROM DEBENTURE HOLDERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Has the government any announcement to make concerning the visit to Ottawa of Sir Francis Harrison Smith and Mr. D. F. Forsdike, who represent the Grand Trunk Pacific debenture holders? Further, have these gentlemen waited upon any member of the government, and, if so, what is the nature of the representations they have made?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The two gentlemen referred to by my hon. friend did wait this morning upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), and myself, and presented certain representations on behalf of the debenture holders of the Grand Trunk Pacific. These representations are similar to those set forth in a memorial the government received some little time ago from the shareholders' committee, and I think I could best answer my hon. friend's question by undertaking to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the memorial itself. I shall be pleased to do that before the House rises to-day.

MONTREAL AND LONGUEUIL BRIDGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): On April 23rd an order of the House was passed for production of the report of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal on the south shore bridge. On May 9th I called the attention of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) to the fact that the report had not so far been laid on the Table.

The minister's answer was that he would submit it in a few days' time. A month has elapsed and the report is not on the Table yet. I should like to know from the minister whether it is his intention to produce that report this session.

OLEOMARGARINE

MOTION BY MR. CARROLL TO PERMIT MANUFACTURE, IMPORTATION AND SALE

Order of the Day—Special Order.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond) moved:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Oleomargarine Act, chapter twenty-four of the statutes of 1919 (second session), and the amending Acts, by providing that notwithstanding anything contained in The Dairy Industry Act, 1914, or in any other statute or law, the manufacture in, and importation of oleomargarine into Canada, and the offering for sale, the sale and the having in possession for sale, of oleomargarine, shall henceforth be permitted, subject to the provisions of the said Oleomargarine Act and to such regulations as are now or may hereafter be established by the Governor in Council.

He said: Mr. Speaker, no doubt you viewed with alarm my entrance into the Chamber this afternoon. Probably you thought that I must be armed with a very large array of papers and that the House would be subject to a long and tiresome speech from me. I want to assure you before I go any further that my speech will be brief, but I trust it will be logical and replete with facts. The question of the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine has been before parliament for a number of years. In 1886, on a motion by a member of the government to place a tariff duty upon the importation of oleomargarine, a debate took place which considerably affected the standing of the commodity in this country. At that time there were no regulations in force regarding the manufacture of oleomargarine, and in the course of the debate statements were made to the effect that this commodity was manufactured out of dead horses, rats and other unwholesome ingredients. A few years later legislation was passed to ensure the purity of dairy products, culminating in the Dairy Act of 1914, which was amended in 1916 to provide for the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine in this country.

Under this act various regulations were put into effect to protect our people against adulterated products, and to-day I hope we shall not have repeated the well-worn argument that oleomargarine is harmful or unwholesome, for the reason, Mr. Speaker, that the manufacture of this commodity has been under the direct control of the Department of Agriculture and it is generally acknowledged that the gentlemen in charge of that department are very careful indeed to see to it that there is nothing dangerous to the public health in the ingredients which enter into the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Without entering into details regarding these ingredients, I will content myself by saying that there is a difference of opinion both in the country and in this House as to whether or not we should allow the further manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine. We must approach this question in a fair and honest frame of mind and should not use arguments which, while they may have been effective up to 1916, can now be safely discounted in view of the fact that the Department of Agriculture exercises very stringent supervision over this manufacture. But while there may be a difference of opinion on the desirability of allowing oleomargarine to be still manufactured and imported, we cannot ignore appeals from various influential organizations which to-day are asking parliament to make effective an Oleomargarine Act such as I propose to introduce if this resolution passes. We must consider this question not with the eye of 1886 but with the eye of the present day. If I cite the Canadian Lumbermen's Association as being in favour of the continued manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, I shall perhaps be told that this organization is looking for cheap food for its labourers. And when I say that the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada is also asking that my proposed bill be brought into effect, I shall be told that this organization, too, is interested from a financial standpoint. But, Mr. Speaker, I have stronger authority still in the fact that 200,000 of our women have shown by the votes which they cast in their respective organizations and by their circular letters that they are in favour of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine being continued. As I say, the motives of the Canadian Lumberman's Association and of the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada may be questioned on the ground of their being pecuniarily interested; but will any hon. gentleman dare rise in his place and tell us that the mothers and sisters and daughters of the Canadian people are engaged in propaganda that will hurt their offspring, their kith and their kin? The stand taken by these women is one of the strongest arguments, it seems to me, that can be used in favour of the continued manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

But to return for the moment to the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada. I presume that as business men they are not interested either in poisoning our people or in bringing about the ruin of our dairy farmers. What do they say about this matter? In 1916, when an order in council was passed under the War Measures Act to permit of the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine, this association undertook to investigate this commodity. Their investigation convinced them that oleomargarine was not the menace to the health of our people which the propaganda of its enemies had sought to make out. Here is a circular which the association have sent out to the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, and I may be permitted to read one paragraph, as follows:

> Before our members undertook to offer it for sale to the general public we made exhaustive enquiries as to the ingredients it contained and its method of manufacture. We consulted with the chief analyst for the Dominion government and he pronounced it a perfectly good food, and he stated that it contained no harmful ingredients, and, as on each package is stamped the approval of the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada, our retail grocers, butchers, produce dealers and general store merchants throughout Canada felt perfectly justified in stocking it and offering it for sale. If our customers did not want it there would be no sale for it, but our experience shows that they do want it, and, seeing that it is a non-injurious and palatable product, and contains nothing that is unhealthful, we are of the opinion that they should be allowed to buy it if they so desire, and no law should be passed to prevent them from having it.

I reiterate, Sir, that whatever may have been said regarding the harmful properties of oleomargarine should no longer be repeated, because parliament in 1917 recognized this commodity as a healthful article of food, and up to the present time millions of pounds have been sold throughout the country with the approval of the Department of Agriculture. Again I appeal to hon. members not to use the argument that oleomargarine is harmful food, because by so doing they will in effect be casting a slur not only upon the Minister of Agriculture and his predecessors but upon the departmental officials as well. Surely before the approval of the department is placed on this article which goes out in small packages, the precaution is taken to ascertain whether or not it is a healthful article of food.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, regarding the injury which oleomargarine may have been causing to the dairy industry of this country. Well, I do not believe the manufacture of oleomargarine has been in any way injurious to the dairy people, because every pound of butter they manufacture has a ready sale; the milk from every cow they raise is sent out in the shape of butter and cheese. But they tell you that oleomargarine is used as a substitute and that in its sale as such the persons handling it make their customers believe that they are buying butter. I do not think there is any force in that argument, for this reason: Every package of oleomargarine that is manufactured in or imported into this country has stamped on the product itself, in letters that may be seen and read by all, the word "Oleo." Every parcel is also enclosed in a wrapper which indicates in the clearest way that it is oleomargarine and not butter. Moreover, the Department of Agriculture exercise supervision over and make regulations respecting the manufacture of this product in Canada as well as its importation. Now, follow me. This product is manufactured here, or is imported. Surely the officers of the Agriculture department are sufficiently alive to the interests of the people to see to it that not an ounce of oleomargarine leaves the factories in this country or is imported without there being stamped upon it the word "Oleo." Then it goes to the wholesaler. I hope that the Agriculture department have been sufficiently alert in performing their duty to the people during the last four years to see to it, through their inspectors or other officials, that the wholesaler who gets this bulk of oleomargarine for distribution to the retailer does not attempt to impose upon the people by erasing in any way those distinctive letters which indicate that the product is oleomargarine and not butter. Then we come down to the retailer. I do not argue that the Department of Agriculture have a sufficient staff to see to it that no substitution or erasure is made at that stage. But, Sir, I have sufficient confidence in the honour and honesty of the retailers of this country to believe they are not doing that kind of thing, and it will take a very strong line of evidence to make me think otherwise.

When did the dairy industries of this country suggest, after 1917, that we should have a prohibition against the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine? It is a very peculiar thing that in 1921, in their petition to the government of the day, they did not ask for the prohibition of this article of food. What they did ask for was a "standard colour of oleomargarine"; for the printing on each package of the word "oleo"; for a differently shaped package "from that now used for oleomargarine"; "for the prevention of deception or dishonesty in making purchasers believe they are actually getting butter or an article of the same food value as butter."

Mr. KAY: May I ask what my hon. friend is quoting from, and the date?

Mr. CARROLL: I am quoting from a copy of a petition sent to the Dominion government in 1921 by the Dairy Council of Canada. Now, if they saw in 1921 that they should not ask for the prohibition of oleomargarine, or, to put it differently, if they did not ask for it, what has changed their mind in the meantime? Is there any evidence that dealers have been deceptive in the matter—that they have attempted to make the people believe they were getting butter when they were really getting oleomargarine? I do not believe it, Mr. Speaker. Taking this matter as a whole, I think we should use the arguments that may be used as from 1917 in respect to oleomargarine and not hark back to the times when people were afraid of anything new and when they believed that oleomargarine was made up of such ingredients as I mentioned in the earlier part of my remarks.

I wish to impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, and upon the members of this House the fact that the parliament of Canada put the stamp of its approval upon oleomargarine in 1917 and has kept it there ever since. It has indicated its belief that oleomargarine is a non-harmful food, a food that is wholesome. In casting your votes in this connection I want you to remember that fact; I want you not to be led away by any other thought but that there are thousands of people in this country who want to use oleomargarine and who have the right to use it. I hope you will not think me a plagiarist if I use the words: Is this an article of commerce? And—If this is an article of commerce, why should we prohibit it? I am using the words, Sir, of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in a former debate in this House. He is one of the few people who have the happy faculty of placing a whole argument in a nutshell.

I ask the members of this House to give fair consideration to this whole question. I ask them to think of the millions who are asking this parliament that they be permitted to put this product on their table as an article of food. I ask them not to be led away by their own personal interests; we are not here for that purpose. I do not make any accusation—I believe that every member of this House will use his best judgment in the matter—but I do suggest that we be not led away by any selfish motives. Let us seek away down in our hearts and ask ourselves: Are we going to prevent the people from using oleomargarine if they wish to use it? If we are, then it is just as well that parliament should to-morrow say to the people that they shall not use shoes unless they are up to the standard; that they shall not use an article of clothing unless it is the very best; that they shall not purchase any horse food that is not up to or, perhaps, above the standard. It may be said that oleomargarine is a cheap article of food, but it is not deleterious; it is not unwholesome. But I say, give the people of this country who wish to use that article of food the privilege of using it. I reiterate: If this parliament takes it upon themselves to refuse the common people of this country that which I consider a benefit, they will hear from them in the very near future.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second this resolution I do so with the understanding that I may suggest certain changes or in my opinion improvements to it as I go along. Under those conditions I am glad to second this resolution.

This matter has been discussed, as has been pointed out by the hon. member (Mr. Carroll) who has just taken his seat, on a number of occasions in this House in the past, and I for one sincerely hope that we shall decide finally on this occasion whether we are going to have oleomargarine in this country or not. The subject has taken up a very great deal of the valuable time of this House in previous years. On this occasion I can hardly refer to the subject without saying a word as to the way in which this resolution has been put off from the early part of the session until now when we are in its closing days—a resolution of the very greatest importance not only to the dairymen of this country but also to the consumers and to a certain group of manufacturers. I feel that this matter should have been given attention earlier in the session if possible, and should not have been avoided and side-stepped in the way it has been. I rather think the question has been evaded to a certain extent, but I shall not speak any more of that phase of the question beyond referring for a moment to what the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) said yesterday when discussing oleomargarine and in uttering the word "cuckoo" we will all understand what I mean.

This measure was first introduced as a war measure on account of the great scarcity of fats overseas. It will be remembered that there was a considerable demand for fats on the other side of the Atlantic during the war, and oleomargarine was introduced at that time and found very useful indeed over there. In fact, our Canadian troops went all through the war using only oleomargarine as a spread for bread. It has been suggested that on account of its having first been introduced as a war measure it should cease now that the war is over. But let me point out that the people of Canada have expressed their wishes through their representatives in this House on several occasions and have extended the time year by year, and at the present time oleomargarine is now recognized as one of the staple articles of food in many sections of this country. I think the government should carefully consider this in bringing down any measure or in giving support to any measure for making oleomargarine permanent in this country.

What is oleomargarine? In the first place it is made from selected beef fats, neutral lard, vegetable oils, pasteurized milk, salt, pure water, and sometimes includes butter. It is all churned together and then made into blocks and offered for sale. It is manufactured only under the strictest sanitary conditions. It is first necessary for anyone desiring either to import or to manufacture oleomargarine in Canada to obtain a license from the Minister of Agriculture for that purpose, and the minister may at any time cancel that license for cause. It is made under the very closest inspection, the inspection of our Meat and Canned Foods branch of the Department of Agriculture, and their certificate and brand on any goods sent out of this country is accepted in all parts of the world. With the United States we have an exchange of certificates between our Health of Animals branch here and the Bureau of Animal Industry at Washington.

The question is often asked, is oleomargarine wholesome? We find that its digestibility is about the same as butter, about 97 per cent, and its energy value is also about the same. With regard to its palatability we find that the British or English-speaking people throughout the world have a preference for fats showing the lactic acid flavour, as a result of the fermentation of milk and cream from bacteria working upon it. Oleomaragarine will never be as popular as butter in this or any other country because it will never be as palatable, not possessing that peculiar lactic flavour I have just referred to, and anyone who understands or has an appreciation of real good butter can never be misled by any oleomargarine. He can tell the difference both by taste and odor.

One feature of this oleomargarine question that has been stressed to a very great extent in the discussions in this House in the past year is the vitamine content of oleomargarine. You will find that authorities differ a great deal on this point, some claiming that the other animal fats contain just as many vitamine soluble A as the butter fats themselves. Let me quote. William Clayton, Master of Science at Liverpool University, in a book published in 1920 says:

> The published work on "The Nutritive value of Oleomargarine and Butter Substitutes", with reference to their content of the fat-soluble accessory growth substance, is due to Halliburton and Drummond whose conclusions were: That the fat-soluble accessory growth substance is present in beef fat and also oil and is present in margarine prepared upon such a basis. Such margarines are nutritively the equivalent of butter.

We find, too, that butter varies a great deal in its vitamine content, and this is indicated very greatly by the pigmentation or colouring of the butter. For instance, in winter time we find that the butter is very light in colour, and then it has a very low vitamine content as compared with the rich, bright yellow butter of June or July during the height of the grass season. Now, the butter maker is permitted to colour his butter in the winter time so that it will look like June butter. As has been pointed out by scientists who have investigated the matter very carefully, the vitamine content is shown by the height of colouring, but the butter maker by heightening the colour of his butter gives no indication to the purchaser of the vitamine content or its value as a food in that particular respect. Let me quote in this connection from Sherman and Smith's book " The Vitamines," 1922, by H. C. Sherman, Professor of Food Chemistry, Columbia University, and S. L. Smith, Specialist in Biological and Food Chemistry, United States Department of Agriculture. They say:

> In recent years butter has occupied a unique position because it appeared to be conspicuously the richest in vitamine A among the commercial food fats. Further work in this field indicates, however, that the value of butter in this respect is subject to rather wide variation.
> Steenbock, as previously noted, found that paleness of butter fat indicated paucity of vitamine A, but the present system of artificially coloring butter makes it impossible for the consumer to apply this criterion. The burden of responsibility for the maintenance of the vitamine value of butter lies with the producer. By intelligent and liberal use of feeds rich in vitamine A, such as alfalfa, and care in the manufacture, transportation and storage of the product, both butter and other animal fats may in time be standardized as commercial sources of vitamine A.

Quoting again from Mr. Clayton, of Liverpool University, he says:

In conclusion it is well recalled that butter owing to the influence of food, storage conditions and temperatures used in the renovation of inferior products, and even the method of use of the produce in the home, may not exceed a good oleomargarine in nutritive qualities.

The whole question seems to depend upon the adequately varied and balanced diet of the individual. Children should preferably be fed on butter, but adults, with their stronger digestive powers, may with absolute impunity replace butter with either oleo or vegetable margarine, provided they consume sufficient amounts of the vegetative green parts of plants since these furnish an ample supply of all three vitamines.

You will see here that the diet of a man being very varied, a paucity of vitamines in any particular article of food may mean that the whole ration was short in that particular respect. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, a few of the common articles of food that contain vitamines. I will only mention a few of them so as not to take up too much time of the House.

Butter; cream; margarine prepared from animal fats other than lard; milk, condensed, evaporated or dried; nut butter; mutton and beef fat; heart; brain; sweetbread; cod liver oil and other fish livers oils—

Which, I may say, is one of the richest in this vitamine.

—herring oil, salmon and cod oil; liver; onions, kidneys; potatoes; fat fish, as herring, salmon fish roe; eggs—

And some forty-two others, including many vegetables.

This will indicate to you how very freely these vitamines are distributed among the common articles of food. We have also had rather sweeping statements made about the entire absence of vitamines in oleomargarine. You will see, however, that this is not the line of argument pursued by those men who are experts in this particular direction. In a bulletin issued by the National Dairy Council entitled "Health vs. Wealth" I find the following statement:

You may wonder when milk and butter contain vitamines why beef fat does not. Vitamines are in green, leafy substances, grass, leaves, twigs, whole grain and many things that a cow eats. The cow requires some for her own use and stores some in her liver, but all the rest is given off in the milk and are never deposited in the flesh. As oleomargarine is chiefly made from the waste products of the animal at the slaughter house it could not possibly contain vitamines.

This is a very broad statement indeed and is opposed by many. Now let me quote from a statement by H. Steenbock, of the Department of Agricultural Chemistry of the University of Wisconsin. He says:

In our work a somewhat similar product, the oleo oils from beef fats, prepared in commerce for the manufacture of oleomargarine, were in some instances found richer in fat-soluble vitamine than many butters. Subsequent to the publication of these results we became aware of the fact that vitamine content as determined in our feeding experiments with these samples seemed to vary directly with the intensity of pigmentation.

Pointing out again that you may form an opinion as to the presence of vitamines by the colouring of the fat material. Now, in this particular article on "Health vs. Wealth" it is indicated that most of the vitamines are lost except those given off through the milk, but the author does not state what becomes of the vitamines fed so liberally during the grass season to those animals which are not giving milk; and we could hardly expect that nature will be so improvident, as in the case of the steer and the dry cow, as to cause an almost entire waste of this particular and valuable ingredient of food. If we accept Steenbock's theory for a moment we will recognize, as I pointed out a moment ago, that the excess of vitamines is clearly indicated by the high colour of the butter fat. Those who are familiar with the beef aspect of the question will remember that grass beef is also very much higher in colour than beef produced in winter time, indicating that there are vitamines stored up in the beef fats particularly at that season of the year.

Now in some of the American literature which has been distributed in the propaganda against oleomargarine we find pictures of white rats indicating some rats fed on vitamines which are of a very lusty character and other rats fed on a diet wholly lacking in vitamines which appear very weakly. It must be admitted that growth is due to certain chemical changes which take place in the body, and that the very best results are obtained where you have a ration that is chemically well balanced. In many sections of the country there is a paucity of certain ingredients in the soil which causes certain diseases, for example the disease known as rickets. I know of certain sections of British Columbia where cattle, young animals particularly, pastured on certain lands soon after exhibit rickets, or a bending or softening of the bones, due to the absence of calcium and phosphates. By the feeding of certain food rich in calcium and phosphates, however, these conditions are avoided and you can produce healthy cattle on this very same land. I know certain sections of British Columbia where, during the calving season many calves live only for an hour or two after birth, a severe loss resulting from this mortality. This again is due to the absence of iodine, showing again how necessary it is, in the case of growing animals, particularly that the rations should be well balanced.

I may say that during the war our Canadian troops, as I pointed out a while ago, had nothing but oleomargarine as a spread for their bread. This was also used by the British troops. The Danish army and navy is also supplied with the same material. In many Danish institutions oleomargarine is a regular part of the diet. It has been pointed out in some literature I have seen that it is necessary to have milk in some form or other for the proper growth of the human being. I do not think that this theory has been thoroughly supported by evidence. Take the case of the North American who never used dairy products in his life. Yet you see Indians out on the prairie six feet one inch in height and weighing two hundred pounds, fine lusty fellows. If we were to look into the matter very carefully we should probably find that not more than one half of the people of the country use milk or milk products.

Mr. WARNER: I should like to know if the hon. member has proof that the mothers among the savages do not nurse their children.

Mr. TOLMIE: I think the hon. gentleman's question is very appropriate. Every human being is probably nursed in that way, but I am talking about the individual when he reaches the period when the individual can use butter spread on bread. I am quite sure the Indians in the West have never used any butter. If they have, the practice has only commenced within recent years.

We also had very strong criticism of the vegetable oils used in the preparation of oleomargarine. I know that, either last year or the year before, we had some vivid word pictures drawn here of perspiring natives toiling in the jungles of Africa gathering the various seeds and plants from which these oils are obtained. I thought at the time the picture was rather overdrawn. I may say that the principal ingredient in the vegetable oil line used in the manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada is simply cotton seed oil. While we hear many complaints about the use of cotton seed oil in the preparation of oleomargarine we find it is used in many other articles of food such as shortening, and in salad oils, without the least bit of trouble. Evidently the oil is regarded as quite suitable in those cases but apparently is objectionable when used in the manufacture of oleomargarine. In addition to that we find that even annatto used for the purpose of colouring butter is mixed with cotton seed oil and by the use of this particular colouring, as I pointed out a while ago, January butter is made to look like June butter and as though it were rich in vitamine contents.

Now, we find that the consumption of oleomargarine increases as butter goes up in price, and it lessens as butter goes down in price, because no person with a decent palate or a good taste would for a moment think of eating oleomargarine if he could secure butter at a reasonable price. Oleomargarine, though, furnishes a greal deal of relief to people in families where economy is an absolute necessity under certain conditions that are liable to occur from time to time. To indicate that oleomargarine is in demand, let me quote a telegram received from the chamber of commerce in my constituency, the city of Victoria:

> We strongly urge you support resolution introduced by Mr. W. F. Carroll, M.P., Cape Breton, to make permanent legislation permitting manufacture and sale oleomargarine in Canada. Public opinion in Canada overwhelmingly favours such permanent legislation. Will you please forward copy this wire to Prime Minister and Mr. Carroll mover of the resolution.

May I say that Mr. Spencer, in addition to being chairman of the chamber of commerce, is the owner of a very large departmental store where they handle all lines of food products. I have had similar wires from women's organizations, including the Local Council of Women, but I will not take up the time of the House in reading them.

We usually find that oleomargarine is lower in price than butter, and I have in my hand these quotations of last week in Ottawa:

	Wholesale price	Retail price
Creamery butter	33 cents	40 cents
Dairy butter..	26 cents	33 cents
Oleomargarine..	20 cents	25 cents

This shows a difference between creamery butter and oleomargarine of 13 cents wholesale and 15 cents retail, and a difference between dairy butter and oleomargarine of 6 cents wholesale and 8 cents retail.

I was informed only yesterday that it paid the grocer in many cases to sell oleomargarine, because he made a greater profit from the sale of oleomargarine than from the sale of butter. This would hardly be borne out by the figures I have cited. The profit shown in dairy butter is about 7 cents between wholesale and retail; on creamery butter, 7 cents between wholesale and retail; and on oleomargarine only 5 cents between wholesale and retail.

Mr. STANSELL: Is the hon. member prepared to state the source of the figures he has cited?

Mr. TOLMIE: These figures were obtained from the city market in Ottawa last week, on the day it was expected that this question would come up. I did not think it necessary to get new figures to-day.

The argument has been used that we should wipe out oleomargarine in this country, because some of our logging camps give it to their loggers to spread on their bread in place of butter. I do not think we should be inconvenienced simply because of that. That is something that should be arranged between the logging camp men and their employers. In British Columbia, as I am sure the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) will agree, you cannot put on the table of the logging man anything except just what he demands and he sees that he gets it.

Many families throughout the country are from time to time using oleomargarine in order to keep down family expenses. We have the man who gets out of work; we have the man who has sickness in his family and who has to incur an extra expense; we have those families where economy is an absolute necessity, and this occurs from time to time in the everyday life of the people of this country. The people have every right to decide for themselves in their own intelligence whether oleomargarine is to be purchased by them or not, and this House is taking upon itself a very great responsibility when it tells the people that they should not have the same privileges as are enjoyed by the people of every other country in the world.

We have three groups that are chiefly interested in this oleomargarine question. We have the great consuming group which is the first consideration; then we have the dairy man; and, third, we have the manufacturer of oleomargarine. Therefore, this is not entirely a question pertaining to the dairyman. If the poor man or the man who desires to lower his cost of living, cannot obtain the cheap oleomargarine and cannot afford the price of butter, it will be necessary for him to use ordinary beef or pork dripping, and I am sure oleomargarine would be more palatable for his use under such conditions. We should leave this matter entirely to the judgment of the people. It is not the place of the government of this country to prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine; rather it is the duty of the government to protect the people, to see that oleomargarine is made in a very wholesome way; that there is no possible criticism along that line, and then that it is not sold for something which it is not. As I pointed out a moment ago, oleomargarine, on account of its inferiority in flavour, will never interfere with good butter.

We have also had the argument put forward that if the manufacture of oleomargarine is once made permanent in this country, oleomargarine will greatly increase in quantity. I think that argument is not borne out by our experience since 1918 when it was first introduced. We find that we have had free access to the American market, and not only the ingredients which are made up into oleomargarine in this country, but the manufactured article can be imported from the United States absolutely free of duty. So, if there had been a greater demand in this country for oleomargarine, we would have had it entering Canada in very much greater quantities. The truth is that since 1918, when oleomargarine was first introduced into Canada, there has been a steady falling off in the quantity consumed in this country; but it has been very clearly shown that when butter gets cheaper in price, the consumption of oleomargarine lessens to a very considerable extent. Let me cite these figures:

	Oleomargarine
	Quantity manufactured in Canada	Quantity imported
Year	Pounds	Pounds
1918..	10,483,179	3,494,622
1919..	8,450,902	5,231,211
1920..	6,224,422	5,547,345
1921..	3,780,392	2,057,035
1922..	1,902,629	1,345,784

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member will notice that under the Liberal administration we have been using more butter than oleomargarine.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am sure the Liberal government can take credit for some things, but that is rather a long step.

In the meantime creamery butter has shown a steady increase, and only last year it increased something over 15,000,000 pounds. At the present time the consumption of oleomargarine amounts to only about 2 per cent for the spreads used for bread in this country. That is, 98 per cent of the spreads consists of dairy products as compared with 2 per cent of oleomargarine. This shows that the situation is not at all a dangerous one. The dairyman of this country, therefore, might very well look at this question in a broad, liberal way.

Mr. LUCAS: Would that condition continue if oleomargarine became permanent in this country?

Mr. TOLMIE: That is just the point that I referred to a moment ago. I have just given the figures that show that, with the duty entirely off oleomargarine and its ingredients coming into this country since 1918, there has been a steady falling off from about 14,000,000 pounds to less than 4,000,000 pounds last year, when they had the broadest access to the American markets and could have imported a much larger quantity had they desired to do so, or had the consumption called for that. Therefore, with the placing of oleomargarine on a permanent basis in this country, I do not think we could reasonably expect that there would be a greater consumption of oleomargarine than there has been in the past. It has been stated in some of the literature circulated on this subject, and particularaly in that of a gentleman named Love, of Edmonton, who quotes a western packer in his booklet to the effect, that the sale of the portions of the carcass used for oleomargarine do not in any way affect the price of the beef animal. I have figures from the Packers' Association which clearly prove that the price obtained for these portions of the carcass does affect the sale of the animals to the extent of about 59 cents per head; and calculating on the sales of last year through the packing houses this would make a difference to the beef producers of about $400,000.

Let us glance for a moment at the question as to how oleomargarine has affected other countries where dairying has been carried on to any great extent. These figures are exceedingly interesting. In 1880, Denmark, one of the greatest dairy countries in the world, exported 27,057,726 pounds of butter. In 1882, the first co-operative creamery was introduced into Denmark, and in the same year oleomargarine factories were established in that country; and the increase in the manufacture of oleomargarine has steadily continued at a rapid rate. Now, judging by the argument advanced by those people in Canada who are opposed to the manufacture and consumption of oleomargarine in this country, we ought naturally to expect that Denmark's dairy industry would be absolutely ruined by this time through the influence of the manufacture of oleomargarine in that country. Well, let us look into that question just for one moment. Denmark in 1921 had increased her exports of butter to 199,584,863 pounds, or nearly 800 per cent. That is an indication of the way in which oleomargarine has "ruined" that country. On the other hand, Canada in 1880, exported 18,535,362 pounds of butter, while in 1921 the same country, carefully protected against oleomargarine up to 1918, not a pound of that substitute having been sold here up to that time, had suffered a reduction in its exports of butter which then amounted to just 9,739,414 pounds, or a reduction of nearly 47 per cent. Denmark today is consuming annually about 48 pounds of oleomargarine per capita, about 19 pounds of butter and about 62 gallons of whole milk. Did oleomargarine interfere with prices in Denmark? We shall see. In 1880, the average price for Danish butter was 24.12 cents per pound and in 1921 it had risen to 57.25 cents. Denmark imports most of her concentrates, her grains and her oil cake from the United States and the Argentine republic for the purpose of feeding her cows for the production of dairy products. Denmark has a population of only three millions as against Canada's nine millions. Canada can grow the finest foods for dairy cattle of any country in the world, and our people should be able to produce, on that account, cheaper dairy products than any other country. But the figures I have quoted show that while Denmark increased her dairy exports nearly 800 per cent, ours declined 47 per cent. If Denmark has been ruined by oleomargarine, then for goodness' sake let us be ruined in the same way.

Mr. PUTNAM: I presume the hon. member will admit that his figures give no intimation as to whether the coeval existence of oleomargarine would not have still further reduced the Canadian export of butter in the term of years he has referred to?

Mr. TOLMIE: I contend that the decline in our exports of butter was not due to the presence or the absence of oleomargarine at all; I say that if oleomargarine can ruin our butter business in Canada, then Denmark should have been ruined by now, for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. gentleman, I suppose, would concede that the decline in our exports of butter would have been more disastrous than it was if the industry had had to compete with oleomargarine throughout the period he mentioned? It is mere conjecture as to whether or not the absence of oleomargarine helped to keep the industry.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am not claiming that the absence of oleomargarine kept it up at all. What I claim is simply that we are not making progress, and instead of fiddling around discussing a question of this kind in connection with a great industry such as the dairy industry, we should be busily engaged this afternoon trying to discover some means of improving the condition of that industry in Canada to-day.

Mr. PUTNAM: I contend that there is absolutely nothing in the hon. gentleman's figures to show that the absence of oleomargarine had any effect on butter one way or the other in Canada.

Mr. TOLMIE: I pointed out that from 1880 to 1921, the period covered by the figures I submitted, throughout almost the whole of that time except for the last three or four years, we had no oleomargarine at all in Canada, and our butter exports were on the decline all the time. These figures, I think, indicate quite conclusively that we have nothing very much to fear from the manufacture and consumption of oleomargarine in this country. What we need immediately is a well-considered, a carefully worked out, and a broad and comprehensive plan for the development of our great dairy industry; and we should be discussing the more important phases of that business rather than wasting our time on this question.

The dairy industry of Canada has a hundred times more to fear from the manufacture of poor butter than from the manufacture of oleomargarine. The reports brought back by the officials of the Department of Agriculture who recently visited Great Britain go to show that the fact that we do not obtain as much for our butter as the Danes do is due to the poor quality of our product, its poor colouring, its poor keeping qualities and its flavour. I was asked only yesterday whether I expected the people of this country to adopt the standard of living of the Danes. Now, I do not know anything about the standard of living of the Danes, because I do not know Denmark; I have never been there. I do know, however, a number of Danes who have come to this country and settled both west and east of the mountains, and I can say that they are among our very best settlers. At any rate, they are men who are willing to work; and they work with results. I can recall one man whom I met in the city of Calgary, who came here with nothing at all—he had 25 cents in his pocket when he landed. To-day he turns out butter every week at the rate of tens of thousands of pounds. Another man of this type told me last year at the Calgary exhibition: 'Tolmie, you can break me if you like and I shall be independently rich in this country in five years." And, Mr. Speaker, he said this in a section of the country we hear decried so much in this House.

Let me quote some figures to show what we have to fear from the manufacture of bad butter, as compared with the production of oleomargarine, in Canada. I would ask hon. gentlemen to pay particular attention to the figures with reference to oleomargarine, because we hear it stated so frequently that this article is being sold for butter in a wholesale way in Canada. In 1919, the convictions for infractions of the Dairy Act, that is, for the sale of bad butter, were 111, while the convictions under the Oleomargarine Act were eight; in 1920, the convictions for butter were 126 and for oleomargarine 12; in 1921, the convictions for butter were 126 and for oleomargarine 14; and in 1922, for butter they were 126 and for oleomargarine 14.

Mr. NEILL: Is not that due to two facts —first, the far greater quantity of butter sold; and secondly, the fact that there is a very strict standard of butter making while there is none whatever for oleomargarine in this country?

Mr. TOLMIE: I do not think the hon. member will find any very strict standard of butter making extensively applied to dairy butter throughout this country. I have been a dairy inspector myself and a good many times I have seen butter that was anything but desirable. Quite apparently there was no standard at all except to get the butter into solid condition and sell it to someone.

Mr. MARTELL: Would not my hon. friend say that probably the reason why more oleomargarine people escaped than butter makers was due to the fact that the former were represented by more able attorneys?

Mr. TOLMIE: I do not think so. I am not trying to argue in favour of oleomargarine as against dairy products. I am trying to quote exact figures, and it is a very poor showing indeed if our dairymen, or whoever are responsible for the administration of the Oleomargarine Act, can find only fourteen convictions from Halifax to Victoria in one year if infractions of the law are nearly so general as they are stated to be.

Mr. WARNER: Can the hon. gentleman tell me how many firms in Canada are making oleomargarine compared with the number of our dairymen?

Mr. TOLMIE: I cannot tell my hon. friend the number of our dairymen, they are here by the thousands, but I think the oleomargarine manufacturers are confined to two firms. If I am not mistaken, we have two factories in Toronto and one in Edmonton.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): What are the names of those two firms?

Mr. TOLMIE: The Swift Canadian Company and the Harris Abattoir Company.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): They are American firms?

Mr. TOLMIE: One has the same name and is I presume a branch of the Chicago firm, although I have no evidence of that, but the other is a strictly Canadian firm as far as I know. I am acquainted with both proprietors and they look like Canadians anyway.

To indicate how carefully the dairyman is protected in this country with regard to the manufacture of oleomargarine, I will quote the regulations. I do not say that this protection is ample, and I have already intimated that there may be further restrictions we can apply so as to prevent the sale of oleomargarine for anything other than what it actually is. Before oleomargarine can either be manufactured or imported the dealer or manufacturer must have a license from the Minister of Agriculture. The minister may cancel this license at any time for cause. All packages must be clearly marked "Oleomargarine." I have a package here on which will be noticed the word "Oleomargarine" is cleary marked. We also have the word "Oleo" stamped directly into the material itself in letters one and a half inches high. Oleomargarine must be manufactured in an inspected establishment and, as I pointed out, the inspectors are highly qualified men who in addition to being skilled veterinarians have also passed a further examination before being taken into the employ of the Department of Agriculture. The sanitary arrangements must be first-class in every respect. The manufacture of oleomargarine in butter establishments is strictly prohibited. All materials must be inspected and analyzed if thought necessary. Oleo oil and neutral lards used for this purpose must be from inspected establishments. Importations of any of these materials must be accompanied by certificates from recognized authorities in the country from which they come. Milk from non-reacting cows or pasteurized so as to be free from tuberculosis must be used. Butter free from rancidity and bad odour must be used. I may say that some of the manufacturers are using no butter at all at the present time. No preservatives other than salt are allowed. No unlicensed person is permitted to mix oleo with butter. No colour is to be used or given away with oleomargarine. Manufacturers of oleomargarine must not use the words "butter," "creamery," "dairy," or the name of any breed of cattle in advertising or describing oleo or on any package containing oleo. Pure vegetable oleo must be so designated. It must be sold only in its original package. In all restaurants where oleomargarine is sold there is to be a placard displayed, "Oleomargarine sold here." Now, we have heard a great deal about how oleomargarine is sold in some places for butter. I have made careful inquiry among the butter distributors in this city, who say that that is not the case, that our restaurants here buy and use butter of the best quality. I have also asked a prominent gentleman connected with the Dairy branch who also agrees that not much oleomargarine is disposed of, at any rate under these conditions.

Mr. LUCAS: Has the hon. gentleman ever seen one of those placards in any restaurant in Canada?

Mr. TOLMIE: Not where I eat. There are very severe penalties imposed for any infractions of these regulations. I am quite sure that frequently oleomargarine gets a reputation for certain things that it is not guilty of at all. For instance, a gentleman, connected with the Department of Agriculture at that time, travelling from Montreal to Ottawa received on the train some very bad butter. He was very much disgusted with it and very angry, and after "calling down" the waiter he placed the butter in a paper package and had it analyzed, claiming very confidently that it was not butter at all but oleomargarine. The analyst found that it was just bad butter—some of that butter I was describing a few minutes ago.

There are certain propositions being put forward for the further control of oleomargarine even more stringently than at the present time, so as to make it impossible for it to be sold for butter. It has been proposed to give it an artificial colour. You will note, Mr. Speaker, here is a sample of oleo oil used in the manufacture of oleomargarine which is of a distinct yellow colour. Here again is some cottonseed oil, which is a vegetable product and which also is a rich golden colour, indicating that the natural colour of any product made from these two articles would be yellow. It is proposed now, however, to change this colour. Whether a proper standard can be arrived at or not I do not know, but if the manufacturers are agreeable I see no reason why this proposal should not be carried out. I feel we should place this matter on the soundest possible basis, I think we should encourage our dairymen in every possible way, and if I for one moment thought that this oleomargarine manufactured in Canada would interfere with the dairy industry—last year there was the miserably small quantity of less than 4,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine manufactured compared with 240,000,000 pounds of butter—if I thought it was going to seriously interfere with our dairymen I would certainly oppose its continued manufacture. But after a very careful study during the past three or four years I have been unable to find any reasonable argument along these lines.

Mr. CARROLL: Is the hon. gentleman himself engaged in dairying?

Mr. TOLMIE: Oh yes, I am engaged in the dairy business, and I also have two pure bred herds of very valuable dairy cattle. My principal customers are dairymen. However, I feel that when I come down here as the representative of Victoria City I would not be justified in allowing my private interests to interfere with my public duty.

Mr. WARNER: Of course—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that these interruptions are only allowed with the consent of the hon. gentleman who is addressing the House. They must not be too profuse.

Mr. WARNER: I want to ask the hon. gentleman two questions. If a greater number of people were engaged in the manufacture of oleo might not conditions be different? Also, if permanent arrangements are made does he not think there will be a great increase in the amount of oleo manufactured?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, I do not think there would be any difference at all, because ever since 1918 our people have had an opportunity to eat all the oleomargarine they want. Our figures show that instead of an increase in consumption there has been a steady falling off with the decrease in the price of butter, that is, the consumption of oleomargarine has fallen from 14,000,000 pounds to less than 4,000,000 pounds last year, which I think is a pretty fair indication that the people are getting tired of it. Had there been a duty on oleomargarine it might have affected the figures, but this commodity can be got just as cheap from the United States as in this country, and the people have shown that they have no great desire for it.

The butter maker is asking the oleo maker to colour this product, made from two yellow articles, either pink, green or black. I think it would be unreasonable to ask for that change in colour; it would be entirely foreign to the natural colour of the products from which the finished article is made. Remember this: The dairyman to-day—and the oleomargarine man does not object to it—is allowed to colour his butter so that he can make January look like June; he can make it look as if it were rich in vitimines when perhaps it is not. In Great Britain they permit ten per cent of butter to be added to their oleomargarine product; in Denmark fifteen per cent is allowed. In this country some of our packers are using as much, I think, as eight per cent. This can hardly be called adulteration—the mixing of a small quantity of higher priced material with a lower priced material Adulteration, as I understand it, is quite in the opposite direction.

As have pointed out, on every package of this product "Oleomargarine" is clearly marked. I am strongly in favour of improving that in any way possible so as to prevent the article from being sold as butter, or so as to obviate any misrepresentation in connection with it. I am a firm believer in putting a duty on oleomargarine imported into this country and on such of its ingredients as are already manufactured here. I see no objection whatever to the standardization of oleomargarine and the placing of a statement on each package indicating exactly what is contained in it. Holland has built up a great oleomargarine industry, the product being largely exported to Great Britain. Here is a chance in our country for development along similar lines. I feel that we should take up any line of work that will increase our industry, add to the wealth of the country and enable us to overcome the difficult conditions that exist as a result of the war. I believe in the firmest and closest policing of the sale of oleomargarine and dairy products in general. Unless we put our goods on the British market in the best possible condition we are not going to get our share of the market over there.

The suggestion has been made that oleomargarine affects dairy prices in this country. I do not think that its sale affects the price of butter here at all, for the reason that we get rid of our surplus in an export market: If the dairy industry of Canada is to increase we must continue to develop our export market. Naturally the price of butter in Canada is set by the price of butter in the market in which we dispose of our surplus product; and do not forget that that butter is sold in a market where oleomargarine also is sold in huge quantities. If we cannot compete with the little bit of oleo sold here, how on earth can we ever hope to compete in the British market, where oleomargarine is sold in such large quantities? One thing is sure, if we are going to compete over there we shall have to reduce our cost of production to such a level as will enable us to meet the Danes and our other competitors on that market; otherwise we cannot hope for good results.

It has been stated that the farmers all over this country are firm believers in the wiping out of the manufacture and consumption of oleomargarine. I have had talks with several farmers in the West, and when the whole condition is explained to them, as I have attempted to state it to-day, they have felt that there was no unreasonable ground for fear of the competition through the manufacture of oleo. But here is a very interesting thing: At the last session of the Alberta legislature a resolution was brought up to wipe out oleomargarine, that is, to recommend that the manufacture, sale and importation of oleomargarine in this country be made to cease. This resolution was put to a vote and that farmers' legislature voted it down by a majority of 30 to 12. I want to congratulate those farmers on the broad-minded view they took of the situation. If the dairymen throughout Canada were fully informed concerning this matter we would not have all this row about oleomargarine at the present time.

Mr. WARNER: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. TOLMIE: Certainly.

Mr. WARNER: Does he know that that vote was not so much on the question whether or not we should have oleo in Canada as on the question whether the provincial legislature should undertake to advise the Dominion parliament what to do in the matter? That is what the vote was.

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, but the hon. member knows what the resolution was aimed at. The question was whether they should recommend that legislation against oleomargarine should be adopted by this parliament, and they turned it down by a majority of 30 to 12. They are broadminded farmers, men who understand their business.

There should be a campaign in this country to increase the consumption of dairy products, to advertise their value, and so on. I think also that in connection with our export it would be well to adopt the words "Canada, approved" on our Canadian products wherever possible. These are the words that appear on our pork, bacon, ham, and so on that are sent out of this country. By having these words attached to all our products we should set up and maintain a nigh standard; we would keep up our volume of exports and maintain the quality of our goods, thus being able to get our share of the British market in a comparatively short time. I have tried to present the figures to the House in a fair way. I hope this matter gets settled one way or the other on this occasion. I know it would do me more good to take the other side of the question, as I said before in reply to an inquiry by an hon. member—to take the side of the dairyman. But I do not feel justified in doing so; I feel that this House has no right to tell the people of Canada that they have not the same intelligence as the people of other countries and that they cannot be allowed to buy oleomargarine if they wish to do so. The whole thing hinges on that one point, in my opinion we have to leave a little to the people. We told them a while ago what they should do with their money when they went to a certain place of entertainment; now we are going to tell them what to put in their mouths, and in doing so I think we are going a little too far. Last year the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) expressed great astonishment at my stand in this connection. I studied this question very thoroughly, both when Minister of Agriculture—when I was able to get information more easily than now—and subsequently; I have examined it carefully from all points of view, and I have come to the conclusion that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in this country is not hurtful to our dairy industry at the present time and will not hurt it in the future. Instead, therefore, of wasting our time on a question of this kind we should be busy trying to develop the dairy industry along proper lines.

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll), has been less belligerent to-day than he was on a former occasion, I trust that I shall have no difficulty in keeping within the rules of parliamentary debate. I am not going to follow his argument very far, but he made one statement that I think is hardly fair. He said that oleomargarine had the approval of the staff of the Department of Agriculture. I think he has no warrant for that statement. The law was passed by this House and these gentlemen, however much they may be against oleomargarine, are in duty bound to enforce the provisions of the law.

The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) in the beginning of his speech found fault with the government for what he termed the long delay in giving an opportunity for the discussion of this resolution. It struck me as rather curious that he should criticise the government in that respect, because if my memory serves me correctly, in 1921 when he was Minister of Agriculture a bill providing for the extension of the oleo legislation stood on the order paper from the early days of the session and was not discussed until within the last two weeks of the session.

This question has been discussed in this country for a great many years. The first legislation enacted on the subject was I think in 1886, when oleomargarine was first prohibited. In 1903 the provisions of that restriction were re-enacted, and this occurred again in 1914 under the Dairy Industry Act. During all that period from 1886 to 1917, a period of thirty-one years, oleomargarine was prohibited in this country, and we have not heard that there was any public demand or any demand whatever for its introduction. In 1917 the members of the House will remember that we as well as all the allied countries were beginning to feel the pinch and the stress of the Great War, and all the peoples of the allied countries were then willing to submit to any sacrifice which would help towards winning the war. Many things were done, Sir, not only in this country but in all the allied countries at that time which no one would have dreamt of as possible under normal conditions, and one of these extraordinary things was the enactment in 1917 of the order in council permitting the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada. Before that order in council was passed the matter was fully discussed by the Canada Food Board, an organization of the government, and by a special committee of that Food Board known as the Special Milk Committee. Upon that committee were representatives of the dairy interests, and when the great need of the boys at the front and of the allies for more butter and fats was pointed out to the dairymen they consented gladly, as patriotic citizens should, to allowing oleomargarine to be manufactured, imported and sold in Canada provided that it was as a war measure only and a temporary one. In order to show that that was the view of the government I will read the provisions of that order in council, dated October 23, 1917:

Whereas attention is drawn to the abnormal demand for butter due to war conditions and to the very great probability that such abnormal demand and consequent high prices will prevail for this product for some time to come;

And whereas it is in the public interest, under the special conditions above named, that other fats should be available in Canada under strict and reasonable conditions as a substitute for butter,—

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and in virtue of the provisions of the War Measures Act, 1914, is pleased to make and enact and doth hereby make and enact the following regulations providing for the importation to Canada and the permitting of the manufacture, sale and possession within Canada of oleomargarine and establishing the conditions of such importation, manufacture, sale and possession, such regulation to be in force and to have effect for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue, the conclusion of such period to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, as provided in the said regulations, and as a war measure only.

[Mr. Kay.]

That, Sir, as I have said before, was agreed to by the dairymen of this country, but it was agreed to on the distinct pledge of the government of the day that the measure should not be made permanent. On the expiration of the War Measures Act in 1919 the government of that day did not consider that the special conditions mentioned in the order in council, a return to normal conditions, had arrived, and therefore in the second session of 1919 a bill was introduced intituled "An act to permit the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada." Since then, Sir, as you well know, year by year, a temporary bill has been introduced, and I claim that the fact that the bill has been a temporary measure, for twelve months only at a time, is an indication that the government still considered that a pledge had been made to the dairymen of the country.

Let me remind the hon. members of the House of a pledge made during the war by the British government with reference to the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle. I need not remind this House and the people of the country that without exception we made a demand that that pledge made during the war should be carried out. The people of England, notwithstanding their great objection to the admission of Canadian cattle, felt that they were bound by the pledge which their government had given to ours, and so last year a government in Great Britain which was not the same government which had made the pledge, but the government of Bonar Law, removed the embargo on Canadian cattle, and to-day our cattle are admitted to England. I ask you then, Sir, is it not equally the duty of this government to fulfil and carry out the pledge which was given by the government of that day to the people of this country that when conditions became normal the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in this country would again be prohibited? Feeling that this is so, feeling that the pledge of the government of that day is the important point to discuss, I have refrained from taking up the pros and cons of the question of oleomargarine, and therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell):

That all the words after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor,—

In view of the distinct assurances given at the time that the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine was suspended by order in council in 1917 under the War Measures Act of 1914, such suspension being but temporary and a war measure only, should now be removed and the question left, without prejudice as to its merits, in the same position as before the enactment of the said temporary suspension.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit to your consideration that the amendment is a direct negative, it is not an amendment at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have examined this point. The expanded negative theory of an amendment is discussed by well known authorities on parliamentary rules of procedure. In some instances an expanded negative has been accepted as an amendment. For example I find a ruling in May, which is the standard authority, page 258:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "that," and to substitute in their place other words of a different import.

The main motion has for its object the making it lawful to manufacture and sell oleomargarine. The chief object of the amendment is, that when the delay under which importation, manufacture and sale is permitted expires, I think it is on the first of August, there shall be a reversion to the status quo ante, that is to say to the time when this right was prohibited. Now, there is, if I may use the expression, a classical case in May where an amendment of this nature is justified. It is to be found at page 253, and the case is a very interesting one. May says:

> The general practice in regard to amendments is explained on page 258—

Which I have just read.

> —but here such amendments only will be mentioned as are intended to evade an expression of opinion upon the main question by entirely altering its meaning and object.
> This is effected by moving the omission of all the words of the question after the word "that" at the beginning and by the substitution of other words of a different import. If this amendment be agreed to by the house, it is clear that no opinion is expressed directly upon the main question, because it is determined that the original words shall not stand as part of the question; and the sense of the house is afterwards taken directly upon the substituted words, or practically upon a new question. There are many precedents of this mode of dealing with a question: but the best known in parliamentary history are those relating to Mr. Pitt's administration and the Peace of Amiens, in 1802. On the 7th May, 1802, a motion was made in the Commons for an address, "expressing the thanks of this house to his Majesty for having been pleased to remove the Right Hon. W. Pitt from his councils;" upon which an amendment was proposed and carried, which left out all the words after the first, and substituted others in direct opposition to them, by which the whole policy of Mr. Pitt was commended. Immediately afterwards an address was moved in both houses of parliament condemning the Treaty of Amiens in a long statement of facts and arguments; and in each house an amendment was substituted, whereby an address was resolved upon which justified the treaty. This practice has often been objected to as unfair; but the objection is unfounded, as the weaker party must always anticipate defeat, in one form or another.

I need not quote any further from May. Here is the doctrine expounded by, I should say, the standard authority on parliamentary procedure which would justify me in ruling that the present amendment is in order. The weaker party, as in the Pitt case just cited, will have to anticipate defeat. I do not know which is the weaker party, but I rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): At the outset of the brief observations I propose to make I should like to say immediately that I am heartily in favour of the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll). This subject has been discussed session after session, and the same old straw has been threshed and re-threshed again and again, almost every session since I have been a member of this House. I deem it unfortunate that time has been unnecessarily spent from year to year in attempting to solve a simple problem which should properly be solved only in one way, it seems to me, if the members of the House choose to approach it in a fair and unprejudiced manner. Last year the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) introduced a resolution into this House which called for the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. That resolution was very exhaustively discussed, and finally was lost by a substantial majority. I contend that that vote itself was a declaration on the part of this House that it did not believe in the principle of the prohibition of oleomargarine; and I contend further that it was a direct mandate to the government to wipe off the statute book the law which provided for the prohibition of the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine. I regretted at the time that the Minister of Agriculture did not accept the vote in that way, and that he did not take steps to put himself in line with the expression of the opinion of the House as contained in that vote. As it was, the principle of the prohibition of oleomargarine was still recognized as the will of this parliament when exactly the reverse was the case, as expressed in the vote on in September, unless something further is done in regard to this matter the old law becomes operative and oleomargarine is prohibited. Now, we are under the necessity of discussing the whole matter again.
5 p.m. the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Missisquoi. Therefore,

I accept as true the assumption that oleo is a wholesome food. I am quite content to take the word of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), who knows a good deal about the subject that it is. I have read a little about it myself, and I have personally come to the conclusion, and have the conviction, that oleomargarine is a wholesome food and contains nothing deleterious to health. That being true, my position is as it has always been in previous discussions on the question. If oleomargarine is wholesome and if it is sold for what it is, then I say this parliament has no moral right to declare that another person may not purchase, as he or she pleases, an article of commerce according to the price which they care to pay. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the issue here is a matter of personal liberty. I do not think that it should be possible for parliament to dictate to anyone as to what he or she may purchase provided the commodity to be purchased is a sound article of commerce. Here is a palatable, wholesome food, a substitute for a more costly article. When butter is selling at 70 or 80 cents a pound in the winter, who dares say that the mother, we will say, of some eight or ten little children—

An hon. MEMBER: Make it twenty children.

Mr. EULER: I will make it twenty if you like; in the province of Quebec it may be twenty-five or more—who shall say that the mother of these children, with a small income, shall be prohibited from buying the only substitute for butter which she can afford? I think the suggestion is entirely indefensible from every point of view. It is an outrage in principle, and it is unworthy of a people that calls itself advanced and progressive, and having respect for ordinary human rights and freedom.

It should not be necessary at all to make an extended argument in regard to the matter. One would almost judge from some of the statements that have been made by opponents of oleomargarine and the indignation with which it is regarded, that those of us who favour oleomargarine are trying to force people to eat it. That is not the case at all. Those who do not like oleomargarine can buy butter. All we are contending for is freedom of choice and liberty in the matter.

[Mr. Euler.]

The point has also been raised by some friends outside of the House in conversation, that because butter is more nourishing, therefore oleomargarine ought to be prohibited. If that principle is to govern, we might as well say that a good porterhouse beef steak is more nourishing than a bit of veal or a piece of the shank of the animal. That argument could be carried to absurd lengths. Cream is better than milk; milk is better than skimmed milk, I suppose. Are we, therefore, to say that the inferior article cannot be used at all? Will an interfering parliament say that one must buy steak instead of sausage or the cheaper meat which is, perhaps, the only thing a family can afford? Some people like to wear real silk, not the artificial silk that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is trying to promote. Some people cannot buy real silk for their dresses or hosiery. they are forced to buy cotton. Are we justified, for the sake of the manufacturer of silk goods, in prohibiting people from buying cotton or any other class of goods which they may choose to buy?

We have talked almost with horror of substitutes for butter. It seems to me that the fact that the people of this country or any other country have been able to devise substitutes that serve their purpose at lower cost, is simply an indication of their ingenuity in adapting themselves to the needs of the moment or general conditions. So long as there is no deception, there should be no objection to substitutes. Cotton is a substitute for wool. Would you, therefore, abolish cotton, especially because it is imported? There seems to be antagonism to some of the ingredients of oleomargarine because they are imported from other countries. Concrete building blocks are a substitute for cut stone and are made to look like it as much as possible, and why should they not? I am even told that carrots and other vegetables sometimes appear, after they have gone through certain processes of manufacture, as the finest of strawberry jam or something of that kind. In my town they used to make, and I think they still make leatherette, a very good substitute for leather, and they make it to look as much like leather as they possibly can. Why should they not as long as this leatherette is not sold as something it is not? In my town they make a great deal of furniture, and sometimes possibly a member of this House will purchase what appears like a very fine article of mahogany furniture, when after all he has purchased only birch which is finished like mahogany and it is perfectly good furniture. Let me take even such a matter as linen collars. Possibly members of the House think they are to-day wearing linen collars. As a matter of fact, I think they are all wearing cotton collars, and these wear longer than linen collars anyway. Therefore, the argument of substitution, in my opinion, constitutes no argument at all. If there is butter in oleomargarine and that improves oleomargarine, why should the butter not be used? It is said that oleomargarine is made to look like butter and that is objectionable. One might almost as well say that butter looks like oleomargarine. Butter is made for man and not man for butter, and I cannot quite understand the veneration with which some of our hon. friends speak of butter and the sacred cow from time to time.

It surely must be significant that every other civilized country in the world permits the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr Tolmie) has already made reference to the butter industry in the country of Denmark. To-day at luncheon I had the honour of sitting at the same table with a gentleman who came originally from Denmark and who has been living in this country for some time. He told us there, when the conversation turned to the matter of oleomargarine, that he could not understand for one moment, why anybody could possibly object to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. He said: "Denmark is the greatest butter country in the world"—and perhaps he is right—and he added: "No one there thinks of objecting to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine." I think he even said that they make more oleomargarine than butter, and I believe he said further that many of those who make butter eat the oleomargarine and sell the butter.

We talk of protection, and there has been a good deal of criticism in this House with regard to the matter of high tariffs, or, as it is often called, "high protection." Sometimes I have been a recipient of some of those criticisms although I am entirely guiltless. Those who would prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine go far beyond the limits of high protection. They apparently believe in monopolies. Tariffs are usually directed against the outsider, the foreigner, the foreign product; but this is actually an attempt to put out of business a legitimate industry within our own country in order that another industry may benefit.

When one examines the arguments of opponents of oleomargarine—and I say this with all goodwill—there is really only one motive in the movement, and it is this: That all competition in connection with the commodity of butter may be removed by act of parliament, so that certain producers may make more money at the expense of the consumers. Broadly stated, I believe that and nothing else to be the fact. All this solicitude for the poor children who will not be allowed to eat butter and who will be forced to eat oleomargarine is, as one gentleman said to me to-day, just so much eye-wash. This is a purely commercial proposition. I do not blame those who are makers of butter throughout Canada for desiring to make as much money out of butter as they can. That is business; but I do not think it is right for the members of this House who are representing all the consumers of Canada, to take an attitude of that kind, advancing the interests of one class at the expense of another.

Mr. McMASTER: Sound free trade argument.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid the hon. member for Brome is putting on my remarks an interpretation that was not intended. Therefore I say that the sole purpose of the prohibitory law as regards oleomargarine is to destroy by law competition in connection with butter and nothing else. Can this parliament afford to recognize a principle of that kind? I say that it cannot. If it can, if we can do that for butter, we can do it properly for any other commodity that is manufactured in Canada. I would even go so far as to say that the man who raises cattle ought to object to anybody breeding hogs for fear that pork might come into competition with beef. And one could suggest numerous comparisons of the same kind.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Dundas): The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) stated in his speech that the price of butter was fixed in the markets of the world. How will the hon. member (Mr. Euler) make that statement conform to what he has just said, that we are looking for protection for the dairy industry in this matter?

Mr. EULER: For the simple reason that if people buy oleomargarine they will not buy so much butter.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Dundas): But the hon. member for Victoria City stated that the price of our butter was fixed in the markets of the world. What has that to do with oleomargarine?

Mr. EULER: I will leave the hon. member for Victoria City to stand behind his own statement; I did not make it. Another argument has been advanced and it is the only one which to my mind carries any weight; and, at that, I do not think it goes very far.

It is that the prohibitory law was suspended on the strength of a pledge given by a former government that it was only for the duration of the war, and that the old conditions should be restored at the conclusion of hostilities. A pledge is a pledge, and I do not think that it should be violated or viewed in any light that would be regarded as a reflection on national honour, on parliamentary honour, or on the honour of any government. But surely a former government cannot perpetually bind succeeding administrations. This is a parliament elected by the people of Canada since the war, and it undoubtedly has a perfect right to legislate as it sees fit in the interests of the whole people. If that principle were not admitted, then any law that we now have on the statute books, enacted by the last government or any other before that, would necessarily have to be maintained by this parliament. That is absolutely unthinkable. This House has a right, moral, legal and in every other way, to legislate with regard to oleomargarine precisely as it deems fit in the interests of the people of all Canada.

Finally, I do not think that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine is going to injure the dairy industry. The hon. member for Victoria City dealt with that aspect of the subject better than I possibly could because he is much more familiar with it. When butter is low in price or comparatively low—because it is never very low now to those who live in the towns—I do not believe that people will buy anything else to any great extent. When, however, it is extremely high, going up to 75 and 80 cents, as it does in the winter time, and is readily and profitably sold, there should be no objection on the part of those who sell it to the use of oleomargarine by people who cannot afford butter. Surely when butter is selling at these high prices, the men who are out of employment or who have scant employment, with a small income, should be allowed to purchase this substitute. I do not think that any hon. member of this House would say to any man or woman with a large family who cannot afford butter that the purchase of this wholesome substitute for butter shall be prohibited, so that their children may be deprived of something to eat with their bread.

I would add, before concluding, that no one can deny successfully that oleomargarine when properly made is thoroughly wholesome. And it is cheaper than butter. It is sold as oleomargarine and nothing else; and I would say that if the government or the Minister of Agriculture feels that oleomargarine is still being sold as butter, or feels that it should be surrounded by further restrictions, provided it is not actually prohibited, I am ready to support any measure that will ensure fair protection for the dairy industry. Let the manufacture of oleomargarine be surrounded with all sorts of safeguards in the public interest. But if oleomargarine is wholesome—as undoubtedly it is—and if it is properly safeguarded, then we have no right to forbid its manufacture and the use of it by the people. Such prohibition is an interference with the right of citizens and cannot be justified on any grounds. In my opinion the government should bring in a bill to repeal the old prohibitory act and then if necessary, introduce another providing for the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine under proper conditions and with adequate safeguards.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I had not intended making any speech on the motion and the amendment thereto, but after listening to the remarks of the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Euler) I feel that I should offer some explanation of the way in which I propose to vote. The closing sentences of his speech practically state all that I intend to say at the present time. The amendment declares that at the time the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine was suspended by order in council in 1917, under the War Measures Act of 1914, the assurance was given that as such suspension was but temporary and a war measure only——it should now be removed and the question left, without prejudice as to its merits, in the same position as before the enactment of the said temporary suspension.

An order in council is not merely a scrap of paper that carries no consequences whatever, and it seems to me that the proper step to take now is to remove that order in council, "without prejudice," so that the matter might stand where it stood before. Then, if the government will bring down a bill dealing with the subject of oleomargarine I shall be prepared to discuss it. In the meantime I shall vote for the amendment, because I believe it proposes the proper step.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to associate myself with my hon. friend (Mr. Forke) in what he has said and in the attitude he is taking. I should not like at this time to go into the respective merits of the prohibition or the importation of oleomargarine, but I do think that an undertaking was given a large interest in this country, under circumstances to which this House and parliament should pay attention. As has been mentioned by the hon. member who introduced the amendment (Mr. Kay), during the period of the war, there appeared before the Milk Committee of the Food Board members of the dairy industry, to whom it was represented that the interests of the country rendered it advisable on patriotic grounds that the government should be given a free hand in the matter of permitting temporarily the importation of oleomargarine. The dairy interests acquiesced at the time, freely and willingly, in the belief and on the understanding, backed up by the government of the day, that when the circumstances had passed which had given rise to the necessity for this temporary arrangement, the measure permitting the importation of oleomargarine would be repealed. I think it would be a great misfortune if any large interest in this country, any large body of our citizens, had reason to feel that the government had not to the fullest measure lived up to any obligation assumed under circumstances such as then existed. Reading the order in council which was passed at the time, I think there is no room for any difference of view whatever as to the exact ground on which the importation of oleomargarine was then permitted. It has been read by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) but I may requote the first few paragraphs. It is dated October 23, 1917:

> Whereas attention is drawn to the abnormal demand for butter due to war conditions and to the very great probability that such abnormal demand and consequent high prices will prevail for this product for some time to come:
> And whereas it is in the public interest, under the special conditions above named, that other fats should be available in Canada under strict and reasonble conditions as a substitute for butter.—
> Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council under and in virtue of the provisions of the War Measures Act 1914 is pleased to make and enact, and doth, hereby make and enact the following regulations providing for the importation into Canada and the permitting of the manufacture, sale and possession within Canada of oleomargarine and establishing the conditions of such importation, manufacture, sale and possession, such regulations to be in force and to have effect for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue, the conclusion of such period to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council as provided in the said regulations and as a war measure only.

Now, there is further evidence it seems to me which is conclusive in large part, and that is the legislation which extended the period of permission for importation. The act assented to on 10th November, 1919, 10 George V, Chapter 24, is entitled, "An Act to permit the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada." Why was that word "temporary" inserted in the title unless it was to emphasize the fact that the conditions which were set forth in the order in council had not, in the view of the ministry of the day, yet fully ceased to exist, and that this period of extension was to go on for another year.

All subsequent legislation on this subject has been in the nature of an extension year by year. I agree with what the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) says about a government not necessarily being bound by all the acts of preceding administrations. I think every case has to be considered in the light of all the circumstances surrounding it, and I confess that had I seen or known of the existence of this pledge last year, I should have been inclined to attach very great importance to and place strong emphasis upon it, and to have seen that it was referred to in the course of the debate. As nearly as I can gather, no reference whatever was made to this particular pledge in the debate last session. When a deputation representative of the dairy interests waited upon members of the government some little time ago, they stressed very strongly what they had conceived to be the representations of the government of the day and what they had represented to other members of the dairy industry as a consequence, and I felt at that time doubly convinced—I had previously learned of this pledge, and having learned of it decided to see that some recognition was taken of it—I felt strongly convinced at that time that the dairymen would not in all probability have acquiesced as they did in the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine during the period of the war if the pledge had not been given; and inasmuch as their action was taken for patriotic reasons, I feel it is the duty of this parliament to see that that pledge is carried out. Once it is carried out, I think parliament should be perfectly free to take whatever subsequent action it may deem fit with respect to the continued importation and manufacture of oleomargarine.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that I am surprised at the stand taken by the Prime Minister in this matter. If I describe it as a stand I do it compliment overmuch. It really is not a stand at all. It is merely an evasion recommended to this House, and a very clumsy evasion, of a direct and definite question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask my right hon. friend where he stands in the matter of the pledge given by his government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will stand by any pledge given by the late government. But I must say that I find the Prime Minister a lot more anxious and solicitous about a pledge given, as he says, by the late government, than he is about any pledge given by his own. Pledge! Really this talk about a pledge appeals to my mind as so insufferable that I can hardly command patience or find language to address myself to it. We are told by the Prime Minister that the late government gave a pledge that oleomargarine would be swept away when the war was over, and that we would return to a policy of no oleomargarine as we had before. He reads that pledge into an order in council, which was passed in the year 1918 and by which he states this parliament is bound. Well, I will have to try to address myself to that question before coming to a discussion of the merits of what really is before this House. What is before this House is whether we are going to have oleomargarine or whether we are not. Does any hon. member think that if we accept this amendment in that way and slip the question outside the door this government is going to come forward with a bill to restore oleomargarine or indeed with any bill on the subject at all? Let us all remember that oleomargarine dies if this parliament does nothing this session. The legislation passes out of existence. Now let us be assured first of all, that once we vote for this amendment and thus get rid of this resolution we are in effect shoving the subject out of doors because, take my word for it, this government is not going to come in with any bill once they have the excuse of the passing of the amendment.

But I said I would address myself to the question as to whether or not there was a pledge that binds us to support this amendment. In 1918 the government of the day, having behind it a War Measures Act passed in 1914, which virtually gave them power to legislate instead of parliament in respect of all matters that concerned the war, even indirectly, passed an order in council under the authority of that act whereby oleomargarine was admitted whereby the statute was suspended which had forbidden the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. Naturally the government did this as a temporary measure, and plainly stated in the legislation that it was a temporary measure. As a matter of fact the government had no power to enact other than a temporary measure under the War Measures Act. We had no power in the world permanently to alter an act of parliament; we only had power to do so temporarily in so far as we felt it justified and called for by the emergencies of the war by which we were then surrounded. Consequently, we made it plain in the order that this was to be considered by the people of Canada as no permanent commitment on the subject but merely as a temporary measure resorted to by the government under the authority of a temporary act. We made this clear in our order in council. Not satisfied with that, next session we advised parliament what was done and recommended that the temporary measure which we had put into effect by order in council be made a temporary measure by legislation. Thereupon, by an act of the parliament of this country, the order in council was merged in a statute, and we no longer rested on the order in council. We rested from 1919 onwards on the statute of this House. Consequently—although I do not impugn for a moment the sincerity of the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke)—there is now no order in council to wipe away. Does anybody honestly imagine that there is to-day an order in council in effect? It has no more existence or effect than a piece of blotting paper?

Mr. FORKE: The question was voted upon last year and the decision was in favour of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. That was a decision of the House last year. Will the passing of this resolution have any more effect than that resolution had?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I doubt it very much. I doubt, even if we pass this resolution, whether the government can then make up its mind. It could not last year, and I have not seen any evidence of additional virility this year. I doubt if it would; but we must do our duty when a resolution is before us—whether the government is able to do its duty or not.

Mr. FORKE: We want to clear the way, anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no order in council to get out of the way, nor is there anything else to get out of the way. The order is as dead as Julius Caesar; it was dead a year afterwards. It was merged in a statute which provided that oleomargarine should not be forbidden to enter, nor forbidden to be manufactured for a period of time thereafter, parliament thereby taking the ground that under the conditions then prevailing, which were undoubtedly abnormal, we should not legislate in a permanent way; we should legislate in a temporary way only and leave parliament absolutely free when the temporary period was over to legislate just as it desired. What I am seeking to impress on the House is that at the expiration of the period fixed by parliament in the legislation of 1919, parliament was left free to act either one way or the other, as it might see fit. Parliament was free from all pledges of any kind. There had been indeed no pledge of any kind, affecting anyone, the moment the legislation expired.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my right hon. friend tell me when that period was?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it was last year. No; the first period expired in 1921.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Was it a fixed period?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it was a period fixed; it expired in 1921. The government of the day came in with a bill to extend it permanently and recommended that bill to parliament. There was a very great difference of opinion in the House—a difference of opinion as to its merits, confined not at all to the opposition alone but manifested by some on the government side. We finally, in view of the opinion of parliament, modified the bill to have it last only for a year and recommended to parliament that a measure to this end be adopted. The operation of the act was to expire one year from then, leaving parliament at the expiration of that period quite free to act as parliament might in its wisdom see fit. That law expired last session and this government being without any policy of its own at all placed the subject in the hands of parliament to be decided on a motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). Parliament on that motion declared emphatically against a policy of forbidding the admission to and manufacture in Canada of oleomargarine. One would have thought that the government then would have introduced a bill pursuant to such vote of parliament, but it did not; it introduced a bill providing for prohibition for one year and one only.

I have recited these events in order that parliament may understand its position now, in order that no hon. member of this House may feel that his vote or his decision is in any way restrained or his rights as a member of parliament abbreviated by any action of any previous government or by any action of any previous parliament. There is no excuse for any hon. member shelving this question to-day because of anything that has heretofore taken place. No hon. member I know is bound to vote for the admission of oleomargarine because of anything that was done before; every hon. member is just as free to vote against the admission of oleomargarine as if nothing at all had been done by the late government or by the late parliament. Surely it is not necessary to emphasize again that an order in council which is dead and which made no pledge at all save that its own life would be temporary, as necessarily it was, forms no hindrance to the free action of this House. Surely it is equally unnecessary to say that a statute which was declared to be temporary, to exist for a limited period only, forms, when that period is over, no obstacle to the free exercise of the rights of hon. members of this House. As I said at the beginning, the whole thing is so absurd, it is so beyond the pale of reason, that one can scarcely have the patience to hover round such a subject now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask another question? I think when I asked my right hon. friend before about the period expiring he had in mind the expiration of the particular act. He has just said the order in council contained no pledge. I would like to read these particular lines:

> Such regulations to be in force and to have effect for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue,—

That was a pledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (reading):

> —the conclusion of such period to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

That was another pledge. I will ask my right hon. friend if that period was ever determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. undoubtedly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where is the record?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will have to go over a little of the ground again, I see. Undoubtedly a pledge was given that the order in council would be temporary. Well, was the order in council not temporary? Is not the order in council dead long ago?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was the prohibition that was temporary, not the order in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly the prohibition was temporary and the order in council too. There were hundreds of prohibitions passed under the War Measures Act that were just as temporary. Was parliament by those acts tieing anybody's hands after the temporary period was over? Were its hands tied, can anyone seriously argue, against freedom of legislation at the expiration of that period? Why, the Prime Minister can go through the records of the orders in council and I will guarantee that he can find two thousand of a like temporary character. Parliament was just as free at the expiration of these orders to legislate in regard to the subjects covered by them as in regard to any subjects within the purview of this House. The only pledge if you call it a "pledge" was that it would be temporary; that does not mean that parliament is not free later to make it permanent. The Governor in Council determined the period of the existence of the order in council the moment the subject was brought before parliament and a statute passed. We brought it before parliament and parliament passed a statute for a temporary exclusion, and at the end of the expiration of that period parliament is free either to make it permanent or to do away with it for good. I do not doubt that every hon. member of this House, as an intelligent man, knows that parliament is to-day as free as if there had never been previous legislation, either orders in council or a statute of any kind. So I banish from my mind the suggestion that in any way we are tied by a pledge; we are not. We have to act; we are wholly free; what should we do as free men and a free parliament?

I have no hesitation in saying what I think should be done. I do not find, however, that any member of the government, upon whom now is the responsibility and who ought to take the initiative in this House on public questions, seems equal to the task of declaring what he thinks should be done. I think oleomargarine should be admitted. I do not for the life of me see any argument why an article which is a food and which unquestionably—at least it is unquestioned—if properly made is a wholesome food, should be forbidden entrance to or manufacture within this country. The only argument attempted against it is that it so resembles another article of production—butter—that there is danger of its being mistaken for that article, confused therewith, to the damage of and injustice to the producers of that article. I am ready to agree that it is no more than right and justice that the producers of butter should have ample protection against such confusion and against substitution. If I were convinced that it was impossible to give ample protection, to provide those safeguards that would make the conditions of production fair for dairy butter, then I think the lesser evil would be to vote against the admission of oleomargarine. But I have never heard anything so to convince me. I am not convinced that even under present conditions, the regulations are such as do not sufficiently protect dairy butter. I am not convinced, on the contrary, that they are sufficient—I do not know enough about it—but I am thoroughly convinced they can be made sufficient. And if it were necessary to go to the extent of providing a colour standard up to which the producers of oleomargarine might go and beyond which they might not go, I would support the establishment of such a colour standard and I guarantee this, that if you compel the oleomargarine maker to keep the colour of his article below a certain standard, you will never have it mistaken for butter and never do any injustice to the dairy industry. I am not saying it is essential to have that done. I do say it is practical to have it done, and I do say, if the Minister of Agriculture or the government feel that it is essential in order that the distinction may be defined and clear and unmistakable, then they ought to go ahead and do it. It can be done; it has been done.

Consequently with the burden on the administration to so frame and enforce regulations as will prevent confusion, as will prevent unfair substitution, I say there should be no objection to its admittance. Now I am going further.

Mr. VIEN: Was the right hon. gentleman of the same opinion in 1917?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was of the same opinion.

Mr. VIEN: Then might I ask further, instead of passing a temporary measure under the War Measures Act why did he not pass a law to admit oleomargarine permanently?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought I had told the hon. gentleman. I had told the House. Under the conditions of those times, which were abnormal, we did not feel that in matters of general policy affected by those passing forces we should legislate permanently. We came to parliament and committed ourselves to permanent legislation in 1921. We were quite prepared as a government, indeed we actually did recommend to this House the permanent admission of oleomargarine under proper regulations. That is where I stand to-day.

Now I would go further. I believe as regards oleomargarine the same as regards other articles produced in this country or substitutes for which are produced in this country, that we ought to have a fair protective tariff against importation, and I say so more with regard to the needs of the dairy industry of this country, because it is not asked for so far as I know by the makers of oleomargarine—I say so more in justice to the dairy industry of this country than I do with regard to any producers of oleomargarine. We ought to have a duty against the admission of oleomargarine. I want to know why the farmer of this country should in this market which he helps to build up, to which he contributes every time he pays a dollar of taxes or buys a dollar of goods, be subjected without any restraint to competition of others from other countries who do not do anything to build up the market of Canada. We ought to provide a duty against the admission of oleomargarine and against the admission of the ingredients that go to make up the element of oleomargarine. If anyone can provide me with a reason why there should be a preference given in the tariff of Canada to the admission of oleomargarine I should like to hear it; it should be treated the same as other products against which duties are placed on their admission into this country—

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member place a duty against the ingredients of oleomargarine?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I do not see how we could be fair to the butter makers if we did not.

Mr. EULER: On cottonseed oil, for instance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be some ingredients you should not tax, but there are others you should. You cannot be fair unless you impose a duty against some of the ingredients anyway.

Mr. GOULD: Would not that duty take away the cheapness of the argument that has been presented in favour of oleomargarine?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You mean the cheapness of the article. It would not affect the cheapness of the argument. I do not think it would affect the cheapness of the article, or I should say, would not substantially or permanently affect it. It would in some measure for a time, but permanently I doubt very much if it would. But why should we in this country subject the farmer who produces his butter to the free admission of a competitor when the man who produces butter across the line has an eight-cent-a-pound duty against butter and an eight-cent-a-pound duty against oleomargarine? That is the condition to-day? The United States farmer has his market. He has a preference there because he helped to build it. He has his own country as a basis to rely on, on which to build his industry. He has a duty of eight cents a pound against butter and a duty of eight cents a pound against oleomargarine. We here have a four-cent duty against butter, and nothing against oleomargarine. That is an unfair position for the producer of butter in Canada. That is a position that should last no longer, and I venture to say that if you place the Canadian butter producer in a position comparable with his American competitor, you are not going to find him unreasonable on the question of oleomargarine. Do those two things—provide by more stringent regulations, because certainly more stringent regulations can be provided, against the possibility of substitution, that is to say, of the palming off of one article for the other; provide against that, put oleomargarine in the same position as other importations into this country that compete with productions in our own country and in our own market, do those two things, and, of course, make sure that only wholesome food ingredients enter into its production, which I understand is provided for already—and then if these three conditions prevail I know of no argument against the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine.

Mr. ROBB. How long has oleomargarine been allowed to enter Canada free under the Customs Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oleomargarine was entirely forbidden up to 1918, and since 1918 the ingredients have been free.

Mr. ROBB: And oleomargarine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And oleomargarine too, as I understand its history. We should have placed a duty on oleomargarine before. We should place a duty on it now and place a duty on such ingredients as compete with Canadian products. We should place these articles in the same category as other products of our country. Then see that the oleomargarine is manufactured only from wholesome substances, see that the restrictions are such that it cannot be unfairly substituted for butter, and these things done I do not know how we can argue against the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. There may be difference of opinion on this subject; there is room for difference of opinion. But that is my view and I deem it my duty to state it to the House and state it clearly.

On the other question as to our being under some compulsion to vote for this amendment because of the 1918 order in council, there is no room for any difference of opinion at all. There is no room for sensible argument. It is a mere sham or screen erected in order to enable those who desire to do so to evade a fair and square issue that is before parliament.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: (Minister of Finance): I did not desire to speak at this moment but if no other member wishes to address the House—

An hon. MEMBER: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. FIELDING: —I would like to be permitted to finish, if I may, before six o'clock. May I first direct myself briefly to the constant complaint of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that the government as a government does not deal with this question. He has repeatedly emphasized that, indicating that he attaches great importance to it. Let us have a little common sense on this question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a difference of opinion among members of the government on this question. My hon friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has one view, I have another view. Does my hon. friend contend that on a matter of this kind one or the other of us should resign? Is it a matter of such vital importance as to justify a member in leaving the cabinet because he differs from some of the others? Surely he would not take such an absurd position. We take the position that inasmuch as there is a difference of opinion in the cabinet, the commonsense view is to ascertain the opinion of the House of Commons and be content to accept its judgment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You got that last session.

Mr. FIELDING: But only for a short time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You got the view of the House of Commons last session. I would take it that it would be for all time.

Mr. FIELDING: We are taking the position to-day that inasmuch as there is a difference of opinion among ourselves, the commonsense view is not to make it a matter of vital importance and break up the cabinet, but simply to invite the judgment of the House of Commons and accept it whatever it may be. What has my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition done about it? In 1921 he took the noble stand that we were going to make this permanent, no longer any question about it, and he introduced a bill. Noble soul! But immediately he abandoned the bill. He made a change. He agreed to a bill that was not permanent. He agreed to temporize. He agreed to play safe for another year. If that be the case, if my right hon. friend felt perfectly free to do that at that time, cannot he give us the gracious privilege now of having a difference of opinion in the government and being content to accept the judgment of the House of Commons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The difference is this: The former government, as a government, took a stand without any previous direction from parliament. This government had before them a previous direction from parliament last session, but they refused to take a stand, and they still refuse to take a stand.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend says his government took a stand. They did not do so very strongly and they did not stick to it very long. My right hon. friend practically abandoned one bill and took another bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. FIELDING: That is practically what my right hon. friend did. A good many years ago when oleomargarine was an unsought product, it was prohibited in Canada. For many years I had the pleasure and duty of introducing the budgets of the country, and I want to say this: To the best of my knowledge and belief the question never arose as to what was to be done with oleomargarine. So long as butter could be got at a reasonable price nobody wanted oleomargarine, and nobody cared about it. And to-day if you can get butter at a reasonable price nobody wants oleomargarine. With the progress of time oleomargarine seems to have improved in character. It seems to be a product now which eminent physicians and health authorities certify is all right; there is no objection to it, it is a wholesome and useful product. I believe that if anybody had drawn attention to it in earlier years the prohibition would have been removed. I state again that oleomargarine remained on the prohibited list, not because anybody agitated for prohibition, not because anybody demanded it, but because the subject was not at all considered. Nobody wanted oleomargarine so long as he could get good butter.

I think I am correct in saying that Canada is the only civilized country in the world which refuses to allow the use of oleomargarine. I know of no civilized government in the world which prohibits oleomargarine except Canada. Hon. members know the old story as to the man who differed with his brethren on the jury and who said "that he never met such stupid men in all his life as those eleven fellows." Are we the only intelligent people in the world? Is the whole world, outside of Canada, wrong in its policy on this question? I think myself that the real question before parliament to-day is simply this: Are the Canadian people as intelligent as other people? If we admit that the Canadian people are as intelligent as others. why cannot you give to these intelligent people the right to buy an article which is wholesome when they want it? It is not a question between butter and oleomargarine. Nobody wants oleomargraine to-day if he can buy butter at a moderate and reasonable price. I submit, as the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) put it, that the issue upon this question is: Are we an intelligent people? Are we to be trusted with the duty of looking after ourselves? Is there a doubt lest we shall not always take care of ourselves wisely in a matter of this kind? Now, there are some things as to which we have prohibition—I will not say prohibition but restriction. To-day, for example, there are explosives which are dangerous. We do not prohibit them, we put restrictions upon them; we say they shall only be sold in a certain way. Then there are narcotics and drugs. We do not prohibit them but we say they shall be sold subject to restriction and to restraint. Oleomargarine is the only thing in the commercial world which the people of Canada cannot be trusted to buy if they want it. It is an awful accusation to make against the people of Canada that they cannot be trusted to buy oleomargarine.

To-day nobody condemns oleomargarine on its merits. We have this extraordinary position—I say that with great deference to my respected leader—that it is claimed we are under an obligation. I cannot admit that for a single moment. If that is so when is this pledge to end which was given in 1917? We have had a new election, a new parliament. What a preposterous thing it is to claim that the members of this new parliament are bound by something that was done by a previous government and a previous parliament. We are free to vote as we like, and let us vote as we like on the merits of this question. We are bound by nothing that happened in a previous parliament. "Ah!" it is said "in the cattle embargo a pledge was given; a change of government took place but nevertheless the pledge was carried out." Yes, the Right Hon. Bonar Law was a member of the government that gave the pledge, and he was called upon to fulfil the pledge given by the government of which he was a member. I have never joined in the argument that because of that pledge Canada's case was very strong. When you want to make a case before a rival or competitor you bring every argument you can. I think that in England there were some excellent men who did not want to admit Canadian cattle who used that pledge as a convenient excuse. I do not quarrel with them for doing so, but I decline to admit that the members of one House of Commons are bound by the act of any previous House, and I am bound to say that I see no foundation whatever for the statement that in this matter there exists a pledge that binds us. If there is a binding pledge I have a right to ask when does it end? If it binds us now it binds our successors, we are no longer a free parliament. No, the real question is not as between oleomargarine and butter. The people who want oleomargarine only want it when they cannot get butter at a reasonable price. If they cannot afford to use butter they will use oleomargarine; they want a substitute which is wholesome. Do not let anybody be deluded by the cry that oleomargarine is not wholesome. The highest medical authorities tell us that it is wholesome. I cannot for the life of me see why the intelligent Canadian people cannot be trusted to decide for themselves what they want. If we are as intelligent as any other people in the world give us the right to exercise our intelligence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA (Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of detaining the House with any lengthy discussion of the proposition before us. There are, however, some features that I think have not been touched on and that we might well consider. We are asked to allow the permanent manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada. What is oleomargarine? Nobody knows. You may search the statute books of Canada from end to end, and you will find no definition, no formula, no restriction, no anything that indicates what oleomargarine is. The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) gave us a formula, but does anybody follow his formula? We have no evidence that people do. There are a dozen or twenty different kinds of grease that they say may go into oleomargarine, but in what proportion and with what other constituents we have no means of knowing.

My objection to oleomargarine is that it is not presented upon its merits; that it does not stand on its own legs. We are told that men should have a right to buy as they see fit, and it is quite possible that most of us who buy oleomargarine know what we are buying. That is not the point. The question is: Does the fellow who eats it know what he is eating? That is the thing we want to be instructed on. Your Chinaman may go to the wholesale establishment to buy oleomargarine, and it has a government wrapper on it, with a label with oleomargarine in large letters printed on the side. He slips it in through the back door of the kitchen; the wrapper goes into the stove; the case knife wipes off the big letters; he mixes up about five pounds of it with one pound of butter; then he sells that to you and to me and to his other patrons as butter, and we pay for it as butter. I venture to say that 90 per cent or more of the oleomargarine that is consumed in Canada today is consumed as butter. The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) was asked: Did he ever see a sign up in a restaurant or a hotel that they sold oleomargarine? He said that he did not eat in such places. How does he know? Do any of us eat there? We do not know. I would not be surprised if he had eaten a ton of oleomargarine.

Mr. TOLMIE: I do not think I look like that.

Mr. McCONICA: It may have that effect on some people; I do not know. I have an idea that if he knew how much of that stuff he had eaten when he went home after prorogation, he would be ashamed to look his own cows in the face. When he eats oleomargarine, what is he eating? He does not know. He knows he is not eating butter. He knows that oleomargarine, in its natural state, does not look like butter; that it does not taste like butter; that is does not smell like butter. He knows that certain greases, what kind he does not know, are taken and treated chemically, then deodorized, decolourized, and mixed up into some sort of a conglomeration which is called oleomargarine. We have had a statement from scientists that they have analyzed it. Does any man state what the food value is? Does any man put down a table stating that butter is so-and-so and so-and-so and so-and-so, and that oleomargarine is exactly or very nearly the same? Certainly not. When a man eats that stuff, thinking it is butter, he is taking into his system something that is entirely foreign, something that his system does not require. Experience shows that milk is the natural food of the human being; that milk products are naturally adapted to building up the human system. What about this oleomargarine? We do not know. For that reason I do not think this is a question whether a man shall have the right to sell it or not. The question is: Shall a man have the right to feed it to some other man under false pretences? That is the point, and that is the one thing that, I imagine, is the vital point in this discussion.

An hon. member suggested that to prohibit oleomargarine from coming into or being sold in Canada is protection, similar to tariff protection, and he argued that we on this side should never support the prohibition of oleomargarine for that reason. I am not a protectionist, and I hope the time may soon come when nations will conclude that protection is a mistake. I very much doubt the right of a nation to tax one private individual for the benefit of another, and that is what protection is, in essence. When one man is protected someone else protects him, because there is no magic by which the passing of a protective law will create wealth for the fellow who is protected without imposing a burden on some other person. I repeat, if one man is protected some other man has to protect him. For fifteen years I have been selling my farm products in western Canada, and I do not think I ever sold a dollar's worth that brought me one single cent more because of a protective tariff; while I have not bought anything for which I did not pay more by reason of such a tariff. That is something I do not believe in. But if protection means to protect the people of Canada against fraud, against paying for something they do not get, against buying one thing and having to accept in lieu of it a rank imitation and counterfeit, then I am a protectionist.

I am not here urging this as a matter of protection to the dairy industry or to the farming industry generally. I urge that we prohibit the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine from the standpoint of the people of Canada, who are the consumers. We have the statement of the lumber boss that he is in favour of it; have we anything from the lumber jack? That is the point. Where is the man who eats it that is asking that this stuff be allowed to come into Canada or be manufactured and sold here? There is not one word from any such person. Did anyone ever hear of any hotel keeper who advertised: "Nothing but high grade oleomargarine used in this hotel?" Why, the effect of such a pronouncement would be to empty the dining-room in a day. No; the trouble with this thing is that it is not sold on its merits; it does not stand on its own feet. It is an imposition on the people who use it, and for that reason I shall certainly support the amendment offered to the House.

Mr. TOLMIE: Can the hon. member cite a single instance that he knows of where oleomargarine was sold as butter?

Mr. McCONICA: I do not say it is sold as butter; I say it is served as butter on the table.

Mr. TOLMIE: Can you name one single instance of that Mr. McCONICA: Yes, I can.

Mr. TOLMIE: Tell us.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): The question now before the House has occupied our attention on several previous occasions and it is to be hoped that on this occasion, after a full discussion, we may make up our minds and act accordingly. So far as I am concerned, I am not in favour of the prohibition of any wholesome article of food. I cannot take any other stand, holding the principles I hold; and therefore I am in favour, not necessarily of oleomargarine, not necessarily of butter, but of liberty and freedom of choice for the people of Canada. I do not think that anything has been proved before the House to show that oleomargarine is not a wholesome article of diet; and once the fact of its wholesomeness is established, the whole burden of proof is thrown upon the shoulders of the restrictionists and those people who believe that liberty of choice should be interfered with.

I take it for granted that there should always be a presumption in favour of liberty. What is the object of eliminating oleomargarine? The eloquent member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McConica) has placed his opposition to oleomargarine on the highest ground. Far be it from me, he says, to advocate anything for any special interest; it is the welfare of the people that I am considering; it is to protect the people against this deleterious substance that I wish to see legislation passed. May I observe that, if oleomargarine were an unwholesome article of diet, we have a distinguished doctor in charge of the Department of Health of this country who would see to it that such an article was prohibited. No, Mr. Speaker, the object of the propaganda is, as I trust I shall be able to show, the mistaken idea that by prohibiting oleomargarine you are going to enhance the price of butter, or at least to stabilize it. That is the real object lying at the basis of this propaganda against oleomargarine. But we are not here to represent merely what we may imagine are the views of our constituents. We are here to look at matters from the point of view of the national interest.

Let me just examine for a moment the real, though unavowed object of those who are in favour of the elimination of oleomargarine, that is to say, the raising of the price of butter. Will it raise the price of butter to eliminate this substitute? I do not think it will. The price of butter, of which we have a large exportable surplus, is determined not in Canada but on the markets of the world. There the butter enters into competition—if there is such competition—with oleomargarine, and the price of our butter will not be affected by oleomargarine in this country. This was most conclusively argued by the member for Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy) two years ago when the matter came before the House. I do not believe that oleomargarine is a competitor of good butter; I believe it comes into competition only with butter of an inferior grade. If that is the case, as I believe it is, what is the result of the prohibition of the manufacture in or importation into this country of oleomargarine? Well, the first result will be to give an example of class legislation which will redound very little to the credit of those who support such a move. I say class legislation; it is not even class legislation, because it cannot be imagined, for instance, that to prohibit oleomargarine will help the farmer who raises beef cattle, and for whom the market for oleomargarine helps to maintain the price of what he produces. If this prohibition is to help any one it will tend to help—I do not believe it will succeed in doing so, but that is what is aimed at—only a section of a class, that is, the dairy farmer. Nor do I believe that it could help this section.

Furthermore, it would deprive the people who cannot afford to buy good butter of a wholesome spread for their bread. Now, I know that in appealing to the members of this House I am appealing to gentlemen who are humane and reasonable. Can they place themselves in the position of an unorganized workingman in a city? Organized workingmen, through combination, are generally able to raise their wages to a reasonable height; but the vast majority of people working in cities are unorganized, they have to sell their labour for what they can get. There have been those who have justified the manufacture of oleo as a war measure. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there are those who under the present organization of our society are always at war with poverty and with debt, and they have a right to be supported and to have liberty to exchange their labour for what they want as long as they are not buying what is poisonous or positively deleterious. I ask those who support the idea of the elimination of oleo to put themselves in the place of some poor working man with a large family. He comes home at night after this legislation is passed, after oleo has been driven off the market, and not being able to afford good butter—in the winter time good butter goes beyond the price which the poor can afford to pay—he finds his children with dripping on their bread, perhaps lard, and if they say to him, "Father, why cannot we have that nice stuff that we had on our bread last year?" "Oh well," he answers, "the representatives of the dairy farmers have said you cannot have it." Is there a supporter of the prohibition of oleo who would like to overhear that conversation? I do not think so.

Now, there are others too, there are the clerical classes, there are the school teachers, there are the ministers of the Gospel who find the cost of living pressing heavily upon them. Are you to tell them that they shall not have oleo if they want it to spread upon their bread? And let me say this—and I make the plea very strongly to those who agree with me on tariff matters—if you vote to eliminate oleo you are placing in the hands of the protectionists a rod for your own backs. For if you vote for the elimination of oleo, how in the world can you expect anyone to listen to you when you protest against the imposition of duties which raise the price of what you must buy? I would implore hon. members who agree with me on tariff matters to think very deeply before they commit themselves to an attitude which will be in direct contradiction and repudiation of the principles they have advocated in this House. They will be regarded as inconsistent people—and we are told that consistency is a jewel.

And let me with all frankness and with all courtesy expose to those who think differently from me what posture they will appear in before the people of Canada, before the vast numbers who live in our towns and cities and who are not interested in having oleo eliminated. First of all, those who vote for the elimination of oleo will place themselves before the nation as the representatives of a class who are thinking of their selfish interests and not of the public weal. No one is obliged to eat oleo unless he wants to, we are not forcing oleo down anyone's throat, but we who believe in the principle of liberty do feel that there should be liberty of choice.

Then may I make this argument also? I think it is a sound one. Those who in Great Britain fought for fiscal freedom made their appeal first to the workman in the town, then to the manufacturer, subsequently to the farmer on the land, and finally to the landlord, and they got the vast majority of the British people to agree with them. They could not carry on the battle successfully themselves, they had to get the co-operation of other people. Now, in the fight which many of us wish to make for lower tariffs, for greater freedom of trade and commerce, we need the help of the consumer in the town, we need the help of the workingman in the factory, and if by our vote we restrict the liberty of those classes in the towns who wish to purchase something which they think they need, we will be in a poor position to ask for their help. The matter is not of tremendous importance in one way; it is of tremendous importance in another. People have got to be guided either by expediency or by principle, and it is hard for me to understand how anyone who desires to have his conduct guided by principle rather than by expediency can one day vote for lower tariffs, for greater freedom of exchange—because in the long run that is what it is, allowing a man to exchange the product of his own toil, his own capital, for what he lacks—and then next day say that so far as a certain exchange is concerned the possibility of making that exchange shall be cut off.

You are a student of history, Mr. Speaker, and no doubt you will be interested to note the similarity of the idea underlying this proposed legislation to eliminate oleomargarine with the ideas on trade and commerce which obtained in the time of the Stuarts. I have before me the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and I read with interest that by an act passed in the reign of Charles II it was decreed that all dead bodies should be buried in woollen shrouds. They must not be buried in linen shrouds, nor in cotton shrouds, they must be buried in woollen shrouds. Why? Because the lawmakers of those days wished to favour the interests of the woollen manufacturers. And I say with all courtesy that legislation which would prohibit the manufacture and sale of wholesome articles of food in this country is legislation on the lines of that which prevailed in the time of Charles II. I think perhaps with that historical allusion I had better leave the question to be decided, I trust, by the enlightened intelligence of the members of this House.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of an agricultural constituency I do not wish to give a silent vote on this question. Oleomargarine is unknown to the people I represent; they eat good Canadian butter. The only requests I have received from my constituency to vote for the continued manufacture, importation and sale of oleo were from a couple of lumbermen so they might be able to supply it to their shantymen in the winter time. Therefore I am free in the matter. My electors are consumers of good butter, and I hope will continue to be for a long time to come, and I should like to see the majority of Canadians following their excellent example.

We are dealing with an aftermath of the war. Nobody ever dreamt of allowing the importation, manufacture and sale of oleo in Canada previous to the war. Our parliaments before that time—and they were made up of reasonable men—never thought of allowing this product to be sold to the Canadian people. But during the war it was allowed in under the abnormal conditions which then prevailed. Those conditions are now at an end, and I think we are free to act in the matter. I am going to cast my vote to re-establish the embargo on oleomargarine, and thereby I am satisfied that I shall have done my duty towards my constituents and the people of Canada generally.

There is one great problem in Canada which must be solved and solved soon if Canada is to remain the country that it is or is to have the future that we hope for it; the people must go back to the land. That is the main salvation of Canada. In the first ten years that I had the honour of representing my constituency in this House its population increased by five thousand people; in the second ten years the increase was only five hundred people. Their explanation is that the young people are leaving the farms and going to the cities because farming no longer pays. I have heard the agricultural question discussed from the point of view of the West; the condition that exists there exists in the province of Quebec just as acutely, but little is heard here of the grievances which our farmers have. But the people of my province are a patient and long suffering people. The progenitors of some of them were there some ten generations ago, and they have passed through many of the crises experienced by Canada during that time. They have stood the burden and heat of the day and are willing to stand it yet, but I say frankly to this House that unless we do something immediately to induce the people to return to the land we are facing a great crisis in this country.

I know of no industry in the province of Quebec that is of more importance in every respect than the dairy industry. Quebec occupies an enviable position in that respect. We have a land which is eminently suited to the purpose of dairying and a climate which is exceptionally favourable to the raising of cows and the making of butter. I would therefore, dislike to see this House give a vote which would jeopardize what I consider to be the leading industry of eastern Canada—the dairy industry. I was pained and surprised to see that a large number of agricultural representatives from western Canada last year forgot the agricultural interests of eastern Canada to the extent of voting against the dairy products of eastern Canada in favour of oleomargarine. After all, oleomargarine is a mere fancy; it never existed in this country before the war. Nobody thought of it then, and it was allowed in under certain well-defined rules, with a positive engagement that as soon as the abnormal days disappeared the privilege then granted would be repealed. There were too many substitutes of various kinds during the war; it is difficult now to go into a store in any part of Canada and buy an article which is not a substitute of one kind or another. Manufacturers and others during the war lent themselves too readily to the making of substitutes of this kind or that, and I am not in favour of encouraging any more of them.

I do not see why the farmers of Canada, the dairy farmers especially, those who have the courage, and, I may say, the patriotism, to stick to the land when so many others are deserting it, should be given a slap in the face by this House of Commons in favour of an article which, after all, is consumed by very small numbers of people. We are told the consumption is only 4,000,000 pounds annually, its use being confined mostly to the cities; in the agricultural districts it does not exist. I should be surprised to see the representative of an agricultural constituency vote in favour of the main motion now before the House. I will say nothing further, Mr. Speaker, than this: I will vote for the amendment, and in casting that vote I think I am acting in the genuine interests of the farming community of Canada.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in regard to the situation by which we are confronted. I do not feel that the amendment is necessary; the defeat of the resolution offered by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) would have accomplished the same purposes that the amendment has in view. However, now that the matter is before the House I wish to make my position clear.

During the by-election in Moose Jaw—and I want to speak as kindly as I can in regard to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)—he stated that when the vote was about to be taken last year on the subject of oleomargarine I, with about five or six others in this corner of the House, immediately slipped under the barn and the only part of me that could be seen was my feet. Well, I hope the whole of me will be seen when the vote is taken on this occasion. But what the minister said was not quite correct, and as the charge was repeated in a paper in my own constituency, I wish to answer it. It is true that the Minister of Agriculture spoke to me in the afternoon—not a short time before the vote was taken, but in the afternoon —in respect to oleo, and also about the conditions in southern Saskatchewan and the need of entering largely into dairy farming. With all of that I quite agreed. But about eleven o'clock in the evening I asked the whip, when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was speaking, how many more members were going to speak, and he said, "Oh, possibly ten or eleven." I wanted to speak on the subject, but he did not think the vote would be taken that night and I left the House about eleven o'clock. I understand, however, that the vote was taken some two hours afterward. So that I did not slip under the barn just a few moments before the vote was taken. As I said, I understood that the vote was not going to be taken that night.

Now, I wish to speak only about three or four things. The second thought that came to me when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking was this: Since when did he become solicitous about the keeping of pledges? It is only a few weeks since the party of which I am a member presented an amendment because they felt, either rightly or wrongly, that the Liberal party were not implementing their pledges of 1919. It seems to me that a government should think about keeping its own pledges before concerning itself about keeping the pledges of the government that preceded it. At all events, so far as the pledge was concerned, it may have been a pledge, as the hon. member for north Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said this afternoon, to the dairy interests. So far as it was a pledge to them, it should be kept; but I think there is a greater pledge to the Canadian people, and they have spoken since that time in no uncertain voice.

The third point I wish to make in regard to the amendment is this: To me it appears to be somewhat of a camouflage. I went upstairs immediately after I had heard the amendment read and I looked over the resolution that was proposed last year by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). It did seem to me that that resolution superseded any pledge that had been given to the Canadian people in 1917 or any time afterwards, because it asserted that it was in the interests of the Canadian people that oleomargarine should not be imported into or manufactured in Canada, and the House voted against it. The majority was not large, it is true, but at the same time it was a majority, affirming the view that the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine should be permitted. So it is that we have heard the expression of the representatives of the Canadian people in this parliament; they have spoken definitely; they have expressed the opinion that the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine should be permitted.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow me a question? Am I to understand that he contends that a vote of parliament may supersede a pledge?

Mr. LEWIS: I understand that the pledge was given at that time. Well then, automatically when the vote is taken which gains a majority, showing that the Canadian people wish oleomargarine to be manufactured, imported and sold in Canada, that to me seems to be the supreme will of the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member also refers to a pledge. I do not know what he means by that. To whom was the pledge supposed to have been given?

Mr. LEWIS: I understand from what I have heard that such a pledge was given to the dairy interests, and that the measure was simply passed as a war measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the pledge given in the terms of the order in council or at some meeting?

Mr. LEWIS: In the order in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The order in council simply states that it is temporary for the war period. Does the hon. gentleman think that is a pledge to the dairy interests?

Mr. LEWIS: I am not arguing in support of this pledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that, but I do not want a misunderstanding on the part of the House that something was said to the dairy representatives. If it was, I have no recollection of it.

Mr. LEWIS: I would say in answer to the question that indirectly, whether it was meant or not, the dairy people of Canada took it as a real pledge from this parliament, but even if they did, the expression of the will of this parliament, who are really the representatives of the people, should govern, and if it is the opinion of parliament that it is for the well-being of the people that that pledge should be abrogated and another law put in its place, I do not say that we have not the right to do so.

Mr. WARNER: I would ask the hon. member if he knows how many members of parliament were not present when that vote was taken?

Mr. LEWIS: I shall answer that in a few moments, because I was charged by the Minister of Agriculture with shirking the vote. If I shirked the vote I shirked it in good company, because the right hon. the Prime Minister himself was absent and about eighty other members, probably not expecting the vote to be taken that night, and that is the reason why I feel justified myself in regard to that matter.

As far as the resolution is concerned, it does seem to me that parliament, although eighty members were absent when the vote was taken, wanted the sale of oleomargarine. But let us go one step further. The laws we pass here are not the laws of the Medes and Persians, and if this year it is necessary to change that vote, and if we think it is in the interest of the primary industries, but not in regard to a matter of principle, that that vote should be changed, I think parliament is competent to change it without being inconsistent at all. What I do feel is this: It seems to me that there is a certain lack of courage on the part of the government after the resolution passed last year by the vote it obtained, in not bringing down a measure and shouldering the responsibility. I think it was the duty of the government to have done that, to have shown that it had backbone enough to bring in a measure of that character. I hate to cast my vote in regard to a camouflaged motion, and after hearing the speech of the hon. member to my left (Mr. McMaster) it is very hard for me to reconcile any position I may take to-night, because we are not really fighting or voting on the merits of the question.

There is one thing I do want to urge upon the government earnestly, and it is this: If this amendment carries and the importation and sale of oleomargarine is defeated, I feel that the government should insert a clause whereby people in Canada can at least manufacture oleomargarine for export, and thereby use up the by-products in some of these large concerns. If it is the will of the Canadian people that we shall not eat oleomargarine, well and good; I am willing to abide by that, but it does seem to me that these manufacturers should have the privilege of competing with Belgium and other countries in the British market. That is all I have to say on this resolution, but I hope that a measure will come before this House where there will be no side-stepping at all, and where we shall be able to vote on the merits of the question.

Just before I came up to the House I spoke to a washerwoman with a large family and said, "Possibly to-night we shall vote for the elimination of oleomargarine." She said, "If you do what are we going to do in winter with butter at sixty-five cents a pound? I shall not be able to put anything on the bread for my children." That is the situation as it seems to me at the present time. We are not forced to eat oleomargarine, and as far as the West is concerned, when I was out there I went into many and many a store to find out if they ever sold oleomargarine, and I never came across one village store in my constituency that sold it, so that I cannot see that it enters into competition with butter. Furthermore, I want to say as a member of parliament with the family I have that I have bought oleomargarine as a test for my children, and as far as some of them were concerned they could hardly tell the difference between oleomargarine and butter, especially in regard to that cottage roll the minister speaks of. I am not saying it is a good thing for the children, but it does seem to me that the people of this country have a right to say what they are going to eat, and if it can be proved that this is a wholesome food I do not see why we should restrain this trade in any way. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see this question fought on its merits, and not on a camouflage or an amendment such as is before the House at the present time, on which we really cannot get a consensus of opinion in regard to oleomargarine.

Mr. DECHENE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much pleasure to the greater part of this debate on oleomargarine. I was already well acquainted with the views of most of the members and nothing new has transpired in the present discussion, unless it is the word "camouflage" which was freely made use of. The last speaker (Mr. Lewis) clearly proved to us that there existed camouflage among a great number of members sitting around him. In fact, last year, when this debate took place, the interests of the large packing houses were strongly emphasized and we were told: "These packers allow us, we from the West, a better price for our beef when the manufacture of oleomargarine is permitted, because they can make use of a large portion of the beef fat, which gives them some return." Now, we know, through the circulars of these gentlemen which have been distributed to all the members, that there is about twenty-five to thirty pounds of beef fat or such per head used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, the price of the former being four or five cents per pound, this would mean that the manufacturers would pay for beef about $1 or $1.25 more per head. This would amount to very little for the cattle-breeders of the West, and even this slight advantage would not exist in the eastern provinces. For over twenty years, the governments of the eastern provinces have exerted all their energies to promote the dairy industry. Large sums of money have been paid to agricultural and co-operative associations, and also to farmers, in a word, to all those who took an interest in the growth and improvement of the dairy industry in our provinces.

Every year, parliament is called upon to vote large sums for the improvement of the dairy stocks of the different provinces. Every year, the provincial legislative assemblies vote large amounts for the same object, always, with the idea of fostering lively competition among the farmers, and, bearing in mind the improving of the dairy herds and at the same time benefiting the farms and the commonwealth. What would be the object of having spent such enormous sums, if by a majority vote of this House, we allowed the manufacture of oleomargarine on a large scale.

[Mr. Lewis.]

We are told: There are but three or four million pounds of oleomargarine sold yearly, it is very little compared with the 270,000,000 pounds of butter produced and sold yearly, in Canada, or by Canada. This may be true to some extent, but one must not lose sight that last year parliament passed an act extending for one more year the right to manufacture, to have in one's possession and sell oleomargarine. Evidently the large manufacturers of this article did all they could to keep down this trade, so as to show how small it was and not to frighten the other industries. However, I think that the majority of members will not be deceived by this camouflage of the manufacturers who, to-morrow, should the law permit them and the markets be thrown open, would spread over the country a product of an entirely inferior quality.

The hon. member (Mr. Lewis) who has just taken his seat, told us that he made, last year, the experiment of oleomargarine on his children. I do not think that he is much to be congratulated on this matter. If he had had some experience with this product, he would not have tried it a second time and I am certain that his wife would not have wanted him to bring oleomargarine home again. Most of the experiments made consist in placing oleomargarine or butterine on bread. If these gentlemen would only go to the kitchen and place this oleomargarine on hot toasts, or else, do some frying with it, I think they would much prefer not to be the cook when this is happening; it is healthier to be in the open air or pace up and down in front of the house while the wife is leaning over the pan. I do not think that all those who have a delicate sense of smell and like to eat well, bear a love for oleomargarine to the extent of putting up with the smell of tallow on their toasts or again in cooking. There is nothing so unpleasant as the odour of suet or oleomargarine in the frying pan and I have heard this as a fact from more than one person who has given it a trial. It is a substance which disintegrates with the heat and that is why when it is used on toast or in cooking it is abominable. When you are told, Sir, let the workman give it to his children to butter their bread, I think, that is a very poor argument. Here is another weak reason given in behalf of the labourer: How do you expect the working class in winter to purchase butter at 65 cents a pound? They forget to tell us, however, when these prices prevail, oleomargarine has increased in price and is sold from fifty to fifty-five cents a pound, and even much dearer, with profits ranging from 100 per cent to 125 per cent. The price of manufacturing oleomargarine is 12 to 15 cents per pound and it is sold at 24 and 25 cents per pound; it is sold just sufficiently low enough to compete with butter, but not in keeping with the workman's purse. Very few working men, if not influenced, buy oleomargarine. It is forced upon them. It is forced upon them when the large companies feed their men with it. It is forced upon them in all restaurants of cities, where meals are served at cheap prices, without mentioning if butter or oleomargarine is supplied. This article is coloured and given the appearance of butter, it is served to those who come and eat in such places at a rate of 5, 10, 20 or 30 cents per meal, but great care is taken not to mention that as the hon. member who preceded me in this debate stated, we serve only oleomargarine of the best make. This is simply camouflage. Another reason that certain speakers invoked this evening and which I feel certain cannot but have astonished you, is the freedom of choice. Here is an article which is not worth much, everybody admits—perhaps it is worth nothing—however we are free to purchase it, we are told. Is this the only instance, in our country, where a citizen is not allowed to purchase what he finds good to his taste? Have we not in Canada a temperance act which applies to the whole country, and have we not in this province where we live, at present, a law which decrees: You shall not have the right to drink beer and you shall neither have the right to drink wine? Do we not know, Mr. Speaker, that beer plays a very important part in the English workman's diet?

There was almost a revolution in England, during the war, when they tried to stop the workman's beer. Do we not refuse in certain parts of the country, not only to our workmen but everybody the right of drinking beer, even though it may be a pleasure to them? Is beer a deleterious product? Evidently not. It is a product made from malt which is recommended by the medical profession but one must not make use of it to excess. Neither would it be wise to eat too much oleomargarine.

In France—as you are better aware than I am, Mr. Speaker, wine is part of the diet, not only for the well to do classes but also for the working classes, and cider is also part of the diet of the farming class. Even here, in certain parts of the country, is not the use of wine prohibited? In this province we are allowed to make wine, to sell it by the dozen bottles, but you are not permitted to purchase it by the bottle. What becomes of individual liberty? When it becomes of not suit the purpose, we abolish it. This is not a serious argument. I therefore state, Mr. Speaker, that we should brush aside that part of the reasoning in favour of oleomargarine and treat it laughingly.

One last word before closing my remarks. We were told a short while ago that this was part of our political platform, that we even made promises that the greater number of the members of the government would be bound by these promises of the Liberal party and should vote against oleomargarine. It is not the first time that the Liberal party places on its programme this question regarding oleomargarine. I remember—when I was still at the university or college—when the Liberal party under Sir Wilfrid Laurier prohibited the importation of oleomargarine. What was the result? Oleomargarine was prohibited shortly after 1900 and immediately the dairy industry improved and expanded, and a few years later our country had become known abroad as an exporter of butter and cheese. The prohibition which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had then imposed on this article had been favourable to the trade development of our country. We have the experience of the past, why not follow in the same footsteps? This plank in the programme of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1900, is still part of our programme; and I am, to-day, happy to adhere to it as well as to many other measures by asking that imports of oleomargarine be banned and by strongly supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay).

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, as short speeches have been the order of the day in this debate I hope I shall not speak at undue length. Although there is quite a lot I should like to say I will try and make my speech as brief as possible. I wish to say that I want to discuss this matter from, perhaps, two viewpoints. First, as to the effect of the use of oleomargarine on the young folks that we expect from this time on to grow up and become citizens of Canada; second, as to whether the government should or should not carry out their pledges; and, perhaps, I shall have something to say as to the possible financial effect on Canada, of a question of this kind if we do not act wisely.

One thing that is always present in our minds is what is best for the children of our country. The state, it will be admitted, has the right to say something with respect to the conduct of parents or people who are taking care of children. If parents, through carelessness, negligence or other cause, do not send their children to school the law steps in and declares that those children must be given a certain amount of schooling in order that they may develop into proper citizens. Some people may regard that as unfair towards the parents. Nevertheless such is the law. Is it any more unfair or unreasonable to go one step further and provide

> In addition to providing heat and energy for the body butter promotes growth and health to a remarkable degree because it is rich in that vital element called vitamines (fat soluble A) which is absolutely indispensable to health and growth and as a factor in the building of bone and teeth. There is no problem before the country of greater importance than the one of properly feeding and nourishing its people.
> Statistics in the United States show that one out of every four in that country is suffering from under nourishment, and that 350,000 of them die every year from no other cause than poor or deficient food. It is not a case of poverty, so much as a case of ignorance. The food now given those children costs even more than proper food would cost. Similar figures are not available for Canada. While the condition of our children is doubtless not as shocking as the United States because a greater proportion of our people live on the land, where the children are fed on milk and butter in greater abundance, still children suffering from mal-nutrition are far too numerous in our centres of population.
> It is the sacred right of children to be given wholesome nourishing food, that they may grow up to be strong and healthy men and women.

The next is Mr. Herbert Hoover, a member of the United States government, who won so much honour for himself and his country as United States Food Administrator during the war. He puts the case clearly when he says:

> The basis of child welfare is health and physical development, the foundation of child health lies in proper feeding. In its broad aspects the proper feeding of children revolves around a public recognition of the interdependence of humans upon dairy cattle. The white race cannot survive without dairy products.

[Mr. Warner.]

That is Herbert Hoover's idea. Professor E. V. McCollum of Johns Hopkins University, who is one of the greatest authorities on the use of foods, for the preservation of vitality and health, in his book, "The Newer Knowledge of Nutrition," at page 16, after alluding to certain experiments in diet, says:

> With this diet the interesting observation was made that growth could be secured when the fat in the food mixture was butter fat, whereas no growth could be secured when the butter fat was replaced by lard, olive oil, or other vegetable oils. Under these conditions, why should ignorant parents be permitted to give oleo instead of butter to helpless little children merely because it may be a few cents cheaper when butter is an essential to the health of the child and the welfare of the nation?

I might say that is proof—and I have more—that it has not been proven that oleomargarine is a proper food for children. It has been proven that it is not.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): What is that from?

Mr. WARNER: I got this statement from the secretary of the Dairy Council, who obtained the information from the parties who have been quoted. I wish to quote from Dr. Wiley who has been quoted on both sides as I think these other authorities have. I wish to quote a statement by Dr. Wiley copied from a letter that Mr. Love, secretary of the Alberta Dairymen's Association, got from Dr. Wiley himself. This is what Dr. Wiley says:

> Originally my objection to oleomargarine, and this is quoted by the dairy interests, was based on the fact that it imitated butter. Not only did the makers of this product seek to resemble butter in colour, but also in flavour, and for this reason in the making of oleomargarine it is, I believe, universally churned with cream or milk. I have always been opposed to this process in the manufacture of oleomargarine. I believe that the churning of oleomargarine with milk or cream is solely for the purpose of simulating butter in the taste or flavour. For that reason it masquerades, or seeks to masquerade, under assumed properties which are possessed by butter itself.
> Since the oleomargarine problem first presented itself in this country—

He is speaking of the United States.

> —there has come a new discovery of supreme importance to the health of our people, namely, the vital factors, commonly called vitamines, in foods. Investigation shows that butter fat of all known fats has the most abundant supply of vitamines. Next to butter fat comes the fat of eggs and the fat which attaches itself to the vital organs of the animal body. For this reason animal fats which are used in the manufacture of oleomargarine are far inferior to butter fat, and to this extent oleomargarine is inferior in wholesomeness to butter. There are some animal fats used in the manufacture of margarines which contain no vitamines at all; for instance, lard. The same objection holds in regard to vegetable fats used in the manufacture of margarines.

It has been stated, further, that the feeding of oleomargarine to children or young animals is distinctly injurious because a lack of development ensues in many ways. Here is what Dr. Margaret Patterson has to say on this point:

In Denmark (one of the best dairying countries in the world) the high price obtainable for butter induced the people to ship all the butter out of the country. The butter-fat was extracted from practically all the milk used in the country. The children were given plenty of separated milk, (a very valuable food for it contains all the lime salts, in fact, the only lack is the butter fat). This lack of fat was supposed to have been made up in fats of other kinds. The proper number of calories were given, but after a time the children developed a very troublesome type of sore eyes. The eyes showed no signs of improving under the most skilled physicians and had it not been for the research work carried out by Dr. McCarrison in Britain, and Prof. McCollum and others in America, the cause and cure of the disease might have remained unknown, and hundreds of children would have lost their eyesight.

This doctor goes on to say that as soon as butter fat was given to the children, and without any further treatment, a noticeable recovery followed. An hon. member has informed the House that we do not know what oleomargarine consists of. I do not believe we do. I have here a statement from the Dominion Cold Storage Commissioner in which he quotes Mr. Love, the secretary of the Alberta Dairymen's Association, in reference to the question as to the formula for oleomargarine. I read the following:

We asked J. A. Rudick, Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner of our country, for the formulae to make oleomargarine and he was forced to reply as follows:

"We have these on our files as well as the formulae used by most of the American manufacturers, who are exporting oleomargarine into Canada. These were supplied to us by the manufacturers on the undertaking that the information should be considered as confidential, and we are, therefore, not able to pass this on to you."

We can see how the thing is covered up so that no one can tell what oleomargarine contains. No one knows anything about it apart from the cold storage authorities who take charge of it. To continue:

Compare Mr. Ruddick's statement with the law of Canada on butter, as found in section 21, page 27, of the Food and Drugs Act, Department of Health of Canada, 1920, which read as follows:

"Butter is the clean, non-rancid product made by gathering in any manner the fat of fresh or ripened milk or cream into a mass, which also contains a small portion of the other milk constituents, with or without salt, and contains not less than eighty (80) per cent of milk fat, and not more than sixteen (16) per cent of water. Butter may also contain added colouring matter of harmless character."

The oleomargarine manufacturer does not even have to make his formulae public, so that the public may know what to look for in his product and help the government of our country to prosecute violators of the law, the same as is done in the butter business.

Everybody in Canada knows exactly what the contents of butter are, but no one can possibly tell you of what oleomargarine is made.

However, we have the printed portions of two parchment wrappers off oleomargarine and margarine prints sold in California, U.S.A., which read as follows:

"Milcoa Brand Oleomargarine.—Ingredients: 77.50 per cent cocoanut oil, 5.50 per cent peanut oil, 12.00 per cent moisture, 2.50 per cent salt, and 2.50 per cent milk solids.—Morris & Co., Los Angeles, California, U.S.A." and

"Nuco:—Ingredients: 76.00 per cent cocoanut oil, 5.00 per cent peanut oil, 2.50 per cent milk solids, 2.50 per cent salt, and 14.00 per cent moisture."

Now then, the people who are talking about oleomargarine being made from animal fats are under a delusion as well. The practice is becoming more and more general all the time to make oleomargarine out of vegetable fats, and these are imported. I do not wish to weary the House by reading it, but I have under my hand a statement by John Burns, manager of one of the biggest packing plants in Alberta, and perhaps in Canada, in which he says that they do not pay any more for an animal on account of the oleo oil they expect to get out of it.

The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) stated this afternoon that only about 2 per cent of the spread for our bread was oleomargarine, the other 98 per cent being butter. He also quoted the convictions of men for wrongful handling of these two commodities. He said that for one year there were 126 convictions in the case of butter as against 14 convictions in the case of oleo; the following year the figures were 106 and 11 respectively. Now then, when we analyze these figures we find that the convictions relating to the handling of oleo constitute 9½ times more than those relating to the handling of butter. I do not believe it will be possible to control the manufacture, importation and sale of oleo once we remove all restrictions.

Now I shall take up another feature, that is, as to whether our dairymen were misled by the government at the time they acquiesced in what was considered to be purely a temporary war measure. I am told that it is not a good argument to say that the dairymen are holding the government to their pledge, but I claim, Mr. Speaker, that such a pledge was made and still stands. If for no other reason, it is plain to me that the temporary nature of the legislation demonstrates that such a pledge was given by the government of the day. I have in my hand a letter from the worthy Minister of Agriculture at the time this temporary legislation was introduced, the Hon. Mr. Crerar, in which he says in part:

> You have doubtless noticed that an order in council has been passed providing for the admission of oleomargarine into Canada under certain provisions during the period of the war.

That is, during the period of the war alone. Further, he says:

> I think you can rest assured that it will not be the policy of the new administration to do anything that would in any sense permanently injure the dairy industry.

That is what Mr. Crerar wrote me when he was Minister of Agriculture in 1917. I wired him at that time on the request of the Alberta Dairyman's Association, and that is the answer he gave me. I have before me the first act which is entitled:

> An act to permit the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada.

Now, that is all temporary and the government have never denied that the legislation was intended to be of a temporary character to meet the abnormal conditions arising out of the war. The dairymen understood, and I understood, when I got that letter from Mr. Crerar, that that is what the government meant, and I believe the people of Canada still entertain that view. Therefore I am going to support the amendment to restore the old condition of affairs before there was any order in council or any other action to permit the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. I believe that is where this commodity ought to be, and I should like to see the government take the responsibility of dealing with the matter in accordance with the pledge given by the former administration.

Regarding the value of dairying and its national importance, I have been in the dairy business all my life, since I was old enough to milk a cow, and I think I understand it from one end to the other. I know from experience how hard it is to keep people in this business. I also know how important it is to Canada to have our farmers continue as dairymen. It is worth something to Canada to encourage our farmers and help them to make a success of the dairy business, and thereby help to bring about national prosperity. For this is what it means. I have heard some people view this problem merely from the standpoint of the profit that is made out of butter. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that that is only a detail. The pork which will be produced by increasing our dairy business will be equal to the amount of money derived from our dairy products. Denmark is one of the greatest dairying countries in the world, and she is also one of the greatest bacon producers in the world, as everyone knows. Now then, are we by allowing this substitute for butter to cut off two valuable lines of production? You can call it protection or what you like, but I say that it is not a proper thing to put oleomargarine in competition with butter when we have spent so many millions of dollars to develop the dairy business of Canada. I do not think it is good policy to do so. I think I know enough about business to understand that Canada needs every dollar she can get from every honourable and legitimate source, and our farmers need the elimination of oleomargarine to place them in a position where by increased dairying operations there may be a corresponding increase in bacon production, which will enable them to do their share in bringing back this country to a prosperous condition.

I have been studying this problem ever since Mr. Crerar wrote me the letter from which I have quoted. I come from the United States where they have always been unable to control the oleomargarine business. I do not wish to use harsh words or harsh illustrations, but I want to tell you that these corporations that are putting oleomargarine on the market are just as hard to control as the bootleggers in the liquor business. I do not believe we can control it.

I appeal to hon. members for support to this amendment; I believe that such an attitude on our part will give renewed confidence to the farmers. The government are thinking of an immigration policy; are they going to permit the sale of a substitute for butter that will make it harder for the people who come to our country to go into the best business we have? I do not believe the government can afford to do it; speaking for myself I hope they will not do it.

Now, just a word in regard to whether the prohibition of oleo would or would not be protection. We are not asking for protection on an article that enters into fair competition with another article. I think I have shown that oleomargarine is not a proper food for children. It is a substitute for butter, the best you can make. If it were a question of butter coming into this country and we were asking that a tariff be put upon it to shut it out, that is what I would understand as protection. I am looking at this matter, not from the monetary point of view, but from the point of view of the welfare of our children, I have references here which show that children attending school who had been fed with butter on the one hand and oleo on the other advanced in knowledge and in physical weight where they had used the butter and lost where they had used the oleomargarine. That was demonstrated by actual test; I could read the quotation, but I do not need to. Let me point out also that we compel the parent who might otherwise be negligent to send his child to a school to get an education. Are we going to say that he may, without perhaps knowing the actual effects, feed to his children something that will prevent them from absorbing the instruction that is given in our schools? Are we going to be as inconsistent as that? There is enough butter in Canada to enable everyone who wants a proper spread for his bread to get it; there is no question about that. Science tells us that the parent who buys oleomargarine to give to his children would do his family more good and would make a better investment of his money by buying butter with it, thus getting a natural food and a perfectly wholesome product. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have said enough on the subject; I shall not take up any more of the time of the House.

Mr. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) and I shall endorse with pleasure the amendment to the resolution brought down by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay).

I disapprove of oleomargarine and I favour butter, good butter; I wish to see our farmers succeed, to help in promoting both the development of our farms and this always increasing industry known as the dairy industry.

This question of oleomargarine has been discussed in every possible way and examined under different aspects by the hon. members of this House ever since the beginning of this debate. For my part, I shall briefly touch upon it. One of the phases to which my attention has been drawn the most, is the economic aspect of the question. It was said with a great deal of truth that every pound of oleomargarine which is imported, manufactured or sold in this country, has for object the replacing of one pound of butter. Those who supported the resolution of the hon. member for Cape Breton South also stated that, for the last few years, the sale of oleomargarine had considerably diminished in this country; that three or four years ago, if I am not mistaken, the sale amounted to about 14,000,000 pounds and that last year it only amounted to 4,000,000 pounds, and they seemed to infer from this fact, that we had nothing to fear from the sale of oleomargarine, we, the advocates of the dairy industry, because, as we are aware, the sale of this article decreases from year to year and tends to disappear. If such is the case why legislate with the object of continuing the sale of this product? If it tends to disappear, if the public has taken an aversion to oleomargarine, in my opinion, there is no use passing a law allowing to place once more on the market this famous substitute for our Canadian butter.

It was the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), I think, who so ably discussed the economic aspect of the question. He represents one of the most beautiful counties of the province of Quebec, a flourishing region of Gaspé. May I be permitted to tell him that the electors of another district of the province of Quebec, the district of Labelle, who have devoted themselves to farming and have opened up, in the heart of the Laurentian hills, a beautiful and large domain, are fully in accord with him this evening, because they share the lofty views he so well expressed. As the hon. member for Gaspé so ably stated, it is more than time that the people give their thoughts to the land, and develop their agricultural industries, for agriculture will certainly be the salvation of the country, and, among these agricultural industries, the dairy industry has not its equal. Indeed, we are passing through, at present, a period which is perhaps more critical than the one we went through a few years ago; however, those who are in touch with history, will remember that about the year 1882, our rural districts were being depopulated; a constant emigration from our country was taking place and many of our farmers disheartened, abandoned their farms to cross over to the United States. We are facing at the present moment a situation somewhat approaching the one our fathers experienced. At that time the public men of the province of Quebec were moved by the sad state of things, even the clergy came to the rescue and all proclaimed: We must save our farmers. It was then that we witnessed the development of our dairy industry in that province, the organization of numerous dairy associations. Eminent men took up the good work in the province and from that date we rejoiced in seeing the farmer take an interest in the land and produce in greater quantities butter and cheese. He paid his debts, cleared his mortgages and made the land productive. In my opinion, it is the dairy industry that saved Canada. We should be attached to this industry. If the people were so much attached to it in the old centre of the St.

Lawrence valley or in the old provinces of Canada, should we not be so, we the representatives of those colonization districts. I should like to see in my region of Mount Laurier industrial dairy associations; lecturers to teach the people, the settlers, how to make a success of these farms and keep them to some extent, away from the bush, the home of shanties, so as to enhance the agricultural industries in all those valleys. I should like to see subsidies granted to the county that I have the honour to represent, for the establishment of butter and cheese factories, and to obtain better herds of milch cows. I think that this would be one of the most important acts that the government could accomplish. This work of the dairy industry, I may say is the first, the one that dominates to-day.

I therefore take pleasure in stating that I am absolutely opposed to the sale of oleomargarine which is placed on the market to replace butter. It was advanced in support of the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that oleomargarine is a product which is sold cheaper than butter and that consequently it might have a certain attraction for the poor and labouring classes. We must not lose sight of the fact that oleomargarine is a product which unfortunately tends to replace butter.

What we especially require, is pure food; and between the two, there is no hesitation of choice. I think we should even protect the poor or the workman against this substitute which certainly has not the value, nor the taste of good butter. We are told: Canada is the only country in the world that prohibits the sale of oleomargarine and all the other countries, even those that produce butter in large quantities, have permitted for a great number of years the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. I think we should be thankful that our country has never adopted legislation to that effect. After all, we are perhaps in the infancy of the development of this great dairy industry, we therefore need to encourage it the more. That is the reason why we should not cast aside any means that are apt to help in its development. We cannot compare ourselves to the European countries, to Denmark for instance, who for a number of years past, has not ceased to work for the development of its dairy industry, the source of its wealth. Here, we are in the earliest stages; we live in an agricultural country where we find natural resources in abundance, where we can produce more than any other country, butter and cheese, for exportation. We cannot compare with Denmark or Switzerland so far as this is concerned, but let us wait. We are the owners of vast territories, numerous rivers, magnificent and large lakes and the richest soil. For that reason, I state that we should be more drawn towards the development of this great dairy industry and that we should oppose energetically the thought of allowing the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this amendment is based on the premises that the suspension of the legislation preventing the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada was a war measure, and therefore being a war measure was by inference of a temporary nature, and that the suspension should now come to an end. It is true that the war is over, but with the end of the war we did not settle the question of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. We must now deal with it as an economic question The conditions, let us admit, permitted of temporary action during the war, but conditions at the present time demand something more. They demand that this House and this parliament face the question of whether or not oleomargarine should be manufactured in and imported into this country as a permanent measure.

Mr. MARTELL: Might I ask how many dairy herds there are up in the Yukon? Is there a dairy industry up there

Mr. BLACK: I am happy to say that we have a dairy industry up in the Yukon.

Mr. LOGAN: Reindeer?

Mr. BLACK: But the people of the Yukon I am quite sure though proud of their dairy herds do not wish to prevent the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in that country or other parts of Canada where such sale will be of great benefit to the majority of the population. It is subterfuge to say that because we dealt with the matter temporarily during the war we should not deal with it now at all. Supposing the action during the war was temporary, that does not relieve this parliament of its obligation to deal with the matter now one way or the other. It is purely an economic question. It is not a matter of sentiment in any respect. Both at the last session of this House and at this session the government has shown itself decidedly averse to taking a stand on this question, although I think it is fair to say that at the last session, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, the government tentatively pledged itself to deal with the matter this session. In support of that I shall quote briefly the words of the Minister of Agriculture when the bill of last session was before the House. Excusing himself for not being in a position at that time to deal finally with the matter of oleomargarine the Minister of Agriculture said:

> We have had before this House evidence indicating that it was more nutritious and also evidence that it was less nutritious than butter. I want to know which is the fact and other conditions in connection with oleomargarine before a permanent bill is brought down if that is found to be desirable. I want time during the recess—

That was the past recess, so he has had the time.

> —to find out if it is desirable to bring down a bill, and, in that event, to know exactly what I am doing. That I could not know at the short time at my disposal. Hence I bring down—

In the classic words of the Minister of Agriculture.

> —this rotten old bill that my hon. friends have passed on three or four occasions.

That is how the minister speaking for the government described the oleomargarine bill of last session. I say that the government through its Minister of Agriculture tentatively pledged itself there to deal with the matter at this session. A bill was brought in at this session. Evidently the Minister of Agriculture did inform himself for he brought in a bill dealing very copiously with oleomargarine, but suddenly and for some unknown reason the government, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, experienced a change of heart and withdrew and washed out from the slate this bill dealing with oleomargarine upon which the Minister of Agriculture has taken the recess to inform himself. Strange to say, the explanation given to the House for the change of heart was that some law officer or departmental clerk without the minister's knowledge and against his wish had so altered and tampered with the bill after it had passed its first reading that the government could not follow it and was obliged to destroy it. Truly an extraordinary situation for the head of a department to find himself in.

It is also true that the Prime Minister expressed his disapproval of the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture in sending out, through his department, anonymous communications seeking to influence those in receipt of such communications against legislation favouring the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. Perhaps the minister will protect himself in this instance, as he did in regard to the mutilation of this bill, and say that some clerk in his department improperly, unlawfully, without his authority and against his wish, took the stationery of the Department of Agriculture and issued this appeal against oleomargarine. Otherwise he will have to take the responsibility for it.

Now, to ask us to believe that the government consider themselves bound by any pledge, made or implied, by any former government is to put too great a tax on the credulity of the members of this House, too great a tax on the credulity of the public, having in view this government's record in the matter of observing their pledges and carrying out their platform. However, be that as it may, I say this is an economic question to be dealt with now in the best interests of the public. The evidence is that oleomargarine is a good wholesome food composed of nourishing ingredients. It is manufactured under regulations ensuring cleanliness and sanitation. To allow its manufacture will build up an industry with all its attendant advantages, including increased employment in Canada. To allow its importation will provide revenue by applying a tariff charge both to the finished article and to the ingredients which enter into its manufacture. A man of straw is built up to be knocked down by opponents to the legislation in favour of oleomargarine by saying that it will hurt the dairy industry. The evidence is that in the countries allowing the manufacture of oleo the dairy industry does not suffer from that cause. Why should we suppose that the dairy industry will suffer in Canada? That being so, what argument is left against the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine? It would be just as reasonable to prohibit the manufacture and use of homemade bread in the interest of bakeries because the use of homemade bread lessens the consumption of baker's bread. That would be just as reasonable as to prohibit the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine because it might be used in some instances instead of butter. The importation of butter from Denmark and New Zealand gives the Canadian butter makers much more effective competition than the use of oleomargarine, but we hear no agitation to prohibit the importation of butter.

Beyond all question oleomargarine is a health giving food. It is a fact that the Canadian corps overseas were fed on oleomargarine, they were not fed on butter. They got oleomargarine and plenty of it, and they were a healthy lot; there were no healthier men on the face of the earth. Oleomargarine did not injure their health in the slightest, any more than it will injure the health of the people of this country. And it must be remembered that oleomargarine was supplied to the troops under conditions that permitted of adulteration to a far greater extent than do the conditions of the present day. I say that to admit the quality of oleomargarine cannot be controlled and its use regulated, is to admit inefficiency on the part of those in charge of the administration of the laws of the land. For my part I say: Encourage its manufacture as a Canadian industry, allow its importation, and regulate it, as in the case of any other food, under the pure food laws of this country. I say let the people use it according to their needs, whether as a substitute for axle grease or for food.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): On the 15th of May, 1922, the question of oleomargarine was discussed in this House at considerable length and a clear-cut declaration of position on the question was made. The resolution proposed at that time read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that in the best interests of the dairy industry, and of the public generally, the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine should be discontinued in Canada after September first, next.

That resolution was negatived by a vote of 83 to 57, 95 members of the House being absent. It appears to me that was a clear-cut and distinct declaration of position on the part of this House as to what, in the opinion of parliament, should be done in the matter of further prohibiting the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. That is how the question appears to me, Mr. Speaker, and may I say that I represent a farming community in Ontario second to none. But if that farming community expects me to contend for the protection which I find embodied in the motion before the House they have got entirely the wrong individual to further any such scheme, which I regard as the rankest demonstration of protection that has been witnessed in the House since I became a member of it.

Mr. MARTELL: But did you not vote for greater protection?

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. gentleman, as usual, is ever ready with a side remark. He is absolutely right in that statement but it merits, in view of the form in which it is made, a little explanation. I find that for these many years protection has existed with respect to very many, altogether too many, walks of life. I find that protection, with the bright lights of the industrial prosperity of those protected has attracted too many of our young men and young women from the farms of Canada. It has brought them to the towns for the purpose of continuing a protection which, in my opinion, is wrong and should never have been tolerated. But I am not ready, as the representative of an important constituency in this House, simply because I believe that the principle of protection is absolutely wrong, first, last and all the time, to bring industrial or business chaos to Canada by saying that we are going to wipe out at one fell swoop all the protection that exists in Canada to-day. Holding that view, Mr. Speaker, I am not ready to quietly acquiesce in encouraging a species of protection which, in my opinion, is less justifiable than any other protection we have had in this country in the years gone by.

10 p.m.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the minister if he expressed those views to his dairy electors before he was elected?

Mr. MURDOCK: Unfortunately I did not.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MURDOCK: I was elected by acclamation and my constituents did not have the opportunity of hearing these views. I am hoping though that they will have an opportunity now of hearing my views, and I shall be glad to go to them if good fortune should permit, and state the same views that I will express to this House to-night.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Dundas): Will the minister explain to the House how this is protection of the dairy industry?

Mr. MURDOCK: I will try to come to that logically and in sequence. I was much interested in noting the efforts made by two of my hon. friends across the aisle to my right, one of them, the hon. member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) intimating that he was against protection, but that he would vote for this amendment because oleomargarine was not sold and put before the consumer on its merits. Then the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) also was in favour of the amendment because oleomargarine is an imitation of butter. These seem to me very plausible apologies for overlooking the rank feature of protection embodied in the matter that is before the House to-night. If the view of the hon. member for Strathcona with regard to the imitation feature is correct, why should this House to-morrow or the next day not legislate against wooden legs and glass eyes and go the whole length in respect of preventing imitations.

Some hon. members referred to the fact that the women of Canada were in favour of continuing the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine. I think that great and undue stress has been laid upon the fact that this was a war measure which permitted, in the first place in 1918 and since that time, the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. I want to place before the House the views of part of the community of Canada, whose views I think should be given consideration. Under date of April 22, 1922, there came to me on the letterhead of the Great War Veterans' Association, a letter addressed to the Minister of Labour, reading:

Dear Sir,

I have the honour to submit herewith attached resolution adopted by the convention representing the Province of Ontario Great War Veterans' Association when in session at Ottawa the 21st April, 1922, respectfully urging that legislation may be enacted to permit the continued manufacture and sale of oleomargarine within the Dominion of Canada, which product has proved a boon to large families with small earnings and to those suffering distress through unemployment, as well as the provision of a channel for continued employment of a number of our citizens.

This resolution has been submitted to the Hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

I beg to remain, Sir, yours very obediently.

J. V. Conroy,
Secretary, Great War Veterans' Association,
Toronto district.

This is the resolution:

Whereas oleomargarine is widely known as a good and palatable food of high nutritive value and obtainable at all times at a considerably lower price than butter, and.

Whereas its sale is freely permitted in all parts of the British Empire (except the Dominion of Canada) and in other countries so long as it is sold on its merits, and

Whereas by a conservative estimate there were last winter 200,000 unemployed persons in the Dominion (of whom 17,000 men, three-quarters of them married with dependants, were reported in Toronto) to whom the lower price of oleomargarine was undoubtedly a benefit, and

Whereas members of the Great War Veterans' Association, Inc., know from experience that oleomargarine is a hygienic food which furnishes the necessary fats required in the diet, and

Whereas there is reason to fear that the present regulations permitting manufacture and sale in Canada may be allowed to lapse in September next:—

Be it resolved that this Ontario Provincial Convention, Great War Veterans' Association, respectfully and earnestly urges the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and the members of the Dominion government promptly to take steps to assure the continued manufacture and sale of oleomargarine within the Dominion so that housewives may be enabled to continue freely to purchase oleomargarine for their families if they so desire.

Mr. NEILL: What year was that?

Mr. MURDOCK: April 22, 1922. Those were the views of the Great War Veterans' Association. Then we have also in an editorial the expression of the Labour Leader, and I am rather surprised to note that the Labour party in this House is conspicuous by its absence to-night, as I think this is one of the most important questions concerning labour that has been dealt with for some time.

Mr. LEWIS: I should like to inform the hon. member that the two labour men are in the Banking committee which is sitting to-night.

Mr. MURDOCK: They ought to be looking after the feeding committee.

Mr. MARTELL: I would call the attention of the House to the fact that they are not the Labour party. There are a number of members representing Labour in this House. The minister is one of the best representatives of labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: The editorial of the Labour Leader in part says:

A product which was considered a good palatable food in war times by all competent authorities has a right to be so considered in times of peace. A glaring example of government by orders in council is reflected in the way permission to manufacture, import and sell this product has been granted. Yearly extensions have been made and undoubtedly several manufacturers who would equip their plants to make a high-class product have hesitated to make the outlay and thus create industry because of the uncertainty.

To allow this right to lapse would appear to be class legislation by protecting dairy interests at the expense of the wage earner. Oleomargarine has won a definite place in our commerce and so long as Canadians desire it, they should not be denied the privilege of making their own choice.

I could not in any way add to the statements made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), when he pleaded for the poor family and the working man, that they be permitted to purchase oleomargarine. We have heard to-night, for the first time so far as I know, that a distinct assurance was given at the time when the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine was suspended, that such suspension was but temporary and a war measure only. I should like to inquire why it was that last year when this question was discussed and when by a majority of twenty-six it was, in my judgment, decided that the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine would continue, the question of such assurance was not raised? Is it conceivable that because on the 15th May, 1922, the House passed judgment on this question adversely to those who now desire to prevent the continued sale of oleomargarine, this is an after-thought of an assurance given in 1918, and that they are now trying to bring this forth, as some hon. member suggests, from a camouflaged viewpoint in order to influence this House to make good on some alleged agreement that was given in 1918.

It seems to me that the House should do to-night what was done on the 15th day of May, 1922; it should pass upon this question on its merits, and on its merits alone. A great deal of literature has been read to-night in regard to the comparative food values of butter and oleomargarine. I have before me a statement which it has been stated is an analysis of the energy values of food and which was published by the British government. The author is R. H. A. Plimmer, D.Sc. who was attached to the Directorate of Hygiene of the War Office, and in this analysis the following statement appears:

> Butter, margarine, dripping, lard: As is well known, these foodstuffs consist essentially of fat and their energy value is entirely due to this constituent. The amount of protein present in butter and margarine is a negligible quantity. Butter and margarine have a lower energy than dripping and lard, owing to their content of water and salt. It is owing to the variability in amount of these two constituents that there are differences in the proportion of fat.

It is not necessary to enlarge further on this because I realize, from the documents that have come to my hand during the past few weeks, that it is possible to get a view either one way or the other on this particular question, and you can obtain all sorts of expert advice and decisions in regard to it. But let us come to the real question of protection involved, which is now being advocated openly for the dairying interests of Canada. In my judgment they want protection in its most glaring form. And how much protection is involved? Let us analyze the matter and see. Some of the figures were given to the House this afternoon by the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), but there were not submitted all of the comparisons which I desire to draw therefrom. In 1916, there was produced in Canada—I am just giving the millions and thousands—26,966,000 pounds of butter, while there was imported into the country 2,091,000 pounds. In the same year we exported of this product 7,787,000 pounds. In 1917, there was produced 34,274,000 pounds of butter; we imported only 466,000 pounds and exported 4,344,000 pounds. The tendency was gradually to increase the ratio until 1921, when we find that there was a production of 128,784,000 pounds of butter in Canada, while in that same year there was imported into this country 4,018,000 pounds and exported from Canada 9,132,000 pounds. Last year, 1922, we produced in Canada 146,863,000 pounds. But that was not sufficient; 6,396,000 pounds of butter was imported into the country, while we exported 21,504,000.

As to the production of oleomargarine, I have here a report of the Canada Food Board for 1918, which gives in detail the results of its work as a food board for the months during 1918 in which it was in operation. At page 57 of the report reference is made to the enormous amount of business over which the board exercised control, and the statement is made that oleomargarine was imported to the extent of 1,000,000 pounds monthly during the year 1918. In 1919, the production of oleomargarine in this country was 10,084,000 pounds, while during the same year we imported 5,221,000 pounds. In 1920, we produced in Canada 10,565,000 pounds of oleomargarine and exported 5,553,000 pounds. In 1921, we produced in Canada only 3,824,000 pounds of oleomargarine, while during the same year only 2,057,000 pounds was imported. Last year, 1922, the production of oleomargarine was 2,326,000 pounds, while the importation was 1,032,000 pounds.

Mr. MARTELL: If the prohibition of oleomargarine is rank protection, what about the prohibition of mechanics from entering Canada?

Mr. MURDOCK: Just at the moment we are not dealing with alien labour, but if we should come to that subject in the course of the debates in this House I hope to maintain a sane, fair and reasonable view on the question. The point I wanted to make in quoting these figures was this: If we are really going to do, here and now, something for the real protection of the dairy interests of Canada, why not let us go the full limit and not only prohibit the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine but put a stop to the importation of the 6,396,000 pounds of butter that came into this country last year to compete with our Canadian butter?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MURDOCK: An hon. gentleman says, "We do not ask you to do that". But it would be equally consistent to go that length and adopt the real essence of protection so that nothing but Canadian manufactured butter should be spread upon the bread of any citizen of Canada. That is virtually what is proposed, if I understand the protection that is intended.

Mr. GOULD: Chinese eggs too.

Mr. CANNON: Is the hon. member in favour of abolishing the duty on butter?

Mr. MURDOCK: At this particular moment I am not putting that view forward; nor would I be prepared to support that view any more than I am ready to subscribe to the proposal to prevent oleomargarine being manufactured in Canada or imported into the country. Is it protection that is really proposed? Well, we have to go back to the records of the House in order to answer that question. This subject has been discussed in previous years. We find that on the third day of April, 1918, a resolution was proposed by the then hon. member for East Lambton to amend an order in council and more strictly to enforce it—

In order that the great dairy industry of Canada should be adequately protected.

Protection was what was desired. Various other orders in council were passed subsequently, until we come down to the year 1920. In 1920 an hon. member in this House spoke against the admission or manufacture of oleomargarine and said:

But there is a bigger thing at stake. It affects a great big industry in this country, one of the biggest industries in the Dominion with hundreds of millions of dollars invested in it,—

Which is admitted.

—employing hundreds of thousands of people and spending millions upon millions of money in wages. Surely this is an industry which is entitled to protection.

Another hon. member said:

It does not want protection.

And the first hon. gentleman said:

It does want protection, so this government says, as did the former government, and in fact every government from confederation down to the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: They must have been Tory.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, they were too Tory —and that, Mr. Speaker, is going to be one of the misfortunes of my life, to find myself to-night, I expect, before we get through, voting with the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the other gentlemen associated with him.

Yesterday we had a few very pleasant moments in the House when the right hon. leader of the Opposition referred to the cuckoo government over here, pointing to this side of the House, and it occurs to me that surely there has been some dodging on more than one side if I read Hansard aright. I find that on May 21, 1921, on the motion of the then Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) the House went into committee to consider a resolution to repeal part of the Oleomargarine Act and permit the importation, sale and manufacture of this commodity. Then on the 25th May the proposed amendment secured its second reading. But let us find the position of the right hon. gentleman somewhat later, to be exact, on May 25, 1921, when he stated to the House:

When the bill was introduced this time the government felt that there was no further reason for a limited time and that in accordance with the best public policy oleomargarine should be admitted without limitation of time. . . . In that from the government would prefer the measure to pass. . . .The government's position is this, we prefer this bill as it is, we believe, though, in view of the opposition that we should accede to the amendment—

Extension for one year.

—rather than imperil the measure, and we propose to accept the amendment if it is the will of the House . . . . I am sorry that opposition to the bill developed on this side of the House or on either side, but under the circumstances, as we are nearing the end of the session, we felt it was better rather than that there should be a prolonged discussion that the bill should pass in a form which leaves the matter just as it is for another year, when under the circumstances of that time the House can again decide what it wishes.

The "circumstances of that time" came on May 15, 1922, when this House decided by a majority of 26 that it was not proper to longer prohibit the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. In other words, the question was decided in the judgment of the House according to a formula which the then Prime Minister had declared to be proper and right on May 26, 1921, but which yesterday he referred to as a cuckoo attitude on the part of this government that proposes to do exactly the same thing—leave it to the House of Commons to determine what should be done as to the prohibition of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine in the years to come.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hold that the people do not need any such form af protection as is here implied. With 146,000,000 pounds of butter manufactured in Canada last year and 6,000,000 pounds imported, as well as 21,000,000 pounds exported, there is all this to-do about a paltry 3,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine manufactured and imported. We hear gentlemen who are absolutely committed to the principle of free trade and no protection getting up to-night and offering, it seems to me, very plausible reasons why they should, under the circumstances, stultify their consciences to the extent of ignoring the protection feature by voting to prohibit the manufacture aad importation of oleomargarine because it is a butter substitute.

Mr. McBRIDE: If I might ask the hon. minister a question—is he suggesting that the farmer should pay a tariff on everything he buys and get no protection whatever?

Mr. MARTELL: You are right there.

Mr. MURDOCK: Absolutely no. No member of this House would be more ready and willing to work with my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. McBride) to remove so far as possible the burdens now placed on the farming community by improper protection. But holding the views I do on that subject, I am not by my vote going to help inaugurate a system of protection which is improper and unfair and is not in effect in any other civilized country in the world. We do not want to go from bad to worse.

Mr. MARTELL: If the minister will permit me—in the light of everything that has been said and of all the votes I have seen in this House, will he undertake to say, whether the question be protection, free trade or anything else, that how the members vote depends in a great many cases on whose ox is gored?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Speaker, that may be good logic and the proper attitude to adopt in Hants, but so far as I am concerned, as I said some time ago, I represent an important agricultural community and I want the farmers in Kent to know where I stand on this proposal to inaugurate another line of protection. I shall be prepared to go before them and repeat what I am stating here in possibly more extended form.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit me another question? So far as Hants county, Nova Scotia, is concerned, we do not want any protection, if he wishes to know—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MARTELL: —But I want to ask my hon. friend if he is not advocating what he considers is in the best interests of his constituents, just as I advocate anything that in my judgment is in the interests of my constituents in the county of Hants?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if I know the rules of the game, but I thought I was here as a member of parliament from Kent county to represent, as best I could, what in my judgment is in the best interests of the people of Canada including my constituents. That is what I am trying to do to-night in speaking as I have. So I think, Mr. Speaker, that the House should take the position it took a year ago the fifteenth of last month when it decided by a majority of 26 that it would be improper any longer to prevent the people of Canada, the poorer classes of Canada, from having oleomargarine where possibly they could not secure butter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the hon. member permit a question? I understand he is an authority on oleomargarine. Will he inform the House what are the ingredients that make up that product?

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member for South Oxford, as is so often the case, is entirely misinformed. I am not an authority on oleomargarine. So far as my knowledge goes I never ate it in my life, though I assume I have eaten it, because I have had a great many meals in restaurants. I never bought a pound of it and I do not know how it is made. I care little how it is made, as I am told on what to me is sufficient authority that it is a wholesome food. I know it was sufficiently wholesome to be utilized under war time conditions and I know that the returned soldiers and the poorer people of Canada are now contending that oleomargarine should continue to be used, and their views and their judgment are sufficient for me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the hon. member permit another question? Does he think it is fair to the people who are purchasing oleomargarine that they should not know what goes into it?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I do not think it is fair, but that is a matter of regulation.

In conclusion I wish to give the comparative prices of butter and oleomargarine in this country during the last few years. The figures given are the Toronto retail prices for January and July respectively in the years stated: 1918, butter, 55 and 52 cents; oleomargarine, 32 and 33 cents, 1919, butter, 60 and 60 cents; oleomargarine, 40 and 42 cents; 1920, butter, 75 and 65 cents; oleomargarine, 42 and 42 cents; 1921, butter, 64 and 37 cents, oleomargarine, 40 and 27 cents; 1922, butter, 49 and 44 cents; oleomargarine, 27 and 27 cents. 1923, January, butter, 46 cents; oleomargarine, 26 cents. There are many times when the widow of a soldier or his children cannot afford to buy butter, and I say it is unfair to establish a protection for the great dairy industry of Canada that will deny to such persons the right to get a spread for their bread which will take the place of a product the price of which may be too high to permit them to purchase it.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, all the dairymen are not opposed to the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine, and I am glad to say this evening that I can claim to come within that class of dairymen. I have been interested to some extent in a dairy herd, although many of my friends regard me as a lawyer.

An hon. MEMBER: A butter lawyer.

Mr. LADNER: What was the gentleman's remark? Well, there may be some hon. members more slippery than a butter lawyer. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been able to see both sides of this question. Last year the matter was discussed in the House for a whole day, and I venture to say that when the debate commenced to-day there was not an hon. member who did not have his mind practically made up on the matter. We would not have had this confusion, we would not have wasted another day in debating whether $800,000 worth of oleomargarine should be brought into this country or manufactured here, if the government had assumed and discharged the responsibility which was deliberately and decisively placed upon them last year.

Mr. PUTNAM: Which government?

Mr. LADNER: Your government. There may be three of them in the House—the parent government, we will say.

Mr. LOGAN: They are all on this side of the House, anyway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Alleged government.

Mr. LADNER: They do not seem to demonstrate any evidence of being a real government.

Mr. LADNER: In this matter of oleomargarine there is involved a simple question of principle. There has also been indicated in the debates of the House a desire to serve political expediency. Some hon. members represent dairy constituencies; many of them are sincere in their advocacy of the total prohibition of importation or manufacture of oleomargarine. But I suggest that most hon. members are impelled to their conclusions against oleomargarine largely by political considerations. How can it be argued for a moment that it is within the proper authority of parliament, that it is one of the functions of parliament, to prohibit the manufacture or importation of a food which has been demonstrated to be wholesome and useful to the community? The consumer, I submit, is the person to be primarily considered in this question. I know of no better argument on the subject than a few lines contained in the circular issued by the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada, part of which has been read to the House and part of which I will now read. This circular presents the views of the Grocers', Butchers' and Provision Dealers' sections of the association throughout Canada. They say:

> We have no interest to serve, only that of serving the public with what they want, and the fact that the demand from the consuming public for oleomargarine for the past year has been greater than that of any previous year is the best evidence we can offer you that the people want it.

Now, if the people want it, what right has parliament to prevent them from using it? Then the circular continues:

> Before our members undertook to offer it for sale to the general public we made exhaustive inquiries as to the ingredients it contained and its method of manufacture. We consulted with the Chief Analyst for the Dominion government and he pronounced it a perfectly good food, and he stated that it contained no harmful ingredients, and, as on each package is stamped the approval of the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada, our retail grocers, butchers, produce dealers and general store merchants throughout Canada felt perfectly justified in stocking it and offering it for sale. If our customers did not want it there would be no sale for it, but our experience shows that they do want it, and, seeing that it is a non-injurious and palatable product, and contains nothing that is unhealthful, we are of the opinion that they should be allowed to buy it if they so desire, and no law should be passed to prevent them from having it.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in that simple statement we have all or most that can be said in favour of the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine. Every country in the civilized world permits it. On what principle does the parliament of Canada deny the people of this country the right to use oleomargarine if they want it? The dairyman's gain, I submit, would be microscopic, even if the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine was eliminated. I have figures on good authority which show that in value there was about $800,000 worth of oleomargarine consumed in Canada in 1922, and about $74,000,000 worth or a little more of butter, or less than 4,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine and about 240,000,000 pounds of butter, including both dairy and creamery butter. If you calculate these figures you will find that of the spread on bread about 1¼ per cent in value is oleomargarine and 98¾ per cent is butter. I inquired from several dairymen who are members of the House as to the profit per pound on butter and I was informed that there is no profit or only a very small profit. This whole proposition I submit simply comes down to this, that the small amount of profit on the $800,000 worth of oleomargarine is not a factor which should cause the government of Canada to put that small profit in the hands of the dairymen and deny the working classes of this country the privilege of obtaining a species of butter fat which is perfectly wholesome, and which otherwise they could not have. If this question is considered on the basis of principle, on the basis of fair play, on the basis of the liberty of the subject, on the basis of the right of a man to buy what he wants provided it is healthful to him, and considering the infinitesimal advantage there would be to the dairy interests and the great loss to many of the poor people of this country, I cannot understand how any hon. gentleman could deny the citizens of this country this right which is accorded in every other civilized country of the world.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. LADNER: Two.

Mr. MARTELL: In the case of boots and shoes, which are protected, there are very few manufacturers and the public suffer. Would not the same thing apply to the dairy industry? The protection to the dairy industry is for the benefit of the farmers, just as the protection on boots and shoes is for the benefit of the manufacturers, and the public in the final analysis pay the shot, do they not?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. The duty on boots and shoes is only a regulatory measure in order to encourage the manufacture of boots and shoes in this country. It is not total prohibition. It does not say: You shall not wear shoes; go in your bare feet. It says: You can wear shoes, but there will be a small addition to the price in order to encourage the manufacture of that article in this country.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not the case that the tariff is so high that it almost means total prohibition? In any event it is the same principle, and the principle is wrong.

Mr. LADNER: As the hon. gentleman finds it necessary to resort to such extremes in argument, I think his question hardly merits an answer, because he knows perfectly well that the protection on boots and shoes is not a very high protection.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): There are one or two words only that I would like to address to the House on this question with a view to explaining what my position is in regard to it. I come from a constituency in the Maritime provinces which was a pioneer in the dairy industry in our part of the country. I know how important the development of the dairy industry is to the farmers of eastern Canada, and I am sure the experience that we have had there has been equally felt in all parts of this country. There has been no development along agricultural lines which has been so satisfactory and of such benefit to the agricultural people of our part of the country as the development of the dairy industry during the last ten or fifteen years.

All parties in this country down to 1917, about the middle of the war, apart from any question of free trade or protection, had decided that in the interests of the Canadian people from every standpoint there should be a prohibition of the sale and importation into Canada of oleomargarine. That was the situation, and nobody ever questioned it. But solely and only on account of the situation that was created by the war the government of the day under the War Measures Act, without the consent of parliament, without asking parliament anything in regard to the matter, proceeded to pass an order in council which expressly recited the circumstances under which this prohibition was to be removed. It stated that it was due entirely to the abnormal demand for butter, and that as high prices would prevail for this product for some time to come it granted permission for the sale and importation of oleomargarine under regulations to be enforced and take effect "for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue, the conclusion of such period to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council."

When the provisions of the War Measures Act and the orders in council that were passed under it ceased to have effect, by reason of the fact that abnormal conditions still continued in the country, a statute was passed extending the provisions of this order in council for another year, then later another statute was passed extending it a further year, and last year a third statute was passed extending the permission for the temporary manufacture and importation of this article to the 31st day of August, 1923, and the offering of same and having possession for sale was permitted up to the 31st day of March, 1924.

Now the matter comes to this House by my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) bringing forward a resolution in which he asks the House to reverse the policy of the Canadian parliament and people which has obtained ever since confederation, and to permit the importation and sale of oleomargarine in this country without restriction except in so far as the regulations of the act provide. We have an amendment moved to that resolution by my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) which I would interpret as meaning, if adopted by this House, and I hope it will be, that these temporary acts shall be done away with and that we shall revert to the condition of affairs that existed before the orders in council and these statutes were passed, and that oleomargarine shall only be permitted to be manufactured until August, 1923, and its sale permitted only until the following March.

The question is what ought we to do? It is all very well for my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) to argue about the virtue of consistency, but of what use is it for a man to congratulate himself upon consistency in voting to-day for something that he supported five years ago, when in this changing world with the varying conditions that we have seen in that period what would be in the interest of the country to-day might not have been in its interest five years ago? Consistency is not the only virtue a public man should possess. Again my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) undertook to give his lecture ex cathedra to the gentlemen who sit next to him as if he had had some holy principle committed to him alone and the Ark of the Covenant was in his charge. I submit that neither of these gentlemen is taking the proper position. Apart from either of their theories, our attitude on this question should be that which would be of the greatest advantage to and contribute to the advancement of the country as a whole.

Now, what is the situation that confronts us? We have the dairy industry developing in Canada in the manner in which it is, and bringing to those engaged in it the greatest amount of money, derived from any part of the agricultural system of Canada outside of that derived from the sale of wheat. Are we to say that it is not wise in the interests of this country to encourage the development of that industry still further? Because somebody says that oleomargarine is good to eat and somebody else says that it is not, are we to imperil that industry? Are we going to give notice to the people in those parts of Canada where it has not yet been developed that they must not co-operate for the purpose of building up this great industry to a greater degree, or that they are not to teach agriculturists proper methods for the production of butter? For myself I care not what theories may be advanced. I believe it is in the interest of the Canadian people that the dairy industry of this country should be encouraged. May I venture the statement, Mr. Speaker, that there is too much of a tendency on the part of many in this House to indulge in theorizing. Why cannot we look every business proposition that is submitted to this parliament squarely in the face, and say honestly what we think in regard to it and whether it is in the interest of the Canadian people or not. If we are actuated by that idea when we approach the determination of this proposition we need not care what theory may be violated or what maxim may be overlooked so long as what we decide upon is in the interest of our people. It does seem to me that this House would be wise and would be doing that which will be best for the country as a whole if we support the amendment which has been submitted by my hon. friend the member for Missisquoi.

The hon. member who immediately preceded me (Mr. Ladner) read from a circular issued by the Retail Merchants Association this statement:

> The fact that the demand from the consuming public for oleomargarine for the past year has been greater than that of any previous year is the best evidence we can offer you that the people want it.

Now I find from an authoritative official statement that in the year ending December 31, 1920, the quantity of oleomargarine manufactured in Canada was 7,182,936 pounds. In the year ending December 31, 1921, the quantity manufactured was 2,632,250 pounds; and in the year ending December 31, 1922, the quantity manufactured was 1,964,243 pounds, or 5,000,000 pounds less in 1922 than in 1920. This shows that if there was a large portion of the Canadian people consuming oleomargarine they are getting heartily sick of it, and that the product is going out of use.

Mr. LADNER: Do the figures which my hon. friend has given cover importations?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The story in regard to importations is much the same. The importations in the years referred to were reduced in like proportion.

Mr. LADNER: Will the hon. gentleman give the figures showing importations?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am unable to put my hand on the figures, but they are, roughly speaking to this effect: In 1920 the imports amounted to 5,000,000 pounds and in 1922 they had been reduced to 1,000,000 pounds. The consequence is that instead of warranting the inference suggested by the circular of the Retail Merchants Association the figures show that the people of this country are giving up the use of oleomargarine. Therefore, it seems to me that if the people do not want to eat oleomargarine we should not try to force it upon them. The fact that the unanimous opinion of parliament for so many years was against the use of this article should influence us in our decision. It was never pretended on the part of the then government that the act authorizing the use of oleomargarine was to be anything but temporary in its operations due entirely to the abnormal conditions created by the war. It would be well, therefore, to follow the example of those who dealt with this question in the past and revert to the legislation which was enforced for so many years in this country. By doing so I believe we will be doing that which will be for the best interests of Canada and its people.

Mr. R. H. HALBERT: (North Ontario): After all the discussion that has taken place in this House during the last four sessions on oleomargarine I had decided not to say anything on the present occasion, and I would not be taking up the time of the House now had it not been for certain remarks made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). However, what I have to say will only occupy a few minutes. The Minister of Labour professed to be speaking for the labour people of Canada, and he said it was not fair that they should not be allowed to buy oleomargarine instead of butter. I wonder if he was thinking of the thousands of labour men who work in the mines and in the lumber camps who do not want to eat oleomargarine but are forced to eat it under present conditions or else lose their job? Oleomargarine was allowed to be manufactured in Canada under the War Measures Act of 1917. Up to 1917 we heard no person complaining about the price of butter. Were there no poor in the country then? Prior to that time there was little or no oleomargarine used but we heard no complaints from the poor such as we have heard to-night made on behalf of labouring men.

My main reason for taking part in this debate is because of the allegation that the prohibition is desired for the purposes of protection. We are told that oleomargarine raises the price of beef cattle because of the use that can be made out of the fat of these animals. If I were to advocate the use of oleomargarine the Minister of Labour, with as much truth, could allege that I was asking for protection for the farmers who raise beef cattle in this country. It would be just as appropriate for him to argue that by supporting oleomargarine I was advocating protection for the beef cattle industry as it is for him to say that by urging its prohibition I am recommending protection for the butter industry. It must be remembered that the legislation on this subject was passed during war time. The dairy industry of Canada made no protest against that legislation; they were willing to do anything that would help to win the war. The war has long been over, and all war time measures have gone out of existence with the exception of this. The oleomargarine law has been extended year after year down to the present time.

It has been stated that oleomargarine is a good food. That is for adults. We do not hear it said that oleomargarine is good for infants. I would advise the manufacturers, therefore, not to eat any oleomargarine because their industries are still in the infant stage—so they claim at any rate—and it would not be good for them. If we were advocating more protection for butter the protection argument might be brought in, but it is certainly far-fetched to say that any person who votes for the amendment is advocating protection for the dairy industry. When the manufacture of oleo was not permitted the labouring men of Canada were getting not more than half the amount they are receiving to-day. Still we had no complaints. I think, Mr. Speaker, that under present conditions we should revert to the legislation which prevailed before the war. I am not saying whether I am in favour of the manufacture of oleomargarine or not. Let the subject be fought out on its merits and give the dairy industry its just dues because the general belief is that the legislation on this question was only a temporary measure. I think, therefore, we should revert to the former status and give the manufacturers of oleomargarine on the one hand and the dairy industry on the other a chance to fight out the question on an even footing, because we know that this was the thin end of the wedge that was introduced, and now the manufacturers of oleomargarine want to drive it home. Possession, we are told, is nine points of the law, although I do not know whether all the members who are lawyers will agree with that. These people have been permitted to come inside and now they refuse to go out. Let us put both the manufacturers of oleomargarine and the dairy interests on the same footing. I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, I shall be extremely brief. I am rising only for one purpose. I did not intend to say anything at all on this matter and I know how I am going to vote. I rise particularly to say that I object to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) or any other hon. member saying that he represents labour. There is not a member on the Liberal, Progressive, or Conservative side who does not represent all classes of citizens in his community and in the constituency which he represents in the Canadian parliament. Personally, I have organized unions in my constituency, and I happen to be solicitor for those unions. I am not here as a Labour representative; I am not here as a Progressive; I am not here as a Conservative; I am here as a Liberal, and I believe that I represent labour just as truly as hon. members who sit in yonder corner and the Minister of Labour do. One of my chief objects in rising is to protest against certain men setting themselves up in this House as the supreme arbiters in all matters pertaining to the labour interests, so-called, in this country. We are all labourers when we get down to the final standpoint. Some may be lawyers, others doctors, merchants, men who have to take the pick and shovel; in fact, we are all labourers in our particular vocations in life. Personally, I have stood in court when I have defended members of labour unions without money and without price. I do not apologize for that; I am proud of the fact, and I am glad to say that these men, not foreign agitators, but natives of my constituency, are my friends and will vote for me when election day comes around. Therefore, I protest against the Minister of Labour and other members in this House arrogating to themselves the right to be called representatives of labour in this parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When some of us were elected distinctly on a Labour ticket, how other can we possibly denominate ourselves than Labour?

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend may have run on a Labour ticket; but what I regard as Labour is men who are willing to take their place in life amongst all the rest of the people without asking any particular favour, not men who run on a socialistic ticket and who advocate communism.

All I have to say in regard to the subject under discussion to-day is this. Most hon. members know that I am regarded as a radical. I do not apologize for that, but I do believe good radicalism is good Liberalism. My Liberalism is hereditary Liberalism fostered by the fact that my small education has convinced me that Liberalism is right. I am, however, ready to accord to people who cannot agree with me the right to have their particular views. I have particular views of my own; other people have particular views of theirs, but on the subject which is before us to-day, namely the matter of oleomargarine, some of us have been told that we are advocating protection. If protection is going to be the system in this country, then all industries should be protected. I am not saying that protection is the system of this country. What I say is that this is not protection in the way of tariff legislation; it is simply preventing people from being able to put up against the dairy industry of this country a combination of fats, Heaven knows whence they come. I am prepared to say to the people of my constituency: If you want oleomargarine, you can have it, that is if my hon. friends opposite or some other people like the Minister of Labour want to give to the people of this country things that he will not eat himself. I am sure the Minister of Labour, if he had placed before him oleomargarine and good creamery butter such as is manufactured at Selma in the county of Hants, would not eat the oleomargarine. I am not prepared to stand in this House of Commons and give my vote for a conglomeration of Heaven knows what against the good creamery butter of Hants. Therefore, I am going to oppose the question of the admission of oleomargarine into this country.

I come from a seafaring race. When I was a boy at school, my great ambition was, when the summer vacation arrived, to go on a trip with my father on his old boat. After my parents had passed beyond the vale, I went to sea for a couple of years, and all the oleomargarine I saw was used as slush to slush down the masts of the schooner. Are we going to place before the people of the Dominion of Canada slush to eat rather than the good creamery butter manufactured at Selma and other places in Nova Scotia?

I am opposed to oleomargarine primarily because it should not be permitted to come into competition with a natural industry. Oleomargarine is an artificial product; butter is a purely natural product, and if we are going to protect the people of this country, we do not want to protect the decrepit, the aged and those who have passed beyond the three score years and ten. We want to protect the children of the country. As the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has said, nobody has ever said that oleomargarine is a good food for children, and the children are going to be the people who will govern this country in the future. As I have said already, artificial products should not be permitted to come into competition with natural products. Let us protect the children who will be the people of to-morrow, and not those who should be buried if they are not already buried.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I am very gratified for two things, one the shortness of the speeches on this issue, and the other that some hon. members seem to be becoming rather proud to associate themselves with Labour. I do not know whether that is because there is an anticipated election, but I am gratified at any rate that they wish to deny to other people the right to represent Labour and say that they are doing that. The hon. member (Mr. Martell), while he was very willing to assume his share of the representation of Labour, very definitely dissociated himself from Labour ideals as expressed by organized Labour.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend represent Labour, and does he want to set himself up in this House as a supreme arbiter as to who or who should not represent Labour.

Mr. IRVINE I will allow Labour to say who are to be its representatives, and I do not think that Labour has placed its hand upon the head of the hon. member who has asked the question. I should not have been taking part in this debate but for the fact—

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. member permit me—

Mr. IRVINE: —that the Minister of Labour took occasion to refer to the "conspicuous absence" of the Labour members.

Mr. MARTELL: I represent Labour; you represent socialism.

Mr. IRVINE: The Minister of Labour, I am given to understand, stated that the Labour members were not in their seats, and when some hon. member pointed out that they were in the Banking committee, he passed the remark that the feeding committee was of much greater importance than the Banking committee. I am not quite clear as to the inference that the hon. gentleman would wish us to draw from that remark; but if this is a feeding committee and the Minister of Labour is a member of it, then I have no fear for the committee. I have no doubt he can handle the situation, from the point of view of either Labour or anybody else, quite well as a feeder. If, however, he meant to imply that this comparatively paltry question of margarine is comparable with the great question of finance, then I will leave the famous utterance of the hon. gentleman to the laughter of history.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. IRVINE: I have no objection.

Mr. MARTELL: Does he not think that his reference to the Minister of Labour is akin to the Biblical injunction which he enunciates on Sunday, "Feed my lambs"?

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. IRVINE: I must ask the hon. gentleman to repeat his question, because I did not perceive the humour of it, and there certainly was nothing of any serious consequence about it.

Mr. MARTELL: You do not know anything about Scripture.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. gentleman has been quoting Scripture, I see; I did not know he was quite as modern as that. I have no doubt, however, that he can possibly outquote me, for that matter; I do not often indulge in Biblical quotations myself. Nor do I care what text the hon. gentleman cares to apply to my attitude in this argument. But to return to the point at issue. If the Minister of Labour wished to imply that oleomargarine is of more importance than the question of finance, then I shall simply leave his judgment to the people of Canada. If as an economist, if as a graduate from the ranks of labour organizations, if as a Minister of Labour in a government that came into power as the great Moses that would lead us into the land flowing with milk and honey, the best that the hon. gentleman can give us is oleomargarine, and then tell us that finance does not count, I must be content to leave him to the consequences of his own declaration.

The minister claims to be a representative of Labour, I gather from the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has been putting questions to me. I do not object to his claim; he can make all the claims he desires in that direction. That, however, will not get him very far. I am glad, just at this stage, to note that the minister has come into the House, the hon. gentleman who a moment ago was conspicuous by his absence. The seat which was vacant just now is at this moment filled with the august presence—is that proper, Mr. Speaker?—of the minister himself. Let me inform the minister that I, as a representative of Labour, am more interested in giving to the people real good fresh butter instead of margarine; and if the best that the minister can offer them is this substitute, I am not sure that he will get a very great following from the ranks of labour. I assure him that if he does not change his attitude considerably he will have to grease Labour with something better than oleomargarine.

Mr. PUTNAM: What would you suggest?

Mr. IRVINE: I simply desired to explain how it happened that the Labour members were absent from the House when the minister referred to the fact. This question in itself has nothing more than a passing interest for me. It is not a fundamental question. I do not think it will make a very great deal of difference to Labour whether the minister offers them oleomargarine or not. I have discovered that on all big questions in which Labour interests are really involved the Minister of Labour has not been quite so outspoken as he has been on this comparatively paltry subject. When it comes to a question of protecting the miners of Nova Scotia he sends them guns rather than butter.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. IRVINE: When it comes to a question of economic importance—

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. IRVINE:—such as—

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MARTELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has referred to something that occurred in Nova Scotia, with which he associates the Minister of Labour. I submit that this has nothing to do with oleomargarine, which is the question before the Chair.

Mr. MURDOCK: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) is, unintentionally, of course, misrepresenting the facts, because he cannot instance any situation wherein the Minister of Labour had anything to do with any matter involving a strike in Nova Scotia where soldiers were sent down. I therefore respectfully submit that it is entirely improper for the hon. gentleman to be making representations for the delectation of those who he thinks will agree with him in what he says.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have observed many interruptions in the course of this debate, which after all should be very peaceful.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It is a slippery matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would request hon. members to be good enough to allow the debate to proceed in that peacefulness and tranquillity which we should have every reason to expect. I would also ask the hon. member (Mr. Irvine) who is addressing the House to confine himself more closely to the question at issue. The question has been well put before the House by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) who moved the resolution and by the hon. member who has submitted the amendment (Mr. Kay), and any excursion into a county where any strike may have occurred has nothing to do with it. Any remarks of the kind are irrelevant. I trust that the hon. member will confine himself to the subject matter under consideration.

Mr. IRVINE: I shall endeavour to do so, Mr. Speaker, but I think you will agree with me that, the Minister of Labour having taken occasion to refer to the absence of the Labour members earlier in the evening, I should not be hindered from explaining the reason for their absence.

Mr. BUREAU: The reason has already been given.

Mr. IRVINE: If the Minister of Labour was out of order, then, of course, I am out of order also. But if he was in order, I should think that I ought to be in order in explaining the point he raised. However, I must abide by the ruling of the Chair. I simply wanted to explain that the Labour members were absent because they had been in the Banking committee for six hours. If the government of which the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) is a member was not in such a hurry to put this Bank Act through we could have been here instead of in the Banking committee.

But to come down to the subject of oleo, from which I was led astray by the logic of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the first place, I am not opposed to freedom of trade of any description, nor am I opposed to the manufacture of anything that any person wishes to manufacture. At heart I am a free trader. I do not care what sort of stuff you manufacture or sell so long as the people want to buy it. Therefore in regard to the principle of this question I am going to vote for oleomargarine. But I add this rider: I want to see oleomargarine so marked that these labour men—whom we are all so anxious about to-night—will not be paying for grease under the impression that they are getting butter. Therefore if those who are interested in getting an oleomargarine bill passed will kindly arrange the legislation so that when a labour man sits down in a restaurant and pays for butter he will not be served with margarine, I am prepared to vote for the bill.

That is all I have to say on this most profound economic question, Mr. Speaker. I think we might have settled it much more speedily. There is nothing involved in this simple principle that I can see, and I repeat that while for myself I want to have the privilege of eating butter, I am very much concerned to see such economic conditions prevail in Canada that our labour men will all be able to eat butter, I should like to see the margarine plants starved out simply because they could not sell the grease they are handing out instead of butter, and I appeal to the hon. Minister of Labour to help the Labour members bring about such improved economic conditions. Then he will be in a position to claim that he is a Labour man, which he cannot claim to be at the present time.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in the interests of the dairymen of Canada I think something should be said to place them in the light in which they wish to appear before the public on this question. There is a great deal of misconception as to the attitude of the dairy interests, and I think as president of one of our dairy breed associations I have a fair idea of what they really desire in this connection. I do not think our dairymen are anxious to say to the consumers what they shall or shall not eat. All they are desirous of getting is a fair deal in a matter that vitally concerns their industry.

I believe I can point out what is the real cause of complaint. I think it will be generally agreed that there has been no complaint on the part of the dairy interests over the manufacture of apple butter, peanut butter, maple butter or similar preparations because they each have their own peculiar flavour and are sold entirely on their merits. What dairymen complain of is the unfair competition from oleomargarine, which is made to taste and smell and look like butter—the article which it is aimed to supplant. The dairymen also feel that another element of unfairness in this competition is the respective restrictions applied to the manufacture of these two articles. The law requires that butter must contain pure butter fat to the extent of at least 80 per cent, with not more than 16 per cent of moisture and a small percentage of salt and other natural milk solids. Those proportions may not be varied, and if departed from the butter-maker is liable to prosecution. But on the other hand the manufacturer of oleomargarine may manufacture his commodity from any material he wishes and the only restriction is that it must be approved by a government inspector as being clean and sanitary. The public are not given the formula by which the oleomargarine is made. A large proportion of the ingredients originate outside Canada and are imported practically free of duty, there being a drawback of 99 per cent. The butter-maker is shut out of the country to the south by a duty of 8 cents a pound. Therefore he has to compete in his home market with an article which is imported free of duty.

I was interested in the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). He says he represents a farming constituency, and he added that he did not make known his views before his election, as he was adopted without any questions being asked. I could not help thinking that his was a case of being left on the doorstep for adoption when questions are not usually in good taste.

Something has been said in the course of this debate about settling this question once for all. I submit that this cannot be done, for there is nothing to prevent a resolution or a bill being introduced next session to provide for, or to prohibit, the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine.

This question may be considered from two points of view. We have heard a good deal about the relative values of butter and margarine from the health standpoint. I have noticed particularly that those who claim oleomargarine to be a wholesome product adduce nothing in support of their statement. I have yet to learn of any investigations either in this country or outside that have not shown conclusively that oleomargarine bears no comparison to butter as a life-giving food. I was interested in the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), in the course of which he quoted an authority to the effect that there were certain vitamines present in milk or butter which were not to be found in the product of the slaughter-house. I think his statement ran something like this: He did not understand that nature would be so partial as to distribute these vitamines freely to the dairy cow and have them entirely wasted in the steer. Well, I need only remind the hon. member that the steer is not entirely a product of nature.

From the standpoint of health we have had many investigations and experiments made, all of which go to show that in food value oleomargarine is so far inferior to butter that it can scarcely be compared with it at all. As something has been said about this question being viewed from the women's standpoint, let me quote from the remarks of one who is regarded as an authority on the subject; I refer to Dr. Margaret Patterson. Summing up this question she states:—

> Which do we want in Canada—health for the many or wealth for the few? When one sees the question in writing it looks too foolish to be regarded seriously; yet as a people we act as if we were more interested in producing a few foreign millionaires than in giving our Canadian children a chance to grow into strong, healthy citizens. We have long since accepted the truism "that every child has the right to be as healthy as knowledge can make it." The knowledge gained in the research laboratories has shown us that milk (whole milk) is an absolute necessity for proper development, both physical and mental, of the child, yet we allow the importation and sale of substitutes for dairy products.

Reference has also been made to the manufacture and consumption of oleomargarine in Denmark. Attention has been called to the fact, too, that when its use was very general in war time, considerable difficulty was experienced through illness of children and it was found that the only way to effect a cure was to have a resumption of the diet of butter fat. I would like to mention one more experiment that was not referred to either last session or this in the progress of the discussion on this subject—one that comes closer home. It is from the same authority that I formerly quoted, and it says:

An indisputable demonstration of the necessity of butter to the growing child was given us quite near home. It was during the war, when both as a matter of patriotism and economy, oleomargarine often replaced butter. In an orphanage for boys the board ladies decided to reduce expenses, and also save butter to be sent overseas, by serving the boys in the orphanage oleomargarine. Shortly after the butter was stopped there was a great deal of illness. The children seemed to have no resistance and contracted every disease with which they came in contact. The teachers began to complain that the children were not making progress in their work as they had previously done and were restless and inattentive. The nurse also noted that the increase in weight had either stopped or very markedly decreased. The doctor made careful inquiry and when he learned of the butter substitute he at once thought that this was the cause. But he could not make the board ladies believe this, for they had heard a lecture on the food value of oleomargarine. They had even heard a doctor say that it contained more calories to the ounce than butter, therefore the theories of the orphanage doctor were all wrong. Fortunately, the doctor had been keeping abreast with the findings of the research workers. He asked the ladies to allow him to provide butter at his own expense for the boys in one of the cottages. This he was allowed to do, and in the course of a few weeks the difference was so marked that even the board ladies were convinced and the supporters of oleomargarine will find no market for their product in that school.

But you say: Does not the importation of oleo keep the price of butter from soaring away beyond the reach of the labouring people? I believe it has the opposite effect. It tends to spoil the market for our home dairy product. It is not fair to ask our farmers—

Mark you, this is from a woman not engaged in farming.

It is not fair to ask our farmers with dairy cows to compete with the product of the American slaughterhouses, nor can we expect our Canadian farmers to keep up an expensive dairy herd unless they are assured of a home market for their produce. When we educate our people to the value yea, the absolute necessity of plenty of milk and butter in the daily diet, we will have a constant demand for the products of the dairy farm. This will ensure an abundant supply. The question of demand and supply always regulates the price. When the farmer is sure of a market for all he can produce he will produce more and at a reduced cost. The price of butter will be lowered to the consumer. Butter is cheap food at any price, for it contains that which is essential to health, and which money cannot buy as a separate product.

This is the opinion not of the dairy interests but of a noted lady physician in the city of Toronto who has the welfare of growing children and the rising generation at heart. What she points out is the result of investigation.

A great deal has been made of the argument that we should not say what a man should eat or drink. But we must confess that we are saying it by legislation all the time. There are many countries in which articles of food that we ban are in common use. We believe that horse meat is not fit for food, but there are some countries in which this form of meat is very largely consumed by the people. I presume it might at least be considered fit to eat if the horse had been in good condition and free from disease, but we in Canada do not recognize it as wholesome food for the people; therefore we say that this form of meat must not be offered for sale. Now, we could argue on behalf of the man who came from a foreign country and who wished to partake of his favourite article of diet, as our friends argue on behalf of oleo, that parliament has no right to forbid that man from having the food to which he has been accustomed and which, in his case, has proved to be wholesome. So that considered from the standpoint of health we have a perfect right at least to give the benefit of the doubt to the consumer, especially to the children, in an effort to protect them as far as possible by giving them the most wholesome product we have at our disposal. If there is to be any doubt, let us err on the side of safety.

A great deal has been said about the poor man in this connection. I have personally asked a good many questions on this point, and I have yet to hear of anyone who was pleading for the poor man and his family who would admit that he used oleo for himself. It is always a case of someone giving advice for the benefit of the other fellow. It is very much like the argument of those who say, "Go back to the land;" they always want the other fellow to go back. In my own experience we have not had any complaints from labouring men or poor people; we have not had any requests from them for the continuance of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. We have had complaints from the lumber interests and from the Retail Merchants' Association. It has been claimed that the manufacture of oleomargarine is on such a small scale that it does not affect the dairy interests. But I believe that once the oleomargarine interests were assured that they would not be disturbed they would quickly take steps to put the business on a very dangerous competitive basis. In a local town, where dairying is the chief industry, oleomargarine has practically for the first time made its appearance in the local stores. It was featured very strongly in window displays and I asked the proprietors why this was done. Invariably the answer was that they would make a larger profit for themselves in handling oleomargarine; therefore they were pushing the sale of it. In other words, the profits allowed them were greater than they could obtain in the sale of butter.

I am not going to express an opinion as to what should be done as the result of promises. But I believe I can say this, representing the dairy interests, that it was generally understood by the dairymen that if they submitted to this as a war measure it would be regarded as a temporary measure only. Rightly or wrongly they have come to that conclusion and they have been waiting with a good deal of patience for the time when abnormal conditions would be considered as safely past and they would again have possession of the home market that they are so well fitted to supply. The statement has been made that if it was in the nature of a promise the present government could not be expected to carry out promises made by the former one. I have nothing to say regarding that, except that the present government might well take a little warning from the experience of the former one. Whether a promise was made or not, let us consider it from this point of view: It has been amply brought to our attention in this House that the present condition of farming is anything but rosy, and especially is that true of dairy farming. We have a large staff in our agricultural colleges, and we have heard a good deal in various parts of the country, as well as in this House, urging people to take up dairy farming, because it returns more fertility to the soil, enables the employment of more labour and is generally the most satisfactory method of farming. With all of that I can quite agree.

There is no use encouraging an industry unless you can provide a market for its output. We must admit that the condition of European countries is not now such as to enable them to buy the amount of exports we would like to send them, and the home market has been invaded by many of these countries. We are therefore faced with the problem of finding a market for what we produce at present, rather than of how to encourage greater production. Even if oleomargarine only displaces butter to the extent of four or five million pounds a year that is a market well worth catering to, and the money invested and the thousands of men and women engaged in the dairy industry should be sufficient I think for this House to have some concern for its welfare. It it comes to a choice between encouraging an industry based on importations from tropical or foreign countries and encouraging an industry at home, surely there can be only one answer from this House.

If we consider this question from the health standpoint, if we are to believe the results of investigations so far, there is no question as to the advisability of feeding our Canadian boys and girls butter in preference to oleomargarine. I will go further and make this statement, that if the food values of the two are carefully analyzed it will be found that at present prices, although oleomargarine can be bought cheaper, a dollar's worth of butter contains very much more food value than a dollar's worth of oleomargarine. Because the competition of oleomargarine is unfair, for it trades on the reputation of butter, because I believe it is in the interests of this country to encourage our people in the use of the best product and because the condition of the dairy industry is such that it needs every encouragement we can possibly give it, I have only one choice and that is to oppose, as at present regulated, the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine in every legitimate way.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): As a representative of a rural constituency wherein the dairy industry is of great importance I wish to give a few explanations before I cast my vote. On the other hand I also wish to give the assurance to the House that my remarks will be very brief. This debate has been long, and I could add very little to what has been said.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that most of the speakers who have addressed the House have treated this question as being one where high principles are at stake. I do not think that any high principle is at stake in this matter. The question is very simple, and should be treated in a very simple way: Should butter be preferred to oleomargarine? In my opinion good fresh butter should be given the preference.

We are told that we cannot vote in favour of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) without being considered high protectionists. That argument was made by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). But how can that argument be seriously put forward? How can it be high protectionist to support an amendment that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) is opposing? Is there a man in this House who can be considered more of a protectionist than the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition? He has fought for protection since his entry into this House. He has fought for protection on the floor of parliament whenever the occasion has arisen, and to-day therefore can I be considered a protectionist if I vote the other way from him?

Another argument which has been brought forward is that by voting for this amendment we interfere with the freedom and liberty of the citizens of this country. Can this argument be seriously considered, Mr. Speaker, when it is brought forward by the hon. gentleman, for instance, who represents Swift Current (Mr. Lewis), who is a strong prohibitionist? Is it interfering more with the liberty of the citizen to prevent him from eating oleomargarine, which may be most unhealthy, than it is to prevent him from drinking beer or wine if he wishes? I say that these arguments have nothing to do with the question. It is not a matter of protection; the attitude of the leader of the Opposition proves it. It is not a matter of the liberty of the citzens of this country; the attitude of the hon. member for Swift Current proves it.

It has been said that the dairy industry is of great importance. I do not wish to add to the arguments which have been brought forward in support of this industry. It is an important industry, and it should grow every year in Canada. I am quite sure that every member of this House will give to that industry the encouragement that it deserves. An argument was brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) this afternoon that struck me particularly. The amendment mentions that we should revert to the condition of things as it existed before the order in council was passed under the War Measures Act. The hon. Minister of Finance said that parliament was in no way bound by acts or orders in council passed by former governments or by former parliaments. With all due modesty, with all due respect for the hon. gentleman's opinion on account of his vast parliamentary experience, I say that if there is one thing which is important in Canada it is political consistency. Can one government undo what former governments have done? Can one parliament undo what former parliaments have done? Constitutionally, yes, but as a matter of political expediency, if that course were followed, where would be stability?

Mr. FIELDING: I admit at once that where there is a contract made the government is obligated and must carry it out. That is quite a different thing from an order in council.

Mr. CANNON: If an order in council was passed permitting the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and it was worded in such a way that it told the dairy industry of Canada that the agreement was an agreement with these people for only a short period and that it would not last any longer—

Mr. MEIGHEN: What agreement does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. CANNON: I say that it is an implied agreement. When an order in council is passed saying that such-and-such a thing will prevail for only a limited time, I say there is an implied agreement that that period will not be exceeded. That is the ordinary interpretation to give to plain everyday English.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With whom?

Mr. MURDOCK: Will the hon. gentleman repeat that part?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CANNON: I think the leader of the Opposition had the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was asking the hon. member with whom was the agreement?

Mr. CANNON: The agreement was with no person in particular; it was with the people of Canada in general and especially with the dairy industry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the agreement was with the people of Canada one would think the people through their representatives might release the other party to the agreement.

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt about that. I say that according to our constitution this parliament can undo what a former parliament has done, but should we adopt this attitude of undoing what former parliaments and former governments have done where will be stability in Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: Then we can repeal no legislation?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly we can repeal legislation. I shall give an example to the House. For instance, when the Irish treaty was passed by the Lloyd George government and there was very strong opposition in parliament to it. The people who opposed the Irish treaty were the people who put Lloyd George out of power, nevertheless they respected the treaty that statesman had entered into with the Irish people. That is the way the English constitution is to be interpreted. On the one hand we have the Minister of Finance telling the manufacturing interests of Canada we are going to have a stable tariff. But how can we have anything stable in Canada if on the other hand the same gentleman says in the House that we need not be consistent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion let me say that before the French Revolution there was a class of philosophers who wanted to replace God by nature. Since then we have had the Americans in industry, who wanted to replace nature by chemistry. In Canada we want to stick to nature and the longer we do so the longer we protect the farming industry, the longer we protect the dairy industry and the longer we can hope that Canada will be a happy country.

Mr. GEORGE BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker I would feel more at ease dealing with this question of oleomargarine in my mother tongue, but I believe there are no more converts to be made among the French speaking members of this House. Consequently, I crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House whilst I add my remarks to this debate. The fact that this matter of oleomargarine covered more than seventy pages of Hansard last year, and will cover about the same number of pages this year, renders it hard for a new member to be original on this question. I am glad, however, to raise my voice in this debate and to summarize the reasons which induce me to oppose the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) and to vote in favour of the amendment.

In studying the history of oleomargarine, Mr. Speaker, we find that it was introduced shortly before the Franco-Prussian war, and that in 1870 Mege Mouries was awarded a prize for his invention by Napoleon III. From this it will readily be seen that the introduction of this article of diet was essentially a war measure, and was naturally looked upon with favour at a time when rats were at a premium for eating purposes. At first oleomargarine was made entirely from animal fat, principally fresh beef. Gradually the proportion of animal fat was decreased and replaced by vegetable fats such as cocoanut oil, cohune oil, cotton seed oil, kapok oil, and sometimes by fish oil.

An hon. MEMBER: Coal oil. Whale oil.

Mr. BOUCHARD: That is why we have to be selfish and protect ourselves against the oleomargarine. These oils are transformed into hard fats by a process known as hardening, or hydrogenating. This is accomplished by treating liquid oil with hydrogen in the presence of a catalytic agent, such as nickel, or its oxides, or salts, or other agents. It is generally agreed that a small quantity of the catalytic agent often remains in the finished product. Practically all oleomargarine is emulsified in skim milk or in cream, in order to give it the flavour of butter. In considering any article of diet, its nutritive value is a most important factor. Any food to be efficient must not only provide heat and energy but must also promote growth. Recent researches in nutrition have demonstrated that certain elements known as vitamines are essential to promote growth. These same researches show that while butter contains a very high percentage of these essential vitamines, oleomargarine is almost entirely, if not wholly, deficient in them. From this we may logically deduce that compared with butter, so far as its nutritive value is concerned, oleomargarine is an inferior article of diet. In this connection, I may well quote the following from Dr. McCollum's book entitled "The Newer Nutrition," which is recognized as an authoritative treatise on this subject.

> The vegetable fats and oils such as olive oil, cottonseed oil, peanut and cocoanut oils, although good energy yielding foods, do not furnish this dietary essential. The body fats of animals such as lard, beef fat, etc., are not important sources of the fat-soluble A.

Practically all of McCollum's findings have been endorsed by the Lister Institution of Great Britain and the British Medical Research Committee. I would not like to tire the House with the quotation from Dr. McGill's statement as the hon. mem-12 m. ber for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) has already given it. This all tends to prove, however, that in the last analysis, nature has endowed the cow with the best process for producing good edible fat.

The supporters of this resolution have given the impression that the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine is a benefit to the poorer classes. This argument is poorer than the poor to whom it refers. No one in this House I am sure has more sympathy for the poor than I have, being one of a large family brought up on a small farm where the conditions were very hard and where many sacrifices were necessary to secure my education. I know by experience the meaning of privation. If cheap food is required for poor people, as undoubtedly it is in many cases, why should we not induce them to eat raw materials similar to those from which the oleomargraine is derived such as good refined lard or good oils, both of which are just as nourishing and almost twice as cheap as oleomargarine. "Poor people" they say, and yet by legislation they would invite them to pay a tribute of 10 cents to 20 cents a pound tc manufacturers and distributors of oleomargarine. "Poor people"—this sounds well at first, but would it not be better if the poor people, instead of getting two pounds of oleomargarine, bought one pound of lard and one pound of genuine butter for about the same amount of money?

"Poor people!" and we are to make them and the country poorer by legalizing the sale of a food so evidently deficient in vitamines. If any class of people requires good butter, full of vitamines, it is surely the poorer class who have not the means to indulge in fresh green vegetables all the year round, and whose staple article of diet in the winter time is potatoes which, as hon. members know, are very deficient in vitamines and many other things.

The statement has been made that the competition of oleomargarine with butter would tend to keep down the price of butter. When we consider, however, that our Canadian butter has to compete on the world's market, the weakness of this argument will at once be realized. As a matter of fact, if the Canadian supply of butter was insufficient to meet the needs of the home market—a condition of affairs which would naturally tend to raise the price—New Zealand or some other butter producing country would soon send its products to Canada and this would reduce the price at once.

Let us now glance at the history of legislation concerning oleomargarine in Canada since 1886, when this question was first discussed. From that date until 1917, oleomargarine was absolutely excluded from the Canadian market. In 1903, the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet, reiterated the viewpoint of the government on this subject.

Following this, in 1914, the Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture when the Conservative party was in power, took exactly the same stand, and in the debate which was aroused he made the following statement:

> I am not saying that oleomargarine is not a wholesome product to eat but if you allowed the sale of a substitute looking exactly like butter although not made of the same ingredients you would have a tremendously large staff of inspectors to prevent men from selling it as butter. They have had a great difficulty in the United States over that, and I believe the general opinion of this country would be against it.

Of course at that time there was not much question of the vitamines. In 1917, however, an order in council was passed, and as this order in council has been fully quoted, I would call the attention of the House just to the following words:

> Such regulations to be in force and to have effect for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue. . . . and as a war measure only.

That is, we see that oleomargarine was invented as the result of a war, and was also introduced into Canada under similar circumstances. Thus doth history repeat itself.

When the division comes on this resolution, the responsibility for saying whether the promise made to the farmers of Canada in 1917 was only another scrap of paper or not, rests with the hon. members of this House. My Progressive friends will readily agree with the statement that agriculture is the backbone of the economic structure of this country, and that dairying is one of the most important parts of the agricultural industry. It is recognized that this industry must be developed upon a much larger scale, and this has already been pointed out by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and other hon. members. How can we expect, however, that prospective investors will put money into an industry over which there hangs such a sword of Damocles as is represented by the unfair competition of an inferior substitute for butter?

It may be said that this is only another form of protection; but my Progressive friends have already admitted, in principle, that growing industries need protection, and when we consider the highly specialized state of the dairy industry in New Zealand, Denmark, Holland, we cannot do otherwise than admit that here in Canada, this industry is still in its infancy. Admitting this principle, let us begin by protecting our basic industry, an industry which should appeal to you as it does to me, as l'industrie par excellence. Let me quote a statement which I read recently:

> The decline in dairying, an industry which more than any other farming industry maintains best our soil fertility, would have an unfavourable effect upon farm practice in all sections where dairying is now practised and extending.

If this resolution is carried, and a law permitting the importation and manufacturing of oleomargarine is placed upon the statute books, the door will be opened for numberless frauds. In this connection let me quote from the Journal of Agriculture, Quebec, under date of July, 1917:

> The question of controlling the manufacture and sale of margarine involves so much, a small army of inspectors would be required. Even then frauds will be numerous. In England, where, I think, they usually observe laws perhaps better than we do, there are two cases of prosecutions weekly for offences against the Margarine Act.

I would not have hon. members infer from this that every manufacturer and importer of oleomargarine would sell his product for other than what it is; but it must be remembered that much of the margarine wihch is sold goes to boarding houses, lumber camps, and so forth, where workmen are boarded and where they are supposed to be given butter.

In conclusion, and before resuming my seat, let me emphasize again the following points: First, that oleomargarine is a very inferior substitute for butter, and while possibly deceiving the eye, the palate, and even the stomach, will never deceive the physical nature, and especially that of our children who will be unable to find in it the vital elements of real food; secondly, that its importation and manufacture have been prohibited by all previous governments; and that it is a real menace to the development of the dairying industry.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I will not detain the House, Mr. Speaker; I promise to introduce no arguments that have been advanced by any other member, which at this stage of the game will be a somewhat difficult undertaking. I wish for a moment to deal with the position of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). He told us that he represented a dairy constituency; that his views—shall I say his sinister views?—on the oleomargarine question had not been put before the electors prior to his election; that he had not put them before those people since, but that he intended to carry out those views, as he believed in them, without any regard to his constituents. Now, I think I can best leave the electors of the county of Kent to deal with that situation.

I have seen in another House a member coming from an election where he did not have to fight for his seat and proclaiming in that House his indifference, his aloofness, his absolute independence of the men that presumably had sent him there. I have seen more than one man do that, but I have never seen the same man do it more than once. I think it is Solomon who describes this situation somewhat aptly. He says:

> There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is death.

I am sorry that the minister devoted so much time to a consideration of this agricultural question, with which he is evidently only imperfectly acquainted. I do not, of course, blame him for that ignorance because the matter does not come within the scope of his ministry. It is regrettable, however, nevertheless, that he spent so much time on the subject, because there is a field that opens directly in his own department which presents a much larger scope of undeveloped territory demanding instant attention. There was a pledge, we are told, in connection with oleomargarine; there was also a pledge in connection with labour. In the Treaty of Versailles, and confirmed by labour conventions later on, there was a very definite pledge given to labour, by virtue of and in reward for their services during the war, that a certain definite schedule of labour reforms would be aimed at, and carried out at the earliest possible moment. Canada was one of the signing parties to the agreement, and that was five years ago. So far as I know, not a single iota, jot or tittle or these reforms have been carried out in this country. So that this is a matter that presents great scope for a man of the energy of the Minister of Labour, without his delving into these remote subjects of more strictly agricultural concern.

Now, there is no need for me to go into the merits of the case, and I do not propose to do so, especially seeing that I spoke at great length on the subject last year, and in view of the fact that the amendment of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) has limited the discussion entirely to the question of a pledge given and the desire to fulfil that pledge now. I can only say, in order to save time, that I entirely and heartily endorse the stand taken, first by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), and secondly, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It would be painting the lily and adorning the rose for me to try to add anything to the able way in which those hon. gentlemen have dealt with the subject. There is no question that the pledge was given. The conditions have passed away and now the time has come —in fact, it has long since passed—when that pledge should be fulfilled.

The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) stressed to some extent the point that the order in council was of a temporary character, and he indicated that the government of that day only had power to pass, under the War Measures Act, legislation for a temporary purpose. That, no doubt, is true. But the order in council went further than that, for it not only took certain action but it specifically stated that there would be a time when the suspension of the prohibition would cease to take effect. Not only did it say when that suspension would cease; it even went to the trouble and the precision of defining the body who would decide when this condition had arrived; the conclusion of the period of suspension was to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council. It is true that the order in council no longer exists; we are aware of that. But the temporary character of its enactment was carried on into legislation, because we find the word "temporary" apears in the title of the act into which the order in council was later crystallized.

I desire for a moment to turn to a consideration of the stand taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who asked us more than once, when or where a pledge would end. He told us that a government had no business, or was not bound—I think that was the precise word—to carry out the undertakings of its predecessors. While that is technically true, it is so only in a very limited sense. There is no doubt the government of to-day can cancel the laws of yesterday; they can cancel their own laws. But a government cannot cancel contracts without providing some compensation therefor. That is the difference between changing a law with the consent of parliament and cancelling a contract or repudiating a pledge, legally or even morally given, with all its obligations. The Minister of Finance asked us again and again, when does a pledge end? I think the answer is obvious: a pledge ends when it is fulfilled. A promise ceases when it is carried out. Let us consider a few illustrations.

Any hon. member of this House who has been under the necessity of pawning his watch in a case of temporary financial embarrassment will understand what I mean. This experience has never occurred to me, because in the many periods of my financial disability I have never had a watch worth pawning. But one can realize if he did find himself in that position, that he would not get his watch back until the pledge was redeemed in the ordinary way. Or take a more business-like illustration—a mortgage, say. I am speaking now of a hypothetical case under British Columbia law, which follows the English law, and may or may not be different from the law in the province of Quebec. In a mortgage, the outstanding feature, the gravamen, is personal obligation. There is a phrase indicating a promise to pay to So-and-So the sum borrowed. That is the centre, so to speak, of the mortgage. Of course, the bondage of the land is also valuable, but that is only as collateral security, and if that security diminishes in value and does not realize the amount of the mortgage, then a personal obligation rests upon the man who borrowed the money to repay it out of whatever other funds he may possess. In other words, his pledge continues until he has paid back the money. The same thing is true in reference to a note. I am not aware that our note wears out like a suit of secondhand clothes, if you have it long enough. There is, it is true, a statute of limitations with regard to debts. But who would suggest that we should invoke the statute of limitations in connection with the moral or legal obligations of a government?

I think the example cited by the hon. member for Missisquoi was a very good one, that is, in connection with the British government. The case there was even stronger than it is here. In the matter of the removal of the embargo on cattle, the British government had no order in council that could bind them; they had no legislation that could compel them to do what they did. It was a simple fulfilment of a promise given by a British statesman across the table to a Canadian statesman. But the British government made good on it. The British government did not want it, the people did not want it, and they held an election on it and said, "We do not like it, it is going to hurt us"—they thought it would at any rate—"but we have made a promise and we must stick to it." For my part I am proud to be associated with a government and a parliament that will follow the very best traditions of British public men in this regard.

I should like to say a word regarding the Progressive party in this House—not by way of commendation, Sir, for that would be presumptuous on my part, but the man on the outside sometimes sees conditions from a somewhat different angle to that from which they are viewed by those immediately concerned. I do not think that up to date the party has done anything that will strengthen them more in the confidence and esteem of the country than by the action they have indicated they are going to take on this measure to-night. It will be years before they will have a very great—shall I say?—clientele outside the farmers. It is to the farmers of the country that they must look in the first place. They have been accused in the past of being one-sided, parochial, short-sighted, but the action they intend to take to-night, as expressed by the leader of their party and by many of those who follow him, will show that they are capable of taking a broad, national view of this subject, and as a consequence they will secure the esteem and support of farmers from one end of Canada to the other—the first occasion I think on which they have received it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEILL: Well, at any rate I am sure that this action will be favourably received from one end of Canada to the other and will materially increase the standing of the party in the country. I am safe in saying that. They have deserved the name which is given to them of the National Progressive party, for their attitude shows that they have taken a national and also a progressive view in the best sense of the word in regard to this subject. I have criticized them in the past, and therefore I am glad to be able, on behalf at least of the dairy farmers of my constituency and, I believe, of British Columbia generally, to thank the National Progressive party for the stand they are taking to-night.

Referring to the original motion moved by my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll), I think hon. members will find that if they look at the amendment introduced by my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Kay), which I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition described as clumsy, they will find I think that it is clear-cut and distinct, for it indicates exactly what is proposed to be done under it. But let me refer for the moment to the original motion. You will find there a strange confusion of ideas. In the first half dozen lines it provides that despite certain acts—and it is quite proper to express it in that way—such and such shall happen, that the offering for sale and so on of oleomargarine shall henceforth be permitted. So far as that goes you understand clearly the position. It says, in defiance of certain acts to the contrary, that henceforth the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine shall be permitted. Had it stopped there it would have been intelligible, but the motion goes on to say, "subject to the provisions of the said Oleomargarine Act." Well, the said Oleomargarine Act—there is only one, which has been extended from time to time—says that oleomargarine shall go out of business on the 31st day of August. So while in the early part of the motion the hon. gentleman expresses a determination that its sale and manufacture shall henceforth be permitted, he also says that it shall be "subject to the provisions of the said act." If it is subject to such provisions, the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine will automatically cease on the 31st August. Had the hon. member put in the words, "in other regards" or "subject otherwise to the provisions of the act," that would have expressed a different meaning. But as it stands the motion is vague and confusing and ultimately binds the government to nothing and is in sharp contrast with the distinct meaning which is expressed by the amendment.

The hon. member who introduced that motion has, as we all know, a high legal standing in his profession. He is a man of repute in his profession, and we all know his ability as we have seen it expressed in this House—and I am not saying this in sarcasm at all, I am speaking the sober truth. However, believing that as I do, it is impossible for me to so impugn the hon. gentleman's motive as to suggest that he drew that amendment wrongly by accident, blunder or incompetence. While it might be in order for me to so assume, I do not believe it is justified by what we know of his ability and his reputation. Therefore I think I am justified in concluding that he drew it in that way of deliberate intent; and, if so, I am pleased to say that I am proud of his action in that regard. If he did so of deliberate intent, why then he put that abortive, or at least non-effective, resolution on the order paper presumably to stop other resolutions that might be more effective, and he has taken this method to show—and I honour him for it—that the Swift Company of Chicago have overdone their lobbying in this House and he has shown this House I hope that he possesses —and I always thought he did— a rugged independence that would never allow him by any means to be put in a position where it might be suggested he was the man Friday of any alien corporation in the States or anywhere else. Now, I have sat in this House for over four months and watched with a good deal of interest and a certain amount of disgust the persistent lobbying in this House of these alien interests from Chicago. They have camped in the galleries, they have haunted our rooms, they have slept on our doorsteps, so to speak, and one of their main arguments has been their desire to give the poor workingman of Canada a wholesome food at a cheap price. I have sometimes wondered when I have seen the lobby that is carried on whether, if they succeed in establishing oleomargarine permanently in Canada, that poor workingman would not ultimately have to pay the price of this lobby, because you can easily conceive that when conditions are such that there are only two companies allowed to manufacture oleomargarine in Canada it would be easy, once its manufacture was permanently established, to so manoeuvre and manipulate prices that the cost of this extensive lobby would be amply repaid out of the pockets of the poor workingmen for whom the Swift Company of Chicago profess to take such an altruistic interest. I have sometimes wondered when I have seen all this going on whether it was these paid lobbyists or whether it was we ourselves who took the oath of office when we came down here that we would act in the best interest of our constituencies and the country. It is not they who took the oath, it is we. We have got to answer to our God so far as our oath is concerned, and to our constituents for the pledges we made before election and since. Therefore I would suggest that we throw aside all these paid arguments and address ourselves to the consideration of this subject animated only by the oath we took and the pledges we gave that we would one and all of us legislate in the best interests—putting it on the lowest basis—of our constituents. If we do that I think the aggregate result will also be in favour of the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to submit to the House that the amendment which has been proposed serves rather to becloud and sidetrack the real issue. I think this issue ought to be faced, and it might as well be faced now as at any time. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Shaw:

That the amendment be amended further by adding thereto the following words:

"and that the government do before the end of the present session submit to parliament such legislation in the premises as may be deemed advisable."

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman intend to speak on this sub-amendment?

Mr. GOOD: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have not much to say further. In my judgment it is necessary and desirable that the real question we have in the back of our minds be settled before the end of this session. If the first amendment which is now before the House should carry, it will leave the whole matter in the air. The government may choose to do nothing. I do not think it is desirable that the government should be enabled to simply sit tight. I think the issue ought to be faced and decided, and it is for the purpose of bringing the matter to a head in that way that I move this further amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the sub-amendment. Those in favour of the sub-amendment will please say "aye."

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I was about to rise before this amendment was proposed, and I was about to say that I did not like the amendment. I do not like its head; I do not like its body, and now that it has got a tail I do not think that it is improved thereby.

My intention in rising was to make a word or two of explanation, because I intend to vote against the amendment, and now against the amendment to the amendment. I think it is always easier to make an explanation before one votes than afterwards. I do not envy the position of some hon. members who will have to explain themselves afterwards. I do not wish to impute any motives to those who are responsible for this amendment or who support it, but I have observed certain things in the debate that have raised questions in my mind. For instance, I have thought that some of the hon. members have been supporting the amendment from purely humanitarian motives, a kind of inverted Benthamism, the least good for the least number. Now, I do not take very much stock in humanitarian arguments on economic questions. I think that all good economics, all just economics, are fundamentally humanitarian and that you do not need to be continually dragging in the widow and the orphan and the poor workingman. I have a great deal of respect for the poor workingman and the widow and the orphan, but for the purpose of rational discussion it might be just as well if we abolished them. I think we could even afford to bury them in wool or, perhaps still better, in butter, I do not, as I say, take any stock in that kind of argument. We hear it frequently in discussions of questions of this kind but I do not think it deceives anybody.

Now, another thing occurred to me, I hope I am not going out of my way to impute motives, but it seemed to me that this amendment was not so much an amendment as a convenient sand-hill in which political ostriches might hide their heads for the time being, until somebody made a definite move in the matter. It seems to me that everybody is waiting for somebody else to declare himself on this question. I do not know whether or not this is general, but it is a type of procedure which I personally object to. I think hon. members ought to be willing to say "no" or "yes" to the motion on the order paper without all this seeking of convenient refuges and putting it up to somebody else to take the first step in the matter.

Then, again I have thought that perchance some moralist had invented this amendment in order that the sanctity of pledges might be observed. I think that pledges from parliament to parliament ought to be observed and held in veneration, and also pledges from one party to another. That is, pledges of governments or parties when in power and out of power ought to be held sacred, too. If we are going to talk about pledges let us talk about pledges per se—in themselves. I do not think there is a great deal in the moralistic side of this argument. I cannot persuade myself that there is much sincerity in it. I do not think this parliament is greatly concerned in the keeping of pledges. I cannot say that any hon. gentleman sitting opposite can claim to be specially interested in the sanctity of pledges. There have been those who have referred to this amendment as a piece of protection for the farmers, and I honour the frankness of the hon. gentlemen who take that position, because I think it is the only straightforward position to take. I am standing here to-night not as one who is a hard and fast believer in consistency. I do not draw that distinction between expediency and principle which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) does. For instance; I believe that expediency is principle, or a kind of principle. It all depends on how you use it. If you use it openly and with a declared purpose and without any intent to mislead or deceive, I think that is justifiable. I have a great deal of sympathy with some hon. members on my own side of the House who imagine that by prohibiting oleomargarine they are doing a service to the cause of agriculture. However, I have been watching this process very keenly, and I hope with some foresight, and it seems to me that the farmers of this country are beginning to nose around the protection trough, they are beginning to sniff around it. They have seen other people in it for fifty years and they have been shoved aside or have been persuaded to keep aside. But to-night the farmers of Canada, it seems to me, are beginning to see the attractions of that trough and some of their old time prejudices are being held less firmly than before. Will any man stand up in this House and say that they are to be blamed for that, that they are swallowing their principles? Why, what are principles for but to be swallowed:

> A marciful Providunce fashioned us holler
> O' purpose thet we might our principles swaller.

It is not the swallowing that is wrong; it is the inopportune time that we choose to swallow. This is a very opportune time for the farmers to swallow their principles, because they will go down very easily with oleomargarine—or butter. I want to point out this, and I hope I do not need to point it out because everybody with his eyes open will have seen it before now, that the farmers of this country are of the same flesh and blood as farmers elsewhere in the world, and we have seen the British farmer go to his government with the plea for protection; we have seen the United States farmer go to his government with the plea for protection, and we have seen the Canadian farmer to-night not exactly asking the government for protection but just hovering around and trying to hint to the government that they would like some protection if they dared give it to them. That is the position. Now where are we coming to? We are coming to this position; we are just beginning to get in the thin end of the wedge and by and by you are going to have a Farmers' party in Canada that will be one hundred per cent protectionist. They will all be in the trough then.

Mr. HALBERT: Never.

Mr. BIRD: You are getting in it to-night, those who are going to vote for this amendment. I am laying down lines of logic, and those who say "never" will be up against something in the future. I am not speaking against any gentleman in the Farmers' party to-night who thinks he ought to vote against oleomargarine to protect the farmers' interests. That is what we are all coming to. For fifty years the farmer has been wedded to a theory, and where has it got him? He trusted to a free trade party to bring him relief, and where has that got him? The farmers of Canada cannot afford to go on for another fifty years on the same principle. They must have something more to live on than simply professions. I was wondering to-night how much difference it would have made to this debate if someone could have given us an authoritative definition of what a dairyman is. Supposing Mr. Speaker could have settled for this House what a dairyman is. Is it the man that milks the cow, or the man that milks the man that milks the cow? That is what we are up against to-night, and that is why all the parties are divided because they do not know whether they are supporting the farmer or the manufacturer, and we are slithering around all over the place on this question of oleomargarine simply because we do not know whom we are supporting.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Speak for yourself.

Mr. BIRD: I am speaking for myself and I think I am speaking for a good many more too, if they would only get up and say so.

Some hon. gentlemen are very eloquent from their seats in this House, but we rarely see them on their feet to express their opinions. I foresee the time, and you can judge whether I am speaking ironically or not, when this party here will have lost all the faith they ever had in the free trade party in this country. I do not think they have lost it all yet. We are still hoping we will get some support from the free trade party in this country, but our faith has been badly shaken and I think it has pretty nearly got to the vanishing point. What are we going to do? There is a party at the other end of this House, the high protectionist party, and what are we going to do when he have lost faith in the party across the way? We are going to turn to this party at the other end. We are all going to be high protectionists. We are going to turn to them and say: "Get out a scheme, you protectionists, and you manufacturers' associations, and come and hold conferences with the long-suffering farmers of Canada and see if we cannot get some remedy for the position we have been in for the last fifty years. We have to do something. We cannot live in a vacuum. We have got to have actual benefits." That is economics. We are not here to prate about theories or anything of that kind. You cannot live on theories. Who is the theorist in this House anyway? Who is the expedient man in this House? Why I was amazed today and I rubbed my eyes when in another place I saw a high protectionist quoting Adam Smith as a sound economist. I thought that was about the furthest I could get, but to-night I rubbed my eyes again when I saw sound free traders advocating high protection, and protection as somebody has said, in its worst form, but I would say in its most naive form. It reminds me of the story of the deputation of orange growers that went to McKinley to get a duty on bananas. He said, "We do not grow any bananas in America," but the deputation said, "We know that, but we calculate like this: We think if the people get their stomachs full of bananas they will have no room for oranges." That seems to be about the position of the advocates of the elimination of oleomargarine. They seem to be afraid that if the people get their stomachs full of oleo they will not have room for butter. I say that is the most naive kind of protection you can think of. Where are we getting to? Our principles are all up in the air together. We are none of us on solid ground, and therefore we have to get together as all sensible men should and try and arrange a practical solution for the difficulties of the dairyman, however you may define him, and for the farmer generally in this country. I am only throwing out a hint to the party to my right. I leave it to them to work it out as best they can.

One hon. gentleman said to-night that this was the first time that the Progressive party had ever done right. That is a very significant remark that I would like the members of the Progressive party to think about. It seems to me that is where the confusion of right and wrong comes in. His right is our wrong and our wrong is his right. This is the first time we have done right, which means to our way of thinking, the first time we have ever done wrong.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): I did not intend to delay the House and would not have risen but for some rather remarkable statements which in the last few moments have fallen from the last speaker, the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). From his occupation and training I had hoped for a logical speech; I had expectation of a charitable speech, but as far as any attempt on his part to interpret my reasons for casting the vote I shall give is concerned, he was utterly uncharitable, and therefore I must occupy a few moments to make myself clear.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. gentleman seems to imply that I had some direct implication with regard to himself. I have not heard the hon. gentleman speak.

Mr. PUTNAM: I did not intend to imply that, but I take up his imputation of motives. He professed some lingering faith in the Liberal party and some hope in the Conservative party but he showed an absolute lack of that greatest grace of charity towards many of us who are voting for this amendment from a special reason. The hon. gentleman professes his inability to distinguish a humanitarian from an economic question, and he gave the concrete and instanced or implied that those of us who are voting on this question on the basis of child welfare were not sincere, and he said in terms that only those who approached it from the standpoint of protection for the farmer were doing so with any straightforwardness, or words exactly to that effect. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that two hon. gentlemen in this House the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) and the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), based the major portion of their speeches on the argument of child welfare, and I for one found my information in that regard very much supplemented and buttressed by the excellent speeches of these two honourable members, and I cannot thank the hon. member for Nelson for telling us that the only straightforward vote from those opposed to oleomargarine will be on the part of those who are frankly for protection for the farmer.

I was impressed, Mr. Speaker, with the humanitarian aspect of this question which the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) professes so frankly to ignore. In this country we have rather a unique climate. It is very rigorous in the winter, it is in many parts very severely warm in the summer; and while, for the moment, I cannot recall exact figures it is a tremendously unfortunate fact that infant mortality in Canada is comparatively heavy. That infant and child mortality is heavier in the Canadian cities. I am not going to say that solely because the children in the country have plentiful access to the products of the dairy the mortality there is less. But, Mr. Speaker, that fact stands as a very obvious circumstance in connection with an unfortunate situation. Now while the hon. member for Nelson professes to ignore the humanitarian aspect of this question he has done nothing to dispute, or dispose of, or disprove the statements and the arguments of two or three hon. members of this House who at least did base their case upon the welfare of the little child who cannot even say what is palatable always—the little child of the poor man. That child should have access as freely and openly as possible to products of the dairy during his growing years. It is not disputed that oleomargarine lacks the vitamines which are necessary for the bringing of that child to a healthy maturity. Oh, you may say, he will get them elsewhere, he will get them from vegetables. But let us remember that those fresh vegetables are just the very things that the poor man in the cities cannot always afford, that he gets but a very small quantity, and in many cases none at all. Having regard to the parents of whom these poor children are begotten does it need more than the opinion of a layman to recognize that if it is a bad and an unwholesome thing for the children to be reared without the vitamines of butter, that the parents themselves, getting along on oleo, minus these vitamines, will unfortunately reflect that very deficiency in the life of their little children.

Mr. Speaker, we are confronting a problem as to how we shall get immigrants to this country. I am not going to utter any word of censure or reproof on anything that has been done, but we all know that it would be a valuable asset to raise a good healthy Canadian as compared with importing a foreigner and trying to convert him and educate him in Canadian ways. I believe it is quite within the conception of probability that children of the Canadian poor are dying in our Canadian cities in substantial numbers, or that their health is becoming impaired, because the products of the dairy are not circulated freely enough amongst them. You may tell me "Oh, the poor man may get nothing at all for his children if he does not get oleomargarine." But, Mr. Speaker, we have to look at the question from a sensible basis. In those long years when oleomargarine was prohibited in Canada the child of the poor man did get its butter, and the parents of the poor children yet to be born got their butter. There is tangible argument here that child welfare cries out that oleomargarine should be discouraged because it is a plagiarism of butter; and I for one, though I represent an agricultural community, hope to-night that I am taking higher ground. I most respectfully resent the imputation that the hon. member for Nelson has cast against the vote which I intend to pass. I shall not have the blood or the impaired health of any child crying from the ground because of any vote of mine to-night which might encourage the consumption of oleomargarine and thereby necessarily discourage and lessen the use of butter amongst the children of the poor or amongst the potential parents in the ranks of the poor. With all the goodwill in the world certain women's organizations in the cities of Canada have been working for the permanent recognition of oleomargarine by the law of this country. I must humbly advise them that I consider such propaganda inimical to the ultimate health and life of the children of the poor.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): I rise to a point of order. I do not believe that the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Brant is in order and I would ask for your ruling on the point. Rule 36 provides that when a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it with a view to improving it, or accomplishing some such good purpose. The sub-amendment provides that the government of the day, before the end of the present session, shall submit to parliament such legislation as in the premises it deems advisable. The resolution before the House asks that the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine shall henceforth be permitted; and the amendment of the hon. member for Missisquoi declares that the prohibition respecting oleomargarine was, under the War Measures of 1917, only removed for a certain limited period of time. Now, the only thing necessary in order to carry out the object of the hon. member for Brant is to pass no legislation because I understand that the continuation of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine was permitted only until next August or September. Therefore it is not necessary to bring in any legislation such as is contemplated by the sub-amendment. We do not need to introduce any legislation when the permission given expires in August or September, and it will not be permissible after that time for any person to import, manufacture or sell oleomargarine. I therefore maintain that the hon. gentleman's sub-amendment is out of order.

Mr. GOOD: Does the hon. member think I am proposing this in order that the prohibition shall lapse?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, but you ask the government to bring in a law to enforce the motion made by the hon. member for Missisquoi. I say that is not necessary. You obtain the same result by not bringing in any legislation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to hear the opinion of the House on the point of order.

Mr. GOOD: May I speak to the point of order? I only do so to remove what I think is an entire misapprehension on the part of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). I may say very frankly that I am not in favour of the prohibition of the importation and manufacture of oleo. The hon. member assumed that I was in favour of that, and that it was the reason why I moved the sub-amendment. I may frankly state that my purpose in moving it was to prevent inaction which might result in the automatic revival of the prohibition. I want the matter to be settled. I do not want the government to dodge the issue and to allow the whole thing to drift back again to where it was in 1914.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is arguing the general merits of the question. That is not a point of order; he must speak to the point of order.

Mr. GOOD: Perhaps I was departing a little bit from the point of order, but I wanted to explain the purpose that I had in mind in order to clear up the objection which is raised.

1 a.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: How could that be an amendment to the amendment which does not provide for that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not agree with the amendment, but certainly I see no substance to the point of order. How it can be argued that the amendment is out of order passes me. Let me put it in this way: The amendment calls upon the government to come down to parliament with a bill. The hon. member argues that if the government decide against oleomargarine, they do not need a bill. Such may be the case, but how does that argue against the validity of the amendment? If it were an argument against the validity of the sub-amendment, it would be an argument against the validity of the main amendment. We do not need, for example, to pass any legislation or any resolution to get rid of the present legislation. It dies of itself. The argument would be equally valid against the main amendment, but in my judgment it is equally invalid against both. I argued against the main amendment on the ground that it is a direct negative, and I think it is, although His Houour the Speaker ruled against me; but I submit this is no argument against the validity of the sub-amendment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The question as to the relevancy and regularity of the first amendment was settled by you, Mr. Speaker, and the statement of my right hon. friend on that has no relevancy to the point raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). May says at page 261 on the question of moving a sub-amendment to an amendment:

> Every amendment proposed to be made, either to a question or to a proposed amendment, should be so framed that, if agreed to by the House, the question, or amendment as amended, would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

The effect of the amendment of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) is along the line that no legislation should be passed at all. That is its effect. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) comes along and proposes a sub-amendment which declares that the government should bring down legislation to give effect to the amendment when manifestly and clearly no such thing is possible. Therefore it is a direct negative, and the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant is a direct contravention of the rule I have read and also a similar rule which is laid down by Beauchesne in rule 333 at page 93. To put the matter again, if the House should agree to the proposition of the hon. member for Missisquoi, it declares itself committed to a proposition which involves no legislation being introduced. Then the hon. member for Brant asks the House to stultify itself by declaring that the government, if they deem advisable in the premises, should bring in some legislation to give effect to the amendment. This, of course, would be absolutely absurd, and I cannot see how it would be possible to vote for such an amendment.

Mr. FIELDING: A resolution might be absolutely absurd and yet absolutely in order. The sub-amendment may be absurd—I am not arguing the point at all; I think it is a mistaken amendment—but it is simply adding words to a previous amendment, and although I cannot see any necessity for it, on the pure question of order, I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): To show that the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Brant is out of order, let me say that the main motion is that legislation be introduced. That substantive question is before the House, and surely it cannot be in order to have it again brought before the House in the form of an amendment.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to point out in answer to the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), that the sub-amendment is rather contradictory of the original proposed resolution. The original proposed resolution suggests that legislation should be provided that oleomargarine shall henceforth be permitted. I take it that that means a permanent oleomargarine measure. The government in their wisdom, if acting under the sub-amendment, may bring in legislation looking to a continuance of the permission to manufacture and sell oleomargarine for a year or, perhaps, a longer period.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the amendment to the amendment carried, how would the amendment as amended read? What would be the sense to it?

Mr. FIELDING: The question is not whether there is any sense to it or not; the question is whether or not it is in order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With all deference to the minister, I think it makes sense. The amendment reads, that all the legislation passed, that is, in 1918, should be swept away, in order that the matter will stand as if such legislation had never been passed; that is, in the words of the amendment, that the matter will stand "in the same position as before the enactment of the said temporary suspension." If we were in the same position as before the enactment of the 1918 legislation, we would be free to enact as we liked, and the government would be free to bring in legislation as though previous legislation had never been enacted.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the amendment carried, would any enactment be required?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government would be free to bring in legislation. For the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to say that they cannot do so, is absurd. Further, the amendment to the amendment recommends that this legislation brought in such as the government deems wise. Certainly this makes sense. I am against the sub-amendment, but it is an amendment undoubtedly.

Mr. FORKE: I understand this amendment means that it simply puts the situation back where it was prior to the legislation that made it possible to manufacture oleomargarine. If this amendment is carried, it still remains open for the government to introduce legislation if they see fit. That is the only reason I could find for supporting the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The motions moved appear to be a direct negative of each other from beginning to end. This process started about a week ago on a bill introduced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) followed by a resolution in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) and a further amendment introduced by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay), which was a direct negative. It appears to me that this is another negative. The words used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that the resolution might be absurd but be in order, I think will apply to the whole process. It has been an absurdity from the beginning to the end, and it has been an encroachment upon the privileges of parliament to introduce such a process of shirking responsibility as we have had.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion which was introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) briefly expresses the desire that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine should be made lawful in Canada henceforth. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) expresses the desire that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine should not be made lawful, but that we should revert to the situation in which we were before the order in council granting a temporary suspension of the prohibition was passed. The drafting of this amendment is amply justified by May, pages 253 and 258. It is my authority on the subject. The amendment states that the suspension was but a temporary war measure and that it should now be removed and the question left, without prejudice, as to its merits, in the same position as before the enactment of that temporary suspension.

The prohibition against oleomargarine will be resuscitated, by the simple efflux of time, in a few weeks or months from now. That prohibition might be qualified or it might be complete. The sub-amendment, in my humble judgment, is in order because it asks that before that time shall have arrived the government shall take action and therefore say during the present session what it will do. In other words, the government is directed by parliament to take action not later on in a few weeks or months but now whilst parliament is in session on the proposition submitted in the amendment as moved by the hon. member by Missisquoi (Mr. Kay). I therefore rule the sub-amendment to be logically in order.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have very few words to say in reply; I shall confine my remarks now to a consideration of the order in council passed in 1918. It has been stated that the order in council as drafted contains a pledge to the dairymen of the country that the manufacture of oleomargarine would be prohibited at the close of the war. I say that there is no such pledge in the order in council; no pledge of the kind was intended when that order in council was drafted. The order in council simply conformed to the usual order passed under the War Measures Act of 1914. I believe it was passed in August; and when hon. gentlemen make any assertion of the kind that has been put forward in this debate, they are evidently doing so without having fairly read the order in council and the act based thereon. I was not a member of the House at that time, but I have no doubt in the world that the dairy interests of this country were never approached in the matter, and never approached the government, because I do not think that the government of that day made known to any interests in Canada, dairy or otherwise, any order in council which they intended to pass based upon the War Measures Act of 1914.

Some hon. gentlemen say that for fifty years oleomargarine has been kept out of Canada. Yes, Sir; and for five hundred years the franchise was kept from the people of England, but they ultimately got it; and for sixty-five years responsible government was kept from the Canadian people in some provinces, but they, too, ultimately obtained their right. So that this is no argument whatever against the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada. The manufacture of this butter substitute is not an imposition on anybody in this country; it absolutely is not. On the other hand, it undoubtedly is an imposition on the Canadian people to deprive them of oleomargarine if they desire to have it. You are not imposing on any people in this country by allowing the manufacture of oleomargarine, because you do not compel anyone to eat it or even to have it on his premises. The member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) had a few kind words to say about myself, and no doubt he meant them. But I do resent the latter part of his speech wherein he talks about paid arguments in this House. So far as I am concerned, I want to assure the hon. gentleman that my arguments are not paid for except by the indemnity I receive. And when the hon. member goes on to refer to certain interests staying around doors, I should like him to look around the galleries to-night and say who, apparently, are taking more interest in this matter—the paid servants of the dairy industry, or those whom he pretends to see there, and whom I have not seen, as representing the oleomargarine interests of the country. My hon. friend from Missisquoi in his opening remarks said that I was less belligerent to-day than I was on the last occasion this subject was before the House. I am never very belligerent, Mr. Speaker, but sometimes I am spirited; and I shall continue to be spirited so long as hon. members break the rules of the House by using in reference to myself language which you, Sir, declare to be unparliamentary. Before I sit down, I hope that hon. members will give to this question a fair meed of consideration. If they do, I believe they will vote for the main resolution and against the amendment.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am rather reluctant to crave the indulgence of the House even for a moment. I desire to state, though, that while I agree to the validity of the sub-amendment offered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) I am compelled to oppose it. Did the sub-amendment stand alone, the principle it embodies would receive my support. I feel it is quite consistent with the amendment, and should be added if the amendment is to carry. In other words, if the amendment is a correct statement of fact and principle and goes into effect, it should be followed by action on the part of the government. I cannot support it because it is an addition to and incorporated with the sub-amendment. The sub-amendment I regard as a false statement as the official imprimatur of this parliament, a false implication to the people of Canada. Consequently, no matter what is appended to it, I must vote against it.

Anyone who believes the amendment I cannot understand voting against the sub-amendment. I disbelieve the amendment; I believe it is a subterfuge, admirably described by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) as camouflage. It is only a means of escape from an affirmative or a negative answer to the main motion. The amendment states that assurances were given at the time of the prohibition of oleomargarine that the suspension was but temporary. The implication is that some contractual assurance was given certain persons that at the expiration of the temporary measure parliament would not be free to enact such legislation as it liked. No such assurance was given. Nothing was done save the passing of legislation, first by order in council and subsequently by this House. It is passing strange to me, Mr. Speaker, that this House of Commons, which last year knew everything it knows to-day, which last year knew all that was embodied in the order in council, which last year knew every word of the statute, and which last year felt itself perfectly free to enact a prohibition of oleomargarine or to enact an abolition of such prohibition, should now after twelve months find that it had tied its hands behind its back four years before it deliberated last year. Nobody has ever insinuated that there was anything in the world in the way of an assurance that was not contained in the order in council and in the legislation. We knew of the order in council last year, we knew of the legislation. Then how is it that we felt perfectly free last year, and now we find ourselves fettered and shackled? Really to assert to any person that parliament is not free at the close of temporary legislation to do as it feels right in the interests of the people of Canada is an affront both to its intelligence and to the intelligence of the nation.

I make an appeal to hon. members of this House to face this as we ought to face any situation. Leaving aside the question of government policy—and I think the government should have a policy—the matter is now before parliament. Then let us be honest, do not let us try to escape a clear yes or no under an assertion of an assurance, which assurance never existed. That is my appeal to hon. members. I make no further argument on the main motion or on the question that we ought to get finality. I make an appeal that we sweep aside these subterfuges and get to the question, and that hon. members vote yea or nay upon it. I have stated my position upon it already and I will buttress it by no further argument.

Hon. members who are opposed to oleomargarine, who believe it is bad for the dairy industry and for the nation in general, who think it is going to hurt little children and all the rest of the community, let them sweep away the arguments and push oleomargarine aside. Why should hon. members put this amendment between themselves and oleomargarine? Why does the hon. member whose heart is bleeding for the little children and who thinks they are going to be hurt argue against the merits of oleomargarine behind an amendment of this sort? Is the man who believes that oleomargarine is an unsound food, that it is deleterious to health, that it is condemned by medical authority—is he going to stand up and say that he is not free to express his opinion because of an assurance given by a government or by a parliament five years ago? Could anything be more absurd? Were it not parliamentary I would say: Could anything be more cowardly? I can understand hon. members being opposed to oleomargarine. I am free to admit that I am myself opposed to the unrestricted manufacture and importation of oleomargarine under conditions as they are to-day, and I can understand hon. members being opposed to oleomargarine under any conditions. Such a position may be right; I do not think it is. But I cannot understand hon. members who have opinions upon the subject at all seeking to hide the expression of those opinions and their reflection by a vote in this House behind an amendment which, I repeat, is an affront both to the intelligence of the House and of Canada.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am induced to say a word or two in reply to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who intimated that there was no promise or assurance given the people of Canada or the dairymen except that implied in the order in council. Even if that were so, in addition to the very distinct assurance implied in the order in council, we have the sworn testimony of Mr. Stonehouse, president of the Canadian Dairymen's Association, taken before the Agricultural committee this session, in the course of which he said:

Therefore the expressed—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I regret to say that the hon. minister may not refer to a statement made before a committee unless its report is before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have refrained from taking part in the debate up to the present, but in the face of the statement made by the mover of the resolution with regard to the influence of paid servants of the dairy industry claimed to be in the galleries, I wish to take exception to any implication that I am in any way influenced by any person outside of those I am here to represent. I repudiate any such suggestion, and I am surprised that it should come from the member who moved this resolution, with which I am not in accord.

I have heard something with respect to the order in council which permitted the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. I have a very distinct recollection of the time it was passed and from that time down to the present I have been strongly opposed to the regulations which were issued in pursuance of that order. I have stated repeatedly that I was not opposed to the manufacture and importation under proper regulations, but the regulations which have been in effect are such as have never been in effect in any other country in the civilized world. The manufacturers and importers of oleomargarine have been given a freedom and a liberty such as has obtained in no other country, I care not where you go, and it was for this reason that I have so bitterly opposed the continuation of the permissive legislation.

A year ago we had a lengthy address from the hon. Minister of Agriculture in relation to this matter. He is a practical farmer and realizes the unfairness which was done to those engaged in dairying by reason of the legislation which has been renewed from year to year. We have heard a good deal during this debate with regard to the injurious effects of oleomargarine on the health of the people, and we have also heard claims made that it is a splendid food and the people should not be debarred from using it. But these statements of the wholesomeness and food value of oleomargarine have never been supported by any conclusive evidence. Notwithstanding that this has been a bone of contention during the past four or five years, and that we have to-day a Department of Health and officials by the thousand to enforce the law, there is not a member of the government who can tell parliament what oleomargarine really is—not one. If there is a minister present who can give such information, I should like to hear from him. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) told us about the poor man and his children, about the families of the soldiers who went overseas and did not return, about the man who was earning a small wage, and the importance of a cheap substitute for butter. Let me call attention, Mr. Speaker, to something that may open the eyes of my hon. friend in regard to this matter. In 1919 valuable evidence with regard to the manufacture of oleomargarine was secured by a cost of living committee of the parliament of that day, and it was brought out how highly coloured June butter was purchased to be mixed with these other ingredients in order to make the product look like butter and thus deceive the people. When the question was asked, "Why do you go to all this trouble and expense; if oleomargarine has the virtues you claim for it, why not sell it on its merits?"—the reply came "Oh, it would be like eating lard; the people would not eat it at all." So that shows there has been a deliberate attempt on the part of the manufacturers of oleomargarine to deceive the people and induce them to consume this article by making it look and taste like butter. We are voting millions of dollars to the Department of Health, yet not a particle of evidence is laid before parliament to show whether this stuff that has been consumed in this country has or has not any merits. It is impossible for a private member to secure this information, but it is not impossible for the Minister of Agriculture and members of the government to secure it. The Minister of Finance (Mr Fielding) has been taking an active part in this matter; if he were really anxious to put before parliament the conditions as they actually prevail in this regard, this could very easily have been done. I remember a speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a year ago, and I thought he was very extreme in the statements he made on that occasion. I would just like to refer to some of the evidence given by the manager of one of these packing houses with regard to the manufacture of oleomargarine. He was asked about fixing the price of oleo—the value of the oils imported for the manufacture of oleo does not fluctuate from day to day or from year to year—and he stated:

> I think every man in business gets all he can.

And a little further on:

> I am not an expert in the prices of the retail trade. I have not given it the same study, but I do not think you are getting anywhere if you blame a man for taking—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman is reading from the report of a committee which has not been laid before the House, he is out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The committee of 1919 was one I had been referring to. It is true that what I am now quoting was stated before a committee of this House, the report of which has not been presented to the House.

Mr. FIELDING: This session?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: That is out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I presume it is out of order if the committee do not want to hear it —and I am not surprised that some of them do not want to hear it.

Mr. FIELDING: It is out of order even if the committee should want to hear it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It may be out of order, but it will not be forgotten. I am sure it is on the records of the committee which have been published, and if any hon. members desire to secure the evidence to combat the arguments advanced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) all they have to do is to refer to the evidence given by Mr. McLean, general manager of the Harris Abattoir Company, to show—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is an old member of the House, and he knows the rule just as well as I do. I am sure he will not insist on referring to the evidence taken before a committee which has not yet reported to the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I submit to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I was merely refreshing the minds of the members so that they might later refer to this evidence in order that the matter might be cleared up in their minds. But I have here something further dealing with the matter, and I presume it will be in order. It is taken from a newspaper report—the Toronto Globe—of a speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in 1922 before the Ayrshire Breeders' Association in the city of Toronto. The report states:

> On the question of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine, Mr. Motherwell said that, being introduced as a war measure, it had served its purpose and would do well to die a natural death. "All that we want to do with oleo is to do nothing at all," the speaker said. The legislation expired on September 1, 1922, and it would be up to the other fellow, he said, to make the next move.

I have been wondering since who the other fellow was. I remember about a year ago the Minister of Agriculture frantically waving above his head a bill he was moving the House to adopt and characterizing it as "this rotten old bill." The "rotten old bill" is evidently going to be revived again because the government have not enough courage—or shall I say backbone?—to take a decided stand on this matter. They are fooling away the time—perhaps that is too strong a term to use; the time of parliament is being taken up day after day and year after year when everyone knows that there was in the order in council passed in 1918 an implied promise that the measure then passed was to be a war measure and a war measure only. The order in council said:

> —to be in force and to have effect for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue, the conclusion of such period to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

Yes, His Excellency the Governor in Council can decide this matter at any time; why has it not been done? Why all this subterfuge? Why all these attempts to make it appear that this is democracy, that the government are placing the responsibility upon parliament? When I saw the bill which appeared in the name of the Minister of Agriculture about a week ago, providing for the reinsertion of the suspended clause of the act of 1914, I thought the government were going to have the courage to deal with this matter, but when it came up in the House, the minister, to my amazement, asked leave to withdraw the bill. The hon. member for Cape Breton South, a private member (Mr. Carroll) has had this motion on the order paper since the second of March. Now, that is surely not democracy. It is certainly not responsible government but an evasion of responsibility.

Just a word in regard to what has been said about this being a protective measure. People are inclined to think that anything that savours of protection is not to be encouraged in this country. We have from the Atlantic to the Pacific a staff of officers who are preserving order, who are protecting the people; and the farmers are entitled to protection just as well as any other class. They contribute their quota toward the government of the country; I venture to say that no other class contributes as much as they do to the prosperity of Canada. When you look through the list of bills that has been introduced this session and last session you can come to no other conclusion than that the government are making it as difficult as they can for the farmers to carry on and do business. Is any attempt being made to see that the farmers are enabled to manufacture dairy products profitably? We have a protective tariff of three cents a pound on butter—why do they not put on a specific ad valorem duty as in the case of agricultural implements and other manufactured articles. When it comes to agricultural implements the duty on these implements is doubled, when the price is doubled; consequently, the protection on them is doubled. But in the case of butter when it is at 25 cents a pound the duty is 3 cents a pound under the British preference if it comes from the British Empire as it does, and if it goes up to 50 cents a pound the duty remains at 3 cents a pound but the protection is reduced by one half with an ad valorem duty such as the manufacturers of agricultural implements enjoy, their duty is doubled, but in the case of the other product it is decreased. This is the opportune time for the manufacturer of oleomargarine to get in his work. The cost of peanut oil, cocoanut oil, cottonseed oil and all these other things does not fluctuate as does the price of butter, and he takes advantage of the opportunity and comes in as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) has pointed out, and he quoted figures here tonight from year to year showing that sometimes the cost of oleomargarine in this country was up to 40 and 45 cents a pound. What is the price of butter to-day? It is quoted in Montreal at 34 and 35 cents a pound. So is there any injustice being suffered by the people of this country?

Take the price of cheese, 18 cents per lb. If the same price was obtained for butter to-day on a butter fat basis, it would be selling at 39 cents a pound when you compare the values of the two commodities. The manufacturer of cheese to-day has a great advantage over the manufacturer of butter, and this is why there is no progress being made in the manufacture of butter in this country. I know that in western Ontario many of the creameries have been closed up, and let me point out there is nothing so important and so essential to carrying on successful agriculture in this country as the butter-making industry. There you have the very fundamentals which are necessary in order to carry on agriculture successfully. We have seen in old Ontario, farms that have been cropped for many years and finally practically abandoned, and there has been a great effort and an immense amount of labour has been applied and money spent in trying to bring them back to a successful state of agriculture. The same thing applies to western Canada at the present time, where in many sections they have cropped and cropped year after year and now the farms are congested with weeds, the fibre of the soil has been exhausted, and it is drifting everywhere to-day. You cannot bring this land back to a condition where you can operate it successfully without going back to the primary agricultural industry, that of butter-making. In that case you raise the young stock on the farm. You engage in the raising of cattle, hogs and all these other things, and the product of the farm is converted into a product that is easily exported and that is much cheaper to export than is grain. In that way and that way only can this be brought about. But what do you find? You find during the past few years that the very things that are so essential to carrying on agriculture in this way have been lost sight of.

I hope I have done my utmost to see that parliament would put into effect some regulations which would protect the farmer with regard to the thing which is so necessary for feeding the young animals he is endeavouring to raise on the farm. The pollution of the mill feeds of this country as they have been and as they are being polluted to-day is a crime against the farmers of Canada and is responsible for driving thousands of them from the farm. The farmers of this country are entitled to protection and to something different from what they have been receiving from this government and from preceding governments. You may talk about the importance of having the farmer stay on the land, but how can you expect the farmer to stay on the land? They go in the mills and feed stores and purchase a load or a carload of mill feed so polluted with poisonous seeds—yes, and this information is all in the Department of Agriculture, that thousands of animals have died from the effect of the poisonous seeds found in these mill feeds, and no steps being taken to remedy this condition of affairs. Now we are asked to permit the continuance of a condition with regard to something that is going to be used as the Minister of Labour has pointed out to regulate the price of butter in this country. Yes, it is going to be a very convenient thing. It is a matter of small importance to him in view of present conditions, although nearly $400,000 has been handed back to the two manufacturers of this article during the past four years in a rebate on the customs duties collected upon the ingredients which go into the manufacture of this article, and some years there has been a great deal more imported for which rebates have been granted than there have been pounds of oleomargarine manufactured in this country, notwithstanding the fact that from 15 to 20 per cent of the article manufactured is made of skimmed milk. It is a very clever scheme that has been devised of recent years, particularly in the United States, where the chemists now extract the butter fat from milk and put back into it cocoanut oil, peanut oil and other extracts of that kind and then put the product on the market in competition with its genuine article.

Much has been said and particularly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I know hon. members are getting anxious, but there is no particular hurry. The Minister of Finance a year ago in reply to the speech made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, said:

So it is that we are setting ourselves up against the civilized world if we adopt this resolution.

A little further on he says:

The whole question is this: Here is a commodity that is traded in by every country in the world except Canada. Surely there is no reason why it should not be traded in in this country, unless our people are lacking in the intelligence that we believe they possess. It is because I believe they are intelligent, because I believe they are able to know what they want and able to make a distinction, because I believe they are not going to be so easily fooled and humbugged into having oleomargarine pawned off on them as butter, that I am going to oppose the motion made by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

I was surprised to get a certain piece of information from the Minister of Agriculture to-night. I have always understood that Canada was a dairying country. I have been down in the eastern townships of Quebec and have heard eloquent speakers declare that there was no finer agricultural, grazing or dairying country in the wide world than those eastern townships of the province of Quebec, but to-night I learn from my hon. friend that that is a mistake. It is a country in which the dairying interests are in such a perilous condition that at any moment they may be destroyed by the butter which is being brought up from the Argentine.

Mr. FIELDING: It sounds a pretty good speech.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A pretty good speech. He talks about the civilized world and Canada being the only country where the farmers are afraid to come into competition with conditions as they find them here.

I have here some of the regulations which are in effect in some of the states of the union where dairying is carried on even more successfully and scientifically than we are doing it in Canada. For instance, in the state of Minnesota the regulations provide:

The use of milk and milk products are forbidden in the manufacture of oleomargarine; the manufacture of oleomargarine in imitation of, or in semblance of butter of any shade of yellow, even by the selection or proportion of any fat or other ingredient which may color the product, shall be taken as an intent to deceive or defraud the consumer or purchaser thereof; labelling of receptacles and packages is very strict, and package must show, with substantial accuracy, percentage of each ingredient and the name of each animal or vegetable from which the fats or oils are derived.

Why is it that the government has absolutely refused to specify on the containers the ingredients of the oleomargarine sold in this country? Yet that requirement is insisted on in the case of many other articles. The ingredients are supposed to be placed on containers of mill feed. Even in the case of the mill feed to which I have been referring you will find printed in small letters on the bottom of the container "screenings not exceeding mill run." In the case of fertilizers it is necessary to enumerate the articles and percentage of which they are constituted. But when it comes to an article of food consumed by the people the manufacturers are given the absolute right to put into it anything they see fit providing it is something that is not absolutely putrid. So far as the actual ingredients of oleomargarine are concerned the consumer knows nothing about them. In regard to the splendid speech delivered by the Minister of Finance, who dilated upon the conditions prevailing throughout the world, let me say that the value of dairy products in the state of Wisconsin in the year 1919 was $144,655,000 and they have this provision in their regulations:

Any person manufacturing, selling, offering or exposing for sale any commodity or substance in imitation or semblance of butter, the product of the dairy, shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this section—

And so on. Note this also:

Under this section if, in the manufacture of any oleomargarine, fats, oils, or other ingredients are selected and used in such proportions as to cause the oleomargarine so manufactured to resemble butter of any shade of yellow, such fats, shall be prima facie evidence in any prosecution under this section that such oleomargarine was manufactured with an intent to deceive or defraud the consumer or purchaser thereof.

What do we provide? We permit manufacturers to colour their oleomargarine and to put it in pound prints the exact size of butter prints, and we allow that product to be sold in the retail stores by the retail merchants of this country. On the other hand in many other countries it is not permitted to be sold in the same retail stores where butter is sold. In France, for instance, the retailing of oleomargarine is not permitted on the same premises in which butter is being sold; and in Wisconsin the name of each ingredient in the oleomargarine must be printed on the container, also each animal or vegetable from which the fats or oils are derived. Many other states of the American Union have recently passed very stringent regulations with regard to oleomargarine. There is no article of food in which such a great amount of fraud has been perpetrated, and is still being perpetrated as in the case of filled milk and oleomargarine. Consequently I think it would be much more satisfactory and in keeping with good administration in this country if a proper stand had been taken by the Minister of Agriculture and the government on this question. I am satisfied that the Minister of Agriculture realizes the seriousness of the situation, he has given evidence of that, but it appears that his influence with the government has not been sufficient to enable him to get their consent to refusing to take any action and allowing the law to revert to the condition in which it was prior to 1917. We export butter, at an enormous expenditure, to about seventeen different countries to-day. We are in a position to manufacture much more butter than we are manufacturing at present, and it is idle for anyone to argue that what is proposed in regard to oleomargarine is a measure of protection for the consumer, or for the poor of this country. I venture to state that in nine cases out of ten those that are asking for the continuance of the oleomargarine regulations are not those who intend to use the commodity, or have any desire to do so. We have had requests from Lumbermen's Associations and from retail merchants who are anxious to retail oleomargarine at a profit. We have had requests from women's organizations—some of them even in this city—the members of which would not touch oleomargarine if they knew it for anything. These are the people who are so solicitous about the poor of Canada. Nevertheless they are not taking any steps to see that the poor are not being imposed upon, or to put them in a position where they can purchase an article of food and know what they are paying for. It is a deceptive counterfeit which is being placed on the market. If this article is good and wholesome why not come out and let the people know what it contains. Strict regulations are enforced with regard to the manufacture of butter. Is there not a necessity for still more rigid regulations with respect to oleomargarine. I almost feel impelled to speak at length owing to the attitude of the government on this question. I cannot conceive of any government pursuing such a policy as the present government is adopting with regard to oleomargarine. We have had differing statements from various members of the cabinet. They have no mind on the question; they say it is one for parliament to decide. That is something new in the way of parliamentary government in this country. If the government are going to shirk all responsibility for the measures they originate that may possibly account for the length of the session, and for the numerous special committees that are sitting and which have not yet reported. The fact that these committees have not reported precludes the possibility of dealing with many questions which ought to be dealt with, some of them having a direct bearing on this matter. It is all very well to be ruled out of order on the ground that committees have been sitting and hearing evidence but have not yet reported. I venture to state that there are committees which have dealt with every possible thing that will come before parliament during the present session. One committee in particular has taken a stack of evidence, and it will be the end of the session before the report is brought in. In the meantime we cannot do anything until the report is presented. Yet the government continues to sit here day after day refusing to accept the responsibility which belongs to them, and to take a definite stand on this question.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would my hon. friend be in favour of putting into force in Canada regulations corresponding to the Wisconsin regulations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would be heartily in favour of it. I have advocated that for years back. Do not permit any milk or milk products to be mixed with other ingredients in view of the strict regulations which are in effect respecting dairy products. Why should it be possible, when dairy products are subject to such strict regulations, 2 a.m. to take those products into some packing houses, manufacture them into an article and place it on the market? Moreover the country to the south of us has placed a tariff barrier of 8 cents a pound on butter. We have also a similar duty on oleomargarine, which is absolutely prohibitive. If this is a good thing for the country and if the people want to use it, let them use it by all means, but let them know what they are doing. Let us put a proper protective tariff on it. It is all very well to talk about protection and free trade. That is a beautiful theory; but it is not a theory with which we are faced in this country, it is an actual condition, and this condition prevails to-day by reason of the tariff which has been erected against us by the United States. We must take action according to conditions with which we are confronted and deal with them in that way. I am not going to impose on the good nature of the House. There are two amendments. After one is disposed of there will be ample opportunity to speak later.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Carroll:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Oleomargarine Act, chapter twenty-four of the statutes of 1919 (second session), and the amending acts, by providing that notwithstanding anything contained in The Dairy Industry Act, 1914—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot dispense.

—or in any other statute or law, the manufacture in, and importation of oleomargarine into Canada, and the offering for sale, the sale and the having in possession for sale, of oleomargarine, shall henceforth be permitted, subject to the provisions of the said Oleomargarine Act and to such regulations as are now or may hereafter be established by the Governor in Council.

It is moved in amendment by Mr. Kay:

That all the words after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor,—

"In view of distinct assurances given at the time the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine was suspended by order in council in 1917 under the War Measures Act of 1914, that as such suspension was but temporary and a war measure only it should now be removed and the question left, without prejudice as to its merits, in the same position as before the enactment of the said temporary suspension."

It is moved in amendment to the amendment by Mr. Good:

That the amendment be amended by adding the following words:

"And that the government do before the end of the present session submit to parliament such legislation in the premise as may be deemed advisable."

I do not wish to contravene the wishes of the House when I insist upon putting the question, but the putting of the question is probably the most important function of the Speaker. Of course, at the beginning of the proceedings, when the Speaker orders that the members be called in, the formal reading of a motion may be dispensed with. But when the vote is being taken the Speaker is bound by the rules of the House to put the question.

The House divided on the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Good which was negatived on the following division:

MILITIA PENSION ACT, AMENDMENT

Hon. E. M. MACDONOLD (Pictou), (Acting Minister of National Defence) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, (1) That it is expedient to amend the provisions of the Militia Pension Act by providing that the period of service entitling officers, retired compulsorily, to pension, shall be twenty years; and that any officer so retired, who served on active service during the Great War and was appointed to the Force on or after the 1st January, 1919, and prior to 31st December, 1921, and since such appointment has served continuously in the Force for not less than ten years, shall be entitled to pension as provided in section four of the said Act.

(2) That the period of service required of every militiaman to entitle him to pension shall be twenty years, or fifteen years if incapacitated for duty by infirmity of mind or body, and he shall be subject to return to service if he ceases to be incapacitated, and if he has completed fifteen but less than twenty years service, his pension shall be an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances for every completed year of service.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been informed of the subject matter of the resolution, has given his consent thereto and commends it to the consideration of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister take this occasion to let us know the exact effect of the resolution, for purposes of discussion?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have not my memorandum by me, but in a general way I might explain that the original provisions of the Militia Pension Act stipulated that the period of service entitling them to pensions of both officers and men should be twenty years. In 1919, the period was reduced to ten years. It is now proposed to return to the former standard and provide that the service shall be twenty years. It has been found, particularly among non-commissioned officers and men, that many persons have been taking advantage of the shorter period to leave the service in order to secure the pension. I shall be prepared to deal with the matter fully when the resolution is in committee.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is adopted—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There can be no debate on the motion at this stage. When the resolution is in committee the hon. gentleman will, of course, have an opportunity to discuss it.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act by providing,—

(1) That in any case where an application for insurance under the said Act has been received, and the applicant has died prior to the delivery to him of the policy of insurance, the approval of the application by the proper officer and the receipt of the initial premium shall be deemed to have been sufficient to put the insurance into force, unless it can be shown that the application was fraudulent, and any insurance moneys which would have been payable had the policy been delivered to the applicant shall now be made payable, subject to a deduction of the amount of premium due from the date of application to the date of death.

(2) That any applications which were rejected prior to 1st July, 1922, under any conditions set forth in section 2 of the amending Act of 1922, or the schedule thereto, shall be reviewed, except in cases where the applicant is suffering or has become impaired as a result of self-inflicted wounds or immoral conduct, or where the application was fraudulent, and provision be made to give the right on such review to any applicant now living to insure, and if the applicant has died, the amount of insurance for which he applied shall now be made payable, less the amount which would have been due as premium from the date of application to the date of death, notwithstanding that no effective insurance contract was completed, and provided that the application was approved.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been informed of the subject matter of the resolution has given his consent and recommends it to the consideration of the House. I do not know whether any explanation should be forthcoming at this stage, but I will content myself with saying at the moment that there is a slight deficiency in the phrasing of the second section of the resolution which carries the proviso: "Provided that the application was approved." The meaning intended is, provided a sufficient time has elapsed after the application in order that, in the ordinary course of procedure, it might have had an opportunity of being either approved or rejected. When the resolution is before the House in committee I shall fully explain it.

Mr. SPEAKER: In justice to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) I beg to state that I was in error a minute ago when I ruled him out of order. He is entitled to address the House. Rule 17A is so involved that sometimes I am inclined to make too drastic a decision under it.

Motion agreed to.

DRY DOCK SUBSIDIES

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, 1910, and amending acts, and to provide that when the amount expended for the work and materials upon a dock of the first or second class shall have equalled seventy-five per cent of the cost thereof, and the Chief Engineer of the Department of Public Works shall have certified thereto, half yearly payments at the rate of four and one-half per cent per annum may be made on ninety per cent of the cost of the work done and materials provided at the time of such payment.

He said: His Excellency the Govenor General has been made conversant with the subject matter of the resolution and recommends it to the consideration of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister might give an explanation and, if possible, a defence of this resolution. It strikes me as a most remarkable one. It apparently provides that when a certain fraction of a work is done interest may be paid on a much larger fraction. Will the minister intimate to the House the case that is to be affected by this resolution?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I do not say it is not in order, but it is exceedingly unusual at the first stage of these resolutions to call for an explanation. I should think that in the general interest of the business of the House it is not a desirable practice. I do not want to raise any question of order, but in all my experience I cannot recall a case where an explanation has been called for at the moment the formal motion was made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explanations are not very frequently demanded, but they are undoubtedly in order. I am not encouraging the practice, but we are going into Committee of the Whole—

Mr. FIELDING: Not now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —and will not then have an opportunity to debate the general principle.

Mr. BELAND: A motion will be made to go into Commitee of the Whole at the next sitting, and my right hon. friend will then have an opportunity to speak on the motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend is wrong. The motion now is that at the next sitting we go into Committee of the Whole, and the Speaker at the next sitting will simply call the motion and leave the chair.

Mr. BELAND: I submit that the motion has to be formally put by the Speaker, and before he leaves the chair my right hon. friend will have an opportunity to speak as long as he wishes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think my hon. friend is right, because, if so, the motion has no meaning. The motion to-day is, that at the next sitting the House go into Committee of the Whole. If the motion passes now, why should it have to be decided again?

Mr. FIELDING: All the House decides is that it will take up the question for consideration. The present motion does not commit anyone in the least.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Although I have not my notes with me I have no objection to giving a brief explanation of the subject matter of the resolution. It is a simple amendment of the Dry Dock Subsidies Act. The present act allows the payment of 75 per cent of the subsidy when 75 per cent of the work has been done. That is the limitation. As this one work in particular is nearing completion it is found that it would be an advantage to the contracting firm to be allowed to receive 90 per cent of the subsidy instead of 75 per cent. It is not sought in any way to increase the amount of subsidy or the commitments of the government. The amendment does allow certain funds which are appropriated under the act to be used at an earlier date for the construction of the dock. I shall be able to show later that the department is fully secured in the work already done and that this amendment will not have the effect of imposing any further financial obligation upon the government. I hope to be more fully prepared to explain the amendment to-morrow. But, as I have said, our obligations will not be increased, and therefore I trust the amendment will receive the fair consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

OPENING OF BANFF-WINDERMERE HIGHWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put an inquiry to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). In common with other members, I presume, I have to-day received an invitation to attend the opening of the Banff-Windermere Highway on the 30th June. Will the minister give us any assurance that it would be wise for us to accept this invitation?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): That is largely in the hands of the opposition, I imagine.

HEBRIDEAN IMMIGRANTS

ADJOURNMENT MOTION—MR. SPEAKMAN—TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I beg to ask leave, under Rule 39, to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. The matter which I wish to discuss is the case of a body of Scottish immigrants, recently landed in Canada with the assistance of the Department of Immigration, a large part of whom, to the number of about two hundred, is still camped in a disused school building near the city of Red Deer, Alberta, unable apparently to find an opportunity either to go upon the land or to secure employment. This is a situation in which departmental responsibility is involved is at once a hardship to these people themselves, and is a deterrent to future immigration into this country.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Speaker, the House will remember that some time ago a comparatively large party of Scottish immigrants from the Hebridean islands, to the number of between four and five hundred, came to this country. Their advent was advertised extensively throughout the Dominion and, I presume, throughout a good part of the world because the news went through at least the United States and Great Britain. Those people are, I imagine, amongst the most desirable class of immigrants which this country can secure. They were accustomed to hard work; they were industrious, frugal, ambitious, anxious to succeed. They sold their little holdings in these islands and came to Canada. I had an opportunity of meeting a part of that body of men and women as they went through this city on their way to the West, and I can assure you that from personal contact with them I consider them to be a class of citizens of whom Canada might well be proud, a class of citizens who, given a fair opportunity, could be expected to succeed, if anybody could succeed, in this country. They met with some difficulty on the way here. They were delayed through storms on the ocean, through washouts on the railroad and other circumstances over which no one had control and as to which no fault can be attributed to anyone. They might have been pardoned, had they been inclined to take a somewhat gloomy view of this country, but the reverse was the case; when I met these men and women they were filled with hope, filled with optimism, filled with the ambition and the intention to succeed. They went on. They got to my own city of Red Deer, where they were intended to be located and where preparations had been made, to some extent at least, to receive them. A building of some considerable size in the vicinity of that city, which had been used as an Indian Industrial school, had been prepared for their accommodation in order that they might use it as their headquarters, from which they might go to secure the land they were desirous of obtaining and where their wives and families —because the greater number of the men were married men—might remain while the men were in search of land or of employment.

So far things had moved fairly smoothly. But a large number of these people who went there with such high hopes, hopes which were justified by the information they had received, are still in that building and unable to locate themselves upon the land which they had hoped to occupy. A great many of them are without funds, and from information I have received are dependent upon the charity of individuals. I believe that is a circumstance which is the most serious menace to our country that it is possible to conceive. We had a debate here—I am not going to quote from that debate, as I understand it would be against the rules of the House to do so—but we had a debate on immigration, in the course of which the need for immigration was stressed from all parts of the House. It was pointed out that Canada was a land of opportunity for desirable people who wished to come here. From this part of the House some notes of warning went forth; it was suggested that it was not sufficient to bring these people here, simply to land them in Canada and let them shift for themselves; that if they were brought here, adequate care should be taken to give them a proper opportunity to locate themselves and to build up their homes. Now, that was stressed, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that the situation which has evolved itself has proved the truth of that contention and proved it to the hilt.

There were, as I say, something over four hundred of this desirable class of immigrants many of whom were scattered between here and their ultimate destination, taking up temporary employment in various provinces, but the majority of whom arrived at that city of Red Deer. Their destination was a part of the country which, I consider from my experience, to be a very good section indeed—a place where it is possible, if it is possible anywhere in the province, to succeed; a place largely devoted to mixed farming; a place where there is plenty of water, plenty of rain; a place where growth is usually assured year by year; a place where wood is available; a place pre-eminently suitable for small farmers and homesteaders, for men desirous of working in a concentrated way by putting in part of their time, possibly in assisting their neighbours who are farming on a larger scale—a place, I say, where if they could be properly established, they would have every chance of success.

In the statement which I placed before the House I made the assertion that some departmental responsibility was involved, and I consider, Mr. Speaker, that that assertion was well founded. What are the facts? In the first place this was a small selected body which we had hoped, and the department had hoped, would be the forerunner of a much larger body to come later. Long before these people came the department knew, at least roughly speaking, the number of people that might be expected; they knew that on account of the extensive advertising which had been given to this group of people, upon the reception accorded to them would depend to a large degree at least the success of any future immigration into Canada attempted from that part of the world. In these circumstances it seems to me it is the part of wisdom and common sense that the Department of Immigration should ensure, so far as humanly possible, the success of that detachment. More than that, these people came out here on information which they had received concerning this country. After this somewhat unfortunate situation had arisen, the gentleman in charge of the party was asked who he considered was to blame for what had happened, who was to blame for these people not finding the conditions prevailing here that they had been led to believe they would find when they arrived here. They had been led to believe—and I am not saying they had been so informed directly by the Department of Immigration—that they would find a land where they could get free homesteads within reasonable distance of a railroad, or, as an alternative, where they could purchase land close to a railroad at low prices, on long term payments—terms which would not involve payment during the first one or two years. But when they came here they found the reverse was the case. As I say, the gentleman in charge of this party was asked who was to blame. He was not anxious to attach blame to anyone; he perhaps imputed some blame to himself, having been on the land in the first place to look over the situation. He said the information had been received in various ways, being partly contained in pamphlets furnished to these Hebrideans. He was asked:

Did the Western Canada Colonization Association encourage these men in any way to come to Canada?

And he answered:

Yes; they sent out the pamphlets.

The further question was put:

Is that where these promises of land and homes and passage come from?

To which the answer was, "Yes." Now, it may be said that the government is not responsible for pamphlets issued by the Western Canada Colonization Association, and that might have been said with truth had it not been for the fact that by the granting of a sum of money to that company, the government to all intents and purposes became a co-partner with it in its endeavours. Having become a co-partner in that way, I contend that the department and the government—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Will he give me the name of the individual who is giving out this information?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Certainly. It is Father Macdonell who was primarily responsible for bringing these men out.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is that direct evidence from Father Macdonell, or is it a newspaper report?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: This is purporting—I had better say that now—to be an interview given in Father Macdonell's own name—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is just what I want to know. It is "purporting" to be an interview. I have not seen an interview given by Father Macdonell, but I am prepared to bring letters from him direct. If my hon. friend will correct that, I am quite prepared to let it go on.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am prepared to correct it to this extent: That this is information which has been spread over the country in newspaper form. If it is incorrect, I am not going to back the information—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I want to be clear on that point. Did or did not Father Macdonell give that information?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Father Macdonell did not give that information direct to me, and I am not going to vouch for its accuracy. I am simply giving it for what it is worth; if it is incorrect the Minister of the Interior will be able when he speaks—

Mr. HOCKEN: What paper is it?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The Calgary Albertan.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it given as a quotation from Father Macdonell?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It is quoted. It is in quotation marks as being the direct words of Father Macdonell himself. I am not going to vouch for the accuracy of that. As I said before, if the Minister of Immigration has other information and can show that this interview was not given by Father Macdonell, and that these were not his words, I certainly am prepared to take the minister's word against the newspaper report or against any interview appearing in the public press. But if the facts are as purported to be set out by Father Macdonell, it is very evident that the government and the Department of Immigration cannot escape from that part of the responsibility. I shall not, however, in view of the statement made by the minister now, in view of the fact that he demurs to my using the article in this way—I shall not press that particular point home. As a matter of fact, as far as the purpose of my argument is concerned, it is not necessary; because apart altogether from whether these pamphlets were issued by the Western Canada Colonization Company or not, the fact remains that the Department of Immigration knew these men were coming, and it was the direct duty of the department and of the government to see that correct and accurate information was placed in their hands.

Now, what is the result of that unfortunate situation which had its commencement in inaccurate information sent out in some way or other from this country and placed in those men's hands? The result is this, instead of having the men placed there in a position to be located on the land, in a position where they might go ahead and become self-supporting citizens, become an asset to Canada, become an incentive possibly to future immigration from the same part, these men are now becoming discouraged. That I think cannot be gainsaid. They feel that Canada is not the land which they hoped it was. They feel they have not been given the assistance and encouragement in settlement that they hoped for and believed they had a right to expect they would receive. And the direct result of that is this: It has been stated that some of the speeches made from this side of the House were wrong and should never have been delivered because of the effect they would have throughout the world on intending immigrants, that it was a bad advertisement for Canada, a bad advertisement because we tried to avert this very situation by placing the truth before people before they left their homes to come here, and then allow them to come here and make their homes in this country if they so desired. But, Mr. Speaker, could anything suggested in this House, could anything said by any hon. member of this House, so effectively damn any immigration to this country as the situation itself which has arisen and the publicity that has been given to it—whether that publicity is built on an accurate statement of interviews or not—and the publicity which is being given to the situation through the press of this country and the publicity which will be given and has been given to it in the press of the Old Country? I will say, in order to anticipate any criticism on the part of the Minister of Immigration, that I have not as yet received any papers from the Old Country at home which contain any such statement, but I think you could fairly well say that if a party of Old Country people just arrived here have become discouraged and despondent in any way, they will certainly be acquainting their friends at home with the facts, and another thing, if articles such as this appear in the press of this country they will be copied by those interested in the Old Country. I think we can take that for granted without having seen the articles at all.

Now it may be said that the government or the Department of Immigration cannot assume parental responsibility for the care of these people, that they cannot take these people and act like a father to them and see them located on the land.

Mr. McMURRAY: Has the hon. gentleman other information than the mere newspaper from which he has quoted, or is he just talking, basing his argument on what he has read in a newspaper?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The hon. gentleman can rest content. I have had letters. I do not purpose reading them, because they were private letters; but they contained this information among other private information. I think the hon. member can take my word for it when I say I have had direct information from people at home with whom I am well acquainted, who have a knowledge of the facts from being on the ground, and for whose character and the accuracy of whose information I can fairly well vouch. But apart from that, I would like the hon. member to notice this: Whether right or wrong these things have gone out to the world through the press of this country, and no contradiction of any kind has been sent out by the Department of Immigration denying the truth of these statements, and it seems to me that if I had nothing to go on but the situation which has arisen from the accounts in the public press, it would still be a matter of public importance to bring it to the attention of this House. If the facts are not as stated here, then it seems to me the remedy is in the hands of the government and of the department, and that it was its duty to put a countervailing article in the press to contradict these things and give the facts as they are.

Mr. MARTELL: Does not my hon. friend think that these men coming from the Hebrides or old Scotland should have been induced by the government or by Father Macdonell, or whoever is bringing them out, to start a new Scotland in the province of Nova Scotia, where they could devote their time to fishing and farming?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I will leave the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell), whose habit of asking questions is growing somewhat upon him, to settle that matter with the Department of Immigration himself.

Mr. MARTELL: That is no answer. The member for Hants is from Nova Scotia.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Then I leave the member for Hants, if he has a grievance, to take it up with the government and not to take it up with me who am not responsible for the action of the government.

Mr. MARTELL: You are talking about something you do not know anything about.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does the hon. member intend to convey the idea that in speaking of the situation which has arisen at Red Deer in the vicinity of my own home town that I am discussing something of which I have no knowledge, or is he simply, as was stated by another hon. member in the House, talking?

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit me? All I have to say is this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may not interrupt without the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am not discussing whether the immigrants went to the right place or not. I am not discussing whether the Department of Immigration should have encouraged them to go to Nova Scotia or not. I am discussing the situation which has arisen from the fact that these immigrants have gone into the vicinity of Red Deer in the province of Alberta. I am discussing the situation which has arisen and which at present exists, not any supposititious case.

Before I was interrupted by the hon. member I was speaking of the governmental responsibility involved. I was going on to say that whether the government had any responsibility for the pamphlets placed in these men's hands or not, whether or not these pamphlets were issued by the Western Canada Colonization Company has not very much to do with the main question, which is that the government, knowing these men were coming, should have seen to it that they knew the truth about the country before they set sail, and then having come here the problem before the government was—and they had ample time to prepare for it—to make sure before these people went to any district that they might find some place upon which they might set their feet, some land which they might take up.

We will go a little further. What is going to be the result of the situation which has arisen? Is it not going to be this, that the opinion will go abroad, and will rightly go abroad, that if this Department of Immigration is unable to successfully cope with the problem involved in bringing into Canada a limited number of selected immigrants of the best type, is unable to look after and locate four or five hundred people, then the department and this government cannot successfully cope with any extended immigration policy, cannot bring in, and locate, and in any way assist in settling, any large number of people?

We are faced with a situation with two points of view. In the first place these people are suffering a hardship. They have been brought out to this country, rightly or wrongly, to a part of Canada where they ought to have a chance to achieve success, but they are now in a position where they see their hopes dwindling, where they see the small capital which they had saved in the Old Country disappearing, and when the time of the year they should get on the land is fast going by, and apparently—and I hope to be reassured on that point by the Minister of Agriculture—with no immediate prospects of relief in that direction. Apart from the hardship inflicted on these men what effect is their situation going to have on the men who, it was hoped, would follow them? It was hoped that a much larger number of their relatives and friends would follow them out here; but do you think, in view of the existing situation, in view of the difficulties these men are encountering, in view of the fact that they are unable to locate themselves, do you think for one moment that their relatives or friends, or neighbours will come out here and attempt to locate in Canada? I have noticed one or two editorials written on this subject. I hasten to say at once that I am not going to vouch for the accuracy of the editorials but I presume they reflect, in each case, the opinion of the editor and will be read and believed by at least a large part of the people of this country. The editorial I am about to quote is from the Calgary Albertan:

A couple of hundred Hebrideans, the very best type of new settlers have come from northern Scotland intending to make their homes in this province. They came with great expectations, hoping soon to be located upon their own farms, willing and anxious to make their own way by their own toil. They asked nothing but opportunity. Their hopes have not been realized. They have not been located. They are now living partly on charity in a somewhat congested and uncomfortable way in a large dormitory in or near to Red Deer. They are earning nothing and are eating up their small store.

Some one has blundered.

Who did make the mistake may be an interesting question which can be determined later on. The important problem just now is to get these people satisfactorily settled.

The editorial goes on to point out that the hope was entertained of getting further settlers by reason of the successful settlement of these men, and we come now to this point: Mistakes have been made whether by the Department of Immigration, whether by Father Macdonell, or whether by the men themselves to some extent I do not know at the present time. At any rate, mistakes have been made, this situation has arisen, and I am hoping to hear, later on, what the Department of Immigration intends to do to alleviate the existing condition and to bring in possibly more men of this desirable type. These editorials are being circulated throughout the country. I read another one in a Saskatchewan paper; I am not going to read it but it is practically along the same line. "More blundering" is what they say in the headline and they emphasize what was stated in this House.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What paper has the hon. member reference to?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The editorial to which I am now alluding appeared in the Saskatoon Daily Star of June 2nd. It says:

The 300—

The editorial says 300 but the figures are not correct; however the essential part of the editorial is correct.

—sold their holdings in the old land, according to their statement, in the expectation that they would find cultivated homesteads, on easy terms of payment and close to a railroad, awaiting them. Instead of forming a colony, as they had anticipated, they will be scattered. The long term loans promised them will not be forthcoming. They find that cultivated farm land near transportation facilities has a higher value than they believed and that it must be at least partly paid for on occupation.

Something which we who live in this country, which anybody familiar with the country, could have told them before they left the Old Land. Then they could have come prepared to meet those conditions. The editorial is correct.

The Hebrideans will make a success of their venture. No one will say that they do not share the opportunities which are the privilege of every western citizen.

I hope that prophecy is true.

But why were they deceived? Are delusion and overstatement the only means of bringing people to this country? If the truth about western Canada is so unsavory that it cannot be told to a prospective emigrant from the Old World, then the sooner it reverts to the Indians the better.

That is what this editorial says and that is what we contend. We do not say that the country is only fit for Indians, but that if you cannot get settlers here by telling the truth as to the conditions they will find when they get here so that they shall be prepared when they do come to adapt themselves to those conditions, it is far better not to have them come here at all. It would have been far better for them to have stayed in the land from which they came than to have moved to Canada and find themselves in such a mess as they have got into now. Because it is the effect of the experience of these men that we have got to reckon with in connection with our immigration policy. Now, I have no doubt other hon. members who are interested in this subject will be anxious to take part in this debate. Because of that and because I wish to give the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization a fair opportunity of stating the other side of the case from a departmental point of view, and bearing in mind the fact that I shall have an opportunity of closing the debate and concluding my remarks, if I think it necessary, I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your courtesy and take my seat.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman I think is out of order, he has already spoken. Or, perhaps, he put a question.

Mr. MARTELL: I put a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. MARTELL: I may say at the outset that I am going to be brief and probably that statement will afford ground for applause. But as a representative of the province of Nova Scotia which, in all matters which are dealt with at Ottawa, may be considered the province that was passed by, I rise to say this: When the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) referred to Father Macdonell endeavouring to bring emigrants to this country the only mistake made was that they did not locate in the province of Nova Scotia. These people come from the Hebrides, a portion of Scotland where they are used to engaging in divers occupations. If they had come to the province of Nova Scotia they would have an opportunity to fish and also to farm on a small scale. We are not asking for special concessions for the province of Nova Scotia. All that we do ask is this—that in so far as immigrants are concerned the people of that province shall be treated in exactly the same way as other portions of the Dominion. The unfortunate thing in connection with our immigration policy, it seems to me is that when we ask for immigrants they are required to go out to the prairies. Men who are used to fishing, men who are sailors, men who had small places of their own on the ocean shore, are required to go out to western Canada and become progressive farmers; whereas such men as these coming from Scotland should be located in the province of Nova Scotia where they can engage in fishing for certain portions of the year, where they can engage in farming or other occupations, where they are likely to make a success. The most desirable place for people from Scotland is in the old province of Nova Scotia. They hail from old Scotland and it would be well if they settled in new Scotland. I say that although I do not claim to be a Scotchman.

Mr. LEWIS: Have you positions vacant for such men in the province of Nova Scotia at the present time?

Mr. MARTELL: I did not catch the hon. member's question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members when they put a question to use the third person.

Mr. MARTELL: Repeat your question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend seems to entertain the opinion that because he comes from the Old Land he is superior to the people who have been born and reared in the Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MARTELL: All I am asking is that when such immigrants as we are referring to are brought to Canada, they should be placed in the Maritime provinces or in the old province of Quebec. If they are settled in these parts of Canada they can rest assured that there are ample opportunities for them to engage in occupations which will yield a good living for themselves and their families without any subsidies from the Dominion government. In Nova Scotia we have a province where diversified industries are carried on; there are all sorts of industries in that province. Any man who is actuated by desire to make a good living for himself and his family, and with a desire to have his family educated, cannot find a better place in the whole live world than the little province of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island might prefer the conditions in his province, but the conditions there are very much the same as ours. We have the finest fruit growing country in the world and the finest fishing—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for adjournment for a special purpose gives rise to discussion under well-defined rules. I would call attention of hon. members of the House to paragraph C, subsection 7, rule 39, which says—

The motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session.

The discussion on the motion can only be on the lines of the matter of urgent public importance. There are several rulings on this matter. At page 105 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary rules and forms, I find the following:

A motion under this rule must be restricted to a single specific matter of recent occurence; and as the matter to be discussed must be of an urgent nature, no notice should be given of an intention to resort to the motion on a future occasion.

The point is that there is restriction in the debate to the matter which is under consideration. The whole question of immigration cannot be brought up in the discussion. The question introduced on this occasion has been clearly explained by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) as a matter of urgent public importance. That is the only question before the House. No advertisement of any special province for immigration purposes could be the subject of this debate. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the question before the House.

Mr. MARTELL: I bow to the ruling, but I think the hon. member for Red Deer in the course of his disquisition was intending to criticize the government for things that occurred in regard to immigration. If I misunderstood it, then I apologize to you Mr Speaker, and bow to your ruling, for which I have the deepest respect. But when the hon. member undertakes to criticize Father Macdonell for what he has done, I wish to say that the province of Nova Scotia would approve of what he has done and would welcome all these immigrants.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does the hon. member consider that in my remarks there was any implied criticism of Father Macdonell or any criticism of the government's general immigration policy? I was critcizing this as one direct result of the policy.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member is apt to criticize everything the Minister of the Interior does. All I have to say to him is this—and I do not want to get away from the question before the House—that the people of Canada are absolutely 4 p.m. satisfied with what the minister is doing. He is doing his best and no man can do more, as the saying goes. My hon. friend could not be satisfied with anything the Minister of the Interior did at all. Now Mr. Speaker, I am not going to discuss this matter. But seeing that my hon. friends opposite are somewhat selfish in their interests, all I have to say is that, irrespective of what the motion may be, if the rest of this country are not prepared to take Father Macdonell's immigrants, the county of Hants—I need not say anything about Nova Scotia—will take them all, because they are sturdy highlanders and are quite willing and able to make their living in any sphere of life in which God may place them. I have nothing more to say beyond this, that I want the whole question considered on its merits. And when the hon. member undertakes to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, I think he should have something of greater interest than the discussion of something that pertains simply to the particular constituency of Red Deer, where he wants people to settle, but he does not want the proper people to go there.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Before the minister replies, I wish to put a question which he might answer. I have been fully informed by the friends of Father Macdonell as to his whole plan, and I am very much surprised to hear the information that has been given to us by the hon. member for Red Deer. The minister will remember that an important delegation waited upon him, including the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) and some others, and laid down a plan for taking care of the men whom Father Macdonell was bringing over. I think the information given to the minister was that an organization had been completed clear across the continent, so that those men who are coming out under his auspices would be taken care of perhaps better than any other group of immigrants that have ever come to Canada, I would like the minister, when he replies to the question put by the hon. member for Red Deer, to tell us whether this organization that Father Macdonell created has fallen to pieces, or whether he still hopes to make it operative, so that the men he brings out will be taken care of as he promised, as we all hope they will be; and if he will fulfil his part of the undertaking that he entered into with the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Will the hon. member for West Toronto be just a trifle more explicit, because unfortunately there are many schemes that come up and get into the hands of men who are anxious about immigration, and they listen to them and unfortunately make use of them; and then they do not materialize. Did my hon. friend have reference to the scheme suggested by the Catholic organizations for the loaning of money to these men? I am not just clear on that.

Mr. HOCKEN: As I understand it, Father Macdonell laid before the minister a plan by which he would have an organization represented at every point across the continent, and this organization would undertake to look after these people in co-operation with himself, and perhaps with the Department of the Interior. Does the minister not remember that plan being outlined to him by Father Macdonell?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot say that I remember the plan the hon. member has referred to.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have it from a very close friend of Father Macdonell that that was done, and that the full details of his plan were submitted to the minister and approved by him. If I have been misinformed, I do not implicate the minister. But what surprised me was to hear that these Hebrideans, of all the immigrants that have ever come to Canada, have got into trouble of any kind, because I understood they were coming out with the most complete form of organization to take care of them that had ever been created in Canada for such a purpose.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Minister of Immigration): I have no knowledge of any definite scheme of the character the hon. member has described. True, Father Macdonell has made representations to organizations that were sympathetic for the purpose of securing money to loan, to establish his immigrants upon land, and they had made considerable progress. I cannot say that it is fulfilled, because outside of having a knowledge of it, I was not consulted about the matter particularly further than that I knew it was a general scheme of loaning money to establish newcomers on land by an organization interested in their welfare; but as to the scheme suggested by my hon. friend, I must confess I did not hear it, because when I became acquainted with Father Macdonell he was bringing people to Ontario and establishing them on farms, and they were being brought from the very locality in which those settlers who are now located at Red Deer were recruited. He seemed to be achieving considerable success, and was anxious to branch out in a larger way. I say frankly that, so far as my knowledge goes. Father Macdonell is one of the most successful colonizers we have working to-day in behalf of immigration and colonization. I shall deal briefly with the question raised by my hon. friend in reference to this party of Hebrideans who have come to Canada under the auspices of the Rev. Father Macdonell and the Rev. Father MacIntyre. My hon. friend has laid considerable stress on the advertising generally which induced these people to come to Canada, and he declares that he cannot but hold the Department of Immigration responsible for that publicity. Very well; so far so good. I may say to my hon. friend and to the House too, that this is a matter of which I have been somewhat apprehensive myself. I do not think that we can possibly exercise too great care in controlling the advertising matter sent out, and I would not say for a moment that copies of the scheme of settlement of the Canada Colonization Association did not reach these settlers. I will say, however, and say it most emphatically, that never at any time did the Canada Colonization Association have anything to do with the movement of that party, apart from discussing with Father Macdonell the possibility of their assistance. And if the scheme of the Canada Colonization Association got to Scotland, if copies of it reached the hands of these settlers, it may have been carried to them by the party who came here last summer, who are now associated with these settlers, and who, I take it, would give first-hand information with regard to what they have seen in Canada. In order that the people might have an accurate knowledge of the conditions in Canada, I have been pleased on every occasion to place at the disposal of the representatives of settlers, in any locality on the continent or in Great Britain, who desired to look the situation over, every facility to study conditions in this country. Last year the Holland government sent a representative directly representing it in the person of Baron Sandberg, who travelled through Canada, being in charge of immigration work for the authorities in Holland. He gained information at first hand and from actual observation while in Canada. The government of Italy sent out Miss Garibaldi who travelled throughout Canada and carried back to her country personal knowledge of conditions here. The government of Switzerland was represented by Mr. Fitz Beck, who went from one part of this country to the other investigating, on his own behalf, conditions as they actually exist in Canada. And I know of no better way for the people who intend to come to this country to get information than from their own representatives who are engaged in the work of immigration and colonization and who come here to investigate matters for themselves.

The Immigration department cannot be responsible for all sorts of representations that are made regarding conditions in Canada—that is an utter impossibility. There are thousands of people interested in selling land in Canada; there are private individuals who are anxious to further sales. Why, I was so eager to ascertain from my hon friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) whether Father Macdonell had really made the statements attributed to him in the press, why I wished to nail the allegations down, was simply because I myself have been constantly in touch with Father Macdonell with respect to the difficulties he has experienced at Red Deer. Last year, in common with the other persons I have referred to, four farmers from Barra and South Uist, from which these settlers come, visited Canada under the auspices of Father Macdonell and travelled through the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, carrying out a thorough investigation. And they are four members of the present party who are here to-day.

Now, I am willing to assume all the responsibility that my hon. friends would place upon me, and I have taken the greatest precautions to see that those people who are coming to Canada as immigrants shall be given exact information as to the conditions they may expect. But there is one unfortunate circumstance that we must take note of, and that is the fact that too many decided to come at once. Let me state, however, that more than half of these people are comfortably settled; more than half of them have been established since coming to Canada, and twelve families of them will be settled in the next day or two at Westlock and twelve more at Ohaton. I say most emphatically, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a particle of criticism coming to the department or any of its officials in connection with this matter, and I defy hon. gentlemen, either on this side of the House or on the other, or anywhere else for that matter, to adduce any definite evidence to show that on a single occasion we have failed to carry out to the fullest extent any promise we made with respect to the settlement of these people. At their disposal have been placed two of the soldier settlement inspectors, and Mr. Boyd, the superintendent in charge of western Canada, has been on the ground ever since they arrived, offering whatever assistance is within his power. Furthermore, because these people are largely of the Roman Catholic faith, I apealed directly to the Bishop of Edmonton, who is interested in their settlement, and who accordingly has sent a representative to work in conjunction with us in the endeavour properly to establish them. I firmly declare that a large part of the discontent that has arisen among some of these people who are not already settled has been engendered through influence from outside sources, by persons who are not responsible. Such persons go to these settlers and suggest that they should be on free homestead land. God knows, Mr. Speaker, I should be delighted to put them on homesteads if I could; and we did secure positions at Winnipeg and elsewhere, for all those who desired to take them. But these people are anxious to settle in a colony, which is natural, of course; and this is one of the difficulties we have to cope with. I want to assure the House quite positively that I have no complaint to make concerning them. They are a splendid type of people and I trust we shall be able to assist them to adapt themselves completely to their new surroundings. Naturally, however, this is somewhat difficult of achievement just yet; they are in a strange country and in a new environment. If any one of us were transplanted into such changed conditions and new atmosphere we should certainly be homesick for a while.

I might state at this stage that the abandoned buildings and land at Red Deer, of the old Indian school, which was utilized for some years for the training of soldiers who were to be placed on the land, we have now equipped and placed at the disposal of the settlers that they might be comfortable. The four farmers who came here last year, after looking the country over, decided that, from the standpoint of the settlers, the broken country was preferable to the park-like localities. The broken country was perhaps more akin to the land from which they were coming. But these four representatives were delighted with the land; I know, because they were in my office and had a personal conversation with me before going back to Scotland. I do not know that anything else could have been done by us. I do not think we have left undone anything that we might have done. It is true that not all the women and children have been moved from the Red Deer headquarters to their homes on which the men have been established. That has taken some time, and will take some time yet. Probably it will be July 1 before the last members of the party are settled. But the fact that they have found the land perhaps higher in price than they had been led to believe; the probability that stories had been told them that inspired the expectation that there were homes that they could walk into; and the further fact that they have no live stock and little or no capital, have all had a tendency to create a feeling of unrest among them.

Then, when they are told: "You should not be established in this way, you should go on a homestead," they become absolutely dissatisfied. Let me ask my hon. friends who have gone through the homesteading experience in western Canada: Is it a good thing to take a stranger who has no money and place him with his wife and perhaps seven or eight children thirty or forty miles away on a prairie homestead? What earthly chance would he and his family have? I do not believe that that is the proper way to encourage people to come into this country. But there are others who hold the contrary view and say to these newcomers, "You should not take this load of indebtedness upon your shoulders, rather you should secure a grant of land."

We have been endeavouring to give these immigrants the best possible advice, we have placed at their disposal our officials, trained in the business of settling people on the land, and we are leaving no stone unturned to make them comfortable and happy. To be frank, when I heard that 416 souls were coming out together I had doubts about the advisability of so many coming in one party. I do not think they should come in parties of more than 25, which is about the size we can handle most satisfactorily. I do not wish it to be inferred that every new settler will be given the same personal assistance that we are giving to this particular body of immigrants, for I do not think the government could afford to do so, but inasmuch as I believe in what my hon. friend has said, that the best propagandist you can have is a satisfied settler, I have deemed it advisable to see that everything humanly possible should be done by our officials to settle these people comfortably and satisfactorily. Not only that, but I sent Mr. Black, the deputy minister of the department, to Red Deer in order that he might bring to me firsthand information of what is going on, although we are in daily communication with our officials who are already there. I have his wire, sent yesterday, in which he states:

Settlement Hebridean party proceeding satisfactorily. Utmost assistance consistent with their ultimate welfare being given.

I expect to receive a detailed report from Mr. Black within the next day or two, but from what I have heard from Father Macdonell he expects to have every one of these people comfortably settled upon the land.

I do not say for a single moment that there are not some members of this party who have become dissatisfied. They are extremely desirous of settling in a solid community. I need only repeat what I have said on many other occasions, that I am not particularly favourable to such a settlement. I think a man has a better chance of success if he will go in amongst people who know the country and how to take advantage of the local conditions. In this way newcomers quickly learn to adapt themselves to their new environment and are much better off among those already settled on the land than in a solid community of their own people where they are likely to be constantly meeting and discussing real or imaginary grievances, which has a tendency to make them dissatisfied with their new home. Our officials are endeavouring to settle these people in the way I have suggested and to settle them comfortably. True, these newcomers have not very much money, and I am well aware that they will have a somewhat trying time at the start, as all new settlers do; probably they will go through the same experience that many of us went through—many a night I slept under the wagon when I could not get to my house, and I did not have a very comfortable house at that—and I am not speaking of something I do not know anything about. But, unfortunately, if people are encouraged to think they are coming to a bed of roses, that everything is going to be made easy for them and that they will have no difficulties to overcome, there is bound to be trouble and disappointment.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say most emphatically that nothing has been left undone in our efforts to help these people. We have kept constantly in touch with the situation. Some newspapers are prone to spread propaganda rather than take the trouble to investigate the facts. To say that we are not having difficulties would be a stretch of the imagination. Of course we are having difficulties, and I expect to have more, in fact we are bound to have difficulties as long as we are engaged in this work; but I have no apologies to make on behalf of the men in the Department of Immigration for the way in which they have handled the four hundred Hebridean immigrants to this country.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, as a Scottish immigrant I may be allowed to engage in this discussion. Although I know very well that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) is anxious for the welfare and prosperity of these immigrants, I was glad to see the minister (Mr. Stewart) reply with such vigour, because it may be that he has not been getting just exactly fair play. I quite agree with what he says as to the difficulties newcomers will have to surmount, the trials they will have to undergo and perhaps the heartaches they will have to suffer, before they succeed. But I am not saying this to let the Department of Immigration down easily, because I do believe they need to be very critical of the class of people they bring into this country and to be very careful to look after them thoroughly once they reach here. My only reason for speaking is that I have on my desk a few lines which seem to me appropriate in connection with what the Minister of Immigration said about the heartaches and homesickness of these new immigrants, and I now quote them:

> From the lone sheiling of the misty Island;
> Mountains divide us, and the waste of seas;
> Yet still the blood is strong, the heart is Highland,
> And we in dreams behold the Hebrides.
> Fair these broad meads—the hoary woods are grand,
> But we are exiles from our fathers' land.

That portrays faithfully the feelings of these people. I am not a Highlander myself, but I know a little about the Highland temperament. The Highlander has a poetic temperament, and I know very well that when he comes to Canada he is very apt to get just a little downhearted amid his strange surroundings. On the other hand there is a resilience in the Highland nature that will quickly come on the rebound, and I am confident that you will find these men and women making good in the not very far distant future. From the way in which the minister has spoken to-day I am sure he will see to it that his department does everything possible to assist these immigrants, and I can only hope that they will become so well satisfied in their new homes that there will be a continual stream of these Highlanders coming to Canada—the Scotland of North America.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I am quite satisfied that the department has done a great deal for these immigrants, but I think it should have gone somewhat further with advice. There is one side of this matter that perhaps some hon. members may not know. These immigrants come from the island of Lewis, and some of us are aware that this island was purchased, some years ago by Lord Leverhulme, who ever since has been endeavouring to get these people to fish or to emigrate. He believes that they should go to work and fish in the interests of Lord Leverhulme, who at the present time is trying to establish fish markets for his particular benefit, having already acquired control of the manufacture of soap in the Old Country. Therefore he is telling these people to move off to the coast and fish in his interests or get out of the island. That is another side of the matter which should interest parliament, and I would therefore ask the minister to put forth every possible effort to see that these people are suitably settled in this country. They are the people who have supplied their full quota of sailors to the British navy, they are loyalists to the extreme and make the very best class of citizens. I cannot understand their spirit if they are giving up now or becoming disheartened; that is not a quality that can be attributed to the Scottish people of the past. I believe that if these people are given support and encouragement they will make good. But like the member for Hants (Mr. Martell) I think that a mistake has been made. You cannot take the men of that part of the Highlands which are close to the sea, close to the smell of the water, and put them out on a plain and expect them to make good. They will in time drift to the water or to their compatriots; and if there is any trouble now it will be to the interest of this country for the department to assist these people and place them where they will be situated close to their compatriots. I appeal on behalf of Father Macdonell, who was with us in the service at the front, who is an enthusiastic Scot and a Briton, and who is seeking only to see that these people are comfortably established. I have no doubt that he knows well the history of the people on that island and he will endeavour to see that those who come here are placed in this country where they will make good. These facts are worth bringing to the attention of the minister, and I hope he will see that if these people are not satisfied at Red Deer they will be taken to some other part of the country and placed where they will make good rather than be permitted to go to the United States.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) thought it necessary to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a subject based upon an alleged interview in a newspaper as responsible—or as irresponsible, if you choose to put it that way—as the Calgary Albertan. We all want immigration; is this the way to get it? It looks to me as if my good friend the member for Red Deer was looking for trouble rather than an alleviation of trouble. His whole attitude, the tone that he adopted, bespoke a belligerency that perhaps he did not intend. His intimation that these settlers are discouraged is not a surprise to me. If my hon. friend makes speeches out in Red Deer the way he does in this House and the way some other hon. members from Alberta do, then I am not surprised that these settlers get discouraged. I was an immigrant to that western country; I went from Portage la Prairie when there was not a foot of railway between that place and the Pacific. I know how easy it is to discourage immigrants. I know that people who went out there often started back, homesick; possibly it was the first time they had ever left their home fireside. When these Hebrideans, with a strong attachment for their fireside and their country, finding themselves for the first time in a strange land, are told yarns such as are floating round in the newspapers of Alberta, is it any wonder that they are discouraged? As a matter of fact, I have been expecting exactly this thing to happen ever since I heard that these splendid Scottish settlers had gone to Red Deer. What is the nature of the environment there; what is the atmosphere with respect to immigration? What is the attitude of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and of the hon. member for Battle river (Mr. Spencer) with respect to immigration? Have they encouraged immigrants to go there? Have they held out to them the right hand of fellowship when they got there? What has been their general attitude? If these immigrants have read some of the speeches made by the hon. member for Bow River or the hon. member for Red Deer, it is no wonder they have the blues and feel like going back to Scotland. Until hon. gentlemen from Alberta take a different attitude toward immigration and toward these various questions that arise, they are going to be a long while settling the plains of the West from any source whatever.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Will the minister permit a question? He has suggested that the result of some speeches made by members from Alberta has been to discourage immigrants. Is it not likely that the rosy speeches made by Mr. Duncan Marshall in the Old Country, when he was describing conditions in Alberta, and then the actual conditions that the people found when they got there, have been more likely to cause discouragement than any attempt on the part of hon. members from Alberta to portray the facts?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not see any statement by Mr. Duncan Marshall to the effect that my hon. friend describes. If he will let me know what the statements were —I know he was run over by a steer or something of that kind; is that what my hon. friend refers to?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I was referring to the fact that in the literature of the Western Canada Colonization Association it was stated that Mr. Duncan Marshall was over in the Old Land drumming for settlers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what my hon. friend is driving at; it seems to me he is pretty hard put to it for something to chew about. The hon. member for Red Deer asked the question, can the government be relied upon to engage in any considerable scheme of immigration? And he based that question upon an alleged interview published in a newspaper. There is no question that the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer, whether they were so intended or not, could not be accepted in any other way than as a straight attack upon the Department of the Interior. I think the whole incident has been most disgraceful, Mr. Speaker. We will never get anywhere in the development of our country and the settling of unoccupied lands if this kind of attitude is taken by hon. members. And I would point out that arguments of this kind are made in connection with the first effort of any considerable proportion to place first-class settlers in a first-class district in the province of Alberta.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw his motion?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no reply; it is a motion for adjournment, not a substantive motion.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the two ministers who have spoken upon their consistency in the matter of government policy. They have tried to convey to the House the impression that there is practically nothing the matter with these immigrants who are stranded in Alberta; that this is purely a case where some members of the House wish to criticize the government. I think the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) before he concluded his remarks admitted that he had some information from Alberta to the effect that these immigrants were not wholly satisfied with the conditions. Now the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) rises and states that this subject has been brought up, not with a desire to better conditions, but purely for the purpose of criticizing the present administration. I think that statement is wholly unfair; I am convinced that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) brought this matter to the attention of the House and of the government with the sole desire of bringing some relief to those who are in the position that has been described. The minister should be sufficiently familiar with western conditions to know that immigrants cannot be brought into this country and left there without any further attention unless they have a considerable sum of money —that is, if they hope to make good. I would ask him how it is that the Western Canada Colonization Association, which this government is backing, are not taking charge of these men and seeing that they are properly located. As I understand it, that is a duty they are supposed to fulfil under the contract they have entered into with the government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. member has asked me a question and I would like to answer it. No such undertaking is in the contract. The Western Canada Colonization Association wish to bring in immigrants and settle them on the land. They are inducing them to come to this country. These people came to Canada upon the understanding that the services of the Soldier Settlement Board would be placed at their disposal. If I might be permitted to say so, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but think there is an attempt being made to try to blacken this immigration scheme because of the fact that some bad advertising or so-called bad advertising of the Canada Colonization has been promulgated in this House and this particular immigration is being tied up with it. Let me say to my hon. friend that the Canada Colonization has nothing to do with this. I want to reiterate that; I have said it before. If there was any connection at all, it was the pamphlets that my hon. friend speaks about. I have no knowledge of them. These men may have seen these pamphlets in Scotland, but never at any time was there any connection between this party and the Canada Colonization.

Mr. KELLNER: Possibly I did not understand the Minister of Immigration correctly. If they had no association with this enterprise, far be it from me to try and attach any responsibility to them. However, I think the minister will admit this, that if we are going to have agents in Europe encouraging people to come to Canada, most assuredly we must have agents in western Canada to look after them when they get here. I cannot see how there is any prospect of them making good and I think the minister himself is well enough acquainted with conditions in that part of the country to know that there is no prospect of them making good unless there is someone there to encourage them and assist in their settlement when they arrive.

[Mr. Kellner.]

Mr STEWART (Argenteuil): Would the hon. member suggest any better agency than the agency which was placed at their disposal, the trained field men of the Soldier Settlement Board?

Mr. KELLNER: I would like to inform the minister that any agency which is not satisfactory could hardly be said to be a very efficient one.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does the hon. member make the statement that they are unsatisfactory?

Mr. KELLNER: Most assuredly, if we are to believe these reports, that is the only conclusion we can arrive at. I think the minister himself said that he had information that the conditions were not satisfactory.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I must contradict this. I do not want to interrupt, but I cannot sit still and allow such a statement to be made. If any hon. gentleman got that impression from my remarks I must take occasion to correct him. What I said was that some of the members of this party were not satisfied, and I thought that was to be expected, but I did not say that I knew of widespread dissatisfaction.

Mr. KELLNER: The only difference between the minister and myself is that the minister assumed that I said that one hundred per cent of them were dissatisfied, and he admits that his information is that some of them probably are not satisfied.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will go further than that and say that I have definite information that 5 out of 416 are not satisfied. Is that good enough?

Mr. KELLNER: The whole situation as I see it is not one for us to get into an argument over here in this House. If the minister claims that conditions are as good as we can reasonably expect, then for my part I am willing to accept that. But if these people need some special attention, I believe it is well that we should discuss it in the House, and that the government should accept the responsibility and see if they cannot relieve the situation. I have no desire in any way to criticize the minister unfairly or to get him in wrong, if I may use the expression, in the portion of the country from which he comes, but if an unsatisfactory condition does exist I think he should be anxious to lend his assistance and that of the department in an endeavour to remedy it.

I was about to say when I was last interrupted, that if we are going to have agents in Europe to encourage people to come here, in my humble opinion it is necessary to have agents in the West to look after them when they arrive. There was a time several years ago when our two hon. ministers who have spoken homesteaded in the West. Homesteading then could be done very cheaply. But that day is past. The cost of equipment and of living while they are waiting to be settled has greatly increased, the cost of the land has increased, and unless these people have a considerable sum of money with them there is no prospect so far as I can see for them to immediately settle on the land and make good; and unless the department is prepared to have some organization that will take care of these people for the first few months I cannot see any prospect of evading this trouble. I would appeal to the minister, unless he is entirely convinced that conditions are not as represented in that press report, that he lend his influence and the influence of his department to making the conditions at least somewhat better than they are.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I shall not detain the House more than a few moments. I happen to be a son of the Macdonalds of the Hebrides islands. My forefathers came to this country 160 years ago. They came to what was then an unknown land. They landed in Nova Scotia and they had no buildings prepared for them; the land was not ready for the plough; they had to go into the forest and cut down the trees to build their houses. Then they had to clear the land. Day by day and year by year hundreds of these men and women endured these hardships. Then there came in a continuous stream of other men from the Hebrides and the Western islands and peopled the whole of eastern Nova Scotia. The men who came in after years had to go through all these privations that the first settlers endured. There was nobody there representing the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment or any other governmental institution to look after them when they arrived. They fought their way along and they gave to Canada, to the church and along educational lines the leading men of the Dominion for the last seventy-five years. There are more men and women speaking Gaelic in eastern Nova Scotia than there are in the whole Western islands to-day. This year, within a month, we are celebrating the 150th anniversary of the landing of these first Scotch settlers in the town where I have the honour to live and the county I have the honour to represent. I mention this fact because as one who has read the history of the privations of these men and women and the story of their wonderful achievement, I sometimes wonder whether the men of this twentieth century are built of the same fibre as the stalwart men and women of one hundred and fifty years ago, and I would ask the House in considering the situation of these sons of the Hebrides who have come here in these later days to make a comparison in some slight degree between the difficulties they may be undergoing for the moment and the hardships which their fellow-clansmen endured and the difficulties they overcame over one hundred and fifty years ago.

I had the pleasure of meeting Father Macdonell on his way to the West, I had not had the opportunity of meeting him before. I discussed with him, being a Highlander myself, the story of the Macdonald highlanders and the genus of the race from which he and the men whom he was taking to the West sprang. I pointed out to him that, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) has said, the Highlander is naturally a mystic. He is born under the conditions outlined in the poem which the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) so aptly quoted, and it is under such conditions that the genus of the race has developed. When these people are transplanted to the foothills of the Rockies, knowing the sentiments they entertain towards the land of their forefathers, transplanted into a community which is utterly foreign and where conditions are vastly different from those they have been accustomed to from boyhood—

Mr. McISAAC: And a dry province.

Mr. MACDONALD: —I can understand something of the strangeness and perhaps a little irritation that they feel for the moment. My hon. friend suggests it is the absence of the beverage to which they have been accustomed. Well, at least there will be a lack of something out there to cheer them in their dull hours and pessimistic moments. I am sure it would only be fair on the part of the hon. member for Red Deer—in view of the explanation which has been given by the minister, and which indicated that the solicitude of the department and the interest of the government is to see that these sons of old Scotland who have come to the Dominion and gone out to that western land shall be given every possible attention—to withdraw his motion.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I wish to make a few observations on this question because it illustrates to me, and I think will illustrate to the House, the great necessity of taking better care of immigrants when they come to this country than has been the policy of governments of the past. Unfortunately, we have been in the habit in Canada of inviting people to come and settle on the land, and we have allowed them to enter our ports and then left them to look after themselves. Now, no better class of emigrants can come to this country than people from Scotland, and in this connection I wish to draw attention to a statement I noticed in the press this morning from Mr. Woods, an editor of Alberta. I know nothing about this gentleman's politics, or anything of that sort, but he condemns Canada very severely. He has just returned from a trip to the Old Land and he condemns Canada very severely for not taking her proper place in looking after just such settlers as these, settlers from Scotland; in not attempting to get enough of them in comparison with the attempts being made by Australia and New Zealand. And he goes on to make the statement that to-day in the British Isles, Australia has taken the foremost position which Canada occupied up till very recently in the estimation of the people of Britain, because of the lack of energy that we have shown in going after and getting British emigrants for this country, which lack of energy he claims has been particularly shown at the present time. However, it is not that I wish to point out, I wish to impress upon the government that the utmost should be done when we get immigrants to come to this country to look after them on their arrival. The old methods of the past—and all governments pursued those methods—cannot be followed at the present time in this country. Canada must in the future when she gets immigrants—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to say this to my hon. friend: Mr. Woods is a personal friend of mine, and I had the pleasure of seeing him in my office on his way home. I would not interrupt my hon. friend except for one thing and that is his attributing to Mr. Woods the statement that we were still behind in our immigration propaganda in the Old Land. I am sorry Mr. Woods should have stated that because he gave me a different impression while in my office, namely, that once we had been behind in the matter of immigration but we were now in a much better position.

Mr. MANION: I was merely quoting Mr Woods to this effect—the statement must have been given out yesterday to the press because it was published in this morning's paper—that Canada had lost the foremost position which she occupied because of her lack of energy in going after these emigrants. I am not saying this particularly to criticize my hon. friend the minister at all; I know he is in a difficult position. But I think we have not been showing the energy in this country in getting immigrants which we should have shown. I think particularly we are not showing energy, and have never shown energy in this country, in looking after the immigrants when they have arrived. Now, while the facts in this case may not be absolutely as reported by the press, I think the hon. member for Red Deer has done a service in bringing the matter before the House, inasmuch as it will impress upon the present government—because they are the men in power—that when immigrants come here they must be taken care of on their arrival and helped to select proper lands on which to locate. I believe that is the most important feature, perhaps, in connection with our policy—the looking after the immigrants on their arrival in Canada. I just wished to emphasize that, because although I have listened to other speakers I did not notice any of them emphasizing the point as strongly as I am attempting to do. I think it is our duty to do everything in our power to look after these people, no matter where they come from, providing we invite them to come and settle in Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: As to the comparison made between Australia and Canada, I may say that when I was in England a short time ago, I read in the public press bitter complaints of some of these persons who had been gathered up and sent out to Australia—they complained bitterly of the treatment they had received. I am not endorsing the complaints, I only mention the fact to illustrate that we cannot always satisfy immigrants. The Australian government, I am sure, has acted for the best, I have no desire to reflect upon them; but you will always find some people who discover things are not just as they expected to find them and who therefore will make complaints.

Mr. MANION: I do not doubt that at all—if I may say a word in reply,—in fact the statement is absolutely correct. No matter what class of immigrants you get you will have some who are not satisfied, you cannot hope to satisfy everybody. But the fact remains that according to the press reports in England—and I put on Hansard a statement from the London Times—Australia surpasses us to a very great extent and so do some of the other dominions in getting immigrants from the Old Land. So that apparently we are not as successful as we might be in so far as getting immigrants are concerned.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If I may say so, if my hon. friend will look up the statistics for this year he will find the situation is quite satisfactory.

Mr. PUTNAM: What would my hon. friend suggest this government could do which Australia is doing, of a feasible character?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly what Australia is doing, but I will say this: Mr. Ormsby-Gore, one of the prominent members of the government of England, recently put on record in the English Hansard the statement that Canada was not taking advantage of the Empire Settlement organization to the extent that Australia was. I placed that statement upon the Hansard of this House, and I need not now go into the details. I read that statement in the hearing of the minister and he did not deny it, he simply said that the government were making plans to correct that situation in the near future. Having quoted that statement from Mr. Ormsby-Gore I think, perhaps, that meets the case without going into the whys and wherefores as to the facts.

Mr. PUTNAM: We have to guard ourselves in the matter of relevancy—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must draw the attention of hon. members on both sides to the fact that we are not in the committee stage. This is a motion for the adjournment of the House in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, and the debate must therefore be confined to the matter at issue.

Mr. G. A. BRETHEN (East Peterborough): I was a little surprised at the attitude of the minister and the manner in which he received the criticism which has been offered. If the facts as reported in the press are correct, I think it is only a matter of simple justice that the case of these men should be looked into by the Acting Minister of Immigration. If the statements are incorrect they should be denied. Some of these settlers have been placed in our neighbourhood in the province of Ontario, within the last couple of months, under the direction of the Ontario Department of Agriculture. In conversation with the farmers who are employing these men they give the very highest recommendation of the qualifications for service. One farmer in particular, only a couple of weeks ago, stated to me that the man he had employed was one of the finest hands he had ever had in his service. The only difficulty the farmers encountered was that of understanding the language of their help because they use the Gaelic. These men are doing good service and they are happy and contented.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not wander from the main question.

Mr. BRETHEN: I am just coming to that, Mr. Speaker. If these men are satisfied, careful and contented and are giving good service in Ontario, then, in view of the fact that they are men of the same breed and from the same islands—practically they belong to the same party as the settlers in the West—I cannot understand, unless there is something radically wrong with the conditions, that we should find them so dissatisfied at Red Deer. I think the criticism that has been offered is well worthy of the attention of the minister. I hope either that something will be done to correct these statements if they are wrong, or else that the conditions complained of will be corrected.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): As a scion of one of these Scotch emigrants families that came to the Maritime provinces over a century ago, I may be pardoned for making an observation or two on this matter before the debate closes. Apparently most of the speakers are stressing the point that these emigrants are dissatisfied. They are trying to make of this a social question and not an economic one. As I understand the situation from the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer this is purely an economic question. These men are stranded in Red Deer, and they are without work, they have no opportunity of going on the land; it is not a matter of not being satisfied with the social conditions or anything of that sort. It seems to me that hon. members are approaching it entirely from the wrong angle. I think if there is anything to learn from a condition of this kind, it is that people without money should never be brought into the country, unless adequate provision has been made for settling them on the land. The Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) drew an analogy between this and the condition of his ancestors and mine also, when they settled in the Maritime provinces over a century ago. There are differences and very great differences. Those people who went in there in the early days were brought there by an organization. Arrangements were made for settling them on the land. They did not have to buy the land. They were either given it free or allowed to rent land partly prepared for them, where settlement had already been made. Those conditions do not prevail in Alberta at the present time. There is no free land there. They must buy it. Unless some provision is made under the Soldier Settlement Board plan, or some plan of that kind, people should never be brought in, unless there is work for them. I think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), speaking in the House some time ago, advised the government to adopt some such plan as that. Until such a plan is adopted, and until the government is prepared to come forward with some such policy, it is nothing short of folly to bring people in under these circumstances. I rather resent the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) toward the hon. member for Red Deer. There is a certain kind of bird which, when it is pursued and threatened with danger, sticks its head in the sand and thinks all trouble is over. That is the attitude of the minister. He is evading the issue and trying to ignore, rather than to face it.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): As I understand the matter under discussion as introduced by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), it is that, according to report, some hundreds of Hebrideans, who were brought to this country seemingly under the joint efforts of Father Macdonell, the colonization scheme of this country and the Dominion government, are suffering and in great straits. I notice the matter has been received in this House as might have been expected, when we reflect upon the fact that the condition of these immigrants is a striking criticism of the present government's immigration policy, and also a vindication of the statement that has been 5 p.m. made from this side of the House when the policy of the government was under discussion. And now the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) denies this report. He challenges the statement of the hon. member for Red Deer and passes it by as merely a newspaper report of some ill-advised or evil-minded individual. May I challenge that statement of the minister? May I say that some days ago I took sufficient interest in this question to wire to several sources in Alberta to acertain the truth of the matter. I wired to an official of the Alberta government and asked two questions. I asked, first, if the Alberta government had been approached to give relief to these people, and, second, if the press report could be relied upon. The reply came back that, while the government had not been appealed to by Father Macdonell or the officials of the group, yet it had been appealed to by individuals of that group, and the reply also said that the press reports were undeniably true.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I ask the name of the official who replied to the hon. member?

Mr. IRVINE: Hon. Alex Ross, who is Minister of Public Works and of Labour in the Alberta government. I also wired to the editor of the Morning Albertan, the paper which has conducted a special investigation into this matter, and asked if the report could be relied upon. I got a reply from him saying the situation was indeed serious, and the reports were correct. I have received information from other sources that I do not for a moment personally doubt. To say that only five men of that group of hundreds are dissatisfied is, in my opinion, to state something that is wide of the mark, and I think the minister has been misinformed in that regard. I have not been surprised, as I said, at the attitude of the government with regard to this matter. It has been that attitude which has characterized the government on several questions throughout this session and throughout last session. The hon. Minister of the Interior, as I have said, disregards this, and thinks it is merely a story. Then the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) comes along and tells us that he is related to these poor men and women in some far-off way, and that his own ancestors came from the same country some hundreds of years ago. That ought to comfort the Hebridean immigrants. He also tells them that they belong to a great race that has contributed the leading lights, politically and otherwise of this country. I have no doubt at all that will comfort them greatly. But the hon. minister brings forward no proposal that will help to meet the present situation. He brings forward no suggestion that will relieve the pressure from which these men are suffering. He simply smiles at them and says "Remember that you have come from a great country." And that reminds me also of the country they did come from. It reminds me of the sad and tragic conditions which partly led them to leave their country. I am not blaming this government entirely for the fact that all these people came over here. They came from a country that had been oppressed. They came from a little island that was bought out by Lord Leverhulme, the soap man. He bought out their island—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member is in order when he refers to the condition of these people prior to their coming to Canada. Whatever may have been their difficulties and unsatisfactory conditions when they were on their home island has nothing to do with the present discussion.

In calling the attention of the hon. member to this point, I may say that I do so because it is felt that we are wasting too much of the time of the House on matters which are not relevant to questions under discussion, and I think—and in all sincerity—that I express the sentiments of hon. members of the House when I say that hon. members should adhere strictly to the rule. On a motion for the adjournment of the House, to enable a member to speak to a matter of urgent public importance, the debate must be confined strictly to the matter in issue. The condition of these immigrants before they come to Canada has nothing whatever to so do with the subject under discussion.

Mr. IRVINE: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and will leave that point. I had intended showing its bearing upon their position at the present time, but inasmuch as I cannot do so without contravening your ruling I must necessarily abandon the point. I will continue my remarks in respect to the attitude of the government towards this situation. I have referred to the treatment meted out by the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald); now I will consider for a moment the consolation that has been offered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). In the first place he criticizes severely the hon. member for Red Deer for having brought the matter before the House; and not content with that meed of consolation, he makes an attack upon a reputable newspaper for having dared to publish the truth in this matter. The hon. gentleman referred to the Morning Albertan; but I observed that the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart), who knows that newspaper and its editor a good deal better than does the Minister of Agriculture, did not take the same course. That is the contribution of the Minister of Agriculture to the discussion. Then the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) informs us that he saw in a paper some time ago that some immigrants in some other country had met with some difficulty. Well, that ought to meet the situation; if it does not, I do not see where we can look for better advice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, assertions of this sort will not help matters at all. I want to congratulate the membere for Red Deer on having introduced the subject, and I only regret that he did not bring it up when we were going into Supply in order that it might have been taken a little more seriously. This is a matter which touches very closely the policy of the present administration; it reveals a weakness somewhere in their policy, if they have one. It is indeed a tragic beginning of the activities of the Immigration department, which has been subsidized by such a large sum of money from the public treasury. If the object of voting money for immigration was to bring immigrants into the country, then the direct result that has so far been attained has been simply to nullify all the immigration propaganda that could possibly be put out for some years to come. I want to ask the Acting Minister of Immigration to give some assurance to the House at this time that the condition of these people will be investigated immediately by his department, and that relief will be sent them according to their requirements.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I thought I gave that assurance. Did I not tell the members of this House that the Soldier Settlement Board had been working among them ever since they arrived? Did I not tell him as well that representatives of the church were there? Did I not state that Mr. Black, the deputy minister, had been there? If the hon. gentleman has anything further to suggest that might be done I shall be glad to hear what it is.

Mr. IRVINE: I have got some other things to suggest. But it seems to me that if all these things that the minister states have already been done, then there must be inefficiency somewhere, because the results are not yet apparent. If the gentlemen referred to by the minister had been sent out to investigate matters, it ought to have been evident before now what action had been taken, before the newspaper reports to which reference has been made were published. Let me read a short extract from the Morning Bulletin of Edmonton dealing with the subject. This is a paper which neither the Minister of Agriculture nor the Acting Minister of Immigration will question. Under the caption "Investigation Needed", it states:

> Alberta's new residents from the Hebrides Islands are said to be not altogether satisfied wih the treatment they have received, and are inclined to think that there is a difference between the conditions as represented to them and the conditions as they exist. It is not uncommon for a new comer to any strange country to find that the reality does not in all respects coincide with the impression he had formed and brought with him. All the same, these complaints should be looked into promptly and carefully by officials of the immigration department, and full and ample justice done to these settlers. If things have been misrepresented to them they will have to be compensated in some way by somebody. Canada is a good enough country for anyone, without having its conditions and opportunities exaggerated in the hope of drawing immigrants; and to permit that is about the surest way to neutralize immigration effort and waste the public money spent on it. The Dominion government would not of course be a party to such misrepresentation, and it cannot afford to allow other parties to bring people here by such means.

There is a suggestion in the latter part of the editorial that the government seems to have delegated its power to other organizations and now seeks to disclaim all responsibility.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does the hon. gentleman really imply that the government are trying to evade their responsibility? That is the practical statement that he makes. Does he mean to imply anything of the kind? Or is he making a positive statement?

Mr. IRVINE: I said that the policy of the government was such that it could enable them to escape responsibility and blame somebody else. I think I heard the minister this afternoon say that he was willing to accept all responsibility in this matter.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am.

Mr. BUREAU: What more do you want?

Mr. IRVINE: I want a little more than the accepting of responsibility on the part of the minister; I want the carrying out of that responsibility with regard to these people who are suffering. And if the minister who has just asked me a question has anything better to offer than we have had from the Acting Minister of Immigration I am sure the House would be glad to hear him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I emphatically deny that the people are suffering at all; I deny that a single one is suffering. I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one who has suffered up to this moment.

Mr. IRVINE: That is a very safe challenge for the minister to throw down; he can very safely dare me to name one of four hundred persons not one of whom I have ever seen and of not one of whom I have any personal knowledge.

Mr. BUREAU: It is an unsafe challenge when the man knows what he is talking about.

Mr. IRVINE: I will not accept as a challenge that which is an impossibility. But I want to state that I am just as firm in my belief that a great number of these people are suffering as the minister is convinced that they are not. I challenge him to give us the proof of his statement.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot allow that statement to go unchallenged. Irresponsible statements of this character have been made in the House and I have sat in my place and disregarded them, not considering it worth my while to refute them. That day is past, however. No longer will I allow, if I can possibly prevent it, statements of the kind to be made by any hon. gentleman without contradiction. I say now that not a single member of the party in question has suffered in consequence of any laxity on the part of the government; further, I make the positive statement that none of them are suffering now. They are all comfortably housed and will be so housed until such time as they are permanently settled.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister declares that no one of these people has suffered because of any action or inaction on the part of the government. Does he say that they have not suffered at all, for any reason whatever? Am I to understand that not a single one has suffered; that the whole charge is utterly baseless; that the advice of Hon. Alex Ross of the Alberta government is not founded on anything substantial; and that the newspaper reports are all false? What evidence has the minister to give us in support of his sweeping denial?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is a vast difference between suffering and dissatisfaction. Surely the hon. gentleman will admit that. The hon. gentleman is attempting to convey the impression that the people are suffering. The suggestion is entirely erroneous, and not in its wildest flights of imagination has any newspaper made it.

Mr. IRVINE: If the minister will read some of the newspaper reports he will find it stated that Father Macdonell, out of his own pocket, is feeding a hundred and twenty-five of them. If that does not suggest the idea of suffering, then I do not know what the minister would regard as the meaning of that word. I am not going to engage in a debate with the hon. minister as to what he means by "suffering.' I submit that disappointment is the keenest kind of suffering.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Father Macdonell is a paid official of this government, and if he is disbursing money out of his own pocket this government will repay it. Father Macdonell is in charge of this party, and we are holding him responsible. He is acting on behalf of the government of Canada. I do hope my hon. friend will be more careful about the statements he makes because I do not propose to let unfounded assertions go unchallenged.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I am just as careful about the statements I make as is the hon. minister himself, and I am just as particular not to allow any statement of his to go unchallenged as he may be to challenge anything I say. So we might as well understand that just now.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I understand it.

Mr. IRVINE: I have as good authority for making the statements I have made as anyone can expect to have in this or any other country. If these wires to which I have referred are baseless then I must go back to those who sent them and tell them they are mistaken; also, if these newspaper reports are false, then we must advise the newspapers accordingly. But these are the authorities which I have, I have investigated them to the best of my ability, and I submit again that my statement in this regard is just as well founded as any statement which the minister has himself made.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is very adroit at missing the point. He said these people were suffering. That is what I took exception to. Now he is slipping away from the suffering and dealing with dissatisfaction. I want my hon. friend to understand that he made a straight statement that these people were suffering, and I challenged that statement. I still challenge it and ask him to bring forward facts to show that anything of the kind has happened. Dissatisfaction is another matter altogether.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister himself has answered the question. He says I slip away from the point. I do not slip away from any point or any person. He says I charged that these men were suffering. Then he says they are not suffering, they are disappointed. Is not disappointment suffering? In the estimation of the minister can there be suffering more poignant than the disappointment of people who have come from their own land in response to appeals and promises, into what to them is a foreign country, only to find that they have been misinformed and befooled? Can anything be more keen than disappointment, or has the hon. minister no imagination? Can suffering not take place except someone sticks a pin into one or knocks one on the head? That is a crude concept of suffering. My conception covers a bigger field. If you prove that these people have not suffered at all from want or cold, which has not been proven, there is no doubt that they have suffered and are still suffering in the keenest way from disappointment brought about by broken promises on the part of the government made in the name of the people in a new country. I conclude, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. IRVINE: I am very glad to notice, Mr. Speaker, that the government and its supporters have taken my remarks so keenly, because it proves to me that I am hitting the nail on the head, or to change the analogy, am getting under their skins. I wish they would be as particular in the future about their own statements and about investigating matters as I have been in this particular case. And I hope that the enthusiasm which they display against anyone who criticizes their policy will be switched into carrying their policy out in a positive manner. When that happens they will be doing a greater service to this country than they have yet accomplished, and we shall not have these people suffering as they are doing now. I say suffering, advisedly, Mr. Speaker, knowing that the mental suffering of these people is much keener than any physical suffering can possibly be. That is all I wish to say on the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: In justice to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) who expressed a desire to reply, I would remind him that on a substantive motion only can a reply be made. If the hon. member will refer to paragraph 263 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms he will find the following definition of a substantive motion:

> By a substantive motion is meant a motion not incidental to a proceeding before the House, and which can be dealt with by amendment or by the distinct vote of the House.

This motion for adjournment not being a substantive motion, a reply cannot be allowed. That is why I ruled out the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker.

Motion (Mr. Speakman) to adjourn withdrawn.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

On the order:

That the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient to amend section six of the Judges Act, as enacted by chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920, by providing that the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario shall be as follows:—

	Per Annum
(a) The Chief Justice of Ontario..	$10,000
(b) The Chief Justice of the Second Divisional Court..	10,000
(c) Eight Justices of Appeal, each.. ..	9,000
(d) Nine judges of the High Court Division, each..	9,000

Provided that the judge who at present holds the office of Chief Justice of the Exchequer Division, and the judge who at present holds the office of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, shall, each respectively, and irrespective of the Division, Appellate or High Court, to which he may be assigned, continue to receive the salary of $10,000 which he is now receiving instead of the salary which he would otherwise receive; but that upon a vacancy occurring in the office of Chief Justice of the Exchequer Division, or in the office of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the salary of such Chief Justice shall cease; and provided moreover that, when the two last mentioned offices shall have been abolished, the Chief Justice who may be appointed to preside over the High Court Division shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum, and the number of salaries hereby authorized for the judges of the High Court Division shall thereupon be reduced to eight.

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the following resolution which appears as No. 44 on the order paper may be referred to the Committee of the Whole with the preceding resolution:

(1) That it is expedient to amend section seventeen of the Judges Act, as enacted by chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1914, and to provide that the salaries of the judges of the Circuit Court of the district of Montreal shall be as follows:—The senior judge of the said court, $8,000 per annum, and three other judges of the said court each $7,000 per annum; and to provide that the provisions of section ten of chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920 shall not apply to judges of the Circuit Court;

(2) That section two of the Act to amend the Judges Act, chapter fifty-nine of the statutes of 1919, relating to the salaries of local judges in Admiralty, be repealed.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the proposed resolutions, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On the first resolution:

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the following resolution which appears as No. 44 on the order paper may be referred to the Committee of the Whole with the preceding resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It will be necessary to amend the tenth line where the word "Division" also occurs.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, wherever it appears in connection with Exchequer it is amended in the same way.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. BUREAU: Is that for the Exchequer Court?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, there is no Exchequer Court. It is simply the Exchequer.

Mr. BUREAU: I have no objection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that the object of this resolution is to give effect to the provincial legislation which has recently been enacted in Ontario?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is what I was going to explain, Mr. Chairman.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there is any change in the salaries; it is simply carrying out the former intention as to what shall become of the two other divisions when the chiefs of those divisions no longer serve.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: By the last amendment passed by the legislature of Ontario it is provided that there shall be two appellate divisions and a high court division. The first appellate division will be presided over by the Chief Justice of Ontario, and there will be a second chief justice of the second division. When a vacancy occurs in the Exchequer Court or Court of Common Pleas the two judges now occupying those positions are not to be replaced. There will be a Chief Justice of the High Court, with the same number of judges. The judges of the Appellate Divisions will be known as Judges of Appeal. As my hon. friend has just suggested there is no increase in the number of judges and no increase in salaries.

Mr. CHURCH: This reduction is all right as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The province fixes the number of judges—and the Drury-Raney government kept many judges serving on their commissions. In the first place, there is a considerable decline in the litigation in Ontario in the High Court of Justice—a decline of from 25 to 30 per cent. The jurisdiction of the county courts has been greatly increased; fully 100 per cent; work that formerly was done by the High Court of Justice has been transferred to the county courts and the latter court is supplanting the High Court. In my opinion there are too many High Court judges in Ontario. Four of these judges were away the greater part of two years serving on Ontario government commissions—one of them on a purely political commission—going into the whole question of some $326,000,000 expended by municipalities on cheap light, power and radials. Two of these judges actually left their judicial duties to work on these political commissions—timber, hydro, radials and other political matters—contrary to the statute passed by this House some years ago. Two of them left their duties for the greater part of two years, and, in the case of the two others, for a large portion of one year and a portion of another year respectively. Some of these judges can take holidays at any time, spring, summer, autumn or winter, to say nothing of the long vacation. While there are many good men, we have not on the bench to-day, on the average in Ontario, the men of ability that we had twenty-five years ago. I would point out that when a nation abounds in physicians it grows thin in people and when a nation abounds in judges and justices of the peace, as is the case in Ontario, especially in judges who can leave their judicial duties and go, as it were, on the political bench, then it becomes scarce in politicians. Some of these commission judges "toil not neither do they spin" at purely judicial court work. Now, as to the statute that was passed by the Union government in 1920, chapter 56, setting out an array of some 26 Ontario judges, I may say that no one was appointed who was a Conservative—everybody had to be Liberal to get an appointment from the Union government. I never belonged to the Union party myself, but one of the most extravagant pieces of legislation passed by the Union government was that same Judges Act of 1920, which is cited in the resolution, chapter 56 of the Statutes of Canada, 1920. Under that act there are three or four Chief Justices, some twenty-five High Court judges for Ontario, embracing a population of 2,500,000; in other words, Ontario has more or nearly as many High Court judges as the whole of England. If the present condition continues there will hardly be a lawyer in the province who is not also a judge. That will be like the condition that prevails in the United States, where practically every lawyer is a judge or is called judge and if he is not one to-day he hopes to be one tomorrow. I hope the minister will have a further survey made of this whole matter. I suggest that he inquire into the number of hours these judges sit, the number of holidays they take, the length of time they spend in giving attention to judicial duties and to political commissions. notwithstanding the statutes of 1920 by which in consideration of a raise in salary they were not to take these commissions. There is going to be an election in Ontario in a few days and we will not need next year a lot of these commission judges at all, because when they have abandoned their commissions there will be even less or nothing left for them to do. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, Ontario has too many judges and there should be further co-ordination of judges there and a reduction could be made and a substantial economy effected. Judges should stick to their purely judicial work and keep out of political commissions to help this party and that.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We cannot reduce the number of judges in any province. The courts are created by the province and we provide the salaries of the judges; if any change is to be made in the number of judges, it must be done by the province. As to my hon. friend's allegation that some of the judges in Ontario have been acting on commissions connected with political matters, I do not see how that could be so, having regard to the amendment to which he has referred. It is true there was a proviso to cover investigations which had been started before the amendment was passed, but I do not see how any judge could subsequently act as my hon. friend has suggested without contravening the statute.

First resolution agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The second resolution is as follows:

Resolved, (1) That it is expedient to amend section seventeen of the Judges Act, as enacted by chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1914, and to provide that the salaries of the judges of the Circuit Court of the district of Montreal shall be as follows:—The senior judge of the said court, $8,000 per annum, and three other judges of the said court each $7,000 per annum; and to provide that the provisions of section ten of chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920 shall not apply to judges of the Circuit Court;

(2) That section two of the act to amend the Judges Act, chapter fifty-nine of the statutes of 1919, relating to the salaries of local judges in Admiralty, be repealed.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The Circuit Court of Montreal is a division of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec; it is a special court for the district of Montreal. The jurisdiction which is given to these four judges represents a population of nearly a million people. In the other districts the administration of justice in the circuit jurisdiction is carried out by the judges of the Superior Court. The statistics show that in the district of Montreal these four judges have to decide more cases than all the judges of the Superior Court in the other districts. Their present salary is $5,500, and that of the Chief Justice is $6,000. We propose to give an increase of $1,500 to the three puisne judges and an increase of $2,000 to the Chief Justice. When the increase was given to the judges of the Superior Court in 1910 or 1911, these circuit court judges were so much regarded as judges of the Superior Court that it was assumed they would get the increase, and the result was that they were forgotten. They tried to have the error corrected later on, but they only obtained an increase of some $1,500. Since that time they have been asking that they be given proper treatment, and it is only after the receipt of resolutions from the bar of the province of Quebec and from the whole population of the district of Montreal that we bring down this resolution, which is, I think, only just, providing for a fair remuneration of these judges.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it from what my hon. friend says that the circuit court of Montreal is somewhat similar in its jurisdiction to the county courts of Ontario.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Oh, no.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the limit in the Ontario county court?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to ask my hon. friend what the difference was. When I was practising the county court limit was $500, but that has been very greatly increased. I think now they can try practically anything under certain conditions. I think that is right, Mr. Chairman? You would be familiar with it being an active practitioner in the province.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that to-day under certain conditions they can try suits involving any amount no matter how big.

Mr. BUREAU: All appealable?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes, and I have no doubt that the decisions of the circuit court would be appealable.

Mr. BUREAU: Not to the amount of $100.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Anything as small as that would be looked after in Ontario by the division court. In addition, the county courts in Ontario have a very large jurisdiction in criminal matters. The way matters are now conducted they have almost exclusive jurisdiction in criminal matters outside of murder and rape cases. I would ask my hon. friend if he has statistics of the business done, for example, in Toronto on the one hand by the three judges—is it not?—that are working there and by the Montreal circuit judges on the other hand, and what are the salaries of the Toronto judges?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There is a great difference between the county court of Ontario and the circuit court of Montreal. As I have said, this is a division of the Superior Court of the province just like a division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and if it was not for the fact that we have four judges acting as judges of the circuit court of Montreal we would have to appoint four judges of the Superior Court to do the work. My hon. friend speaks of the county court judges in Ontario.

Mr. BUREAU: The circuit court is also a court of appeal.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes. My hon. friend says that the county court judges of Ontario have a very large jurisdiction. But they are judges for counties or districts. In the case of the four judges of the circuit court of Montreal they have jurisdiction over certainly not less than perhaps twenty-two or twenty-three counties in the province of Quebec, and they have more cases than all the other judges of the Superior Court in the province of Quebec. There is no appeal from the judgment of this court, which means that it is a Superior Court. They have exclusive jurisdiction in matters of municipalities, municipal election petitions, school matters—

Mr. BUREAU: Fish and game laws.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes. There is no limit to their jurisdiction. There are cases that I could mention if necessary where the amount involved was over $200,000, from which judgment there was no appeal. Then as to the difference in qualifications between the judges in Ontario they cannot be appointed before five years' practice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It used to be ten years when I was at the bar.

Mr. BUREAU: These younger people are moving faster than we did in our day.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There has always been a difference between the county court judges in Ontario and the circuit court judges in Montreal. The circuit court judges in Montreal now receive $5,500, and the chief justice $6,000. In Ontario the county court judges are paid $5,000. In Montreal the judges have to give all their time to their administration, while in Ontario the judges are allowed to act as judges for the province, and most if not all of them receive an additional indemnity of $1,000 as senior judge. Our judges in Montreal are not allowed to do anything outside of the court, and that is another reason why the difference might be justified. At all events, I repeat the circuit court judges of Montreal were never treated exactly the same as the county court judges of Ontario, and if you consider the extent of their jurisdiction I think it is only fair that we should give them this increase of indemnity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister says that the difference of treatment as between the county court judges of Ontario and the circuit court judges of Montreal has always been there. I am not suggesting that the difference of treatment should cease, but if there be a change in the one why should not the same difference of treatment be maintained? I am not asking for equality.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have already explained that there was an error in 1911 when an increase was given to the judges of the Superior Court. If you take the judges in Ontario you will see that there are fifty-two county court judges and fourteen district court judges. We have forty-eight judges of the Superior Court and the Court of King's Bench in Quebec, and four judges of the circuit court, Montreal. Altogether in Ontario you have eighty-five judges as compared with fifty-two in Quebec. Now as to the amount paid in salaries, we find that this government pays to the judges of Ontario $504,000 and to the judges of Quebec $457,500, including the increase now proposed. That seems about right in proportion to the population of the two provinces.

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask the minister to consider the case of the county court judges of Toronto and York county on a parity with this case. There was a memorandum presented to the minister's predecessor by the bar of York county and the county court judges, and I would be glad if the minister would look into it. These judges are doing much of the work of the High Court judges, much extra work is being imposed upon them by both Houses of Parliament. They are in the same category as the Montreal circuit court judges and do the same volume of work.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I will look into that petition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as the volume of work done by the judges of Toronto and Montreal is concerned, I think the minister will find that it is practically the same.

Mr. BUREAU: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister shakes his head. He has not looked into the petition yet. Perhaps he does not know how much work is being done in Toronto courts and York county. There is an extremely large amount and the duties of the judges are very, very onerous. I could not quite follow my hon. friend when he said that a mistake was made in 1911.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I should not say a mistake. The minister at that time thought that the judges of the circuit court were being treated exactly the same as the judges of the Superior Court.

Mr. BUREAU: He thought they were included in the increase.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think they were on a parity before.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No they were not, but he was under the impression when amending the statute to provide for an increase of indemnity for the Superior Court judges that the circuit court judges were included.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How do their salaries now compare with the Superior Court judges in Montreal?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The Superior Court judges receive $10,000 and the circuit court judges under this legislation will receive $7,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about the next section, what does it mean?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That relates to the judges of the Admiralty Court. It was provided in the statutes of 1919 that when the salaries of the judges were increased they should not be paid any salary if they acted as judges in Admiralty, but there was a proviso to the effect that those who are acting as judges in Admiralty should continue to receive it. It was represented last session that some of the judges were paid fees by litigants in virtue of a ruling of the Exchequer Court. We thought it was not proper that judges should be paid by fees—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: —and we propose that they should get their $1,000 if they are judges of the Supreme Court.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This means there is an increase of $1,000 in judicial salaries whenever the judge happens to hold an appointment in Admiralty as well?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many cases will that apply to?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Two cases, I understand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: One in Halifax and one in Montreal. One is Judge Maclennan. I do not remember the name of the other, but I think it is Judge Mellish.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we to understand that either of these two judges, and I know they are gentlemen of legal attainments and eminence, has been in the habit of getting fees from litigants?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are these chief justices or puisne judges?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Puisne judges.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As a matter of fact the judges that hold these extra offices, as a general rule, have their other court duties looked after by their brethren when they are doing that particular work. Does my hon. friend think there should be any pay at all? Why should one puisne judge have a perquisite and another puisne judge none—particularly when, as I say, the almost universal rule is that the work of the regular court is not allowed to be interfered with by the business of the Admiralty Division; some other judge does it?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: As I said, there was an amendment passed in 1919 with respect to the judges in Admiralty which reads as follows:

> No salary shall be paid to any local judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court under the provisions of this section who is a judge of any provincial superior court, provided, that the provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any local judge in Admiralty who was or is appointed before the coming into force of this act.

In the province of Quebec we had Judge Lyman, I think—I do not remember the exact name— who was receiving an additional salary of $1,000. He died and was replaced by Judge Maclennan in 1920. Judge Maclennan, being deprived of that additional salary of $1,000, received fees under that ruling of the Exchequer Court and has been receiving them ever since. When we submitted certain amendments to the consideration of the House at the beginning of the present session seeking to amend the Admiralty Act we declared that in the future no judge should be allowed to receive fees. That bill is now before the Senate. It was represented, however, that we were not acting fairly to Judge Maclennan and the other judge I have mentioned, because they had been authorized by the previous administration to receive such fees and that if they were prohibited in the future from receiving fees they should be compensated in some other way. We cannot find any other means than the method we propose now of paying the judges of any supreme or superior court of the province this additional salary. I may say that all the judges who are acting as judges in admiralty were doing their ordinary work in a perfectly satisfactory manner. No reproach of any kind was made against them on any such ground, and I think we should allow them this additional remuneration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend did not catch the point I was making. I understand this will apply only to two gentlemen in the case of both of whom, certainly in the case of one, the appointment took place after the passage of the act to which the minister refers so that there is no right to this extra salary under that act. There was a clear intimation from parliament that there should not be any extra fee paid for that service, therefore, if special fees are accepted, I do not care how it was done, it is acting directly against the intent of that statute. In view of the bill which is before the Senate it seems to me the matter should stand just as it is, without that increase of $1,000, unless the minister thinks the statute of 1920 was entirely wrong. If the minister thinks the policy laid down by parliament was wrong well and good, but if he believes parliament was right when it said there should not be this extra salary I do not think the mere fact that these gentlemen were enabled to get fees in some other way should influence him.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This is special work of a judicial character. There is nothing in the amendment of 1919 which said the judges would not be allowed to receive any fees It was after the appointment of Judge Maclennan that the Exchequer Court authorized the payment of fees to judges. This was known by the Minister of Justice and it was approved by the department. This has been going on now for nearly four years, and if we say that we are going to deprive these judges of these fees and tell them that they will have to act in future without remuneration of any kind I do not see how we can justify our position. The only remedy, it seems to me, is to revert to the old system and pay them an additional salary of $1,000.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Sir Lomer Gouin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 201, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Sir LOMER GOUIN moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of judges of Supreme Court of Ontario.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I move an amendment to clause 1, which will read as follows:

Provided further that any judge who enjoys immunity from taxes or deductions by reason of the provisions of section 11 of chapter 56 of the statutes of 1920, entitled "An Act to amend the Judges Act," shall continue to enjoy that immunity, but shall not, either in respect of the judicial office which he now holds, or in respect of any judicial office to which he may be hereafter appointed, the salary of which is provided for by this section, receive any salary in addition to that which he is receiving at the time of the passing of this act, unless he elect, as he may effectively do, at or within three months after his appointment to any such latter office, wholly to waive or forego such immunity from taxes or deductions.

In 1920 an exemption was granted to the judges whose salaries were increased, and the effect of the amendment was that those who refused the increased salary would be exempt from the income tax, changing the status of the judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. But with respect to those who are to be removed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario we thought we would make it clear that this would apply. If they do not accept the increased salary they will have the benefit of the exemption.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not the section before me, but I will take the minister's statement. The statement I understand to be that as these may be looked upon as new appointments under the new section, the minister desires that the same safeguards should be thrown around the new judges as the gentlemen who were judges before, and who still are judges enjoying under the present legislation. In other words, the minister does not change the legislation, but makes it clear.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is on account of the new commission we are going to give them.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "Division," occurring after the word "Exchequer" will be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Judges may act as arbitrators or assessors under Railway Act or public act.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: By this amendment which was referred to just now, it was provided that judges nominated by the Governor in Council under the provision mentioned in this section shall act as commissioners or arbitrators, provided this enactment shall not interfere with judges who are at present acting as commissioners or arbitrators completing the work on which they are engaged. The amendment is to the effect that the judges will be authorized to act as arbitrators in railway matters. If hon. members will look at the Railway Act of Canada and some of the provincial railway acts, they will find that judges are acting as arbitrators. Under this amendment they are no longer allowed to act in that capacity. But arbitration in railway matters of expropriation is of a judicial character, and we do not see that there could be an objection to that. There could not be any such objection raised as was formerly raised, because under the amendment the judges will not be allowed to investigate any political matters. They will only investigate matters of a judicial character. They will be permitted to act as arbitrators in railway matters, and in matters for the fixing of damages in cases where provincial governments or the federal government may be interested.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister tell me that, in so far as railway questions are concerned, and in so far as the assessment of damages under the provincial acts is concerned, the old law is to be entirely restored?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In regard to railway matters, it is provided in the statutes of 1919 that a judge may act as arbitrator. It is the same with regard to the provinces. The judges will not be prevented by the amendment of 1921 from acting in such cases.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is something entirely new to me. I have not had a chance to look it up at all, but my impression was that all the amendment did before was to prevent any fees being paid.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: They are not allowed to receive any fees under this amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They get no fees under the amendment.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No.

Mr. CHURCH: I think the principle of permitting judges to act as arbitrators in railway matters is a very bad one. As everybody knows the railways are in politics all the time, and if we have judges acting as arbitrators in railway matters, we are going to have judges in politics, more or less, also. We had an illustration of the principle of this legislation in Ontario, where judges served on arbitrations as to electric railway matters, and in assessing damages or compensation in these matters. It was found by Sir Oliver Mowat to be a very bad principle. In arbitrations in regard to taking over electric lines, street railway plants or power and gas plants, in Ontario, experience proved that it was a very bad principle to have judges on these commissions, because appeals would have to be taken from the arbitration board in many cases on questions of fact, and also on questions of law, and some of the judges would sit in appeal in cases where they had acted as arbitrators. We have had the judges acting in 1891-2 in the matter of the old Toronto Railway Company. The railway situation being what it is in Canada, judges should stay off these railway arbitrations. These arbitration judges will be looking for passes and all kinds of favours from the railways, and in civil cases against these same railways the judges should be in a position to be impartial. This is a wrong principle, and a step in the wrong direction, and is not in the best interests of the judiciary.

On section 4—Additional $1,000 to judge of Circuit Court.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think this section is a proper one. It merely strikes out the word "circuit."

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In 1920 an increase of $1,000 was granted to the judges of the Supreme and county courts. In giving an increase to the judges of the Supreme Court of Montreal, we struck out the word "Circuit". The circuit judges will not receive that $1,000 in the future.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is rather difficult to follow it.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Section 10 of chapter 56 of 1920 reads:

> Every judge of every circuit, county and district court shall be paid $1,000 per annum as an addition to his present salary, etc.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right; I understand it now.

If by way of loans, the amount or amounts advanced shall be repayable on demand, with interest at the rate fixed by the Governor in Council, from time to time, payable half-yearly, secured if and when directed by the Governor in Council by mortgage or mortgages upon such properties, in such form and containing such terms and conditions, not inconsistent herewith, as the Governor in Council may approve.

If by way of guarantee, any such guarantee may be of the principal and interest of the notes and obligations or securities of one or more of the said companies specified by the Governor in Council and may be signed by the Minister of Finance, on behalf of His Majesty, in such form and on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine to be appropriate and applicable thereto, $73,000,000.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I think I have nothing to add, Mr. Chairman, to my statement which I presented a few weeks ago as to the standing and prospects of the Canadian National Railways, but I shall be glad to give hon. members any further information which they may require.

Mr. MILLAR: Does "Acquisition of property" include the hotel being acquired in Paris? Is that provided for in this vote?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. STEVENS: What appropriation would that expenditure be taken from?

Mr. GRAHAM: I had better explain that to clear the air. The president of the Canadian National Railway Company, Sir Henry Thornton, having resided in Paris for some time both before and after his appointment, came to the conclusion that the Canadian National Railways should have an office on one of the main streets of the French capital, as the system is practically unknown on the Continent, that is, it is not anywhere linked up with the name of Canada. That view was corroborated the other night by the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) when he asked me: How is it that people from the Old Land travelling in Canada never heard of the Canadian National Railways until they reached this country? He gave an instance of travelling a few weeks ago on the train and meeting people who had just come over and who had never heard of the Canadian National line. The president is very strong in the view that we ought to have some place in Paris to which every person goes and from which everybody who comes from the Continent emanates, as it were, the result being to enable the Canadian National system to secure its share of the immigration traffic as well as of the freight traffic; and I think he had this particular building in mind. However, some little time ago he received word that just the kind of building he required so far as location was concerned could be secured. He immediately wired to a gentleman in Paris to secure this building, as there were two or three other parties after it, and the Canadian National would temporarily finance it. The building was secured not in the name of the Canadian National or in the name of the government, but in the name of this gentleman, with the understanding, of course, that the Canadian National could have it, the government could have it or any other company could have it, provided that the accommodation would be afforded to the Canadian National Railway for its operations. That was done and the building was secured. A syndicate has been formed to take it over; a gentleman is leaving New York, I think on the fifteenth of June, to conclude the details. The Canadian National will thus have a home in one of the best locations in the city of Paris, where it will hereafter be on the map, without any capital expenditure on the part of the Dominion of Canada or of the Canadian National Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that the road is financing the purchase in the meantime. How much money is being used?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think there is no money being used. We guaranteed the bank so that this gentleman could go to the bank and finance the building. As soon as the syndicate takes over the building that guarantee will lapse.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So the guarantee is being given to the bank?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For how much?

Mr. GRAHAM: About $2,000,000, I am told.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That guarantee would be given, I assume to a Canadian bank?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the Canadian bank would have to send that $2,000,000 over to Paris?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not exactly the detail, I think, of the banking. The Canadian National would deposit the security here in cash or otherwise, and the bank would lend the gentleman in Paris the money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that a deposit has been made with the bank of collateral of the railway sufficient to raise $2,000,000. What collateral was deposited? Where did that come from?

Mr. GRAHAM: Did I use the word "collateral?" One of the Canadian National deposits was placed in the bank, to remain there until such time as the building is taken over.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, well, that is better. So that $2,000,000 in cash of the railway was applied to that purpose?

Mr. GRAHAM: To the bank.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two million dollars cash of the railway was deposited in a bank?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Special account, to be used for the purchase of that building?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, put it any other way you like.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is to be retained by the bank as a financial backing in connection with the loan to this man of the money on his note.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well now, my hon. friend will agree with me that that is playing with words. What happens is this: The sum of $2,000,000 of the funds of the Canadian National Railway is deposited in a bank for a specific purpose, namely, to enable somebody else in Paris to get $2,000,000 from that same bank. Now, is that wrong?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course it is correct. In other words the system is paying the money to finance this deal.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now, let us go a little further. It has not yet been determined whether the railway keeps the property, or whether some other company gets the property, or whether some syndicate is to be allowed to have it. Am I right in so understanding the minister?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what is the fact?

Mr. GRAHAM: As I said a few moments ago, the property is being taken over by a syndicate, a representative of which leaves here in two or three days for Paris to complete the arrangements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who composes the Syndicate?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not care to give the names or the details until the arrangements are completed—a reputable body of men having no connection with the Canadian National Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are putting up $2,000,000 for a syndicate—

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are going to use our $2,000,000 for the purpose of securing some property which Sir Henry Thornton thinks is a good one. Surely the committee has the right to know who are interested in this syndicate; surely we have a right to know with whom we are dealing. There cannot be any mystery about it: it has been in the papers. What is the mystery?

Mr. GRAHAM: No mystery.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then if there be no mystery, why cannot we get the facts?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no mystery, but my hon. friend knows as a business man that this syndicate does not want its name to be published broadcast until the arrangements are completed. In the meantime we hold a mortgage on the property to its full value.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why should there be any secrecy about it? Is it because there is to be a difference in price?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it because there is to be a commission here or a commission there?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is nothing of the kind; if everything is open and above board, why can we not be told who the syndicate is? I should think these patriotic gentlemen ought to get the honour of having their names stated as having helped out Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think they did it for patriotism. I think they have made a good business deal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On what terms did they get it?

Mr. GRAHAM: They took it exactly at the cost to the gentleman in Paris—no commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is the gentlemen in Paris who is handling this $2,000,000 for us?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. A. Aronovici.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is Mr. Aronovici?

Mr. GRAHAM: He was a former agent of the Great Eastern Railway and is now agent of the Canadian National Railways for the continent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see. Is the syndicate composed of New York gentlemen? The minister made mention of New York.

Mr. GRAHAM: New York.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that a New York syndicate is going to look after this a little later, and my hon. friend, I take it from what he says, will not tell us anything more about it than that? Now I want to ask my friend if he can give me one reason why we should not get the facts. The money is paid. Mr. Aronovici in Paris has got the money. Why cannot we know for whom he has got it?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend knows that if he were in my place he would do just as I am doing. In a transaction of this nature with a syndicate there is certain financing they have to do, and I do not think it is fair for my hon. friend to ask me, I do not think he expects me to tell him, the names of this syndicate until such time as the arrangement is completed and everybody will know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not follow my hon. friend. One minute apparently the syndicate is working for us, and another minute they are working for themselves. I cannot for the life of me see why this country cannot know who is looking after this deal. Two million dollars is a whole lot of money. Before we go any further, let me ask at this point from what vote was that $2,000,000 taken?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was not purchase money. It was a deposit of the Canadian National Railway Company from current funds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I ask my friend, from what vote was that taken?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend knows enough of the railway business to know that that can be done without being taken from any vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, indeed, I do not, Mr. Chairman, if it is done properly.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a question of opinion of course. I say it was done properly. It was taken from the current funds temporarily only of the Canadian National Railway just as any railway company or any big concern would do. It was not taken from any special vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Everybody knows that the system is being run at a loss, and that there is $73,000,000 asked for this year in order to make up the loss. Everybody knows that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is continually having to provide funds for the purpose of making up deficits. Further, everybody must know and the minister knows perfectly well that if $2,000,000 is taken for one purpose it is just so much money taken out of the treasury of Canada, and it can only be taken out of the treasury of Canada by means of a vote. It is just so much more to make good on the one hand, or else some funds provided by the Finance department have been used for the purpose of making that deposit, and it would take a pretty good accountant probably to trace it out. The fact is, this company having received cash advances, receiving now cash advances, must in effect have diverted those cash advances to the extent of $2,000,000 for this purpose, and I ask my friend where it is coming from.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has heard my explanation. I will give it again. One would think to hear my hon. friend that the Canadian National Railway did not collect any money, never had any money on hand. It collects over $200,000,000 outside of anything it gets from the government. Out of its revenue it temporarily placed this money in the bank, as it often leaves money in the bank, for this specific purpose. If it were permanent my hon. friend would be right, but it is only temporary and he is not right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This fund evidently was specially ear-marked. My hon. friend talks about a special deposit. Was that deposit made in the regular bank of the company or was it deposited in some outside bank?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was made in one of the regular banks of the company. They deal with two or three banks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was it the regular Grand Trunk bank? What is the regular bank now anyway?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are six.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us have them.

Mr. GRAHAM: Bank of Montreal, Royal Bank, Bank of Toronto, Bank of Commerce, Bank of Nova Scotia and La Banque Nationale.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have got quite a collection of banks now to look after our book-keeping. Which particular bank was chosen for this particular deposit?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Bank of Toronto.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was there any overdraft made at that time in any of the banks?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to ask my friend whether it is not a fact that at the time this deposit was made there was an overdraft in one of these six banks he has mentioned.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed there was not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No overdraft. Then what was the position in so far as the Department of Finance is concerned? What vouchers has my hon. friend been putting through?

Mr. FIELDING: The Department of Finance has had no part in it whatever.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, it would not take that form. I quite understand the Department of Finance would have nothing to do with it. I was not asking for any voucher in connection with this, but I am asking in connection with other financial matters has the Department of Finance been making advances to make good deficits?

Mr. FIELDING: Only such advances as parliament has voted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right, and I assume the advances are still being made.

Mr. FIELDING: Out of the appropriation, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are still being made. Now I am going to ask the Minister of Railways when that $2,000,000 was put up.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is difficult to say from memory just what the date was, maybe about the middle of May.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The money was deposited about the middle of May. Then I am going to ask the Minister of Finance if he has been making any advances to the system during April or May. of this current year.

Mr. FIELDING: There has been no special advance whatever in connection with this transaction. The Railway department is making its usual draft on the Finance department and so long as there is money appropriated by parliament that is all we will know about it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are these advances still going on?

Mr. FIELDING: If we are not actually paying now, it must have been because they have failed to ask for it. They are asking us all the time and we sometimes have difficulty in providing the necessary, but we get it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much has my hon. friend been asked to provide that is being held up at the present time?

Mr. FIELDING: I could not say at the moment. This particular transaction has not come before my department at all. Any advances that have been made have been made in the usual routine. The Railway department asks us to give them money on account of an appropriation, and when we have it we give it to them, and when we have not we try and look it up.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite understand there has been the proper routine and that this request for $2,000,000 did not come to the Finance department at all. This $2,000,000 is taken from funds which otherwise would have gone in easing the Department of Finance so, of course, my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance would not know anything about it one way or the other. I am going to ask the Minister of Railways again the names of the syndicate which gets the benefit of the financing of this deal.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not admit that the syndicate gets any advantage. I have told my hon. friend once that it would not be fair to give that information. He would not do it himself. I know his object in pressing, but I must decline to give him the names of these gentlemen until the arrangement is completed. It would not be fair to them and it would not be fair to the transaction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right. I endeavour to put myself in the position my hon. friend has put himself in of removing from the proper custody $2,000,000 of the public funds of this country for the purpose of a syndicate, whether they are making money out of it or not. My hon. friend said a few minutes ago that the syndicate had to make some money out of it. I ask him now for the names of the syndicate.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has the answer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good. Then my hon. friend for reasons best known to himself, refuses to give me the information.

Mr. GRAHAM: For reasons of fairness to the men with whom the railway is dealing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to put another question to my hon. friend: If the syndicate takes it, what guarantee of rent is being made by the railway to the syndicate?

Mr. GRAHAM: None whatever, except that they will rent the building on terms to be arranged, rent their portion of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And how much are they to rent?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a matter of arrangement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Am I to understand then that we put up $2,000,000 and that the syndicate is going to make money out of it?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not out of the $2,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Out of the property?

Mr. GRAHAM: They think they will, they think it is a good purchase.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are to become the owners and it is hoped that the railway will have quarters in this building, but the extent of the quarters, the amount of the room or the rent to be paid are questions still left open. Is that the position?

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me impress upon my hon. friend the fact that the Canadian National is a company incorporated to do business, a company given full authority by an act passed by his government to conduct the affairs of the system as determined by the president and the board of directors. The act was passed for the sole purpose of preventing, in fairness, all the details of transactions by that company from being made public in the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friend knows that his government passed the act for that purpose yet he is asking me a series of questions to-night that he knows would embarrass a private company. Nevertheless he does not hesitate to ask me these questions, not for the benefit of the gentlemen here but because it will be made public all through Canada and in London, Paris and New York, with the result that the men with whom we are dealing—honourable men, who have had business with the British government in an honourable way—might have their interests affected; indeed it might affect the whole transaction. The Canadian National Railway Board acted within their rights in doing what they did. My hon. friend cannot point to one illegal thing that the Canadian National Railway Board or their president have done in connection with this transaction. I ask him in all fairness not to press for details because I feel that I am in honour bound, on behalf of the president and the board of the Canadian National Railways to respect their confidence for the present with regard to a transaction which is only partially completed. When that transaction is fully completed —and that is the position taken by my hon. friend's leader—it will be right for parliament to know what has been done. I repeat there has been nothing wrong done. Everything is in the open. If any error has been committed at all, it is in the president and board of the Canadian National Railways trying to get a place they never had before, trying to get prominence for the Canadian National Railways and, in doing it, save the people of Canada the necessity of making any capital expenditure. I am speaking as the parliamentary representative of the board, not because this is my business. It is the business of the board, and they have acted in a perfectly legal manner. The board have an option on any space they want in this building at a fair rental. That is the proposition. If that is not a good transaction, then the men who have charge of the Canadian National Railways do not know what a good transaction is. I believe it is a good transaction in the interest of those railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it from what my hon. friend says that he did not know anything about this at all; he was not consulted.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to know what the fact is. I would gather—

Mr. FIELDING: Did you not arrange to take the railways out of politics?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is another question. We will deal with that in a few minutes and I think we will deal with it efficiently too. Now, I am just asking this one question: Was the minister consulted before this was done?

Mr. GRAHAM: One at a time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am just asking the one question.

Mr. GRAHAM: When you sit down I will answer it. Mr. Chairman, now my hon. friend comes round to the contention that the Canadian National Railway Board are not running the system at all but that the Minister of Railways is running it. I say that the Canadian National Railway Board acted within their legal rights. I told him the other day that the consent of the government had not been asked to this transaction; I forget whether it was my hon. friend or the leader of the Opposition who asked the question. The question was asked because the Canadian National Railway Board cannot buy property, or real estate, without an order in council. I said then, and I say now that the board had a perfect right to enter into this transaction and the matter was entered upon before the government was consulted at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I find it difficult to extract an answer from my hon. friend's speech. Was he consulted by the president before the latter entered into this negotiation?

Mr. GRAHAM: If I am as dense in speaking as my hon. friend is in understanding the Lord help me! I told him a moment ago, "No."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wanted to get an explicit answer so that there should be no doubt about it at all. We have this situation: There was absolutely no coming to the government at all one way or the other in the matter, no consent as to what may or may not be a profitable investment made out of public funds to the extent of $2,000,000. We now know the fact is that the board did not ask the government's "Yes" or "No" or anything else. Now, the Minister of Finance asks whether we tried to take this out of politics.

Mr. FIELDING: You said you had taken it out of politics.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good. I will take it any way my hon. friend likes. We said we had taken it out of politics.

Mr. FIELDING: Do you want to put it back now?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there was one thing that was always maintained by us it was this: That in connection with any matters which did not have to do with the direct administration of the company parliamentary control had to be there. It makes no difference whether the company honestly put up this two millions without any subterfuge or whether they put it up in this kind of a way. It is a matter of capital expenditure no matter for how short a period it is, and if the Minister of Finance is going to take the stand that that sort of thing can be done without his knowledge he is going to put himself in a very grave position. I do not think he approves of it; I am quite confident that on reflection he will not approve.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does not my hon. friend think it is a good idea for the Canadian National Railways to have a continental headquarters in Paris?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may or may not be good. It may be gross extravagance, or it may be of some use; I am not going to pass upon that question one way or the other. I can tell my hon. friend this, however: The statement made by the Minister of Railways that everything emanating from the Continent comes from Paris is entirely wrong.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood my hon. friend to say so.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then he did not say so. My hon. friend did not say this was the place from which everybody went or came; but the great bulk of the Continent's traffic I may tell him does not originate in Paris.

Mr. GRAHAM: Most of it does, and the tourist traffic nearly all goes there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can well understand the desire of the Minister of Railways for tourist traffic. I suppose he is anticipating the fleets-to-be that he will have control of over the Atlantic.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I am having trouble with the fleets-that-are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Take that statement as a test of his sincerity on this question of tourist business. Has he one passenger boat on his list that is equipped for tourist traffic?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sorry to report that my hon. friend, out of sixteen or seventeen steamers, did not build any capable of carrying passengers, but I do know that thousands of people cross the ocean on other steamships and have to take railway lines when they get here. They take railway lines when they are going across the continent to get to a steamship; and if, as has been the case in the past, there is nobody to say "Canadian National" to them when they are coming over, they are not likely to take the Canadian National when they get here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course that all goes to show how completely the Minister of Railways has been overlooked by the president, and how absolutely he has been ignored, because if the president had taken him into his confidence—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does the hon. member not think—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will give the hon. member an opportunity to speak when I am through. If the president had taken the hon. minister into his confidence he never would have told him to make that argument about the tourist traffic.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Because it would not be arranged that way. It is arranged by running arrangements with steamship lines originating the traffic, and for the purpose of doing that it is not necessary to buy large premises like this. My hon. friend from Pictou wished to ask me a question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) not think that the question of settling headquarters for the Canadian National Railway on the Continent are in Sir Henry's hands? Does he blame Sir Henry Thornton if he is going to be ambitious and endeavour to earn money? Does he not think Sir Henry Thornton should have some slight ambition and some desire to build up a business on the Continent?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will not discuss that for a moment. I am discussing so far the improper withdrawal of $2,000,000, unauthorized by the government, from the capital funds of this company.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did the Canadian National Railways do anything outside of their powers under the act passed by himself?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would say so, absolutely.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would say not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Without the slightest hesitation, I would say so. Why, Mr. Chairman, the idea of the whole act, so far as ordinary matters of business were concerned, was that there was not to be any interference. We took that stand right along. We took that stand when we were asked by hon. members opposite as to coal contracts and tie contracts.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Where did you draw the line?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I drew the line at capital expenditure, and it is very easy to draw the line between a $2,000,000 proposition and the ordinary business.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does the hon. member say that if Sir Henry Thornton desired to build a branch line somewhere which he considered necessary for the business of the railway we should have nothing to say about it, and it should be done by the government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I mean to say—and there is no mystery about it—that Sir Henry Thornton under the practice, under the statutes and under the votes, cannot build a single yard of new line without first getting the government's concurrence. There is nothing strange about it We were supposed to have details of appropriation in connection with all these capital account matters. If the hon. gentleman thinks Sir Henry Thornton can do as he pleases in regard to the mileage of this system, he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member certainly said that he had nothing to do with capital expenditure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member can gain nothing by puting words in my mouth. Sir Henry Thornton can do nothing in the way of capital expenditure without the consent of parliament. He has to go to the government and through the government to parliament, in order to get the vote. He makes his recommendations, of course, just as any other general manager makes his recommendations, to the gentlemen who provide the funds. There can be no doubt that this is a complete departure from the former practice, and what I want to know from the minister is whether he endorses in any way the doctrine of his colleague the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr Macdonald) and whether he thinks Sir Henry Thornton can build new lines without first coming to the government?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I never said that I thought Sir Henry Thornton could build new lines, without first coming to the government. My hon friend knows that perfectly well, and if he made the statement outside the House I would probably use language which is not parliamentary. But in the House I cannot say very much. My hon. friend took the ground that in regard to capital account the Minister of Railways was supreme under the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): He intimated that Sir Henry Thornton had no responsibility in regard to it. He said "We would not interfere with him in the slightest degree with regard to current expenses, but we would interfere in regard to capital account." Then he intimates that Sir Henry Thornton as president would not be responsible for capital expenditure. Does he mean to say the government can initiate these matters without the consent or recommendation of Sir Henry Thornton? My hon. friend is extremely misleading when he refers to what I said, but it is simply on a par with what he has been saying right along.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thank my hon. friend for his clear, well-founded and beautiful statement. There is no mystery about it at all. What childishness to say the president has nothing to do with capital expenditure, when we at the same time say that he has to come to parliament to get authority for the capital expenditure? It is childish. Is it not childish to say he provides the money?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I never said that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would it not be childish to think so?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I never thought so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would it not be childish to think that the government would initiate and go on with the work apart from the man they had paid to do it? The whole fact is that the onus is on the president. The president ought to make his recommendations just like any other manager or president, he makes them to the government and he cannot act on these of his own motion in connection with capital expenditure until the government say so and until parliament provides the money. There is no mystery about that at all—not the slightest. The whole trouble, Sir, is that we have to have a smoke screen erected, just simply in some way to becloud what is a very simple and clear matter. Here is $2,000,000 taken, so far as parliament knows, merely to assist in a land speculation, out of which some unknown syndicate may or may not be making money, and we cannot even know who compose the syndicate. My hon. friend said that a fair rent was to be paid, and he is to have just as much area as he wants. What is the rent to be paid per foot?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is not as dense as he pretends to be; I do him the honour to believe that he understood what I said. Every man in the House knows what I said, and if there is any hon. gentleman here who should not say anything at all about one man putting words into the mouth of another it is the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I never before, in the short space of thirty minutes, had what I said twisted on the one hand and remain unheeded on the other as I have just experienced in the past half hour. I told the hon. gentleman distinctly that the transaction had not yet been completed but that the Canadian National Railways, in this way, had secured a home where it was needed in the best part of Paris. I made it clear that it could secure all the space it required at what was decided upon as a fair rental.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is to decide what is a fair rental?

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that every bargain is made between two parties. If my hon. friend were going to rent floor space from me he would not ask parliament to decide what that space should be.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the bargain, I gather, is not yet made. If what the hon. gentleman says is correct, it appears that the bargain has not yet been consummated. I want to know whether or not it has been made. If it has already been made, then the rental is certain. The committee wants to know how the matter stands.

Mr. GRAHAM: There my hon. friend goes again, endeavouring to twist what I said and to interject into it something that may make it appear what it is not. I told him the details had not yet been concluded but that the Canadian National Railways would have a home at a fair rental decided upon between two men who understand the business.

Mr. STEVENS: I gather from what the minister says that the situation is somewhat in this position. The representative of the Canadian National Railways in Paris, that is to say, a regularly paid official of the railways, secured an option of space in a property in Paris. The Canadian National Railway Company has pledged itself to the vendors to the extent of $2,000,000 on behalf of an unknown syndicate, the names of whose members are not divulged to the House. This transaction, involving a committal of $2,000,000 of capital expenditure on the part of the railways, was launched without the knowledge of the government and before they were aware that it was being done. I think I am justified in assuming that Sir Henry Thornton, as President of the National Railways, undertook that transaction on his own responsibility. When it became known to the public of this country a week or two ago there certainly was reflected in the press and through other media a very severe criticism of the action in expending $2,000,000 for quarters in Paris, and then, as an afterthought, apparently, this syndicate came into existence. I do not assert that as a fact, but it undoubtedly is a fair inference to draw from the very meagre information we have been accorded. Now, the minister says that we are committed to $2,000,000; and we do not know whether this syndicate possesses the wherewithal to pay for that money for which we have stood responsible. Certainly, up to the present it has not undertaken to pay. So that we have committed ourselves to this sum of money; we have in a sense committed ourselves, as a country, to a bargain to rent space in this hotel building.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not as a country.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, the company acting on behalf of the government, because it is a capital expenditure. We must differentiate in that regard; the expenditure is not a current one.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not agree with the hon. member.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister be good enough to lay on the Table such documents as may exist, upon which this $2,000,000 was advanced? I cannot conceive that even Sir Henry Thornton would authorize an advance of such a sum of money without some form of documentary agreement or understanding. I do not wholly agree with the minister in his refusal to divulge the names of those who comprise the syndicate. This is a very different matter from divulging current detail business. Here is a syndicate of gentlemen, New Yorkers, apparently, who are securing a property in Paris, said to be of very excellent value, for $2,000,000. We, the people of Canada, are putting up the money for the time being. That is not the type of transaction that justifies secrecy or concealment, even temporarily, for the sake of confidence. Surely we ought to know who the members of this syndicate are. I say, I do not agree with the minister in his refusal to give their names; I think it would inspire a great deal more confidence in the whole transaction if they were revealed.

I would ask the minister, first, to give to the committee all the details of the arrangement upon which this advance of $2,000,000 is based, because that is a reasonable request; and I again point out that it is capital expenditure and not a matter of current business, which I fully agree with him should not necessarily be divulged. Business of a current character I do not say ought to be revealed; but this is not such business; this is a matter of capital expenditure, just as if we undertook to build a piece of railway or to construct a building in some of our holdings in the United States or in any other part of the world. It is a straight capital expenditure, and I submit that the committee is entitled to full information. Let me fortify that opinion. In the very item under discussion, the details in regard to which we shall request of the minister, there is a reference to operating deficits, acquisition of property and materials and supplies. Under that head I asked the minister a little while ago whether this matter was included, and he said it was not. But he has every detail before him which he will divulge to parliament and upon which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will make an advance of $73,000,000. That is where the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is right in his protest, and it will not answer the question for the minister to say that the law passed under the leadership of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) in 1919 provided for all this. The law did not provide for this or any similar transaction at all; it provided exactly against such transactions.

9 p.m.

Referring briefly to the suggestions made by the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), I want to assure the committee that we are not seeking to interfere with the management of the railways. No; we are seeking to bring that management to account for departing from the clear intent of the law in this matter in making a capital commitment of $2,000,000 without even the knowledge of the minister. That is our point.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad my hon. friend puts it that way. I asked the ex-Minister of Finance distinctly, and he was careful not to say that the transaction was contrary to the act. Now, this transaction was approved in the first place by the financial department of the Canadian National Railways, and afterwards by Mr. Ruel, whose knowledge of these matters will, I think, be conceded to be equal to that of any other legal authority in this country. So it is out of the question to find fault with the president and his board of directors. They take Mr. Ruel's legal opinion, and up to date it has been found to be sound. He thoroughly approves the legality of this transaction. My hon. friend insists that we purchased the building. We did not.

Mr. STEVENS: I say the government is committed to a capital expenditure of $2,000,000 for the purchase of a building.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not committed to a capital expenditure. It has financially backed a man who has bought this building, which is to be transferred. The Canadian National Railway simply became responsible for the financing of the project temporarily, and temporarily only.

Mr. STEVENS: Permit me to interrupt. But this commitment of $2,000,000 is on the say-so of a paid official of the National Railways—the Paris representative. Now, that man has no responsibility whatever. We might as well have had a clerk out of the department. The only difference, perhaps, would have been in their respective status, that is all.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, we are asked to vote $73,000,000 for this particular item, or twice the expenditure of all Canada's estimates in 1894. When the budget was introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) he told us that but for the railway deficits we could have had some reduction in taxation. These railways deficits are bearing very heavily on the people to-day, and in my opinion the vote should not be passed until it has been reported upon by the Railway Commission. A royal commission composed of Mr. A. H. Smith, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth investigated our railways in 1917, and the most important part of their report was that in which they dealt with the subject of capital expenditure. They recommended, in effect, that before such a vote as this was passed there should be a report on it by some responsible body appointed by parliament for that particular purpose. Mr. Smith, then president of the New York Central, recommended, and Sir Henry Drayton, then chairman of our Railway Commission, agreed with him, that we should:

> Amend the regulating policy so that the Railway Commission may have jurisdiction over all railroads in the matter of maximum and minimum rates, the issuance of securities, the building of new railways, or the extension of lines, and other matters properly within the scope of governmental supervision.

The National Railway Board are committing the country to capital outlays running into millions of dollars, and we may well ask ourselves to-night: Have we responsible government in Canada? The board visited the city of Ottawa recently, looked over the terminals and then anounced that millions of dollars would be spent on their improvement. They proceeded to the city of Hamilton, where after inspecting the National Railways' facilities there they announced further expenditures of millions of dollars. Then they came to the city of Toronto and arranged to erect a sky-scraper office building. All this was done without consulting the government or parliament. Last year a vote for a similar purpose went through very easily and large sums of money were provided for the physical improvement of these railway properties, for their co-ordination, for additional rolling stock and for certain branch line construction. But after the expenditure of all that money what do we find? It was hoped some co-ordination would be effected, but very little has been done towards this end. True, the railways have not done badly during the past year, but the point is that we should scrutinize these expenditures a little more carefully at the time we vote them and not wait until recess to find out what we do about them.

[Mr. Church.]

But notwithstanding this large capital outlay what do we find in the annual report of the Canadian National Railways which was laid on the table a few weeks ago? We find that the gross earnings decreased by nearly $7,000,000, the figures for 1921 being $127,000,000 as against $120,135,000 for 1922. The operating expenses in 1921 were in round figures $143,000,000 as against $129,000,000 in 1922, or a reduction of $14,000,000—not so bad. There was also a reduction of about $7,000,000 in the operating deficit, the figures being $16,000,000 for 1921 as against $9,000,000 for 1922. These again are round figures. Some betterments were made, but they were not of a character to increase the earnings, and it would be far better for the directors to bear this in mind when making further capital outlay. The new station in Toronto is still standing idle waiting the building of the viaduct, and these increased facilities alone would, I believe, augment the earnings in that district by at least one-third. The annual National Railway report states that the decrease in passenger traffic is discouraging, particularly as the quality of the service given has improved and because the rate for passenger travel in Canada is relatively low, being generally slightly below the prevailing rates in the United States. This is not strictly accurate, for in the United States they have special holiday, week end and excursion rates, which we do not now enjoy to as great an extent. In the freight earnings there is a loss of revenue due to the Crowsnest pass agreement rates, estimated to be six and a half million dollars. The freight, passenger and express earnings were all less than in 1921. A hundred and seventy miles of new road were put into operation in the past twelve months in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. I do not criticize the board for that at all, I have no doubt it was necessary, but large sums of money were spent on betterments from which they do not get any revenue. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) pointed out last year that $50,000 to $75,000 per day can be saved in railway expenses by up-to-date co-ordination. Have we got that co-ordination to-day? We have not. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) pointed out recently that in his own city there are no signs of co-ordination, that trains are running on parallel lines so close together that they are within a stone's throw of each other. The same thing may be seen on the north shore of Lake Ontario, and the trains running between Toronto, Whitby and Belleville could in my opinion be co-ordinated and a large saving effected.

I think the Canadian National Railway Board has altogether too much power—a power that is prejudicial to our system of responsible government. I believe that the Canadian National Railway Board should have a free hand to administer the railway system; there should be no political interference whatsoever. The government of the country has proceeded along proper lines in this respect during the last few years. The present ministry has been more than sympathetic and has been doing very good work as far as it has gone, but there has not been the co-ordination that there should be. The present head of this railway has been going up and down the country making speeches and promising sidings, lines, terminals, skyscrapers, here, there and everywhere. Now, one of the most important feeders of the National Railways should be the merchant marine, on the ocean, on the river St. Lawrence, and on the Great Lakes. What has made the Canadian Pacific the great railway it is to-day, with its large earning power per mile? It has been very largely the co-ordination which has existed between its ocean and lake services and its rail communications. So our National Railways might very well take a leaf out of its rival's book, instead of recommending the sale of that merchant marine, constituting, as it does, an important feeder to the railway line. Now, I say that something should be done to bring our National Railways up to date. I would like to mention one or two matters in connection with which economies might well be effected. I have seen members travelling on the trains, and I have seen a large number of private cars proceeding all over the country. I knew a gentleman connected with the railway offices who used to have an office position in Toronto; there are big officials of that kind who could not go as far as Hamilton without dragging a private car along the right of way, even with coal as high as from $10 to $15 a ton. And in other ways there has not been co-ordination. There have been transfers of officials from Moncton to Montreal, from one city to another, and so far as I know there has not been any economy effected by the transfer. So I say that co-ordination has not been effected and economies have not been brought about which would increase the efficiency of the system.

There is another branch of the administration of this railway system which must receive attention if success is to be attained; every employee must be satisfied, must be happy and contented. That condition does not prevail to-day on the National Railways. As I say, the minister is doing the best he can; he has done very good work, but in my opinion the principle of promotion should apply on this line as it does on the New York Central, Michigan Central, the Baltimore and Ohio, and on the Pennsylvania and Lake Shore lines. An announcement was made the other day from the general offices of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway that the principle of promotion would apply to all its employees from the very bottom of the ladder to the top, even to the presidency of that great railway. The same principle applies on the Pennsylvania lines and on the New York Central lines. But what have we in Canada? We are sending to England and to the United States for people to take high positions in connection with our railway system; although there is an alien labour law, as I understand it, on the statute book to-day, people are being brought in here to take positions that ought to go to Canadians. I say that the principle of promotion is the best principle; it is the principle which applies on all the leading railway systems of the United States and England. The leading railway officials in these countries have come from the ranks; the best men we have on our railways in this country have come from the ranks. I do hope that this principle will not be forgotten in the future.

Certain regional areas have been established by the present board of directors of the National Railway system. That was a very popular phrase with Julius Caesar—"regions Caesar never knew," and so on. It is a very high-sounding term, "regional area," but I cannot see where any needed co-ordination or economies are effected as the result of the establishment of these regional areas.

As to rates, there has been some downward trend. In that connection I wish to point out that by legislation of last session provision was made for certain additional rolling stock. During the last twelve months there have been added to the equipment 870 new freight cars, 561 additional freight cars, 26 passenger cars. With all these 1,600 new freight cars and the others that they had on hand a year ago, there are three months in the year when these cars are standing idle, although they could be transporting coal and other products from the prairie provinces to the head of the lakes and to central Canada. A rate of $9 a ton has been quoted on coal. I submit that the earnings of the road could be very largely increased and this $73,000,000 item could be very much reduced if instead of allowing a large number of old and new cars to stand idle during three or four months of the year they were utilized to bring down the products I have named from Alberta to central Canada. During the first year or two of these operations there might be a deficit, but I am confident that as the years went on a surplus would result.

The present charges against the railways are as follows: construction, $587,000,000, equipment, $88,000,000; deficit, $122,000,000; fixed charges, $145,000,000. These figures are almost appalling. Unless new sources of revenue are devised, these enormous charges are going to mean increased taxation on the people of Canada for many years to come, under the present system of operation of our National Railways.

Now, some hon. gentlemen sitting in this chamber have blamed public ownership for these deficits. But public ownership is not responsible; it is private ownership that has been responsible for the mismanagement of our railways. Public ownership did not build the Canadian Northern. Public ownership did not build the Grand Trunk. Public ownership did not build the Grand Trunk Pacific or the National Railways. These railways were built under private auspices and we now have these appalling deficits. So I say that the members of the committee should examine very carefully this item of $73,000,000. In my opinion, many of the capital expenditures that have been made during the past twelve months might easily have waited over—many of the so-called betterments, the erection of sidings and terminals, the building of 73 new stations, and so on, many of them in districts that are not self-sustaining. The people of Ontario are behind the National Railways; they are doing everything they can to support the publicly-owned system. In the district from which I come, 326 cities in the hydro-electric movement have had for some time past a working arrangement with the National Railways, designed to promote the interests of that particular system, and they intend to continue it. Everybody wants to give the National Railways a chance. But the minister mentioned the other day one reason why the head of our National Railways system should become a member of the board of Canada Steamships. Now, it was brought out in the lake freights inquiry that the railways of Canada fixed the rates on the lakes for waterborne traffic. That is stated in the report; I need not read it. If there is one thing more than another that is going to help to eliminate the deficit on the Canadian National Railways it is the advantage that waterborne traffic will give on lake, river and ocean as a feeder of our National Railways. I am very much disappointed, as a believer in the national system, that the head of the system has joined the board of Canada Steamships, which has a monopoly on the Great Lakes to-day, as is set out in the report to which I have referred. Now, the reason the minister gave for the president of the system becoming a member of that board was that there was an exchange of traffic between the National Railways and Canada Steamships. Well, there is also an exchange of traffic with the Canadian Pacific, with the New York Central, with the Michigan Central; is it proposed to offer the same argument in that connection, namely, that for that reason Sir Henry Thornton should become a director of the Canadian Pacific, of the New York Central, of the Michigan Central? I do not think that argument could reasonably be offered. The president of the National Railways may be a many-sided man, but he cannot serve two masters; he cannot serve Canada Steamships and the National Railways as well.

The minister presented a very excellent annual statement at Easter with regard to the Canadian National Railways. I believe the day is not far distant when the onerous burden on the Finance Minister, the Minister of Railways, and the people of Canada in respect of our railways will be relieved. I believe a better day is dawning for our national system under public ownership. I believe that a united effort should be made in support of the National Railways. Municipalities and every patriotic citizen who has the welfare of this country at heart should work in harmony with the directors of the railways and the government should do all possible to see if something cannot be done to eliminate the deficits.

In my opinion this vote of $73,000,000 should be cut in two. I do not believe there is any need of spending $73,000,000 of the people's money for betterments on this railway in view of the deficits that have to be made up from year to year. I believe that if there was more co-ordination there would be less deficits. The acquisition of new property can wait till the railway is in a better position. Why should we build sky scrapers when we cannot get a proper terminal in a city of 500,000 people? I do not think the committee would be justified in voting this amount of money, a large amount of which is to be spent on betterments, construction and rolling stock. In my opinion the money on a lot of these betterments to the railway will have no earning power for many years to come. Furthermore, there is no line in America that is spending such a large amount of money on betterments and equipment, and the National is supposed to be a new system, with new rolling stock, new stations, and so forth. I think in view of the expenditure of some $587,000,000 to date on capital, as I pointed out before, on the National Railways, we could get along for a while without new branch lines, sidings and turn-outs, and call a halt on a lot of it that is not immediately revenue producing.

I believe it was wrong on the part of the new Railway Board to countermand the no-politics order. I believe that no good will come from the revocation of that order by the chairman of the board after he had been in office only a short time and had had only a cursory look over the system. I have here the report of the Royal Commission on Railways of 1917 which recommends against the employees of the system being allowed to take part in politics. In May, 1903, there was another royal commission on transportation appointed in Canada which also recommended the same thing. They have had the same experience in the United States, and in Victoria, Australia, where the men went on strike and alienated public sympathy by their attitude in 1903. I think the no politics order was right and proper, and showed the wisdom of Mr. Hanna, and now the new directorate is turning things topsy-turvy and upsetting the no-politics order. I say that is not even in the interests of the men because under public onwership the men need never be afraid of their employers. They will be better treated than under private employers. Their employers can afford to pay because the railway is operating at cost.

In conclusion, I wish the National Railways every success. I believe that before many days are over this magnificent investment of the people of Canada will be able to pay its way. It is a magnificent system, one of the largest and one of the best conducted in the world. We had no strikes on the railway last year. The passenger service in Ontario has never been equalled. So much is that the case that the National Railway is taking business from the Canadian Pacific on all the main lines in Ontario. If we can only do something to keep down the expenses, if we can complete the deepening of the Welland canal and encourage water-borne traffic as a feeder to the Nationals, I believe that a day of prosperity lies before the National Railways.

Mr. CANNON: I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I wish to say very frankly that I was astonished to hear my hon. friend express surprise that the Canadian National Railways were administered in such a way as to take away practically all departmental responsibility. My hon. friend has been in this House for four years now, and if I am not mistaken he was present in 1919 when the legislation that exists to-day was introduced by his own friends. We pointed out at that time that the law should not be what it was. We pointed out at that time also that the law contained clauses which were a real danger to responsible government in Canada. The answer given to our arguments was not the answer which my hon. friend is receiving tonight. It was the usual answer given by the Tory government of that time—closure. That is the only satisfaction we got. The law was put into force, the railways were administered under it, and I really do not understand my hon. friend tonight when he grieves that the Minister of Railways has not got anything more to do with their management than the law enables him to have. I will refer my hon. friend to the debates which took place during 1921 when he was sitting to the right of Mr. Speaker and supporting the government led by the present leader of the Opposition. Dr. Reid who has now gone to the Senate was then Minister of Railways, and I asked the Minister of Railways at that time about the administration of the railways and how things were managed. My hon. friend was Minister of Finance in the House at that time, and although I have read the reports in Hansard very carefully I can find nowhere that he protested in the way he is protesting tonight. For instance at page 1663 of the Hansard of 1921, Dr. Reid made the following statement to the House in the presence of my hon. friend:

> None of the officials or the minister has anything to do with the expenditure. That is left entirely to the management.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear. I still agree.

Mr. CANNON: So if the then Minister of Railways could make a statement of that kind in the House of Commons when my hon. friend was Minister of Finance, how can he get up tonight and sincerely express surprise when the present Minister of Railways takes exactly the same position that my hon. friend's friend took two years ago? On the same page of Hansard the Minister of Railways of that day said:

> We have a Board of Management operating the Canadian National railways. They were placed in charge, and have been operating the railway. I have not in any way interfered with them. I feel that if the operation of the Canadian National railways is to be made a success, as I hope it will, there must be no interference by the Minister of Railways or any other member of the government. That is the position I take.

That was the position taken by the then Minister of Railways in the presence of my hon. friend who was then Minister of Finance, and who in accordance with constitutional usage was responsible as a member of the cabinet for what the Minister of Railways was saying in the House.

To sum up, I say that the attitude taken by the government to-night is the only attitude that can be taken in view of the law which was passed by the former government and which was supported by my hon. friends who now sit to the left of the Speaker. We cannot take any other position. I would not go as far as to say that I approve of this situation. I would not go as far as to say that it is a situation that is very favourable to the people of Canada, and to their representatives in parliament. But we have to follow the law which was passed by the former government, and passed under closure notwithstanding the representations which were made by the members of the then opposition. When my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance goes further and asks for information concerning this famous Paris syndicate his memory must be very short. The members of the opposition at that time got up and asked for information. That information was refused by the government in which my hon. friend was Minister of Finance, and refused for the reason that it was not in the public interest that it should be given.

In this country, Mr. Chairman, especially when a man occupies the very exalted position which is occupied by the ex-Minister of Finance is it possible to maintain that a statesman or a public man, who wishes the welfare of his country and that only, can take one attitude when he is a minister and change that attitude when he quits office? Either my hon. friend was right when he was Minister of Finance and supported the measures which I have just mentioned, or he was not. I think he was sincere at that time and if he was, he certainly cannot maintain the attitude which he has assumed to-night; he cannot ask us to believe that he is as sincere to-night as he was then. If he is sincere to-night was he sincere two years ago? I doubt it.

We had to adopt a situation which is not the product of our own policy. We fought the policy of the former government but the law which they introduced and passed is now in force. The railways are now owned by the public. They have to be managed and administered, and they are managed and administered in accordance with the provisions of the law passed by the Borden and the Meighen governments. My hon. friend was a framer of those laws. He was one of the ministers who supported those laws in parliament; and to-day, now that he is leading the opposition in the absence of his right hon. leader, I do not think that he will increase his prestige throughout the country in any way by creating difficulties for the Minister of Railways, when he knows that the minister is simply doing what the law allows him to do and nothing else. It would be detrimental to the public interest to give the information for which my hon. friend is asking. He knows that quite well.

In conclusion I simply wish to say that I have not changed my attitude in regard to this matter. I fought those laws when they were introduced into parliament, and I hope that sooner or later some means will be found whereby the representatives of the people will be given a stronger control over the administration of our railways. That can only be done by changing the laws that are now on our statute books. I wish to express the hope that the government will satisfy the people that the bonuses voted to the former officials, and to some of the present officials, will be thoroughly investigated, and that these gentlemen will not be allowed, when we have an enormous deficit like we had last year, to receive the large amounts which they voted to themselves. The people of Canada are called upon to pay taxes, and very heavy taxes, to meet our railway deficit. We are called upon to economize in practically every branch of our railway administration. Let the railways themselves give an example of economy. I have a hope, and a firm hope, that the government will see to it that these bonuses are refunded so that the people will know that if our railways are costing us a large sum of money, we at least are doing what we can to curb extravagance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) is quite right in one respect. He has a right to expect sincerity and consistency on the part of our public men. He has charged me with inconsistency and lack of sincerity to-night, but I am going to show him that I am both consistent and sincere. I do not want to see the tu quoque argument which is always used by my hon. friends across the aisle when they say "Did you not do this and did you not do that?" I am not going to refer to what they said when they were in opposition, or remind the House that they made a complete right about face when they got into power. Two wrongs do not make a right. My hon. friend has a right to expect consistency and sincerity somewhere in the House, but he will not find it in the gentlemen around him.

In the first place I am going to take up what was said by the Acting Minister of National Defence. He made a point which would be a perfectly good one if it were well founded—that was as to the right of the railway management to spend public moneys, that they were responsible for the expenditure and could undertake the obligation. The trouble is the hon. gentleman was quite wrong. The statute shows absolutely the contrary of what he was alleging. I may say that I have not had the same opportunity of studying this statute that other hon. gentlemen have had; it was passed before I entered the House. However, I will take my share of the responsibility although I was not here when this legislation was enacted. Now, the question of new lines is dealt with by section 23 of the Act to Incorporate the National Railway Company which provides:

> With the approval of the Governor in Council and upon any location sanctioned by the Minister of Railways and Canals—

The committee will see two checks there. The first is that the minister has to pass upon this capital expenditure, and afterwards the Governor in Council has to do the same thing.

> —the company may from time to time construct and operate railway lines, branches and extensions, or railway facilities or properties of any description in respect to the construction whereof respectively, parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure, or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities. A copy of any plan or profile made in respect of any completed railway shall be deposited with the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen will see that we have here a thorough and most complete check, the check of parliament. These lines can only be built either by money voted by parliament, or else guaranteed by parliament, so that we have a complete check through parliament, the department, and the Governor in Council on these capital expenditures. The thing is so clear I am not quite sure that the Acting Minister of National Defence, seeing the necessity of a smoke screen of some kind, did not utter the first thing that came into his head. He really could not have considered the submission he was making. That is all I wish to refer to, because the thing is very clear.

Now I invite the attention of the hon. member for Dorchester to my next point. The position of the directors of this road is the same as the position of the directors of an ordinary railway company. I think my hon. friend will agree with that. It has not advanced beyond that point. Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that there is a substitution of the shareholders under the act for the Governor in Council. The people of Canada are the shareholders, represented by the Governor in Council, in so far as powers under the act to be exercised by shareholders are concerned. My hon. friend will find that section 9 of the act of 1919, chapter 13, makes that absolutely clear. It reads:

> When, under the provisions of the Railway Act or any other statute or law, the approval, sanction or confirmation by shareholders is required, such approval, sanction or confirmation may be given by the Governor in Council.

So that the committee will see that what has been done under this act is very plain. The directors have the right to carry on business just exactly in the same way as the directors of any other railway company have, and for the shareholders their powers, votes and meetings is substituted the action or the consideration of the Governor in Council. The thing is perfectly clear, therefore. I need not elaborate the point with my hon. friend for Dorchester. He would not for one moment contend, I take it, under the provisions of the Railway Act, that directors can enter new fields, and hazard the capital of the company in new ventures, without the assent of the shareholders. I think we would all have to admit that. Then if that be the case, the position is the same, so far as this board is concerned. They cannot enter new fields and they cannot risk the country's money without the government, acting for the shareholders, assenting. I take it we can have no dispute down to that point. So that the whole result is that these directors have no greater powers than any other directors. They are just in the same position.

Mr. GRAHAM: They have just as much power.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just as much, but no more, and if my friend will consult the legal members around him, I think they will agree that that is absolutely correct. The proposition then is that these directors can do the same as any other directors. They can carry on the ordinary every day business of the company without submitting it to the shareholders for approval, but if they desire to go into new fields to make capital expenditures, they have to come, as provided by section 7 of the act, to the Governor in Council for approval. I take it that is absolutely clear. I want to be entirely consistent and I think I am. Again, speaking particularly to my hon. friend the hon. member for Dorchester, the position that was taken in 1920, I think he will find—and if it was not taken, then it was wrong—was in regard, to the expenditure of funds in the ordinary carrying out of the business of the corporation on the one hand, or, on the other hand, the expenditure of funds which had been authorized as capital expenditure by this parliament.

Mr. CANNON: In the Debates of 1921, page 1662, Dr. Reid, the Minister of Railways, stated:

> They can expend all the earnings without any certificate from the Railway department, but they cannot get any money from the Finance department until they get a certificate from the Railway department that the work is necessary. Then the money is provided as the work proceeds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree with my hon. friend and he is going to agree with me, because he is not going to say that that application of moneys received can be for anything outside the powers of the directorate under the Railway Act. In other words, the directors' trust, in running the business and getting in the receipts, is to apply the receipts and moneys they take in, to the discharge of their current obligations arising out of the carrying on of the business. I think my hon. friend will agree with that. I entirely agree with what was said, and I think he will agree with me that that is the legal result of what was said, because we had to look at the act. Now the position here is entirely different. Here we have a new field and a new expenditure entirely, and an expenditure for a new purpose admittedly. The Canadian National never entered the continental field at any time. They had no offices over there of any kind. I am not saying this for the purpose of trying the matter out. No one would call to order directors who entered into a lease for the purpose of trying the matter out with small commitments—commitments that should be made out of the year's business. That would be all right, but that is not what we have. We have an entry into a new field, plus the application of the moneys which ought, under the act, to have been applied in the discharge of the regular obligations of the company, to a purpose entirely new and outside the former operations of the company. That would not be illegal if you had the shareholders say so—I admit that. But in order to make it legal the shareholders say so, endorsement will have to be given, and the shareholder in this case happens to be the Governor in Council. I hope my hon. friend will not accuse me of inconsistency. My argument may be weak, but I do not believe that he thinks so. He has followed me closely, and I think he agrees with me. But be it strong or weak, it is sincere. I sincerely believe it is absolutely illegal for any director to switch the capital funds of the company, that it is illegal to undertake any new and further obligations outside of the ambit of the present operations, and I think my hon. friend will say I am, at least, sincere.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is giving me the exact concrete form of the thing I would like to have said, but I could not have said it as well. He argues this board has the same power, say, as the board of the Canadian Pacific Railway—to get down to a concrete case. I wish to ask this question: If the Canadian Pacific Railway wanted to buy a property in Paris, and put up the president of the railroad or someone else to buy it, in order that they might get the use of it, would they call the shareholders together and get their consent to it? No. Because that would make it public, and you could not buy it then, except at a price and a half. What they would do in nine cases out of ten would be that the president himself would get an option on the property, and would have a perfect right to put up financial security for the property, and have it ratified by the shareholders afterwards.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no question that it would be necessary to have it ratified by the shareholders. In the meantime, the president would be taking a chance. He is doing something he has no legal right to do at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: The only practical way to do it.

Mr. LEWIS: Reverting to the Paris incident, I would like to ask the minister whether the Canadian National Railway, in putting up this loan of $2,000,000, is receiving any interest on the loan?

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Mr. LEWIS: In what sense are they receiving interest on the loan?

Mr. GRAHAM: The money is in the bank, and the bank allows interest on any deposit.

Mr. LEWIS: With reference to subsection (e) of item 139, "construction and betterments," have the officials of the National Railways presented any programme with respect to branch lines at the present time? Has any schedule been brought down contemplating the construction of such lines in the near future?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is nothing in this vote for branch lines except perhaps for minor ones. I stated a few days ago that the board had recommended a programme of branch lines, which I hope to introduce by way of resolution in a very few days.

Mr. LEWIS: The subsection to which I have just referred, "construction and betterments," is included in the vote, and I thought the minister could tell us whether any branch lines were being considered. There is another question I desire to have answered. Will the Canadian National officials who will be engaged in this building in Paris also act in the capacity of immigration officers?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian National officials, like the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will co-operate with the Immigration department in the interests of immigration.

Mr. LEWIS: Does the immigration which at present comes from that part of Europe demand such a large expenditure as is provided for in this loan, and that offices shall be established in Paris?

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman seems to think that the Canadian National Railways are going to occupy the whole of the building.

Mr. LEWIS: Not at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: The railways will use only a part of it. As I pointed out some time ago, the Canadian National system wants to get its share of all the business which there is, or which can be created. That is not being done at present, because there are no headquarters in Paris. It is believed that traffic can be secured by an aggressive policy in Paris which will add greatly to the income of the railways.

Mr. LEWIS: I can readily understand that if the Canadian National Railways are ever to be put upon a paying basis there is only one way in which this can be brought about, and that is by service to the public. Naturally, we should expect that if we are to have service the population ought to be increased. But at the same time I would impress upon the minister the importance of having branch lines and feeders to the main trunk lines. We have sufficient trunk lines now; in fact, I think we have too many; and the only way in which the railways can be made to pay at all is to give them something to do. There are places in the West that are thirty or forty miles from any railway, and as a result the farmers do not produce as much as they would if they were in the vicinity of a railway line. Some of these people have been promised railways for a number of years. They went into these remote districts on the strength of such promises, and because those pledges are not being honoured many of these people are leaving. It does seem to me that if the government is going to shoulder a loan of $2,000,000, it would be much better, in the interests of the Canadian people and of the Canadian National Railways, to expend the money on branch lines to serve such places as are badly in need of them. I certainly hope that when the schedule is brought down to parliament it will include a number of branch lines and feeders for the main trunk lines; I am convinced that it is absolutely necessary to provide these lines if the railways are to pay. In the vicinity of Swift Current we have certain lines that are almost completed, just about twenty-five miles or so remaining to be done. But because of this gap it is necessary to send grain and coal over some hundreds of miles to connect up with the main lines. As a business proposition, therefore, and as an investment that would prove beneficial to the public well-being as well as in the interests of the National lines, I would urge that all such gaps be closed up and that the branch lines be completed as soon as possible.

Mr. STEVENS: A short while ago I asked the minister a question or two and he was rescued from his dilemma by the intervention of some other observations. I inquired what objection he had to informing the committee of the nature of the agreement, or the conditions of the agreement, entered into between the company and the syndicate in New York on whose behalf the $2,000,000 is advanced. I should really like the minister to give us that information. I would also ask him to state in what way he considers anyone could be injured or any interests be jeopardized by disclosing the personnel of the syndicate. I would call his attention, too, to the answer he returned to my hon. friend from Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) on the question of interest. The interest, he says, is being paid on the $2,000,000 by the bank. But is not the syndicate charging interest at a much higher rate for the $2,000,000 advanced in Paris? And who absorbs that difference?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is very easy; I can answer a plain question without any frills. The bank is paying interest, and the difference between that interest and the interest that will be charged the party in whose name the building was purchased will have to be absorbed.

Mr. STEVENS: That is only one of my questions.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend puts his questions so delicately that one would almost imagine he was innocent.

Mr. STEVENS: So I am.

Mr. GRAHAM: But if I answered the delicate question he asks, he would have all the information which I am bound in honour not to divulge.

Mr. STEVENS: That is just what we want. Will the minister give the reasons why he cannot answer the question?

Mr. GRAHAM: If I gave the reasons I should simply be answering the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is not so innocent as the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FIELDING: The ex-Minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: The ex-Minister, I mean; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is innocent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do not believe him.

Mr. GRAHAM: When my hon. friend says: I do not ask that you give me the agreement, but I want you to tell me what your reasons are for not being able to give it to me. —when he says that, he is simply asking in a subtle way for the information which he knows I cannot give him. If I stated the reasons it would only be answering the entire question, and my hon. friend knows that. There are reasons which I believe, and which the Canadian National Company believes, are valid why, in the public interest, the information should not be divulged at the present time. But parliament will be entitled to all the information when the transaction is completed.

10 p.m.

An hon. MEMBER: When it is too late.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the minister cannot be serious in taking that stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: He is.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I suppose I must accept his answer. In that event I think we are justified in expressing an opinion in the absence of definite information.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. STEVENS: I think I have already suggested that Sir Henry Thornton, as the head of the National Railways, stepped beyond his reasonable authority and exceeded his rights in committing the Canadian people to an expenditure—committing them, I repeat, to an expenditure—of $2,000,000 without placing in the hands of the minister, to be placed before parliament, one word of the agreement upon which such advance was made. In the second place I say that if Sir Henry Thornton's conception of his duty as president of this great system is that he is justified in placing $2,000,000 in the hands of an employee of the Canadian National Railways in Paris to purchase a hotel for a syndicate in New York, then again I say Sir Henry Thornton's idea of his duties is such as will not increase my confidence in him. It is beyond me to understand that a transaction of this magnitude—not the purchase of a private car or some little matter of that kind involving a few thousand dollars, but the purchase of a central site in Paris—was entered into and the money deposited in the bank without informing the minister, that such a step was being taken. To me it is inconceivable that a man of the standing of Sir Henry Thornton should take such a position unless he has got an altogether distorted idea of his importance and his position in this country as head of the National Railways. That is my opinion, and in the absence of definite information from the minister I think I am justified in expressing that opinion in stronger terms than perhaps would be necessary if we had all the information before the committee.

I intimated a little while ago, and I repeat it now, that it would appear to me that after a test of public opinion was made by the rather flamboyant announcement—characteristic of the gentleman's attitude since he has had this exalted position—that he, Sir Henry Thornton, had bought a hotel in Paris, which was blazoned all over the country, and the reflection of an adverse public opinion through the press and other mediums, that as a result this syndicate is a second thought, is only now being arranged, and is not a bona fide syndicate capable of carrying through this transaction. That is my candid opinion, and again I say I am justified in expressing that opinion in the absence of one iota of evidence that these gentlemen are competent, both so far as business ability and financial responsibility are concerned, to carry through a $2,000,000 purchase. If the Canadian National Railways desire to improve their position on the Continent, they could very well be satisfied with ordinary rented quarters in Paris, Brussels, Rotterdam, Antwerp and other cities and do their business in a fairly satisfactory manner without an extravagant expenditure.

There is another item which I do not wish to involve with this one, but I will just mention it. We are told that this $73,000,000 vote is necessary for the carrying on of the railways. We know branch lines are needed, and we know that there is a curtailment of expenditure in this direction. Yet here is a sum of $2,000,000, segregated for goodness knows how long, to finance a private undisclosed syndicate; here is a million and a quarter dollars—and I want the committee to listen to this—for the purchase of one of the most expensive sites in Toronto at the corner of King and Yonge from the owners, a chartered bank—a corner that I am informed was purchased by that bank about eighteen months previously for approximately $700,000. Now, I have this to say to the minister, and I ask him to pass it on to Sir Henry Thornton: If Sir Henry Thornton's idea of his responsibility to this country, his $50,000 position, is that he can, without consultation with or notification to the government, purchase for $2,000,000 a hotel in Paris through an official, and purchase a property at the corner of King and Yonge streets, Toronto, for a million and a quarter dollars—giving to the bank a profit of $550,000 in a few months—then I say Sir Henry Thornton's idea of managing the affairs of the National Railways is a great disappointment to me, and until these matters are fully and completely explained I shall lack very great confidence in the future of the National Railways under the control of Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. BAXTER: Mention has been made of branch lines and it has been stated that we would be informed later on as to the appropriations to be made for their construction or completion. Would the minister tell me what there is that differentiates the buying of a hotel or the acquisition of a corner block in Toronto from the completion or construction of a branch railway? Why is it that the minister gets information and the government passes upon the construction of branch railways and submits the matter to parliament, and yet if it is a building in the centre of Paris or of Toronto the minister and the government are not permitted to know anything about it? I want to find some clear line of policy, some separation of the subjects, so that I and other members will know when they come up what are within the domain of the railway authorities alone and are secrets to the minister and the government, and what class of subjects the government, the minister and parliament are to be consulted about before they are undertaken.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has been led astray by some statement he has heard to-night about the Toronto property.

Mr. BAXTER: I shall be very glad to be put right.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) got extravagant in his statements, to put it mildly.

Mr. STEVENS: I was provoked to it by the absolute silence of the minister with regard to any real information.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am going to give my hon. friend some information about the Toronto building. This building was bought in the usual way, being expropriated by order in council with the approval of the government. Sir Henry Thornton did not buy the property. As to its value, I think at least 80 per cent of the members of this House would have thought it very foolish if we had allowed ourselves to be driven from a building that had been occupied for twenty-five years as a Grand Trunk ticket office. The rental charged the Grand Trunk will fully pay the interest on the investment, and we retain in Toronto a corner which many people would have been delighted to see us driven from. It is the best corner in Toronto; it is the place to which people have been accustomed to go to buy tickets for the Grand Trunk Railway, and to have allowed ourselves to be removed from it would have resulted in the loss, I think, of hundreds of thousands of dollars every year in the way of passenger traffic. That corner is a good buy, notwithstanding what my hon. friend says. The Exchequer Court passed on the price. My hon. friend referred to $700,000; I think it was $850,000, if I remember correctly. But the one property was sold because it was what one might call almost a forced sale; that is the reason why it was sold at a comparatively low price. As hon. members know, on corner lots in Toronto the prices are advancing. The Imperial Bank refused $1,000,000 two or three months before for that property. We endeavoured to get it but we could not get it. We offered them a million, offered them $1,100,000; endeavoured to get it without forced proceedings, as I might call them. Then the government by order in council expropriated the property and the matter went before the Exchequer Court.

They claimed $1,350,000 and the Exchequer Court confirmed the price tentatively arranged between the parties at $1,200,000. If it were not for detaining the committee I would read the judgment which would give the figures, and I am sure every hon. member would be convinced that the Canadian National Railways through the Canadian government have made a deal which is a bargain and which is clearly in the interests of the railway system.

Now, as to the Paris building, the Canadian National could not purchase it. But my hon. friend compares us to branch lines. Now, the places for the branch lines will stay there; they are not liable to leave; no one is liable to take possession of the property. When the opportunity came to get a good location in the city of Paris, rightly or wrongly the president took advantage of the situation as I have outlined. We hope that before the House meets again the country will have been convinced that this is a good proposition; the Canadian National Railways, being relieved of all financial responsibility, will have a home and a place to do business in one of the best locations in the city of Paris.

Mr. BAXTER: It is not a question whether this is a good buy or a bad buy; that is not involved in it. What is involved in it is that it is a purchase or an arrangement made, if I understand the minister aright, without any consultation with the minister or without the minister being informed that such a proceeding was in contemplation. Of course, if we are coming to that, all possible sense of responsibility is gone. A few years ago—I was not in this House—some hon. members who are not now sitting where they were then criticized very severely the attitude of the then government because the railway transactions were not apparently to be submitted to the House until after they were concluded. Well, if that was a good principle then it ought to remain a good principle in the minds of those who first laid it down. I can well understand that one cannot go that whole length, and I would not press the minister to do it, but I suggest that the money of the people should not be spent without even a single minister of the Crown having the slightest intimation of what is projected by this body which has been organized to manage National Railways. It does not appear that even a single director of the company had any knowledge of the matter, outside of the president. I want to know if I am right in that; I am inferring it from the discussion that has taken place here. If I am right—well, there will be an imperial Caesar set up before whom we must all bow the knee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not any information as to whether or not it was before the directors; I did not make inquiries. I know that a number of directors were conversant with it; the solicitor, who is a director, advised that the transaction was legal in every respect.

Mr. BOYS: Is there a written agreement between the syndicate and the owner or owners of the Paris site?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know.

Mr. BOYS: It was really bought, I understood, for the purposes of the National Railways. If that is so, surely there would be a written agreement, and then if the National Railways are to be in a position to get the benefit of it there would have to be at least a trust agreement between the syndicate and the National Railways. If there is not, and the syndicate have a written agreement to control the situation they could hold up the National Railways in the ultimate purchase by them. Now, that is a very undesirable situation. I understood the minister to say that this building had been bought for the National Railways. If that is so and there is absolutely nothing in writing that the minister knows of, either with the owners in Paris or with the syndicate in New York, surely the National Railways are in great jeopardy—that is all I can say—if this is a very valuable site which they want to get.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my hon. friend will find that the interests of the Canadian National Railways are fully protected by the London office.

Mr. BOYS: I am not saying they are not, but I am asking the minister to let us know that they are.

Mr. GRAHAM: So far as my hon. friend's question regarding the agreement is concerned, that is but another way of getting the information that I say it would not be fair to give.

Mr. BOYS: I have carefully refrained from asking the minister for the terms of the agreement or even for the names of the members of the syndicate. But surely this committee can be told—

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that there is an agreement.

Mr. BOYS: If that is so, what right has the minister to say that this is for the National Railways? If there is no agreement; if there is nothing in writing—and we know that land cannot be bought without something in writing—why does the minister say in this House that there is an agreement or an arrangement, or that the National Railways may even ultimately become the owners of this property?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know how many cross examinations a man would be subject to in an ordinary trial—I mean by so many. But as a matter of fact I have the utmost confidence in the solicitor of the National Railways. This transaction in all its bearings has his approval and is subject to his guidance. He advises me that the Canadian National Railways are protected; I did not ask how. I am not the solicitor of the company.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister answer one more question? Does he personally know the names of the syndicate he wishes to keep secret and will he assure the committee that he has personal confidence in them and a knowledge of their financial responsibility?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know them personally; I will go so far as to say that I do not know their names, although I have heard the chairman's name. But I am assured that they are men of responsibility who are able to carry out any contract that they make.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister does not even know their names?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are many responsible men's names I do not know.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister kindly answer that? He does not even know their names?

Mr. GRAHAM: I said so; I have told my hon. friend that.

Mr. MANION: How much rent were we paying in Paris for our offices prior to the taking over of this building?

Mr. GRAHAM: We had no railway offices in Paris; we were not represented there. That was one of the difficulties.

Mr. MANION: Have we any of the merchant marine running between Canada and France at the present time?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have arrangements with the Cunard Line and the White Star, but no arrangement with the merchant marine at the present time. That is as to freight, of course. There is no passenger arrangement.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister tell the committee in a few words what the reason was for having this Paris office just at this time? What business had increased so much that we must immediately take over this office in Paris?

Mr. GRAHAM: We want to get the business. We have not had it, and in order to get it we must have some means of getting it. The Canadian National Railways president believes this is the best method, to get a place on the front street in the city of Paris in order to increase the business of the railway. I may as well say frankly to the House that the Canadian National Railways is a great undertaking that the government has entered upon for the time being, during which I am the buffer between the board and parliament, and there is a constant propaganda going on against everything connected with the railways. The president of a private company would not be questioned by his shareholders if he had undertaken a transaction such as we have been discussing to-night by the hour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all. My hon. friend knows it. The president of a private company makes arrangements far in excess of the expenditure in this case, even if it were an expenditure, and completes the transaction before it is ever submitted to the shareholders for approval.

Mr. STEVENS: Not if he was asking his shareholders for $73,000,000 at the same time. If the company was paying a dividend of 10 per cent he would probably do it, but if he was asking for $73,000,000 to make up a deficit he would be subjected to an even more critical examination by the shareholders than the minister has been to-night.

Mr. GRAHAM: The shareholders of a private company are not in session for six months at a time, or it would never be possible to run the company.

Mr. RYCKMAN: But in this case there is only one important shareholder, and the minister could not mention any company president where the company is controlled by one shareholder who would make an expenditure of this kind without consulting that shareholder.

Mr GRAHAM: I understand that, but my hon. friend could not have listened to me. I know as a matter of fact, and so does my hon. friend if he has had any experience with these large transportation corporations, that the executive proceed to purchase properties without consulting the shareholders. Perhaps they may be wrong in that, but they do it. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr Stevens) says that it would be all right if the company had a surplus, but that makes no difference as to the principle.

Mr. STEVENS: It does in practice.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from West York and my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre had better get together because my hon. friend from West York said that this company had the same rights and privileges as a private company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just the same. It is illegal in both cases.

Mr. GRAHAM: The practice of the private company is for the executive to make the best bargain it can for a certain thing, and the shareholders invariably approve his action if they have confidence in the directorate. If they have not, of course, it is another matter. If that were not the practice, suppose, for instance, that the Canadian Pacific had it in their mind to buy a building and called the shareholders together to discuss it, they could not buy that building at any reasonable price. Up would go the price at once. So these things are done quietly through some other party. All large companies do it that way, buy buildings, right of way and everything else through some other party, and after it is all through their action is approved of. That is the practice, whether it is legal or not.

My hon. friend from Fort William asked a very proper question as to the necessity for buying this building in Paris and why it was necessary to buy it without delay. I have explained the necessity for having some headquarters in Paris. It is considered essential to the success of the Canadian National Railway, unless we are to throw up our hands and say we will not do any business with that part of the world. As to the necessity of getting this particular building which the Canadian National president wanted to get, there were two or three other parties after the property, and consequently he closed immediately.

Mr. MANION: The question I asked in regard to the boats and the business and the necessity for buying the building in Paris so hurriedly has really been answered by the minister and his answer is just as I expected. I have under my hand the Canada Year Book and I was noting our exports and imports to France as compared with other countries and also our immigration from France as compared with other countries. The statement was made in regard to the buying of this building at Paris by Sir Henry Thornton that its basement was to be used for moving pictures to encourage immigration from France to Canada. It struck me at that time that we had never had a large immigration from France. In the first place France does not encourage emigration, and in the second place Canada has not apparently attracted the French people of recent years. I made it my business while we were discussing this to look up the statistics of immigration to Canada from other countries, and I find a number of countries from which we get a very much larger immigration than France. So if there is any reason for having this large building in Paris from the immigration standpoint, and that was the point emphasized in the press, there is a very much greater reason for having such a building in some of these other countries. The figures here are from 1909 to 1915, and I find that the immigration from Scotland before the war, and it is perhaps better to take those figures than the figures of to-day, was between five and ten times greater than the immigration from France. The immigration from Austria was more before the war than the immigration from France, the same is true of Germany, and in a greater degree still of Russia; it is true of Italy, and from little Sweden even if we received as many immigrants as from France. Then in regard to imports and exports the same holds true, although the figures vary for the different countries. Switzerland exports to Canada much more heavily than France, and the other countries I mentioned receive a much greater amount of imports from Canada than France. Therefore it appears to me that it would be necessary in some of these other countries from which we get a greater number of people and with which we do a greater trade than with France to have some building of that sort. It may be answered that Sir Henry Thornton should be more familiar with the matter than I am, and of course he is, but it struck me in looking over these figures that we are doing more business with some of these other countries and receiving a much larger immigration from them. I just wished to point that out. Certainly it would appear to the ordinary observer that this is a case of policy. It is not a case of ordinary expenditure. I admit that we have no right to interfere, I do not think the government should interfere in the ordinary management of the railways, and I believe that all members in this corner of the House will take that view, but in the ordinary expenditure of capital, and this is an ordinary expenditure of capital, it is a question of policy, and before a question of policy should be carried out it would appear to the ordinary observer at least that the government should take more part than they admit having taken in this particular case, where it appears that action was taken first and the government consulted second. That would be the impression anyone would get, and I think the minister admits it. It does appear to me that this was not altogether a wise move to take looking at it from the superficial observer's standpoint.

In closing, I hope the minister will be correct for the sake of Canada and the sake of the railway that next year he will be able to give us more details and be able to prove to the House the wisdom of this purchase, which the people of Canada are now inclined to doubt.

Mr. LEWIS: There is another matter coming under the head of what I would call extraordinary expenditure. In the press some days ago it was stated that the Canadian Pacific in conjunction with the Canadian National Railways were granting $100,000 yearly for a period of five years to the Canada Colonization scheme. Now in view of the very long discussion we had on immigration when those estimates were before the House does the minister approve of this plan? Is it true that the Canadian National Railways have made such a grant? So far as I am concerned I am not against any company bringing people into this country, but I was wondering whether the minister or the department approved of this grant for that purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure that it has been discussed so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned. I want to say again that the Canadian National Railway Board run their business under the provisions of the act, I do not think they have entered into the arrangement as yet, but if they had done so it would certainly be after full consideration, in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway—these being the two greatest transportation companies—and for the purpose of bringing settlers into Canada. Speaking from the Canadian National standpoint—yes, speaking from the national standpoint—I think the salvation of Canada is to get more people of the right kind into this country. I think that is true, and anything that would tend to that end would, I think, have the approval of parliament. As to the particulars in this case I am not conversant with them to a greater extent than I have already informed my hon. friend.

Mr. LEWIS: You say then that you think it would be a profitable arrangement for this country?

Mr. GRAHAM: If properly administered I would think so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have been waiting for a couple of hours now in the hope that I and the committee might obtain some definite information in regard to the question of the purchase of the hotel site in Paris for the National Railway system, and I am sorry to say that after having listened for that period of time I know as little about the subject now as I did when the discussion started. There is this to be said, however, that I think the minister himself knows very little about the transaction. No member of the government knows more than the Minister of Railways about this matter, and if his information upon it is nil the information of the government is likewise nil, and up to the present time the information of the committee is nil also. Now what is the position? I may say it is a serious one. I realize that the Minister of Railways has for two hours to-night treated the matter with the greatest jocularity. It may be his natural good humour but he has certainly tried rather to make a joke of the idea—

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE:—that the House or the country is entitled to any information in regard to this subject upon which there is considerable public discussion, perhaps some little public misapprehension, and perhaps some little public curiosity because of the payment of $2,000,000 of the money of the people of this country in the manner in which it has been done in this instance, from the facts disclosed. The whole of the circumstances regarding the withdrawal of that money from the treasury of the National Railway Company are so shrouded in mystery as to raise some curiosity and anxiety in the public mind; and I think that the government and the minister would do well to reconsider the position they have taken upon this question to-night. I do not suppose the public will be satisfied with the statement made by the minister; I believe that from one end of Canada to the other it will be found that there is a reasonable and a general demand that fuller information than we have as yet received be given, and be given now and not postponed until it is too late for any purpose. If a system is growing up under the act or under the railway practice of this country whereby the president of a railway system—even a man with Sir Henry Thornton's standing—can withdraw $2,000,000 from its treasury and place that money in the hands of one of his officials to be transferred to some banking institution in order that a New York syndicate may be enabled to carry out its financing, the sooner we know the particulars and details of that transaction the better for Canada. Why one has only to state the facts to show how reprehensible the practice is. Think of it. Here is a minister of the Crown standing up in the committee and stating that he does not even know the names of the men who compose the syndicate. Yet the president of the Canadian National Railways has drawn $2,000,000 out of the treasury of that company to back that syndicate. What is the inference? What is the fact? The syndicate has an interest in this matter. We do not know who they are. They could not raise the $2,000,000 from the banks themselves, otherwise they would have got it, and there would have been no occasion for Sir Henry Thornton to interfere with the Canadian National Railway money. Had the syndicate been of the standing which the minister seems to think they are they could have financed this thing through the bank themselves. What an anomaly it is, what a strange thing it is, what a mysterious thing it is, that this syndicate of New Yorkers should get Sir Henry Thornton to go to the treasury of the Canadian National Railways for $2,000,000 to pay to a bank—I do not know whether it is a New York bank or a Canadian bank, I do not know what bank it is—and pull the chestnuts out of the fire for them.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not the situation at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the way I gleaned the facts from the discussion that has taken place to-night.

Mr. GRAHAM: You have been listening to the speeches of the gentlemen beside you, not to mine.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have been listening to the speeches made in this committee, and if I am wrong in what I say the minister should be the last one to complain, because he has given us no facts whatever upon which to base a correct statement. Is it the law, or is it the practice to-day, that Sir Henry Thornton is entitled to use that amount of money to purchase a site in Paris, or in London, or anywhere else? If he can do that, if that is good practice, if that system is to be permitted, to-morrow he can take $10,000,000 out of the company's treasury and finance a New York corporation in the purchase of a building on Wall street. It would be possible for him to take another $10,000,000 and spend it in New York. Why, it is in the power of the president to ruin the country, absolutely to ruin it, carrying the principle to its logical conclusion. I submit the principle is wrong. I submit the principle is illegal. I submit the practice ought not to exist; and if the minister, or the government, or parliament, has any control the system will be put an end to at the earliest possible moment.

Is it any wonder that the people and the press of Canada are a little curious upon this question? A capital expenditure of $2,000,000 by the National Railway Board, with a huge annual deficit, is something to stagger the public of any country. Now we have this $2,000,000 added to that deficit, then another million and a quarter is taken for the purpose of purchasing a block on a street corner in the city of Toronto which, with all deference, I submit was not an immediately necessary expenditure at all, thus adding still more to our deficit. Is it any wonder, in view of these facts, that the people are curious, that they desire more definite information than they have been able to get.

I have never, in all my experience, seen a minister of the Crown stand up in this House and try to justify an expenditure of $2,000,000 and make the statement practically, "I know nothing about it. I know there is a syndicate, but I do not even know their names. I know the money was taken out of the National Railway treasury to assist the syndicate in the financing of this purchase." That is the position of the minister to-night, and that absolute non-disclosure of material facts, that refusal to give us agreements or information —without advancing any real reason for such refusal except the statement that it will be detrimental to the interests of the National Railways—is a bold, bald statement. It is not a reason, it is an ipse dixit of the minister. Of course, we may not be able to get anything more, but I think he might take us into his confidence and say what it is would be so detrimental to the public interest if he gave us a reasonable disclosure of the leading facts in regard to this transaction.

One effect of such a statement would be to restore some public confidence in the road and in its management. An immediate effect would be to allay a great deal of public curiosity. It will not go down with the people, and will not satisfy the House, to say that Gerald Ruel, counsel for the railroad, advised Sir Henry Thornton, and Sir Henry Thornton advised me, and all I, as Minister of Railways, have to do is to sit here and answer questions and pay the bill. That is not satisfactory to me, and I question if it is satisfactory to any member of the committee of this House.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend would read over some of the debates in the House when he was minister, and would read the discussion on some of the estimates, he would probably agree that if there ever was in any government, a minister who gave no information to the House it was my hon. friend. If he will look over the estimates he will see that when he was asked in regard to the very large expenditure for the Air Force, he said "I do not know the particulars, but I am very sure that every cent is right."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not suppose I was pressed for particulars, but in this case the minister was pressed for particulars.

Mr. GRAHAM: He was pressed for particulars and that was his answer. He would not have given that answer if he had not been pressed. I am pointing out his weakness and his great indignation. I understand it all. I do not get annoyed. I am not jocular over this, but I refuse to allow my hon. friend to accomplish his purpose and make me angry. He cannot do that. He has tried it for fifteen or twenty minutes and cannot do it. He has tried by, I will not say wilful misrepresentation, but he has said that I have not given the facts to the House. I have given the history of the transaction, but I have been asked to give documents which the hon. member behind my hon. friend says it would be wrong to produce. I have been asked to give the names of the syndicate. I assure him that I do not know the personnel of the syndicate, but I am assured by the Canadian National officials that they are a responsible body of men. The hon. member would seem to think that I was president of the Canadian National, but I am not. He helped draft the act which gave them great power. Now I refuse to be put in the place of the president and officials of the Canadian National. They are not here to defend themselves. I am advised by the Canadian National Railways of their proceedings. I gave that information to the House. They have the authority under the act to carry out those proceedings. I said that Mr. Ruel had advised the president that his proceedings were perfectly in order. He is so advised by Mr. Ruel, notwithstanding my hon. friend's indignation, which is only assumed. I would take Mr. Ruel's advice on these railway matters as quickly as I would take his advice, and so would the president. He is paid to give that advice. So far as Mr. Ruel's advice is concerned, anything that was done by the president was within the four corners of the act. What better advice could the president get, and what better advice could I get? Not here, that I see. I cannot see anything here that I would take in preference to his advice. My hon. friend says I said the building was purchased for a syndicate. I did not say anything of the kind, and if I were inclined to get angry, one thing that would make me angry would be the statement that I said such a thing. I did not say a lot of things that he mentioned, but I did say a lot of things he has not mentioned. Hansard will show all that. I have given a straightforward statement of the transaction, as given me by the board of directors. I might not have done all these things, if I had been president, but I am not president. The president did these things and Mr. Ruel, his adviser, said these things were done legally. I am not arguing, and I have not argued, that I would have done these things in this way, or that my hon. friend would have done these things; but I did say the president got legal advice, and I trust the arrangement will be beneficial to the Canadian National.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the minister's interpretation of the act is correct, it seems to me that we are drifting into a most extraordinary and dangerous situation in Canada. I suppose very few of us have realized the implications of the Railway Act. Probably because of the unfortunate experience of the past years, we have been so much afraid of having politics brought into our railways that we have gone to the other extreme. The Canadian people have been willing to grant a good deal of power to outside commissions or boards in the hope that these outside commissions or boards would be able to carry on the affairs of the country more efficiently when freed from the nagging of individual members of the House. At the same time, we must not lose sight of the fact that the Canadian people, through their representatives in this House, are responsible for the expenditures of public money. That is the big thing. If we are to erect a board or commission that is practically free from effective criticism, then we have come to a very dangerous pass in our history. The people of this country—at least I can speak for the people of western Canada—have been tremendously interested in this Canadian National Railway system and the whole scheme of public ownership. Yet we are beginning to discover that, after all, the only thing that is national in this railway is the name, and, perhaps, I should add, the deficits. The bondholders are very largely the financial beneficiaries of this road. They seem to be secure. The losses are borne by the people of Canada. We must remember too that in its organization the railways do not come at all closely under the direction of our Canadian people. The management is not at all democratic in its character.

I should like to mention in passing the position that has been taken again and again by Labour, that the employees should be directly represented on these public boards. I believe that the Liberal party gave assurances that the employees would be represented on the board of management. The employees are not represented. Years have passed, and we see no indication—

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the hon. member will recollect that the Prime Minister's suggestion was that Labour would be represented. Labour is represented by one of the ablest labour men on this continent—Tom Moore. He was one of the first men put on the board.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I remember when that matter was up for discussion some little time ago, that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) pointed out very clearly that the promise was that the employees would be represented, and I submit that the appointment of a particular labour man, however estimable he may be, does not in any way make him in the sense in which we understand it in democratic countries a representative of Labour. The claim is, and has been throughout, that the employees themselves, those who work on the road would have some share in the management of the affairs of the road. That is not the case to-day. Further there seems to be no effective way in which the people of this country through their representatives can control the policies of this board. I think we had it some time ago from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that if there came a time of strain, undoubtedly the policies of the board would have to be regulated by the people of this country. I suggest that when these enormous deficits are piling up and the people are being asked to meet them, the time has already come when we should have a larger voice in the determination of the policies of the railroads.

It is all very well to say that we should keep clear of politics in regard to these matters. Yet I submit that after all politics is simply the business of the country, and a great corporation of this kind cannot possibly carry on its affairs without being in touch with the politics or with the business of the country at a score of different points. We find that already the president of this railway has been associated with the presidents of other railways in what might very well be termed a transportation trust—a serious thing when we consider that the primary object of having a Canadian National road is that we may serve the people. This great trust or monopoly is operating, not primarily in the interests of the people but above all things in the interests of the corporations. We are told again and again that our Canadian National Railways constitute an independent corporation which should be able to carry on business in its own way. I submit that if we allow this enterprise to be carried on in such a way we shall be no better off than we should be if the Canadian National Railways were a private concern. Here, for instance, is a question that arises in connection with this particular transaction involving $2,000,000. We are informed that it is desirable that we should encourage tourist traffic. I want to speak in behalf of a great many people of this country and to declare that there are other things a great deal more important to Canada than the encouragement of tourist traffic. There are a great many more important matters that require our consideration. I will not say that possibly tourist traffic might not be advantageous to the railways as a side-line. That might be the case. But I do say that if we intend to enter upon a new policy, or develop a policy, in that direction, we should not do so without that policy being decided upon in this House. That is the point that should be emphasized.

Mr. McBRIDE: Could the hon. member tell me of one practical railwayman in this House who could advise along those lines?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is something a great deal more needed to-day than the advice of practical railway men; and I am not decrying for a moment the advice that they can give. But when we are asked to vote tens of millions of dollars of a deficit, then I say that the people who are being asked to supply that money, are essentially the people who should decide the policies. It is all very well to have experts come in and advise upon certain policies and carry them out; but there are larger affairs that ought to be determined by the people, and by the people alone. I might suggest to the hon. gentleman who asked me the question that there are no practical engineers in this House; at least I presume not. If we required a bridge built we would need an expert to advise us on the matter; but there is the fundamental question as to whether or not we want the bridge built. We are in the position of those who have to decide, since presumably we are speaking on behalf of the people, and are voting these moneys for them.

The same thing is true with regard to the immigration policy. We are placed in a very absurd position indeed in this respect. We spend days and even weeks discussing the immigration policy of Canada, discussing the question whether or not we shall have more immigrants come into the country, and then we find that we are paying tens, almost hundreds of millions of dollars to a corporation which is running things for its own ends, by its own methods, with the object of bringing people into the country. It is preposterous that, should we decide that we do not want immigrants to come into Canada, a corporation independent of parliament can institute a policy that will bring us immigrants by tens or hundreds of thousands. I repeat, it is an absurd situation. This is manifest surely in the response of the Minister of Railways to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) with regard to this item of $500,000 which is to be granted during five years—at least the suggestion was that it should be granted for five years—to the Canadian Colonization Company. We have held up this House for hours discussing items of less than $100,000; and yet here is a matter involving, over five years, an expenditure of $500,000, to promote a definite immigration policy, to be paid to a certain colonization company which has been more or less discredited in the country. But we, the people of Canada, who are indirectly to pay that $500,000 are to have no voice in the matter whatever. The situation is simply intolerable.

Now, I am not going to criticize Sir Henry Thornton concerning the many speeches he has made throughout the country. But I would point out that whilst the reason for having an independent board is essentially that the railways should be kept out of politics, there is a very real danger that Sir Henry Thornton may assume, in the political life of the country, a position that is not accorded to any man elected to represent the people on the floor of this House. Sir Henry Thornton can go about the country advocating immigration and whatever else he likes, and he says he is doing it for business reasons. But these policies which he is advocating may be essentially public policies. Sir Henry Thornton is not responsible for these utterances to any group of people in this country. I suppose he is here on a contract for a term of years; but he is not subject to the scrutiny that is exercised over one of the ministers of the Crown. Again I say that we are allowing things to drift into a very serious situation if we permit an organization to grow up which is not at all responsible to the people of the country.

A similar situation prevails in connection with the shipping corporations throughout the country. Our merchant marine has become part of the railway system or at least is connected with it. We are allowing our president of this great railway company to act on shipping boards and possibly join with our other corporations that are keeping up freight rates, and having no small share in determining the commercial and financial policies of the people. I submit that these are powers that should not be granted to any one man. I know that under the rules and regulations of this House we are comparatively helpless. Apparently about the only thing we can do is 11 p.m. to protest. The government can carry these estimates and not give any information; it can invest in real estate in Paris this year or, if it chooses, in Berlin next year; it can invest in real estate in various countries of the world with which our railways may have some connection. And seemingly the people's representatives are to have no information whatever concerning these things. It can encourage an immigration policy from southeastern Europe or from China. What chance have we of effective protest? After all is done the railway board presents a bill to us, and without scrutiny, without even knowing the items, we are required to pay the account. For one I protest against any arrangement of that kind being continued in this country.

Mr. BAXTER: Is the arrangement with reference to the Paris building completed, or is it yet possible for the government to withdraw from it?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not any doubt in the world that the syndicate will take over this property and rent it to some person else if it is so desired.

Mr. BAXTER: But is the arrangement with the syndicate completed?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have pointed out two or three times to-night that while completion of the arrangement was in progress it would not be fair to place the details before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. GRAHAM: I really enjoy being cross-questioned by so many eminent jurists, not being one myself, as they present the subject from different angles. My hon. friend asks me if the arrangement is completed. I say the arrangement is not completed, and that is the reason I gave for not endeavouring to get particulars to place before the committee. It would not be fair to do so under the agreement as I understand it.

Mr. BAXTER: I know the minister is doing the best he can, but I am under the impression that there is an understanding or agreement between the National Railways and the syndicate, and that this syndicate makes an arrangement with somebody else. I want to know whether the arrangement between the National Railways and the syndicate has been signed, sealed and delivered; in other words, is that part of the arrangement completed?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say it was completed.

Mr. BAXTER: Can we stop it then?

Mr. GRAHAM: When the details are placed before the House next session my hon. friend will see some of the difficulties I labour under at the present time in trying to give him the detailed information he wants. The syndicate is taking over the property and we will be relieved of all liability. We need not rent a foot of space unless we want to.

Mr. HANSON: But we will rent space at a sufficient rate to pay the syndicate pretty well for what it pays for the building?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a question for future consideration. I am told the building is all leased now at a fair profit. I would not mind being in the syndicate.

Mr. HANSON: I would not mind either with the government backing it.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to torture the minister at all—

Mr. GRAHAM: No, it is all right.

Mr. BAXTER: —but I should like to know whether there is something yet for the syndicate to do which, if not done, will cause the whole transaction to fall through.

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine that if the Canadian National Railways wanted to get out of this arrangement—

Mr. STEVENS: Mess.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not a mess at all.

Mr. STEVENS: It surely is.

Mr. GRAHAM: It depends again on which angle you view it from.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All round.

Mr. GRAHAM: I believe in the judgment of the board. There is no arrangement which could not be abrogated, I suppose, if so desired, but I think you will find that if the transaction goes through as outlined at the present time it will be a good bargain. Sir Henry Thornton will be able to get the space in Paris that he has been trying to secure for some months.

Mr. BAXTER: I thank the minister for his endeavours to let me have such crumbs as fall from the railway turntable, for that is about the best I think he can do. I really cannot tell whether there is any particular part of this arrangement that can be considered as completed. I do not want the minister to tell me the details of something that would interfere with good bargaining on behalf of this country. I will go a little further. I had occasion since the session opened to put a question on the order paper. The minister very fairly told me that while it was not expedient to give the information to the public, he was willing to give it privately to members of parliament, and I was one of those who shared in the reception of that information, with which I was perfectly satisfied. I think the course he took on that occasion was correct, but that was with reference to what might have been termed a rumour. Now to-night this matter comes before us in what strikes me as a most extraordinary way. There is not a point on which the minister dare commit himself definitely, and what information he does possess he is unable to reveal. Yet he is actually asking for a large sum of money. Now, we all appreciate the immense difficulty of running this railway system as a public enterprise and at the same time giving detailed information to parliament and to the country in advance of the completion of various transactions. That is something that obviously cannot be done unless we are to pay through the nose time and again for what we want, and I do not wish any word of mine to interfere with any reasonable policy which will avoid that. But there is a body that lies between the management of the Canadian National Railways and the general public, a body that I think ought to be informed as to all the essential parts of every such transaction. That body is the government of Canada, which, whether we support it or not, has been chosen by the people to be their stewards until they make a change. Now, if we are going to set up a power in Canada that will be greater than the government, that will have its secrets from the government, and to which the government must go with bated breath truckling for a little necessary information, then I say something is growing up too big for Canada itself. The minister apparently had not been entrusted with knowledge of this project before an irrevocable step was taken by the head of the railway system. Do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I purpose to-night to abuse or even to criticize Sir Henry Thornton. I do not think the time has come for that. I think what we have to do as a nation is to give Sir Henry Thornton a reasonable opportunity to make good or to make bad with the railway system, and until a sufficient lengtht of time has elapsed I do not think there ought to be either approbation or disapprobation of his conduct. I am prepared, so far as that is concerned, to wait. But that does not prevent me from saying that if Sir Henry Thornton, or whoever else may occupy this position, were the best possible man obtainable,—and he may be that—yet there should be no power in his hands to carry through a transaction such as the one that has been spoken of to-night without the knowledge even of the minister who is responsible to parliament and to the country therefor. He ought at least to be consulted; he ought at least to have an opportunity of laying the matter before his colleagues. If that is not done, responsible government becomes very largely a farce. Most of the time we spend in this parliament is devoted to criticism of estimates, the voting of supply, and very often on trivial, minor matters hours and days of the time of this House are taken up; yet when we come to a matter of this magnitude we are expected to pass it through, even with a confession from the government itself that it does not know the details of the transaction. That does not commend itself to me as a good thing.

I want to refer to another aspect of the case. The president of the road is surrounded by a body of advisers. I do not criticize Mr. Ruel; I have the same respect for his opinion in matters of law, and very largely for his opinion in matters of general railway administration, that my hon. friend the minister has. I think Sir Henry Thornton has a good adviser in Mr. Ruel. But Mr. Ruel's opinion in this matter cannot go a step further than to say that certain documents are in proper form or that the transaction is within the legal scope of the act constituting the Canadian National Railway Board. That does not pass upon the question whether or not it is advisable to do the thing that is proposed. There is no power I know of that can take even as good and as capable a man as Mr. Ruel and substitute him for the elected representatives of this country or for the government that is responsible to all the people. There are, I believe, some excellent men on the board—the Deputy Minister of Railways; Mr. Ruel, and there may be others; I do not profess to know them all. But I do know that part of the board is made up by place men, men who are worn out in the political field and who do not bring a single atom of utility to the deliberations of that board. I do not know; I am not sure that Sir Henry Thornton has even discussed the matter with them—the minister cannot tell us. But if he has, the matter does not, even at that, stand on a sufficiently strong foundation for me or, I think, for the people of this country. I am not reflecting on individual gentlemen any more than is necessary. But take the action of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; look at the group of men with whom they surround their president for the administration of the affairs of that corporation. Contrast them with the group of men that are given to Sir Henry Thornton as his advisers, or—shall I say—abettors. The contrast is quite enough to ban the government enterprise now and eternally—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear,—I am quite willing to accept that. The word of a man is not to be valued simply on the basis of the millions he possesses.

Mr. HANSON: No, but by the business ability he displays.

Mr. BAXTER: A $2,000 a year man does not make a railway man.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A $2,000 a year man is often better than a $10,000 a year man.

Mr. BAXTER: If there is to be a discussion of how much men get per year, I am not taking any part in it. My point is that the Canadian Pacific Railway bring men from the highest positions in the financial and commercial world to the assistance of their president, and that the—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is Tory doctrine—millions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Fudge.

Mr. BAXTER: Well, we come, then, pretty nearly to the parting of the ways.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Personally I have never been able to have faith in the wisdom of public ownership and public administration of a railway system, and I have not got it now. The very existence of such circumstances as we are discussing to-night is enough, I think, to revolt the strongest advocate of public ownership from the doctrine that he has been prone to profess. When I am told that it is within the four corners of the act that the president of the railway may make a bargain behind the back of the government and of the people of Canada, then I say that a system which, even though it may be technically lawful, permits a total disregard of the opinion of the people themselves and of the government of Canada is not a system that in the end will produce beneficial results. You may for a time under exceptional men and in exceptional circumstances get some benefit, but you will not in the long run. I will be asked, perhaps, what stand my party is taking in this matter.

Mr. DUFF: That is important.

Mr. BAXTER: My party took the stand in days of great national stress that it was right that these roads should be taken over by the people. I was not a member of parliament and was not associated with that programme; I have not associated myself with it since. I do not see, from what has come upon the horizon to-night, that the people are likely to meet with anything but disappointment and practical ruin if they permit the national roads to be managed in the way that is indicated by the minister to-night. And the minister cannot help himself, according to what he tells us; he absolutely must impose secrecy upon himself; he must keep from the people the knowledge that the people ought to have. If the transactions that are spoken of to-night are completed transactions, then there can be no reason why we should not have the details given to the committee. If they are not completed transactions, then there must be an opportunity to withdraw from them; and how can we decide whether we ought to withdraw from them or go ahead with them unless we get the necessary information? If a secret committee of parliament, even, representative of all parties and of all shades of opinion, were invited to discuss these matters, it might be something better than the absolute lack of confidence with which we are confronted to-night. But even that would at best be little better than locking the door after the steed was stolen, when we are told that we have been committed to something and that the minister does not know whether or not we can get out of it because he does not know what the thing is, and the president of the road does not tell him. That is what we get down to. The minister is not to blame for it, to this extent: When he was informed that such a thing was in contemplation, he ought to have taken this stand: If you propose to exercise your full rights, your technical rights, under the law; if you propose to administer this road in major matters, in matters of great policy, involving a serious increase in the capital debt, without giving any information to the government, then it is time for us to select a board that will be more responsible to the opinion of the government and the opinion of the people.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Baxter) lead me to think that it might be advisable to get a farmer on that railway board so that things might be properly managed. I have listened very patiently to-night to a great deal of eloquence to see if we could get some information in connection with this very mysterious deal that has taken place over in Paris. I am inclined to think, Mr. Chairman, that something has got out a little too early and that that is all there is to it. I do not think the trouble with the minister is lack of knowledge; no doubt he has information that perhaps it may not be exactly to the public interest to disclose. It is rather unfortunate that such a thing should happen; perhaps it would have been better had this discussion not taken place before completion of the transaction and the laying of the information on the Table of the House so that we should know all about it.

I do not like some of the criticisms that have been levelled at Sir Henry Thornton. He has undertaken a great work, and I think perhaps it would help him to feel that he has the confidence of the public. There is something in human nature that makes a man generally try to live up to his reputation, and the very fact that we expect him to do well, that he knows we place our confidence in him will be an incentive to him to go on and make a success of the Canadian National railway. I believe it is going to be a success. I make a guess that next year if we have reasonable crops in the West we will have four or five times the surplus over operating expenses that we had this year. I am not a prophet nor perhaps a great business expert, but I have that faith in the management and the way things are shaping at the present time.

In connection with the renting of what we may call expensive buildings in some of the principal cities where traffic might originate, although I am in favour of economy I believe that a great institution like the Canadian National railway cannot afford to have a shabby place in any of these great centres.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Toronto?

Mr. FORKE: Take the city of Toronto. Would you like to see the Canadian National Railways, office there located on some back street, or on the back street in any other great city? I would be even more ambitious than that yet.

There is another question that looms up in my mind. It has been before the House, and it is perhaps looking a little too far ahead, but this is perhaps a good time to mention it. We have been trying to work up a trade in exporting cattle to Great Britain. I am going to express the opinion that just so long as we trust to the shipping companies to export our cattle the trade will not be a very great success, because the shipping companies are so few and they amalgamate so easily that I believe the rates will be fixed at such a point that only a few cattle will cross and perhaps the trade will be killed altogether. I think the day is not far distant when it may be necessary to take the merchant marine out into real deep water and sink them. I believe it will be possible in the not distant future for the Canadian National Railways to have a line of steamships just as the Canadian Pacific has to-day.

Mr. DUFF: Proper steamships.

Mr. FORKE: Proper steamships that will carry cattle. I would not say go into the business of having any big steamship line, but they could rent or build just sufficient to demonstrate to the people of this country at what rate cattle could be carried across the ocean at a profitable figure. Otherwise I do not believe the trade of shipping cattle to the Old Country will ever amount to anything. That may seem rather ambitious to suggest of an organization that has a large deficit every year, but I believe in having courage and I believe this is a time for courage. The only way we can make the railways pay is by making them a going concern with ocean traffic and business offices everywhere where trade could originate.

Coming back to the commencement of my remarks I would be rather sorry for the Minister of Railways were he not built exactly as he is, but I see that he is standing up fairly well under the ordeal. I know there is a suspicious look about this $2,000,000 transaction about which we can get no information, but I am inclined to think that the real trouble is that it has got on the boards a little too early and the minister cannot divulge all he knows. We will simply have to preserve our souls in patience and make up our minds that the government is going to get in great trouble when we get the facts if everything is not all right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was pleased to hear the minister make the statement that the rents from the Yonge street building recently acquired will cover the investment. I was going to ask the minister, does he hope to carry this item to-night?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is his idea—that the committee sit till what hour?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Four o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not trying to bulldoze the committee at all. I had hoped to get this item through to-night. I was going to take up the merchant marine, but the leader of the Opposition was going away and asked me to keep some railway item, which I intended to do, on which he could discuss the subject. This is an item of some magnitude, and I thought perhaps we could get it through to-night and reserve some other item on which there could be a general discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend did that he would, I think, be doing something that never has been done in this House before. This is the main item on which the great bulk of the discussions necessarily takes place. There are a great many other items that could have been brought on. We have all the items, for instance, from 116 to 122 inclusive, and then we have the items from 123 to 140 with some omissions.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some are through.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think my hon. friend had any very great hopes than the item would go through to-night.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes I had.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can tell him it will not. We can put in the time just as well as he can.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is talking as if I had made a threat. He must be bad natured to-night.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said four o'clock, and I did not hear any contradiction from my genial friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are trying to make some progress. If we are going to get through any time this summer we shall have to work a little later than we have been doing. But I am not trying to force the committee to do anything.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not bring on any one of these dozen smaller items? We could have passed a string of them. There are fifteen items here more or less unimportant, but this is the $73,000,000 item.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are all important, but I am not going to quarrel with my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend cannot quarrel with me.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from West York said that this item had never been put through before so quickly. It was put through in thirty mitutes last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Last year we were told that the government did not know anything about the business. We agreed. We were very sympathetic. We gave them no trouble at all. But now they are supposed to know something about it and we are finding out things we never knew anything about before.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would point out that last year they were my hon. friend's own estimates, or practically his own, and he had such confidence in them that he did not wish to have any light thrown on them, and so did not ask any questions. I think we might discuss this item a little longer to see if there is any further information that my hon friends want and then we could go on with some of the other items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If we are going on with anything else I think we should go on with it now. We sat last night till three o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do not blame me for that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. I think we should blame the government for it altogether.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Blame it for everything.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to know whether we are going on with this item or going to take up some of the other items, or whether we are going to adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN: There are other members to speak on this vote.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the government desire that we should go on with this vote to-night?

Mr. GRAHAM: Go on for a little while, it is only 11.30.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not let this stand and call some other item?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not objecting to that, but we want to make some progress, that is all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think you would make progress by taking up another item. I would like definitely to know what the government's idea is? My view is that we will make more progress by letting this item stand. The minister will find he will make more progress by letting this item stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a threat.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, it is not a threat. It is a mere statement of fact because we might get some information in the meantime from the minister. For example, the minister might wish to bring down the extract from the minutes of the meeting of the directors. We might even find out whether the matter had even gone as far as that. If I remember rightly the minister told us that he could not say that anybody knew anything about it except the president and the solicitor; he did not know that it had come before the board even. Perhaps we could find out about that. Then I had a very disquieting statement made to me to-day with reference to Toronto. Perhaps we could find out if that is true or not. That statement is to this effect: That the company were buying not only the corner of King and Yonge streets but they were also buying the Home bank and had already been committed to that purchase. I do not know whether there is a word of truth in this statement or not but I would like the minister to find out.

Mr. GRAHAM: I can tell my hon. friend now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That there is not a word of truth in it?

Mr. GRAHAM: In the first place the government expropriated the corner. If there was going to be a large building erected there in the years to come that might influence the policy decided upon, but there is no question about that now. The whole thing is the result of propaganda. Not a day passes but we are called upon to deny some rumour. I believe a paid propaganda is being carried on. Some rumour is spread in a corner one day, in another corner another day, and in another corner another day, in order to discredit the Canadian National Railways and its management. There is a studied effort in this direction. I have had questions asked me in this House that I have traced back to this propaganda. Now I want to be fair. I am standing up for the Canadian National Railways. They have been placed under government control and I believe we can make them a success. But we cannot make them a success if, on a rumour of some kind, hon. gentlemen are going to start out and make unjustifiable statements. Stories of this kind spread like a fire. They get into the press first and then we are asked about them. A denial is given but the first report is never overtaken. That happens every day in the week.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend would find it a great deal easier to make progress if this matter had been done legally and properly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What about the rumours?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the action taken had been legal and proper my hon. friend's position would not be nearly so difficult.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking about the situation in Toronto.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am referring to the Paris matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend asked me a question about Toronto and said he had heard disquieting rumours about what had been done there. That statement goes on Hansard and is circulated throughout the country, and there is not one word of truth in it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Nevertheless I am still going to ask my hon. friend to look into the matter. I am going to ask him to find out whether an offer was not made to the bank directorate, and whether a bank director was not engaged in negotiations. It may be that there is nothing in the rumour; but when we find that the country can be committed to a $2,000,000 proposition without the slightest notice or warning it is just as well to find out if there is anything in it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You have got a suspicious mind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now then I assume—

Mr. LAPOINTE: It pays to advertise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume I may thank my hon. friend for his kind remark.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a splendid advertisement. I do not know that I can improve the model my hon. friend has set up.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh no, you are better at that yourself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be a task entirely beyond me. Nevertheless I thank my hon. friend for his admonition. Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose we can take it for granted that the minister is not going to tell us anything more about the Paris purchase. Can he tell us, though, whether the deed has yet been taken for that property, whether the two millions has yet been paid to the original owner?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure about that. I am informed it has been done through the London office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So the money is gone and we have the property.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says no. We cannot eat our cake and have it. If the money has been paid it must be gone.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You do not want the company to have any property in Paris?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell me from whom the property was purchased?

Mr. LAPOINTE: From the owners.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose it would be the company. I do not know the name of the company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You could not tell us as to that? Is that the whole price? Was everything paid in cash?

Mr. GRAHAM: A little under $2,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was it all paid in cash? I see. So there is no balance left at all. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the minister will not tell us anything about it I shall not tell him what attitude we will take in connection with it. I want full particulars of item (a) "Operating deficits whenever incurred or ascertained." What is the amount put in under that item?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has a perfect right to this information. I do not like his threats, though.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are no threats.

Mr. GRAHAM: There were absolute threats, but we cannot do business in that way. You cannot make any headway and we cannot do any business.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I offered to take some other item.

Mr. GRAHAM: You did not give me a chance to accept, you kept on talking instead of sitting down. The operating deficit for the Canadian Government Railways themselves—I think we are providing liberally for these but we have to make provision for all eventualities—is $3,000,000; for the Canadian Northern, $2,500,000; for the Grand Trunk Railway nothing; for the Grand Trunk Pacific $4,500,000, totalling $10,000,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Before we leave this vote there is a condition to which I would like to draw attention in connection with the St. John and Quebec railway which the Dominion government is operating at the present time. As you possibly know we had floods in New Brunswick this spring. In April a bridge was washed away on the St. John and Quebec railway just above Woodstock. There were several washouts on the Canadian Pacific railway which runs up through nearly the same territory, at the same time. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, however, were able to restore their service within a week anyway. The Canadian National railway bridge is still down. I understand there was a lapse of thirty days from the time the bridge went out before operations were begun to replace it. The latest information I have is that they expect it will be the first of July before they will have that road in operation.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the bridge to which you refer?

Mr. CALDWELL: It is a bridge across the Meduxnakeag just above Woodstock. This creates a very serious situation on that road just north of Woodstock where it runs through the potato belt so-called. The potato shippers, who have warehouses on every siding along that road north of Woodstock, bought large quantities of potatoes and stored them there expecting to ship them out but potatoes being a perishable article they cannot wait until the first of July when this road will be completed. The growers have been under the necessity of hiring trucks and trucking those potatoes to the shipper at some point. In addition to that the farmers nearly all have more or less potatoes, some quite large quantities, on their hands under the best of conditions for shipping. We had sworn evidence before a parliamentary committee this year that the farmers in New Brunswick had got less than 50 per cent of the actual cost of marketing their potato crop last year, and they are still marketing them at that loss. Now they are in the position of having no railway facilities in the best potato producing section of New Brunswick. With large quantities on their hands their potatoes will be an absolute loss by the first of July when this road is to be completed. I have it on very good authority—in fact I was talking to a gentleman this very evening in the House who had just come up from there—that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had trains running over that road in at least a week, but it was thirty days before the Canadian National Company commenced operations on this bridge. If a permanent bridge could not have been put up a temporary structure might have been erected to meet the emergency. I believe the trains could have been running on that road long before this had the proper measures been taken.

Then I see this vote covers the deficits where they are ascertained. I imagine the minister has ascertained the operating deficit on the St. John and Quebec Railway. There has been a deficit every year since it has been operated, due to no fault of the railway, but owing to the fact that it has never been completed from Grand Falls and made a through route, as first intended. The operating deficit is due to two or three facts: one is that it is a branch line, when it should be a through line, and another, the fact that it has not been completed. I want to acknowledge my gratitude to the minister for extending the time for the completion of the road and for paying the Dominion subsidy for the balance of the construction of the road. But I do not think it is going far enough. I think it would pay the Dominion government to complete the road, link up with the Canadian National at Grand Falls, and turn it into a revenue producer, instead of a producer of deficits. That is another reason for the deficit, and this condition should have been remedied.

On the road north of Woodstock there is a great deal of local traffic. There are several mills on that line of road, as well as a large amount of farm produce. I know one saw and lath mill owner who has been unable to procure cars for years when he needed them. He has applied for cars, and was told there were none to be had. He has put on teams, hauled the stuff ten or twelve miles to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and loaded it in Canadian National cars on the Canadian Pacific track. These cars could have been switched with proper management to the Canadian National and the Canadian National would have got the freight. The result has been that the profit has been eaten up by the Canadian Pacific Railway, when the stuff was hauled in Canadian National cars but carried on the Canadian Pacific road. The management said that they could not get the cars. The same thing occurred in regard to potatoes and hay, farmers hauling their produce alongside the St. John and Quebec road, and loading on the Canadian Pacific siding in Canadian National cars, having been told by the management that they could not provide Canadian National cars for their own road.

There is still another condition. This road is not built to its northern extremity and connected with the Transcontinental. Neither is it built into the port of St. John. It runs for the last ten miles to St. John down the west side of the river. Potatoes and hay shipped to St. John for export are loaded on the boats at West St. John, but owing to the fact that no sidings were provided at West St. John for switching cars of freight for the docks to be loaded on the boats, it is taken to East St. John across the bridge at the Reversible Falls. I believe there is a toll on that bridge of 1½ cents per 100 pounds. This toll has to be paid both ways. It goes to the yard in East St. John in the first place, and later, owing to the fact that the Canadian National Railways have no facilities for switching at West St. John, they pay the Canadian Pacific 3 cents a hundred for switching the cars back to the port of West St. John. Then they pay the Canadian Pacific Railway 3 cents terminal charges, because the Canadian Pacific does the switching and unloading.

I want to cite a concrete instance. Let us take a car of potatoes from Woodstock. The freight is 16½ cents per 100 pounds from Woodstock to St. John. Out of that 16½ cents freight from Woodstock to St. John, you have to pay the bridge toll of 1½ cents a hundred each way, making a total of 3 cents for switching, and then there is 3 cents for terminal charges. That brings the charges up to 9 cents, to be taken out of the 16½, which leaves the St. John and Quebec Railway 7½ cents, although they do all the hauling, except the switching on to the dock. They pay over to the Canadian Pacific 9 cents a hundred out of the 16½ cents on every car of potatoes which goes to West St. John for shipment. These are things which should be remedied and could be remedied. I hope the minister will bring this matter to the attention of the management of the road.

We will admit they have taken this road out of politics. A private citizen cannot go to the management of the road and get them to do anything. For instance, a mill man who could not get cars on the St. John and Quebec Railway, on going to the Canadian National management, was curtly informed that there were no cars, although at the time Canadian National cars were being loaded on the Canadian Pacific track. I hope this matter will be brought to the attention of the management, and some effort made to have the bridge replaced north of Woodstock, so that the farmers and shippers who have potatoes that are perishable in storage may be able to get them shipped out before they are spoiled, because they will not be worth shipping by the 1st of July.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will bring the remarks of my hon. friend to the attention of the management to-morrow.

Mr. BAXTER: Perhaps the minister can give me an answer now in reference to the train shed at St. John. Does he know whether the president or board of directors or somebody has arranged for the building of a new station there?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, it is not provided for in this estimate, I am afraid.

Mr. HANSON: Is there any provision for renewing the bridge at Fredericton? The minister may not know, but that bridge was built in 1887 by the late Senator Temple, and it is now considered too light for the class of locomotives that have to go over it, with the result that all the trains passing over that now have to be hauled by small engines. Large engines cannot go over the bridge across the river. The matter has been under consideration, and we have been waiting for more than three years. Could the minister say whether a new bridge is contemplated there?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no provision in the estimates for that.

Mr. BAXTER: If the minister does not want us to continue with this general item, I will not press it now. I can ask the question again.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a general item, 139 under which all those items may be discussed.

Mr. BAXTER: Will that new station be dealt with in the Supplementary Estimates, or has the railway board decided that during the coming year nothing will be done? Will it be built out of revenue or will anything be done?

Mr. GRAHAM: No doubt in the world the board recognizes the urgency or necessity, but in regard to much of this work we have to make selections, and I am told that they are going to impose on the people of St. John for another year. They have not put anything in the estimates for that station.

Mr. BAXTER: Does the minister realize what it means, not only to the people of St. John, who, of course, use the railway station to some extent, or rather who suffer for the want of a railway station, but to the whole passenger traffic coming from St. John? It means people have to get on or off the train in what was a train-shed, but what is now simply out of doors, in all kinds of weather. Such a condition does not exist in any city or town, I think, of one-quarter the size of St. John throughout the Dominion of Canada, and it is even more disgraceful than the filthy station that people have to put up with in the city of Toronto, when there is a good station alongside; and I must say I do not know why it is not being used.

Item stands.

To provide for the purchase of branch lines—Moncton and Buctouche Railway—Revote..	$70,000
Interest estimated, from date of taking possession to March 31, 1924, not exceeding (including Revote—$21,125).. ..	23,625
	$93,625

Mr. GRAHAM: This is an old item that has been voted year after year. The railways have not been able to get title to the property.

Mr. HANSON: I want to tell the minister that if the company will get down to brass tacks and pay their liabilities they will get the title to the right-of-way. Under the provincial legislation they do not own the right-of-way. This railway company never had title to the right-of-way, by deed or grant of any kind. Enabling legislation was passed by the provincial government providing that on certain proof being submitted to the Lieutenant Governor in Council a vesting order should be passed. This road is head over heels in debt to legitimate creditors, but it has absolutely refused to make any effort to pay them, with the result that the provincial government of New Brunswick, very properly, and at the instance of residents of the province to whom the company is indebted, has refused to make this vesting order. The minister will never get title to the right-of-way until he obtains that vesting order, and that order will not be got until he brings pressure to bear upon the management of the Moncton and Buctouche railway to pay their creditors. I can frankly say that I am interested in one of these claims for an estate which has been waiting patiently for a long time to get the money that is due it. We do not seem to be able to make any progress in the matter, and I would ask the minister, as in days gone by I have asked the deputy minister, to interest himself and to tell these people to clean up their liabilities so that these claimants may be able to get their money. There will be very little coming to the owners of the road and the matter should be attended to.

Item agreed to.

To pay claim of Fortin & Moffatt (National Transcontinental Railway), $5,390.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is an old claim. Settlement was agreed to by the late Mr. Cochrane, but at that time the men would not take the amount offered. They have visited me once or twice and I have informed them that I am prepared to give them this amount in settlement of the claim of $29,000. If they do not accept this in full they will get nothing.

Item agreed to.

St. Anne's lock: highway bridge at Isle Perrot, $100,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a grant for a bridge, part of which has been paid.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to say much, but is this bridge more important than some cover for the people who are using trains in the city of St. John?

Mr. HANSON: Where is the bridge?

Mr. GRAHAM: At Isle Perrot.

Mr. HANSON: Where is that?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Lavigueur) can inform the hon. gentleman. This is for the construction of a bridge between the island and the mainland. The federal government has made a contribution, part of which has been paid.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Before the item is carried I want to make one or two observations. I see that the government is subscribing $400,000 for the construction of a bridge at Isle Perrot. I may point out that a bridge is projected on the island of Orleans, Quebec, and we shall look to the government for a contribution to that undertaking. I think the provincial government of Quebec is well disposed to build a bridge which will cost probably about $800,000, or, say, a million, to provide communication with the mainland for a population of six very important agricultural parishes on the island of Orleans. I have no objection to this item being passed, but I wish to have it understood now that at the next session of parliament I shall call upon the government for a subscription towards the construction of that bridge.

Mr. HANSON: I am not objecting to the item, but I want to know on what principle the government could contribute to a bridge wholly within the province of Quebec. If they adopted that principle I am sure they would be invited to contribute to many other similar undertakings. I am pleading at present with the Minister of Public Works for a contribution towards an international bridge which is of great importance to the country from the standpoint of international obligations. Only a modest sum of $17,500 is involved, and I hope to see provision for it in the Estimates, so that our friends in the state of Maine will not be able to regard us as pikers. This particular bridge, I understand, is wholly within the province of Quebec.

Mr. VIEN: Which one?

Mr. HANSON: This one.

Mr. VIEN: Do I understand that the hon. member is referring to the bridge between Vaudreuil and Isle Perrot? So far as I know, this is being built by subsidy from the provincial government and by federal subscription. Is the bridge which the hon. gentleman refers to a construction under the highways grant?

Mr. HANSON: No, this is a special vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend will allow me I will inform him. The federal government is assisting to build the bridge over its own canal.

Item agreed to.

St. Lawrence ship canal—surveys and investigations, $50,000.

Mr. HANSON: What is being done there?

Mr. GRAHAM: This work has been carried on continuously. The time will come when the data from these surveys will be essential. The work is done without any great blare of trumpets, but thoroughly, nevertheless.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay Railway—Port Nelson terminals, $40,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is for the care of the terminals already constructed.

Mr. KNOX: Will provision be made to meet the undertaking given to the House some time ago in regard to bringing the line into a proper state of repair? Will that be provided for?

Mr. HANSON: Before Christmas?

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister cannot make any provision. He can make suggestions to his colleagues who can submit recommendations to parliament. I had in mind asking for an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. SALES: Are we to understand that the minister has made up his mind to ask his colleagues for that appropriation? May we have his assurance to that effect?

Mr. GRAHAM: As a member of the government I do not like to make definite pledges, but I will do like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I will ask my hon. friend to "wait and see." I think he will not be disappointed.

Item agreed to.

Trent canal improvements, $255,000.

Mr. KNOX: What returns are we receiving from this canal?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not suggest that we get any straight returns. The only return is in the development of one of the most beautiful sections of Ontario. If my hon. friend ever wants to take a trip for his health I would recommend him to go along the Trent Valley canal which will take him through a very beautiful country and he will find hospitality all along the route.

Mr. HANSON: But it is of no practical utility.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say so. I think a tourist traffic can be developed there as well as a traffic for light draft freight boats We do get a return in the shape of rent for power development.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is that this is merely maintenance work.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, dams and that sort of thing.

Mr. KNOX: We have been voting very large sums of money annually for this canal, and I was wondering if there was any traffic to warrant the building of the locks and the continuance of this heavy expenditure.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are living in hopes that there will be greater traffic. But if we do not maintain the works great flood damage will result.

Mr. BOYS: Is the Atherley bridge appropriation in this item?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Is there any chance to get the minister to do what the deputation, representatives I think of all parties in this House, impressed upon him, namely, to take over this bridge, the counties concerned contributing $15,000 each. With the $25,000 contribution from the government there is only another $2,000 or $3,000 required to meet the total cost of the bridge, $58,000. Cannot the minister see his way clear to go this little extra distance? This bridge is over the canal system, and I think the request is reasonable. Many other bridges on the canal have been taken over. There is no politics in this proposal, and it is an absolutely fair one. As a last effort I would suggest that the minister make up the extra $2,000 or $3,000. Even if the counties were called upon to make a little more generous contribution I think they might be inclined to do so if the minister will take the bridge over.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have discussed it with my officials, and I am advised that the taking over of the bridges along the Trent canal is becoming such a problem that I hesitate to go as far as I am requested in regard to this bridge. However, I will discuss it again with the officials. The time will probably come when we will take over most of the bridges, but I should not like to hold out too much hope at the present time.

Mr. BOYS: I thought the minister might go the extra distance. I think it has been done in other cases.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will look into the matter.

Mr. BOYS: The bridge should be constructed without delay, and if the department is going to take in hand the construction under departmental specifications, it might as well take the bridge over. On the other hand, if the department is only going to make a contribution, that is a different proposition, and the difficulty is if it is to be further looked into the construction of the bridge will be held up for another year. If I thought for one minute the minister would seriously look into it further I would be glad to get the members from the other ridings together—they represent all parties in this House—and have them spend a few minutes with him. I feel the claim is so absolutely righteous and fair that it ought to be allowed, and I so addressed myself to the minister when we saw him. Indeed, I thought we had impressed him and that he would accede to our request.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. GRAHAM: I almost yielded.

Mr. BOYS: I think you did at the time, and it was the suavity the minister is so famous for which accounted for the absence of further discussion. If the minister will reconsider it I would ask him to let this item stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: You had better let it go through, otherwise there will be no appropriation.

Mr. BOYS: Then there is still hope?

Mr. GRAHAM: We will look further into the matter.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and Inspections, Railways: including salaries and expenses of experts employed temporarily, $55,000.

Mr. BAXTER: Are there any surveys for new branch lines?

Mr. GRAHAM: This is rather departmental. We have a lot of that special work and send men out to do it.

Mr. BAXTER: Is there any large survey in contemplation for branch lines anywhere?

Mr. GRAHAM: If there be any surveys they will be rather under a vote for that special purpose.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, June 8, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act, and to provide:—

1. That the power to make regulations for the constitution of medical boards, including appeal boards, with such powers as may be deemed expedient, be repealed, and provision be made to give the minister power, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to make regulations for appeals from decisions as to the right of ex-members of the Forces to treatment with pay and allowances, and for that purpose to designate the Review and Appeal Tribunals to be constituted under the proposed amendments to the Pension Act.

2. That the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the minister, appoint an ex-member of the Forces to be an Official Soldiers' Adviser in each unit or district of the department, at such salary or remuneration as may be decided in each case, with prescribed duties.

3. That the minister shall have power to appoint a person or persons to hear and receive evidence on oath in respect of any matter pertaining to the department or procedure of the department.

He said: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution has given his consent and commends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

WOMEN AND COUNCIL OF HEALTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government if two women have been appointed to the Dominion Council of Health to replace Mrs. Tood, of Orillia, and Miss H. Reid, of Montreal; and, if not, why?

Hon. Mr. BELAND: Did the hon. lady ask whether two women had been appointed?

Miss MACPHAIL: Two women.

Mr. BELAND: I understand that only one has been appointed.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. IRVINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of privilege. Yesterday afternoon, when we were discussing the situation of certain Hebridean immigrants, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) challenged the facts which I then presented. I have here a telegram from Mr. W. McD. Davidson, who is editor of the Calgary Albertan—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. On a question of privilege or any other question of a similar nature no writing or communication from the outside can be read to contradict statements made by members of the House in the course of a debate.

Mr. IRVINE: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to this communication without quoting it?

Mr. SPEAKER: What cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. On any day, except Friday of course—because to-day the Speaker leaves the chair without any motion being put—when the House goes into Committee of Supply the hon. member has his remedy.

ADULTERATION OF CANADIAN GRAIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) if it is correct that last summer he held a quiet inquiry into the operations of an organization, or alleged organization, engaged at American ports in the business of adulterating Canadian grain for export. If so, what were the results of the inquiry, and when may we expect a report thereon to be tabled?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I never heard of such an organization until to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No inquiries, then were held last summer by the minister or by his department as to such adulteration?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure what my hon. friend refers to. If he would be more specific I might be able to give him the information he desires.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps I can put my question directly. Were any inquiries made by the minister or his department last summer into the adulteration of Canadian grain at American ports?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, last year we had a complaint from the London Corn Exchange that Canadian grain reaching London was not up to standard. I met the members in their exchange hall, London, and the chairman made it clear that they had no complaints against Canadian grain reaching England from Canadian ports; their complaints were against Canadian grain reaching England through certain United States ports. We instructed the Board of Grain Commissioners —one of the inspectors went along with them —to make an actual survey of the conditions there affecting the receiving and the loading of grain going out to those ports. The chairman of the board and the chief grain inspector have gone over with the idea that they will reach there about the time the first ships arrive from Canada and from the United States. They will make inquiries and observations with a view to giving the government information regarding the condition of the grain that reaches the other side.

Mr. GARDINER: I understood the minister to say that they had asked the Board of Grain Commissioners to make inquiry in United States ports. What we desire to know is what was the result of that inquiry.

Mr. ROBB: Well, offhand, the information that was brought back to us confirmed our own view, namely, that we have no control in the United States over grain, once it is cleared from Buffalo. It is true the grain goes through the United States in bond, but that is for the protection of the people of the United States themselves. So it comes down to this—if grain is shipped to Liverpool direct from Canada and then from Liverpool to France and the complaint comes to us from France that it is not up to standard, we have no control over it because it had reached the Liverpool port—beyond our country.

Mr. GARDINER: I quite understand we have no control—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: All right, Mr. Speaker; I will put the question directly. Will the minister tell us just exactly what they found with regard to the adulteration of Canadian grain in American ports? That is the point we want to get at; we want to know just exactly—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; I did not stop the hon. member at first because I thought he was putting another question. But assuredly no debate can arise on a question put to a minister of the Crown before the Orders of the Day are called.

Mr. GARDINER: If I have transgressed the rules of the House, Sir, I desire to apologize. I was putting a question to the minister and I wanted to get the reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I know the hon. gentleman was proceeding in good faith, but I must see that the rules of the House are observed.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to income:

Amount not exceeding $73,000,000 to meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred (where amounts available from net operating earnings may be insufficient) by or on behalf of the Canadian National Railway Company, hereinafter called "the company", or any company specified in the First Schedule to the act incorporating the Canadian National Railway Company, being chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, or by the company in respect of any railways, properties or works entrusted to the company from time to time under the provisions of section 11 of the said chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, or by or on behalf of any company specified or referred to in chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1920; or any one or more of them, on any of the following accounts:—

(a) Operating deficits whenever incurred or ascertained.

(b) Acquisition of property, materials and supplies.

(c) Interest and sinking funds on notes, securities or obligations.

(d) Principal and interest of maturing or matured loans secured or unsecured.

(e) Construction and betterments.

(f) Co-ordination or consolidation of railway lines and facilities.

(g) Guarantees of securities.

The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time, in the discretion of the Governor in Council:—

(a) To meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred by the Company in respect of railways, properties and works entrusted to the company as aforesaid.

(b) By way of loans in cash, or by way of guarantee, or partly one way and partly the other, subject, however, as follows:—

If by way of loans, the amount or amounts advanced shall be repayable on demand, with interest at the rate fixed by the Governor in Council, from time to time, payable half-yearly, secured if and when directed by the Governor in Council by mortgage or mortgages upon such properties in such form and containing such terms and conditions, not inconsistent herewith, as the Governor in Council may approve.

If by way of guarantee, any such guarantee may be of the principal and interest of the notes and obligations or securities of one or more of the said companies specified by the Governor in Council, and may be signed by the Minister of Finance, on behalf of His Majesty, in such form and on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine to be appropriate and applicable thereto, $73,000,000.

Mr. SHAW: In connection with the matter under discussion last night, the purchase of the two-million-dollar hotel in Paris, I would like to ask the minister whether or not the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company have approved of the purchase as made.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Some two months ago the question of getting proper quarters in Paris, I am informed, was discussed at a meeting of the board, and approved. I do not think this special transaction has yet been brought before the board for approval.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the minister give the committee an idea of the service to be rendered to the Canadian National, or to the Canadian nation for that matter, by this purchase?

Mr. GRAHAM: The only answer I can give to my hon. friend is that the Canadian National has had no headquarters in Paris and it is the judgment of the Canadian National Company that such headquarters are greatly needed for the good of the Canadian National system.

Mr. IRVINE: Has the Canadian National similar headquarters in the other European headquarters—Rome, Berlin, Stockholm? If not, why purchase one in Paris and not in the others?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian Pacific Railway have headquarters in Paris. I do not know about the others. Paris is considered a very central point of European trade. It is, in a way, the hub of the wheel.

Mr. IRVINE: There is this great difference between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National: the Canadian Pacific has steamship lines across the ocean and I understand also has railroad systems on the Continent. I could understand that they would require headquarters of this character. But I cannot see how the Canadian National would require them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have never heard of the Canadian Pacific having railway lines on the Continent. They have their own steamship lines; and the Canadian National has connection with the Cunard and White Star lines.

Mr. IRVINE: Then, do I understand that this purchase in Paris is merely "Keeping up with the Joneses," so to speak? Is that the service that is expected by it?

Mr. CAMPBELL: How is this figure of $73,000,000 made up? I understand that about $58,000,000 is required to cover the deficit. Is this for the deficit on last year's operating?

Mr. GRAHAM: I regret I was unable to hear the last part of my hon. friend's remark, but I understand that he is asking how the $73,000,000 is made up. I will give the totals: For the Canadian Government Railways, $5,772,941; Canadian Northern, $36,906,826.64; Grand Trunk, $20,000,000; Grand Trunk Pacific, $10,320,232.36; operating deficit, estimate for next year—which we think is very liberal, but provision must be made—$10,000,000; interest and other sundry charges, $22,821,260.34; refunding and sinking funds, $8,184,699.33; capital betterment and equipment, $31,994,040.33;—making a total of $73,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Have the department taken into consideration the matter of adjusting the capitalization of these railways? The Canadian Government railways, of course, have no capitalization, but the others have. Has the idea of writing off or readjusting the value to bring it down to the actual value been considered at all?

Mr. GRAHAM: That suggestion has been made in several quarters. I think the former leader of the Progressive party urged it very strongly. It would not in any way reduce the liability of the country. If you owe so much money you would still owe it whether you write down the capitalization or not. But it is a matter for investigation. This has to be borne in mind, however,—as my hon. friend has pointed out, there is quite a proportion of the Canadian National system now known as the Government Railways, the capitalization of which is not considered in the indebtedness of the railway, so if the Canadian National system outside of the Government Railways is over-capitalized as some contend, you have to offset that in making your calculations. The amount of capital invested in the Government Railways is about $440,000,000, if I remember correctly.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have compiled some figures that are rather illuminating. The Canadian National—and when I say the Canadian National in this case I am including the Grand Trunk but excluding the Canadian Government railways—had net earnings last year of $193,171,000, and against that interest or fixed charges of $62,454,000; while the Canadian Pacific, with earnings nearly as high, $186,665,000, has fixed charges of only $13,348,000. Taking our roads separately I find that the Canadian Northern for 1922 had gross earnings of only $1.85 for every dollar of fixed charges; the Grand Trunk Pacific had $2.17 earnings for every dollar of fixed charges; the Canadian Government railways had $1.79 of earnings for every dollar of capitalization; and the Grand Trunk had $6.95 of earnings for every dollar of fixed charges. And the Canadian Pacific had a revenue of $13.98 for every dollar of fixed charges. I might say in connection with the Canadian Government Railways that I arrived at the fixed charges by computing 5½ per cent interest on the investment of $414,000,000. I should like to quote at this point from an editorial in the Manitoba Free Press regarding the capitalization of the railways. It says:

> The time has now come to consider seriously the proposition which has been frequently advanced during the past two or three years, to cut down the capitalization of the system to a point where it will represent the actual value of the road. . . It will not be denied that the capitalization of the Canadian National railway is far in excess of the physical value of the road. In this huge mountain of debt are embedded all the railway blunders of Canada since the first railway was built.

Further on it makes this reference to the effect on the operations of the road:

Of the operators of the Canadian National railway miracles should not be demanded. They cannot be expected to make surpluses sufficient to pay interest charges upon the present combined capitalization of the system. Faced with the certainty that every year there will be a huge deficit the directors of the system will inevitably get into the frame of mind which finds expression in the phrase: "What's the use?" If there's bound to be a deficit anyway, why worry whether it is ten or twenty million dollars.

But, given a just valuation of the road, the directors can be told that they must meet the fixed charges or make way for others who can. They will have a target to aim at and they will be expected to hit it. This will be much more exhilarating and inspiring than shooting arrows into a box.

We have plenty of precedent for such action. The whole capitalization of the Canadian Government railways—that is, what are called in the statement the Canadian Government railways, the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Prince Edward Island railway—has been wiped off and charged up to the public debt. I notice also that an item of $2,394,000 spent on the Canadian Pacific between Ottawa and Quebec was transferred to the public debt in 1898. I think the minister would do well to give this matter serious consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a large question, of course. I imagine that the government, if it thought wise, could perhaps deal with the securities held by itself, although that would not relieve the financial obligation of the country at all, but the securities in the hands of the public would have to remain and the liability be held sacred.

Mr. SHAW: After listening to the minister last night and to the discussion which then took place I have been trying to ascertain the situation in connection with this Paris transaction. I presume the minister will not deny that there must be somewhere in the statutes authority conferred upon the president or the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways to enter into a transaction of this character? I should like him, in the first place, to refer me to the section in the act which confers authority upon the president of the railway or upon the board of directors; secondly, I would like to know exactly what the position is in regard to that $2,000,000 transaction. Is it out of the control now of the National Railways and out of the control of Sir Henry Thornton? Has the money been paid over? What is the situation?

Mr. GRAHAM: I explained that fully last night, but I will explain it again. The building was required, so the president of the board considered. In his judgment the transaction would have to take place very quickly or the opportunity would be lost. The Canadian National Railways financed this gentleman in Paris to get possession of the building. The money was deposited in the Bank of Toronto, just as money in like cases has been deposited by other governments for other purposes; and that deposit in the Bank of Toronto allowed the man in Paris to finance the building. In other words, the Canadian National for the time being financed the transaction in order to get control of this building. And they took a mortgage, I am told, in the London office, to protect themselves.

Mr. SHAW: A mortgage from whom?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have mentioned that three or four times already. I do not think my hon. friend can pronounce the name when I say it—Aronovici.

Mr. SHAW: I confess that I find difficulty in understanding the situation. Why take a mortgage? Why should not the title have been taken in the name of the Canadian National Railways? Why take a mortgage in favour of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: I see what my hon. friend is at now. As I understand it, the board did not intend to retain possession of this building. However, I see what my hon. friend is after. He will pardon me, I hope, if I cannot grasp these legal niceties as quickly as legal gentlemen can. But if that had been done I know he would probably have risen immediately and said there had been a violation of the act of 1919 in that the Canadan National is not empowered to build or extend lines or to make any extended capital expenditure without an order in council. The property was not bought in the name of the Canadian National Railways, but in the name of this gentleman whose name I have tried to pronounce, who was financed, temporarily only, by the Governor in Council.

Mr. SHAW: Then I take it, from what the minister says, that the title to the property does stand in the name of Aronovici, and the mortgage is with the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is as I understand it.

Mr. SHAW: For the full amount of the sum advanced?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. SHAW: I would like to ask the minister if he can point to the section of the act which authorizes a transaction of this character?

Mr. GRAHAM: The act is negative and positive in different places.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is absolutely right. My hon. friends know that the act gives certain powers and declines to give other powers. Will my hon. friend tell me of any section in the act which enjoins the president from doing anything of this kind?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had not the advantage of being here last night, but I have read Hansard since and I must commence by saying that there was revealed last night the most extraordinary transaction, I think, ever disclosed in this parliament. I have difficulty in finding words to describe the conduct of the board. In so far as the minister is concerned his responsibility apparently arose after the transaction was complete, and his error consists in condoning the transaction and expressing approval of it in this House. A knowledge of—I had almost said of law—but a knowledge of the plain, simple facts connected with, or rather which constituted, the basis adopted by this parliament for the control of our National railways is necessary to comprehend the seriousness of what has been done. When this country found itself compelled to take over large railways—railways which could not stand up unless they were taken over—we had to find some way, some system, whereby we could at once get operation on business lines unaffected and uninterfered with by political considerations, and at the same time keep in the hands of the representatives of the people that fundamental control of general policy and of expenditure that necessarily the people of Canada would insist on where their own money is involved. Now the method adopted was this—and it is the very kernel, it is the very essence of the whole National Railway Act —that is so far as operation, ordinary operation, is concerned the board of directors elected by the Governor in Council should be in exactly the same position as any other board of directors elected by their shareholders, but there the control of the board of directors ended. In so far as policy and in so far as capital investment were concerned the board of directors could recommend and could do no more. The line was drawn between capital investment and operation. It is not a legal nicety; no one can escape the issue by merely hiding behind a lack of knowledge of law; it is as plain and naked a principle as anybody has ever seen. Let me repeat. As read in part by the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) last night the National Railway Act provides that neither the board of directors nor the manager has any power to expend or pledge the money of this country for capital investment, save with the antecedent authorization of the Governor in Council. And the Governor in Council had its powers only when the money for the express purpose had been voted by this House.

What has happened? The manager of the Canadian National Railways desired to buy with the money of our railways, which means the money of this country, an hotel in Paris —to be converted I presume into some immense structure there—in order that Canada may get "on the main street" of Paris, to use the graphic language of the Minister of Railways. I do not know at what stage the device was adopted, but I have a suspicion that the circuitous plan finally used was not the original intent of Sir Henry Thornton and the management. I fancy it was when the fundamental legal position came before their eyes in its full strength that this device was adopted; to call it a subterfuge is to honour it. They buy the property in the name of one Aronovici who is their own servant in Paris. The minister says they could not buy it as a capital expenditure and take the title to the company; to do so is against the law. The right to do so has been denied by this parliament. But the minister thinks it is all right for them to buy it with the company's money in the name of Aronovici, and the minister passes his blessing on the conduct of Sir Henry Thornton adopting a subterfuge of that sort. I do not admit for a moment they had a right to buy this property in the name of Aronovici or of anyone else, and I question very much if they had the legal opinion of any lawyer of repute that such a thing could without a previous vote of parliament be done. But with or without a lawyer's opinion the people of this country will not stand for subterfuge of that sort to get round the provisions of an act of parliament. The parties go to the Bank of Toronto, they take the money of the people of this country and lodge it in the bank; and then the bank sends that money over to Aronovici to buy an hotel in Paris. What have they for it? They have not anything save the Paris hotel. They buy the property and then they set to work to get some syndicate to take it over—I mean the board, I mean Sir Henry Thornton—and so far as we are informed we do not know up to this hour in parliament whether there is any syndicate bound to take it over or not. If there is we do not know who compose the syndicate.

Now, what is the position? We have $2,000,000 of capital expenditure invested in a Paris hotel, not only against the intent but against the plainest wording of an act of parliament, an act as plain as this or any other parliament ever enacted—money taken from the purposes to which it was applied by a statute of parliament, misappropriated from these purposes and invested in a Paris hotel: Or; without the knowledge of the government we have money loaned on the credit of a syndicate we do not know, money of the Canadian people loaned to a syndicate whose names we are denied. Which is the better of the two horns of the dilemma? This thing is a scandal, this is an outrage, and when this became known to the minister Sir Henry Thornton should have been called to book at once. When the minister comes to this House and says that the thing is all right because the property is bought in the name of Aronovici instead of in the name of the Canadian National Railways I do not think he does justice to himself. I venture to say, because I have a profound respect for the Minister of Railways, that when Sir Henry Thornton first disclosed to him what he had done his language to that gentleman was not like what it has been in this House. But he had not the courage to do to Sir Henry Thornton what he should have done, and to reprimand his conduct now before this House. What right, I want to know, has he to put his hand into the treasury of Canada and apply $2,000,000 to get the National Railways "on the main street" of Paris? No one can argue for a moment that it is in accordance with the intent of that act. It is diametrically opposed to the law, and everybody knows it, to invest capital money without the consent of the government and without previous appropriation by this House. But first, had we not better get on the main street of Canada before we get on the main street of Paris? Where are we to-day? We have the property. We have it in our own name in this shape: Mr. Aronovici has the title and has mortgaged the property to us. As everybody knows, this course is merely a substitute for having it in the name of the Canadian National Railways. We hold the property to-day, a property that is a capital investment in Paris; and all we have is a hope, annexed to which there is not a line, so far as this House has been informed, that some time some people over in New York will take it off our hands. Who the people in New York are we do not know, and I think the minister said last night he did not know himself. That is the position Canada is in. And the minister thinks it is all right.

Is Sir Henry Thornton to have power to repeat this performance? If he has power to go into the treasury to the extent of $2,000,000, he has power to go into the treasury to the extent of $20,000,000. He can pledge this country in Paris, Berlin, South America, or anywhere he pleases, for the whole of the moneys at the disposal of the Canadian National Railways in capital account, as long as he does it by the circuitous sinuosity he adopted in this case, and the minister will think it is all right. The minister should have denounced it and he should have dealt with Sir Henry Thornton on the spot. No board of directors, no matter who they are, has power to do any such thing, nor should be given such power, nor should be condoned for doing it. The country has not very much confidence in the board of directors, if they have any. The proportion of them who should have been appointed is small. The country has welcomed and has given a fair opportunity to Sir Henry Thornton. But the confidence of the country in Sir Henry Thornton will not last much longer after they know of this transaction; and furthermore the country's confidence in the minister will be seriously shattered when it finds he condoned a transaction of this kind on the floor of this House.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said. I think I said last night that if I had been doing it, probably I would not have done it that way. However, the question turns largely on the legality of the transaction, and I gave as an authority the adviser of the president, Mr. Ruel. We all have a high opinion of him. And his reply to me, when asked if this was a legal transaction, was that it certainly was. As to the advisability of it, I said before that I would not have done it that way. But I am convinced that the necessity of getting headquarters in Paris is very essential, in order that we may get our share of the traffic. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) says we are not on the main street in Canada. Well, there was quite a criticism because we insisted on staying on the main street in Toronto. But the way to get on the main street in Canada is not altogether through our own people or their products. One way is to get more people, and the other way is to get the traffic of other lines as much as possible. My own view is, disregarding for the moment the discussion of how this property was obtained, that it is absolutely essential that, in the centres where traffic is to be obtained, the Canadian National must have a prominent place. It must have a place in the centre of the business district where the people will recognize not only Canada but the Canadian National Railways. I can refer my hon. friend to a case, not on all fours with this, because the government did it. I refer to the letting of the contract of the new Halifax harbour works, which to my mind was all wrong—but that is only a matter of opinion. If the right hon. gentleman will look up the facts in that case he will find that there was no appropriation by parliament and no money. The government borrowed and placed in the bank $300,000, and sent agents to buy up certain properties, to establish the value. Well, it was the government that was doing it. They had no order in council authorizing it to be done, so I am informed. It was done, as to the details, just as this transaction was done. However, that is not important. That is the way they raised the money. I want to point out something my right hon. friend has said himself. I want parliament to thoroughly understand that I do not approve, or would not approve, of any transaction about which there was the least shade of dishonesty or departure from rectitude, I would not care with whom I might have to disagree. But in this case there is no evidence of such a thing. There was the desire on the part of the Canadian National to obtain a certain property which other people were endeavouring to obtain. Perhaps my right hon. friend knows who they are. Sir Henry Thornton might have been impetuous in his anxiety to get this property on which he had his eye for something else. But outside of that, there is nothing in the transaction at all to point to anything in the least wrong. The Canadian National Railways Act of 1919 gave the Canadian National board pretty wide powers. My right hon. friend rightly says that the Board of Directors of the Canadian National, including its president, was given the same powers as are given to the directorate and president of a private company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Over operation.

Mr. GRAHAM: He did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is what I said distinctly.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, I will leave it that way, but I think it goes further. I am going to put him on the same plane. It was argued last night—and I think rightly so—that the president of a private company ought to have the approval of the shareholders for a transaction of this kind. That was argued by two or three of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. The practice is, as everybody knows, that the president of a large private corporation or some person acting for and with him, exercises very extensive powers, and while he proceeds in a case of this kind, to purchase property, he would purchase it first, and ask for the approval afterwards, because if he did not do that, the price would be greatly enhanced when he came to purchase the building in the name of a big company, and I imagine the same thing would happen in this case. I admit frankly to my mind capital expenditure, if this were held to be a purchase by the Canadian National, could not be made except by the consent of the shareholders, the shareholders being the Governor in Council in this case. The practice—and I suppose Sir Henry Thornton followed the practice that he followed when he was with the great English company—is for the executive in such cases as this to make their arrangements first, depending on the approval of the shareholders. But I want to quote my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, with reference to a position he took a few days ago, not on this question, but on the powers of the board. I know my hon. friend will say that that applied to operation only. That may technically be correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Absolutely.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would rather say "technically."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read section 11.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am going to read the speech of my right hon. friend—it overrides section 11, maybe—to point out to the members of this committee that I would take it from his words uttered there and, I think, correctly that even in this transaction Sir Henry Thornton was not going very far afield from the principle laid down,—with the fact that the minister was not in a position to give details, being advised by the president that this would not be in the interest of the Canadian National at the present time. I think this was confirmed by my right hon. friend's words uttered the other day, although he will still insist that they meant only matters of operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What date was that?

Mr. GRAHAM: Page 2473 of revised Hansard, May 4. I think I was engaged in the discussion myself and my right hon. friend as well. In reply to something that I had remarked, my right hon. friend said.

Nothing could be a greater contrast than the position of the minister to that of his friends when they were on this side of the House. I wish to take exactly the same position that I took then: I do not believe in details of management being revealable every day or discussable in the House of Commons, and never did. At the same time I realize, as I realized when in power, that there are some matters in connection with which the details might be brought before the House at the proper time—when that might be done without interfering with the actual day to day management, and when all the doings of the company could be scrutinized by hon. members.

The question arises: Was this a part of the management of the Canadian National system open for discussion? I submit, taking the broad meaning of my right hon. friend's words, it would come within that category.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. member seriously intimating that this is ordinary everyday, day to day management of a railway?

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend went further.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what my hon. friend read.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am going to read more.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be just as good.

Mr. GRAHAM: If everything is done legally, nothing out of the ordinary, everything within the four corners of the act, then I think anything that would enhance the value of the line as regards earning power might be considered as part of the management of the railway. My right hon. friend continued:

While management is on and while they are hiring this man and firing that man—

I think he is using my words there.

—buying coal here and refusing to buy it there, we admitted and argued strenuously that it was impossible to have these things subjected to daily scrutiny, but we always said that the time came when the House had a right to inquire into everything in management, and we asked that committee to ascertain when that time came and how these matters could be brought before the House.

That has reference to the argument under the late government for a committee to which these things might be referred. The committee would have to be very small if all the information would not get out. I have great faith in human nature, but I never knew a committee of any proportions that did not have on it someone who had a friend to tell the information to quietly, and one might almost as well have the information on the records of this House. My right hon. friend said further:

But we went this far ourselves: That this was the place where railway expenditures should be made known, but made known at a time when they would not harass the management of the system. Consequently the committee was appointed.

I read these things just to point out to my right hon. friend that less than a week ago he took the ground that as regards details—he did not say details, but as regards the management of a railway, and information concerning it, there was a time to give out the information, and that was when this would not embarrass the management of the road. I do not think I can add anything further to what I have said. My right hon. friend asked me a question, and I think I can go this far with him. I shall be perfectly frank with him. If Sir Henry Thornton or the board could exercise this authority in large degree whenever he saw fit to do so, I think, without saying any more, I should be accurate in the remark that it is not likely to be exercised again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I feel a measure of satisfaction in that there is a note of repentance evident now in the speech of the minister. I must congratulate him on the selection he made of an extract from my own speech made on the 4th May.

Mr. GRAHAM: I beg pardon; I thought it was the 4th June.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The 4th May. It would be just the same as if it were the 4th May, 1919; he would not find an iota of difference. I could not, if I had it to do again, express my meaning a particle more clearly and in a way more applicable to this case than I expressed it in the extract read by the minister. Certainly! In matters of management! under section 11, the term "management" is defined in the clearest possible way and the board has authority as regards matters affected by section 11, matters of day to day management and operation. I used the term specifically—why, I even went further in what the minister quoted—I described what day to day management implied; I gave instances: the buying of coal, hiring of men, firing of men. All those things I did not think should come before parliament—things of that character as they were going on. But I added later on there would come time even for that.

How does that kind of thing affect a transaction of this sort? They are as remote from it as the stars are from this earth; they have nothing in common with it. Section 23 provides that the directors shall have nothing to do in the way of final authority save by direction of the Governor in Council and after a vote of this House with new investment or construction and manifestly one such thing, is to buy a hotel in Paris. You could not imagine a more outstanding instance. What I find fault with the minister for is that he approved in this House what was done and gave carte blanche to Sir Henry Thornton. No general manager is entitled to confidence who would be guilty of an action of this sort. I do not say yet that he is guilty of wrongful intent. The route he pursued showed that he was not acting in accordance with the law. Think of Sir Henry Thornton taking upon himself the duty of manager of this system and not knowing the simple truth that as regards capital investment he had to come to the Governor in Council for authority and that the money for the purpose must previously have been voted by parliament. Nothing will convince any hon. member who is sincere that Sir Henry Thornton does not know as well as any living man that he has to have that prior authority, and that the Governor in Council has to have the prior vote of Parliament. But he goes to work and he takes the money of the Canadian National railway, which money was put there by the Minister of Finance for purposes voted by this parliament last session, and he sends $2,000,000 of it through the agent of the Bank of Toronto to Paris to buy a hotel. This is what he has done, and this is what he is accountable for to this country. We are going to have to pay for this transaction. The prospect of escape looks very dark to me; but escape or no escape, the thing is wrong and should have been denounced by the government.

But how are we going to escape? By taking enough space in this building and paying enough rental to make it worth while for an unknown syndicate in New York to take it off our hands. We have an option. We have financed—the word is hardly appropriate—we have bought it and we hope to sell it. We hope to get rid of it to some people, we do not know to whom, but we have got to pay the $2,000,000. The money is already gone. Still we are told we have an option from this unknown syndicate giving us the right to use as much space as we like on fair terms. What a gallant option: You can depend upon it that the syndicate will take this Paris property off our hands only when we take up enough space and pay enough rental to make it a good investment for the syndicate. To do so is equivalent to keeping the property. There is where we have been landed by Sir Henry Thornton. I think the minister should go further and state to this House that the opinion of this House regarding the transaction shall be made known to Sir Henry Thornton by himself. And, further, if as we are told it is the opinion of any legal adviser of the Canadian National Railway board that this transaction was right I want to assert that no legal adviser can say it was right, no man with a conscience can say so; he may possibly say it was technically lawful, but it passes my ingenuity to see how he can say even that; but if he or anyone does say it was right—let the government come to this House this session with an amendment that will make such a thing unlawful for all time to come. Do not understand me to suggest that it is necessary, I do not believe it is necessary; the intent and letter of the law is to me as plain as the sun in the heavens. If any general manager who in the responsible position that Sir Henry Thornton is in has no more conception of his duty than to enter into a transaction like that, well, for my part the measure of confidence I have had in him is destroyed.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the minister tell us whether headquarters could have been secured in this Paris building without purchasing it, or whether any effort was made to this end?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a detail with which I am not conversant.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, if we are to go through this four-hour stunt again for the purpose of giving the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) a chance to express himself, I presume there is no harm in the rest of us who do not pretend to know very much about railway management expressing our opinion on the question. The leader of the Opposition pretends that he is desirous of being fair to Sir Henry Thornton, that he wants to maintain the confidence of the country in the integrity of the Canadian National Railways board. I would remind my hon. friend that the first reception he gave Sir Henry Thornton, before Sir Henry had had an opportunity to get his shoulder in the collar on the job at all, was an attack upon the newly-appointed president of the Canadian National Railways during a by-election in Lanark last fall. So pronounced was this attack that the hon. gentleman's own party press found it necessary to remind him that it was a very unwise proceeding on his part. My right hon. friend will remember what appeared in his own journals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was some misinformation given the Journal. I would not wonder if it was given by the minister himself. I was suspicious at the time that such was the fact. What I stated in Lanark was a perfectly correct statement of the truth, and apparently the electors of Lanark thought so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am recalling the incident merely to refresh the hon. gentleman's memory, to remind him that he was not fair to Sir Henry Thornton on that date and has never been fair to him since.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did I say?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is he saying now? What is the purpose of his attacks on Sir Henry Thornton? Is it not to destroy the confidence that Sir Henry Thornton himself has won during the time he has been with us? Is it not an attempt to create suspicion in the minds of the public with regard to the administration of this road? In a word, the hon. gentleman is fearful that Sir Henry Thornton is going to make a better job of the management of our National Railways than did his predecessor. That is what is the matter with my right hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER: That is true.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of couse it is true, everybody knows it. I have been watching my right hon. friend's antics in respect to our National Railway system, his solicitous regard for its success; but every time there is any evidence of the system doing better than formerly, well, he is pretty nearly prepared to take some kind of a cat-fit over it. Oh, we know the game of politics, some of us. We do not pretend to be able to play the game very low-down; no, but we can see the kind of people who are playing it.

Let us have a word or two about the propriety of this transaction. We are discussing this expenditure, it is said, after it has been made. Does not that occur constantly in parliamentary practice? Is not every Governor General's warrant expended before it is discussed in this House? Certainly that is so. Unless we can give a certain latitude to the president of this railway system so as to put him on a parity with the president of any other railway system dealing with similar transactions, then we are not going to make a success of our national railways. The president must have some discretionary power or he will not be able to make the system go. If we are going to knock or pull down every day what our president does in the exercise of his discretion, how long are we going to keep a good man in this job? No competent man is going to remain there if he has not the right to use his discretion. The head of every great organization is given a free hand. He must be able to exercise his judgment and close out a transaction when it is to the interest of his organization to do so, and afterwards discuss it with his board of directors or his shareholders. In this case the people of Canada are the shareholders. It has not been shown that the accommodation was not required in Paris. The whole discussion has revolved around the question as to whether Sir Henry Thornton had a right to do this thing or not. Well, if he has no right to use his discretion, if he must wait for all the red tape to be cut before he can close out a proposition of this kind, then we are not going to make a success of our National Railways, because that principle will be carried all down the line and you will not be able to keep competent and resourceful men in the employ of the National Railway system. I know the technical argument is on the side of my hon. friend, but I take the ground that everybody exercising authority in any position, from Sir Henry Thornton down to the most humble employee, unless he has freedom of action at critical times is going to miss many an opportunity of serving the interests of his organization. This principle applies to government just exactly the same. The man who has to go through all the rigmarole of the red tape, without being allowed to exercise any initiative of his own, would not, it seems to me, be living up to the requirements of a young country like this, which desires, especially at critical times, quick action on the part of its servants.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister inform the House whether parliament was in session at the time this transaction was under consideration?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not discussing whether parliament was in session when the transaction was put through. The Minister of Railways is more familiar with these details than I am.

Mr. GRAHAM: Parliament was in session.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: After getting what we believe to be the best available man on this or any other continent for the management of our National Railway system, are we going to shackle him so that he cannot exercise any initiative, judgment or discretion in matters of this kind? If that is so, we may as well all throw up our hands, because you cannot run our National Railways in competition with the other big railway system under such an administration.

Then the question naturally arises, how much latitude are you going to give the president of your railway system? You will have to depend on his judgment. Why did we search the four corners of the earth for Sir Henry Thornton if it was not that we could secure a man whose judgment, we could be confident, would be exercised in the best interests of our railway system in just such cases as the one under discussion. I am not entering into the merits or the demerits of this case, I do not know the situation in Paris, and I do not know the requirements of our railway in that respect. Therefore I cannot discuss the merits. I am discussing the wisdom and propriety of giving the head of our National Railway system discretionary power, and I say that unless you give him such power you might as well despair of trying to operate the system successfully.

I have had some experience in handling departments—in a small way, of course, compared with a matter of this kind; and I say that the man who cannot be given discretionary power and who cannot be relied upon as having good judgment should not be left on the job. It is a mighty small piece of business to take the technical attitude that my hon. friend takes, to advertise it all over the country, to try to destroy the confidence of the country in the National Railway system itself and in Sir Henry Thornton. And all this is done under the pretence that it is for the good of the National Railways! No, Mr. Chairman, the first thought of my hon. friend is to make political capital. Perhaps the Minister of Railways is not without some fault in this matter because of the attitude of the Liberals on a former occasion toward the National Railways. You will remember, Mr. Chairman—you were in the House too—that in 1921 and prior to that, when the question of bringing down information not dissimilar to this was before the House, the Liberals were not sparing of the government of that day, headed by my right hon. friend, in regard to the failure to bring down certain information connected with the National Railways, and in their criticism of Mr. Hanna. But they had this justification, that was a railway board, that was a government, whose passing was long overdue. The Opposition of that day were justified in making the exposures they did in that connection, as subsequent events demonstrated. It is perfectly natural for my hon. friends opposite to retaliate now; I am not objecting to that. I was not here at the time, but I can understand the desire to take advantage of a technical situation like this. I do not ask for quarter on behalf of my colleague at all; let them go to it. But do not imagine that we do not understand the situation. We do understand it, and we will have to see to it that the country understands it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to square accounts, that is all. Now, we are all desirous of making a success of the Canadian National Railways, are we not? I think we are; I think my right hon. friend, when he forgets politics, if he ever does, is desirous that it should be a success. Why, he is at least the godfather of it himself, if nothing more. And I am sure that most of our Progressive friends are in principle desirous that the National Railways should succeed. Long before the national system was inaugurated they went on record as being friendly to and believing in national railways, and I take it for granted, without discussing it with them at all, that that is their present attitude. I have no doubt that they are ready to forgive much, to overlook much if necessary, in order to give the National Railways a fair trial. Are we not all committed to that idea of giving the system a fair trial? Now, here we have a stranger within our borders. It is true that in Great Britain the railways were operated as a national enterprise, but he has had long experience in connection with the private operation of railways. He has only recently got on the job here—last December—and naturally he will be desirous of using the same discretionary powers that he exercised in the administration of other lines. He recognizes that he has a big competitor; he has to measure up to a high standard, and it is the most natural thing in the world that he should endeavour to make good. All I can say is that if this discretionary power is not to be exercised we cannot keep in our employ the kind of men that we believe Sir Henry Thornton to be; they will not stay with us. As long as I am convinced that he is rightly using this discretionary power and that he is justified in what he does in that connection I am going to stand behind him, because I want to see the national system made the success that I believe it can be made. The development of the next ten years in Canada will be wrapped up with the progress of the Canadian National lines; are we going to jeopardize the success of that development over a matter of this kind? The transaction is not yet completed; it will be time enough to denounce the government or to denounce Sir Henry Thornton when we know how this thing ultimately turns out. We believe it will turn out exactly as the Minister of Railways has predicted. If it does, then what difference does it make whether the transaction is done this or that or the other way? The other day we were discussing some question that did not involve anything more serious than whether a member should come in at one door or at the other door; as long as he got in, what was the difference? Time will demonstrate whether or not the exercise of this discretionary power has been overdone; what position are we in to say whether or not it has now been exercised wrongly? If the attitude of the right hon. leader of the Opposition is to be adopted; if, as he says, the head of the railways should have no discretionary authority—all right; good-bye National Railways.

Mr. BOYS: Nobody says it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whatever may be said for the advocate that Sir Henry Thornton has on the legality of this transaction, the minister is certainly to be congratulated on the advocate that he has in parliament. The illuminating address of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) had at least this merit: It was not so long as the last one; also it was equally pregnant. His argument is that unless we allow the manager of the National Railways to dig into the treasury without the knowledge of the government or the authority of parliament, you cannot get a manager worth while. I venture to suggest to the Prime Minister, if he is here, that he keep a close watch on the Minister of Agriculture; a minister who pronounces these sentiments and apparently believes them is a very dangerous man to have in charge of funds. There is a measure of discretion, of course, given to all the directors, but it is given in the law, not by ministers on the floor of the House. Apologies do not create an authority. The measure of discretion is fixed there, and it is a very wide discretion; it is a discretion against which we heard bitter complaints in this House two and three years ago. The manager of the National Railways has no more right to flout the law than a clerk in a bank or anybody else—or the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Where has he flouted the law?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where has he flouted the law? It is only about two minutes since the minister admitted it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The discretion, let me impress on the minister, is fixed in the law, fixed so clearly that no one in the world could honestly evade it or transgress it. It is argued that a manager of a railroad, with a statute which compels him to get the authority of this government for capital investments, can nevertheless go four thousand miles to Paris and plant $2,000,000 of the money of the people of this country—and that is an exercise of discretion! That is only a technical offence! Similarly, a customs officer who believed there should be a good building in his town for customs purposes would be quite right to take the money in his possession and go out and buy a building; he would only be technically wrong; whether or not he should be censured would depend on how the matter turned out later; and it would be quite proper and worthy of the commendation of the minister in the House provided only that the building had been bought in the name of somebody else. Such is the argument that the government has presented; I do not know how it could be plainer to hon. members. Now, it is the duty of the government to deal with the man who is guilty.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It does seem ridiculous to hear hon. gentlemen say "Carried." I want to say one word to the hon. Minister of Agriculture. If he thinks that by idle threats he is going to prevent proper and legitimate criticism of the board he is wrong. He is not, by what he says, nor is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) by mysterious statements as to a hidden propaganda going to gag anybody over here. We have always taken the same position—always. No party is more interested in getting a proper result in connection with the administration of these railways than we are. We believe that that success can only be got if we are able to hold in the management the confidence of parliament and of the people of this country, and we believe that the ordinary citizen of this country, and the ordinary member of parliament, does not like a law breaker. We believe that the ordinary man in the street believes that the sections of the acts of this parliament are not made to be played with or evaded even by the Minister of Agriculture or with his benediction. That is what we think; and we think that if there is one way of ruining this whole undertaking it is by irregularities and illegalities, it is by removing public moneys from the public treasury, it is by making investments which cannot for some time at least—and, I think, for a long time,—be revenue producing while at the same time we have our own people and our own lands without proper railroad facilities. I would have thought that the minister (Mr. Motherwell), if he were actuated by anything except his political bias, would have been just a little anxious for some branch lines that are required to-day in Saskatchewan and that could have been built with that $2,000,000. But apparently he is quite content that the moneys should be misappropriated and misapplied. The hon. gentleman has already managed to make one split in his party. I admit he is an authority on the smoke screen. His devious actions in connection with the oleomargarine question, the substitution of bills and the like show what a past master he is. He managed to make a split in his party there, and he is going to make another one here in a minute or two. Why, he gets up, and against the law and against the statutes and against all principles of company administration, he takes a stand diametrically opposed to the stand taken by his colleague the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). He shakes his head. Did he or did he not commend this action of Sir Henry Thornton? He knows he did. And did not the Minister of Railways just a short few minutes ago apologize for it and suggest that he did not think this transaction or anything of this kind would ever be repeated? Why, the Minister of Railways knows it is all wrong. He has told Sir Henry Thornton that it cannot be done again. He has already dealt with it to the extent of telling Sir Henry Thornton that his action was wrong and that it cannot be repeated. But, of course, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture takes the opposite view,—it is quite all right that statutes can be broken; it is quite all right that current funds of the country can be switched. Well, I do not know. I hope that the cabinet split will not go any further and that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will be able to get a little bit of reason across to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture after the House adjourns. I take it that the law is of consequence notwithstanding anything the Minister of Agriculture has said.

Now my hon. friend the Minister of Railways says there is no suggestion of dishonesty. How can we make any suggestion of dishonesty? Why ought we to make any suggestion of dishonesty? If we were actuated by the motives ascribed to us by the hon. Minister of Agriculture we would say the whole of this is a crooked deal, that is what we would do.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend's leader said it was a scandal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So it is a scandal to break the law. Is it not a scandal for people in high places to pay no regard to statutory obligations of this country? What does my hon. friend say to that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I say my hon. friend is making a scandal of it, that is all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is nothing that can be made out of this by anybody except what is in it now. But I say that if we were here for the purpose of injuring Sir Henry Thornton we would to-day be saying that there was dishonesty, but we are not. It is an easy thing to say there is dishonesty where you cannot get facts, where you cannot get explanations. where you cannot get figures except one blanket amount, and where you cannot get even the names of the people you are dealing with. The government invited all these charges. We are not making them. We want a success made of the system. We are not making these charges and I ask my friend the Minister of Railways in all seriousness why he would expect us to make a charge of dishonesty? Why did he say that we are not suggesting dishonesty?

Mr. GRAHAM: The reason I did so—my hon. friend did not make the remark, but one hon. gentleman behind him shouted "Rake-off!"—which would mean dishonesty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not hear it, I did not know anything about that. But I just want to point out this to my hon. friend, that if anyone is injured in connection with the whole of this matter—and I am going to assume the greatest amount of good faith on the part of Sir Henry Thornton until I am shown the contrary—if anybody is injured, if there are charges of rake-offs or that sort of thing made, if the people believe there are secret commissions, that there is something wrong behind all this, who is to blame? My hon. friend and nobody else. He will not give us the information. It well may be that in the absence of information some people will draw certain conclusions. I say, Mr. Chairman, we are unable to get anything that would lead us to any logical conclusion in this matter. We cannot find out, for example, if the syndicate goes through—and my hon. friend hopes it will—how much we are to pay in rent, how big will be the rent guarantee, for what term or anything else. When you do not know any of these things you cannot say one way or the other whether there is indeed a rake-off or not. But I want to point out to my hon. friend that if that impression goes abroad there is no one as much responsible for it as Sir Henry Thornton himself and the government for not giving us the facts.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways said that other people were trying to get the property, people we would know about. Now I want to say at once that I do not know anything about anybody else wanting this property or anything about the property. I have not the faintest idea of anybody wanting to get it. I did not know that there was any wild rush at present for real estate in Paris. I did not know that values were advancing by leaps and bounds. I did not know of any wild rush or of any desire on the part of anybody to acquire this property, so, if my friend has any idea of that kind he has it; I have not. I do not suppose, though my hon. friend really knows very much about it. I do not suppose he knows how old the hotel is or whether it is a first-, second- or third-class place. I have been told that once upon a time it was a good place, forty years ago, but that now it is a third-rate place. I do not know anything about it, not in the slightest. I do not know of anyone who was trying to get possession of this property in opposition to and in competition with the Canadian National Railways.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we might just as well be frank about the whole thing. Just see where this matter now stands. We have now got the frank admission of the Minister of Railways—it was a reluctant admission, and it took a long time to get it—that the Canadian National Railways, as a matter of law, could not buy this property. They were not content to stand in a legal position, not content to take the chance of going to the minister—I do not know whether they thought that would be dangerous, that he would turn the proposition down absolutely—they were not content to take the chance of going to the Governor in Council, but devised a scheme whereby the law could be evaded. We have got that admitted. There is no question about it. The Minister of Railways frankly and properly admitted that the Canadian National Railways could not buy that property as a matter of law—there is the admission. And in order to get round the statute, in order to get round the legal position, the name of a clerk is used and the obligation of that clerk is taken. But the money is paid just the same. There is no difference in the real, essential elements of the transaction, not the slightest. The law is broken, public funds are applied in a way in which they cannot be legally applied. And the only man to justify the transaction is the Minister of Agriculture, and I do not think he will, long. My hon. friend who knows about the matter instead of justifying the transaction has reprobated it, and has told the president that this thing cannot happen again. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the matter should rest here. The government now know that by a process of manipulation, which has been condemned by the responsible minister, two million dollars of the money of this country has been applied in an illegal investment. What do they propose to do about it? Are they going to content themselves with just simply warning the president that the law of the country must be observed, or are they going to take steps to see that that money is recovered at the earliest possible date? Are they going to take steps to see that the property is unloaded and the money got back? What do they intend to do? Are they going to do what I have suggested? Or are they going to be parties to rendering it absolutely possible that the whole of this scheme shall be carried out to an easy fulfilment? Are they going to see that such leases are given and such covenants made that anybody will be very glad to take the property off their hands and accept those leases and covenants? They can get rid of the property easily enough if they are willing to pay enough rent, if they are willing to make heavy enough commitments. But what position is to be taken, and what guarantee will the government give that this thing shall not happen again? What is the policy of the government having regard to the rights of the board of directors to denude itself of money on one hand and of property on the other? I repeat, what is their policy? What are they going to do to see that in the future this sort of thing is made entirely impossible? What check will they enforce and what control are they going to take?

Mr. IRVINE: I want to take a very few minutes of the committee's time to enter what you might call a protest against the passing of this item, on two grounds. First, I do not believe that we have had sufficient assurance that the service which may be expected from this investment is commensurate with the investment itself; and second, I am quite convinced that there has been a serious irregularity in the purchase. I want to say, first of all, Mr. Chairman, that I do not entertain even the hint of a suspicion as regards the Minister of Railways. I am taking the precaution of saying this because of the outburst of the Minister of Agriculture who—in a long speech, as unconvincing as usual, may I say?—declared that those who are opposing this item are doing it for political reasons. The minister himself was the first, in my opinion, to introduce that phase into the discussion. He made a political attack in which, of course, I am not interested at all. I have no means of entering into the mind of the leader of the Opposition

(Mr. Meighen) so as to know what prompts him in making his protest, but I imagine if he had any idea to hinder the operations of the National Railways under the present government the best thing he could have done would have been to sit quiet and allow this thing to go unchallenged. Because, if such transactions are allowed as a general principle, I think the downfall of the National Railways is absolutely sure. So that I should say the leader of the Opposition was doing the very best service he could both to this administration and to the National Railways by pointing out the principle that has been violated in this particular regard.

Now, first I say that it has not been shown that sufficient service will be given for the investment made. Two million dollars is quite a lot of money to be invested in a hotel in Paris. It has been advanced by the Minister of Railways that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have a head office there, and since that is the case he thinks it imperative that the Canadian National Railways should also have a head office in Paris.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend asked the question. Did he expect me to say, "No," when I ought to say, "Yes?"

Mr. IRVINE: I certainly would not have expected anything of the kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not refer to the Canadian Pacific Company, it was my hon. friend who did so.

Mr. IRVINE: I am quite satisfied with my hon. friend's answer so far as that is concerned. I am trying to get at the justification for this investment and I asked the minister a question. In giving his answer—which is the only answer that has been given to that phase of the question—he stated that the reason for the purchase of this hotel, which is to be used partly as headquarters for the Canadian National Railways, is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have headquarters in Paris. But the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are in an entirely different position from the Canadian National Railways. They have steamship lines crossing all oceans, and therefore it is necessary for that company to have such headquarters in Paris. Let me put the point this way. I cannot conceive of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it is managed, getting headquarters in some capital in Europe on the same grounds that the Canadian National Railways are seeking to get headquarters in the capital of Continental Europe. I imagine the former company would require much more solid business reasons for purchasing headquarters at a cost of $2,000,000 than have been advanced by the minister in this instance. So I want to register my humble protest. I do not think the investment is a good one. My ideas of an investment, of course, are not worth very much, nevertheless I would expect the minister to give us some more substantial reasons than he has yet given, demonstrating that the investment is worth while from the point of view of service in connection with the Canadian National Railways.

The irregularity of the transaction has been very ably and convincingly set forth. While I am not a lawyer, yet I certainly was able to follow the reasoning, and I am able to say that it has not been answered, nor has any attempt been made to answer it. The best answer that was given, in my opinion, was presented by the Minister of Railways, when he said that the time element entered into it, that it was justified on that ground and that somebody might have "got wise" that the Canadian National was thinking of making this purchase and transfer, and that, therefore, it was necessary to do it speedily. Suppose we look at it from that point of view, I submit that it were better for the Canadian National to even miss what might be a good deal than to break a principle, the breaking of which might spoil it ultimately. It has not been shown that the enterprise itself is a good one. It has not been shown that the investment is sound, nor that the service would come to the national railways by this purchase. Therefore, with all these things in doubt, I think it were better that the legal principle involved should not have been violated. The right hon. leader of the Opposition has made a suggestion—at least I took it as a suggestion—that, since the hon. Minister of Railways has admitted so far that there was some slight error or irregularity, and has stated, that he does not think the like will ever occur again, the opinion of parliament on this matter should be conveyed quietly to Sir Henry. I think that is one suggestion of value.

I should like to ask if it is absolutely impossible for us to get away from this thing in any other way? Must it go on? Must this money be voted? Must the deal be made? Can it not be arrested? If it cannot, will the minister admit that a mistake has been made? There is an honour in admitting a mistake. I would rather vote $2,000,000 to the care of a minister who has the courage to admit that a mistake has been made, and that he will safeguard the country against the possibility of a recurrence of the mistake, than simply to blindly vote the $2,000,000, without the assurance that this thing will not recur. I suggest that the minister would frankly admit to us that this was a mistake, a violation of principle, with which he does not concur, and that, the deal having been made, we have to vote the money and it must be paid, but that he will guarantee that, in so far as he is concerned, it will never recur.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a moment ago mentioned the fact that we were sitting now in the same position as shareholders at an annual meeting, considering the action of its executive. I think it was rather a happy thought, and perhaps one of the most intelligent observations made by him during the course of his remarks. We are in the position of shareholders. I was quite at a loss as a matter of fact, to understand why, however, it was so wholly wrong for shareholders to even question the action of the executive, as my hon. friend upbraided my right hon. leader and others for doing.

In reply to what the minister said a few moments ago when he repeatedly cited the Canadian Pacific and other large corporations in defence of the action of Sir Henry Thornton, namely that the directorate and president have wide latitude in matters of this kind, I said last night, and I repeat now, that the Canadian Pacific shareholders, if they were called upon to put up an additional $73,000,000, and if there were no dividends at all being paid, would very carefully scrutinize an expenditure of $2,000,000 in France on the part of its executive, and I think would condemn the executive very harshly for making such an expenditure without previously consulting with them. There is no parallel between a corporation operating in a successful manner and paying a dividend, and an institution that is calling upon its shareholders to supplement its losses with votes of new capital. That is on the question of principle or of practice, and altogether aside from the legality of the question. My hon. friend for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine), and other hon. members have asked, can we retire from this proposition? The minister told us the money has been paid and the property purchased, therefore there is no retiring from it. The only recourse we have, or hope to have in the future, is from this mythical syndicate in New York, or supposed to be in New York, whose personnel the minister does not know, unless he has learned it since last week—and I think he should have ascertained the personnel of this syndicate, whose financial standing he does not know. That is the only possible hope we have. But then we are told that there is another part of this whole matter that has not been discussed at all. This merely buys the old building which is an hotel. We are told that it is going to be transformed into an office establishment in the centre of Paris, and it is going to be rigged up with a picture theatre, or something of that character, for the purpose of showing views of Canadian life, which is perhaps all right. But that is going to cost the minister some money. I have heard—and again the minister will tell us nothing—that it is going to cost over $600,000, in addition to the $2,000,000, to equip the building. Who is ging to put up that money? Is the national railway going to do it? Is Sir Henry Thornton going to do it? Or is this government going to do it? Who is going to put up the additional sum of money? The worst feature of this whole business is this, that we enter into a discussion with this mythical syndicate as to a rental space in that building, and that our hands are absolutely tied, without any hope at all of having that syndicate complete its deal, unless we gave them a fixed rental for a long period of years—a rental that will ensure them absolutely a profitable return on their investment. The minister said last night that there were no documents and no definite agreement,—nothing in writing. He said that no discussion of the amount of rental had been entered into yet, and not even a verbal understanding. Yet $2,000,000 has been paid over and is in the hands of the purchasers of this property. It is paid out absolutely, and it is our money. Having done all that, we go to the alleged syndicate to fix a bargain for the rental we are to pay for, Heaven knows how long in the future. If I know New York financiers—that is the type that are able to finance—I rather imagine they will be sharp enough to say to this government or to Sir Henry Thornton, "You pay us a rental that will give us about 10 per cent for a great many years—20 years, say—before we will enter into this contract to return you the money." They have not got the money now. That is clear, because Sir Henry Thornton had to put it up. Sir Henry Thornton dipped into the treasury of the country illegally and put it up. Of that there is no question. I move an amendment, seconded by Mr. Boys, as follows:

That item 139 stand until the president of the National Railways submit to the House full information regarding the purchase of certain property in Paris:

(a) The names and financial standing of alleged syndicate.

(b) The rate of the rental to be paid.

(c) The commission, if any, and to whom paid.
(d) The reasons why the property was bought indirectly and not directly by the railway company and without any written agreement of any kind whatsoever.

That is information that, ordinary common sense demands, should be submitted to this committee before it grants $73,000,000 for the president of the National Railways to play with for the next year. What does this item say? Has the committee taken the trouble to note it particularly? This item is virtually granting a blank cheque for $73,000,000, subject to certain conditions. It outlines the manner in which the money is to be paid, and then on the second page this will be noted:

The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time, in the discretion of the Governor in Council.

And I want the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to listen to this. He said that this should be spent in the discretion of Sir Henry Thornton; that Sir Henry Thornton should have the discretion to spend this how he liked, and that he was to be brought to book only at some future date and only if he made a mess of the matter. But the law says and the appropriation says this year, as they said last year, that this money is granted, the Governor in Council saddled with the authority or the discretionary power of seeing that it is properly applied. In this case—and I would cite this to support my resolution—the Minister of Railways told us last night that Sir Henry Thornton did not report this transaction to him until after it was done. The Governor in Council had thus no opportunity to exercise discretionary power; the hands of the Governor in Council were tied. I will venture to say that if one could look into the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at this moment, one would see reflected there the rather heated discussions which occurred in the council chamber within the last few weeks when this transaction became known to the cabinet. Not one of them outside of the burlesque by the Minister of Agriculture, not even the Minister of Railways himself, has attempted to support this transaction this afternoon. The Minister of Railways told us last night that he would have done this in a different way. He told us to-day that he had to apologize to the committee for the transaction, and I do not blame him. I feel that if the minister would be perfectly frank with the committee, he would tell us that he was surprised and mortified when he learned in the first place that this transaction was made; that he had called Sir Henry Thornton into his office and severely reprimanded him for taking this course. I have no doubt that he did so. Why not publicly discipline this gentleman by frankly admitting this before parliament? That will probably do him a great deal of good. Let me put this to the government, and particularly to the Prime Minister. If this transaction had been allowed to pass without comment last night or through this parliament, I venture to say that next year Sir Henry Thornton would not have stopped at $2,000,000 in Paris. The one thing that will prevent this gentleman from repeating this practice is just what has gone on last night and to-day. If a private corporation were concerned, what would prevent him would be the criticism of the shareholders. I want to say to the Minister of Agriculture who lectured us here pretty severely, who charged us with trying to discredit the National Railways, that he cannot discredit the National Railways more effectively than by giving a free hand for transactions of this sort. I want to say to him further that he stands to-day before this country a minister of the Crown knowing this transaction, condoning the move and the steps taken by Sir Henry Thornton; he stands approving the paying over of $2,000,000 of the money of the Canadian people for a mythical and undisclosed syndicate. And he cannot escape that. He has approved it and condoned on the floor of this House. He has approved it and has condemned those who dare to question it. The Minister of Agriculture cannot get away with that sort of thing. I know his colleagues at least feel and feel keenly—one has only to look at their faces—that this is a transaction that is not to the credit of any government. I have watched each minister yesterday evening and this afternoon, and not one of them is comfortable under this matter. It is to their credit that they are not comfortable. The one thing, however, that is not to their credit is the extent to which they condone this transaction.

An attempt was made yesterday by one of them, the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) to take responsibility and defend this action. To that extent I think he is culpable together with 5 p.m. the president of the National Railways. This is not a trivial matter; this is not a matter of a small purchase; this is a heavy investment. And we in Canada are striving under a load of debt. One of the difficulties we are faced with is the cost of transportation. What is the problem in the prairie provinces to-day? To get the products of the soil out to the seaboard. What is the chief part of that problem? The cost of moving that stuff. What makes the cost of moving goods to the seaboard? The cost of operating the railways. Here we have as an exhibition of what we are to hope for in the future in the way of economy in transportation, the president of the National Railways, lightly, flippantly and in a most frivolous manner, flinging $2,000,000 into the heart of Paris, as if that were nothing. What hope is there in this country for economy in operation with an extravagant person like that at the head of the National Railways? Just as soon as possible the president of the National Railways must be brought to understand that that form of extravagance will not be tolerated in this country.

I move this resolution for this purpose, that the members of this House, as shareholders of this great undertaking, may receive the information to which we are entitled. The minister has not even been entrusted with the names of the syndicate. Is that appalling fact clear to the House? Think of it! He said at the commencement of the argument last night—and it was an argument—that it was not in the interest of the National Railways to disclose the syndicate. Later on, in reply to a question by myself, he admitted that he did not know the syndicate, and that is the real reason why he cannot disclose it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: He certainly cannot disclose that which he does not himself know. Does the minister know the names of the members of this syndicate? Will the minister answer me that question before I proceed further?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is making an argument and giving a reason why I did not give the names. That is the thing to which I object.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend be good enough to answer my question: Does he know the names of the syndicate?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in the witness box. My hon. friend has taken the opportunity to ask me a question. I will answer it in my own way and not be dictated to at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not desirous of dictating.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have the floor and I am trying to answer the question.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend cannot accuse me of being discourteous to him.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not doing so. My hon. friend had better let me answer the question. He gave as a reason why I did not give him the names of the syndicate that I did not know. It is true I do not know; but if I did know, I would be in the same position.

On the advice of the president of the board and with the concurrence, I think, of the solicitor, it is not in the interests of the Canadian National Railways that the details of this unfinished transaction should be made public at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. Then we have the minister coming before parliament advising that he, or the government, or the National Railways, has parted with $2,000,000 in the interests of a syndicate whose names not even the minister knows in confidence. This is an appalling situation.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be if it were true.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend told us last night that he did not know the names of the syndicate, and he says he does not know them now. I say it is an appalling situation.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not what my hon. friend said was an appalling situation.

Mr. STEVENS: I say that is an appalling situation.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is his opinion.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, it is my opinion. The minister does not know the names of this syndicate, that, I think, is the most extraordinary feature about this whole transaction. And yet we are really asked to approve the turning over of $2,000,000 to undisclosed, unnamed and unknown Americans in New York. That is what it amounts to. That is the situation which we cannot excuse, it is a situation that the government cannot defend, and my resolution asks that the names of these gentlemen and their financial standing and ability to carry through this deal be disclosed to the House, so we may know something about who they are, the terms of the rental and the rates to be paid for the space, the lease for which will have to be signed before this House meets again—probably tying us up for ten or twenty years, for certainly we ought to have a long-term lease on the main street of Paris—and furthermore, that the reasons why this property to the value of $2,000,000 was bought through an official of the railway company in Paris and not directly by the railway company itself, and why the title should be in the name of this official. This information and these reasons we are entitled to have and they should be given to the committee. My resolution asks that the committee order that the item stand until this information is brought before us.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I am of opinion that this motion is out of order, for the reasons set forth in Beauchesne at paragraph 169:

A proposed resolution may be allowed to stand over with general consent until another occasion, but if it has been regularly proposed from the Chair and discussed, no motion for its postponement is regular because there is no period to which it can be postponed.

There is a reference to Bourinot, page 426, which is a repetition of the words contained here, and also to May, page 479, which also stipulates to the same effect, namely:

No amendment can be moved which is not relevant to the grant under consideration, nor can a motion for postponing a proposed resolution be entertained.

Therefore I have to declare this motion to be out of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before you declare it out of order, Mr. Chairman, I shall have something to say about it. I have the greatest admiration for the Deputy Clerk and for his book, but if it says what the Chair states is the law I shall be surprised. The Chair has ruled that a motion to pass an estimate cannot be postponed. Why, such motions have been postponed dozens of times.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): By consent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not by consent. You cannot enforce the closure, Rule 17B, without postponing the item under discussion at the time. Under this rule, in order that the closure may apply on the second day, on the first day there must be a motion in committee to postpone consideration of the item. We have moved it over and over again; if I remember rightly before there was any closure rule. The rule that there cannot be a postponement of an item under consideration of the committee is, I think, with all deference to the Chair, preposterous. Certainly there can be a postponement, and we can surely give reasons for the postponement in the body of the motion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): The rule I have cited applies only to Committee of Supply according to Bourinot.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Bourinot was written before this rule 17B was passed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): There is another point, that the committee has no authority to impose a condition upon the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not imposing a condition upon the House, but upon the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): The words of the resolution are, "until the president of the National Railways submit to the House."

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be. That is not a condition imposed on the House, but a condition that must be fulfilled before this estimate is proceeded with. We cannot restrict the prerogative of parliament, everyone admits that, but to suggest that in Committee of Supply we cannot move postponement of an item does not admit of argument. Let me read section 17B:

Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any Minister of the Crown, who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed;—

Mr. CANNON: "Shall not be postponed."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, but he has to give notice before. The procedure is this: In Committee of Supply a motion is made that the consideration of the items one by one be deferred, then at the close another motion is made after a day's notice that those deferred items be at the next sitting of the committee the first business and that their consideration be not any further postponed. I think I should know the rule pretty well.

Mr. CANNON: I understand my hon. friend had something to do with the drafting of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did, I had everything to do with it, and I have never had reason to believe it was faulty. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite who criticized it do not repeal it; they are careful to preserve it. I say that under the closure rule a motion to postpone must be made.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): After notice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Read the rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The notice is in this form: A motion to postpone is made; there is nothing prior to that; but after that is done, then notice is given, effective the next day, that these items, consideration of which has been postponed, be the first business of the committee and be not further postponed. That is the notice. But the notice is given after. There is a preliminary motion to postpone consideration. There is no question about it at all, and I am sure if the Deputy Clerk has a moment to look it up he will immediately concur with me. The first thing done is a motion to postpone, subsequently there is a notice that at the next sitting of the committee there will be a motion made that all the postponed items be the first business of the committee and be not further postponed. Then, this notice being given, next day the motion accordingly is made that these items be not further postponed. Consequently a motion to postpone is in order. I think, as well, reasons can be given, but I do not speak so definitely on that point. I do not know why reasons should not be given, so long as those reasons are applicable only to the committee. But as to the first there is no doubt whatever.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Does the right hon. gentleman desire to appeal from the ruling?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to appeal. I ask that the Chair reconsider the decision, because there cannot be any question about it. It is a very serious ruling.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I am occupying the Chair only temporarily, but Rule 169 is very plain to me. It says:

> A proposed resolution may be allowed to stand over with general consent until another occasion, but if it has been regularly proposed from the Chair and discussed, no motion for its postponement is regular because there is no period to which it can be postponed.

That is based on Bourinot, and it has been the invariable procedure in Committee of Supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was long before Rule 17B was passed; consequently it must merge into 17B so far as it prevents a motion being postponed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Closure cannot apply here, because no notice has been given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not asking that it apply. But after that rule is passed there must be eligibility for a motion to postpone. A ruling that it cannot be done means that 17B never can be applied again.

Mr. CANNON: The closure rule, 17B, is in the nature of an exception; it does not do away with the general rules of the House as they stood before. Now, let us read 17B. It does not state that there must have been a previous motion to postpone; it simply says:

> Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

A minister of the Crown gives notice that at the next sitting he will move that a debate be not further adjourned, but there is no previous motion to postpone. The rule does not mention any such motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that case there must have been a previous motion to adjourn, because you could not move that it be not further adjourned unless it has been adjourned once. Similarly, when it is in committee there must have been a previous motion to postpone, otherwise you could not move that it be not further postponed.

Mr. CANNON: For instance, last night this item was discussed and then it was allowed to stand. But if it had not been allowed to stand, the committee would have reported progress; we would sit again to-day and the committee would make the same report. Closure would mean that on a subsequent day the minister would rise and say that when this item would be discussed there would be no further postponement. That is what closure means.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, that is what closure means. Closure proceeds on the assumption that when a minister says "stand," that is a motion for postponement. When a minister brings in an item he is supposed to move a resolution for the passing of that item. He does not in so many words do so, but as a matter of fact in all application of the closure, in so many words he does so. The closure rule cannot be operated unless on the assumption that there has been a previous motion to postpone, whether in committee or in the House. I am sure the hon. member will come to that conclusion.

Mr. CANNON: Even assuming the right hon. gentleman is right, which I do not admit, I say again that 17B is in the nature of an exception. Secondly it is a rule which applies only in favour of a minister, and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is not a minister. Therefore the old rule, the general rule of the House which has been quoted by the Chairman, should prevail.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It assumes that the motion in the closure case is made by a minister, of course. But any motion that a minister can make, anyone can make. I have not had time—

Mr. GRAHAM: The rule does not say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rule does not touch the matter at all.

Mr. CANNON: The right hon. gentleman does not seriously contend that a private member could impose closure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I know that he could not. A private member could move postponement but he could not give notice afterwards that the postponed item be considered the next day, because the rule says that a minister only may do so. What I am trying to draw attention to is this: That rule 17B necessarily and inescapably implies that a motion to adjourn is in order—to adjourn consideration of anything. Why should it not be in order? What is wrong about a motion to adjourn consideration? I have not looked into what has been referred to as rule 169, but whatever it may be it is undoubtedly modified by rule 17B, which came later. As a matter of fact, there is no rule 169 of this House anyway. I certainly think it would not be applicable to prevent a motion to postpone consideration of anything in committee.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is very clear that unless something to the contrary can be found in 17B, which is the rule relating to closure, a motion to postpone a resolution in Supply is not in order. The rule read by the Chairman of the committee and the references to Beauchesne and Bourinot clearly show that that principle should prevail. Now, is there anything in this rule about closure which could be accepted as changing or modifying that old-established principle? The rule provides that a minister of the Crown can give notice of certain things, can move that the debate shall not be further adjourned or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed. My right hon. friend does not say that he can find any rule that expressly reverses the old principle to which I have referred, but he suggests that the inference is that rule 17B does reverse it. I submit there is no such irresistible inference; if it had been intended to change the old rule, parliament would have said so. There is nothing to compel a minister of the Crown to give notice. The rule does not say that the consideration of the resolution shall be postponed; the motion is that it shall not further be postponed. It is therefore not open to my right hon. friend to draw the inference that he suggests, and clearly the long-standing rule which is cited by all the recognized authorities is in line with the ruling of the Chairman of the committee.

Mr. GOOD: I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that the rules ought to conform to common sense, and if it is irregular to move that an item stand until we get certain information, I think we are in a queer position. How do we know whether or not this item should pass? We want certain information. We may not be disposed to cut the item down or to refuse it; it may be simply a matter of waiting until we get certain information. It seems to me to be entirely in accord with common sense that this motion should be allowed; if the rules forbid it, then I think the rules ought to be changed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I simply call attention to the fact that 169 mentioned here is not a rule; it is a quotation from Bourinot.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. It is not the first time that errors have been found there. These boks are compiled mainly from British authorities and certainly would not prevail over our own specific rule, which admits that we may move to postpone. Let me read 169:

> A proposed resolution may be allowed to stand over with general consent until another occasion,—

I ask that the committee remember that.

> —but if it has been regularly proposed from the Chair and discussed no motion for its postponement is regular because there is no period to which it can be postponed.

Well, if there is not, what happens when it is allowed to stand by general consent? The reason is just as applicable against the standing by general consent as standing on a motion. In a word it is absurd as applied to our practice. A motion that is postponed in committee can be taken up at any time. We do it repeatedly when it stands at the instance of the Chair, so there is no reason whatever against this motion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend overlooks the statement of May who says:

> No amendment can be moved which is not relevant to the grant under consideration, nor can a motion for postponing a proposed resolution be entertained.

That is May, the authority on parliamentary procedure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not applicable here in the face of a definite rule.

definite rule. My right hon. friend says there is a definite rule, but there is not. He says that a rule has been made in regard to closure, which he drew up himself, which provides that a minister of the Crown by giving notice can stop debate and force a vote. But there is nothing in that rule which says that a motion can be postponed, and my right hon. friend knows that. He says there is an inference to be drawn, but you cannot override the well-settled parliamentary rule which every parliamentary authority including Bourinot and May has laid down, and which has been followed for ages, and by inference say that that shall be disregarded or overruled.

Mr. CANNON: I do not think the normal rules of parliament can be altered by a freak or exceptional rule. Rule 17B is an exception, as I said before, and the general rules must prevail. My right hon. friend says there is a rule of parliament in support of his contention. Where is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Rule 17B.

Mr. CANNON: No. Rule 17B provides for closure. Where is the rule of parliament that gives a private member the right to postpone a resolution in committee of supply?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the constant practice as well.

Mr. CANNON: Just the contrary.

Mr. STEVENS: Has your ruling been given, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Yes. I base myself on the invariable practice as found in Bourinot and May.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no intention of appealing against your ruling, Mr. Chairman, not that I wish to agree with it because I think it is perhaps not quite in accord with the rule. However I have a great regard for you, Sir, and I have no desire to appeal against your ruling. I would ask the minister, in view of the ruling of the Chair, if he will accept the spirit of the resolution and let this item stand until the president of the railway has had the opportunity of furnishing him with the full information asked for in this resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: The object of this resolution may as well be understood. The object is to have parliament express a vote of want of confidence in Sir Henry Thornton. That is the object of it, no matter how it is brought in or how it is worked out, and the result can only be, if Sir Henry Thornton is a red-blooded man as I believe him to be, injury which we cannot perhaps estimate to-day to the Canadian National system. I am not going to say that that is the object, because I have no right to say so. I am saying that that may be the result, and every man in this House who votes to haul Sir Henry Thornton, the head of the Canadian National Railways, before us to give certain information which through me he has said to this House will be detrimental to the Canadian National System, votes want of confidence in the head of that system. Sir Henry Thornton has made a success of the system up to date and is making a success of it to-day, and if everything hon. gentlemen said were true the members of this House must understand that they are taking the responsibility of leaving the Canadian National railway probably without a head in the midst of a busy traffic. What the object is I do not know, but the result may be that, and the men who pretend to be in favour of making a success of the national railways cannot well vote, even if what my hon. friend has said is true, want of confidence in a man who up to date is making a success of that great undertaking, which is the greatest experiment in government ownership and operation that we have had in the Dominion of Canada.

I knew something would come up to give an opportunity to divide this House. The Liberal party, even those who do not believe in public ownership, are obliged to give it a fair trial. Not that every one of us believes in it. I know many do not, but we are pledged to give it a fair trial. Hon. gentlemen over there are pledged to government ownership, and now we have a distinct cleavage between the men who are trying to destroy public ownership and the men who are in favour of it. My hon. friend can disguise it anyway he likes. I have given the opinion of Sir Henry Thornton as head of the railway, an opinion that will be shared by every business man, that an uncompleted transaction of a great corporation should not be divulged to the shareholders even though the shareholders be the Parliament of Canada. My hon. friend took the same ground in his term of office, that to divulge an uncompleted transaction might be detrimental to the transaction. He asks for the name of a syndicate in New York. To give that would be to give him half the information that Sir Henry Thornton thinks would be detrimental to the system. What would happen when the representative of this syndicate in New York landed in Paris later on to make arrangements as to the rentals? The Old Country system of rentals is different from ours; they have leases that run for years and are very valuable, and whoever takes over this property has to take over these leases and make some settlement with the leaseholders. And we are asked to announce to every person in the world that we are taking over this property and let the leaseholders be prepared to make the biggest bargain they can possibly make. If it was a private concern such information would not be asked for. They would take the word of those responsible. Acting as the go-between between the government and the president of the Canadian National Railways I have been advised by Sir Henry Thornton that in the interests of the Canadian National system it would not be well, for obvious reasons, to give the particulars of this arrangement about to be completed. That being the case I want to warn hon. gentlemen about the specious argument of getting Sir Henry Thornton here. That argument, no matter how specious it is, if backed up could only have the result of injuring the system and making public ownership possibly a failure in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has made a very gallant effort to divert the attention of the committee and of the country from this transaction, which he does not attempt now to defend, to the great question of dividing the country and the House upon government ownership of the railways. He does not need to reach very far in any direction from where he is sitting to touch those who attack the government ownership of railways. As far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for many others here, we are anxious to see this government ownership of railways succeed. But we are not prepared to give unrestrained liberty to any individual who apparently is inclined at least, if not to abuse that liberty, to treat it in a very trivial manner. My hon. friend asks what is going to happen if the name of this syndicate is disclosed. When they go to Paris it will be known that some syndicate representing the Canadian National Railways is going to do some business there. Why, Mr. Chairman, it was placed before this country in the press two weeks ago that Sir Henry Thornton had bought a hotel in the heart of Paris, and that he was going to transform the whole building into offices for the Canadian National Railways and to house the High Commissioner and other departments. All these details were disclosed two weeks ago, and everybody in Paris that is interested, everybody in the world that is interested, knows all that the minister says this resolution of mine is going to disclose to the world. Such an argument is not worthy of the long parliamentary experience and intelligence of the minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend will not fool anybody with that.

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly, but the minister will never fool anybody with the argument he made about interfering with the business of closing out certain leases.

Mr. McBRIDE: Might I ask the hon. member a question? When he was trying to get a lease of Point Grey sand heads out at Vancouver, why did he not come out and tell the people who were behind the transaction and give the public the name of the company?

Mr. STEVENS: That is pretty nearly as good a herring drawn across the trail as the minister attempted to draw. Sand was being taken from what was alleged to be government property at the time, and the Public Works department at Ottawa imposed a restriction upon it. However, that has nothing to do with this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: No it has not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is a good illustration.

Mr. STEVENS: Inasmuch as the committee seem to desire the facts I can give them and very quickly. The facts of the case are these: There are certain sand heads off what is known as Point Grey just at the mouth or entrance to Vancouver harbour. These sand heads were claimed by the Public Works department of Canada for the right of the Dominion, they were also claimed by the provincial authorities. Certain persons dealing in sand, lime and gravel were taking the sand off these sand heads. Other persons made application for what is known as a license or a lease, which is a common form granted by the Public Works department to take sand from these banks. This application was entertained by the Public Works department and granted. The provincial authorities disputed it. The matter was carried to the Privy Council, and it was decided that the title to the property rested in the province, and the parties who got the license from the Dominion authorities were out of pocket whatever investment they had made. That is all there is to it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to digress into matters of this kind.

An hon. MEMBER: Another smoke screen.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, another smoke screen. I want to say to the minister that the information we are asking for is reasonable information. It is not unreasonable, it is not information calculated to interfere with the National Railways. We are not asking that Sir Henry Thornton be brought to the bar of the House, or before any committee. We are simply asking, in view of the admitted ignorance of the minister of the facts, that this item should stand until these facts, which are facts I think the committee are entitled to, are disclosed.

Mr. FORKE: I think a good many members in this House, more especially members in this quarter of the chamber, have listened to this long and protracted debate that lasted all yesterday afternoon and evening, and apparently it is going to last all this afternoon—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Only last night, not yesterday afternoon.

Mr. FORKE: Very well, it does not make very much difference. I do not like to act in the role of a critic but really it surprises me to hear the nature of speech after speech made here. It is simply a case of member after member getting up and repeating what previous members have said. I have been really anxious for information in order to know just how to form an opinion on this matter, and I was quite prepared to listen, I think without prejudice, to either side in order to get at the foundation of this whole affair. At the very commencement it did strike me that it was rather a serious thing. We are very anxious for the success of the National Railways. I think, perhaps, all of us are, with probably a few exceptions. We have a man at the head of affairs and apparently accusations are being cast at him from the House here of having been injudicious, of having overstepped the bounds of prudence—in fact doing what was really illegal. The accusations may or may not be true. Perhaps I have not a legal mind, a judicial mind. I am not just prepared yet to express an opinion as to exactly how far the president over-stepped what it was his right to do. Nevertheless, I cannot help but think, Mr. Chairman, that the desire to manufacture a certain amount of political ammunition is entering into this debate, and there has not been an earnest desire, perhaps, to give that information to the House that it is in the power of some members to give. I have not a bit of hesitation in saying that I believe the right hon. the leader of the Opposition probably knows just as much about all these matters as do some hon. gentlemen on the front government benches. I may be wrong or I may be right but I have the suspicion that certain hon. members know a great deal more than they are telling, that they are not taking the House into their confidence, that they think they have got the government in a very embarrassing position, and they are going to make the very most of it from a political point of view. That is the inference I have drawn and I am drawing it without being influenced by any prejudice whatever.

An hon. MEMBER: It is good drawing.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, for you.

Mr. FORKE: I beg your pardon. If you would keep in your own seat it would be better.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He is in a bad corner there.

Mr. FORKE: I cannot say that I am entirely satisfied. There is perhaps a little more mystery about the whole of the circumstances than I would like to see in this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why not try to get at the bottom of it then?

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me. Perhaps you will be able to enlighten us when you get up; we have not heard from you yet. I take this point of view—I may be right or I may be wrong—there is some mystery here that I would rather not see in connection with this matter. But the consequences are so great, the issues are so tremendous, in regard to the management of these railways, that I am willing to let the matter go at the present time. But if subsequently when information comes to this House it can be shown that the government has acted in any underhand or improper way, that the proper handling of the country's money has been prejudiced in any shape or form, then no man in this House will be more ready to condemn them than I am. But taking all the circumstances into consideration at the present time I do not believe it is in the public interest that this matter should be debated at any further length. I believe that incalculable harm has already been done by this debate.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Purposely.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know as to that, but I am stating my candid opinion without any desire to favour either the government or the opposition. However, I am not going to occupy any more time because I believe that many of the speeches on this subject could be curtailed with great advantage to every one concerned, the country included.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this is, perhaps, an opportune moment to say a word as to the relations between the government and the Canadian National Railways, and particularly as to the relationship between Sir Henry Thornton, as the head of the railways, and myself in the position which I occupy at the moment. When the government asked Sir Henry Thornton to take control of the railroad we gave him—and I in the name of the government gave him—a distinct pledge that he would be entrusted with the management, that he would have a board of directors with whom he would be associated, and that the board and he as president would be given a free hand, and that there would be no interference on the part of the government with the action which they were taking. We told him, however, that we would hold him responsible for the manner in which he conducted the affairs of the system, but that while we held him responsible we would give him a free hand and would not interfere with him.

That was one possible attitude. The other attitude would have been that as a government we would wish to know everything that he was doing, and the responsibility then would be ours. Sir Henry Thornton in his first interview with me made it perfectly clear that unless he and the board of directors were to have a free hand in the management of that road he would not for one minute consider accepting the position of president. From the moment Sir Henry Thornton took over the control of the railroads to this hour there has been no attempt on the part of the government, in any particular, to influence his judgment or his course of action in any matter. Whether there will be reason in the future to alter the attitude that we have assumed towards him and the board of directors will depend very largely upon how different transactions of the road turn out in the course of affairs.

So far as this particular transaction is concerned, the position, as I understand it, that Sir Henry Thornton takes, is that to-day there is known throughout Europe one great railway system in Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway; that the people of Europe know nothing whatever about the Canadian National Railways; that if Canada is to get her share of business from Europe for her system of railways she must be as much on the map in the heart of that continent as the Canadian Pacific Railway is and have as wide a connection not only with the railroads on this continent but with the railroads in Europe so as to get the benefit of any business in the way of traffic originating there. Sir Henry Thornton, in his judgment felt it desirable for the Canadian National Railways to obtain a site in the heart of Paris which would be conspicuous, and where the affairs of the railway might be so put before the European public that they would soon become conscious that there was a competitor to the other great transcontinental railway system in Canada, namely the Canadian National Railways.

Sir Henry Thornton, like every other railway president, in endeavouring to carry out a move of the kind, naturally surrounded his actions with a certain degree of secrecy. He took this action without any knowledge on the part of the government. Nothing was said to the government with respect to what he or the board of directors proposed to do. Why? Because we told him we expected him and not the government to manage the railway. Does the House wish us to change that policy? Does the House ask us to go to Sir Henry Thornton and say "From now on you shall not enter into any business transaction without placing it before the government and having us approve of it?" If that is the attitude hon. members want us to take, we shall have to change our whole policy with respect to giving a free hand to the Canadian National and giving the board of directors a chance to manage it as in their judgment they think best.

Sir Henry Thornton felt it necessary there should be a building in a conspicuous part of Paris which would be known as the Canadian National headquarters. I have no doubt that, in his endeavour to get the best building, he was anxious to make it in every way the centre or home of Canadian business, and possibly he has had in his mind the moving of our Canadian offices into that building, and perhaps getting other business interests in Canada to rent premises as well. It is a business matter. As a man of wide business experience, he probably knows what is best to do in a transaction of this kind. If Sir Henry has seen fit to conduct that transaction as all business houses transact their business, with a certain amount of secrecy, I think we all owe it to him to wait and see how his experiment works out before we pronounce judgment upon it; and so far as the government is concerned I wish to say that we stand here prepared to support Sir Henry Thornton in the transaction which he has made and the step which he has taken. We will judge him as the head of the railway by the manner in which that particular transaction, as well as all other transactions while he is president of the road, turn out. But while he is president of the Canadian National, and we are representing the people of Canada in this House we propose to give Sir Henry Thornton in this and every other transaction precisely the same degree of latitude and freedom as the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific would give to Mr. Beatty.

Mr. SHAW: I shall not adopt the pose of sitting in judgment upon any individual or any part in this House. I listened with a great deal of care to the discussion last night, and I read the debate in this morning's Hansard, with a view of ascertaining the facts in connection with this particular matter. At the outset I may say that I yield to no man in the House in my desire to see the Canadian National Railway experiment prove a splendid success. I say further that I have every confidence in Sir Henry Thornton as an experienced railway man. While I know little about it, I am prepared to give him the heartiest possible support that it is possible for one in my humble position to give. I think the government, in assuming the attitude which was assumed towards Sir Henry, acted properly. They gave him a free hand to administer and manage that particular railway. I think it was desirable to do that, because, of course, it was a matter of tremendous moment to the country, a matter fraught with a great deal of significance to the people of Canada. But I suggest to the Prime Minister that the free hand was given to Sir Henry subject to the laws of this country. Even the Prime Minister of the country is not in a position to override the law. That is a matter for parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where has the law been overridden?

Mr. SHAW: I think perhaps the fact that the Prime Minister was not in attendance in the House earlier, and did not hear the frank admission of the Minister of Railways, would justify him in asking the question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The question I asked has not been answered.

Mr. SHAW: I will deal with the Minister of Agriculture in a moment.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I should like to hear from the hon. member wherein the transaction was unlawful.

Mr. SHAW: Perhaps the hon. senior member for Halifax has not been in the House either. I am not going to say anything further except that I commend the Minister of Railways for coming before the House and saying that in his judgment it was improperly done.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish I had had a legal training. I could then express things much better than I do express them. Our legal friends, when they get up, kind of put you "in wrong" with their language and not your own. I distinctly said if I had been doing it that I would probably not have done it in the way it has been done. I also said that the solicitor for Sir Henry Thornton informed Sir Henry that the transaction was perfectly legal, and that I stood by his opinion rather than by the opinion of others.

Mr. SHAW: It is not my purpose in view of the discussion that has taken place to argue as to the legality or illegality of the transaction. Suffice it to say that I simply expressed my opinion, after a fairly close examination of the statutes in this regard, that the transaction so far as it has gone is illegal. I do not say it is improper. I impute no motive of impropriety to Sir Henry Thornton at all.

Mr. CANNON: Under what clause of the act does the hon. member undertake to say that the transaction is unlawful or illegal?

Mr. SHAW: If the hon. member will look at the Canadian National Railway Act, and refer to sections 11 and 23, he will find that the powers given to the officers, the president and the board of directors, are there enunciated. That is the limit of their power. I have sought in my own mind some justification for the expenditure in Paris, and so far as I can observe, about the only justification so far urged has been that apparently the Canadian Pacific Railway has a very ambitious office in that city. They, too, are on the front street of Paris. But I am not so sure that it should always be the ambition of the Canadian National Railways to live in the atmosphere of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is where they are today.

Mr. SHAW: Then I think it is unfortunate. If the minister suggests that the Canadian National is living in the atmosphere of the Canadian Pacific I am sure a lot of people will view that statement with a good deal of regret.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are compelled to admit the fact, not in any theoretical sense that the Canadian Pacific is here. We are confronted with a healthy rivalry and we have to do the things a business firm would do, in order to get our share of the business, if we are going to make a success of the road.

Mr. SHAW: My suggestion was that, so far as I was able to observe, the substantial reason given was to put it in this sense, that the Canadian National must live in the atmosphere of the Canadian Pacific. In this particular transaction, it appears to me that the moneys belonging to the people of Canada, have been taken for the purpose of financing a New York syndicate, in order that they may subsequently at some time purchase this particular property. That I think is an undesirable thing for the Canadian National Railway board to do. I do not think it is a commendable thing that the money should be taken from the coffers of this country in the method indicated and used for the purpose of allowing a New York syndicate to subsequently acquire control of this particular property.

The Minister of Agriculture interrupted just a few moments ago and I want to compare his words in this matter with those of the Minister of Railways. The Minister of Railways says frankly that if he were carrying out this particular transaction, he would not carry it out in this particular manner at all. On the other hand, the Minister of Agriculture, in the light of that fact and with the knowledge imparted to him by the Minister of Railways, seeks to give this transaction his special benediction. I want to dissociate myself from the attitude assumed by the Minister of Agriculture. That I do not believe to be a commendable code of morals whatsoever, and all I can say is that he made a most illogical apology for an illegal act.

The question is: What can be done under the circumstances? The transaction may be and, perhaps, is perfectly legitimate, and I have little doubt that upon investigation, it will be found that the transaction is in the best interest of this country and of the Canadian National Railways. Why is it not possible for us to get these facts? A few material facts are required, and it seems to me that we have a right to ask for the facts, in view of the expenditure, particularly outside of this country, of something over $2,000,000. I do not see how anybody could be prejudiced, despite the statement of the Minister of Railways with regard to the leaseholders. The facts are already known; they have been within the knowledge of members for some time, and they must be within the knowledge of the leaseholders of that particular hotel building in Paris. Therefore, I would suggest that, perhaps, the minister would be willing to allow the matter to stand in order that he can get the facts that are required and place them before the House. I am sure neither he nor Sir Henry Thornton will ever regret having stated to the House all the facts.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difficulty with that is that my hon. friend must not forget, as some hon. members seem to be trying to forget, that Sir Henry Thornton is the head of the Canadian National Railways, and responsible for its success to the people of Canada. He knows the situation, and he has told me that to divulge the details of this transaction at the present time would be detrimental to the interest of the Canadian National Railways. If I approached him again, he would tell me the same thing. Under those circumstances, if we have any faith in Sir Henry Thornton, we ought to do with him exactly what would be done by the shareholders with the head of any great company—accept his word and act accordingly.

Progress reported.

The House resumed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister obtain, before we meet at eight o'clock, information as to where the transaction is? How far has it proceeded? Have we, or has the Canadian National Railways, any contractual relationship yet with this syndicate in New York? How far has the syndicate proceeded? When we know that, we shall know a little better just how to estimate the advice which Sir Henry Thornton gave.

While I am on my feet, I am going to enter a protest against the too oft repeated assumption of the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) that he is sitting in final arbitrament over the moral quality of all other people in this House; nor do I thank him for the suggestion that I have certain information of my own about this transaction which I am concealing from parliament. I should like to know his authority for this suggestion. I tell him I know nothing about this, not one word, not a tittle of information, that he does not know if he has sat through the discussion in this House. I ask him, before he attributes to me concealment of facts known to myself for partisan purposes, that he have some authority for his words. He goes on and he states with an air of sanctimonious complacency, that we of the opposition have no right to proceed with our criticism because we are seeking party advantage. I do not pretend not to be seeking party advantage provided that it is legitimate and right, and I do not expect the leader of the Progressive party to pretend to parliament not to be seeking party advantage provided it is legitimate and right. Am I to be deterred from criticism of a transaction which I believe to be wrong and which I believe I can demonstrate to be wrong, because if we succeed in bringing wrongdoing home to the government, it would be detrimental to an opposing party? Are we continually to be taunted, when we make criticism or censure that we are acting merely in a partisan spirit and not doing our duty as members of parliament? What does he conceive to be our duty?

Mr. FORKE: If my right hon. friend would ask only one question at a time, I would have some chance to remember it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I proceeded on the assumption that the hon. member's mind can carry more than he thinks it can. I will put my questions one by one in future.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would like to remind the right hon. gentleman that the Mace is on the Table. We are not in committee.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to income, $73,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had made some references to comments on the motives of members of this House in attacking the transaction in question. I want to refer for a moment to the appeal made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The Prime Minister seems to think that the question whether we know where we are at in connection with this deal or do not is really a question between political management of the Canadian National Railway and business management. Could a more preposterous suggestion be made? He says, "We told Sir Henry Thornton to go ahead and we would give him a free hand; we would not interfere with him at all." Sir Henry Thornton did as he was told; consequently it cannot be wrong. If the government told Sir Henry Thornton to go ahead beyond what Sir Henry Thornton and his board's powers were under the act, then the government is accountable to this House and should receive just what Sir Henry Thornton is receiving. Sir Henry Thornton is properly told to go ahead with the management and operation of the railway, and I would that the government were carrying out to the full the whole spirit and intent of the injunction they gave him so far as management and operation go. But the government has no right to tell Sir Henry Thornton to go ahead and invest moneys of this country in capital ventures unless parliament has previously voted the money to do it. The Minister of Railways definitely told us they did not tell him to go and do that; that they gave him no authority at all; that he never consulted them in any way. Consequently he is clearly subject to reprimand, and no one would be doing his duty in parliament if he did not make that perfectly manifest.

Now, the question is this: Should we vote the $73,000,000 that is before us, which is the main railway vote to the National Railway board, until we know what position the country is in? I come in this connection to say a few words as to the minister's argument. The minister's argument is: Here is an attack on the railway; if we submit to this motion and do not pass this $73,000,000 item without the information demanded, it simply means that the opponents of the National Railway must definitely sever themselves from its supporters and the issue be joined throughout the country. I do not know what the minister means. Is the House not entitled to know where we are at with respect to two million dollars of our money that has gone from our possession? We do not know about it; the minister himself does not know, and all we are asking is that he find out.

We may be in one of two or three positions. We may be the definite owners of the property, of course, in the name of the National Railways or rather of Aronovici. We may be the final owners of it, and so far as the legal position is concerned, my thought is that that is where we are. So far as I have been able to find from the minister, we have no undertaking of anybody to take it off our hands, we are tied there by the act of Sir Henry Thornton in defiance of the law of Canada. Well, if we are in that position the hour has struck now for a reprimand. We may be in another position: we may be in a position of temporary ownership, legal ownership, with the undertaking of others to take it off our hands at what we paid for it, subject to some understanding on our part that we will help them out by a leasehold interest. If we are in the latter position, which the minister intimates we are in, surely we are entitled to know the facts about it. Surely we are entitled to know the value of the covenant we have, if we have such a covenant, with this syndicate in New York, and if we vote this money, when are we going to know? When we vote this $73,000,000 we place it or authorize the minister to place it month by month where Sir Henry Thornton can do with it again just what he has done now. Should we do that till we know the real position we are in as to the first $2,000,000? Oh, the Prime Minister says, we ought to give him full authority to buy hotels in Paris or buy hotels in Hong Kong, and not only should he have the authority, but if he does it parliament should not know the facts about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When did I say that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I made no such statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If parliament is entitled to know the facts, then let us have them. That is all we ask; that is all the motion asks. It is a fact that we have a covenant with a syndicate to take this off our hands or we have not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Please keep to the facts when you are speaking of facts.

Mr. MARTELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is precisely what I am doing and I am getting, "hear, hear," from hon gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MARTELL: It was not intended for you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As it comes from the hon. member for Hants I am still more confirmed in my position.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You were a little doubtful before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am more confirmed. The Prime Minister did not state to this House that this vote should go through before we know the facts as to the late transaction. His Minister of Railways has told us over and over again that we do not know the facts, that he does not know them himself. He does not know who the syndicate are whose credit we are asked to take for this $2,000,000 that has gone. Are those facts to be known or are they not? They are not known. We are told we are not to know them until the $73,000,000 is placed in the position where it may go in exactly the same direction and by the same plan. Now is it an unfair thing to ask of the minister that before he asks parliament to vote $73,000,000 more to be in a position to be used just as Sir Henry Thornton used this, he should be in a position to tell this House what really has happened to the last $2,000,000? He is not to-night. The reason he gives I must say I do not appreciate. I do not know what harm it is going to do that syndicate for this parliament and for the government to know who they are. The minister says there are tenants in that building and if they know who own it it will be hard for those owners to make terms with the tenants. How can they make terms with the tenants until the tenants do know who owns it? I do not see what difference it makes to the tenants whether it is owned by Aron-ovici in Paris or Moses-ovici in New York. What is the difference to them? If there is any reason for secrecy the minister has not suggested any circumstance that would justify his claim for secrecy, none at all. Certainly the tenants of the building know it has been sold. The minister has told the House that, he has volunteered it himself; it has been in the papers for two weeks. They know it has been sold and that arrangements have to be made, and how is it going to hurt the owner that the owner should be known? But even if it is going to, are not we entitled to know? Why should we vote money without knowing to whom the last money we voted has gone or at whose credit it rests at this hour? That is the position the Opposition takes. There are hon. members of this House who say it is all right—all right that $2,000,000 of the money of Canada, $2,000,000 added to the deficit of Canada on the National Railways should lie somewhere in Paris subject to redemption at the hands of men we do not know anything about, and whose names even the Minister of Railways has no knowledge of. Now if other hon. members are satisfied with that condition I am not, and I do not propose to take the responsibility of voting further money until we do know. If the House wishes to do it, then my vote will be the measure of the responsibility I take.

The minister says: Do not attack Sir Henry Thornton. Look at the success he has made of the National Railways. Well, that question is not up for discussion now. But I venture to say to the minister that the National Railways were succeeding just as well when Sir Henry Thornton took charge as they are to-day, that they were succeeding just as well at the hands of the manager whom he and his government dethroned and cast out of office, certainly as well as they are to-day. I venture to say more, if you will search the whole history of Mr. Hanna's tenure of office you will find nothing to compare with a transaction like this. No, it was never even alleged that he went beyond the limits of his power, never alleged that he broke the confidence of the Commons of this country or went beyond the limits fixed by statute as the limits within which he ought to restrain himself. No, no breach of confidence was ever even suggested of Mr. Hanna. But the question of Sir Henry Thornton as general manager is not the question before this House, and the minister cannot make it so. The question is this, whether in a case where admittedly money has been wrongfully taken from the treasury of the Canadian National Railway we are not entitled to know just exactly the position that money is in before we vote more money into the same position. That is the only question before us.

The Prime Minister says the money has not illegally gone, and the Minister of Railways says it has not illegally gone. The Minister of Railways admitted that if they had bought the property in their own name it would have been illegal, that they had not the power to do so and we are supposed to be satisified because they went through the formality of putting it in the name of Mr. Aronovici. The matter is not changed in the slightest by the property being in the name of Mr. Aronovici. The essential facts are these, that plainly in defiance of the word of parliament and the statute of Canada, $2,000,000 has gone out of the treasury of the Canadian National Railway, and we are supposed to vote more money where it may be similarly dealt with without knowing the position the last $2,000,000 is in.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I might be permitted to say a few words in reply to the lecture I received from the right hon. leader of the Opposition. Let me say at the outset that I have in no way freed the government from responsibility in this matter. I stated my opinions then. I also ventured to assert that probably the right hon. leader of the Opposition knew just about as much about this transaction as the government. At this statement he was very indignant, and that surprised me very much because I listened to speeches last night and this afternoon by members in that part of the House twitting the government with knowing nothing about this transaction, so I do not see why he should have been so indignant when I insinuated that he probably knew as much as they did. But I am quite willing to take it back if I am wrong. I only made a guess.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition also told me that I had no right to lecture the members of this House. Well, I do not know that he has the keeping of all this House in his pocket. Is he the particular guardian of their rights and privileges? I can hardly see why he should take what I said to himself so very quickly if I was not hitting a sore spot. I have a great deal of respect for the right hon. gentleman, and I think he knows it. I respect his ability, his industry, and his many good qualities, but I want just to tell him right here and now that if he thinks that any special or peculiar sanctity surrounds the personality of the leader of the Opposition he is entirely mistaken. Now, I think, perhaps I have said enough; but I do not intend to be lectured by the leader of the Opposition, or any other member in this House, when I am occupying a position that I have a perfect right to occupy. I think, Mr. Chairman, you will all acknowledge that since my election to this House I have not indulged in any long speeches; I have never wasted the time of the House. Perhaps in that respect I have made a mistake and allowed opportunities to pass that I ought to have taken advantage of. However I am going to promise hon. members that from this time forward I am going to utilize my due share of the time which is available for discussion.

Mr. GOULD: I do not wish to keep the House very long, but I am more or less in sympathy with the sentiments that have been expressed concerning the $2,000,000 which is under discussion. It seems to me that the attitude of the government, or of the Minister of Railways, is that we should sign a blank cheque and allow moneys to be spent without asking for details. That is the only interpretation to be placed upon the attitude of the government or of the minister. As to the purpose for which this money is taken we have had no specific details. Am I not therefore justified in saying that we are practically asked to sign a blank cheque? We have a total contemplated expenditure under the vote before the committee of $73,000,000 which may be spent for this, that or the other purpose, and I think we would be establishing a wrong precedent if we voted this money without any question or without criticism. To my mind in this case there is justification for more or less criticism. In private life I could not for a moment think of taking such an attitude as is assumed here in respect of matters of business. I want to say that I have all respect for the Minister of Railways, and if he had been duly advised of all the details concerning this arrangement, or this understanding, and had come to the House and given his word of honour as a gentleman and as a business man that the arrangement was all right, and also had advised Sir Henry Thornton that such a method of doing business did not meet with his approval, I would be prepared to accept the hon. gentleman's word in that regard. But when no real information is supplied to the committee concerning the matter I am disposed to be more critical than I otherwise would be.

Now, I do not know whether the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has been disposed of or not but I wish to call the attention of the committee to this circumstance; that some few weeks ago when a very interesting debate took place here on the question of immigration we asked that the item be deferred. I do not think there was a formal resolution but it was asked that the appropriation be deferred and brought down in a more itemized form. That was done and the total was divided into, I think, at least sixteen different items. The request in question was very readily acceded to at that time and it seems to me that this demand of the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) is no departure from the principle then admitted. I think that by adopting such a precedent to-day we may reasonably infer that in other cases, let us say for example the Canada Colonization Company, if they are granted an appropriation next year, there will be a repetition of making expenditures in advance of parliamentary authority. That is a wrong precedent to establish, and we have a right to insist that such things should not continue.

The Minister of Agriculture claimed that the West is in favour of government ownership, and he pointed to the fact that that principle had been carried out in the matter of these railways. I think, however, that statement needs a little qualification. As the matter stands in the West we are in favour of the principle of government ownership, and I wish to remind the minister that we predicted fifteen years ago that government ownership would come. However, if the minister will cast his mind back and take the case of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company he will realize that the sentiment of the people of the West runs more along the line of co-operation rather than government ownership. Yet we give our hearty support to the principle of government ownership, or more properly speaking public ownership, of railways. That condition has been forced upon us. I have no desire to harass the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite but I would remind them that some years ago we gave a blank cheque to a Liberal government with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the construction of which line they said would not cost the country one cent. That is one reason why we hesitate to grant any more blank cheques in the case of other arrangements or agreements. The country has not forgotten the experience of the past. Our past experience renders us very cautious in regard to agreements of this kind. Possibly this discussion will serve a very useful purpose if it teaches these men who talk of money in millions and who do not have to dig down into their pockets for money, the value of a dollar, and render them a little more cautious in the expenditure of the people's money. The people themselves are very much concerned about expenditures of this kind and this debate will have served a really good purpose if those who are responsible for this expenditure are induced to act with greater prudence and circumspection hereafter.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am opposed to this vote unless further information is given as to its necessity. The ground of my opposition is that with the information in my possession I think $2,000,000 is an excessive price to pay for this property, if it is the one indicated in the public press. I saw the Hotel Scribe in 1911, I saw it again in September, 1921, and while I cannot for a moment set myself up as a valuer of property in Paris yet I feel that I can say, with all confidence, that $2,000,000 for that property is a price that has something behind it. It is not even on "the main street," and I appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and to the Minister of Finance, who were in Paris very recently, to confirm that statement. If you take $2,000,000 at 5 per cent that means $100,000, and no one can tell me that the American Express Company, which occupies a corner of the Rue de la Paix near the Place de l'Opera, pays 1,400,000 francs for its yearly tenancy of that building. It does seem to me that before a matter of this kind, coming up in the way in which it does, should be accepted by this House we ought to know that $2,000,000 is a fair price, or anything like a fair price, for the Hotel Scribe. The public prints also tell us that the de facto Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Duncan Marshall, was in Paris recently. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, and I know the responsibility I take in doing so, that I am perfectly satisfied that if any member of this parliament had gone to Paris to bargain for what was known as the Hotel Scribe—I do not know whether it is still occupied as the Hotel Scribe, but it was formerly known by that name—and had $2,000,000 in his pocket the property could have been bought for much less money. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be some means of testing whether an excessive price, a price with a meaning behind it, has not been agreed to be paid for this property.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Before this vote carries I would like to ask the minister if the government have in view any purpose in regard to the Transcontinental railway to Quebec. That road is practically out of commission at the present time. I think that in 1919 there were no less than 7,000,000 ties put on it, ties that had not worn out but had rotted from lack of use. I presume that by this time they will have rotted also, and it seems to me that some use ought to be made of that section of the line. Recently a number of us from the west visited the city of Quebec and saw a shipment of cattle from western Canada loaded on board a steamship there. There are a great many advantages in shipping those cattle through the port of Quebec. They arrive there in very much better condition than they arrive at Montreal. The facilities for handling them at that port are so much more superior to the facilities at Montreal that the United Grain Growers, I understand, paid a vessel $600 to stop there. Hon. members can see the situation. The full freight from Montreal to Liverpool was charged, although the cattle were loaded at Quebec. The Grain Growers paid a bonus of $600 to the steamship company for taking these cattle on board at Quebec, and yet they figured that, in the saving of shrinkage and the saving of time, they were money ahead by bringing the cattle over the Transcontinental to the latter port. It appears to me that if a proper grain rate were put into effect on the Transcontinental a great deal of the overflow, which at present goes down through the United States and which is used to create business for American ports, would go to Quebec.

It seems rather remarkable, and it is discriminatory in fact, that to-day the rates on grain from Port Arthur, or an equivalent point on the Transcontinental, say Armstrong, to Quebec, is just double the rate charged for handling grain for a similar distance in the West, and one might be almost pardoned for supposing that those in charge of the operations of the railway were discriminating against that port, in favour of either the American route or the lake route. I know that some hon. members in this House are of the opinion that under the prevailing grain rates in the West, the Crowsnest pass rates, the railways are losing money in handling our grain. If any hon. member will look over the statements of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway for the past few years, and compare them with the information given before the special rate committee last year by President Beatty and President Hanna, he will be quite convinced that grain was handled at a very large profit by the railways, even under the prevailing rates. If it can be handled at a profit on the prairies, there is no reason in the world why the Transcontinental cannot be used from Winnipeg east to take the overflow of grain.

I am not suggesting any discrimination against the port of Montreal, where they have the finest facilities probably of any port in the world, but with the amount of money the government has spent on the port at Quebec, with the excellent railway we have there—and the Transcontinental is a road which has been excellently built—and with the equipment they have, there is no reason in the world, to my mind, why a large part of the overflow grain cannot be carried by way of that port.

I think in all sections of the House there is a great deal of sympathy for the western farmer, particularly in the marketing of cattle. We have just recently secured an opening for our cattle in the British market, which means a great deal to us. It will mean all the difference between profit and loss in raising these cattle, if we can ship them from the port of Quebec. It is very, very important, but if we have to pay a bonus of $600 to a steamship company to stop there for every shipment, it is no use to us. It would amount to $1.25 a head if we had to pay that sum, and that much extra deducted from the small profit, or added to the loss, means a great deal to the western farmer. I think the government can do us a very great service in this matter by approaching the managing officials of the Canadian National Railways and trying to see if it is not possible to get the usual rate—I do not suggest any lower rate—prevailing on the prairies, for the transportation of grain from Winnipeg to the port of Quebec. If there is a sufficient amount of grain to be handled vessels can call at that port, and in this way we can get our cattle shipped without any extra bonus. In addition to the saving of the bonus there will be a saving in the freight paid on cattle from Montreal to Quebec, because in the shipment I mentioned they had to pay, in addition to the bonus, the full freight from Montreal to Liverpool. I trust the government will try to do something in this connection.

Mr. STEVENS: I moved this afternoon that this item should stand, pending the presentation to the committee of certain information which many of us believe the committee has the right to demand. That motion was ruled out of order. I then appealed to the minister to allow the item to stand until he was in possession of this information and submitted it to the House. This he refused to do. The minister then endeavoured to divert the attention of the committee from the immediate subject under discussion, and to introduce the question of an attack on the Canadian National Railways as a whole. In order to avoid that, and to make it clear that we do not attack the Canadian National Railways as a whole, I purpose moving, seconded by Mr. Boys, in protest against the manner in which the minister has endeavoured to put this item through, that item 139 be reduced by the sum of $2,000,000. That is the only way in which we feel we can formally and properly bring our protest before the committee, inasmuch as the other motion which reflected our views more accurately was ruled out of order.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to reply to my hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell). No man in this House is any more delighted to hear what he said about the port of Quebec than myself. The development of that port when I happened to be Minister of Railways before was a hobby of mine. It was a little mutilated by the successors of the then government, and the plan as outlined by the government of which I had the honour of being a member, headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who represented Quebec, was changed, I think not for the benefit of the port of Quebec. But it has been changed and certain advantages given to other railways that were not at all intended. However, the Transcontinental, I think I am safe in saying, is in good physical condition—at least I am so informed—and anything that can be done to increase the traffic over the Transcontinental to the port of Quebec will receive my hearty support. The fact that cattle can be landed there quickly by the Transcontinental and shipped has been proven, I think, very recently. As a matter of fact, I do not pose as a farmer.

Mr. BANCROFT: The only man in the House that does not.

Mr. GRAHAM: Now do not misunderstand me. Of course, I mean that everybody else does. Why not I?

Mr. BANCROFT: I said that the minister was the only man in the House that did not pose as a farmer.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then I will not say what I was going to say, but I think I am safe in saying that speed on the rails is a factor in the proper delivery of live stock, because the longer they are on the hoof in the car the greater their deterioration—I mean in regard to shrinkage in weight and so on. Anything I can do to improve conditions along that line I can assure my hon. friend I will be delighted to undertake, because I believe in the port of Quebec, and I believe in the Transcontinental as the line to reach that port. My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has moved that this vote be reduced by $2,000,000. I want to tell hon. gentlemen that they are not interfering with the $2,000,000 but that they are crippling the management of the Canadian National Railways to the extent of $2,000,000. Some of the things that they probably want to do, it will be impossible to do, but that is beside the question. The situation is just as it was before. I cannot say anything more than I have said. My right hon. friend would do exactly the same thing if he were in my place; he could not do anything else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would do a great deal more.

Mr. GRAHAM: Along the same line, I think he would do a great deal less, because that is his history—give no information.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Rule 17B.

Mr. GRAHAM: I can go back two or three years in Hansard, and that is the principle laid down by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards day-to-day operation, my hon. friend can read Hansard for five years back and he will find nothing different.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be a waste of time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be if he were trying to find anything different.

Mr. GRAHAM: I say that the principle that would be adopted by any great company in regard to the president of it, the position that Sir Henry Thornton is in, and the principle my right hon. friend would have to take were he in my place, would be that this being an uncompleted transaction and the president and the solicitor assuring me that, in their belief, to give these details at the present moment until the transaction was completed, would be detrimental to the Canadian National Railways, no other stand is possible than to abide by that advice. Who is to give me advice in regard to the Canadian National? My right hon. friend? No. I would not think it was good. The man whom the country has engaged to run the Canadian National Railways? If his advice is not good legally, then he has an adviser in the person of Mr. Ruel, I think one of the best—I will leave it at that—railway lawyers, at least, and business lawyers in the Dominion of Canada. His advice is the same as that of Sir. Henry Thornton: Knowing the inside of the transaction, he considers that it would be injurious to the Canadian National Railways if the details which are asked for were made public. They are not merely for this House; they are intended for publication the world over as they would be published, and the opinion of these gentlemen is that that would be injurious to the Canadian National Railways. These men have advised me so. If you were in my place, what would you do? The responsibility is on the man whom we have hired to accept the responsibility, and I am not going to allow it to be put on my shoulders. I am taking the advice of these gentlemen. To reduce the estimate by $2,000,000 will not affect the transaction in any degree; it will only reduce the amount of money we can expend on betterments, buying of stock or anything of that kind for the Canadian National system. We have discussed this matter thoroughly; the committee has expressed its views; there is no portion of this committee that has not had full opportunity to place its protest on record; but as a principle of business that will be followed by any company, I say that the details should not be given out at the present moment, and I say that on the advice of the president of the company and his solicitor.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Did the minister, as head of the department of government purchasing this property, ask for a valuation of it?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not purchase the property.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The government advanced $2,000,000 in connection with or in relation to the purchase. That is broad enough. The security that the country has, if there be any failure to complete this transaction, is this property. We have heard that over and over again. Has the government had any valuation made of this property?

Mr. GRAHAM: The government did not buy the property.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I quite understand that.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian National Railway Company through their agent bought it—I should not say that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It very nearly slipped out.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has said it so often; when you hear a story often you sometimes believe it. The Canadian National advanced the money for an agent to buy the property. Their judgment, the judgment of the president—and he has been in the property very recently and knows the location —although my hon. friend says it is not on the main street—is that there are so many main streets in Paris that one cannot select one. Without fear of successful contradiction, I say that it is possibly in the best situation in Paris. I must assume that the president of the Canadian National Railways before he advanced the money, knew what he was doing, and I intend to leave the responsibility on his shoulders.

Mr. HANSON: Had the Canadian National Railways any independent appraisal of the property made?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON: Does the minister not think the committee ought to know that? With all his great qualifications, Sir Henry Thornton cannot possibly be a judge of values of real estate in Paris.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am rising for the purpose of asking my hon. friend, as he refuses to give the other information, whether there will be any possible objection to producing the opinion of the solicitor to which reference had been made more than once? If the Commons have any rights at all under this new government that in opposition prided itself so much in connection with the rights of parliament, surely we have a right to the production of the solicitor's opinion.

9 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I have stated it several times, but I will do it again. Verbally, the solicitor assured me that this transaction was perfectly legal, because I asked him that question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the minister put it in this way to him, because I venture to say that if he did, he could not get an affirmative answer—that it was legal to do so without the authority of council and prior vote of parliament? I would be most interested if the minister could produce Mr. Ruel's opinion that it was. I venture to say now that he cannot.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot produce it in writing because it was not produced to me in writing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He can put it in writing if that is his opinion.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely my right hon. friend will accept a statement made on my responsibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Ruel did not understand what the minister said if he made any such statement. There would be no difficulty for the minister to get the opinion if Mr. Ruel is of that view. I ask him to get it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have that opinion, not in writing; but my right hon. friend surely sees his peculiar position. He says that this was bought without an order in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without authority.

Mr. GRAHAM: Put it in any way you like; but in the face of that, I assure the committee that Mr. Ruel, as legal adviser of the Canadian National Railways, assured me that this was perfectly legal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me put it in this way, if I canot get the minister to get the opinion: Does the minister think it ought to be legal—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen have a strange idea of a joke and just as strange an idea of the law. Does the minister think it ought to be legal that the management or the directorate of the Canadian National Railways should be allowed to buy a $2,000,000 property in Paris without the knowledge of the government and prior vote of parliament?

Mr. GRAHAM: All I am saying is what it is, and I did not frame the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking the question: Does the minister think it ought to be?

Mr. GRAHAM: My own view quite frankly would be that it would be better for such transactions as that to be made after consultation with the government, even to the extent of an order in council. I have no hesitation in saying that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister thinks it should not be the law, supposing it is, is he prepared to bring down legislation to amend the present act so as to ensure that it does not remain the law?

Mr. GRAHAM: I certainly will make inquiries as to the law; but my right hon. friend has so befuddled me during the last two days with insisting that the law has been broken, that this would require some consideration. If, however, I am advised by the Minister of Justice that it is legal for the board or the president or any of the officials to purchase property without the consent of the government, I would suggest that the act should be amended so that this would not be legal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like to see anything devised that is plainer than the present act.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Chairman, the minister tells the committee that he does not know the facts of the case,, he does not know whether the Canadian National Railway has bought this property or has an option on it.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has not been here surely.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): But he says he is advised by counsel for the railway that the transaction is perfectly legal. Therefore the railway counsel must have the information, and it would be quite simple for the minister to become seized of the facts. He could then make up his mind whether it is in the public interest to disclose the information to the committee.

The minister has just asked hon. members what they would do if in his position. For my part I would suggest to him that there is no crying necessity for the passing of this main item to-night. In the course of a few weeks undoubtedly the information asked for will be available, the transaction will have reached such a stage that it will be advisable to let the committee and the public have all the particulars. In the meantime there is lots of other business to engage our attention, and this item can stand until the minister and the government are in possession of all the facts, when they can decide whether or not it is in the public interest to disclose these facts to the committee before asking a blank cheque for $73,000,000. I think in view of the disastrous consequences which have resulted to this country in the past through the giving of blank cheques, to be filled out at the will of government officials and governments, that we would do well to hesitate in this instance. I do not think that that is an unreasonable answer to make to the minister's question. I would say, for the time being let the item stand. Such postponement will not cost the country a cent, and I submit it is the proper way in which to deal with a public transaction of this magnitude, for it will satisfy the public better, and undoubtedly it will satisfy the committee better if I am any judge of the feeling of hon. members to-night.

Mr. CANNON: If there is one man in this House, Mr. Chairman, who ought to know everything about the Canadian National Railway legislation it is the right hon. leader of the Opposition. He framed that law, he brought it before the House, and if I remember rightly he defended it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The National Railway Act?

Mr. CANNON: Of 1919.

[Mr. G. Black.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the hon. gentleman's memory is rather wrong there. I did not introduce the bill, I did not frame it, and I had no particular connection with it except as a member of the government.

Mr. CANNON: If I remember correctly, the right hon. gentleman took part in the debate on the bill and defended it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so. I am proud of that.

Mr. CANNON: Anyway, the right hon. gentleman was a member of the government at that time, therefore he knew of the bill before it was introduced, and according to the rules of our constitution he was responsible for the legislation in common with his colleagues. The main argument put forward by the right hon. leader and his friends is that this is an illegal transaction. I have the act before me. I do not claim to be a great lawyer, but I should like the right hon. leader of the Opposition to point out once for all anything in this law upon which he can base his assertion that the transaction in question is illegal. I do not see anything in the law to warrant his statement. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) last night argued that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways had exactly the same powers and privileges as the directorate of an ordinary company. Is there anything in the Railway Act which says that the board of directors of a railway company cannot purchase a property without being authorized beforehand by their shareholders? I do not think that any such provision is to be found there. I say, therefore, that according to the Canadian National Railway law, introduced by the friends of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, there is absolutely nothing to prevent the Canadian National Railway board from doing what it has done.

I do not wish to repeat the argument which I made yesterday, but I think it would be a good thing for the members of this committee to bear in mind that the government to-day is simply putting into application the law which was framed, the law which was defended and the law which was first put into force by my right hon. friend and his associates. Why should the opposition to-day come before this committee and denounce this transaction as scandalous, when it has been put through in accordance with the law passed by the government of which the right hon. gentleman was a shining member? A minute ago the leader of the Opposition was asking my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to amend the law. Why was the law framed as it stands to-day if it is so bad? Why did my right hon. friend give to Mr. Hanna and the former directors of the Canadian National Railway board the powers which are contained in the law of 1919, and seek to deny those powers to Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors to-day?

I shall not go into the merits of this transaction, I do not claim that it is good or bad, but I say that the government cannot be held responsible for such a transaction, and I can only conclude that the opposition in the attitude it has taken is simply playing a political game. I am a politician myself, I do not claim to be a statesman, but when I play politics I play it openly and I say so. Why should our friends on the other side claim that they wish to save the country from a tremendous catastrophe when they are simply playing the ordinary game of politics?

I have in my hand, Mr. Chairman, the Journals of the House of Commons of 1921. On the 22nd of March, 1921, the Liberal opposition, of which I was a member, was desirous of securing certain information with respect to how the Canadian National railways were being run. We thought that parliament should be furnished with certain particulars and certain details as to the management. My right hon. friend was a minister at that time, and the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was also a minister. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was a member of the House, as was the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). All these gentlemen whom we have heard since last night asking for information, asking for particulars, saying that this vote should not go through unless all the documents connected with the transaction were laid on the Table—what did all these gentlemen say when we asked for information? At that time Sir George Foster moved that we go into Committee of Supply, and the then leader of the Opposition, now Prime Minister, moved:

> Subject to the reservation that in exceptional cases there may be documents of a confidential character which, in the public interest, may properly be withheld from publication, the House declares that it is the undoubted right of parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, accounts, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service including the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, whether operating directly under the control of the department, or under corporate form.

We voted—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Did you vote for that?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly I voted for it, and I have not since changed my opinion. My opinion is very simply stated: I say that this parliament should be given every information that is not of a confidential character or the disclosing of which would not be detrimental to the public interest. The stand I took then is the stand I take to-day, and that is what the resolution meant. We were simply asking that any information that was not confidential or the furnishing of which would not be detrimental to the public interest should be made available to parliament, and these gentlemen not only denied us the right to have information that was not of a confidential character, but said that we were entitled to no information whatsoever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON: The resolution is right here; my right hon. friend can read it. Now, Mr. Chairman, to show how sincere these gentlemen are to-day in their attitude in this fight they are putting up, I would ask you to read the list of those who voted on the division which followed the presentation of the resolution to which I have referred. Where was the right hon. leader of the Opposition on this question? Was he then, as he is to-day, in favour of information being given to representatives of the people? Where was the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton)? Where was my eloquent friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and my also eloquent friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion)? They were on the side of those who denied the representatives of the people the least information.

Now, if this is going to be a fight as a party question, let us fight it out. We are not afraid; this is not our first battle. But the right hon. leader of the Opposition reminds me of a god whose name I have forgotten but of whom I read in my Greek mythology. It was a god who used to eat his own children so as to preserve their father. Who, Mr. Chairman, is the father of this Canadian National system? The right hon. gentleman. In 1912 in this House, in the words of the then member for Calgary, he was the "gramaphone of Mackenzie and Mann;" he carried through the legislation which was afterwards denounced all over Canada. He is the gentleman who, in the House of Commons, burdened the people of Canada with every debt, every obligation incurred by the Canadian Northern and by Mackenzie and Mann. Who is the man who forced on the people of Canada the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk system? The right hon. gentleman. Who brought these children into the world? He was their father; but to-day, in order to preserve himself politically, he wishes to swallow them. The Tory party is evidently playing the old game of leaning on the Canadian Pacific Railway so as to kill the Canadian National Railway and preserve its own existence. If the right hon. gentleman wishes to be in this House, having been the father of the Canadian National Railway, the representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is his own business. But I do not think the people of Canada are ready to follow the right hon. gentleman in his political game.

One last word: Not only did these gentlemen refuse us any information when they were in power—information of any nature,—but to-day they say a great principle is at stake, the principle whether public moneys are to be expended by the directorate of the Canadian National Railway without previous consultation with the government or with parliament. Well, if that principle is so sacred, if it is of such importance, how is it that when these gentlemen were in power they expended $72,000,000 in building up a merchant marine without even calling for tenders? Was parliament consulted when the Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, then Minister of Marine, expended $72,000,000 to build up a merchant marine? We were told about it afterwards, when the ships had been built—and painted. Mr. Chairman, when this amendment is put to the vote I am confident that we shall have the support of every member who wishes to give the Canadian National Railway system a fair trial. We from Quebec are not very enthusiastic supporters of public ownership. This system has been imposed on us; we are willing to give it a fair trial, but the debate that has taken place here to-day is not of such a nature as to increase our confidence in public ownership. If public ownership is to be denounced by representatives of the western provinces, if it is to be denounced by its own fathers, pretty soon the people of the province of Quebec will firmly believe they were right in not being very enthusiastic about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the hon. gentleman tell us who were the members from western Canada who attacked public ownership in the House?

Mr. CANNON: I understand that my hon. friend was in the House; he must have heard the speeches the same as I did.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I heard some speeches, but I heard no attack on public ownership from this section of the House.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: Well, evidently my hon. friend is more indulgent than I am in interpreting the speeches that he hears. I heard an hon. gentleman who represents the West saying that if the administration of our railways meant that considerable sums of money were to be spent the way this money had been spent the sooner we put a stop to the system the better. How can our railways be administered in a practical, businesslike way if the directorate is to come to parliament and ask the previous permission of parliament before they do anything? I heard with considerable astonishment my good friend from Vancouver Centre, who generally speaks in a very moderate way, suggest that we bring Sir Henry Thornton before this House to give him a spanking.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend, whom I am delighted to have provoked into making this speech because we are always so glad to hear him, will permit me to say that I made no such statement. The Minister of Railways repeated some such statement as that as coming from me, and I immediately took occasion to correct him.

Mr. CANNON: I think my hon. friend in a flight of oratory suggested that Sir Henry Thornton be severely castigated.

Mr. STEVENS: No, but I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. CANNON: Can you picture, Mr. Chairman, the supposed advocates of public ownership proposing on the one hand that not a cent be expended before the previous approval of parliament has been obtained, and then on the other hand suggesting that the chairman be brought here whenever we want him to receive a castigation? As far as I am concerned I have never been a very strong advocate of public ownership. In my province we are not very enthusiastic over it. But if the system is to be subjected by parliament to the very severe restrictions suggested today I do not think it will last very long.

In summing up, I say that if we are to have public ownership we cannot have it in any other way than we have it now. If we want to revert to private ownership, and we can devise a way of going back to private ownership, it is for parliament to decide. This debate is a debate which has been brought on by my hon. friends simply for the purpose of making some political headway. I do not blame them. The political horizon is rather cloudy for my hon. friends. I saw that the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition piously undertook last night a pilgrimage to Montreal. Was it yesterday in the city of Montreal that he received his inspiration for to-day's conduct in parliament? I do not know, but really if the Canadian National Railways, the children of my right hon. friend, are to be forsaken by their father and left on the hands of us miserable Liberals who can only be considered as stepfathers, then unless the Progressives step in pretty soon they may be orphans.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend from Dorchester is a very interesting political libertine. He can stray from the facts with the most delightful abandon and always, notwithstanding the utter destitution of truth, say something interesting. One hon. member dared to contradict him when he asserted that public ownership had been attacked by hon. members from the West. Well, there was utterly no basis in fact, of course, for the assertion of the hon. member for Dorchester, and there was just as little for every single sentence he uttered from beginning to end. When the House possesses an oratorical ornament who can refer to me as the father of the Grand Trunk Pacific and still keep his face in utter and demure sobriety we ought really to rejoice in the possession.

Mr. CANNON: I think my right hon. friend is following my example and diverging from the truth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now that I have the admission of the hon. member for Dorchester as to his own conduct, I come to mine. He described me as the parent of the Grand Trunk Pacific, of the Canadian Northern, of the Grand Trunk itself, and it seems to me I have some other progeny in the railway line the name of which for the moment I cannot recall—the Transcontinental, I presume. Has the hon. member so soon forgotten his great leader as to ascribe to me the exceeding honour of being the parent of these political ventures in the early part of this century?

Mr. CANNON: I never said that. I said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier created these railways and that they were perverted by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were perverted into their present position from the position of bankruptcy into which they had drifted. It is true he was the creator. It is true that my hon. friend and those around him were those who fastened those liabilities on this country. They signed the credit of the country to the whole ghastly responsibility. When we came into power the notes fell due. That is quite correct. But this is quite apart from the subject. No one could draw us so far apart save the hon. member for Dorchester with his romantic and picturesque eloquence.

Coming to the question of liability the hon. member says, and wisely he predicated it upon the modest assumption that he was not a good lawyer, unless you could show him something in the act that denies Sir Henry Thornton the right to buy a hotel in Paris, he had it, and he ought to exercise it. Everyone knows, lawyers and near-lawyers, that Sir Henry Thornton and his board have the authority given them by the National Railway Act and not one whit more by any act on earth, and unless they are given authority to make capital expenditure without the consent of the Governor in Council in that act, they have not the authority. But is argument necessary? Section 23 sets down clearly that for capital investment or for construction they must have the previous authority of the Governor in Council, and the Governor in Council cannot appropriate a dollar without the previous vote of this House. No argument is necessary. The government has admitted the position. Why is the hon. member for Dorchester coming along to argue that the Minister of Railways is wrong? The Minister of Railways is perfectly right. They have no authority to make capital investment, but by some contrivance they fancy they have got around it. They put $2,000,000 into the Bank of Toronto. The Bank of Toronto does not take up the exact bills that are put there but sends $2,000,000 of its own to Paris and it is handed to Aronovici who buys the hotel. The Bank of Toronto takes the undertaking of the National Railways, backed by the security of a $2,000,000 deposit, that it will get this money back. This is the device adopted. I must congratulate the Bank of Toronto on the sufficiency of the security. They have the government's cash and they have the pledge of the National Railway Board. Legality! There never was anything more flagrant, more brazenly opposed to the whole act than to buy property in another land, four thousand miles away, out of the money of the people of Canada. This is exactly what is done, this is exactly what the hon. member defends.

Mr. CANNON: Is my right hon. friend basing himself on clause 23?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Clause 23? I am basing myself on the fact that in the whole of the act there is no parliamentary authority to make capital investments without the authority of the Governor in Council.

Mr. CANNON: There is absolutely no mention of that in clause 23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is "property" but this hotel in Paris? Let us read the section.

Mr. CANNON: You are talking of capital investment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Buying property is capital investment. The Acting Minister of National Defence made a remark. Does he tell us that the National Railway board has the power to make capital investments without the authority of the Governor in Council?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I will tell my right hon. friend when he gets through. I will say this, however. He knows very well he is making an argument which he cannot substantiate as to section 23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not rely wholly on clause 23. I said I did not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I told the hon. member that unless there was specific power given to the board to make a capital investment they have not got it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You said it was all in section 23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say it was all in 23. As to that I put myself in the judgment of the House. I never found an interruption of the Acting Minister of National Defence to be well based yet, in fact the more prolific his interruptions the more hopeless his case.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do not get mad about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unless there is power given within the four corners of the act to make a capital investment it cannot be made. I venture to say there is no honourable member of this House who for a moment believes that the National Railway board has power to make capital investments without the authority of parliament. That being so what are we to think of the repeated statements of the Minister of Railways, the head of the department?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Is there any other section upon which my right hon. friend relies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) may perhaps think he is deceiving somebody by his smile, but he does not deceive even himself. He knows as well as I know—

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You are shifting ground every moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not shifting my ground. I am in the judgment of the House if I have not said from the beginning that unless there is authority given in the act to the board there is no authority.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You cannot put your finger on it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know I cannot. That is what I am complaining of, it is not there. How can I put my finger on the authority when it is not there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I thought my right hon. friend said it was in section 23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I told the hon. member it was not there nor anywhere else. Clause 23 is a prohibition, that is all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have enough of that now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the latest joker and what is his joke? Someone says we have enough prohibiton now. Well, that may be a fact. Sometimes I think we need more.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now what does clause 23 say?

With the approval of the Governor in Council and upon any location sanctioned by the Minister of Railways and Canals the company may from time to time construct and operate railway lines—

Railway lines that they can construct——branches and extensions, or railway facilities or properties of any description in respect to the construction whereof respectively, parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure, or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities. A copy of any plan or profile made in respect of any completed railway shall be desposited with the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada.

Where is the authority there to make a capital investment without the sanction of the Governor in Council? But why waste time arguing this? Hon. members only want to waste time arguing it to keep the attention of parliament off the actual transaction. If there was authority to do it why did they take this circuitous way to get it done? Why did the Minister of Railways tell us they could not take it in the name of the company? The matter is abundantly plain.

Now, I want to come to the resolution referred to by the hon. member for Dorchester. There was a resolution moved that, subject to the reservation of information that might be confidential, all the affairs of the National Railways should be made known at once to the people's representatives in parliament. I opposed it, and rightly opposed it, and I would oppose it now. Hon. members opposite, I suppose, had they been in office then might have supported it and then when the time came when information was wanted they would do as they are doing now, tell us it is "confidential". I did not want to support the resolution and then merely play with it afterwards. Information is not "confidential" merely because a government or a board do not want to disclose it. Information, for example, touching the price paid for coal in one mine and the price being paid at a similar time in another, or information connected with a dismissal of an employee—that kind of information is not confidential and yet it should not be made a subject of discussion in parliament while these operation transactions are occurring. That kind of information, being a matter of the operation of the road day by day, should not be a subject for discussion in parliament. Consequently I was perfectly right to give a negative to that resolution. I thought it was better to do so frankly than to let the resolution pass and then at another time when anything came up to say that the information was "confidential." Such course would be unworthy of parliament. But here are hon. members who supported that resolution coming to this House to-day, not in respect of a matter of operation at all but in respect of a matter of capital investment and in respect of a matter where the money is gone, irrevocably gone, withholding the facts. Is the case not wholly different? Yes, obviously different, and no one knows this more clearly than the hon. member for Dorchester, yet he cannot even turn his own mind from the right and direct line of thinking, judging by the specious reasoning he sought to advance. I opposed the passage of a resolution such as he quoted and in opposing it I would be entirely consistent with the stand I have taken to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I must say that I have heard my right hon. friend on many occasions speaking in the positive way in which he always addresses the House and making assertions with that bold manner which he always summons to his aid no matter whether the subject may be a serious one or comparatively unimportant. But we have heard it explicitly declared, respecting this act in connection with the Canadian National Railways that expenditures such as were proposed by Sir Henry Thornton to be made in Paris could not be made, because of their character without the direct sanction of the government. My hon. friend from Dorchester very properly said to-night to my right hon. friend that he could not find any such declaration within the four corners of that statute. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to declare that that declaration was made and was to be found in section 23 of the act. When I ventured to interrupt my right hon. friend and to state that that declaration could not be found in section 23 of the act, he intimated that my interruptions were of no value whatever. Then I asked him if there were any other sections in which he could find legal justification for this position that he and his desk mates have been taking for the last two days, and then he admitted it was not in the act at all. And when he declared that it was not in the act at all. It is not in the act. My right hon. friend cannot find within the four corners of this act any statement, or any provision in the statute, which made it obligatory upon Sir Henry Thornton, as the president of this railway, to come to the governor in council for absolute authority before he proceeded to negotiate for the purchase of this property in Paris. So that we have that much in the way of clearing the air of all this mist, innuendo and suspicion which is being engendered by hon. members on the other side of the House for the last two days. What next? We had repeated demands that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways would explain clearly to the committee the attitude of the government in reference to the management of the Canadian National; but we have committed the task to Sir Henry Thornton, we are holding him responsible for the results and we are not interfering with him in regard to the plans he may make or the ideas he may conceive, in order that the end and aim of the Canadian people as a whole might be attained in regard to the successful operation of the railway.

My hon. friend does not think to-day as he thought a few years ago. There is nothing that my hon. friend resents so much as a charge of inconsistency and yet upon this very question, when we come to consider the point as to what information the Minister of Railways should give this House and the country with reference to the operation of the Canadian National by Sir Henry Thornton, we find that my hon. friend laid down two years ago a totally different doctrine from that which he lays down to-day and I will prove that statement. My right hon. friend speaking on a motion proposed at that time by my right hon. leader went on to speak as to the nature of the information that the public ought to have with reference to the operation of the railway system, and first he spoke of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and as to how much information the public should have as to the movements of their directors, the movements of their president, and their method of dealing with the operation of the road.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Operation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And other things. He said:

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company would refuse to any man or to any parliament the disclosure of business that is its own; it knows that it cannot conduct the administration of that great enterprise and at the same time disclose to everybody just what it is doing from time to time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The right hon. member said further:

Not that what it is doing is wrong, but every business enterprise knows that it is impossible successfully to conduct a business, impossible to get the advantages which every business must get if it is to succeed, if everybody doing business with that enterprise and the public generally is to know all its moves on all parts of the chess board from morning till night and from day to day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is very clear. Does my hon. friend agree with that to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, precisely.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend went further. He was speaking of the Canadian Pacific at that time, and proceeded to lay down the doctrine as to what should happen in connection with the Canadian National Railway, and as to that he was very clear. He said:

I think it will be obvious that if the Canadian National directorate are to be compelled to answer to resolutions which by the dozen may be put upon the order paper of this House every day, calling for copies of correspondence, for the disclosure of every fact and of every deed connected with the operation of the road—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do not "hear, hear" till we get through. Then the hon. member will find that it was not merely the operation. He continues:

—they will be put under a disability that their great competitor is not under at all. Should we do that they might well say: you shackle us in the management of the road; you refuse to give us that latitude and freedom of management that every successful business must have; you therefore will have to take the responsibility of failure—we do not. That would be the position they would logically assume. I venture to say that no board of directors, no president and general manager who would be big enough for the tremendous task of operating that system to-day would undertake to assume such responsibility under conditions that would be brought about were this amendment adopted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear—operation only.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend may not be in such a hilarious mood when I get through. He says:

I know there must be such information at that time as will enable parliament properly to judge as to the general management of the system and to say whether or not the Board of Directors that we have put in charge have in the main properly discharged the responsibility placed upon them. That information must be given; but if this resolution passes, it is certain that much that is unfortunate will happen, but very improbable that what is most desirable will actually result. This resolution means simply a return to the old system of political control; it stops nowhere short of that end.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is the situation here? This government committed the control and the operation of the Canadian National Railways to Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors. Now, I think Sir Henry Thornton enjoys the confidence of the people of this country since he has assumed the management of that road. I think the care with which he has approached the solution of all the internal problems which face this country in regard to this railway, and the evident interest which he has taken in regard to all these matters indicates that we are justified, as members of this government, in believing that Sir Henry Thornton, to-day has the confidence of the Canadian people. Sir Henry Thornton, coming from the other side, knows that Canada cannot be a hermit nation, and that the great success of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been due to the fact that, on account of their ocean steamships, they are the great highway of the world between the eastern and western hemispheres, and that the ramifications of that system on the Continent, as any hon. member who has ever been over there will realize, furnish the very life blood of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If under Sir Henry Thornton's management we are to attain that success in government ownership which every man in this country, if he is a true patriot ought to hope for, is it not natural for Sir Henry Thornton to say "As a means to that end, on the continent of Europe, I must obtain some business connections which will enable me to be, at least, a competitor with the Canadian Pacific Railway on that continent?" I venture to say that the doctrines laid down by the right hon. member which I quote to-night, expressed to this House so definitely two years ago on this very question as to what ought to be the policy in dealing with the matter of operation, are in direct conflict with his statements to-night, because he declared at that time that these matters should not be the subject of communication to parliament before they were consummated.

And what more? Let me submit, Mr. Chairman, the lines upon which the right hon. gentleman laid down the importance of maintaining the secrecy of business connections in the business management of a great enterprise. These are the lines which he laid down. My right hon. friend says to the Minister of Railways, by a succession of innuendoes, that Sir Henry Thornton had no business to consider the question of purchasing an hotel in Paris. It has been stated by the right hon. member and reiterated for two days that the law declared that that was so, and he had no such power, and now he cannot put his finger upon the law. Hon. gentlemen on the other side and, in particular, my right hon. friend have stressed the name of Mr. Aronovici, as if some virtue was to be obtained by reiterating the name of a man who had been the purchasing agent of one of the greatest English railways as negotiating this matter on behalf of the president of the National Railways. My hon. friend says, as regards this general appropriation which the Minister of Railways is asking from parliament this year for the operation of railways in Canada: "Oh, we want to have that reduced until we get that information," information similar to that which two years ago he declared, if it were given, would have meant putting the railways under political control. Information of this character he now wants to have. I think the Minister of Railways was quite right when he pointed out to the committee shortly before dinner what was at the bottom of this whole question. Either my right hon. friend was right or half right in 1921 when he laid down the simple business rule that, in the management of a great enterprise, it was only right and proper that a certain amount of secrecy should attach to negotiations until they were concluded, or he is wrong now. Sir Henry Thornton enjoys the confidence of the Canadian people. He has started upon this proposition in connection with obtaining continental business. Either we are to trust his judgment in that regard or we are not. If it is not a good thing for him to look abroad across the channel and endeavour to find avenues by which men and women of the Continent who want to travel across the ocean to Canada, or beyond Canada to cross the Pacific also, can do so; if it is not sound business for him to do that, then the position is a very singular one. This must be sound business, and if in the carrying out of that idea of sound business, he is to be asked, in the course of negotiations, to satisfy the curiosity of my right hon. friend and his deskmate as regards everyone to whom he has talked, everything he has talked about and all these things that have taken place during the consideration of the proposition, surely that is not wise. We on this side of the House trust and believe in Sir Henry Thornton. We think it is in the interest of the Canadian people that he should be given an opportunity to make good. He has been in Canada for a matter of only some four, five or six months, and already there is evidence of renewed impulse to the railways and renewed confidence amongst the Canadian people. As regards this matter we say to this committee that we think it should trust to Sir Henry Thornton's judgment. We believe results will justify his action, and we think the motion of the hon. gentleman in regard to the reduction of this item and the attitude of the right hon. gentleman are, as they were declared to be by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), purely a matter of playing politics.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister inform the committee whether, in his opinion, this is a capital expenditure or not?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I say this to my hon. friend that there has been no expenditure in regard to this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I say further that my hon. friend probably did not catch my point. Notwithstanding the hilariousness of those leaders of his, I challenge them to show where in the act there is any authority for what they have been stating. They are absolutely unable to do so.

Mr. BROWN: It is with some hesitation that I enter into a discussion of this subject. As to whether the expenditure in question was a wise one or not, I shall not with the present information I have at hand, presume to pronounce an opinion. Certainly I should not presume to pronounce an opinion upon the legal aspect of the question; neither will I, in the course of my few remarks, impute to any person motives such as the playing of politics or any other motive than the welfare of the country. I have no desire to play politics regarding this matter if I ever was inclined to such a course. I have, however, been intensely anxious to come to a proper conclusion regarding this question, and if called upon to cast a vote, to cast a vote that will be justified in my own mind, and that I can justify to my constituents and the people of Canada generally. It has been urged upon us that if we vote against this expenditure which has been made, we are casting a vote against the interest of the Canadian National Railways. Whether that statement be true or not, it would not be fair to say to any persons that they are deliberately doing so. I would like to take it for granted that all hon. members in this House are desirous of seeing the Canadian National Railways a success. Yet it is quite possible that injury may be done to that system even if we do not do so by deliberate intent.

This question has brought to us one of the most difficult problems connected with our National Railways; that is the question as to how far we can give to those to whom we have entrusted the management of our railways similar powers to those possessed by Mr. Beatty and his associates in the management of the great Canadian Pacific railway, and at the same time secure for the shareholders represented by their representatives here in parliament, those rights which naturally reside in the shareholders of a great company. I think I am right in saying that that is the most difficult problem which we have to face, to know just at what point to draw the line between giving a free hand to those managing our railway system, and at the same time reserving our rights as representatives of the owners of the system.

Perhaps even to define this by statute would be one of our most difficult problems, and I am quite willing to say this that, perhaps, the present statute, if it is interpreted by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), that there is a distinction between capital expenditure and operating charges, gives the wisest distinction that can be made. Whether that distinction is made in the law as it stands, I am not, as I said before, going to pronounce an opinion. Granting, however, that that is a correct interpretation of the law, I think I can imagine that an occasion might arise where even the letter of the law might need to be violated. I think I can imagine that a situation might arise that would necessitate a violation of the strict letter of the law. The extent to which we might condone such a violation would of course have to be determined by the circumstances of the case as they arose.

When the government made the announcement to the country that they were going to give Sir Henry Thornton a free hand in the management of the railways, I think the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific gave their approval to such a declaration. To me there is in the whole situation in Canada to-day nothing that I look upon as more necessary to our ultimate well-being than that our government railways should be made a success. We desire the success of the Canadian National Railways; but success will depend on many different factors; it will depend on the loyalty with which the people of Canada support those roads, and I believe there is in the country an increasing feeling of loyalty towards that institution.

I believe it is quite correct to say that if we go among the people we shall find a growing sentiment that they feel "This is something that belongs to us." And I think there is a growing feeling of optimism, a feeling that success can ultimately be achieved. But while a number of factors enter into the success of the road, it seems to me the outstanding factor will be the capacity and the capability of the man we put at the head of the system. In other words, we have to rely upon Sir Henry Thornton. Now, the question that must necessarily come up in our minds is, to what extent are we willing to trust the man that we have placed at the head of the system. As I look upon the situation to-day I think I am willing to take this position, that if Sir Henry Thornton does not make a success of this system, then it is inevitably doomed to failure. I believe we are now just at that critical stage, that it is a case of succeed or fail, and if Sir Henry Thornton does not make a success of our Canadian National Railways I doubt the possibility of getting any other man to do so. That is, if I correctly estimate Sir Henry Thornton, he is a man that would not very long put up with too much nagging. And the man who would put up with much nagging would not likely be the type of man that would make a success of this system.

I believe there is danger in a man becoming unduly autocratic, there is danger in his going too far in the reckless expenditure of the people's money. I realize that danger, and I do not need any person in this House or outside to impress upon me the danger that confronts us in that direction. But to my mind the greatest danger that faces our National Railway system to-day is undue political interference. That, to my mind is infinitely a more imminent danger than any other that can possibly arise. With that thought in my mind, and holding the views I have expressed, I am disposed, with our present limited knowledge of this transaction, to give Sir Henry Thornton a fairly free hand. The time will come when fuller information will no doubt be disclosed to us. At the moment I am not disposed to condone this particular transaction, I think it is quite evident that in some aspects it merits our disapprobation, but at the same time, holding as I do that the greatest danger confronting our National Railways is undue political interference, I feel disposed to give Sir Henry Thornton the benefit of every reasonable doubt. I think if Sir Henry Thornton is the man that we take him to be he is capable of rising to his great opportunities. I do not know if he is likely to hear what I say or take any notice of it if he does, but I think he has the greatest opportunity that any man ever had in the commercial or industrial world. He has to take hold of this National Railway system, handicapped it is true by tremendous over-capitalization, and to make it a success. We pay him a salary, and properly so, that gives him the possibility of enjoying everything in life that any man needs to enjoy, and we offer him, as I say, an opportunity of doing the biggest thing that any man has ever done in the commercial or industrial world—an opportunity of doing something, not for himself but for the good of the Canadian people. If Sir Henry Thornton rises to the opportunity that is given to him, as I believe he is a big enough man to do, he can establish for himself a name before which the names of Ford, Rockefeller and other men who have accumulated great fortunes for themselves will look small indeed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Can the hon. member tell me how much Sir Henry Thornton has at stake in the Canadian National Railway system compared with the people of Canada?

Mr. BROWN: His reputation. The opportunity has been given to him not only to sustain his reputation but to make a still greater reputation for himself, a reputation that will be the greatest that any man has ever achieved in the commercial and industrial world. That is what I think he has at stake. While it may be possible—I do not know at present—that he has been led into a transaction which is in violation of the strict letter of the law, for myself I propose to withhold judgment on the merits of this particular case until full information is given to us.

In regard to the amendment itself, the minister has stated that its acceptance would not affect the transaction in any way at all, but would simply mean curtailing the expenditure of the board for the coming year and crippling their work to the extent of $2,000,000. If that be the correct statement of the case, holding as we from the West do, the necessity for the immediate construction of many branch lines—there are many sections out there in need of railway facilities—for my part, even if I were disposed to support the amendment on other grounds, I could not consent to do so now and in any way cripple the management of the Canadian National Railways for the coming year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I only rise to remark that I think my hon. friend, the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) has overlooked one important point in his argument as to whether this expenditure was or was not authorized under the act as an expenditure which might be made by Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors, irrespective altogether of the Governor in Council or of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). Let me point out that when parliament sees fit to make grants for railways or for anything else it usually does so in specific, definite language, surrounded by certain conditions. I note that in the estimate now before the committee out of which this particular $2,000,000 must come, as well as in the similar estimate last year, the language is very definite and very express.

Last year the vote was under three separate headings: 136 for the Canadian National Railways, 137 for the Grand Trunk Railway Company and 138 for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. This year the amounts are consolidated under a single item owing to the consolidation of the three railways. But I find that in the three votes last year the limitations, restrictions and conditions were identical with those which accompany this vote to-day. What are they? Under vote 136 last year an amount of $42,000,000 was granted:

> (a) To pay operating deficits;
> (b) Acquisition of property, materials and supplies;
> (c) Interest and sinking funds on notes;
> (d) Principal and interest of maturing or matured loans;
> (e) Construction and betterments;
> (f) Co-ordination or consolidation of railway lines and facilities.

Now, if the section had stopped there, there might have been some force in the argument of the Minister of Railways. But it did not stop there. The next clause is:

> The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time, in the discretion of the Governor in Council by way of bonus, in cash or by way of guarantee, or partly one way partly the other.

Money voted by this parliament to this road for the acquisition of property may be expended how? By Sir Henry Thornton? No; at the discretion of the Governor in Council. That is the act passed by the House last year—it is the statute I am reading from; and I find almost identical language in the vote this year. Turn to page 31, vote 139, the one we are now discussing. The language is a little different; in this case the restriction and the limitation are in the first clause. It says:

> The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time, in the discretion of the Governor in Council.

Not in the discretion of the minister; not in the discretion of Sir Henry Thornton. And what is that money for?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is not the act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is the estimate I am reading from, which becomes an act when it is passed by parliament. I read a moment ago from the statute, not from the estimates of last year; the latter are in the Appropriation Act. It is chapter 53 of the acts of last session to which I referred.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is not in the Canadian National Railway Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, in the Appropriation Act, in which the limitation is expressly defined. Now, I take the vote of this year and I find not identically the same language, but language that is similar and of the same effect. I read from item 139, at the top of page 32 of the Estimates. The language is:

> The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time, in the discretion of the Governor in Council.

And what was that amount for? How may that money be used? Turn to page 31: "(a) Operating deficits; (b) acquisition of property." That would cover the present case; it is the same express limitation of last year. Now, such a limitation upon the expenditure of that money, can it be argued for a moment that Sir Henry Thornton can take that amount out of the treasury without the authority of an order in council or the consent of the minister? It passes my comprehension how that can be done. Let me just touch upon the other question. The powers of the Canadian National Railway Board as it exists are set forth in the Act of 1919. Only such powers as are set forth in that act can be exercised by that company; it gets them all there; it has no existence whatever apart from that statute. What did we give to the company? I shall not read the sections, but we gave them the management and the operation of the lines of railway; that is the meaning of section 11. Then follow the restrictions: They cannot acquire new lines of railway without going to the Governor in Council for authority. They cannot amalgamate with other companies, they cannot issue securities, without going to the Governor in Council for authority. All they can do is to look after the management and operation of the road. I quite agree with the Minister of Railways in his interpretation of the act; I heard him on two occasions plainly give it as his opinion this was a capital expenditure and that capital expenditure could not regularly be made without the matter having first come before the minister and the Governor in Council. Well, apart from the National Railway Act, what about the vote of this parliament? Are the express terms and conditions under which parliament voted that money to be absolutely disregarded by the head of this railway board? Is he to be supreme? Is he to be above parliament or the votes of parliament? Is the limitation which we impose by act of parliament when we vote the money to be of no effect? I do not know whether the purchase was wise or was unwise; it is beyond me. I know I heard with a great deal of satisfaction the minister say to-day that the thing would not occur again. It is easy to see from the attitude of the minister that had he been consulted in the matter the transaction would never have gone through in the manner in which it did. But what I maintain is that there has been a breach of the letter and of the spirit of the National Railway Act; there has been a breach of the limitations imposed by this parliament when we voted the money. It was a wrong thing for Sir Henry Thornton to do. If in the opinion of the committee he should be excused, that is another question, but I do not think the offence should be condoned. I believe some reprimand should be offered under all these circumstances. For my part I am willing to leave the reprimand entirely in the hands of the Minister of Railways. I think he both feels and sees the real situation and realizes that there is something very wrong in the whole transaction.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I do not know that anybody could contribute much that is new or informative to this debate. The remarks of the Prime Minister this afternoon and those of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) just a little while ago represent my views upon this matter, and I think each of them has plotted out the course that parliament should follow in this particular case. The leader of the Opposition (Mr Meighen) and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Guthrie) asserted on several occasions this evening that there was no legal warrant for the purchase made by Sir Henry Thornton, president of the National Railways. Even if there were not legal authority for the course pursued, I doubt if the country generally would be much exercised over that fact; if the expenditure itself was sound, parliament and the country would condone the transaction But I wish to say with the same amount of confidence that was shown by the leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that the action taken is well within the statute. Whether it is wise to incur expenditures of this magnitude without direct contact with the government may be, of course, a question for debate. Now, section 23 has been referred to several times. Clearly that clause is not relevant to the issue; it merely gives the company power to construct and operate railways under the authority of the Governor in Council. That is not the case we are discussing. There is another section, 29, which authorizes the company to purchase the securities or shares of going businesses which are incidental to the work of a railway, such as hotel businesses or electric power businesses. That is not this case, and that section is not applicable. Section 11 is perhaps the most important section, and it has been referred to by the hon. member for South Wellington. May I read that again:

> The Governor in Council may from time to time by order in council entrust to the company the management and operation of any lines of railway or parts thereof.

That section entrusts to the company the power of operating and managing the Canadian National Railways. That company therefore has the same powers that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has in the operation of its property. It has all the powers that any other railway company in Canada has, and I ask hon. gentlemen if it is not well within the legal and statutory powers of boards of directors of railway companies to rent offices, to build offices for the company's purposes. The directors of this company have exactly the same powers that the directors of any other railway company in Canada has, and I submit with confidence there can be no question as to the powers of the directors of a company to purchase buildings for the company's own purposes. I do not think that is open to question.

Then there is another section, section 16 which provides:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Government Railways Act or the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, all expenses incurred in connection with the operation or management of the Canadian Government Railways, under the provisions of this act, shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the Canadian Government Railways.

Now the question is if the acquisition of a building in Paris for the purposes of the company's offices is necessary to the prudent and aggressive management of the company. Surely such expenditure would come within that section, and a deficit would require to be liquidated by a vote of this parliament. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has referred to the estimates to be voted in connection with the Canadian National Railways this session. I submit that whether this transaction is lawful or not is to be determined by the statute of 1919 in reference to the Canadian National Railways, and not by the verbiage accompanying a proposed vote in parliament. It is true that when it comes into the Appropriation Act it has the effect of a statute, but even in that instance it provides for the payment of the deficit, and if the purchase of this property is responsible for incurring a portion of that deficit then I think the vote which the hon. member read supports the contention which I have made.

Now just a few words as to the transaction itself. The purchase of this building may indicate a great deal of courage, excellent judgment and prevision on the part of Sir Henry Thornton. It may be a bold and splendid conception and one that will ultimately prove of value to the country and to our railway system. The transaction may conform with the usual and best business practices known to us to-day, and yet it is one that is liable to misinterpretation and misrepresentation, and that, Mr. Chairman, is one of the difficulties of government ownership and government operation. It will always be difficult for the Canadian National Railways to do the right thing in connection with the big things in a proper way because a critical public and a critical parliament will not accord to them the same freedom of action and of judgment that is usually accorded to business men and to the directors and managers of a big concern.

Now what are the facts? So far as I can gather them by a reading of Hansard chiefly, I would suppose the facts to be somewhat as follows: Sir Henry Thornton, the president of the Canadian National Railways, believed it was in the interests of the company to have an office well located in the city of Paris, to be the centre possibly of their European operations. I gather also that it was their intention to lease from somebody else this particular building, and that at a certain stage negotiations were on for the purchase of this property by a syndicate. It transpired that another purchaser was in the field whom they feared might purchase the property and prevent the Canadian National Railways from obtaining it for rental purposes. In consequence of that Sir Henry Thornton had to act quickly, and from the current funds of the Canadian National Railways he advanced $2,000,000 to purchase this property, not to hold the property, but to give him temporary ownership while he undertook the organization of a syndicate outside to take over the property and lease to the company such portion of it as they desired for the purposes of the company. I see my friend angularly opposite to me smiling.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a great joke.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But these things are done every day by reputable business men, by the ablest business men in the world.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With public money?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I will come to that in a minute. They do it every day, and if it is sound in their case why is it unsound in this particular instance? Let me proceed a little further. I stated that when Sir Henry Thornton secured possession of the property he contemplated the organization of a purchasing syndicate to take it over and to lease from them a portion of the building for the purposes of the company. That is done every day, and I say that there is nothing objectionable in it, and if he did not do it, who else would do it? I admit that the whole circumstances permit the suspicious mind to create a false picture of this whole transaction. Hon. gentlemen want some more information. What further information do they want? What further information would be of any good to them?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have not any yet.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Am I not right in saying that they are praying they will not receive any because it might spoil the whole purpose of their argument of yesterday and to-day? If the facts disclosed that this proposed purchasing syndicate belonged to the city of New York they would say, why not have organized a Canadian syndicate? The fact probably is that you could not organize a syndicate in Canada at the present time to engage in such a transaction. You probably would require to go to a large city where very large sums of money for investment purposes were available. If the syndicate was a Canadian syndicate, what would happen? Somebody in it would be found to be the thirty-second cousin of someone connected with the railway or the forty-second cousin of some member on this side of the House or of a member of the government. Already the leader of the Opposition is playing upon the name of the man in whose name the property is now held, and I fancy one could make an interesting and destructive political speech on that fact alone. If the leader of the New York syndicate had the Hebraic name of Moses as my right hon. friend has suggested, that might afford ample ground for political pamphlets and many political speeches.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if Sir Henry Thornton believed it was in the interests of the company to own a property in Paris he pursued the only course open to him. I am not sure whether it is advisable to have an office in Paris at the present time. Perhaps it is. I am not to be judge of that. Sir Henry Thornton is the adviser of this country in this particular matter, and I submit that we must accept his judgment. And probably the idea is a sound one. It may be a very big idea and worthy of being carried out. If the Canadian National Railways have an active organization in Paris it may be worth 100 or 500 commercial agents in Europe. It may not only be the representative there of the railway system itself, but it will be the agent of the men of business in this country, and will be an active propagandist for the development of our trade in European countries. I would urge upon hon. gentlemen not to disparage, and damage and destroy a transaction that seems a perfectly natural one and one that is engaged in almost every day by large railway or industrial companies. I assume—I am bound to assume, and I think every hon. member in the House should assume—that Sir Henry Thornton has acted in good faith in this matter and really has at heart the interest of the National Railways and nothing else. He does not anticipate a permanent capital investment; evidently he will shortly be recouped the temporary advance which he secured through the bank on behalf of the railways, and the railway treasury will then be repaid the advance. I assume again that Sir Henry Thornton will be in a position to see that it is carried through.

Now it may be, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, and as I think the Minister of Railways said, that in transactions of this size it would be better that before the transaction is launched or completed, full negotiation and discussion should take place with the government, or at least with the Minister of Railways. I feel, however, that Sir Henry Thornton deemed it to be an expenditure which should be made. In his judgment it is one that will enure to the advantage of the railways and to the country, and as it was only a temporary expenditure I think he should be supported. It would be very unfortunate if every transaction of the Canadian National Railways became the matter of a discussion in parliament. I do not deny the right of the opposition to engage in the criticism they have indulged in yesterday and to-day. They, perhaps, have only done their duty. They may have rendered a public service. They have, however, already said all they can say upon the question, and I do not think they are performing their duty in any better way than they have already done by moving an amendment and asking for a vote upon this particular item.

Mr. BAXTER: Having spoken before I almost regret to address the committee again upon this subject. I assure them that I would not do so if it were not for the very peculiar positions taken by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of National Defence, and by my very good and hon. friend the member for Halifax who has just spoken. With reference to the latter, permit me to express the hope that when he shall be called to that eminent position to which the newspapers are at present appointing him, he will display perhaps not a more judicial attitude, but that at least the law administered by him will be of a much better brand than that which he has propounded to the committee tonight. I know that neither the Acting Minister of National Defence nor the member for Halifax are at all oblivious of the decision of the court of Exchequer Chamber in the very well known law case of the Ashbury Company vs. Riché. What was that? An incorporation, under a British statute of a company to carry on railway operations, and when they undertook to buy a railway in Switzerland it was held beyond their powers. And yet had the court of Exchequer Chamber had the benefit of the eloquence of the Acting Minister of National Defence they would have been told in thunder tones that you could not find a line in the statute forbidding it. And no man of any standing as a practising barrister would expect to find a line in the statute forbidding it. That is only what I must characterize as simply a bit of bluff put forward to help the government out of a difficult position. It is not law, it is bluff. That is what we got from the Acting Minister of National Defence to-night. Now, the case that I have spoken of stands. It is law. It is not a matter of politics, it is a rule to which all people in the British Empire must submit in the construction of a matter of this kind; and that rule applies just as much to the construction of the act relating to the Canadian National Railways as it does to anything else. In this case there is a company incorporated, and what is it incorporated for? I know that other hon. and learned gentlemen have addressed the committee on the subject, and at a good deal of length, and I do not propose to take up very much time, but I am going to point out something that I think has not been pointed out yet. We use a preamble in the statutes for the purpose of explaining, and circumscribing, and interpreting the rest of the statute, and in that very preamble—the preface, the reason that is given to this legislation—we are told that:

—it is expedient to provide for the incorporation of a company under which—

What now?

—the railways, works and undertakings of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern system may be consolidated—

Now, that is present or past. It is something that has existed and still exists——and together with the Canadian Government Railways operated as a National Railway system.

Does that indicate anything other than Canada? Does that suggest the carrying on of a railway in France? Could you have built a railway from Calais to Paris under that legislation? Did anybody ever think of such a thing? The court of Exchequer Chamber burst that soap bubble fifty years ago. It has been blown again to-night to serve a very obvious purpose. Now then we have a company formed, and I am not going into the details of that except to say that it is not a one man company such as we sometimes hear spoken of. It is a railway board of directors, or is supposed to be so, and the gentleman who is chairman is only one member of it; but the astonishing thing—leaving all other legal considerations out of the question—is that the Minister of Railways has not been able to point out to this House that the purchase, or transaction, or agreement, or whatever I may call this nebulous thing that has taken place, whatever it is, is not the act of the board of directors itself, not the act of the company; it is the act of one individual unsupported by a resolution, unsupported by even the shadow of the company, and not reported to the minister. That is clear beyond the necessity of any further demonstration. It cannot be denied that if the minister could have had a resolution of the board of directors and brought it here he would have had some footing. But he has got nothing but the solitary personal act—however good the intention may have been, and I am not going to discuss that—nothing but the solitary personal act of Sir Henry Thornton uncommunicated to the minister and, as far as the evidence before this committee is concerned, uncommunicated to any one of his colleagues. That is what this House is asked to ratify and endorse as the usual, the ordinary and proper mode of conducting the business of the National Railways.

Is the committee prepared to accept that? Is the government prepared to stand back of it? I sympathize with and admire that attitude of the Minister of Railways, who clothing his statement in such language as is necessary to soften the blow, has practically told Sir Henry Thornton that this thing is not to occur again, and has assured the House that it will not occur again with his sanction. What am I to say of the group of apologists on the other side of the House, who have quoted everything from discussions in connection with matters pertaining to the National Railway, have quoted from my right hon. friend's remarks, and have almost given to a speech of his in the House a few years ago the solemnity of an act of parliament, and that from the same gentleman who denied that the act of 1921, because it dealt with finance, was an act of parliament, and treated it as only a resolution—a strange case of mental confusion or moral obliquity, I do not know which. When we turn to section 11, to which the hon. senior member for Halifax has referred, we find the following:

> The Governor in Council may from time to time by order in council entrust to the company the management and operation of any lines of railway or parts thereof, and any property or works of whatsoever description.

And so forth. We find nothing there about new construction. Hon. members will find a section that has not been referred to, that permits the powers of expropriation to be exercised.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BAXTER: Certainly.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): If the cost of this building in Paris were $10,000 and not $2,000,000, would my hon. friend think that the Canadian National Railway would not have legal authority to buy that for its own purposes?

Mr. BAXTER: What purposes?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The company's purposes.

Mr. BAXTER: Well I hope, when justice is administered in the Exchequer Court, that it will not be regulated by the number of dollars involved in the transaction, and that one matter will not be considered legal because only $10,000 is involved, and another matter considered illegal because $1,000,000 is involved. It would not be legal on account of the small amount involved. I cannot draw such a distinction.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The hon. member does not get my point. I wanted to test the soundness of his argument, and I think he might admit that it is not a sound argument. Does he seriously mean to say that the Canadian National Railway, without the authority of the Governor in Council, could not go to the city of Paris or to London and buy a building for $5,000 or $10,000 for its own purposes?

Mr. BAXTER: Leave the amount out of the question altogether. I thought the hon. member was drawing a distinction as to the amount. I say they have no legal authority to buy one square foot of land in Paris or anywhere else under this act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Could they lease an office, buy furniture and put it in?

Mr. BAXTER: No, they cannot carry on business.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think my hon. friend, at the close of the sitting of the House this evening, should sit down and reason out the matter.

Mr. BAXTER: I will take the words of the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), and I will employ them to better reasoning than he employed them. When considering the charter of the company, I will take what I find within the four corners of the act constituting the company, in order to find some provision authorizing a particular thing to be done. If it is not there, it follows that the thing is not authorized. I have not read every line of the act, but I have seen nothing that instances foreign countries as places where business may be carried on. I find in the act provision for expropriation, and I thought they might be referred to, because I find the plan may be signed by the minister or the president or vice-president of the company. But if members were reading the act, and thought that it followed from the language that they could acquire property by expropriation—but of course that would be within Canada—without the consent of the Governor in Council, they would still be wrong, because the Railway Act permiting expropriation for railway purposes requires the preliminary consent of the minister before even the plan can be filed. If you read this act from end to end you will find it does not contain a single provision looking to the making of capital expenditure by this board, or the acquisition of property or anything of that kind, without the consent of the Governor in Council. Section 23 has been referred to and I need hardly repeat it, but it says:

> With the approval of the Governor in Council and upon any location sanctioned by the Minister of Railways and Canals—

Will any hon. member say that that means in England, Scotland, Ireland or France?

> —the company may from time to time construct and operate railway lines, branches and extensions or railway facilities or property of any description in respect to the construction whereof respectively, parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities.

When has parliament authorized the expenditure, assuming the company could lawfully expend money in France or in England? And when has the approval of the Governor General in Council been given?

As to the particular transaction, I do not know whether it is a building or not. The thing has become so absolutely nebulous that it may be a sort of dirigible balloon that is floating over Paris. I cannot get much accurate information. The need of this country is the handling of freight, passenger traffic is carried ordinarily at a loss by the railways, and the freight sustains the passenger traffic. All that I can see of this nebulous proposition is that somebody wants to advertise for passenger business. I cannot conceive what freight is going to be brought to the National Railways by this expenditure. We cannot, however, get any information. We are not even told the particular purpose. We are not told how many rooms the railway is expected to occupy, or whether it is for freight or passenger business. That sort of thing cannot be a secret. If it were to be a secret it would have to be equally a secret that this is an hotel. Perhaps it is not. I sympathize with the position the minister is placed in when he can tell us so little about it, but I must make a protest against the misinterpretation of the statutes by the Acting Minister of National Defence and against the attempt to influence members who do not profess to make law their vocation in life, to misrepresent the application of legal principles to the whole subject, particularly for the purpose of political excuse or political advantage.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In view of the fact that an amendment has been introduced, I wish to state my position with regard to that amendment. Last night I endeavoured to state my position on the general question. I have no desire whatever to cover that ground again. As I listened a few minutes ago to the rather laboured defence put forward by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) it seemed that there was full justification for a protest against the action that has been taken by Sir Henry Thornton. The senior member for Halifax suggested that the expenditure was but a temporary one, and on that ground no exception should be taken. It seems to me his argument might be used to carry him a great deal further than this particular case If, for example, in encouraging this tourist traffic from Paris, it might be considered advisable that some sort of a race track should be started or an amusement park or a seaside resort be opened, in that case it would seem to be quite justifiable that Sir Henry Thornton should take one or two million dollars to organize a syndicate to start some such enterprise as that. In carrying on the work of the railway or providing freight traffic for the railways from, we will say, Prince Rupert eastward, it would be quite justifiable, according to the same line of argument, that Sir Henry Thornton should organize a fish company up in Prince Rupert; at least he might take one or two million dollars temporarily with the idea of organizing some syndicate with the understanding that if it were successful, he would put the money back again. The argument is no defence for an action of this kind and makes it all the more necessary that some protest should be made by the House to check such a practice as this. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) suggested that anyone who would vote in favour of the amendment was simply playing politics. Some of us here fortunately have a short parliamentary record, and we do not need to worry very much about what we did in previous years. I should like to suggest that we have a right, a duty to act on the merits of this question irrespective of who introduced the amendment or any motive that may lie behind it. It was also suggested by the hon. member for Dorchester that anyone who supported the amendment proposed, would be going back on the principle of public ownership.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend might have understood that, but I do not think I said so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what I understood. I may have misunderstood. I should, however, like to say that in supporting the amendment proposed, I believe I am doing my best to uphold the principle of public ownership. I believe most firmly in public ownership; but I am not going to be deceived by mere words. I do not want to see set up in this country a public ownership that means very little more than an irresponsible dictatorship. That, it seems to me, is what very readily we may see grow up if we allow this kind of practice to continue.

So far as we have had evidence, produced this evening or at previous sessions of the House, there has been no consent by the minister or by the government, and as the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) points out, we have not even had evidence to show that the board itself gave its endorsation to the action taken by Sir Henry Thornton. Under these circumstances, I do not see that we have any other course than to vote in favour of the proposed amendment. A previous resolution was turned down on the ground of being out of order; if there were some other way in which we could show our disapproval, possibly we might feel that we like to take that course; but under the circumstances it seems that the only way of doing so is to vote for the amendment, and that I propose to do.

Mr. McCONICA: I had not intended to discuss this question, but it seems to me that we might review the situation as has developed. Sir Henry Thornton and the board of directors apparently decided that they wanted a home in Paris. Was that a wise decision? I do not know. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodsworth) who has just taken his seat, knows. I do not think any man in this House knows. I believe the judgment of the board of directors and of Sir Henry Thornton on that question is entitled to greater weight than my judgment. I can conceive that such a thing would be desirable, and I think it would be in the interest of the railroad system. But I do not know much about it. What did he do? He took the advice of an eminent barrister how to go about this matter, the advice of a gentleman whose name has been given us in this House to-day, a gentleman who knew the law, and who knew the facts. He was advised by this gentleman that a certain course of procedure was entirely regular and legal, and he adopted that course. Hon. gentlemen have been complaining that they do not know what has taken place; but without knowing the facts, they are giving us their knowledge of what the law is. The gentleman under whose advice this action was taken knew the facts, and when the matter is one of legal opinion, it is very well to apply the law to the facts if you want to get a sound opinion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That sounds sound.

Mr. McCONICA: Then what did he do? He arranged to guarantee a loan in Paris and hypothecated, as it were, $2,000,000 of the money of the railway company. If the amount had been $2,000, there would not have been any question that he had a right to do this. If he had made an arrangement by which he might rent an office in Paris or in Luseland, Saskatchewan, the village from which I hail, it would have been within his right and power to do so. The size of the transaction does not make any difference as regards the principle involved if parliament votes money and puts it in the bank. What is the situation? As regards this parliament, or as regards this $2,000,000, no action which we men take can undo what has been done in this case. The performance is over. Shall we interfere when we cannot possibly do any good? Shall we compel the minister to disclose all the transaction and the situation of the parties, and possibly jeopardize the whole performance in order that hon. gentlemen may know some things which they do not know? This thing will keep. We are going to have another session of parliament one of these days. If it is found that an irregular transaction has been made or a losing game has been played, then we can haul Sir Henry Thornton over the coals. I do not see why we should break right into the midst of this transaction and perhaps jeopardize negotiations, when we have already incurred our part of the responsibility, when our money has been put up and when, if we spill the beans, we shall be the only losers, so far as I can understand the matter. Why not let events take their course in connection with this transaction in the sincere hope that it will be all right, as I believe it will be? Sir Henry Thornton has been put in charge of this great railway system. He is spending millions upon millions of dollars. We are trusting him to buy locomotives, coal, cars, rails, and to carry on the greatest business transaction on earth to-day. Have we confidence enough in him to believe he can make a deal to rent offices in Paris? If he is not competent to carry this transaction through in what he has been advised is a perfectly legal and proper manner, then he has no business to be in the place he occupies and we should get rid of him. If he cannot carry through this transaction he cannot run the railroad. I for one have implicit confidence in his ability as a railroad man, and in his integrity as a gentleman, and I believe that the acquisition of this property will in the end prove to be a benefit to the railroad and to the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the system of audit at present applied to the Canadian Government Railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is the same system that we have always had.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I recollect, there used to be a pre-audit in connection with large matters. Is my memory wrong?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that that system has not been changed since my hon. friend was Minister of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to find out if you have to get the auditor's O.K. on your cheque in connection with large expenditures.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that that is only in connection with matters where the money is advanced by the government. The same system was in vogue under my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand that the pre-audit only applies to actual government payments?

Mr. GRAHAM: By the Auditor General, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What protection is there, who can get a cheque?

Mr. GRAHAM: The railway has its own auditors, also an outside firm of very competent auditors.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I think my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the usual railway operation is that while payments in the discharge of ordinary business can be made—and I am forgetting all about the legal question—when you have an extraordinary payment it can only be made by the board of directors. That being so, how was this money got out without vote or justification?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am told by the deputy minister that we have the exact system used by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and as required by the Interstate Commerce Commission. All the railways are operated under that system.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does one man get out a cheque under this system?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is approved by the proper officer in the department, then it is checked by the comptroller and the treasurer. There is no change in the system.

Amendment (Mr. Stevens) negatived: Yeas, 19; Nays, 78.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): The amendment is lost. Shall the resolution carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the resolution, I want the minister to give me the details under (a), the operating deficits for each of the four companies for last year, and the amount spent.

Mr. GRAHAM: I presume my hon. friend wants the figures for last year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am asking for the vote this year and then last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I gave him this year's.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I have it again, please.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Operating deficits on Canadian Government Railways, as estimated, $3,000,000.
Canadian Northern Railway, $2,500,000.
Grand Trunk Railway, (nothing).
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, $4,500,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now, the vote of last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is all in Hansard of some weeks ago.

Canadian Government Railways, $2,496,721.91.
Canadian Northern Railway, $2,946,729.72.
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, $4,292,866.41.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the actual deficit. Will my friend give me the vote last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not got that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked specially for that information and it was sent over by the deputy, but I was told I had to return it again for use here.

Mr. GRAHAM: The estimate for last year was:

Canadian Government Railways, $7,000,000.
Canadian Northern Railway, $5,000,000.
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, $8,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the next, acquisition of property.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not seem to have it in that form.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying to keep it just as simple as possible. I am referring to his own vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: The amount for acquisition of property this year is $2,902,641.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be for all the systems?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. We do not seem to have it in the same form for last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think so. The deputy will know whether the form has been changed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that the form is not quite what it was last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my memory is not wrong, my hon. friend is incorrect in that. The statute reads exactly the same, and the vote was practically the same. These figures are no good at all unless we can have them as they ought to be—comparative figures.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am told that the amount was $2,800,000 for last year. Owing to the amalgamation we have one item this year where we had four before, and by adding the four together we get the amount I have mentioned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I have the figures of the four votes for last year, please?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am told that it was under vote 115 of last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we had better clear that up, because I do not want either to get wrong myself or to start the minister wrong. Now, I have before me item 115 of last year, and as I read it, it is not the item I was referring to. If the minister looks at item 136 of last year he will find that parliament was asked to vote—whether there is anything in it or not I do not know, but I propose to find out—for "acquisition of property, materials and supplies" exactly as we have it this year in the main vote, The item that is now pointed out to me, 115, has to do with miscellaneous railway equipment. Of course, it may be an overlapping. I notice the wording is as follows:

> The assistance herein provided may be by way of advances to the Canadian National Rolling Stock Limited or to any company comprised in the Canadian Northern Railway system, or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system, or by way of equipment or materials acquired by the minister.

What I want is the amount of the appropriation last year under item (b) of vote 136 of last year. It is exactly the same wording as in the item of this year.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend want the details of last year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not asking for the details. I am merely asking for the amounts that parliament was asked to give last year according to the various details of last year's vote. There ought to be no mystery about this.

Mr. GRAHAM: What my hon. friend wants, then, is a comparison between the amounts appropriated in 1922 and in 1923 for the different purposes set out in the item. I have not the details here, but I will get them for my hon. friend. The difficulty is that last year the amounts were in different votes, while this year they are in one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To a certain extent that is quite true, but there cannot be a great deal of difficulty, because the wording in each case is the same and all that has to be done is to keep to the same designations of these different details right through.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will work it out for my hon. friend and let him have it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I also want to know what was spent on each one of these items under last year's vote. That must be there too.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a little difficulty owing to the two systems but we can work it out. I will see that my hon. friend gets it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When shall I get it?

Mr. GRAHAM: We will have it for the first of the week.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does my hon. friend want to do? We have not the information now. What does he suggest? Is there any other item he wants to pass so that the matter could be discussed on that item. This is the last item I believe, and I am afraid the item cannot carry till I get the figures. I shall very likely want to discuss the figures, and this is the only item on which I could discuss the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have several items for Railways and Canals on any one of which my hon. friend could have this discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which one? I thought we had put them all through.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are several items I know of for Railways and Canals and my hon. friend will be at perfect liberty to discuss this on any one of those. We have spent two days on this item and I should like to get it through.

Mr. BELAND: Items 139 and 140 have not passed.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are on item 139 now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Item 140 relates to the merchant marine. That is a different thing.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will not maintain that. We have several votes that have not passed yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think they are all passed. We put through several last night for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two votes for Canals that are not passed yet, the vote for maintenance and the Welland ship canal vote. I will keep that for my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How can this matter be discussed on an item for canals?

Mr. GRAHAM: By consent it could be discussed, of course.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As to that I would say that at an earlier date this session we had a minister who was absolutely anxious, at least so he said, that a certain matter should be discussed, but when the time came he was ruled out of order.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it would not be done again in this case, if we have a distinct understanding.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we have a distinct understanding that letting this item pass will not preclude the fullest discussion upon the item that my hon. friend picks out, No. 118.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which item is that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Item 118. My hon. friend tells me that is open. Then notwithstanding the rules of the House the fullest discussion can take place in connection with these items which my hon. friend now wants to put through, and which I for the purpose of expediting business will not object to passing so long as we have that distinct understanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government would ask the House to give its consent to have that done.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that that is enough.

Mr. MACKENZE KING: We cannot do more.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have had the government asking for consent before, and I remember the position in which the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) found himself. A similar pledge was given in that case but it could not be carried out. Someone objected. It is quite easy for someone to object to this understanding being carried out. It could easily be blocked. It has been done before.

Mr. GRAHAM: Further than that I might say that there will be Supplementary Estimates on which it would be fully open for my hon. friend to discuss anything in connection with this item. There can be no question about that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the best thing I can do is to rely on my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. The understanding is that we let this item go through with the full right to reserve discussion.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.29 p.m.

Monday, June 11, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN PRESS LIMITED

Mr. HEALY:

1. How much money has been paid to the Canadian Press, Limited, since its organization, by the Dominion government?

2. How much of the amounts advanced have been used for (a) leased wires; (b) cable service; (c) other purposes?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: $311,499.99 has been paid to Canadian Press, Limited, made up of $287,499.99 from the grant of $50,000 voted each year since 1917-18 to aid in paying leased wire rentals, and $24,000 on account of the annual grant of $8,000 for cable services, paid since 1920-21 to Canadian Press, Limited, and formerly to the Canadian Associated Press. Statements of disbursements which indicate that the government grants have been allocated to these purposes are submitted regularly.

COST OF LIVING

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the government to hold an inquiry into the present high cost of living in Canada, especially into fuel, food, rents, clothing, bread, and other necessities of life, to include cigarettes, cigars and tobacco and restaurant prices?

2. If the government does not propose to hold such an inquiry, will they empower, this session by law, municipalities, or grand juries lawfully convened throughout Canada, to hold such inquiries so as to protect the public from extortion, and will such concurrent jurisdiction be given in such a local way to deal with the problems?

3. Will the government see that the consumer will get the benefit of any reductions in taxes set out in the budget, and what will be done to protect the consumer accordingly?

Right Hon. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. No.

3. This question does not seem to be of a character that the government could be expected to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my judgment the third question is out of order.

MR. W. A. DRYDEN

Mr. MAYBEE:

1. What amount of money, if any, has been paid by the present government to W. A. Dryden, of Ontario county, Ontario?

2. What was the money paid for?

3. What trips, if any, has Mr. Dryden made at the expense of the Dominion since the present government took office?

4. What benefits have the Dominion obtained from Mr. Dryden's trips at the public expense?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. $2,552.26.

2. Expenses to South America, to investigate live stock conditions, markets, etc., July 17-September 26, 1922, $2,126.76; judging live stock at fairs, February 14, 1922, $32; judging live stock at fairs, February 2, 1923, $32.50; purchase of two shorthorn bulls, March 5, 1923, $360.

3. From July 17 to September 26, 1922, Mr. Dryden visited the South American countries of Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina, for the purpose of looking into live stock conditions in those countries, and the possibilities of a market there for Canadian breeding stock.

4. For some few years Canada's export trade in pure-bred animals to the United States has been gradually falling off, until about a year ago it practically disappeared. A considerable number of breeders made representations to the government to the effect that a market might be found in certain South American countries, particularly Brazil and Argentina, if the Canadian government were willing to undertake the expense of certain shipments, particularly of beef cattle and sheep, to those countries. It was thought advisable to investigate the possibilities of these markets before participating financially in any such enterprise, and, accordingly, Mr. Dryden, whose experience as an importer and exporter of beef cattle and sheep is very well known, was asked to make a trip to South America, visiting particularly these two countries, and, incidentally, Uruguay and Paraguay, to look into these possibilities.

The report prepared by Mr. Dryden indicates his views of the possibilities of the development of such a trade and has been of very considerable value to Canada in indicating the live stock requirements of these countries, and in discussing at first hand the possibilities of the development of such a trade, which, unfortunately, seem to be rather small.

LITTLE GEORGE

Mr. LAVIGUEUR

1. Was the sentence of deportation carried out against Little George? If so, when? If not, why?

2. Is the said Little George the same person who was tried for murder at Quebec, and whose three companions were hanged?

3. Who are the officers of the Immigration department who had charge of Little George when he made his mysterious escape?

4. (a) What means were taken to capture this man, and (b) is it the intention of the department to continue the search?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. No. Escaped.

2. Yes.

3. Guard Carbray.

4. (a) Information at once transmitted to local, permanent and federal police. (b) Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my hon. friend to let this motion stand until the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has had a chance to express his view in regard to it.

Motion stands.

INTERIM SUPPLY—SPECIAL BILL

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the co-operation of the House in the passing of a special Supply Bill. It will be remembered that at an earier stage of the session we adopted resolutions and a bill providing one-sixth of the year's supplies. The two months for which the supply was voted are now expired, and especially in relation to the civil service it is very urgent that we make a further arrangement. I am proposing, and I have mentioned this to my hon .friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), that we adopt the necessary resolutions for a further supply of one-sixth, being two months. I therefore move:

That one-sixth of each of the resolutions reported from the Committee of Supply from the 20th February last to the 8th June instant inclusive, granting to His Majesty amounts voted of the Main Estimates, and forming a total of $34,349,528, be now concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no objection whatever, as I have already told my hon. friend, to his getting his interim supply. He has to have it; the business of the country has to be carried on. The motion will pass subject, of course, to the usual terms, with which my hon. friend is very familiar, that is, that while the money is granted the principle of any vote or the amount of any vote is still open to challenge by the House.

Mr. FIELDING: Surely.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move:

Resolved that one-third of the Resolution reported from Committee of Supply on the 13th April, 1923, providing a provisional bonus allowance for the Inside and Outside Services of the Civil Service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, and forming a total of $1,833,333.33, be now concurred in.

In this case we did not have the one-sixth vote. We are now voting one-third.

Motion agreed to.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move:

That a sum not exceeding $10,375,530.25 being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items not yet voted, as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March, 31, 1924, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, excluding the amount of the second item of Resolution No. 141, "Ottawa, New Departmental Building, $500,000" be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That does not seem to be in accordance with the first resolution as read. The first resolution as read said "one-sixth."

Mr. FIELDING: Oh yes, the Clerks are simply carrying out their duty. The figures will be correct, I am sure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The first resolution as read said an extra sixth of the whole supply.

Mr. FIELDING: We are taking one-sixth of concurrence and the sixth mentioned here. I think the figures are quite right.

Motion agreed to.

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, the sum of $46,558,391.58 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume that is the calculation of the one-sixth.

Mr. FIELDING: I assume so. I have left it to the officials. I am sure the figures can be relied on.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Fielding thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 202 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1924.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—DISMISSAL OF Mlle. BOULAY

On the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) for Committee of Supply.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of the presence of our friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) whom we are all glad to see back in the House with us again, to bring to his attention and to that of the House one of those incidents which, unfortunately, occur from time to time in the administration of public business. I refer to the case of the dismissal of a lady, Mademoiselle Boulay, who was serving apparently with perfect satisfaction to the community, as postmistress in the town of Sayabec. She had the misfortune to be the daughter of a gentleman who formerly represented the constituency of Matane. Mademoiselle Boulay is no longer the postmistress, and I hold in my hand a notification from the Civil Service Commission which shows that a gentleman named Eugène Lacroix has been appointed to that position. At this stage of the session I regret the amount of time that will be necessary even to refer to the most salient portions of the correspondence which will show how Mademoiselle Boulay ceased to be an office holder under this act, and how Mr. Lacroix, apparently through the medium of the Civil Service Commission, became her successor.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Postmaster General): May I interrupt my hon. friend? Does he intend to bring in a motion on this matter? My reason for interrupting is that this is the first intimation I have had of the matter. I have received no notice of it, and I am uninformed at the moment as to the particulars. If my hon. friend is going to terminate his remarks with a motion I wish to ask him if he would have the courtesy to defer it until we go into supply again, say to-morrow. Up to the present I have not had an opportunity to familiarize myself with any of the details.

Mr. BAXTER: I had no intention of concluding my remarks with a motion unless it were necessary as a matter of formal procedure. The hon. member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier) is fully acquainted with the circumstances, and I had him sent for so that he might be present, there being an understanding between us that I would not take the matter up in his absence. With the assurance given by the minister, if he feels that he would be in any way embarrassed by taking the matter up to-day, I will defer it until to-morrow.

Mr. MURPHY: I think I would prefer if the hon. gentleman would allow the matter to stand until to-morrow.

Mr. BAXTER: Very well.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is this a matter of urgent importance? Can it wait for twenty-four hours?

Mr. BAXTER: I have agreed to it being deferred.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

PENSIONS

Pensions—European War and active militia, $32,500,000.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Before this appropriation is passed I think it would be advisable that I should supply the committee with a few figures, showing the number of pensioners in Canada. The pensioners are divided into two classes. One class is made up of disability pensioners, and the other class of dependents. On 31st March, 1923, there were 43,263 disability pensioners; on the same date there were 19,794 dependent pensioners; making 63,057 pensioners in all. The amount paid during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, for European war pensions was $32,032,074. If we include the Fenian Raid pensions, which are also paid by the Pension board, and the general pensions and long service militia pensions, the total expenditure for this purpose for the year 1922-23 was $32,612,242.36. I should be glad, Mr. Chairman, to supply any information which I have before me at the present time and which may be of interest to hon. members. I will give more details in this connection and will give the number of disability pensioners and permanent pensioners in the different districts. They are:

	Disability Pensioners	Permanent Pensioners
Quebec	3,229	903
Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island	2,213	606
Eastern Ontario	2,062	571
Central Ontario	9,559	2,522
Western Ontario	2,846	751
Manitoba	4,173	1,183
Saskatchewan	2,837	936
Alberta	3,673	972
British Columbia	5,410	1,333
New Brunswick	1,268	398

Mr. MANION: Does the second item refer to the militia pensions?

Mr. BELAND: No, the second figure refers to pensions which have been declared permanent by the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MANION: Do those figures include the dependents as well, or just the direct pensioners?

Mr. BELAND: No, they do not include dependents. The total number of people who receive benefits from the pensions, is very large. There are 146,373 people in Canada coming under the benefit of pensions. That includes disability pensioners, and their dependents, and dependent pensioners and their dependents.

Mr. MANION: I take it that there will be a good deal of discussion of the question of pensions, and I think it will be rather difficult to keep separate the matters that refer to pensions and to Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment work. In other words there are cases which, if they were admitted to treatment under the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for disabilities at the front, would, generally speaking, be eligible for pensions. Therefore, there may be some difficulty in separating them. I know that the few remarks I am going to make a little later on will probably combine them. Has the minister any objection to a certain amount of intermingling of these estimates? I suppose what is said in this discussion will not be repeated on the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment estimates. It is very difficult to keep them separate. I make this statement in order to allow the chairman to take a lenient view of it.

Mr. BELAND: At the time I had the honour to submit to the House the estimate in connection with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment I gave a statement of the number of soldiers under treatment. When a soldier is in the hospital his pension is paid to him just the same, and the amount is made up to the amount he would receive if he received full pay and allowance. The amounts I have mentioned refer only to pensions which are awarded by the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada. This amount has no reference whatever to the treatment of patients, or the maintenance of hospitals, or the examination of pensioners, or the examination of soldiers who desire to receive treatment, it simply covers the amount of money awarded to pensioners in Canada, and nothing else.

Mr. TOLMIE: I wish to say a few words in connection with the pensions matter, as the people of my constituency are particularly interested in this work. The Pensions Act has been administered now for a number of years, and we have had an opportunity of discovering a good many flaws in the administration. I do not know that anyone in particular is to blame, but the spirit of the act, I think, has not been carried out in the way that was intended when it was passed. It has been unsatisfactory, not only to those that are directly affected by the working of the act, but also to the public who from one end of Canada to the other, are highly desirous to render the fullest possible service and full justice particularly to those men who went overseas and so nobly fought the battle for this country. We can never hope to compensate them fully for what they have done for us. But we should make every effort possible, to the extent even of our last dollar, to do justice to those men, and not only to see that they are paid proper pensions for their disabilities, but, in addition to that, to aim to restore to them their usefulness, and in that way add to their peace of mind. It is complained by these men that the Pension Act is inconsistent in some ways. In some cases it is said the pensions are entirely inadequate when the disability is taken into consideration. Then again it is complained that in the case of, say, two men affected almost in the same way and to the same extent with regard to their ability to earn a living, one man is paid a much higher pension than the other. It has been claimed also that a man who has had severe head injuries, suffering from extreme nervousness, unable to concentrate his mind on his work, suffering from headaches and dizziness, and unable on that account to hold any position, is given a pension of $5 per month. It is said that one of the principal sufferers is the man who carried on overseas, the man who, though affected with sickness, probably suffering to a certain extent from gas or other causes, still persisted in carrying on his work, with the result that when he arrived on this side, and began to really suffer from the effects of the war, he was unable to show any history of having been under treatment on the other side. Anyone looking at the question from an ordinary business standpoint and under ordinary business conditions, would accept that as evidence that this man suffered from a disability. But his case is turned down because he is unable to show documentary proof of what occurred. Many men, it is claimed, are suffering from an injustice in this country as a result. I will read just one or two cases referred to by certain men in Victoria who have made a careful study of the situation.

This is the case of a man who enlisted on August 10, 1914, and was a prisoner of war in Germany from April 24, 1915, to March, 1918, when he was sent to Holland. He arrived in England December 19, 1918. He had, of course, no medical history sheet. On his arrival in England his only anxiety was to get back to Canada, and for that purpose he declared himself fit. As a matter of fact, the man was greatly run down and had suffered in Germany from severe pains in the abdomen lasting several weeks at a time. He was discharged from the army on May 3, 1919, at Victoria. He suffered continually from gastric trouble. In February, 1922, he went to the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; he was given treatment, but was refused pay and allowances. On applying for pension for which, of course, it should not have been necessary for him to apply, as he should have been examined for pension, he was told that he could not receive a pension because he could not supply medical evidence of his illness in Germany. Subsequently he filed a declaration by a Lieutenant McDowall, who was his officer and who was a prisoner with him in Germany, whose evidence substantiated his statement as to the nature of his illness while a prisoner. This evidence was refused, and he is not yet in receipt of a pension. He is now a physical wreck.

Here is another case of a private who enlisted in Victoria, June 1, 1916. He went to France December 1, 1916, and served twenty-seven months in the trenches. All the time he was not in good health, but he carried on. He was discharged December 19, 1919, as A1. He took up land under the Soldier Settlement Board, but he broke down before going on to the land. He is married and as he says, he thanks God he has no children. He is in very straitened circumstances, and is in very poor health. He has applied to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment from time to time, but he has been refused any amelioration. On December 20, 1919, two months after his discharge, he was admitted to the Jubilee hospital, suffering from gastric ulcers and toxic poisoning, and was extremely ill. The doctor placed him on treatment with pay and allowances. Ottawa refused pay and allowances and subsequently even treatment. On February 10, 1922, after an interval of continuous suffering and treatment by private doctors, who all say that his condition is due to war service, he again applied to the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and the local doctor placed him again in hospital. During this hospital period the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment doctor had all his teeth removed save six, Dr. Arnold, Medical Director of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, directed that he should receive no pay and allowances, and pension also was refused by him. The treatment then continued. On October 18, 1922, the sub-unit office in Victoria asked the Vancouver office for a denture to supply the place of removed teeth. On October 28, 1922, Dr. Proctor, of Vancouver, Medical Director of the "J" Unit, refused to give any denture and ordered that all treatment must cease. The man was then placed in the charity ward, and he subsequently received treatment from the local doctors, out of charity. Here we have the fact of a gallant soldier who wished to carry on and not make a fuss, having his very gallantry used to his detriment by the Pension board, because he reported A1 to get back to Canada. No Pension board ever examined this man. The case was entirely decided by doctors. The man is still suffering severely, but he is doing his best. Naturally enough he cannot compete in the labour market.

The third and last case I have is that of a widow whose first husband was a member of the 16th Battalion. He was killed in action and a pension was granted to his wife and one child. On December 19, 1916, this lady remarried a pay sergeant in the 50th Highlanders who, owing to bad sight, was not allowed to go to either England or France. By him she had one child. Whilst at Willows camp, Victoria, this sergeant contracted pneumonia, and subsequently contracted influenza, and he had to leave the service. Later on he contracted tuberculosis and died of tuberculosis in February, 1922. According to doctors' statements in Victoria, this showed a clear case of continuity from the tuberculosis to the pneumonia contracted on service. Nevertheless she was refused a pension because she cannot produce evidence that her husband contracted tuberculosis whilst on service, or any evidence of the nature or possible cause of the disability which led to his death. This information should have been on the man's military papers and medical history sheet; but no such documents in his case can be found, and the evidence goes to show that they were probably burnt up in the fire which took place at the Work Point barracks. The widow is at present living on charity, with her two children. She still draws a small pension for the first child.

These are cases, not only of lives lost, but of lives ruined as the result of the war. If it was not the intention of the Pension Act to meet just such cases as I have cited, what did we pass that act through the House for? In my opinion, it was passed for the purpose of relieving just such cases as these, and in the administration of the act more elasticity will have to be given or great injustice will be done to men who deserve much better treatment. These complaints are coming in, not by ones or twos, but by hundreds, and I am informed that if the resolution proposed by the minister takes the form of legislation later on, no fewer than 10,000 cases on appeal will be presented for his decision. It is quite clear then that the act under present conditions is not fulfilling its mission. The people have waited and asked for reform; they have been very patient; they have given a great deal of time for the carrying out of the administration of this act so as to enable little discrepancies to be overcome. But results have not been reassuring as might be expected, and consequently we find that the people in some sections now are getting very much excited over the condition of affairs. On June 29 last, a very representative mass meeting was held in Victoria, British Columbia. At that meeting the following bodies were represented: Liberal Association, Independent Order of Foresters, Trades and Labour Council, the Council of the municipality of Oak Bay, the Council of the municipality of Esquimalt, the Kumtuks Club, Gyro Club, Rotary Club, Kiwanis Club, Army and Navy Veterans, Women's Conservative Association, Grand Army of United Veterans, Salvation Army, Navy League, Chamber of Commerce, Conservative Association, Women's Canadian Club, Canadian Club, Young Mens Christian Association, Saanich Council, Tubercular Veterans Association and British Campaigners. Among those present were the Bishop of Columbia, and Father Wood representing St. Andrews Cathedral. This meeting was also a very representative one of the principal citizens of Victoria, and at it the following resolution was passed by a unanimous standing vote:

> Whereas the findings of the Royal Commission on Pensions constitute a grave indictment of the Pension board in their administration of the Pension board and shows that the members thereof are unfitted to fairly administer the act:
> Resolved, that in the opinion of this meeting of representative public men and women of Victoria, the government forthwith take the necessary steps to remove the members of the Pension board from office:
> And further, be it resolved that copies of this resolution be sent to the Premier, members of the Cabinet and members for British Columbia in the Senate and House of Commons.

This was a non-political gathering, and I am very well acquainted with a large number of those who were present on that occasion. The gentleman who acted as chairman is the editor of the Liberal newspaper in Victoria. The resolution was moved by the Lord Bishop of British Columbia and seconded by the secretary of the Trades and Labour Council. Since that time I have received a wire from the Canadian Club, the Chamber of Commerce, the Rotary, the Kiwanis and the Gyro Clubs, besides soldier organizations, which have all either endorsed the resolution or forwarded similar resolutions asking for reform. This will indicate that the feeling is general throughout that section of Canada, and it clearly shows that there is a very urgent demand for immediate reform. The principal speaker of the evening on the occasion in question was Major Twigg, a soldier who had been overseas and a lawyer of considerable ability. He claimed that seventy-five per cent of the returned soldier cases in which applications were made for pensions never reached the board at all but were settled by doctors, and that in many cases, where fifty per cent disability had been recommended by doctors, only twenty per cent was allowed by the board. He declared that there was apparent an effort to practise economy at the expense of the men. I quote the following from a newspaper report of the meeting:

> Mr. Twigg took up various phases of the pensions question. A woman whose husband died from cancer five minutes before the official end of the war, said he, would be given a pension by the Board; while one whose husband died five minutes after the hour set down would not. The pension board took the stand that the statute was there and had to be enforced, and asked whether he thought that the board was following out the intention of parliament in regard to the above-mentioned situation, the head of the board had said, "I think so."

Another quotation from the address of Major Twigg is as follows:

> Mr. Twigg cited the case of a man gassed at Ypres. He had been a big husky chap before the war. Gassed, he had reported to the doctor that he could not stop coughing. The doctor said, "Everybody's coughing; carry on," and the man had carried on, no record being made on his medical history sheet. Bronchial pneumonia developed, and the man spent a long period in hospitals. Finally he asked for a pension. He was refused treatment, refused pay and allowances, and refused pensions because no mention of his being gassed had been made on the medical history sheet. The man was now dying because of the decision of the pension board, and the worry accompanying his efforts to care for his family. The men who carried on without running to the doctor every time anything was the matter with them were the ones who suffered in the matter of pensions. The men who always went to the doctor had medical history sheet evidence. Pension after pension had been refused because men had no evidence on their medical history sheet to prove that their disabilities had come from service.

Major Twigg also claimed that although the 1920 amendments were held by the board to refer to the permanent force, in reality they were manipulated to cover men who had been overseas. It was claimed that this was at the bottom of the agitation throughout Canada. Speaking of the proposed resolution Major Twigg reminded the audience that it was not so much that the law was at fault as that the administration was to blame. This criticism of the Pension board was dispassionately presented. And, as I have stated, I am acquainted with a great many of those who were at the meeting and know them to be leading citizens and not firebrands. Their one aim was to do justice to the returned soldiers. We must remember that the returned soldier did not stop to bargain with us when called upon to go overseas but gallantly joined the forces. He set aside all business or other arrangements, his hopes were all sidetracked, and he subordinated his ambition and his desires to the impulse to render service to his country. We feel therefore that these men, having left their dependents at home under these circumstances, should receive justice now at the hands of the country. In my opinion they are entitled to the very last dollar which it is reasonably within our ability to pay them. When a gathering of the kind I have described passes a drastic resolution such as I have read, it indicates how acute the conditions are and how necessary it is that immediate action should be taken.

I can quite understand the difficulties of a board of this character, who have a vast variety of cases presented to them and who naturally desire to keep within the law. But if they have not the power now, then they certainly should be given that power, to apply a certain degree of elasticity to their administration of the act. In my opinion what is required is good judgment tempered with sympathy and mercy in all cases.

It is quite apparent from what I have quoted that the Pension Act is not achieving just exactly what we had expected, and the matter is too serious to be allowed to drift any longer. I am very glad indeed to note that the minister has presented to the House certain resolutions which promise to afford relief in the directions complained of; and so far as I can see, before the question has been debated, I think they should tend to make the situation very much better than it is now.

As regards the administration of the act, clearly it was the desire of the House representing the people of Canada, when that act was passed, to take care of just such cases as I have mentioned, and hundreds of others that have been sidetracked simply because they could not comply with some little technicality in the law. It would be far better to give the act a much broader interpretation, even at the expense possibly of overpaying some fellows who might be inclined to fake, than 4 p.m. by too great stringency to rob hundreds of men and their dependents of the pensions that are justly due them under the law as it stands now. We cannot be too merciful or too sympathetic or considerate in cases of this kind. As I have said before, these young men when they joined the colours to go overseas parted with their family connections and renounced the prospects that they had seen ahead of them. No doubt many of them had had a vision of that point of efficiency, after certain years of hard work, at which they would be able to establish themselves, to marry and settle down in homes of their own. Many of them have come back badly maimed, some physically, others mentally, with the result that they find themselves unable to make a living and with all their hopes for a bright and happy future entirely gone by the board. These cases should receive the most careful attention, and I am sure it is the wish of the Canadian people from one end of the country to the other to render them justice in the fullest possible measure.

Mr. ROBICHAUD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, if there is an instance where the distribution of the public funds should be carried out with the utmost fairness, it is certainly when the question arises of granting to those disabled in the Great War a pecuniary help in compensation for the sacrifices they made for civilization. Ever since my Difficulties in interpretation have arisen election to this House, numerous claims have been submitted to me by the dependents of the heroes who gave up their lives on the battlefields, and by those who have come to end their days in this country, burdened with infirmities due to wounds received in the war. Many have given me to understand that their cases had not been taken up by the Commission in charge of the distribution of these public funds. I have here the claim of a mother of a family from the County of Gloucester, whose son, her only support, lost his life on the battlefields. After making inquiries, the Secretary of the Commission on Pensions, informed me that the case of Mrs. Albert—that is her name—had not reached the Commission. In the second paragraph of this letter, which is signed by Mr. Davis, we come across the following lines:

No application for pension was filed on behalf of Mrs. Albert prior to your letter of the 10th of March last. Immediately that was received the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was requested to obtain a properly completed application to investigate and report upon the case. This request is dated March 14th.

You may judge, Mr. Chairman, by this communication received from the Secretary of the Commission, that the full responsibility and care devolve upon the soldiers' dependents to acquaint the Commission of their rights.

It seems to me that in the remote parts of the country, as for instance in the back parishes of my county, these dependents should receive the necessary information so as to facilitate the task of placing their claims before the Commission.

In another instance, a farmer of my county, a Mr. Comeau, belonging to the parish of Petit Rocher is liable to lose his farm, which is already heavily mortgaged. An official came to him and made him sign a declaration that the crop on his farm was sufficient for the support of his family and that moreover he had, each year, a net balance of $300. When I made inquiries in regard to the matter, I was able to ascertain that instead of a net balance of $300 per year, this farmer had only sold $300 worth of products during the year. He had to meet from the above income rather heavy taxes as well as the interest on his mortgage. He is advancing in age, his health is on the decline and he will soon become a public charge unless help is extended to him. Now, how does it happen that these farmers, these heads of families having given what is most precious to them, their sons, in defence of this country, should be required to sign documents void of truth? I have made inquiries on the subject, and if I am well informed, it appears that these good people are at the mercy of these investigators and are not in a position to understand the purport of the statement which is required of them. That is why I have requested from the hon. minister, and I again make this request from my seat, that a French-speaking official, be sent into my county so as to make an inquiry into each case and thus do what is right towards those whose sacrifice was great in the war.

The correspondence received on the subject is very voluminous. I might read it out and give the committee an idea of the different claims that I have received, however, I hope this will not be necessary, and that with the hon. minister's help and the commissioners' good will, the demands of ex-service men, having taken part in the Great War or their dependents will be taken under consideration and that justice will be dealt out to them. I strongly insist that each interested person should receive the necessary forms and instructions so as to enable him to put in his claims. It seems to me unfair to insert in the statutes of our country laws governing the disabled in the Great War and to force upon these good people the burden of putting into practice the different regulations enacted in their favour by the Dominion government. If for example, circular letters were addressed to each of these soldiers or their dependents, explaining or giving a synopsis of the act, it would help in making the administration of the act easier. I trust that this suggestion will be taken into serious consideration and that the disabled in the Great War not only from my county but from all the counties of Canada will be thoroughly informed on this matter and that in future we may witness a little more fairness in the distribution of the public funds.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, the condition this year in respect to the consideration of the pensions estimates is very different from what it was last session. Since last session a royal commission has been appointed to look into the matter of pensions and soldiers' civil re-establishment; that commission has made two reports to the minister and we understand that the minister will present amendments to the Pension Act and the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act bearing on the recommendations embodied in those reports. When the resolutions come before the committee these matters may more suitably be discussed; indeed, it is difficult to say anything regarding pensions without to some extent discussing the changes it is proposed to make by the amendments. But in the meantime I would like to say this in connection with the Pension Act. These difficulties in interpretation have given rise to much dissatisfaction and trouble among returned men and disturbance in the country generally, and therefore I would suggest to the minister that one matter of outstanding importance in the amendments to the act that he will bring before us is that there be absolute clearness in their wording. One great advantage it seems to me in having these amendments brought down is that there is now a great hope of our obtaining a substantial settlement of the difficulties that have so disturbed the overseas men and the country in the matter of pensions and soldiers' civil re-establishment. I think that we have before us a distinct prospect of an opportunity to end all the principal difficulties. No amendment, of course, will ever ensure to us a complete and satisfactory solution of all the difficulties, but I do think there is an opportunity now of producing a condition of satisfaction and contentment among the returned men that we have not yet reached, and certainly one way will be to avoid any such difficulties as we have had in the past in interpreting the meaning of the act.

I might also say that so far as I have been able to learn the opinions of the returned men, should the subject of the recommendations of the royal commission be carried out by the minister in his resolution which he will bring before the House, it will secure a condition of satisfaction and contentment among the returned men.

While we are on the subject of pensions I would like to take this opportunity of referring to the difficulties which a number of applicants for pensions have in getting their cases fully investigated and their claims adequately met. I have been recently informed that through the efforts of the Great War Veterans' Association about six hundred cases have received substantial pension adjustment in the past twelve months. If that be the case, and I have been assured that it is, it shows that there is a difficulty in applicants securing a full investigation of their claims at the outset, and that it has required a further effort and assistance through an organization to have their claims fully and forcibly presented so that they have now obtained a better treatment than they were accorded at the outset. This number does not include minor adjustments that have been obtained, but as I said before, there are six hundred applicants who after their cases had been taken up through the organization of the Great War Veterans' Association have received substantial pension adjustments. That is a point which I bring forward as one of those important in the future, so that we may enable those who claim pensions to obtain what is their due with a reasonable amount of facility. I have no doubt there are many claims presented of an exaggerated character, but clearly these are not of that character because they have been granted finally.

There is one particular case that I wish to bring to the attention of the committee which bears on the same subject. It is that of a nursing sister who in her early childhood had a severe injury to her hip, from which she duly recovered. She was passed as fit in Canada and again passed as fit in England, and proceeded to France. She was in the Expeditionary Force from the 12th April, 1915, to the 1st July, 1919. During this time she served in France for three years and nine months, an unusually long period for service in France, and rendered excellent service. While in France her hip became troublesome, but not sufficiently to interfere with her duties, and she carried on. On her return to Canada she served as a nurse in one of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment hospitals, but after a time her hip became still more troublesome and she was obliged to leave the service. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment decided that it was not advisable for her to continue further her duties, suffering as she was from the condition of her hip, having the view that it would increase further her disability. She received a vocational training in typewriting. She received also four per cent disability, for an aggravation of disability, which amounted to $100. You will observe that she was discharged from the hospital as unfit for duty. Her application for pension was declined. On one letter sent to the Pension board asking for pension was a marginal note from one of the medical advisers stating:

> This lady was in charge of the surgical ward of which I was the medical officer in charge in the fall of 1915, and to my personal knowledge had an obvious disability. (Difficulty in walking.)

You will observe that the term "obvious disability" occurs in the act. It is one of those conditions which preclude one from obtaining a pension; that is, if anyone goes to France suffering from an obvious disability, that is the bar against receiving a pension. Now this statement is made on the margin of her letter, and I cannot help thinking that that is a bar against receiving a pension.

of that kind. It is a very important statement in the records of this case, and I think it might well have been a formal statement of evidence. However, there were two interpretations which might be put upon it: One was that the medical officer had seen the sister with a disability, and that it had occurred during service in France, and therefore that it was evidence in favour of her getting a pension. The other was, that it was an obvious disability which she brought with her to France, and therefore precluded her from pension. Apparently the latter view was the one taken. I would submit that here is a case where evidence of such a character was put on the file without any indication being given to the applicant.—the applicant knew nothing about it. The Board of Pension Commissioners do not write to the claimant stating "Here is a statement, do you wish to submit further evidence of your condition on arrival in France." That had not been done. In other words in this case the nursing sister has not had the opportunity of meeting evidence of the character referred to, if she were in a position to do so. As a matter of fact she can produce medical certificates showing that she was fit when she proceeded to France. I quote that as an instance where, I think, the case has not received full investigation. It is also an illustration of the necessity of informing the applicant for a a pension when additional facts are forthcoming so that the applicant can take proper action in the matter if he or she is in a position to do so. At the present moment I do not propose saying anything further on the question of pensions beyond this: I think it is clear that in the amendments which the House will adopt later on, we should provide that claims for pensions should be thoroughly investigated and carefully looked into for the protection of the claimants, as well as for the protection of the country.

Mr. MICHAUD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few remarks to those just made by my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). On different occasions we have had to complain of the employees or agents sent by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to our purely Acadian centres, in parts where English is not understood, and the good people of these counties found difficulty in submitting their cases to those agents. I trust that the hon. minister will take under consideration our requests and that in the future we shall have in that part of the country agents who at least understand the French language. With reference to pensions, many cases were referred to in this House. Among those I have here, there is one which I especially wish to submit to you. It is the case of Mr. Ferguson, of the town of Campbellton, who is now blind and unable to earn his living.. He has to support his wife and receives no help whatsoever, except from one of his daughters, who is soon to be married. Mr. Ferguson is really in need of his country's help. His son, the only child who could have supported him, died on the battlefields. I would therefore ask the minister to consider again this case, for I have already had the opportunity of submitting it to the commission on two different occasions. I hope that the minister will grant my request and that we shall obtain fair play in this particular case.

Mr. MANION: At this late date in the session, and at this stage of the proceedings, I do not wish to take up very much of the time of the House. Nevertheless, there are a few remarks that I wish to make in regard to pensions which I think are appropriate upon this occasion. It is a very difficult position to be in to discuss the workings of the Board of Pension Commissioners, for the reason that one who looks at the affairs of the country—at the tens of thousands of people who are receiving pensions, and at the millions of dollars which are annually being spent upon pensions—must feel that the task of the pension commissioners is a very difficult one. I do not wish in any way, under those circumstances, to be in the least unfair to the Pension board. I wish to preface my remarks by recognizing that they have a very difficult position, that they often have brought before them unfair and unreasonable demands and requests which are difficult to give effect to and which if given effect to on many occasions the commissioners would feel that they were not doing justice by the country. At the same time, I have had many dealings with the Board of Pension Commisioners in the past year, and in other years, and—speaking entirely for myself and not on behalf of any organization—at times it has appeared to me that the commisisoners have shown a little too great a desire for efficiency, and, perhaps, too little sympathy toward the cases coming before them. By sympathy I do not mean a foolish sentimentality, but that spirit of sympathy which is really meant to be inherent in the Pension Act. In other words, it has appeared to me sometimes that there is too much of an inclination on the part of the board and its officers to live up to the letter, rather than the spirit of the law. In saying that I wish to point out that there is no personal gain for the commissioners in refusing a pension to any man. No doubt, as is mentioned in the report of the royal commission, the pension commissioners could make themselves very popular to-day among the returned soldiers by granting pensions without proper consideration. At the same time they have appeared to me at times to be a little too strict; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is better for them to err on the side of leniency than that injustices should at any time be done to the returned men. I submit, Sir, it is better, to my mind, that ten people should get pensions that do not deserve them, or that ten people should get treatment in the hospitals who do not deserve that treatment, than that one just case should be refused. I submit, in support of my statement as to a lack of sympathy—I do not say an entire lack of sympathy by any means, but at times there has been a certain lack of sympathy—the report of the royal commission. Again and again in this report the commissioners point out very much the very same conclusion as I myself arrived at before I ever read the report. For example at page 128—I do not wish to quote the statement itself because I do not desire to extend my remarks—they point out that very fact—that at times the Pension board has been "unsympathetic in its attitude." That is a synopsis of what they say; at different places in the report they point that out. I believe what the people of this country want is fairness towards the men, and after fairness has been carried out in every possible way then they want economy, but not till then. My hon friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacLaren) pointed out the fact that the changed decisions proved very often that the case had not been properly considered by the board. I had a case recently where the decision was changed. The applicant in that case was a British Columbia man and his brother was a friend of mine. For that reason I took up the case but left it entirely with the Board of Pension Commissioners. I gave the board nothing but the man's own statement and the statements of medical men who had seen him. The board turned the applicant down repeatedly, but frankly his representations were so persistent, that at last I got to the stage where I threw his letters in the wastepaper basket. I heard about the case the other day. I received notice from the Board of Pension Commissioners, after I had excused them to him to the best of my ability, that they had granted him a pension. Well, there is something wrong, it seems to me, in a case like that, when they took so long to come to a decision. I do not know what it is, but it would appear to me that there was an error made in that case, which put me in a wrong light with the man, because I did not argue the case from any personal knowledge which I occasionally do, on account of having had a medical training and meeting a good many returned men. In that case I did not use these arguments at all, because I did not know the case. But it must have been about two years after I took up the case that the decision was changed and he got a pension. That illustrates to me that there was something wrong in handling the case in the first place. Whose fault it was I do not know. I think that case should have been given a little more consideration earlier, and that it should not have been delayed for a period of pretty nearly two years.

I might refer to another feature in this report on pensions—and I am not fond of recriminating—that practically all the severe tightening of the reins which has taken place has occurred within the last year, and I say that because I well remember that during the last election the Prime Minister, particularly—and I regret that he is not in his seat when I say this—travelled around the country pointing out that if he came to power the returned men would receive better treatment than they had been receiving. As a matter of fact, according to this report, whatever tightening up of the reins has taken place has practically taken place within the last year. I have read of very many cases quoted by the Ralston report in which that statement is borne out, but I do not wish to take up time now in reading them.

I will illustrate my other remarks by reference to another case, though in a sense it deals more with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment than the Department of Pensions. I took the case up about a year ago with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The name of the man was Charles McAvella. He had lived in my rdiing, but not in my city. He Came to me, and after looking over the man and listening to his history, I ascertained that he had a severe disease of the bone of the leg, what is called in medical parlance osteomyelitis He had been injured while in uniform, serving in Port Arthur. He was in the hospital a couple of weeks, got better, went overseas, served a couple of years, and was discharged as fit; and then a year later the disease broke out. He used up all the money he had, something like $2,500, in medical attendance in Winnipeg and other places. He was a married man and a fine type of fellow. He was finally up against it and he asked help from the department, and was refused on the ground—and it was very fair ground in a general way, as a large percentage of the reasoning was in favour of their decision—that there was no connection between the original injury which had taken place four or five years before and the present condition, which made him a permanent cripple—and he will be a cripple the rest of his life, even if he does not lose his leg. I was approached by some of his friends and I took up the matter with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and in my opinion there was a marked possibility of connection between the original injury and the present condition. I wrote to the board and they replied to me that they had already made a decision, they had other medical opinion stating that his condition was not due to the injury. I had a good deal of sympathy with him, because I felt there was a fair chance that his condition was due to the injury. I took him before a well-known medical man, Dr. M. B. Dean, who has been practising in my city twenty years, and he wrote out an opinion taking absolutely the same attitude as I have taken. In spite of that, the treatment was refused. I gave up the fight, but recently the Port Arthur Great War Veterans' Association wrote me and told me this man was in the hospital, depending absolutely on charity, and they thought the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment should reconsider its decision. I again took up the matter, and the minister possibly might remember, in the multitude of letters which he receives, that I wrote him in regard to it, and I have a couple of letters on file from him. The reason I mention this matter is because the minister made a statement based on the information given him by his officials which statement was wrong. The statement was to this effect: I find that all medical reports agree that his present disability could not reasonably be attributed to his service.

I do not blame the minister. He was simply reporting what his officers told him. That statement was made to the minister, despite the fact that I put on record the opinion of a very good medical man—to say nothing of my own opinion, although I do not know that I offered my opinion medically; I know that I sent in the report of Dr. M. B. Dean, as a medical opinion. In spite of that the officers of the department advised the minister, as he informed me, that no medical opinion agreeing that his present disability could reasonably be attributed to his service had been received. That was an absolute misstatement of fact. I then wrote to two doctors in Toronto, and I have on file the opinion of one of them. I gave him the facts of this case and when I mention his name I think all hon. members in this House will know of him, because he is probably the most outstanding surgeon in Canada. I refer to Herbert A. Bruce of Toronto. I told him the facts of the case, and I have his letter, a copy of which I shall send to the minister. He said:

> Although the case you refer to evidently had no suppuration at the time of the original injury, I think one would be justified in considering that there is a very reasonable probability of the present osteomyelitis being due to the former injury.

I would consider Dr. Bruce's opinion a better opinion than that of any man in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; I would consider it a better opinion than that of any doctor or adviser on the pension board—certainly as good anyway. I think I am safe in saying that. He was for many years professor of surgery in the University of Toronto, and he has not only a national but an international reputation. The minister might ask me why I did not send the letter to him. The reason I did not send it is that at the bottom of the letter he points out—and very courteously too—

> I intend to discuss the case with Dr. Arnold shortly. We will go a long way to meet your views.

I was waiting for a further reply. I might well have sent it across to the minister, but I thought it was a good document to illustrate my contention that at times the Board of Pension Commissioners and the officers of the Department of Soldiers' Re-establishment live up a little too much to the letter of the law;—I am endeavouring to be as moderate in my language as I possibly can, because I consider they have a difficult position, and I do not wish to make it more difficult. I know they have a very hard row to hoe, and I do not wish to make it any harder or to put this country in for millions of unnecessary expense. But I believe that in many cases the Board of Pension Commissioners and the officers of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment could give treatment or pension at not very great increase in cost to the people of the country, and give better satisfaction than has been given in cases such as the one I have mentioned. I make this statement in the House because

I wish to impress these facts not only upon the minister, but upon the commissioners and other officers in the fairest way I possibly can, and yet I wish to impress them strongly enough, so that possibly they may have some effect in bringing about a great deal more satisfaction than has been evidenced by some of the complaints made by the Great War Veterans' Associations and the various soldier organizations. I am doing it with that object entirely and no other.

I wish to offer two other suggestions before I close, and I make these suggestions because the minister will present shortly recommendations of change in the Pension Act. I offer two suggestions which have been put up to me by a returned officer, which, I think, are very good suggestions, and which I think might possibly be dealt with by the minister when bringing in his amendments to the Pension Act.

He pointed out that if the widow of a man who was killed at the front is receiving a pension and she marries again, her pension automatically ceases. That is all right. He says: "Supposing her second husband dies within a reasonable time, she does not get a pension again," and he points out that in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, which is on the statute books to-day, even in such a case as that a woman on application would have an opportunity of being replaced on the pension list. I have thought the matter over, and I can see no real argument against the same condition being applied to the Pension Act in the case of the widow of the man who has served overseas. This would appear to me to be a just request. He quotes the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, section 56, subsection 2, and I will quote it:

> If the widow remarries, her pension shall be suspended from the day following that of her remarriage. If in the event of her again becoming a widow her pension may be restored if she is otherwise qualified.

I quote that for the information of the minister. That is a suggestion that should, at least, receive consideration.

The other case, which to my mind is more unjust, I have taken up in this House before. It is the case of a woman who lived with her husband, a returned man, who is seriously injured, and who is receiving a pension because of his injuries, or she and her family are receiving pensions because of his injuries. He for some reason—let us suppose it is because he gets into trouble with the police—leaves the country. He does not dare to come back, or for some reason he does not come back. He deserts her; no matter what the reason may be; he leaves her at any rate. Because he does not return at the end of six months and appear before the medical board to be examined, her pension and that of her children are cut off, the idea being that since the man does not return,—it is not a permanent pension, according to the expression used by the minister and therefore it is cut off. I believe some method must be worked out to do justice to women and children who are placed in that situation. I am sure it is not the desire of anybody in this country that the wife and children of a man who served overseas and who was seriously injured over there should suffer, if we can possibly prevent that, even at a great deal of expense to this country. I want to lay that case before the minister in order that he and his officials, when he brings in these amendments, may consider the possibility of bringing in some amendment to cover such a case as that.

Those are all the suggestions I have at the present moment. I did not mean to speak quite so long; but I have laid the facts before the minister because they are of great importance, and I hope they will be of some benefit to him and his commissioners and to the men who went overseas and their dependents.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As representing a constituency in which there are resident a very large number of returned men, I should like simply to endorse what has been just said by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion). It seems to me that we should have the most generous treatment possible as regards the returned men. It is not necessary to go into the recommendations of the pension commission. The returned men feel very strongly on this matter, and I think they have just ground for feeling that their cases have often not received from the present board the consideration that is due to them. Just as illustrating the feeling of the returned men across the country, I should like to read a resolution which was passed by the Manitoba Provincial Executive of the Great War Veterans on May 12, 1923:

> This command views with great dismay and surprise the action of the Board of Pension Commissioners with reference to the report of the first part of the investigation into pensions made by the Royal Commission on the charges made by the Great War Veterans' Association. In view of the conduct and attitude of the board, indicating that it does not intend to carry out the administrative recommendations of the Royal Commission and in view of the previous mental attitude of the board, which shows, combined with its present conduct, that it is unfitted to administer the Pension Act,

Therefore be it resolved that the government ask for the resignation of the whole board, including the secretary, and if the resignation is not received that the government remove the board and secretary by statutory action.

I read that simply to place before the committee what seems to be the considered opinion of a very important section of the returned men. Unless the Pension board can in some way obtain another ideal of their duty, as the last speaker has said, can, perhaps, not so much emphasize the exact letter of the law as rather to endeavour to give expression to the spirit of the Canadian people in dealing with these returned men, I do not know whether they are the men to administer even the amendments which we hope will be forthcoming in the near future. We are a little bit at a loss at this time in not having the recommendations of the minister before us. When those come, I hope they will be found to make such changes in the act as to leave no doubt as to its interpretation, and that this may be along the line of more generous treatment to those men.

Mr. LADNER: The question before the committee is, perhaps, one of the most important matters which could engage our attention this session. It is important because it relates to a time when very strong and passionate emotions were aroused during the war, and appeals, such as we have not listened to for many years, were made to the manhood of Canada to respond to the call of their country and to place their all on the altar of this Dominion and of this Empire. Almost nine years have passed by since the commencement of that terrible conflict; five years have passed since the war has been concluded, and to-day we are still dealing with many of the pension cases, doubtful cases which, either by the administration of the Pension board or by the enactments of parliament, are found to be suffering an injustice. We are now, of course, considering pension estimates. There will come a time very shortly when the minister brings down his bill in amendment to the Pension Act, when we can discuss the concrete proposals for remedying the injustices and for arranging to adjust the many cases which have come before every member of this House.

In my observations of proceedings in this House during the past two years, it has seemed to me that on matters of this kind, a little too much apathy and a little too much reluctance has been shown by the members in taking the initiative as leaders of public thought in this country, and that soldiers' organizations and the public at large instead have been obliged to stir up the members of this House to bring about remedies and to force the appointment of a royal commission. Various reasons may be given for that. A parliamentary committee sat last year, and if my recollection is correct, all the recommendations of that committee were not carried out, although many should have been carried out at that time. What is the result? The result to-day—and it is a fact which no hon. member will deny—is that from Vancouver to Halifax there is dissatisfaction on this question of pensions, on the administration of the act, and on the state of the law as we find it. I do not think there is any hon. member in this House who will deny that statement: we are all receiving letters and resolutions of one kind and another advocating extreme measures to remedy the situation. What has been responsible for this dissatisfaction? In my judgment, the impression has got abroad —and that there is some truth in it, I do not doubt—that this dissatisfaction is due to a lack of sympathy on the part of the Board of Pension Commissioners. And I make that statement, not rashly, but after having had personal dealings with the board. I do not suggest that they have not acted conscientiously and in the light of their best judgment, but the results show that many cases are decided in which the element of sympathy is absolutely lacking. Then the charge is made that the administration of the act has been at fault, or that unsound procedure has been followed; and I believe that the Ralston commission, as there is ample evidence to show, fairly well upholds these contentions.

There is also an objection to the law as originally framed. When the act was passed there was established a principle that practically amounted to a contract between the soldier body of the country and the country itself, but the law has been so changed as to deprive many men or their dependents of the pensions they should otherwise receive. Last year it was my good fortune to have the opportunity of participating in the debates in this House when pension matters were under consideration. At that time, as will be seen at page 3453 of Hansard, I suggested to the House in committee certain specific amendments dealing with the very difficulties with which this House is faced to-day. My amendments related to section 11 and section 25, subsection 3. I sought to induce the House to re-establish the insurance principle so that one part of our soldier body would not be awarded pensions on one principle while another section of that body were given pensions on a different principle but one much less advantageous. In the reports a difference is made between what is known as the insurance principle and the "due to service" principle. So that after September 20 you find a line of demarcation. Before that day men and their dependents had a much greater opportunity of getting pensions than they have had thereafter. Last year, therefore, I asked the House and the government to accept the insurance principle, and to that end I moved an amendment to section 11 for the purpose of re-establishing the law as it was in 1919. Unfortunately, however neither the government nor the House saw fit to accept that amendment. The Ralston commission, after extensive investigation, has now brought down its report favouring the re-establishment of the insurance principle. My purpose in dwelling on the subject to-day is to urge upon the government and the minister not only the expediency, but the wisdom and justice—indeed, the sacred duty of themselves and of parliament—to adopt an amendment at this session to bring about this end.

I wish to call the attention of the minister to the fact that, in accordance with the report of last year, section 33, subsection 1, was amended in order to remedy an unfortunate evil which then existed. But the Senate rejected the amendment. This section as it stands to-day apparently prevents the payment of pensions to widows who were married subsequently to the appearance of disability causing death. The Board of Pension Commissioners has taken the stand that no latitude in the interpretation of the section is permissible. I would point out, however, that provision could reasonably be made in some instances where disability was incurred during service but did not become apparent until after marriage. I would also remind the House that a parliamentary committee during the session of 1922 recommended to the House a very satisfactory amendment to the section. The report of the committee was adopted and an amending bill to that end was passed in the latter part of the session. But the amendment was deleted in the Senate and the bill was referred back to the House and adopted in the form amended in the other Chamber. I trust that the minister on this occasion will remedy that situation.

I would call to the attention of the government their own obligation in connection with these different amendments and in relation to recommendations that have been embodied in the Ralston report. Prior to the election of 1921 the Great War Veterans' Association submitted to the various leaders of the parties engaged in that contest specific questions which those gentlemen were asked to answer in order that the great soldier body might know to what extent the leaders and their respective parties would go if returned to power. At that time the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was one of those who received these questions. He made a general answer in which he gave expression to a statement the thought and sentiment of which finds great favour with me, and which I think creates an obligation on the part of the government that I trust they will realize and discharge at this session. Speaking at Cobalt on November 20, 1921, the right hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

5 p.m.

> "Our duty to the returned men, their dependents, and the dependents of those who have not come back, is clear," Mr. King stated. "It is a demand that we treat their requests with generosity, which is more than mere justice. To the men who sacrificed their all in the fight for freedom we owe all the freedom we have to-day; though we default the interest on the national debt (which would mean national bankruptcy), we cannot afford to let one of our returned men or their dependents suffer."

That is a very fine and noble sentiment. But sentiment is not very useful to men and women in this country who are to-day walking the streets without the wherewithal to provide the necessities of life. The responsibility for improving this situation actually rests upon the government to-day, in view of the statement I have just quoted, and I suggest to the government and to the minister that, when the amendments to the Pensions Act are brought down, they remember their sacred pledge given on that occasion, and take advantage of the recommendations which have been made after investigation in the Ralston report. I trust that we may have amendments to the act which will do justice to the many cases, knowledge of which every member of the House has in his possession, which have not been provided for either because of some technicality in the law, or of faulty procedure in the administration of the act, or of some inefficiency in the department. I am not of course for a moment making any general charge in that regard. But there are instances where cases have been decided differently on the same set of facts.

I wish to take advantage of this occasion to offer to the minister some suggestions that have been made to me by different organizations. The first is that the pensions of orphans be increased from $30 to $45 per month. A number of organizations believe that increase is necessary, and I personally think the additional expenditure involved would not be so serious as to weigh against the advantages which would accrue to the children by the increase. Another matter—I am citing these because they are not ordinarily reviewed in the discussion of this question—is this: It is urged that provision be made to meet the cost of burial of widows, widowed mothers and pensioned children. These requests have been submitted to the department, and I wish to urge upon the government the justice of accepting them; I know the minister is very sympathetic and will look into them carefully. Another question which can properly be considered here is one which was dealt with by the special committee on pensions last session, namely, the helplessness allowance for soldiers who have become totally blinded as the result of service overseas. These men, in addition to their pension, receive a helplessness allowance. Those who are able to go out upon the streets are in need of a guide. The practise of the department is to allow these men, I think, $25 a month or a little more, which is not sufficient to provide that necessary assistance, and the result is that when these men walk upon the streets—I know of concrete cases in Vancouver, they fall over wheelbarrows, trip over ropes and excavations where the streets are being repaired, and in general suffer many inconveniences and difficulties through their disabilities. Their complaint is best set out in the words of one of the men, Mr. A. Baron Taylor, in a letter addressed to myself, to which communications from some of these organizations are attached. He says:

> I certainly think that we are entitled to at least two-thirds of the maximum—
> The maximum is $75 a month.
> —for it is acknowledged that blindness is the most pitiable of war disabilities, yet we receive less than one-half the maximum allowance, despite the fact that each may be blessed with trench foot pains or shattered nerves. I trust that I have made the situation clear on this point.
> Another thing that vitally affects some of us is the fact that our wives, on becoming widows, receive no pension because of marrying after the disability was incurred. This, to me, is a gross insult to both parties concerned, for it immediately puts the sacred marriage on a commercial base and has the tendency to class the wife as a prostitute. Will you kindly remember these points when the debate reopens.

I consider it my duty to make a plea on behalf of these men who are suffering from this disability and for whom the helplessness allowance is not sufficient to provide the assistance they so much need.

Mr. POWER: Is it not a fact that the helplessness allowance is $750 a year?

Mr. LADNER: That is the maximum, given to a man, for example, who is blind and who has both arms off or both legs off. That is a case where an attendant is required all the time, at the man's side; but when a blinded man is able to walk out upon the streets he gets only a portion of that allowance. My contention is that the purpose is to provide the necessary help for a blinded man to enable him to get along the street. I do not think the allowance should be cut in two simply because a man is able to walk outside instead of being always fed from a tray, and so on; the idea is to enable him to get along the street in comparative safety.

Mr. POWER: Has a certain scale been established—so much for a walking patient and so much for a patient confined to the house?

Mr. LADNER: Yes, they draw distinctions between certain classes of patients.

Mr. BELAND: Does my hon. friend not think that a pensioner who receives $900 a year and besides that a helplessness allowance of $750 is able to provide someone to attend upon him in the house and accompany him when he goes out in the street?

Mr. LADNER: Quite so, but that is not the point of my contention.

Mr. BELAND: I do not catch the hon. gentleman's point, then.

Mr. LADNER: The blinded man who is able to walk along the street does not receive the full helplessness allowance of $750.

Mr. BELAND: He may receive it.

Mr. LADNER: The information I have is that he receives about $25 a month or slightly more. This man says in his letter that he wants to get a least two-thirds of the maximum. He ought to know—he is one of them.

Mr. POWER: What is his disability?

Mr. LADNER: Total blindness; and he is connected with some organization. He says:

> I certainly think that we are entitled to at least two-thirds of the maximum.

And so on. As I say, I understand they get about $25 a month.

Mr. BELAND: The helplessness allowance is left to the discretion of the Board of Pension Commissioners. As my hon. friend knows, it may be not less than $250 a year and not more than $750. It is for the board to judge what allowance should be awarded to a man who is helpless on account of blindness. I understand they must award the maximum in the case of a man receiving the full pension of $75 a month, or $900 a year; that would be an additional $750 a year to enable him to have assistance in the house as well as outside. We have married men working in the department for $750 a year. I am sure it is possible for a full pensioner to secure the services that he requires when he receives the amounts I have stated, particularly when it is a case of not preparing his meals but serving them and accompanying him on the street. I may say that the regulations of the department provide for free transportation to totally blinded soldiers twice or three times a year. I am only stating the condition as it is; of course, my hon. friend may be able to suggest better treatment.

Mr. LADNER: This matter was thoroughly discussed before the special committee of last year: I was not on the committee but I was present, and followed these points closely. The difficulty is that the board do exercise their judgment, but they exercise it on this basis: They say that if a man is totally blind and is not, for instance, able to look after himself at all—cannot get his food for himself but has to sit in a chair and have an attendant constantly waiting upon him—the disability is more severe than that of a blinded man who can walk outside and proceed along the street. They maintain that a man who can walk around the street, even though totally blind, should not receive the maximum allowance. Now, that is an argument; it is logical; it is a lawyer's argument. And the trouble with the Pension board is that they have carried logic and the law so far into their administration that injustices have resulted and do result. My suggestion is that what they should regard is not this relationship between one man who is totally incapacitated and another man who can walk about the streets, but the need that the man has in order to accomplish the purpose of his activities. For example in the one case he requires help to feed him. He has to sit down and he requires someone to look after him, and they pay him $75 a month. In the other case the man should have the right to walk about the streets even if it is necessary to pay two-thirds of the allowance or $50 a month as they say here, to get a child or somebody to guide him by the hand. The main consideration of the Pension board in that case should be the taking of the man on to the streets, and if they have to pay $50 a month to get someone to do it they should pay it. In other words they have figured out the relationship between the two on the wrong principle. If the Pension board say that that is the legal interpretation, and they must persist in doing it and will not do it in any other way—and I have found them uncommonly stubborn in matters of that kind—what is the remedy? The responsibility is on the government and parliament to say: If you will administer the law that way, we will have to change our laws so that you will administer them in some other way. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the minister to-day because I certainly intend to deal with it later at another opportunity.

I would like before taking my seat to refer to one or two actual cases. A number of men have spoken of such cases, and it is a splendid way to illustrate the operation of the act. All of us have a great many of these cases. In this particular case I am not specially attaching any blame to the minister of the department, but I am attaching blame to the Pension board, and its administration, to its lack of sympathy. The facts show the need of certain amendments in the law. I have one case which I might cite by way of an example largely because the applicant is resident in Ottawa and the evidence was available in Ottawa. It is the case of Mrs. Florence G. White, whose husband died of malignant cancer at Christie Street hospital in Toronto, in July, 1921. It was a case of carcinoma, I believe the doctors call it. This man served overseas. He was a married man with a family. He went overseas and in June or July of 1918 he was shot down while flying over the German lines. In falling he was hurt somewhat. He was made a prisoner in Germany and I believe he had to eat many things there which in a number of other cases have been known to cause cancer. As a result of his experiences he came back to Canada and about the time of his discharge he returned to his position in the Marine department in this city. He came back to Canada in June, 1919, was discharged July 16, and returned to the Marine department August 6. At the time of his return to Canada he informed a number of people, responsible people whose word is worth something, that he was constantly suffering pain in the region of his abdomen where the cancer developed, and from a pull of the leg when he was going upstairs. The doctors of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment diagnosed it as appendicitis and treated this case of malignant cancer as appendicitis. They took him to hospital, and finally he had to relinquish his position with the department. First of all, he had taken a few days off from his job, informing a high official in the government that he was constantly suffering from this pain and would like to be released. All these facts were sworn to in affidavits and filed with the Pension board. This man went to St. Luke's hospital in June, 1920, and the doctors of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment operated on him and found that instead of appendicitis he had cancer. They had to get consent before a subsequent operation could be performed, and he was sewed up temporarily and was later on operated on again and finally died. That was, of course, a case of attributability due to the change in the pension law.

Mr. BELAND: When did he die?

Mr. LADNER: In July, 1921. We proved by a number of the very best witnesses you could possibly find all the facts that were relevant and were available to be proved, showing that the man suffered from pain, and the position, and everything absolutely dovetailed with the cancer pains which afterwards became more severe.

Mr. POWER: Was he discharged as fit or unfit?

Mr. LADNER: I do not know the exact category in which he was discharged. At any rate, I believe reference was made in one of the reports to the pains. Of course, the pains might have been something else. After this the case was presented to the Board of Pension Commissioners, but unfortunately all the facts which a lawyer would know were relevant and pertinent to proving the case were not given to the Pension board. The matter was brought to my attention and I got affidavits and prepared a statement of the case and placed it before the board. I found that the board refused to reconsider their position, and I also found out as a lawyer of some years' experience in my practice the real procedure that the Pension board carried out and the reason why a great number of injustices have been done in this country. You have on that board a lawyer, a doctor or two doctors, and somebody else. I laid the evidence before this body which exercises final judicial authority. I said: There are the facts for the plaintiff's case, here you have the facts for the department; now on what grounds do you refuse to reconsider this case? On one particular point on which three different people swore to a fact which bore directly upon the case, one of the commissioners said to me, "Why, Mr. Ladner, that is not so." I said: "How do you know it is not so?" He replied: "As a doctor I know that things like that practically never happen." He took the inference of his medical mind to perform the duty of a judicial mind, with the result that he simply refused to listen to anything in the way of these facts sworn to in the affidavits and said, "In my opinion this did not happen." It appears that carcinoma or cancer does not often happen from a blow but from some other cause, but it might easily have happened in Germany when he was a prisoner there. But the board refused to reconsider the case. I then took all the facts and a new statement of the case and placed it before the pension section of the parliamentary committee of last session. Some hon. members present will remember the case. We had quite a heated discussion. We had present Col. Thompson, Dr. Burgess, Mr. Paton and a number of other officials. The evidence was all gone over again, and I pointed out that the board were in fact exercising a judicial function and that they should carry out their duties in accordance with established principles of evidence, that they should not go by inference, guesswork or medical theories, but by the evidence before them, and on that score we had the evidence. The committee on pensions appreciated that point and came to the decision that the board was wrong and that it should reverse its finding and grant the pension. A communication was formally sent to them but the medical member of the board said "We have made up our minds on this case and we are going to stick to it, we will not change." Now, in my opinion, as a lawyer of some years standing and practice before the bar—having heard the members of the committee discuss this case, having seen the prepared evidence—we actually had the applicant, her mother, her son and another witness present before the committee to give verbal evidence and be subject to a cross-examination if desired—in my opinion the committee absolutely failed, and the Pension board absolutely failed, to carry out the fundamentals of judicial procedure; and in that respect I must commend the minister for suggesting in the resolution he has brought forward that something in the nature of appeal boards should be provided to which people such as this applicant can go, so that their whole life's work and interest shall not be finally determined by somebody who obstinately clings to his own view of the case. Take the case of a Chinaman in the matter of an ordinary contract or debt or the case of an ordinary vegetable man out West and there is a contract involved of, say, $150, why that man can go to the Supreme Court of Canada and there are at his disposal the finest trained judiciary of the country, and all the common law precedents, and he can have justice. But when a case goes before the Pension board it is pronounced upon by men some without legal training. They come to their conclusion and whatever reasons to the contrary are advanced those reasons are overborne and it is hopeless to do anything further for the applicants. In that respect I for one am frank to say that I would like to see a change in the law by which it would be possible to get justice done outside the Pension board as it is administered to-day.

In this case,—the White case—what were the consequences? This lady is a widow with a child at school. She had had two serious operations. She was denied by the doctors the right of carrying on her occupation as a nurse, she had no other means of earning a livelihood, she had to take her son from school and put him to work and she herself had to earn whatever she could. The husband in this case gave his life for his country, and yet the son is denied the opportunity of getting the education which he otherwise might have got. So that in the administration and practices of the Pension board we not only have the actual consequences of a pension not being paid, but also the effects of that action upon the families concerned for a generation and perhaps two generations to come. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are other cases that I might cite but I will merely mention the names because the particulars are all on file. There is the case from Vancouver of Captain H. A. Langford in which all the particulars have been placed before the department. There is another case, that of E. N. Couch, living in South Vancouver, which is quite involved and which depends largely upon the question of attributability.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the question of pensions is a matter which should engage the attention of every single member of this House. I do not believe that we as members have the right to feel any apathy with respect to it, and I hope that when the amendments to the Pension Act come down they will contain practically all of the recommendations that are embodied in the Ralston report, and that a means will be found of rectifying the injustices which have been disclosed in the actual administration and in the procedure of the Pension board.

Mr. MILLAR: I shall be very brief in my observations to the committee at this time, but at a later date when the amendments to the Pension Act are discussed I may have more to say. I suppose that Canada has been a little negligent of the welfare of her returned soldiers. In this respect history is only repeating itself. That seems to have been the case in all countries and after all wars. Nevertheless in comparison with other countries and with other periods, I think Canada, perhaps, has a good record. Still, I believe there have been some cases of injustice, and perhaps that is to be expected

The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) has referred to the position of the Pension board. I can understand that in dealing with returned soldiers distributed all over Canada, and receiving reports from a great distance and from doctors whom the board does not know, and some of whom are very persistent in advancing claims on behalf of their patients, the board feel that they must be very firm in order to protect the country from being imposed upon. In the constituency I have the honour to represent there are no very large centres of population, and perhaps, that is the reason why very few specific charges against the board have reached me. Yet in a general way there have been several complaints, and it would certainly seem that there are a goodly number of men who have not been well treated. It seems rather sad too when such a spectacle as was witnessed by the people of my own town last week occurred. That was the sight of two returned men, each of whom had lost a leg, on their way at the present time from Calgary to Ottawa in order to lay their complaint before the proper officials there.

Reference has been made to the fact that during the last few years the reins have been somewhat tightened, but that, I think, is only to be expected. I do not think we can attribute the fact to the change of government. The same thing has occurred in connection with the Soldier Settlement board. Having been imposed upon in the early years of their history it is quite natural that the pendulum should have swung in the other direction and, perhaps, swung too far. Probably that is what has taken place in connection with the Pension board. I should like to say that I have received several telegrams in which the desire is expressed that the recommendations of the Ralston commission be put into effect. I think if I read a few words from one of these communications it will express what is conveyed in the others. I find in one telegram these words:

> To get immediate action taken which will give effect to the findings of the Royal commission, as we have in this province a large number of urgent, necessitous cases affected thereby.

I only wish to say further in connection with the returned soldiers—particularly those who are maimed or crippled—that while it is time that Canada practise every economy I do not think this is a direction in which it should be done. I should like to see the most generous treatment towards these men—in fact the treatment should be very generous before I could demur in any way to the expenditure for this purpose.

Mr. MacKELVIE: This, perhaps may be the appropriate time to interject a remark or two of a slightly different tenor regarding the operations of the Pension board—and I may add the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment as well. Everybody's judgment, to be of any value in cases of this kind, must be based on observation; and while for the last three years I have had a very considerable number of cases to take before these two boards I am very much pleased indeed this afternoon to be able to state unreservedly to the House, that not only have I received from them the most courteous treatment and prompt consideration but my experience has been that they have leaned always towards a sympathetic interpretation of the law. I can only say what I have found myself. In the last week I had occasion to take up a case with the Pension board, and there was some doubt in my own mind as to how they should act. Greatly to my delight, and somewhat to my surprise, the matter was settled almost immediately. A telegram was despatched to my constituency conveying certain instructions, and the claims of the applicant were met and met very promptly.

I would hold up both hands for any change in the act which would give a more generous treatment, if possible, to our returned men, and I would support unreservedly any features of the Ralston report which have that end in view. I wish to say that none of the criticisms which have been levelled against the administration of the Pension board in my opinion is well grounded. This may not be a popular view to express; I know that a great many people take a different view. Many associations of soldiers seem to imagine that they are receiving entirely unsympathetic treatment. I can only judge by what I know, and I have not found that to be the case. The same remark applies to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. I have carried some appeals to that body to a successful conclusion and in a manner that gave me satisfaction. Most of my work in connection with the Soldier Settlement Board has been carried on through the secretary, Mr. Paton, and I have found him an efficient officer. He has been always most obliging, and has rendered me service quite equal to that which I could reasonably expect from any government official of any department. I would like to see the act enlarged in any possible way that will give better and more generous treatment to those who so richly deserve it, but I do not like to have this discussion closed without saying a word in commendation of men whom I have found to be very efficient and courteous.

Mr. SHAW: Numerous complaints which have been forwarded to members of parliament during the course of the last two or three years must, I am sure, have been received with some sense of apprehension. I believe that it was for the purpose of securing finality in connection with pension problems that last year this parliament authorized a twofold investigation; an investigation first for the purpose of inquiring into certain definite charges made, and, secondly, for the purpose of investigating, examining and figuring out the best possible way to meet any grievances that might exist.

In this connection I am satisfied that the people of Canada desire that the fullest justice should be done to the returned soldiers. I think that the people of Canada, too, have some reason to be grateful to the soldiers' organizations which have brought before the public at large the questions involved. I think that Mr. MacNeil, who has given so generously of his time and of his efforts, deserves the thanks of the people of Canada for bringing, as he has ably done, before the commission the consideration of various problems which were under their purview.

With regard to the first part of the investigation, it appears that the Ralston commission have found the charges well-founded, except in so far as the charges covering the matter of conspiracy and lack of good faith were concerned. With regard to the second part of the report, I regret that it has not been distributed so that it is impossible to know, except from newspaper reports, the nature of the recommendations which have been made. I am hopeful—and I am sure the minister in presenting his pensions recommendations to the House, will see to it—that these will have as their purpose the desire to give the fullest justice to returned soldiers. I am satisfied the people of Canada will be satisfied with nothing else. We need, I think, speed and efficiency in consideration of these problems. We need justice in their disposition. It occurs to me that, perhaps, something may be accomplished if we strive for, not only simplification of the work of the pension department, but also unification. I have been somewhat surprised by the formula through which the pension applicant must go before he can have his case determined. I do not know whether it has occurred to the minister—I presume it has—but it seems to me there should be some method by which these two principal organizations that we have now, the Pension board on the one hand and the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment on the other, might well be placed under one head, in order that the work might be co-ordinated, and that there might be greater speed. I think this might assist, to some slight extent in securing the justice which the people of Canada desire should be given to every pension applicant. I propose to have something further to say when the legislation comes before the House.

Mr. MANION: What percentage of those who are blind receive the full allowance of $750 per annum?

Mr. BELAND: I am not in a position to supply the information as to the exact number of blind soldiers who receive the full amount but I would think a large majority, if not all, receive it. I must congratulate hon. members first of all upon the moderate tone which has prevailed during the discussion. It was expected indeed that the discussion would be conducted in that spirit.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is it intended to close the discussion with the minister's remarks?

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend might speak now. I would rather wait till all the members have expressed their views before I sum them up, as it were, and indicate what the action of the government is likely to be.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I will make a few remarks in this connection, but when the legislation comes up I desire to speak more fully. I think I am speaking as one who perhaps has dealt with more cases than most individual members in the House. I hold in my hand the papers relating to the cases I have dealt with during this session. I think the bundle of papers I have here would be a fair representation of the work of one member with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. These cases cover ex-service men from California to the Yukon and from the Pacific to the Atlantic. There may be one reason why I, perhaps, receive more applications than other members, and that is the fact that I was largely in touch with the medical work at the front. The number of cases will speak for the work of the board.

I am not out to "knock" the board altogether. I can criticize it and criticize it severely, but I doubt if you could get any other board that would do any better, because one of the most difficult duties I know of, connected with the administration of any department of the government is the endeavour to give satisfaction to the ex-service men.

I would like to bring one or two matters to the attention of the minister to-day and the first is the difficulties in connection with these cases. Eighty per cent of these cases of complaint are due to poor presentation of the case at the beginning. The ex-service man has had some medical officer, who is not thoroughly acquainted with ex-service conditions or with the pension system in general to deal with his case. In these cases I find that the large majority of the difficulties are due to a poor presentation of the case at the beginning. Can the board or department escape criticism in connection with these cases? I do not think they can, because my criticism of the board is, perhaps, largely lack of sympathy, that they do not assist a man in the presentation of his case. Let me exemplify that in one or two cases.

I came in touch with an ex-service man named Dumais, who had cancer in the pelvic region. He received no assistance whatever from the board. When I met the man I said to him: "Have you any history of sickness during your service?" "No, nothing whatever; I was never in a hospital during my service." "Have you any history of an injury?" "No." I said, "Think." He said, "I never thought of it before; during my service a horse kicked me exactly in this place, and I lay in my lines for three days without making any report." It seems strange that during all this time no person in the department suggested to him the history of an accident. Unfortunately that man died six days after I spoke to him. He had no relief; he had no benefit whatever. I am positive that the history of that man's cancer began with the injury he received on service. That is only one of a number of cases in which the board failed, and in those cases they failed to sympathize with the men's condition.

Let me give another example where, I think, they have fallen down and where any board might fall down, but I am giving this as a practical illustration how they can pull up on those cases. There is in the city of Kingston a man who has a history of illness, gas and so on all through the service. This man is now in a mental condition. He drives a cart. He gets off the cart and the cart goes one way and he goes the other. That mental condition, I am satisfied, is due to the man's service and conditions affecting him overseas. He may have been in a slightly demented condition before; but he was accepted in that condition, and he went overseas. What did the department do? They were not satisfied as to the report of the medical officer at Kingston; and bear in mind that there are eight or nine medical men there. If they are not fit to carry out their duties, they should be removed and somebody else put in their place. That has been done lately; but that is not a criticism. They took this man from Kingston to Toronto, and they put him before a man who examined him for one day, and who said: "There is nothing wrong with that fellow," and the only explanation given to the man or rather to his wife is: "Cannot you go out and work and help?" That is the kind of sympathy that men are getting in some cases from officers connected with the department.

There is a third criticism that I have of the board. A man who has a slight disability comes before them; they, perhaps, pension him along for a while, and later on they may bring him up before one of those specialists they speak about. They say to the man: "We will give you $200 to settle your case." That is ridiculous, and it is the harshest way of dealing with a man that I know of. They are simply trying to clear off the country's responsibility to this man by paying him $100 or $200. If a man has a disability at all, his pension should continue with that disability. If he has no disability, he should be told that he has none, instead of an effort being made to buy him off. That sort of thing has been done too much by both governments, and I am not going to criticize one government more than the other. When the man was discharged he was brought up for examination and one question that was put to him was "Are you satisfied?" They expected to clear off the responsibility of the government or the state or the country to that ex-service man by the answer to that question. Fortunately that has fallen down. The department, however, are doing the same thing to-day; they are trying to buy men off with $100 or $200, because they think these men have no disability at all. They should be straight and above board with these men and meet them and say: "You have no disability; we are representing the state in this matter; we have no responsibility in your case, and therefore we are going to discharge you."

Mr. POWER: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that commutation of pensions was brought in at the request of the soldiers' organizations and in spite of the Pension board some two or three years ago?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am not going to accept that as a reason for buying off a man. I do not care who brought this in, whether it was soldiers' organizations or anyone else. My contention is that this is not a fair way of dealing with a man. Commutation of pension is a different thing altogether from giving this trivial pittance to a man to buy him off. A man may commute his pension; that has been done, and the country has suffered because a man has come back afterwards. That, however, is a different question. What I am speaking of is the effort to buy a man off saying: "Sign this and we are done with you." He may come back later on, and they put this document up to him and say "You signed this and we are done with you.

These are two or three difficulties with which I have to deal in connection with cases that have come before me. I may say that I have secured satisfaction for ex-service men in 70 per cent of the cases with which I have had to deal, and that is pretty fair dealing; but in all of those cases the board had decided against the man in one way or another. When the case was properly put up, this requiring the work of a medical man to go thoroughly over the case, review it and bring it to a certain point, the man would get reasonable consideration; but this is work that, perhaps, somebody else should not have to do. All the same, I criticize the board along the lines I have mentioned but I doubt if any other board would do any better.

On the other hand, we have just as many criticisms with regards to people who are receiving pensions but who are not entitled to them and for that reason we should be very careful not to throw the board down so that the state or the country may suffer. What we want is a fair deal, a good honest board. What is my recommendation to this end? It is that if you want satisfaction in these cases, you must have men who can give you satisfaction, and I do not believe the medical men doing the work to-day are big enough for the job. You must go out and get the biggest men in the country and pay them decent salaries. If you do that, I think the country will be satisfied and will say: "Well, they have done all they can anyway to meet these men." I know men are on the board for service overseas and so on; but the biggest medical men in Canada were overseas and I think their services could be secured. You must make sure that you get big enough men to deal properly with the questions that are brought before them by doctors from the smaller places, and you must pay them reasonable salaries. That is my main criticism, and I think this criticism that comes from many centres will be met if you secure big men as advisers to the board and pay them reasonable salaries.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have just a few words to say with regard to the item before the committee. I am fully aware of the very difficult position which the Pension board occupies. The members of this board have to consider very many serious cases, a number of which I have cognizance of myself. I agree with the remark of my hon. friend who spoke this afternoon (Mr. Ladner), that if the board is a judicial body it does not always act in a judicial manner. Numerous cases come before the board for consideration, and I have noticed within the last year or so that it has been becoming increasingly difficult for any man to get consideration at their hands. I am not in any way adversely criticising the board, but there are a few discrepancies in the act which I think the present minister might very well take into consideration.

I want to submit two or three cases that show that in some cases the board has been somewhat unjust to pensioners. I would refer the minister first of all to pensioner No. 666,734 who had a permanent disability of five per cent recorded on initial examination. This meant a pension for himself and family of $7.50 a month. On September 28, 1920, he was informed by the board that he could have his pension commuted to a lump sum of $300 in cash. This, of course, is not a large amount, in comparison with the enormous sums which this House considers at various times but it is nevertheless of considerable significance to the individual who gets it. In this case the complaint is not in regard to the meagreness of the amount involved, but the apparent injustice that has been done the pensioner. The sum of $300 was allowed him as a commutation for a five per cent permanent disability pension. I wish the minister clearly to understand that the disability was recorded as permanent. This man decided that he would not commute the pension but would continue to draw $84 per annum or thereabouts instead of taking the single payment of $300. In 1922, in the month of January, or eighteen months afterwards, he was summoned to Toronto, where he was examined, and was informed that his disability would be reduced to three per cent. Naturally, he was very much surprised at this, because his discharge papers distinctly showed that he had a five per cent permanent disability. The fact, however, was that the disability was reduced to three per cent and he was told that he would be given a cash payment of $75 and be discharged. Now, the man was not at all unfair. He said he would be perfectly willing, if the board would grant it, to accept the balance to make up $300. He stated to the board that he had refused the commutation of $300 in the mistaken belief that he had a five per cent permanent disability which would entitle him to a pension for the rest of his life. The matter was taken up by the board who granted him another hearing in Toronto; and that second board confirmed the previous decision reducing the disability to three per cent. I had the man examined in Milton by local doctors who gave him a certificate of over five per cent disability. But the board came to the conclusion that local men did not understand the case. They therefore decided to appoint a man of their own in Toronto, a specialist named Clarence Starr, who examined the pensioner and gave him a certificate of between five and ten per cent, thus increasing the amount of disability which he had in his favour in the first instance. The matter was then placed before the board for reconsideration. After considering it, they decided that the initial examination on which the man was granted five per cent permanent disability, carrying the commutation award of $300 in cash, was wrong. They refused any relief. This is a case in which the board absolutely refused to accept the certificate of independent medical men who examined the man, and rejected the certificate of their own appointee in Toronto, a specialist, I might almost say, of national standing. The point I want to impress upon the minister is this: Instead of basing their decision on the evidence submitted to them, they acted, so to speak, as witnesses in their own behalf and gave a verdict on their own evidence. They were not fair to the man in refusing to accept the independent evidence submitted to them, and in constituting themselves, not, as they were in fact, a judicial body, but witnesses in a cause.

I have another case to bring to the attention of the minister; the regimental number is 438489. I do not make any statement against the board in regard to this case, which is a very unfortunate one. It is that of a soldier who went overseas, served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force during the whole war, came back to the city of Port Arthur and took ill there in the summer of 1922. There was no possible way of connecting his illness with his service; at least they could get no evidence to connect it. The point is that this man was suffering from cerebro-spinal meningitis of infectious origin. In fact, it was stated to be of syphilitic origin. He was sent to an asylum in Toronto and his wife was left penniless in Port Arthur. She was sent down to her sister in the county of Halton; that is how the case came to my attention. The sister was the wife of a returned soldier who had no means of supporting this woman; he was on a small farm which he had purchased under the federal land settlement scheme. The woman was dying of tuberculosis. Both these persons have since died, and they received nothing whatever from the government to assist them, although the husband had served during the whole of the war and the wife had gone to work in order to maintain herself in his absence. I must say that the Pension board has nothing to do with this case, but there is something wrong with the Pension Act or the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act when it allows a pensioner and the wife of a pensioner to depend on charity for their subsistence. This was a very unfortunate case, the wife dying of tuberculosis and the husband dying of syphilitic spinal meningitis, having previously been dependent entirely on charity.

Mr. BELAND: I may point out that under clause 12 of the act the board has discretion in such a case to award a pension if the soldier or his dependents are in a dependent condition.

Mr. ANDERSON: I took this case up with the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment board here in Ottawa and also with the Pension board. I pointed out the peculiar circumstances in which these people were situated, and directed attention to the fact that they had failed to get any assistance whatever. The Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment board claimed that he did not come under their jurisdiction and that they could do nothing in the way of treatment, and the Pension board absolutely refused to grant a pension. They said the matter did not come under their purview; that they were unable under the Pension Act to give any assistance to this very dependent wife who, suffering from tuberculosis, was dying at the time. I cannot quite understand the statement of the minister, having regard to statements of the Pension board in this case.

Mr. BELAND: I may say in this connection that the department has treated and is treating now many soldiers suffering from syphilitic affections. That is so far as the department is concerned; so far as pension is concerned, naturally that would come under the Pension board. I will read to my hon. friend section 12 of the act:

> A pension shall not be awarded when the death or disability of the member of the forces was due to improper conduct as herein defined; provided that the commission may—

The commission "may".

> —when the applicant is in a dependent condition, award such pension as it deems fit in the circumstances.

So the board has full discretionary power in a case of that kind to award a pension to the widow or to the wife of the soldier.

Mr. ANDERSON: The case was placed squarely before the board, and they claimed that his disability was not due to his service, and that he was therefore not entitled to any pension; and the same was said of the dependent wife. Of course, they do not need it now; there is none of the family left.

Another case I wish to bring to the attention of the minister has to do with regimental number 663,242, pension number 106,-363. This man served overseas as a private, returned, was rated as having a pensionable disability and was receiving a pension of $7 a month. He has not been able to do a single day's work since he returned toward the end of 1918: during all this time he has been dependent on his family. He had apparently a peculiar disability, one in connection with which no pathological change could be found. Having received his pension up to January, 1922, he was asked to go to Toronto for treatment. He remained in hospital in Toronto from January, 1922, until May 5, 1922, receiving treatment. He was then discharged from hospital; the doctor told him he could do nothing further for him. Shortly after returning to his home he was notified that his pension had been discontinued. In October I made a further application on his behalf and on October 9 he was returned to the hospital in Toronto for treatment. He remained there for four days, from the 9th to the 13th of October, when, claiming that he could not stand the treatment he was being given, he voluntarily left the hospital and went home.

A report was then sent in to the Pension board, but they still refused to reinstate his pension. I have taken the matter up with the board on several occasions and they maintain that this man's pension cannot be reinstated unless he submits to further examination and treatment. The claim is made that although this man has been under the doctor's care for over a year, there has been an absolute failure to diagnose his case and to establish any pensionable disability, although the Pension board admit that he is entitled to a pension. Simply because he refuses to return for examination and treatment he is prevented from drawing that pension. I have tried to prevail upon him to return for treatment and consideration of his case, but he refuses to do so, and consequently he is penalized on that ground.

Mr. BELAND: For what reason does he refuse treatment?

Mr. ANDERSON: Because, he says, the treatment he received has not done him any good and the treatment he received on the last occasion he was there was so severe that he was unable to stand it. He claims that when he left the hospital he was scarcely able to walk owing to the pain which had been induced by the treatments given. His family now refuse to allow him to return. I think this is a case that might well be looked into by the minister and given serious consideration.

I have one other case to submit—and I may say that these are only a few of the cases which have come to my attention. A soldier who enlisted in 1914 was sent to Valcartier camp and was there only a short time when he contracted cerebro-spinal meningitis and was sent to hospital. During the attack of cerebro-spinal meningitis he contracted pneumonia. He was in hospital there during all the time the soldiers were at Valcartier, and for some time after they left. I cannot give his number; there was no record of his number or of his service; it was very difficult to find out anything about him so far as the records of the department were concerned. This man was a member of the 5th Field Company, Canadian Engineers. This is a letter from Mr. W. L. Malcolm:

> He proceeded with us to Valcartier camp on or about August 16, 1914. While at the camp and while under my command Sapper W. L. Mullin contracted spinal meningitis, later followed by pneumonia. He was in hospital in Quebec for a very long period, being there after the camp at Valcartier had been cleared. Later I understood that he returned to Acton, but of his later movements I am not aware.

This man, then, had meningitis, on the statement of his commanding officer. When this matter was first taken up before the commission, they declined to accept the evidence that was presented of spinal meningitis, but finally I got this letter from Colonel Malcolm. The letter is dated December 21, 1922, and says:

> The history of meningitis while on service is not confirmed by records, nor at the time it occurred is there any record of there being a spinal meningitis epidemic. It is true an outburst occurred subsequently in the ranks of the C.E.F.

I remember distinctly hearing that there was an outbreak of spinal meningitis while the soldiers were at Valcartier camp. This does not agree with the statement of the Pension board, but later on apparently they got further evidence and they said:

> This man enlisted on August 17, 1914. He took sick on September 24, 1914, at Valcartier camp and was admitted to hospital on the same date with a diagnosis of cerebro-spinal meningitis. He left hospital against the advice of the medical officer in charge and signed a waiver releasing the public from any responsibility for further care or treatment, or liability claim.

On that statement signed by this soldier the Pension board in the first instance based their statement that he was not eligible for pension. During the time after his discharge on the 15th of January, 1915, he was living in the town of Acton and was under treatment by a doctor there who has since died. There was a period of four or five years with no record of this man's disease from any medical officer so far as could be discovered. In 1921, on August 9, six years and seven months later, this man was taken very seriously ill. Previous to being taken ill he had been married, in 1918, I think it was. He had applied for life insurance, and when making his application for life insurance the examining physician discovered that he had a mitral insufficiency, that is a heart lesion, resulting as he said from endo-carditis. In 1921, six years after this man's discharge, he had a very serious attack of endo-carditis. He was attacked with embolism and was examined by three physicians, and died after consultation. Application was made by his widow for a pension and each of these three physicians, well known in that vicinity, gave a certificate that this man died from cerebral embolism produced by heart lesion which they claimed was the result of cerebro-spinal meningitis suffered in 1914. This was brought to the attention of the board, but the board refused a pension on the ground that cerebro-spinal meningitis rarely if ever caused a heart lesion but they forgot that this soldier also suffered from an attack of pneumonia at the same time as he was stricken with spinal meningitis. Now it is a well-known fact that spinal meningitis is an infectious disease and that it sometimes results in the formation of pus, particularly about the ear. We know also that pneumonia very frequently results in impaired heart action, particularly pneumonia that results from some specific poison. After pneumonia, during an attack of la grippe, a heart lesion is quite frequent because pneumonia that results from a specific poison is not ordinary pneumonia, and it leaves the patient with an impaired and faulty heart action which, if it is severe enough, may result in embolism causing sudden death. The minister will understand that. Cerebro-spinal meningitis we know from history rarely causes a heart lesion, that is endo-carditis, but it has been known to occur. These gentlemen of the board absolutely refused to accept the certificates of the three medical attendants who saw this man and refused a pension on the ground that his disability and his death were not due to anything that occurred during service, that his disability did not result from his service to the country and they claim that from 1915 when he returned home up to the time this disease was discovered by the doctor examining him for insurance there is a period of something like five years as to which there is no evidence that the man suffered from anything. But the point is that the doctor who attended him during those years is dead, and we cannot present evidence for that period, but there is the evidence of the three medical gentlemen who attended him at the time of his death. The doctors of the Pension board, who never saw this man, and who knew nothing about the circumstances except what is furnished by the evidence, refused to accept that evidence as a judicial board and say their own deductions are better than the opinions of the man who saw this case.

Those are the points I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I think the board at the present time is not giving the soldier that sympathetic consideration and treatment which parliament intended when the act was passed. They are entirely dependent upon a technical reading of the act. They are administering the letter of the law and missing its spirit, and I think if there is anything needed by which these men could see their duty a little more plainly, if these little technicalities were removed from the act, it would be much more easy for the Pension board and a great deal more satisfactory for the soldier, particularly the man who desires to get consideration some time after his discharge from the army on account of a disability appearing after his discharge.

There is one other point I wish to bring to the consideration of the minister and it is this: Many of these men were discharged from the army without a proper medical examination, and many of them were discharged as physically fit who had some disability resulting from war service and which is unknown to the department. They were, of course, naturally anxious to get to their homes, and they did anything to get away, waived examination and allowed themselves to be called medically fit, and then later on when they returned to civil life they found they were not physically fit. Just as this man did at Valcartier. He was in a hurry to get home and signed this waiver releasing the country from all liability in regard to him. He came home and died, I think, as a result of his war service.

There is another peculiar feature about this case which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister for his consideration. The difficulty was to prove that this man's disability was due to war service. If we proved that his death was due to his military service but that his disability was known previous to his marriage, that entirely eliminated the widow from any chance of getting a pension. That question was brought up in the House more than a year ago, and we amended the act at that time to alter that condition in the Pension Act, but I understand that the amendment was thrown out in the Senate; at least I am so informed, I do not know whether it is correct or not. But after looking over this case and trying to convince the board that his death was due to service, I tried to bridge that gap between 1915 and 1921. I finally did find a doctor who had seen him during this period, and I got a certificate stating that he had examined this man—he was not sure of the date—and had found that he had an endo-carditis and valvular lesion of the heart. I placed the case before the Pension board, and they said that as the man's ailment was known previously to the marriage and that the woman married the man although aware of the fact she was not entitled to come under the provisions of the Pension Act; therefore she cannot get a pension. If such is the case I wish the minister particularly to consider that point, and to have the law amended so that a widow with a small family under such circumstances may be assisted in her own name.

In other respects I may say the Pension board have treated me with the utmost courtesy, and I have no criticism to offer excepting this, that I think they are adhering entirely too closely to the technicalities of the law, rather than interpreting the law according to the spirit. Not only should they interpret the law in a liberal manner, but they should give the applicant the benefit of the doubt and not throw the onus of proving the claim entirely upon the returned soldier. Over and over again the board have stated that where evidence can be produced to show the man is entitled to a pension they will consider his case, but until proof of that can be submitted they will not grant him a board. I do not think it is the soldier's place to do that. I think that when a returned soldier, believing he has a disability, makes application for a pension it is the duty of the commissioners when that case is brought to them, to look into the matter and grant a board to inquire into the circumstances, thus deciding for themselves whether he is or is not entitled to a pension. Certainly the onus of proving the claim should not rest upon the returned soldier.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): A great many cases have been submitted to the Pension board which we, from our viewpoint, regard as very reasonable. Some of these cases have received attention but others have been overlooked. I have in mind the case of a big, strong, healthy young man who went overseas, was wounded in the thighs and back and is now receiving the small pension of $11.50 per month. Shortly after his return home his eyesight began to fail and to-day he is totally blind. The case of this man has received attention from the board. He has been taken to Halifax and has undergone different examinations, but still the Pension board seem to be of the opinion that his blindness cannot be attributed directly to his overseas service. His claim for an increase in pension has therefore been turned down. This is one very outstanding case among a large number that I have been written to about, and I wish to thank the minister for the splendid assistance he has given me. In some cases, as I say, we have been able to get the pension claims adjusted. In other cases if we have not been equally successful the minister has done everything in his power to meet the situation. The board seem to act strictly according to the letter of the law, and, as has been stated here by different speakers, seem to evidence a lack of sympathy in some cases. Possibly we cannot blame the board for this as it may be their duty to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the act. Nevertheless, I feel that in some cases such as I have mentioned there ought to be a means of redress; and I certainly hope that the appeal board that is to be appointed will give proper attention to deserving cases which everyone feels should be thoroughly looked into. The blind man to whom I have referred has a wife and two children. I have a letter on my desk with respect to the case, but perhaps it would not be fitting at the present moment to take up the time of the House by reading it. Let me say that the people of the vicinity have had to go round and collect subscriptions to help this man and his family. It may be as well to point out that this poor fellow risked his life in our behalf. He is certainly deserving of greater consideration than he has yet received, and I trust that his case will be suitably dealt with.

I have also in mind another case. It is that of a woman whose two sons were killed overseas. Shortly afterwards her husband died. Although she has been left what we call a fairly good farm down in our province she is unable to work it, and derives no profit from this source. Her case has also been looked upon by the Pension board as not deserving of any consideration owing to the fact that she owns this property. I merely wish to put myself on record as saying that I trust that in the future such cases as these will be given greater consideration. I again thank the minister for his courtesy in assisting me in the great many cases I have brought before him.

Mr. CLARK: During the discussion this afternoon we heard a great deal of criticism with regard to the administration of the Pension Act. I have had some experience in presenting cases to the Pension board, and I have never undertaken a more difficult task than that of interpreting the law and presenting properly cases of applicants for pension. The member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) made some reference this afternoon to the medical services. Personally I think he touched upon the point which requires attention and which contains the only cure if a cure exists as the law stands, namely, that we must have the best medical men this country possesses to perform the work connected with the Pension Act.

In the Canadian Pension Act we have a clause which is different from the Imperial Pension Act, a clause which has given rise to the difficulty. I do not think I exaggerate when I say that nine-tenths of the complaints that have occurred in Canada have arisen under that particular section, namely, that in order to secure a pension a man's disability must be attributable to service. In Great Britain if a man was discharged and had nothing on his medical history sheet which indicated that he had disability connected with his war service that was the end of it, and if disability arose in the future no attention was paid to it. In our country the law is quite different. If disability arises subsequent to discharge, although there is nothing on the medical history sheet to indicate that the disability was in any way connected with service, if it subsequently transpires that that disability which has arisen is attributable to service then the man gets a pension. This is purely a medical question. The Pension board —I do not care who they are—must be largely guided, and in ninety-nine per cent of the cases must be bound, by the conclusions of the medical men who investigate that particular point as to whether or not the disability is attributable to service. Now, I venture to say that as long as there are service men alive in this country there is going to be dissatisfaction under the Pension Act, unless the country is prepared to wipe out that clause altogether and allow any man who has had service overseas to come in and claim pension when disability arises, whether it is attributable to service or whether it is not. If you are going to leave the clause in the act that it must be shown that the disability is attributable to service, there will be dissatisfaction in this country amongst service men just as long as there are service men alive, because each applicant will be convinced that his disability is attributable to service. We might as well recognize that. The Ralston commission has proposed a cure for this dissatisfaction, namely an appeal board. I hesitate to differ with the royal commission that has had the advantage of evidence taken from coast to coast, and has had months to consider the matter. I am judging now by some of the applications for my support that are made by various men in this country who want jobs as members of these appeal boards. The minister can readily understand that I will have no influence in having members appointed on these appeal boards. Some of the applicants I would not recommend to the minister, and others I would. I can readily see the position the minister is going to be placed in when these applications begin to pour in from all over the country for jobs in nine different districts as members of these appeal boards and as advocates for the returned soldiers. I do not think that scheme is going to be a cure. I regret to think that it is not going to be a cure. I recognize, however, the situation which has been described by every speaker and the difficulties which have arisen under this particular section, and I personally think the most effective remedy is to improve our medical service until we evolve a medical service that will be so efficient that mistakes will be reduced to a minimum. I do not think we can eradicate mistakes, but we can minimize them. Now I am not criticizing the medical service in the country, because I think the officials are doing their utmost, but they are dealing with these cases every day, and they adopt the official attitude which one is bound to adopt when he is dealing with such cases day after day, and the sympathetic touch with the returned men is lost, and these cases are very often dealt with in such a way that they do not get to the root of the trouble, and do not really determine whether the case is attributable to service or not.

The minister has determined to establish appeal boards, and I would hate to think that I would have any influence in stopping anything that is going to be of benefit to the returned soldier or going to assist in eliminating or minimizing the dissatisfaction that exists. We have a judiciary in this country which to-day is not overworked; in fact, every province in this country has been enacting statutes which have reduced the volume of work whch our judges throughout the length of the country have to do. For instance, there are county court judges in every county throughout Canada. If the minister is going to have an advocate appointed in each of the eight or nine districts to advocate the claims of returned soldiers, why can the advocate not go before one of the county court judges who has been appointed by the Dominion and advocate his claim? They will certainly receive considerate and sympathetic treatment before our judges, because I do not think any body of men that we could pick out in the country would be more sympathetic than these judges. I think we would get justice just as readily from them as we will from appeal boards which are established, and which, as I am bound to say, will take on a political flavour, which would be a very serious matter in the interests of the returned men, if political appointments are going to be made, and I do not see how it is going to be avoided.

Mr. CARROLL: Last year I think the committee dealing with pensions made a recommendation to the House that an appeal board should be constituted at Ottawa, and I understand it has been constituted. Does the hon. member know whether anything has come of it?

Mr. CLARK: I have never run into it.

Mr. BELAND: Better ask me the question. I can answer it.

Mr. CLARK: Many cases have been presented and I want to make concrete suggestions as to amendments to the present Pension Act. I will refer to two cases which I have brought before the Pension board, and will ask for consideration. I am perfectly satisfied with the decision of the board in both cases, but they have convinced me that the law is such that they cannot do anything. Members have complained that these men carry out the law. What would be said of them, if they did not carry out the law? They are bound by the statutes we have passed. I think where these difficulties arise, and we have cases which are not provided for by law, it becomes our duty to bring in concrete suggestions by way of amendment, to meet these different cases. That is what I propose to suggest now in reference to these two cases. One of these is the case of a woman whose marriage certificate I have in my possession. She was married in England, in good faith, and came back to Canada with her husband. Her husband died and she made application for pension; but it then appeared that the man was previously married, and his real widow, who had a family also, made application for the pension, and the pension was granted to the real widow. Now this is not an isolated case, although it is the only one I have in my possession, but it is the type of case, which undoubtedly should be provided for. The first widow would no doubt have been entitled to her pension, but there is no reason in the world why the second wife should not be provided for in the act.

Mr. BELAND Would the hon. member suggest that the two widows should each receive a pension in this case? I am simply asking for the hon. member's opinion.

Mr. CLARK: Decidedly, I would say so, provided there was no immoral conduct on the part of either; but it so happens in this particular case the country would not be required to pay two pensions, because the first wife has since re-married; therefore, she has lost her pension, and the pension is now being paid to no one. But it is impossible under the law as it now stands to pay the pension to the second wife or widow.

The other is the case of Private McPhail, of Brandon, who died in Vancouver a short time ago. He was taken prisoner during the war and received very brutal treatment. He was wounded in the eye, and did not receive treatment for it for many days after he was taken prisoner. He came back to Canada completely wrecked in health and without his eyesight. He died the other day, and I have forgotten the nature of the disease from which he died, but in any case it was some six years after discharge. Up to the time of his death he was a 100 per cent pensioner, but having died more than five years after discharge his widow was not entitled to the pension, because the medical officers of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment maintain that the disability from which he died was not due to service. The old question of attributability comes up in this case as in nearly every case. So far as cases of this type are concerned, they can be met by an amendment to the Pension Act. I would suggest that where a man was a disability case to the extent of 100 per cent or even, perhaps, of less than 100 per cent, no matter how long after discharge that man died, his widow should receive a pension, because this is exactly the same as though the man were killed in France in service. The mere fact that he happens to live five or six helpless years will probably make the widow's case the harder. Far better for the widow had the man been killed outright, even though she received the total pension if he died six years or ten years afterwards. That is a case that might be taken under consideration. I have forgotten the number of the section; but the period is five years now, and where a man is a disability to the extent of 100 per cent, that provision should be wiped out, and no matter how long after discharge his death takes place, the widow should receive the full pension.

Those are two concrete suggestions that I have to offer to the minister, and I also hope, before he decides upon the exact nature of this appeal board, he take the matter under very serious consideration, because I do not foresee clear sailing by any manner of means under that appeal board. In fact, as I say, as long as we have in our act the provision that a man must show disability due to service, we shall have dissatisfaction in this country, at least just as long as any ex-service man lives.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I think the tone of the discussion that has taken place to-day is not attributable to anything in the estimate before the committee, which estimate is the ordinary vote of recent years to provide for payment of pensions; but the discussion is because of the interest which the public is taking to-day in the whole question of pensions payable to members of the 9 p.m. Canadian Expeditionary Force and their dependents. During the war promises were made to the soldiers that the disabled and their dependents and the dependents of those who were killed would be cared for. I do not think the public has grown cold in the matter; I think the public had simply lost track of the situation until very recently and was not in touch with what was going on. In line with public sentiment that returned soldiers and their dependents who needed help should be helped, legislation to that end was passed. The legislation was intended to be generous; it went further than any previous legislation establishing pensions had ever gone. It was passed entirely on the insurance principle: that is, pensions were awarded for any disability incurred or aggravated on service; it did not matter whether the disability or death was due to service or not. In other words, the country insured the soldier against any disability incurred while on service, whether or not the service caused the disability. For instance, a soldier on leave might be run over by a tram car and injured or killed. That disability incurred during the period of his service would entitle him or his dependents to a pension just as much as if he had inhaled poison gas from the Hun trenches or been killed by a Hun bullet. The other principle of the two is that pension is payable only because disability is due to service, for instance, where a man was wounded or killed in action. The present investigation and interest in pensions are due to charges made against the Pension board by the Great War Veterans' Association. That association complained that in 1920 the "due to service" principle was introduced into the act on the recommendation of the Pension board, who represented to the parliamentary committee of that time that this principle would apply only to the permanent force and to those serving in peace time, and not to the Canadian Expeditionary Force. But according to the Great War Veterans' Association, notwithstanding those assurances, the principle was applied to the Canadian Expeditionary Force men and their dependents as well. In support of that, I propose to quote briefly to the committee some of the findings of the Ralston Commission. This is set out at page 44 of the first report:

> The 1919 Pension Act had reference essentially to those who had served in the war, and it included the few who remained in service after peace was declared, to clean up the debris of war. The permanent force was not included.
> The 1919 act provided that pensions were payable on the "insurance principle," that is, for any disability incurred during service, although not "due to service", but it was intended, by the second proviso to section 11, that when peace was declared, Canada would go back to the "due to service" principle.
> The Great War Veterans' Association claims that this change was not to affect discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force men, as to disabilities or deaths connected with their period of service, while the Pension board contends that it was to apply to all deaths or disabilities occurring after peace was declared, whether of discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force men or those still serving.
> The commission found that, in its opinion, the change was only to apply to those who continued in the service for peace time duty, and was not to affect discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force men as to disabilities or deaths connected with their period of service.
> The representatives of the returned men thought that the change was not to affect discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force men or their dependents.
> The representatives of the returned men asked, before the 1920 Parliamentary committee and elsewhere, whether the Canadian Expeditionary Force men or their dependents were affected by these amendments, and were told by representatives of the Pension board that they were not. They also undertook that if any further provision were necessary to safeguard the rights of these men and their dependents, it would be put in. The representatives of the Great War Veterans' Association accepted these assurances and the amendments were passed.
> In view of the commission's conclusion as to the true construction and intention of the 1919 act, it can be said now that these assurances were not carried out because the saving clause section 29, construed literally, did not protect the rights which discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force men and their dependents had acquired under section 11 of the 1919 act, but only saved disabilities or deaths occurring before September 1, 1920, as to everybody, Canadian Expeditionary Force or otherwise. After that date the new section 11 came into effect as to discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force men and their dependents, as well as to all others, and this meant that after that date, if the statute were interpreted strictly, two classes of cases which formerly had been dealt with on the "insurance principle" would be refused pension unless they could show that the death or disability was caused by military service.
> These classes would be—

And very wide classes they are:

> (1) The dependents of those who died after September 1, 1920, even though the death was due to something which was incurred on service, and even though the deceased had been receiving pension for the very trouble which caused the death.
> (2) The discharged Canadian Expeditionary Force man who had a disability which could be shown to be connected with his period of service, but who could not show that his condition at discharge was serious enough to constitute a disability.

Then the commission in general find in favour of the charges made by the Great War Veterans' Association, that is as to anything important in the charges, and the commission recommend legislation that will re-instate applicants, including their dependents, in their rights under the original act of 1919. There can be no doubt, I think, that the Pension board, within recent years at any rate, has constituted itself too much a watchdog of the treasury. They have looked on applicants for pensions with too much suspicion. They have, I believe, sought opportunities to refuse applications rather than to bring them reasonably within the act.

I do not think that the government wishes them to act in that way; I do not think that either parliament or the public wishes them to do so. I think they have taken the wrong cue. In the investigation before the parliamentary committee last session, on which I had the honour to serve, it was plain to me, as I think it was to the members of the committee, that the Pension board was carrying out the letter rather than the spirit of the law, or the intention of parliament—either of this or of preceding parliaments; and it was quite apparent to me, and I have no doubt it was equally obvious to the committee generally, that the board would persist in its policy of carrying out the letter of the law in that way regardless of the recommendations of any parliamentary committee. I understand, from press reports, that it is more than likely they will also disregard the recommendations of the Ralston commission. I believe the board could very much ameliorate present conditions by a little give and take in their administration of the act. They have tightened up too much.

This afternoon the member for Vancouver South (Mr Ladner) referred with some particularity to a case that came before the committee last session. I refer to what is known as the Percy White case. That matter was practically retried before the parliamentary committee last year. The board was represented before the committee and the applicant and her witnesses also appeared. Both sides were fully heard, and after hearing them and seeing them face to face the committee recommended that the pension be granted, and advised the board that in their opinion it had been wrong in refusing the pension. Surely that was reason enough for the board to relent and grant the pension. I do not think they are quite so conscience-bound as to be unable to do so if they really wished to be fair. But notwithstanding the representation of the parliamentary committee they refused to reconsider the matter. I do not say that the Pension board is always unfair or intentionally unfair, but in that case at least one of the members of the board was downright and intentionally unfair to the applicant. There is evidence on the file today of such unfairness on the part of at least one of the members of that body. There is evidence of personal antagonism to the applicant, who was a widow in ill-health, penniless and with an infant child to support. It is plain from the evidence that this member of the board so far forget himself as to ignore all demands of fair play and of gentlemanly instincts and to place on file grossly unfair notations, having no bearing whatever on the merits or demerits of the application, gratuitously insulting, and calculated to prejudice the board against the application. There is no question about that; if they have not been removed, the notations are there yet to speak for themselves. I do not propose to detail the evidence that was given before the parliamentary committee in that case; it was gone into sufficiently by the hon. member for Vancouver South this afternoon. I can only say that a flagrant injustice was done and is being persisted in; and that is only one of a number of similar cases which have not been remedied.

This new ruling of the board under which they tightened up in their policy became known to the Great War Veterans' Association only some six months after it had been made. For some unaccountable reason the board kept that ruling practically secret at head office until finally it got out in some way not accounted for. The evidence before the Ralston commission is that the board did not know how that minute was ever communicated to any of the district offices. They did not send it out officially; it leaked out mysteriously. Fortunately, however, it did get out and the Great War Veterans' Association then became aware of the principle on which the board was acting. This was the state of affairs in the closing hours of the 1922 session of parliament when Mr. MacNeil, the secretary of the association, realizing that something desperate had to be done to wake up the public, parliament and the government, sent his famous telegram. The telegram, I think, was worded extremely; there was no reason to suspect the Pension board of a secret conspiracy, which was the effect of the telegram. But there was every evidence to warrant Mr. MacNeil in assuming that secret regulations were being made—and as a matter of fact had been made, and had been withheld from the public—under which the board was acting. He had to startle the government into attending to that piece of public business; and he did so, with the result that the Ralston commission was appointed. After many sittings, a very thorough investigation and the hearing of much evidence and of many witnesses, the commission submitted a finding entirely favourable to the Great War Veterans' Association, recommending legislation which, if enacted, will leave very little to the discretion of the board. They recommend the establishment of central appeal boards.

It goes without saying that the position of members of the board is a difficult and delicate one to maintain. I have had exactly the same experience as many members who have already spoken on this matter have had. I am free to observe that in regard to the specific cases which I have submitted to the board I have received nothing but the most courteous and proper treatment. I have half a dozen cases pending now before them and I expect the same treatment. But there is no reason why any special pleader should have to go to the board. They should decide all applications on their merits. No member of parliament should find it necessary to go to the board; nor should any applicant for a pension have to enlist the services of a member of this House, no matter how willingly they may be given. It should be all in the day's work of the board. The condition should not exist wherein the Pension board refuses an application and then, because some member of parliament or some other agent pleads the case further, reverses its decision. The decision should be right in the first instance. When we hear of cases being refused simply because they have not been properly presented, whose fault is it? Surely it is not the fault of the applicant; it is the fault of the board. The board should see to it that the evidence is all properly submitted and that the case is finally and fully presented before they give their decision.

I might mention one astounding case I have now in hand of a man who went to the war as a volunteer. He was a strong, healthy man in every respect, a six-footer. He was hit in the arm with shrapnel; the arm was shattered and has since not been of any use to him. He was sent from hospital to hospital till the armistice came and he was finally sent to Canada. He did not want to go to hospital in Canada and in his hurry to get his discharge he told them to mark him A-1. The disability was apparent, however; the arm was stiff, as it still is; he cannot raise it above his shoulder and cannot lift anything. They discharged him A-1, and in various ways he managed to get employment until the past winter when he was up against it. When I inquired of him I was astonished to find that he was getting no pension, I advised him to apply and he did so; but to my amazement pension has not been granted. I have not found out why; it may have been because of his eagerness to get his discharge. But it is such cases as these that are causing dissatisfaction. Although the act is not as perfect as it should be or as it can be, I think that a great deal of dissatisfaction could have been avoided had the board seen fit to adopt a more diplomatic attitude. On the contrary, they have in some cases adopted the most toplofty or infallible attitude; they could not err; they could not make a mistake; what they said was the law and must stand. That attitude is not calculated to make the administration of that department very popular. The people are becoming alive to the fact that legislation is necessary to meet the present state of affairs and to give the board power to do what they say they would like to do but are prevented by law from doing. When that legislation is finally framed and passed and becomes effective, there may not be much need of appeal boards; personally I hope there will not be at any rate. I must say I have not very much faith that relief will be afforded by a multiplicity of pension boards which, in effect, is the legislation recommended by the Ralston commission. They really recommend the establishment of a great number of district pension boards. If one pension board cannot do any better than it has been doing, I do not think nine or ten or twelve will bring about any greater degree of satisfaction. I have more faith in the judgment of courts of the land, experienced and trained as they are in the weighing of evidence and the administering of justice. Expense, after all, is not a matter to be very seriously considered if we can get satisfaction for the returned soldiers and their dependents. But in any case, before adopting in toto the recommendations of the Ralston commission, I would urge the government to take into account the suggestion which has been made to-day by other members as well as by myself, namely, that appeals from the decisions of the Pension board should go to the regularly constituted courts of the land, which, I affirm, are quite competent to deal with the situation.

Mr. BELAND: First of all, I should like to make clear the position the minister occupies with regard to the administration of the Pension Act. The Board of Pension Commissioners is constituted by a special clause of the Pension Act, and it is provided by that act that the decisions of the board shall be final. So that whatever may be the desire of any hon. member or of any member of the government; whatever may be the desire of the minister in charge of the department, to whom the board is bound to make a report, no decision of the board can in any way be altered or appealed from. The contention of the board is that they interpret the act as it has been enacted by this parliament. Reference was made by the last speaker (Mr. Black, Yukon), and also, I think, by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) to the principle which ran through the whole act of 1919. Nothing can be truer than their assertion in this regard. In 1919 a Pension Act was passed by this parliament providing for men who had served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force a pension for any disability incurred on service and also for any aggravation of a pre-existing disability, whether or not such disability was attributable to service. That was the condition that prevailed in 1920, when the act of 1919 was amended. It will be remembered that through an error peace was declared on the tenth of January, 1920; the real declaration of peace took place on the thirty-first of August, 1921. During the session of 1920 a special parliamentary committee dealt with pensions and re-establishment generally. It was thought during that session that peace had been declared; and if you read carefully the act of 1919 you will see that there is a special provision that after the declaration of peace pensions should be awarded in respect of death or disability when these were attributable to service. Now, in the session of 1920 an amendment was introduced to the Pension Act of 1919 repealing section 11, which was the vital section, and replacing it by the provision that pension should be awarded in respect of disability or death when such disability or death were the direct result of military service. I had at that time the advantage of being a member of the parliamentary committee, as I have been ever since the war with the exception of last year.

Mr. LADNER: The minister was on that committee. Will he say it was the intention of the committee or of parliament at that time that that change should apply to members or ex-members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or was it not the intention that the change should apply only to members of the permanent force?

Mr. BELAND: I was coming to that: I could not speak of it before I had mentioned the fact that the law had been amended. Before the parliamentary committee representatives of the Pension board were heard and they stated definitely that the new section would not affect the Canadian Expeditionary Force men but would be applicable only to men who remained on service after the declaration of peace, having in mind undoubtedly the men of the permanent force. That act was passed by parliament and things went on until 1921, when another special parliamentary committee had to deal with pension matters. Then the words "as such" were added to the 1920 clause 11, and the clause in 1921 after that addition would read about like this: Pensions shall be awarded when disabilities or death are attributable to military service as such. Again I think it was pointed out that that had reference only to men of the permanent force and that men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force would not be affected, that it did not change the practice with regard to them. Now the declaration of peace took place on the 31st day of August, 1921, and bearing in mind what the 1919 Pension Act said, that after the declaration of peace pensions would be awarded only in respect of disabilities or death attributable to war service, having also in mind the amendment of 1920 which did away with the insurance principle clause of 1919, and having also in mind this other amendment of 1921, the Pension board issued in the month of September, 1921, a minute in which it was stated that pensions henceforth would be awarded only when disabilities or death were attributable to military service. That altered to a large degree the practice that the Pension board had followed up to that time. I hope I make myself clear, but if I do not I would invite any question in order to make everybody absolutely satisfied that he understands the situation.

Mr. LADNER: On what authority was that minute of the Pension board issued?

Mr. BELAND: The Pension board does not require any authority at all to interpret the act. The act itself confides it to the discretion of the board to make their own interpretation, and moreover, my hon. friend being a lawyer and better versed in legal questions than I am knows as well as I do that if you read section 11 of the act as it was passed in 1920 it is plain that pensions can be awarded only when disabilities or death are attributable to military service. But as to what my hon. friend mentioned a moment ago, when this very limiting amendment was considered before the parliamentary committee it was then openly stated by the representatives of the board that this clause would apply only to men who remained on service after the declaration of peace and would not affect the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. This minute was issued in the month of September, 1921, under the authority of the Pension board, and they have that authority; it is given to them.

Mr. LADNER: Are they the final arbiters on the question of the interpretation of the law? Have they any method of referring, for instance to the Supreme Court?

Mr. BELAND: They are the final arbiters. There is an appeal from the Pension board to-day, but it is an appeal from the Pension board to the Pension board, and that is the only appeal there is.

Mr. MANION: Do they not often get the opinion of the Justice department in interpreting the act?

Mr. BELAND: They do, but they are not forced to do it. They may seek the opinion of the Department of Justice. In this instance they have sought the opinion of the Department of Justice on clause 11 as it now stands on the statute, and the Justice department, and I think properly so, replied that the board's interpretation of the letter of the act was correct. No one could say otherwise.

But what I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, are the declarations that were made before the parliamentary committee by the representatives of the Pension board to the effect that the new clause 11 would only apply to members of the permanent force, because as they said there is now no longer any Canadian Expeditionary Force. It was then made perfectly clear by the chairman of that committee, Mr. Cronyn, and by a number of hon. gentlemen who sat on that committee, and in particular by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), that it would not affect the Canadian Expeditionary Force men. The clause as you read it in the act to-day does not refer at all to disabilities or death incurred on service, but only to disabilities or death which are the result of military service as such. Having said that much, I do not want to delay the committee much longer.

I may say that when the Pension board in 1921 issued that minute which placed upon their medical examiners the duty of awarding or recommending pension only to those who came within clause 11 of the new act of 1920, and 1921, the practice of the board and the practice of the medical examiners all over the country was naturally altered to a large degree. It was only a few months after that it was noticed that a stricter interpretation of what was thought to be the act was being applied by the Pension board and certain accusations were levelled against the Pension board. The rest of the story is known to every hon. member of this House. The accusations were investigated by a royal commission, which has taken a great deal of pains to get in contact with service men of every unit, and this royal commission has already submitted two reports bearing particularly upon pensions, appeals and insurance. The report has been placed in the hands of hon. members, and it is not for me to say what hon. members should think of it. As far as the charges against the Pension board of plot or conspiracy or ulterior motive are concerned, they have not been sustained. The royal commission has found, however, that the practice has been altered by the Pension board and that generally their policy had been unsympathetic, and that increased severity had taken place in the consideration of pension applications. If it could not be called undue severity, surely there was increased severity in dealing with applications for pensions. Now, the Ralston commission has submitted a number of recommendations in regard to the Pension Act. These recommendations I think will be carried out substantially by the bill which I shall introduce into the House, within two or three days, I hope. The resolution is already on the order paper which covers the main part of the bill.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask, will the bill include reverting to the insurance principle so that the remainder of the expeditionary force can enjoy the same advantage as those who acted prior to September 1920?

Mr. BELAND: Yes. I am not expected of course, to go into details at the present time. As minister in charge of the department I have been overwhelmed by complaints coming from ex-service men. I have a good deal of sympathy with most of my colleagues who have had two or three departments to administer during the last year. I think I might have as much sympathy for myself because I do not believe that the work performed by any other member of the government has been as arduous as the task that was mine during that time. I can fairly say that over 2,000 cases have been submitted to me for examination and for action. Those cases did not all have reference to pensions, but a large portion of them did. Others were treatment cases. Both classes in many instances, came together. Some hon. members, to-night or this afternoon, referred to their lack of success in submitting cases to the Pension board. Let me tell them that I have not been more fortunate than they have. Out of, I should say, about 1,000 cases, at least, of pensions submitted to the board for reconsideration I do not think that I have succeeded in more than 2 or 3 per cent. In other words the Pension board interpreted the act as they read it, and I do not believe that they will yield to any outside influence, which I think is something to their credit. I would not approve of their conduct if, in my cases though they might not be deserving, they should yield and award a pension. In many cases—I would not venture to state how many, but in fifty cases at least—that I have submitted to the Pension board I believe that I would have given a different decision to the one they rendered. I may have been wrong but my impression was at that time that pensions should have been awarded in those particular cases. However, the Pension board thought in their wisdom that the act would not permit them to award a pension.

You do not, Mr. Chairman, expect me to go into the individual cases that have been submitted this afternoon by different hon. members. Most of them, I think, have come to my knowledge. Some are very interesting, some are peculiar, some are very rare. In a particular instance, I fancy, there is only one case such as that referred to by one hon. member, and I scarcely think the Pension Act should be amended on that account. If the sentiment of the people of Canada, if the sentiment of the House of Commons and parliament generally, is that the act has not been properly interpreted by the Pension board, the only recourse is to amend the act and provide for an appeal. I do not know of any court in the British Empire, outside of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that is without an appeal. In Great Britain there are thirty different district boards specially appointed for the purpose of dealing with pensions and ex-soldiers. In the United States they had at first a very large number of district boards, but they have contracted this number gradually to fourteen. They now have fourteen district boards operating in the United States. There is an appeal from those district boards to another board in Washington, the exact evolution of which I forget. There is also an appeal from the decision of that second board, and finally an appeal from the third decision to the President of the United States.

Mr. LADNER: Would the minister mind saying whether those appeals are in the nature of a rehearing of the case and of the evidence, or are the cases tried in the courts just as cases are tried here before a trial judge, the case going to appeal with the same evidence subject to addition where evidence is omitted by mistake?

Mr. BELAND: I am not perfectly conversant with the regulations that govern appeals in the United States or in England. I presume that first of all those boards deal with the evidence which is on record and that a clear decision can be rendered immediately. When they are not satisfied that they have all the possible facts upon which the decision should hinge, they have power to inquire further. I think this is the only country in the world where there is no appeal from the decision of a Pension board.

It was most interesting to follow the discussion this afternoon and evening. The amendments which will be submitted will, I think, remedy the situation which is now so bitterly complained of as far as legislative action can do it. I know the appeal boards are somewhat clumsy. Although the machinery is pretty much involved the establishment of appeal boards will, I hope, give the men a large amount of satisfaction even if their claim is not sustained. These men will have in their vicinity or in their district a body of three persons to whom they will be entitled to present their side of the case personally, or through a representative of their own for which provision will be made by parliament, and if their appeal is not sustained, even if they do not receive any more money, they will have the satisfaction of knowing that all that could be done for them has been done. This recommendation of the royal commission, I think, is consequent upon insistent request from ex-service men all over the country. I have not read the record of evidence given before that commission because it is too voluminous—no man could undertake to do so unless he had a whole year to himself. I feel satisfied, however, that they have made the recommendation as a result of the request made by ex-service men of the highest type from Vancouver or Victoria to Halifax.

My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross) has suggested to the committee that perhaps the greatest difficulty lies in the fact that the presentation of the cases is not properly made. In this connection I am disposed to agree with him in a large measure. I think the men should have one of their own number whose duty it would be to take charge of the preparation and presentation of their claims to the board. That practice exists in England, and I think also in the United States. He is known in England as the Soldier Adviser, and this should be provided, I think, also in every unit. My hon. friend from Kingston also referred to the functions of the medical staff. No function is more important in dealing with pensions and applications for pensions than the medical staff. It is evident that in a large majority of cases it must be a matter of medical opinion, and the difficulty arises from the fact that medicine is a variable science. You can make an addition and everybody else will make it the same way and you can make a multiplication, and everybody will make it the same way, but the appreciation or the valuation of a disease or a disability, not being a mathematical matter at all, medical opinion must vary as expressed by one medical man or by another medical man. My hon. friend from Kingston is of the opinion that we should secure the best medical and surgical opinion and services that can be secured in Canada. I agree with him in this regard. He has had considerable experience in those matters; but, undoubtedly, looking over the list of medical men who were selected originally by the government, I feel satisfied that we have at our disposal, with very few exceptions, the most prominent specialists in Canada, whether it be in surgery, in medicine proper, in the science of eye, ear, and throat diseases, or other ailments of the human body. I do not know personally all of the medical men, but I know most of them by reputation. In the cities of Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, I think we have, if not all the best men, certainly some of them. The Pension board or any board at all that has to deal with pensions, will have to rely very considerably on medical opinion, and, as the years go by, as we get further and further from the armistice and from the declaration of peace, the harder it will become to decide as to the relationship of a particular ailment to a man's service. Hon. members will realize that immediately.

The fact, however, that we have 63,000 pensioners in Canada would not indicate that we have been entirely ungenerous. The board in many instances has rendered a decision which was faulty, I think, not in a sense that it was dishonest at all but in the sense that it was too narrow. If a few hundred more pensions had been awarded, we might not have heard any complaints at all. When one hundred pensions are awarded in Vancouver nobody speaks about it, but if one case is turned down, and if it is known by the public that that man is entitled to a pension but that it has been denied him it is discussed on the street and discontent penetrates the different classes of the population. I hope, however, that we will amend the Pension Act to carry out the recommendations. We will restore the insurance principle and will do away with the contention that because a man was discharged as A1 he must be A1 all his life, and he must not have any ailment related to his service in the years to come. It is a preposterous and, I think, absolutely unsupportable contention, that because a man is discharged in a hurry from the army as fit, or A1, he cannot, after six months or a year or two years, claim that he has a recurrence of a certain disability which was incurred on service and had disappeared for the time being.

We will also provide for insurance, but I wil. deal with that a little later, when we are in committee on the resolution. Now my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) has thrown out a suggestion that appeals should be heard by the ordinary courts of this country. I do not know how that will work out in some instances. I have in mind the city of Montreal. At the present time there are more than 1,000 cases awaiting hearing before the courts of Montreal. I do not think I am very much wide of the mark when I say that—

Mr. CLARK: What particular tribunals does the minister refer to?

Mr. BELAND: The courts of justice,—the circuit court.

Mr. CLARK: Quite true; I realize that, but there are many more divisions. In regard to the particular division I have referred to, I feel quite convinced the situation is comparatively uniform thoroughout the country, and I think the hon. members for eastern Canada will bear me out in the statement that the work is not congested in any sense of the word. In fact I venture to say that in every county court in Canada the cases which are entered for trial at the beginning of the month are fully disposed of each month.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend's judges are happy judges.

Mr. CLARK: I am not referring to British Columbia only.

Mr. BELAND: In the city of Montreal, where undoubtedly a large number of appeals would arise, I do not know of a court that could hear those appeals to-day. I cannot speak for Halifax, Winnipeg, or Vancouver, but in the cities the courts are generally overwhelmed with cases, and they have more than they can attend to. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Boys) would, perhaps, know more about the situation in Ontario than I do.

Mr. BOYS: I would say that outside of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, I think the statement of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) is correct. I refer now to the time that I think Ontario county court judges would have for disposal of appeals of the kind under discussion. I think the courts of appeal in Toronto sitting in appeal from the county court judges have plenty to do. But I venture to say in all the counties, outside of Toronto, and possibly Ottawa, London and Hamilton, the county court judges would have time to dispose of these appeals, if the minister thought that was the proper method of disposing of them.

Mr. BELAND: Of course I do not think that is the proper method. I am, however, subject to conviction. Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton and London have a combined population of at least one-third of the population of the whole province of Ontario. One-half of the appeals, I would judge, would come from those cities, and those appeals would have to come before those city tribunals. Is an ordinary court of justice a competent board? Can one imagine, for instance, all the files needed in the trials of some of these cases being removed from the units to the different county court divisions, in Ontario for example? The matter is quite different if the board sits in a city itself; it is within easy reach of the unit where the files of the men are available.

As to the constitution of the court; generally those courts will have only one judge. The boards must have men who are conversant with military matters, with veterans' claims generally, with veterans' ailments. Members of the board should know what conditions prevailed in the army, generally speaking, and that is why I presume the royal commission recommends that two of any three men should be ex-service men. I believe also the recommendation is made in this regard upon the insistence of returned men generally. I do not know that in England those cases are tried before the ordinary courts of law. I am informed, and I think credibly, that those boards have been appointed by the Minister of Pensions for the purpose of hearing cases and then appeals upon decisions.

I think I have dealt with almost every feature of this subject that has been brought up very moderately by hon. gentlemen. The question of dealing with veterans generally has never been in the past, from the moment I served on the parliamentary committee in 1919 to this day, a matter of political cleavage. All the parliamentary committees from 1919 to last year have dealt with this question regardless of any political leanings that any member of it may have. This spirit has prevailed all through. I believe it is the intention of the people of Canada to give to the returned men a square deal,—justice—full justice—and if there is some remote measure of doubt in the case of a returned man, that he should get the benefit of the doubt, in other words, be treated with generosity. It will be in that spirit that I will submit, during the course of this week, I hope, the legislation that is intended.

10 p.m.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. CLARK: What particular case had the minister in mind when he said some time ago that there was only one case of that type in existence, and, therefore, legislation dealing with that case would not be justified.

Mr. BELAND: I think it was the case of a man with two wives.

Mr. CLARK: If that is the only case that has come to my attention, I think there are other cases like it. I presume the minister will admit that it is a case in which justice should be done to the woman, she having married the man in a bona fide manner. How does the minister propose to deal with such a case if no legislation covering it is to be introduced?

Mr. BELAND: The case submitted by my hon. friend has been disposed of as one of the widows has re-married.

Mr. CLARK: No, it has not.

Mr. BELAND: I understood my hon. friend to say that one of the widows had re-married.

Mr. CLARK: But a pension having once beeen awarded to one of the widows, the other one is barred forever by the act.

Mr. BELAND: I have now in mind another similar case to that referred to by my hon. friend. It came to my knowledge some six or seven months ago. I do not know in what way the matter was settled, but I have the feeling that it was adjusted. At all events, there are so few cases that they may be easily dealt with. I do not think I have anything else to say in this regard. The discussion has been interesting, instructive, illuminating in some regards, and I think also I have supplied the committee with all possible information in connection with the amount that was paid in pensions during last year.

Mr. LADNER: The minister did not state in connection with the proposed legislation, whether he intended to deal with the construction of section 11 in its relation to section 25 (3), that being the section which states that "no deduction shall be made from the pension of any member of the forces who has served in a theatre of actual war" and who was admitted as being physically fit when he enlisted. As the minister knows, the applicant must come under section 11 which deals with the rates of pensions before he can claim the benefit of this "no deduction" clause. That is a matter of importance and we have heard nothing in regard to it.

Mr. BELAND: It has been dealt with in the preparation of the bill. Clause 25 (3) has been removed under section 11.

Mr. MANION: The minister pointed out that the Pension board can act only within the statute. That is correct to a certain extent; but there are in the act a number of clauses under which the Pension board are allowed the discretion and I think that should be pointed out, because continually the Board of Pension Commissioners themselves point out that they cannot do such and such a thing because the act does not permit them to do it. The minister made that statement fairly strongly himself. While he was speaking, I looked over half a dozen clauses, clauses 29, 31, 33, 34, 37, and in all those clauses I have given the numbers of, the term "in their discretion" or "in their opinion" is used. That is as to the granting of pensions, so that in many clauses of the Pension Act the board can act in their discretion or opinion. Therefore, they are not tied down to cast iron rules as the impression would be given by the minister or themselves. I wish to make that correction because I think it is only fair that that statement should be corrected. They are tied down to cast iron rules in many of the clauses; but in many others the matter is left to their discretion, and it is usually in those clauses that cases arise on which there are disputes.

Mr. BELAND: Of course I am perfectly aware that in the Pension Act a number of clauses give the Pension board wide discretionary powers. But I beg to differ from my hon. friend when he says that these discretionary clauses are the vital clauses of the act.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that.

Mr. BELAND: Well, I understood my hon. friend to say that most of the cases that were complained of came under those clauses.

Mr. MANION: I said that very many of the cases came under them, and I think they do.

Mr. BELAND: I do not share my hon. friend's view, and I beg to differ humbly from his opinion. Most of the complaints are due to the interpretation or administration of two clauses of the act, clause 11, which is the vital section, providing for the award of pensions in the case of disability and death, and section 25, subsection 3, which deals with pre-existing disabilities in the case of men who served in any theatre of actual war. Outside of that, of course, there are a number of discretionary clauses. For instance, there are such clauses in the case of parents, grandparents, prospective dependency, dependent sisters, dependent brothers, any major child that has become of age but who for some reason or other may be incapacitated mentally or physically, and unable to earn his own living. If he were sound he would not receive a pension, supposing that he belonged to a pensioner, after the age of sixteen, and in the case of a girl after the age of seventeen. He might, however, be twenty-one and still be unable to earn his living, but in the discretion of the board he might be awarded a pension. In numberless cases of the kind discretionary powers are left with the board. No doubt there are some complaints in this regard, and my hon. friend is right in a measure. But if I have appreciated rightly the complaints that have come before me, most of them come within the category of disabilities on the part of men who claim a pension on that account, such disabilities having been incurred on service and not having been recognized by the board. There are a few cases of widows who claim a pension and are denied it because they married after the appearance of disability on the part of their husbands. Section 25, subsection 3, also caused a good deal of trouble in the matter of pre-existing disability in men who served in a theatre of actual war, undoubtedly the board have discretionary powers in many cases, and some of the complaints bear upon these matters.

Mr. BOYS: Earlier in the session I brought to the attention of the minister one or two cases where pensions had been cancelled without notice to the persons receiving them. It seems to me that there should be a very definite provision requiring, in every case either of suspension or discontinuance of pension, that the person entitled should receive personal notice, either by personal service, or at all events by registered letter, of the intention to dispose of the pension in one or other of these two ways. The person should be given every opportunity during a certain number of days, say ten days or two weeks, to explain any charge that may be made. I have no doubt there are many cases, apart from the ones that came to my personal notice, and I feel sure that the minister will agree that no pension should be suspended or discontinued without notice to the person entitled and an opportunity given of presenting his or her case to the board.

Mr. BELAND: I am of the opinion that a notice is always served on the person concerned. I am very much surprised to hear that the board decides to cancel pensions without notifying the pensioners. I think they do notify them. But what my hon. friend undoubtedly has in mind is that a certain length of time should be given the person whose pension is to be cancelled in order that he may submit some evidence to prove that the information before the board is faulty or unreliable.

Mr. BOYS: I do not expect the minister to remember the matter, because too many of these things come to his notice for him to bear them all in mind. But earlier in the session I brought to his attention a case in my own town in which an officer came and got information locally. A widow was notified that her pension was discontinued and she never had an opportunity of putting in any evidence at all. Certain charges were made against her which she was prepared to meet. As far as I know her pension was restored, and I believe she is being paid it to-day. At least, I think so. But for a time it was absolutely cancelled and no opportunity was given her to submit any defence of any kind.

Mr. BELAND: I agree with my hon. friend absolutely that in such cases they should be notified, say, a month ahead of the intention to discontinue their pensions in order that they might have sufficient time to make representations.

Item agreed to.

Pensions on account of the Fenian Raid, 1866-1870, $1,000.

Mr. BELAND: I have only two pensioners.

Item agreed to.

Pensions payable to militia men and on active service Northwest Rebellion, 1885, and general pensions, $42,700.

Mr. BELAND: These pensions, the item of which I am bringing before the committee, are being paid by the Board of Pension Commissioners. The other pensions do not come under my department at all; they are statutory.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $83,700.

Mr. MANION: What is the reason for this increase of over $12,000? We are getting away from the war.

Mr. BELAND: These estimates are prepared by the Pension board themselves. The expenses are their own and they have supplied me with an explanation. They cover clerical staff that was moved from the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to the Pension board proper. My hon. friend will remember that under the late administration the Pension board was brought under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the whole of the Pension board's clerical staff, except the personal staff, was transferred from the Pension board to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. That was effective in 1921. The Pension board remained with a certain number of clerks for their own work—correspondence, investigations, and so on. During the year they asked for the transfer from our department of a few clerks to assist in their clerical work, to which, of course, we agreed. There is really no increase. My hon. friend is aware that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment decreased its staff in the city of Ottawa last year by 500 or 600. The items are made up as follows: permanent staff, 1 secretary; 1 accountant; 2 head clerks; 2 principal clerks; 1 senior messenger; 1 junior messenger; 3 senior clerk-stenographers; 3 clerk-stenographers; 1 junior stenographer. The total for the permanent staff is $26,880. The temporary staff consists of 10 medical advisers and 1 senior clerk-stenographer, total, $45,820. Then there are contingencies, $11,000; transportation and subsistence, stationery and supplies, unforeseen expenditures.

Mr. MANION: Is it likely that the maximum expenditure for the board has now been reached, or are we likely to have another increase for salaries next year? Has the minister any information on that subject?

Mr. BELAND: I have no information on that. As I have said, they simply asked for the transfer from our department to theirs of a few more clerks, and we could not refuse them.

Mr. MANION: The amount is $12,700, so it is not only a question of a few clerks. I do not suppose there would be any objection to the transfer of two or three clerks, but we are getting further away from the war, and while there may be occasion under the proposed amendments for some increased activity, no regulations were put in force last year to justify any such large increase in salaries.

Mr. BELAND: It is also my view that as we get further away from the war the work should decrease. But I do not think the Pension board had less work this last year than they had in the previous year.

Mr. MANION: They should not have had any more.

Mr. BELAND: I do not believe they had less. I would judge they had more.

Mr. MANION: Why?

Mr. BELAND: Applications come in regularly. My hon. friend would be surprised if I told him the number of applications received and the number of cases dealt with by the board in one year.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest that we were not receiving applications in previous years?

Mr. BELAND: We were receiving them, but they were disposed of. The cases that now come up require a great deal more examination. At all events, the Pension board prepared this estimate; they say they require that clerical staff, and I have no doubt they are perfectly straight about it.

Mr. MANION: I am not questioning that at all. The minister seems to take the attitude that he should not know anything about this estimate. I admit that so far as administration of the act goes the minister has no control over the board, but so far as the executive work goes he is the minister in charge and is the only one from whom we can get information regarding any of these things. So I think it is up to him to be able to furnish information respecting any of the items involved in this vote.

Mr. BELAND: I realize that. I do not think I have indicated any desire to withhold information. The fact is that the board have asked the department for five or six more clerks—I do not know exactly how many; we have transferred these clerks from some of our branches, and instead of being paid by us they are now paid by the Pension board.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Can the minister tell us how these ten medical advisers are disposed? What are the departments represented—medicine, surgery and so on?

Mr. BELAND: I do not know exactly; the board select their own medical advisers. I think the men who are there now are the same men who were there two or three years ago. I do not know the names of more than three or four of them.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This is a matter to which I have already made some reference. It seems to me that these men who are close to the Pension board should be the biggest men obtainable, having regard to the nature of their duties. I was wondering if the minister could tell the committee what medical departments they represent?

Mr. BELAND: I have not any particular knowledge as to their attainments, but I believe that so far as some of them are concerned, they enjoy a very good reputation. It is up to the board to select their own men. They have surgeons, internists, oculists, genito-urinary specialists, chest specialists, and so on.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There has been a little criticism, quietly, that some of them are rather young and without the experience that one would naturally expect in advisers of such an important department as the Pension board.

Mr. BELAND: I entirely agree with my hon. friend. I was not responsible for their appointment.

Mr. CHISHOLM: How much are they paid?

Mr. BELAND: Each is paid $4,500.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Do they devote all their time to the work?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. LEWIS: How many of them live in Ottawa?

Mr. BELAND: All of them.

Mr. LEWIS: Does the minister mean to say that these ten medical men devote all their time to that work in connection with the Pension board?

Mr. BELAND: They do.

Mr. LEWIS: They are not practising on the side at all?

Mr. BELAND: No, none of these are.

Mr. MANION: Does this item contain the salaries of the Pension commissioners themselves?

Mr. BELAND: No, that is statutory.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act by providing,—

(1) That in any case where an application for insurance under the said act has been received, and the applicant has died prior to the delivery to him of the policy of insurance, the approval of the application by the proper officer and the receipt of the initial premium shall be deemed to have been sufficient to put the insurance into force, unless it can be shown that the application was fraudulent, and any insurance moneys which would have been payable had the policy been delivered to the applicant shall now be made payable, subject to a deduction of the amount of premium due from the date of application to the date of death.

(2) That any applications which were rejected prior to 1st July, 1922, under any conditions set forth in section 2 of the amending act of 1922, or the schedule thereto, shall be reviewed, except in cases where the applicant is suffering or has become impaired as a result of self-inflicted wounds or immoral conduct, or where the application was fraudulent, and provision be made to give the right on such review to any applicant now living to insure, and if the applicant has died, the amount of insurance for which he applied shall now be made payable, less the amount which would have been due as premium from the date of application to the date of death, notwithstanding that no effective insurance contract was completed, and provided that the application was approved.

He said: This resolution is for the purpose of carrying out the recommendation of the royal commission respecting soldiers' insurance. Clause 1 applies to a few cases where the application for insurance had been filed with the department, had been approved and the premium paid, but the soldier died before the policy was delivered to him. It was held by the Finance department that in such cases no contract existed and the insurance money was not paid to the soldier's dependents. There are only six or seven such cases in all. This is to provide that when the application was regularly approved and the premium paid—

Mr. BOYS: Prior to death? The resolution does not state that.

Mr. BELAND: That is what it means.

Mr. BOYS: The bill will?

Mr. BELAND: It is to cover these cases where the application was received and approved and the premium paid but where the soldier died before the policy was delivered.

Mr. MANION: May I ask the minister if these two amendments to the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act cover all the recommendations made by the royal commission respecting soldiers' insurance?

Mr. BELAND: Absolutely.

Mr. MANION: All of them?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Would the minister explain what is meant in clause 1 by saying "unless it can be shown that the application was fraudulent?" Would he give us some examples of what would be considered a fraudulent application?

Mr. BELAND: It might be signed by another man in his name.

[Mr. Béland.]

Mr. POWER: Would that be the only case?

Mr. BELAND: I have no other cases in mind at the moment.

Mr. POWER: Would it be such a case as this? The applicant is dying; he has beeen warned by his physician that he is likely to die within two or three days or a week and he sends in his application for insurance. Would that be considered a fraudulent application?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. HANSON: Is it intended to cover cases where the application had been passed on before death?

Mr. BELAND: Clause 2 of the resolution covers that. I stated when I gave notice of this resolution two or three days ago that there was a slight error made in the drafting of clause 2. The last line should not have read "provided that the application was approved' but "provided that such applicant lived for a sufficient period of time to admit of the approval of his application by the proper officer of the department in the ordinary course of procedure."

Perhaps a word of explanation is necessary in this connection. The intention when this Soldiers' Insurance Act was passed by parliament was that every returned soldier who made an application for insurance could insure, in other words, that every soldier should be insurable if he made application. I think in 1921, and especially in the month of January, 1922, some restrictions were made and enforced by the Pension board, which has the administration of this act together with the Minister of Finance, to the effect that the insurance money in the case of an application not being approved would not be payable, and also that certain applications on the part of men who were seriously ill of an illness which was not due to war service, and who moreover had no dependents, should not be entertained by the board or approved by the Minister of Finance. Hon. gentlemen will remember that during the session of 1922 we amended the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act to provide a certain schedule which sets out the conditions under which an application for insurance can be refused. That amendment was passed last year. The Returned Soldiers' Act was passed originally in 1920 and was made valid for the period of two years, so on the 1st September, 1922, it was coming to an end, but last year we extended the provisions of the act for one year making it applicable to the 1st September 1923, with certain restrictions proposed in a schedule that was annexed to the act. But now we contend, and I think it is only fair, that all the men, no matter what physical condition they may have been in who filed their applications before the 1st July, 1922, that is the time the act was amended with the schedule, should be insurable and in case of death their dependents will receive the insurance money. I asked the department to supply me with a report in this connection and they gave me the following figures which, perhaps, are not absolutely needed in this instance but which may be of interest to hon. members: Total number of policies issued as of March 31st, 1923, 19,516, with a value of $46,864,500. Total number of death claims as of March 31st, 1923, 514. I may say en passant that this is not a very large rate. The value of these claims is $1,622,500. The total number of claims settled under section 10, insurance cancelled by award of pension, was 109.

Mr. BOYS: Have you a statement of the premiums received for the policies that were paid?

Mr. BELAND: No, I have not that information.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister a statement of the applications refused?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, I will give that in a minute if my hon. friend will wait. Now, as to the number affected by the bill which I am going to introduce, I may state that the total number of cases that will be subject to review under the proposed legislation is 71. This has reference to the second part of the resolution, to applications which were not approved. The 71 applications are divided as follows: Applications of those who have died 35; applications with dependents still living but seriously ill, 36; making a total of 71 with a liability of $233,500. It is represented that these men had, under the original act, the privilege of insuring their lives only by making application, without any medical examination and regardless of their physical condition. Well, 71 of those cases have been refused, and I am introducing a bill to provide for the honouring of those claims.

The CHAIRMAN: Have you a copy of the amendment?

Mr. BELAND: I have no amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: There was an amendment read to paragraph 2.

Mr. BELAND: As far as the resolution is concerned?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: I must have the bill then.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it in the bill.

Mr. BELAND: It is in the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Beland thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 203, in respect of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act, and to provide:—

1. That the power to make regulations for the constitution of medical boards, including appeal boards, with such powers as may be deemed expedient, be repealed, and provision be made to give the minister power, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to make regulations for appeals from decisions as to the right of ex-members of the forces to treatment with pay and allowances, and for that purpose to designate the review and appeal tribunals to be constituted under the proposed amendments to the Pension Act.

2. That the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the minister, appoint an ex-member of the forces to be an Official Soldiers' Adviser in each unit or district of the department, at such salary or remuneration as may be decided in each case, with prescribed duties.

3. That the minister shall have power to appoint a person or persons to hear and receive evidence on oath in respect of any matter pertaining to the department or procedure of the department.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. BELAND: Under the Pension Act resolution which is now on the order paper it will be seen that a certain number of appeal boards will be constituted in different units throughout the country. The Pension Act, however, only deals with pensions. It is desired also to provide appeals for those ex-members of the force who are seeking treatment with pay and allowances. As hon. members are aware a number of men apply for treatment and are denied treatment with pay and allowance by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment board. As the right has been granted to appeal from a decision of the Pension board it is also proposed that the right shall be granted, in cases where treatment is denied, to appeal from the decision of headquarters to the boards that will be constituted under the Pension Act.

The second portion of the resolution provides for the appointment of a soldier adviser in every unit of the department, thus following the example which has been set in England. In every one of the thirty units in that country there is a soldier adviser who is paid by the government to give advice to the men who desire to appeal, that is, to examine their claim, and to advise them as to the propriety of appealing or not appealing, and to present their case before the board. In other words to represent them. This has been asked by the men generally throughout Canada and it has been recommended by the royal commission.

The third part of the resolution is a provision to give power to these investigators of the department to receive evidence on oath. This provision exists for the Pension board. In the Pension Act there is a clause, I do not remember which one, which provides that the investigators or the examiners of the Pension board can receive evidence on oath. We have numberless investigations to make in connection with treatment and with pensions. The officials of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment have no power to swear a person who gives evidence in these cases, and this provision is designed to prevent fraud as much as possible.

Mr. BOYS: How many appeal tribunals is it intended to appoint? One for each military district?

Mr. BELAND: One for each departmental unit.

Mr. BOYS: And I suppose the members of the tribunal are to be paid salaries?

Mr. BELAND: Oh, yes.

Mr. BOYS: How many units altogether?

Mr. BELAND: Nine units.

Mr. BOYS: And how many men will there be in each appeal tribunal?

Mr. BELAND: There will be three men.

Mr. BOYS: There will be twenty-seven appointments to be made in pursuance of this provision.

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: At what proposed salary?

Mr. BELAND: That will come under the Pension Act Bill. If my hon. friend desires to discuss it now, I can give him the information.

Mr. BOYS: I just asked as to the proposed salary.

[Mr. Béland.]

Mr. BELAND: The salary for the men who will serve on the appeal boards is not fixed. I did not intend to make that position a permanent one. I had in view—and I think it is also the recommendation of the royal commission—that these men should serve part time, and that they should be paid so much per day when they are called upon to sit on a certain number of appeals that are brought in by the unit. When a number of appeals has accumulated, the members of that board should be called together and will discharge their duties during one, two or three days in a month, or more, as the number of appeals would warrant, and they will be paid so much per day. We thought that it would be a good deal more economical than to pay a regular salary and have these men devote the whole of their time to the work. It is presumed that during the first six months, or perhaps during the first year, the number of appeals will be very large, but after one year the number will decrease considerably. Then it is provided in the bill that we can contract the appeal board to the number which will be required; in other words, to extend the territorial limits of these appeal boards. Some of the men who were heard by the royal commission submitted the view that there should be one in every unit and were very insistent upon it. Others expressed the view that, perhaps, if we had three or four all over Canada it would be sufficient. But the commission has recommended specifically that in each unit there should be an appeal board and I think my hon. friend from the Yukon (Mr. Black), if I mistake not, referred to the great patronage that would develop therefrom. I can assure my hon. friend that I do not see it in the same light. My idea is not to exercise any patronage in this regard. The aim will be to secure three outstanding men in each one of those cities where the unit is located, who would commend themselves to public confidence and to the confidence of the returned men generally, regardless of their political leanings. I may say that the royal commission itself contained one Liberal, one Independent, and one Conservative.

Mr. HANSON: Who was the Conservative?

Mr. BELAND: Dr. McKeown.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, no.

Mr. BELAND: Has my hon. friend any doubt about it?

Mr. HANSON: Yes, I have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Entirely wrong.

Mr. HANSON: Liberal-Conservative.

Mr. BELAND: That is an ameliorated Conservative.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid there is simply amelioration and no conservatism.

Mr. BELAND: If my hon friend knew of the protests I have received from my Liberal friends because I did not make the appointments strictly Liberal, he would agree with me.

Mr. SHAW: Has the minister considered the matter of having the appointment of the official soldier advisers made by the Civil Service Commission? It seems to me, at least, that there should be some good reason for having them appointed otherwise than by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BELAND: Does my hon. friend suggest they should be appointed by that commission?

Mr. SHAW: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: I have not the remotest objection.

Mr. CARROLL: Have they power to appoint temporary officials?

Mr. HANSON: Give them power to do it.

Mr. BELAND: No objection whatever. I would be pleased.

Mr. MANION: Is it the intention to proceed with the bills to-morrow? If so, we would require to get copies early in the morning because we want to look at them.

Mr. BELAND: No, it is not the intention, because they would not be distributed.

Mr. MANION: I hope my hon. friend will see that these bills are distributed early, because we would like to see them some time in advance of their being taken up in the House.

Mr. BOYS: As to the procedure before the appeal boards, will the boards merely review the evidence that appears on the files, or will they themselves hear evidence?

Mr. BELAND: It is provided that the man himself has the right to appear personally before that board.

Mr. BOYS: Before the appeal board?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, and he may submit whatever evidence he likes which is not already on the file, and the soldier adviser in this connection will be most useful to us. In that connection I would point out that I undertake before this House to appoint the soldier adviser that will be indicated to me by the returned soldiers' associations.

Mr. MANION: That is recommended by the commission, is it not?

Mr. BELAND: I think it is. The Civil Service Commission will suit me absolutely, if it suits the House. This is an appointment made by the soldiers themselves—their own representative.

Mr. POWER: Is the soldier adviser to be paid fees or salary?

Mr. BELAND: I presume these men will receive a retainer of so much a month. I presume the adviser will be a lawyer. That, of course, is in the hands of the soldiers themselves. If they should appoint a lawyer, we should provide, in accordance with the number of pensioners in the unit, what should be a fair monthly remuneration for him for whatever time he gives to the work of advising the soldiers generally.

Mr. POWER: There is a reference to the official soldier adviser in each unit or district; what is the distinction between unit and district?

Mr. BELAND: There is a distinction.

Mr. POWER: So that the intention of the minister is to appoint a soldier adviser in each unit? If I remember rightly Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia are all one unit?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: So that the man from Prince Edward Island, in order to have his case properly prepared, would have to consult his official adviser in Halifax?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Would it not be well to have an official adviser in Charlottetown or St. John, if it comes under the same unit? I would make that suggestion to the minister, owing to the difficulty of the men communicating with the adviser under the other arrangement. I think the minister should look into that. We have the same situation in Quebec. We happen to be under the control of the headquarters in Montreal. It is extremely difficult and inconvenient for pensioners in Quebec to have to consult the adviser or somebody in Montreal in regard to their pensions. I would suggest to the minister that, in cases where applicants are far removed from the headquarters an adviser should be appointed in some more convenient place. This seems to be a good job; let us give everybody a chance.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Beland thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 204, to amend the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BELAND moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What business has been arranged for to-morrow?

Mr. BELAND: I presume it was understood by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance to-day that we would move to go into Supply in order to afford the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) an opportunity of discussing a certain matter in connection with the Post Office Department. If we have time we will take up the second readings of certain bills on the order paper, a resolution in connection with the Canada Shipping Act, standing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; a resolution in connection with the Dominion Lands Act, standing in the name of the Minister of the Interior; a resolution in connection with the harbour of Three Rivers, standing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, a resolution in connection with the Militia Pension Act standing in the name of the Acting Minister of National Defence; also a resolution in connection with the Pension Act, standing in the name of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Mr. MANION: Is the minister going to endeavour to get this work of his finished this week?

Mr. BELAND: I hope to be able to-morrow to introduce the Pension Act amendment and to dispose of all those bills this week, if possible, by Thursday. I think we have discussed them, except the Pension Act amendment, pretty thoroughly. We could discuss the Pension Act on Thursday. I will try to arrange matters with that aim in view.

Mr. MANION: I hope the minister will endeavour to do that. A number of hon. members wish to go out of town for a short time. They have been staying over day after day hoping that this would go on. They stayed over last week, and now they are staying over this week. They would like to get away at the beginning of next week, and I hope the minister will do everything in his power to get this through.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. BELAND: I could accelerate matters if I were permitted to pass the resolution in connection with the Pension Act. I sent the bill to the Printing bureau this afternoon, and I hope to get it to-morrow.

Mr. MANION: I do not think there would be any objection to the House passing the resolution. We could discuss it on second reading.

Mr. BELAND: I cannot withdraw the motion for adjournment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: Can I get the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Pension Act, chapter 43 of the statutes of 1919, and the amending acts, and to provide,—

1. That enactments be made respecting pensions for military services rendered during the war and after the war, which shall be made retroactive to the first day of September, 1919, and all cases in which pension has been refused, reduced, discontinued or underrated by reason of the fact that the proposed legislation was not included in the Pension Act shall be subject to review by the Board of Pension Commissioners, and on such review pension shall be granted, increased or continued as from the date or dates it would have been granted, increased or continued had such proposed legislation been in force when such refusal, reduction or discontinuance or underrating was made effective.

2. That the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice may appoint a District Review Board for each of the nine districts of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and a Federal Appeal Board for Canada, to review appeals from decisions of the Board of Pension Commissioners; and that provision be made for the tenure of office and qualifications of the members of such boards, and for the payment of their remuneration or salaries out of any unappropriated moneys of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

3. That the Governor in Council may make such rules and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out and enforce the provisions of the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is it proposed to make the decisions before these district review boards, if favourable to the applicant, final, or are they only intermediary? Must applications go to the Pension board, be refused, then go to the district review board and then, in any event, go to the federal appeal board again? Will these boards not have power to deal finally if dealing favourably to the applicant?

Mr. BELAND: All appeals, after they have been dealt with by the district appeal board, must come back to the Board of Pension Commissioners. In the case of a more favourable decision rendered by the district appeal board, the pension board will carry it out; but should they refuse to carry it out, it will automatically go to the federal appeal board for confirmation. Then the Board of Pension Commissioners shall be bound by the decision of the appeal board. In the case that the Board of Pension Commissioners carries out the decision of the district appeal board, the decision is final. In every case where the decision of the district appeal board is not more favourable to the applicant than the decision appealed against, it will automatically, through the Board of Pension Commissioners, go to the federal appeal board.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Beland thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 205, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. CARROLL: Shall we get copies of the bill before it comes up for second reading?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Beland the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Tuesday, June 12, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) (for the Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act, chapter eighty-six of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by providing that the Governor in Council may make special regulations as to the sale of naphtha and its use for illuminating purposes, and that, subject to regulations made by the Governor in Council under authority of section three of the act, naphtha shall not be sold or offered for sale in Canada for illuminating purposes, except for the uses prescribed in section fourteen thereof.

He said: In the absence of the hon. Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau) I desire to state that the subject matter of this resolution has been communicated to His Excellency the Governor General, who has been pleased to recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) (for the Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by providing for the inclusion of certain employees as departmental analysts; that the certificate of departmental or provincial analysts shall be accepted as evidence in all prosecutions under the Act; that a penalty be prescribed for deodorizing or clarifying denatured alcohol or specially denatured alcohol; and that a cultivator of tobacco for private use may sell the surplus tobacco grown by him after paying to the nearest officer of Inland Revenue the duty of twenty cents per pound.

He said: In the absence of the hon. Minister of Customs and Excise I desire to state that the subject matter of this resolution has been communicated to His Excellency the Governor General, who has been pleased to recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) (for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Canada Shipping Act, chapter one hundred and thirteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, by providing:—

1. That no registrar shall register any ship purchased or otherwise acquired from a foreign subject or corporation where any bill of sale or other document under or by virtue of which the ship became vested in the applicant for registry contains any provision express, implied or constructive, restricting the use of the vessel or imputing any measure of continued control thereof by the government of a foreign country.

2. That where in the opinion of the minister any person who applies to be registered as owner of a ship has not sufficient assets in Canada, other than the ship itself, to reimburse His Majesty for any expenses His Majesty may subsequently incur in connection with such ship, her master or a member of her crew, the minister may prohibit a registrar from registering such person as owner until security for such expenses, in such form and such amount as the minister may decide, shall have been furnished.

3. That the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the manner in which grain cargoes shall be loaded at ports in Canada on ships bound to ports outside of Canada not within the limits of inland navigation, and for the imposition of penalties for breach of any such regulations.

4. That the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the manner in which the Port Warden shall perform his duties, and giving him such additional duties as he may from time to time see fit.

5. That annual returns shall be made by surveyors, and that provision be made for calculating tonnage.

He said: In the absence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe)

I desire to state that the subject matter of this resolution has been communicated to His Excellency the Governor General, who has been pleased to recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BANFF PARK POWER PRIVILEGES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SHAW: I should like to ask the government what disposition has been made of the application of the Calgary Power Company for additional power privileges in Banff National Park?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a question I think for the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). I will direct his attention to it when he comes into the House.

SUPPLY—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding for Committee of Supply.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): In the statement of business for to-day which was given last night but which I have not before me at the moment, I am pretty sure Supply was not mentioned.

Mr. BELAND: I think it was mentioned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just for one purpose, to enable the hon. member for St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) to bring up a certain subject.

Mr. BELAND: I stated, Mr. Speaker, that opportunity would be afforded for the discussion referred to but that afterwards we would go into Committee of Supply. At any rate, that was my intention, when I announced the business that would be taken up to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was not stated. I cannot dispute the hon. member's intention; all I can state is what he said. Hon. members must make their preparations in accordance with the government's statement. It is true that between twelve and one o'clock I was personally notified that the government intended to go into Committee of Supply on other matters, but even that notification to me is not sufficient. I did not get it myself until the time mentioned. But I am only one member; other members guide themselves by the notice of the government leader the night before, and would not be prepared, especially on important matters of Supply, because of the information given by the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. What the minister stated was that a motion would be made to go into Committee of Supply in order to afford the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) an opportunity of discussing certain matters in connection with the Post Office Department. Then he went on to say:

> If we have time we will take up the second readings of certain bills on the order paper—

And he named a list of them occupying a space two inches long—

Mr. BELAND: Three inches long.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Three inches is it?—which would be quite sufficient to take up to-day, I think.

Mr. BELAND: I take it for granted that at this stage of the session, when there is time we always go into Committee of Supply. There are very few estimates to be disposed of.

Mr. SPEAKER: It may, perhaps, clarify matters if I remind the hon. leader of the Opposition—I do not know whether he was here yesterday at three o'clock—that the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) rose and spoke for a few minutes on the motion to go into Committee of Supply, and it was agreed between the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) that the question should be deferred and should come up to-day on the motion for Supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to that, that is quite proper. We expect a motion for Supply for that purpose but not for the other.

SUPPLY—DISMISSAL OF MLLE. BOULAY

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to bring the facts of this case before the House as briefly as I can. I regret that the documentation is rather large, and that it is necessary to refer to a good deal of it. I said yesterday that Mademoiselle Boulay, who was postmistress at Sayabec Station, had been dismissed from her position. As far as I can gather from the correspondence, her offence, and her sole offence, was the fact that she was a daughter of the previous member for Matane, Mr. Boulay. Of course, something else is alleged in the correspondence, and what that is and the way in which the removal of Mademoiselle Boulay was rather carefully led up to will be revealed by an inspection of the documents.

Now, the matter began as far back as the 4th January, 1922, when my hon. friend the Postmaster General received an offer, in perhaps rather unusual terms, from a gentleman named Eugene Lacroix who wrote from Sayabec under that date and said that he was just offering the minister a place to hold the post office, that it was some place where the post office had been kept before but there was now another proprietor. It used to belong to Mr. Boulay, the deputy who had been beaten in the county of Matane and "we," whoever that may be, "had now acquired the property." He not only offers it but he says he desires to hold the post office, like so many other people who are desirous of holding some position under the government. He wants the Postmaster General to be good enough to give it to him and then he will make an arrangement with the Postmaster General. If the Postmaster General will give him the post office he will give him the building to hold it in for nothing and he thinks, and he says, "It will be difficult to do better than that." Evidently Mr. Lacroix was a very good supporter of our friend who now represents the county of Matane in this House (Mr. Pelletier). At any rate, he started the ball rolling. There were other gentlemen who also thought they had the support of the hon. member for Matane but perhaps they had not. I suppose they had no right to assume they had that support. The minister on the 12th January, very properly told Mr. Lacroix that this was a matter for the Civil Service Commission. Then Miss Boulay, who held the post office, had apparently heard that something was on foot. On the 17th January, she wrote the minister saying that she had learned that Mr. Lacroix had caused to be sent a request under false representations in respect to her; that he said to certain persons in order to get their signatures that she had resigned, and to others he said that he wanted the request signed in her favour so that the post office might remain in the building in which it was. Then she says that she has not given her resignation to anybody, and asks if it is necessary for her to sign a request for the purpose of annulling the request of Mr. Lacroix. Mr. Lacroix is told on the 17th January, that this statement has been put in and that the lady has no intention of getting out of the office—and the House will note that at that time the minister is finding no fault with her. On the 20th January, Mr. Lacroix presses his claim a little more. He now encloses a request signed by a number of people at Sayabec Station asking that the post office be left in the place where it was at the time, and in case there should be any change of postmistress or postmaster to give the position to him. He says that he hopes to have a favourable response, that with a request as strong as this one he does not believe the minister can refuse him. He sends with that a document which is rather remarkable. Mr. Lacroix, the man who has apparently convinced the Civil Service Commission, sent a petition to the minister on the 20th January, signed by ratepayers of the village or station of Sayabec, in which they say:

> That they wish to put very respectfully before His Honour the Postmaster General that Mademoiselle Boulay, postmistress of the said village, having given her resignation ought to be replaced soon.

And they are made to ask that occasion should be taken to give Mr. Lacroix the appointment as the new postmaster, and they point out the advantage of having the post office in a central site which they understand he controls. This was certainly ingenious on the part of Mr. Lacroix. He does not get very much, perhaps, from the minister, who just simply acknowledges receipt of his letter, and tells him that he has not received the resignation of Miss Boulay, and that in consequence the position is not vacant. So that down to the 25th January the minister is finding no fault with Miss Boulay. On the 6th February we have a letter written by Mr. Pelletier, the present member for Matane, addressed to William Foran, Secretary of the Civil Service Commission, dated 6th February in which he says:—

> A few days ago I wrote to the hon. Postmaster General in regard to a proposed transfer of the post office at Sayabec. My request has been referred to the deputy Postmaster General for inquiry and report. Thinking that this matter is under the control of the Civil Service Commission, I would, therefore, ask you to do nothing in this matter until I have the opportunity of conferring with said commission.

The previous letter, so far as I can find, is not on the files, and I do not know whether it refers to Mr. Lacroix, and I do not know what the contents were; it has not been returned. Then on the 28th February Miss Boulay writes to the minister and speaks of the lease of the building, the time of its expiration, and says that this building has become the property of Mr. A. Lacroix since the 15th March, and that she has seen Mr. Lacroix and asked him if he would consent, after the expiration of the lease, to lease the building to her, but she has not been able to obtain any answer. On the 21st March the member for Matane again writes to the hon. Postmaster General and says:

> In connection with the post office at Sayabec, I wish to state that, setting aside all political feelings, I must say in justice to all parties concerned, that Miss Boulay, the present postmistress at the above-named place is the daughter of my opponent Mr. Hermenegilde Boulay, and that the said Miss Boulay,

Mr. FOURNIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: I hope the hon. member will be able to carry the "hear, hear" outside of this chamber, and go upon any platform in the country and advocate the spoils system, the slightest reference to which is met by a "hear, hear" from him.

Mr. FOURNIER: Well, I can do it.

Mr. BAXTER: I have every faith in the ability of the hon. member in performing that which he claims to be able to do, but I do not know that such a thing would be so distinctly complimentary to him. The letter continues:

> And that the said Miss Boulay is the daughter of my opponent Mr. Hermenegilde Boulay, and that the said Miss Boulay during the campaign of 1921 allowed her father to hold political meetings in the post office. Therefore, knowing as I do, that the present postmistress has taken a very active part in politics, I feel the post office should be moved to a place where it will be exempt from all political influence.

And that is quite right. If Miss Boulay were guilty there should be only one rule to apply. No postmistress or postmaster has any business to meddle with elections. But I say Miss Boulay should be treated at least as a British subject and get some fair form of trial. She should have that undeniable right which has always been accorded by the laws of both the races represented here, that a person should be heard in his or her behalf before being condemned. And Miss Boulay was not heard.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member is being heard.

Mr. BAXTER: The letter continues:

> I therefore would recommend that the postmistress be dismissed and that Mr. Georges Bouchard, of Sayabec, who has a building that would suit the government and the public in general in that district, should be named in her stead.
>
> I sincerely trust that you will take this matter in serious consideration and that you may see your way clear to grant my request.
>
> Thanking you in anticipation, I remain,
>
> Yours truly,
> F. J. PELLETIER.

Ten days is rather a long time. On the 31st March we have another letter from the member addressed to the minister and it is marked "House of Commons" and reads:

> With further reference to the postmaster at Sayabec. I am herewith enclosing two affidavits, one from Mr. Cote, merchant, saying that Miss Boulay has allowed her father to hold political meetings in the post office during the recent campaign.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: How amusing it is to some hon. members. Is it really enough that a member of parliament shall write these things to make them incontrovertible? Would hon. members who laugh like to be tried in that way themselves if anyone launched an accusation against them? Would anyone be quite content to have the unsworn testimony of the prosecutor accepted as sufficient, and not be heard on their own behalf? I do not think so. And why should politics make a difference? Why should it obstruct the principles of fair play? I have also a letter from the member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier) which reads:

> With further reference to the post office at Sayabec, I am herewith enclosing two affidavits, one from Mr. Cote, merchant, showing that Miss Boulay, the postmistress, has allowed her father to hold political meetings in the post office during the recent campaign; also one from Miss Aurelie Imbeault, showing that the postmistress was actively engaged in political affairs on voting day.
> I therefore reiterate my request that she be dismissed and that the post office be placed in charge of Mr. Georges Bouchard who lives right close to where the post office is now, and I may state that he has very good quarters and the people of Sayabec are seemingly anxious to have Mr. Bouchard take charge of said office.
>
> Hoping that this matter will not be delayed, I remain,
>
> Yours very truly,
> F. J. PELLETIER.

Now there was probably some conversation in the meantime, but we have no note of it in these records. I will turn for a moment to these returns. Here is a copy of an affidavit of Mr. Cote which says:

> I, the undersigned, Louis Côté, merchant of the village of Saindon, parish of Sayabec, having been duly sworn on the Holy Scriptures, deponeth and saith:
> That on November 29 last, 1921, a political meeting was held by H. Boulay, candidate at the last general election, in the county of Matane, at the post office of Sayabec Station, of which Miss Adrienne Boulay is in charge.
> And I have signed.
> (Signed) LOUIS CÔTÉ.
> Sworn before me at Sayabec, this 27th day of March, 1922.
> (Signed) L. P. JOUBERT, S.C.C.,
> District of Rimouski.

Now this affidavit is regularly sworn by some one who, of course, violated the law of Canada in swearing any one to an affidavit.

Mr. MERCIER: Why?

Mr. BAXTER: That surprises my hon. friend. There is such a thing as the Canada Evidence Act. There is also an act for the suppression of extra-judicial oaths. The furthest anyone can go is merely to make a statutory declaration. I will tell my hon. friend—and I am glad always to dispense a little information—that it is an absolute crime against the laws of Canada to swear a person to an affidavit unless with lawful authority. This, however, was taken in the absence of Mademoiselle Boulay. She never saw it. She was never confronted with the man who made it. Some one accepts it. She gets no trial. She gets no hearing. It is matter for the judgment of the House if that is fair dealing. The affidavit to which I refer was simply a declaration on oath that on the 29th November, 1921, a political assembly was held by Mr. Boulay, candidate for the constituency of Matane at the last federal election, in the post office of Sayabec station kept by Mademoiselle Boulay.

The next affidavit is by Aurelie Imbeault, of the village of Saindon, who is also sworn and who states:

I, the undersigned, Aurélie Imbeault, of the village of Saindon, in the parish of Sayabec, being duly sworn on the Holy Scriptures, deponeth and saith:

That Miss Adrienne Boulay, postmistress at Sayabec Station, has taken an active part in politics on polling day, by going in quest of women voters at their homes and taking them to the polling booth during the Dominion election of December 6 last.

And I have signed.

(Signed) AURÉLIE IMBEAULT.

Sworn before me, at Sayabec, on March 25, 1922.

(Signed) L. P. JOUBERT, S.C.C.,
Dist. of Rimouski.

A declaration that she busied herself actively in politics on voting day by going to bring female electors from their houses to the polls for the federal election, in which, of course, her father was interested. That is the first instance that we have of anything like a charge. Then we have the reply to that on the 6th April from the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy). He says:

Dear Mr. Pelletier,

I am duly in receipt of your letter of March 31st enclosing affidavits in connection with the post office at Sayabec Station.

I notice that one of the statements is to the effect that the postmistress allowed the post office to be used for purposes which are improper and of a nature absolutely foreign to its destination as such. As an irregularity of so grievous a character cannot be tolerated, I have given orders for the dismissal of Miss Boulay.

Hon. gentlemen will note that the Postmaster General wrote to the deputé for Matane in French. He received the letter in English. I suppose that is the explanation why the Postmaster General is not anxious to have a French-writing deputy. He can do the work himself.

Mr. MURPHY: If my hon. friend will permit me, he misstates the position of the Postmaster General in that regard. He is anxious to have a French-writing deputy.

Mr. BAXTER: I congratulate the Postmaster General upon his taste, but not upon his speed. The Postmaster General said:

I note that one of these declarations is to the effect that the postmistress has permitted the use of the post office for an improper purpose and one absolutely foreign to postal administration. As an irregularity so serious cannot be approved, I have ordered the dismissal of Mademoiselle Boulay.

Tried in her absence, condemned without a hearing, and executed without mercy. On the 7th April, Mr. Eugène Lacroix, who afterwards got the job, but who was not the protege of the member for the constituency after all, though, perhaps, he may have thought he was, wrote asking what had been the result of a requisition signed by 235 people that he had sent three months before. He states that every day his friends of Sayabec are asking themselves what has been the result of the request, and he cannot give them information for he does not know any more about the matter than they do. He hopes for a response very soon, and he remains the very humble and very obedient servant of the Postmaster General, from whom he does not get any particular consolation. The minister tells him on the 15th April that that is a matter for the Civil Service Commission, and he says: "In case there should be any change of postmistress at the place indicated"—that is on the 15th April, but on the 6th April the Postmaster General had given orders for her dismissal. One is not surprised; the whole thing is evidently a political affair. The deputé for Matane had a candidate and that candidate was not Mr. Lacroix, it was Mr. Georges Bouchard; and naturally the minister is not going to assist Mr. Lacroix by giving him any unnecessary information. On the 19th April, Mr. Coolican of the Post Office Department writes for the General Superintendent to the Acting District Superintendent of Postal Service at Quebec:

It has been represented to the department that the postmistress at Sayabec station has allowed the post office at that point to be used for improper purposes, and in view of the fact that the post office is rented by the government a serious offence of this kind cannot be countenanced.

Under the circumstances the Postmaster General has authorized a change in the postmastership at Sayabec station.

Mr. Boulay, the father, writes to the Postmaster General saying that he wishes to ask a favour, namely to keep his daughter there as postmistress. He tells him that she has gained her living for six or seven years and that the department has nothing to reproach her with; that some instances are without doubt going to be brought before him for the purpose of having her dismissed, but he hopes he will grant her request. He says that the dismissal would not serve the Liberal party very much for about nine-tenths of the Liberals in the county are in her favour.

Moreover she is a woman, and he says that if the minister will refer to the dismissals made in Rimouski at the time when he was a member, the minister will see that one woman only lost her office, all the others being kept on by him.

I know before we get through the discussion, that it will be alleged that Mr. Boulay caused numerous dismissals.

Mr. FOURNIER: My hon. friend refers to Mr. Boulay. Is he the same gentleman who, when the Parliament building burned down, put in a claim for $200 for a bad promissory note and a pair of mittens?

Mr. BAXTER: I would be more than happy if I could give my hon. friend any information he desires, but I shall have to say to him that, so far as I know, he is not.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the same one.

Mr. BAXTER: My hon. friend speaks of some instance of which I never heard. I brought the matter personally to the minister's attention on the 20th April, 1922, and this is the first that I had heard of it. I told the minister that it was rumoured that Miss Boulay was to be dismissed, although her father did not know for what reason. The minister then replied to me on the 26th April, stating:

> This case has been before me for consideration, and in view of the fact that the postmistress allowed the building rented by the government for post office purposes, to be put to improper use, I have been obliged to follow the departmental procedure in such cases and accordingly gave instructions that her services be dispensed with.
> In view of the courtesy of your letter, I may assure you that the circumstances of the case and the evidence submitted, amply warrant the action taken.

Now, so far as the record discloses, that is all I have; I have given hon. members every syllable of the testimony that was submitted to the minister. The minister continues:

> From the terms of your letter, I judge that you are not acquainted with Mr. Boulay. At the first opportunity I will show you some illuminating exhibits from the official files.

I thought it was Miss Boulay that was on trial and not her unfortunate father. But as an excuse for the dismissal of the daughter there can be shown me some illuminating exhibits from the official files with reference to the father. Then we have a very large petition sent to the Postmaster General signed by numerous residents of this locality who say that Miss Boulay has for many years been postmistress in this place and has given general satisfaction, that the office has been kept in a perfect manner to the satisfaction of the public and the authorities of the postal department; and they insist strongly in their demand that she be allowed to continue in the exercise of her functions. They are strenuously opposed to any change in this relation. That petition was sent in in April, 1922, and, as I say, was numerously signed. On the 4th of May, Mr. Boulay, the father, writes to Mr. Tanner Green, inspector of post offices, that he is well enough informed to be able to deny swearing to the accusation in the name of Mlle. Boulay and to demand an inquiry at which he desires to be called, if justice can be accorded. Mlle. Boulay, he says, has never given any permission to make use of the post office for any improper purpose; and that such a suggestion is a black calumny.

Mr. MERCIER: Who signed that?

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Boulay, the father; this is a letter to Mr. Tanner Green. Then we have Mr. Bouchard's application. There is a lot of correspondence leading up to that, and in answer to the civil service form, inquiring whether he has any defect of sight, hearing or speech, or any other infirmity, he says he has. That was the gentleman, however, who was being backed by the member for the time being. Some nine persons made oath again on May 8, 1922, that they were present in the post office at a political meeting held by Mr. Boulay and his friend Mr. Martineau at Sayabec. This is a solemn declaration, but they do not say that Miss Boulay knew anything about the matter, gave permission, opened the door or lent the key; it is alleged, only, that she was the holder of the office at the time. We also have a little sidelight on the way people were putting petitions around there when we find a lady making a declaration that she and others had been asked to put their names to a petition alleging that a request had been made that Miss Boulay might be paid her salary for the month of April. The lady who signs this says that the petition was supposed to be for the purpose of obtaining a pension for Miss Boulay, she having held the post office for more than ten years. But it was really a petition for the appointment of one of those who sought office.

On the 4th May, the Postmaster General apparently thought that it might not be quite fair to deal with the matter in the summary manner he had intended, and so he wrote to his friend the hon. member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier) enclosing some correspondence. He says:

In reading the enclosures, please note that Boulay denies, over his own handwriting, that any meeting was held in the post office.

After you have read the enclosures, I would like to see you about the whole matter, as it is evident that Boulay is in touch with his party friends with a view to having the matter ventilated as a grievance.

On May 6, the hon. member replies:

I shall read the enclosures very carefully and will be pleased to see you on Monday next and explain fully what the conditions are and have been at Sayabec.

I would not have asked the dismissal of the postmistress had I not been in a position to prove everything I have advanced against her.

That proof, however, has not yet been adduced. On the previous day, May 5, the same hon. gentleman writes Mr. Tanner Green, Inspector of Post Offices, and again recommends Mr. Bouchard as postmaster. He is persuaded that he is a sober man, is competent, and will know how to do justice to all the citizens of Sayabec. He recommends Mr. Bouchard to the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department. One would hardly have supposed that it would be necessary to have a Civil Service Commission if recommendations of this character were to go very far. Then the minister writes to Mr. Boulay stating:

In the course of the correspondence from you, I observe that you state that the Conservative party in 1911 did not dismiss anybody in your county without holding what you term a "reasonable inquiry". This statement led me to ask for the production of the files, and I regret to say that their contents are in direct contradiction of your statement. Without going into too many details, allow me to say that in the case of the county you represented, I find, in your handwriting, one list demanding the dismissal of no fewer than 23 postmasters, on the sole ground that they had taken an active part in politics against you. I further find that in each of the 23 cases the postmasters were dismissed without any inquiry whatever, and without any other evidence than was furnished by the list in your handwriting, demanding the dismissals solely on political grounds. You must, therefore, admit that if the department were to follow the example furnished by the written proofs on file here, there would be wholesale dismissals in your county, as there were in 1911, on the mere demand of the sitting member.

But Mr. Boulay does not accept that view at all. On the 8th of May he says:

I have perhaps asked for the dismissal of these persons to put back the offices into the hands of those that the Liberal party had taken them from in 1896, and not otherwise. At the time I asked for the dismissal of these twenty-three postmasters this was refused, except in the cases above cited, without previous inquiry; and I defy you to prove to the contrary of that statement in any case in this county.

He alleges that political friends of his were brutally dismissed in 1896 without any other reason than politics. He asserts that he has not asked for the dismissal of anyone for political reasons. All that was asked generally in 1911 was simply the re-establishment in their original positions of those people whom the Liberal party had thrown into the street in 1896 and very few were put back.

My friend from Matane (Mr. Pelletier), however, does not cease his efforts. On the 9th May he sends the minister an application signed by Mr. Bouchard, who had succeeded in being placed temporarily in charge of the post office at Sayabec Station. The minister replies on the 13th May and says that the representations made on Mr. Bouchard's behalf will be referred to the Civil Service Commission, by whom, under present legislation, the regular appointment will be made. Then my friend from Matane comes back on the 2nd June with another letter to the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission, in which, after acknowledging receipt of a communication from the secretary stating that the position is now vacant, he says:

I thank you for having advised me of the fact, and in passing permit me to say to you that Mr. George Bouchard, who was chosen as postmaster a couple of months ago, is very competent and, besides, I learn that he has spent $250 to $275 to repair the office. No doubt Mr. Bouchard will make application and you will see by his work that he is very competent to fill this position.

He adds he cannot recommend Mr. Bouchard too highly. On the 8th June he again asks the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission to take Mr. Bouchard's application into his "serious consideration," and on the same day he sends, under separate cover, two more letters of recommendation on behalf of Mr. Bouchard. On the 4th July Mr. Tanner Green writes to Mr. Eugene Lacroix,—the man who eventually got the appointment—sending back his petition on the ground that it was not dated and that all he had was a typewritten copy. Then Mr. Lacroix writes to the Postmaster General that his petition was in the minister's office. He apparently could not get it there. It went back and forth and nobody knew where the missing petition was, but Mr. Lacroix writes Mr. Tanner Green on the 8th July telling him that he has sent the original to Mr. Pelletier, who said that he had sent it to the Postmaster General. The writer also encloses a letter which he had received from the deputy for Matane and he wants to know where the original petition is. The Postmaster General even got a ruling from the Justice department, which states as a fact that the postmistress of Sayabec having allowed the post office to be used for a political meeting, she is guilty of improper conduct and subject to removal by the Postmaster General. One would still think the charge should be proved and the woman given a chance to defend herself. On the 13th July Miss Boulay again denies that the meeting was held with her permission or with her knowledge. On the 3rd August the Postmaster General replies with the assurance that the proofs actually on file in the department are sufficient to show that no injustice has been done the postmistress.

On the 30th September Miss Boulay writes to the minister:

> Having written you already many times asking you to be good enough to grant me an inquiry concerning my dismissal as postmistress of Sayabec Station, and never having had any response, I am again reiterating my request. I greatly desire to undergo an inquiry, and I hope you will accord it without further delay. You have no doubt received a copy of the petition from the public of Sayabec demanding that I be maintained in my office. The original was addressed to the Civil Service Commission.

In reply the Postmaster General tells her that he can add nothing to his previous communications upon the subject. On the 27th November Mr. Tanner Green writes the Civil Service Commission saying:

> With reference to the commission's letter of the 24th instant, asking for further information regarding the comparative qualifications and premises offered by Messrs. Bouchard and Lacroix, applicants for the Sayabec Station postmastership, the undersigned advises that Mr. Bouchard, who has been in charge of the post office since the 8th April last and who previous to 1911 acted as assistant to his father, the then postmaster, is surely the better qualified of the two.
> His quarters are sufficient, adequate and well located. Doubtless more central than Mr. Lacroix's, and therefore his selection would seem to be justified on these premises.

I do not propose to go into the competition between these two men or the attitude that has been taken either by the minister or his deputy in regard to the matter. I think I have referred to all the correspondence that is material, and I know it will be useless to take up the time of the House any longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Well, it is a great pleasure to have the concurrence of hon. members opposite in some things. I know there will be no change made in this postmastership, but I want to put it on record as a regrettable fact that anyone should be dismissed on the written evidence of witnesses behind his or her back without being given an opportunity to cross-examine or challenge the witnesses. I think her request for a full inquiry should have been granted. No matter what may have been done in the past, I say it is still more unfortunate if we are to have a continued system of reprisals after every change of administration under which we are to be looked upon as enemy parties, each seeking to acquire some advantage over the other. When this House decided in favour of a Civil Service Commission it was to get rid of such a discreditable system. If, however, the Civil Service Act is to be practically disregarded, if we are to have dismissals merely at the request of the member for any constituency, and if we are to have a minister complaisantly granting such requests, we need not wonder if the Civil Service Commission gradually lapses into a body without very much vitality and accepts the pretty direct suggestions that are made to it through the medium of correspondence such as I have quoted.

4 p.m.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the issue raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Baxter) who has just taken his seat I desire to thank him and the other members for the cordiality of the welcome which they extended to me upon returning to resume my duties in this Chamber after a long period of enforced absence. I desire also, Sir, to thank the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) for his courtesy in allowing the matter under discussion to stand over from yesterday so that I might have an opportunity to familiarize myself with the facts of the case which he has brought to the attention of the House.

To give these facts their proper setting allow me to furnish some features which were not included in the hon. gentleman's statement. My hon. friend began his very temperate and fair presentation of the case by saying that judging by the record the sole offence chargeable to the postmistress at Sayabec Station was that she was the daughter of the previous member of parliament for that county. That, Mr. Speaker, I need not say is not correct, but I might add that if my hon. friend had been a member of this House from 1911 to 1917 he would be more fully aware than he is at present of the seriousness of the charge that he himself has made against the late postmistress at Sayabec Station. I would like to point out for the information of the House and for a proper understanding of the matter under discussion just how firmly entrenched was the Boulay dynasty at Sayabec Station. In the first place it is not the postmistress, the daughter, at all who is the chief actor in this matter. The moving spirit and the directing mind is the father, Mr. Hermenegilde Boulay. Mr. Boulay was the member for that county from 1911 to 1917. During that period, referring only to his activity in connection with the Post Office Department, he induced the Public Works Department to lease a building for post office purposes to Mrs. H. B. Boulay, his wife. Then he made a charge against the then postmaster, had him dismissed on political grounds, and induced the then Postmaster General to appoint his daughter, Miss Adrienne Boulay, as postmistress at Sayabec Station. Then, as a good provider, as the head of a family ought to be, in order to see that nothing would escape the Boulay family, he had his son made the contractor for the carriage of the mails at Sayabec Station. So that my hon. friend, who apparently was unaware of these facts, will appreciate how deeply incensed was the Boulay dynasty when their entrenchments were disturbed by the unfeeling member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier). So much for the situation at Sayabec Station.

In connection with the renting of the building Mr. Boulay was not only not satisfied with having the ordinary arrangements applied in the lease that was made between the Department of Public Works and his wife, but he succeeded in having the rule applicable to such cases set aside. I might explain, Mr. Speaker, not for your benefit because as a former Postmaster General you are quite familiar with it, but for the benefit of my hon. friends in the House, that the usual practice in the case of an office such as that at Sayabec Station is to grant a rent allowance based on the revenue of the office, and when that is done the postmaster takes that amount and rents the office and pays for it himself. But not so with Mr. Boulay in the case of Sayabec Station. He first of all saw to it that his daughter got the usual allowance of $75 based on the revenues of the office, and then he got the Public Works Department to enter into a lease with his wife and add $125 more, so that they got $200 for this office which Miss Boulay should have provided out of the $75 allowed her by the Post Office Department. These are some slight features that have a bearing on the case.

Now let us for a moment dwell on the statement which my hon. friend extracted, and quite properly from a letter of Mr. Boulay which appears on the record, that is, that Mr. Boulay resented the statement that he had dismissed people on the wholesale scale charged against him, after 1911. Well, the records show that in this county there has been but one dismissal at the instance of the present member, while Mr. Boulay in a shorter time dismissed thirty-five, and I hold in my hand a list in Mr. Boulay's handwriting demanding the dismissal of no less than twenty-three people on the sole ground that they had been guilty of active political partisanship. I observe that my hon. friend quoted a statement from Mr. Boulay's letter to the effect that he had only made this request in the case of people who had replaced Conservatives who had been removed from office by the Liberals, but unfortunately for Mr. Boulay the document itself does not bear that out, because in certain paragraphs he does distinguish by asking for the reinstatement of certain people, but in other paragraphs he makes just the plain request that Mr. So-and-So be removed and Mr. So-and-So put in his place.

Mr. BAXTER: They were not removed, were they?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, they were. They were removed on the authority of a little tell-tale pencil interlineation which I will read, and which is as follows: "O.K.—L.P.P." in every case.

Mr. MERCIER: Whose initials are those?

Mr. MURPHY: L.P.P. are the initials of the former postmaster general, the Hon. Mr. Pelletier.

Mr. MERCIER: Does it say that an inquiry was made?

Mr. MURPHY: No there was no inquiry made in any case. Now what are the charges in the present case? The charges on which the action was taken are two. First, that the postmistress allowed the building to be used for the holding of a political meeting. As to that we were furnished with a written statement by the hon. member for Matane.

Mr. BAXTER: He was not at the meeting surely.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know whether he was there or not but in any event he makes the statement as a matter of personal knowledge and on his responsibility as a member of the House—a ground that in previous days was deemed amply sufficient to grant the request of the Conservative member supporting the administration of the day. But we have much more than that. We had supporting the statement of the hon. member for Matane the affidavit of Louis Cote which my hon. friend read, and which I propose to read in turn in order to make comment upon it:

I, the undersigned, Louis Côté, merchant ,of the village of Saindon, parish of Sayabec, having been duly sworn on the Holy Scriptures, deponeth and saith:

That on November 29 last, 1921, a political meeting was held by H. Boulay, candidate at the last general election in the county of Matane, at the post office of Sayabec Station, of which Miss Adrienne Boulay is in charge.

And I have signed.

(Signed) LOUIS CÔTÉ.

Sworn before me at Sayabec, this 27th day of March 1922.

(Signed) L. P. JOUBERT, S.C.C.,
District of Rimouski.

Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) in commenting upon that seemed somewhat to attack the validity of the document, on account of the manner in which it was drawn up and sworn to. I understand, however, that the form in which this document was drawn up is a customary one in the civil courts of the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: In the superior courts.

Mr. BAXTER: Part of my criticism is that although a political meeting was held it does not appear that Mademoiselle Boulay had any knowledge of it or gave any consent to it.

Mr. MURPHY: It does not appear she had any knowledge or gave any consent, but she must have given the key to her father because he said "It was I who opened the door."

My hon. friend also referred to another affidavit supporting the charge of the hon. member for Matane. He read this in part; he did not read the whole of it. Had he read the whole of it I think the House would have been more impressed with its importance. I propose to read the whole of it. The affidavit in question is as follows:

We, the undersigned, of the parish of Ste. Marie of Sayabec, being sworn on the Holy Evangelists, respectively make oath and say, that on the 29th day of November last we assisted at a political meeting held in the post office of Sayabec Station, of which Miss Adrienne Boulay was the official at the time.

The aforesaid meeting was held by the candidate, H. Boulay, and his friend, Mr. Martineau of Québec.

And we make this declaration solemnly, knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and in virtue of the Canada Evidence Act,

And we have signed,

This is the part my hon. friend omitted:

E. BANVILLE,
LÉOPOLD JOUBERT, cult.
FRANÇOIS JEAN, cult.
LOUIS CÔTÉ, marchand,
VICTORIEN SMITH, inspecteur,
OCTAVE OUELLET, cult.
L. P. LEPAGE, M. dentiste.
ROMÉO RINGUET,
J. GEO. BOUCHARD, H.C.S.

Now this is a formidable list of names, and my hon. friend passed them over in presenting his version of the affidavit to the House. The affidavit concludes:

[Mr. Murphy.]

Declared before me at Sayabec, the 8th day of May, 1922.

(Signed) L. P. JOUBERT, J.P.,
District of Rimouski.

I have mentioned that Mademoiselle Boulay was not present at this meeting, but in a letter dated the 8th May, 1922, Mr. Boulay writes in the course of this communication addressed to me as follows:

A speaker made a speech in the waiting-room of the office, but it was without the permission and knowledge of the postmistress, because it was I who opened the door.

The father says the daughter was not there and the meeting was held without her knowledge and without her permission, and he gives us proof of that. He says "It was I who opened the door." Well, it is impossible to shift responsibility in that way in view of the activity of the father throughout all these proceedings. The use of a building for other than post office purposes is specifically prohibited by a rule or regulation of the department. That rule or regulation is imparted to the incumbent of each office upon such incumbent assuming the duties of his or her office, and my information is that such rule or regulation was communicated to Miss Boulay in the case of the post office building at Sayabec Station. Hence she violated that rule with knowledge of the consequences.

The second charge was that she was engaged in active partisan work during the general election of 1921. As to that there is a statement in the letter from the hon. member for Matane, and there is a specific affidavit on the point from Miss Aurélie Imbeault which reads as follows:

I, the undersigned Aurélie Imbeault of the village of Saindon, parish of Sayabec, having been sworn on the Holy Evangelists, depose and say:

That Miss Adrienne Boulay, postmistress of Sayabec Station, was actively engaged in politics on election day, in bringing female voters from their homes to the poll, on the occasion of the federal election, December 6, last.

And I have signed.

AURELIE IMBEAULT.

Declared before me at Sayabec, the 8th day of May, 1922.

(Signed) L. P. JOUBERT, J.P.,
District of Rimouski.

For the benefit of hon. gentlemen who may not understand French I may say that the person who makes this affidavit swears that to her knowledge Miss Boulay was engaged in bringing female voters to the poll on election day, and it would be too great a stretch of imagination—even at the request of an hon. gentleman whom I respect as much as I do my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter)—to think that Miss Boulay was bringing voters to the poll to vote for the present hon. member for Matane.

Mr. BAXTER: I would not ask you to think that, but I ask you to try and prove the charge.

Mr. MURPHY: Miss Boulay has been guilty of a violation of section 32 of the Civil Service Act which reads as follows:

32. 1. No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the Civil Service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election if, under the laws governing the said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election, or contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for any party funds. 1908 s. 43 amended.

2. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the Civil Service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up the time of the House unnecessarily. I would submit that an offence was committed under the law as it stands at present, and as it stood on the date of the last general election. The proof of the offence was furnished to the Post Office Department. The penalty provided by the law which was violated was then applied by the department. And I submit further, Sir, that the action taken on that occasion by the department, under my instructions, was amply justified by the circumstances and was entirely in the public interest.

Mr. FRANCOIS J. PELLETIER (Matane): The Postmaster General has so completely proven his case that there remains but little for me to say. However, I wish to offer a few observations. At the outset let me say that evidently my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) cares very little for the people's money when he occupies the time of the House in discussing a question of this kind. By this waste of time he has caused quite a large expenditure. Who is responsible for it? An hour and a half of the time of the House has been wasted in the discussion of this case and this means the expenditure of a large sum. You know, Mr. Speaker, the amount that is involved. If my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) wants to give Adrienne a position I am informed and believe that he is a bachelor. He can therefore offer her a better position than she would enjoy as postmistress.

Mr. BAXTER: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he kindly recommend the young lady either to his leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) or to the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy)?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: She would never marry a Grit.

Mr. PELLETIER: As I have already explained, I wish to be brief; I do not want to spend the people's money for nothing. Now Miss Boulay was dismissed for cause, and my hon. friend the Postmaster General has proven it. May I add a little to the things she has done. She allowed her father to hold a political meeting in the post office. When the electoral list was posted in the post office, Miss Adrienne Boulay, my hon. friend's client, erased quite a number of names from the list, and why and how did she do it? Her father told her to do it, and she did it. On nomination day I met Mr. Boulay, and accused him of it in front of the returning officer at Matane, and he acknowledged that he had given her orders to do it. Is that satisfactory to my hon. friend for St. John? I believe he has a bad case. Furthermore, campaign circulars were sent to the Sayabec post office, and unfortunately they were for the Liberal candidates, but they were never distributed. That is another charge. I would not advance these things if they were not facts. Referring to Mr. Lacroix, Mrs. Boulay was the owner of the property and sold it to Mr. Lacroix with the understanding that he would have the postmastership. That is another charge, is it not? I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied, and if he needs more, I can give him plenty.

Mr. CANNON: Let him off easy.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do not spoil his opinion about the girl.

Mr. PELLETIER: In 1911 and 1912, as the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) has said, the member of that day asked for the dismissal of many employees, and if I may be permitted I shall read a letter that Mr. Boulay wrote at that time. This is addressed to Hon. L. P. Pelletier, and reads:

Ottawa, December 1, 1911.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa,

Dear Sir,

The enclosed petition is signed by the political friends of Mr. Bouchard, with three or four exceptions and I have nothing to withdraw from my request. I take the position that there is only one thing to do, to change the post office. Besides, there has been an inquiry already which will prove political partisanship on the part of the postmaster. The thing should be done without an inquiry because this man has been an open opponent of mine, not only all during the campaign but always.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
H. BOULAY.

Yet he claims that he has not asked the dismissal of any one. I have before me Sessional papers No. 88. I find here another letter December 10, 1911, to Honourable L. P. Pelletier, Ottawa, which I translate as follows:

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—I am of the opinion that I have overlooked giving you the names of those who should take charge of the post office at Sayabec; Miss Hedwidge Boulay—

An hon. MEMBER: Another daughter.

Mr. PELLETIER: The letter continues:

Kindly make those nominations at once in order that the changes be made while the employees of the post office department in Quebec are in the county doing that business.

Now, what were they doing there?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Shopping.

Mr. PELLETIER: Here is another letter dated Ottawa, and addressed to Mr. H. Boulay, signed, L. P. Pelletier. I translate as follows:

OTTAWA, December 26, 1911.

My dear sir,—I received your letter of the 10th instant recommending the nomination of Miss Hedwidge Boulay to the position of postmistress at Sayabec station to replace the postmaster who was dismissed. In answer I wish to say that I have given instructions to nominate Miss Boulay to that position according to your recommendation.

Yours very truly,
L. P. PELLETIER.

And he is one of those, as I understood my hon. friend to say, who did not ask the dismissal of any one.

Mr. RINFRET: Do I understand that Miss Hedwidge Boulay is another daughter of Mr. Boulay?

Mr. FOURNIER: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: He had the first one appointed and the other was appointed.

Mr. PELLETIER: He did. Those who have known Mr. Boulay know that while he was a member of the House he had all the contracts, not only in his own riding, but he even went down as far as New Brunswick and elsewhere and would have contracts there. Mrs. Boulay would have one, Andre Boulay would have another, Adrienne Boulay would have another, and Hedwidge Boulay would have another.

Mr. CANNON: Not only family ties but railway ties.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Did he have a contract in St. John?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know. Probably my hon. friend knows that.

Mr. LOGAN: He was having a bully time.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. PELLETIER: Here is another letter dated Ottawa. This is a good one.

Translated it would read:

OTTAWA, March 4, 1912.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I want to get through with Hélène Joubert.

Mr. LOGAN: I see her finish.

Mr. PELLETIER:

You have refused to dismiss her without making an inquiry, promising that an inquiry would be ordered immediately, and it is not granted as yet. I want her to be dismissed immediately or that an inquiry be held immediately, one or the other, because I am too humiliated with that affair to stand it any longer.

I have the honour to be,
Youds very truly,
H. Boulay.

It then happened that Miss Hélène Joubert was dismissed and Miss Hedwidge Boulay, recommended by Mr. Boulay, took her place, the same as when Mr. Bouchard was dismissed, Miss Adrienne Boulay was placed in his stead without inquiry.

I said at the outset of my remarks that I am sorry to see the time of the House being taken up with such a case as this. I was under the impression that the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) would not take up a question of this kind to kill the time of the House. Knowing his ability as I do, I am really surprised. At the same time, now that this has been done, if he wished to give Miss Boulay a position, he can do so.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Railways and Canals—chargeable to capital—Welland ship canal construction, $11,800,000.

Mr. CHURCH: How much money has been spent on the Welland canal? How many sections have been completed and how many sections remain to be done? Fifty or sixty million dollars have been spent on this work, and an effort should be made to finish the canal as soon as possible. The matter was very carefully considered from many standpoints, and after many years spent in investigation and discussion, the work went on. Last year we were told that the canal would not be open until 1927. It is a matter of economic necessity that the construction of the canal should be brought to a conclusion as soon as possible, so that the people of Ontario and also of the West may derive the benefit from the work already done and the money spent. The Erie canal was opened two or three years ago although the construction of it was commenced at a later date, and the people are getting the benefit of that very important work on the other side of the border. The minister is aware of the congestion on the Great Lakes. If the Welland canal were finished, boats would be able to come down from the upper lakes to lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence. I think the work should go on somewhat faster. I appreciate the work that was done last year and previously. Will the contractors be allowed to use their own plants by which they may effect economies, instead of having to use plants provided by the government and in many cases not up to date? Surely this canal could be opened in 1925 instead of 1927.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): As hon. gentlemen know, this is a pretty large undertaking. During the period of the war, the work was in a large measure stopped, and to my mind rightly so. There are under contract five sections, no section of which is really completed. It was thought there would be four more—numbers six, seven, eight and nine; but I understand that eight and nine will probably be merged into one contract so that there will be three further sections to let. My hon. friend asked if hereafter contractors would be allowed to use their own plants. That question appears peculiar, but it is not. The department, under an arrangement with contractors, found themselves with about $2,000,000 worth of plant on hand, and in letting new contracts, they asked the contractors to take the plant over at a reasonable price. This was done. That was the only case in which contractors were not allowed to use their own plant. Of course it became their own after they purchased it from the government. This plant, I understand, has been absorbed, and they are at liberty to use their own plant now. About $34,000,000 has been expended, and the canal will cost altogether at least $80,000,000 and, perhaps a little more. It is an absolute physical impossibility, so I am informed, to complete the work in 1925. It is expected that the canal will be completed in 1927, that is, in about three years and a half. I think my hon. friend asked me the number of locks. There were 25 locks heretofore; there will be seven now. The size of the locks is 80 feet wide, 800 feet long with a 30-foot draught.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have five different sections, and my recollection is that all that work is under contract?

Mr. GRAHAM: The first five sections are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As matters stand at present the government are carrying on no work themselves at all. Their work has been entirely abandoned. I take it therefore that the government have no commitments whatever in connection with the Welland canal outside the existing contracts. For example, we are not buying supplies of any kind, are we?

Mr. GRAHAM: The arrangement, I think, has always been for the department to supply the cement for the different contracts. That is the practice in connection with all canal work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that the government are still purchasing the cement?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apart from that, they are not buying anything?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed by the chief engineer that the government provides certain structural work. I presume the reason is that they want to be sure that they are getting the right material. This is all considered in the contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But over and above that, do they buy anything, such as coal or sand?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Neither coal nor sand. Well, how is the price of the cement arrived at?

Mr. GRAHAM: Tenders are called for, the lowest of which is invariably accepted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had reference to these contracts. Do the contracts include the cost of cement which is rebated by the contractor to the government?

Mr. GRAHAM: The terms of the contract are that the department shall supply the cement.

Mr. LEWIS: How much of this work is completed?

Mr. GRAHAM: No section has been absolutely completed yet.

Mr. LEWIS: Are the government employing any men of their own on the work?

Mr. GRAHAM: The department, of course, must have its engineering staff to see that the work is properly done, in addition to a certain number of staff inspectors, just the same as on any other contract.

Mr. LEWIS: I understood that this work was all under contract, but I see in to-day's paper that carpenters, plumbers and steamfitters were making a protest under the nine-hour day advocated by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I was wondering whether these men were in the employ of the government or whether they were working under the contractors.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is known as the old Welland canal is still in operation with all its men, and the staff to which my hon friend refers has nothing to do with the construction of the new Welland canal. Those men are employed on the old canal.

Mr. GERMAN: Is the minister giving any consideration, in connection with the construction of the Welland canal, to the report of the International Waterways Commission in regard to the proposal of the United States government to join with the Canadian government in studying the St. Lawrence waterway question? Under that scheme the United States government would pay such proportion of the cost of construction of the Welland canal as their use of that waterway would compare with the use of it by Canadian shipping. That report appears to indicate that if the St. Lawrence deep waterways construction is gone on with, the proportion which the United States government would pay of the cost of the Welland canal would be, at any rate, 75 per cent. The Welland canal is going to cost $100,000,000 or more, and its usefulness will be very much restricted unless the work is carried on to tidewater. That, I think, is admitted by everyone who has any knowledge at all of the circumstances. There is no question that it would be of some use in allowing upper lake freighters to come from the upper lakes into lake Ontario, thereby reaching such ports as Toronto, Hamilton and Kingston. It would also be of great advantage to United States shipping, because it would allow upper lake freighters to reach Oswego, thus relieving the congestion in the port of Buffalo in the fall of the year when there is very great traffic during the shipping of grain in the western provinces.

Now, the United States government is quite willing to join with the Canadian government in discussing this problem of the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterways, and as a matter of fact it sent an invitation to the Dominion government some time ago looking to a conference. Indeed, the idea contemplated more than a mere conference; it suggested not only the making of a treaty, but, independently of that, the alternative that the representatives of the two governments should sit down together and discuss the question solely from the point of view of the feasibility and the practicability of the St. Lawrence scheme. The answer to that proposal made by the Canadian government at that time, which answer I think was quite proper then, was that the time was not opportune to take the matter up. But that was nearly two years ago and it seems to me that the time is now opportune. I would therefore respectfully suggest to the government that they communicate with the United States government indicating their preparedness to sit down with the representatives of that government in order to discuss, not a treaty, but the feasibility of the project, to ascertain whether or not it is practicable, and to discover the correctness or otherwise, in the light of the facts as they exist to-day, of the figures that have been given by the engineers That, I think, is the least that the government can do. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated to a very large and influential delegation which waited upon him and other members of the government some time ago that this government would be prepared to discuss the matter with the United States government if a proposal again came from that source. I respectfully represent, however, to the Prime Minister and his government that, the United States authorities having already extended an invitation for a discussion of the subject, the next move ought to be on the part of the Canadian government. The Canadian government, I think, should in all fairness now suggest to the United States government that they are willing, without committing themselves to any definite line of action, without committing themselves to the construction of this gigantic work, to sit down and discuss the whole subject with representatives of the neighbouring republic. If that is done, I believe that a situation will ensue which will bring about the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterways project. It is a scheme which undoubtedly will be carried out in the future, for it is one that will prove of enormous benefit to the people of Canada, and particularly to the grain growers of the western provinces. It has been said, and I have no doubt it is true, that in the fall of the year the congestion in the transportation of grain brings about an enormous increase in the lake freights, but with the St. Lawrence deep waterway in operation we would have an effective check on rate manipulation for we would have ocean-going boats proceeding to the head of the lakes and loading cargo for direct transport to Liverpool. I believe that this proposition is susceptible of complete and positive demonstration, and, if so, it will be an enormous benefit to the people of Canada.

As I stated, the Welland canal improvements will cost at least $100,000,000. If the United States government in joining with us in the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway will contribute 75 per cent of this cost, it will mean a saving of $75,000,000 to the taxpayers of this country. Therefore I do hope the government will seriously consider this matter in connection with the construction of this great work of the Welland ship canal, and in the very near future will communicate with the United States government with a view to bringing about a conference looking to the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway.

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss this matter at some length, partly because the undertaking itself is of considerable magnitude, and partly because it has a direct bearing on the opening of the St. Lawrence route. In order to do so intelligently I must deal with the freight that passes through the Great Lakes. The greater part of this freight is iron ore, next comes coal, and thirdly grain. I know little about the other two commodities, so I shall confine myself to grain. I think perhaps the committee can best appreciate what I say in regard to this feature if they will picture to themselves the carrying of grain from the prairies down the lakes to Liverpool as resembling an inverted tree. The gathering of the grain in the provinces resembles very much the roots, then the trunk is represented by the western grain reaching Fort William, whence on its way to Liverpool, it branches out to Owen Sound, Collingwood, Port Edward, Goderich, Port Colborne, Buffalo and some other points, 65 per cent of it passing through American channels.

5 p.m.

Dealing with the cost of transportation, in the past we have heard a good deal about the immense saving that would accrue to the western farmers by the opening of the St. Lawrence route. Turning to the report of the grain commission appointed by the provincial government of Saskatchewan in 1914, at page 125 I find particulars of the cost of transporting wheat from Fort William to Montreal. The whole page is devoted to these particulars, but instead of taking up the time of the committee by reading all the different items I shall condense the information and merely give the averages. These different items I find average 4 cents per bushel exactly. The other pages that follow show slightly higher averages, namely, 4½ cents, 5 cents and 6 cents.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that water-borne traffic?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes, all water-borne. Hon. members will note that the rate from Fort William to Montreal, water-borne, averages exactly 4 cents. Let me back up that statement by two extracts from a letter which appeared in the January number of Canadian Finance. This is the first extract:

> Some of the ardent advocates of the new scheme go to extremes and use the abnormal rates which are charged for limited periods by lake shippers. . . . Taking the years 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915, we find that the average all-water rates from Fort William to Montreal were as follows:
> 1912, 5.77 cents per bushel; 1913, 5.35 cents; 1914, 4.58 cents; 1915, 4.99 cents.

This is the second extract:

> Taking the lake-and-rail route we find that the average rate during the above-mentioned four years was 7.47 cents per bushel—this includes the heavy rates prevailing in November and December. Certain storage privileges and saving in insurance go with this rate and, as a result, the lake-and-rail route has competed with the all-water rate of around five cents and secured a good volume of traffic.

My third extract is very short and is taken from Canal Statistics for 1913, a government publication:

> The combined water and rail rate from Port Arthur-Fort William to Buffalo-New York in November, was 8.796 cents per bushel, as compared with an average for that month between Port Arthur-Fort William and Montreal of 6.341 cents. With an advantage of 2.455 cents per bushel in favour of the St. Lawrence route, it is still true that more than ten times as many bushels of Canadian wheat went out by way of Buffalo-New York in November as came down to Montreal.

I give those rates to show that the contention of some people that 5 cents a bushel can be saved by opening this route is in fact preposterous. In the evidence given before the royal commission on Lake Grain Rates. I believe the consensus of opinion of the witnesses was that a reasonable rate at the present time from Fort William to the end of Lake Erie—Buffalo or Port Colborne—was ½ cent a hundred miles. That distance is about nine hundred miles. In other words, that gives a rate of 4½ cents per bushel. A reasonable rate from there to Montreal, passing through the canals and lake Ontario, would be 2 cents per hundred miles. This latter distance is about three hundred and fifty miles. So this would give a rate of 7 cents per bushel. In other words, a reasonable rate at the present time would be 11½ cents.

Mr. MANION: Lake and rail or straight water?

Mr. MILLAR: All water. Just here allow me to step aside to mention something that has a bearing on this and yet it deals with rail rates. It does seem remarkable that the rail rate from Armstrong, a point on the National Transcontinental directly north of Fort William, to Quebec, a distance of 960 miles, is 21 cents, whereas the rate from Calgary to Fort William, a distance of 1,295 miles, is 15½ cents. Hon. members will note the comparison—that although the distance from Armstrong to Quebec is no more than 960 miles the rate is as high as 21 cents, as against a rate about a third less for a much longer haul. Perhaps hon. members may have the idea that the low rates are all in the West, but this illustration does not bear them out. I have not carefully verified the figures but in a pamphlet I have been reading I notice it is stated that the rate from Goderich by rail to Halifax, a distance of 1,305 miles, is 12¼ cents.

Mr. MANION: On what commodity?

Mr. MILLAR: I am speaking of wheat entirely—12¼ cents per bushel. I should have stated that. It would seem to me that a lower rate by rail from Armstrong to Quebec would have enabled us to utilize that railway to better advantage and perhaps have prevented a lot of the congestion of last year. Now let me go back. If a reasonable rate from Port Colborne to Montreal is 2 cents per 100 miles, then a reasonable rate through the canals must be very much more, and a reasonable rate through lake Ontario would be very much less. That means that the rate through lake Ontario would be—it is hard to say just what a reasonable rate would be, but I think it would readily appeal to your judgment that 1 cent per bushel per 100 miles of lake Ontario would be a reasonable rate. Now after the Welland canal is opened it is plain that all the advantage will be that the larger boats will be able to pass down to a point at the eastern end of lake Ontario, probably Prescott or Kingston. The carrying power I admit will be very much increased. In a pamphlet issued by the Department of Agriculture at Washington I notice that this calculation is made in respect of one large shipping company. In the case of a large boat loaded down so that it draws about 15 feet of water every inch of increased depth, means 80 tons of 2,240 pounds; that is, an increase of depth of one foot would mean 960 of such tons. The present depth of the Welland canal being about 14 feet, and of the new canal about 25 feet, if it could be utilized at once it would mean an enormous gain in the carrying power of the vessels, but I think it is safe to assume that for some time it will not be possible to use any greater depth than twenty or twenty-one feet for the reason that the depth of nearly all the harbours in the upper lakes, both lake Michigan and lake Superior at such points as Duluth, Milwaukee and Fort William, is only 21 feet so that until such a time as these are deepened it is likely that 21 feet is about all that will be used, but this in itself will mean a very great saving.

Let me say a few words in regard to the 65 per cent that is going through United States channels. I suppose it may be expected by some that the opening of this canal and the opening of the St. Lawrence river will hold nearly all of our Canadian wheat in Canadian channels. There are other reasons why our Canadian wheat goes through American channels. The route from New York to Liverpool although 500 miles longer than from Quebec to Liverpool has an advantage of about 2·55 cents per bushel in favour of New York, largely because, and I think entirely because the insurance rate is a little better, and there is much more traffic between the Old Land and New York than there is between the Old Land and Quebec. That 2·55 cents is a great drawing card, and a great deal of our grain passes that way for that reason.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend seriously desire to convey the impression that the difference in insurance as between Canadian ports and New York is 2 cents per bushel? Perhaps he would tell us what is the total rate of insurance per bushel.

Mr. MILLAR: I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. The total rate of carriage across the ocean is 2·55 cents in favour of New York, and while I am not just positive, I think a part of that may be due to insurance. Nearly all of it is due to the fact that there is greater space at New York. Let me make a remark here in regard to a matter that was discussed in the House a short time ago. We find that our grain on arriving in the Old Land is not in as good a condition passing through American channels as it is when it passes through Canadian channels. The reason for this is partly because the American people have considered in the past that when grain leaves the shores of the United States it is out of bond and mixing has been done—I know this for a fact—beyond the shore. The British people on receiving this grain complain, and I know on many occasions they have asked why it is so. I think they will have to learn, and the quicker they learn the better it will be for us, that they must accept this condition if they are going to take the grain through American channels.

Now will the Welland canal when opened keep a larger share of our grain in Canadian channels? I am not sure, because while it will allow the grain, both American and Canadian, to pass through the Welland canal and to the eastern end of lake Ontario, I believe that Oswego will become as keen a competitor for our grain as is Buffalo at the present moment. The natural place for the Erie canal is between Oswego and New York rather than between Buffalo and New York. The Erie canal runs eastward almost parallel with lake Ontario until it reaches a point nearly south of Oswego. Whether it be true or not I notice some comments in the American papers in which they claim that the expenditure on the Erie canal between Buffalo and New York was largely a political expenditure, and that it will be quite natural and more logical to spend money on the Erie canal between Oswego and New York. However, the canal is not a strong competitor. A few years ago, and I am not sure that it is not true up to the present time only 14 per cent of the grain reaching New York reached it by water. The American railways with their increased carrying capacity, better roadbed and larger cars have become very keen competitors, and have in fact put the Erie canal pretty well out of business, and the fact that Oswego is quite as close to New York as Buffalo is, in fact I believe it is a little closer, leads me to believe that Oswego will be at least as keen a competitor for our grain as Buffalo is at the present time.

A year or two ago I would have been very much in favour of delaying the building of this canal, but I will frankly admit that the congestion of last year has placed a very strong argument in the hands of those who would like to see the work hurried. In that connection I believe that with a very much less expenditure, in fact, with just a little more care and activity on the part of some of the government departments—and I am very pleased to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his seat because I have some little criticism to make of his department—much of that congestion could be avoided. The congestion last year was caused very largely by the fact that Montreal was not able to handle the grain as fast as it came. The output of Fort William and Port Arthur is many times the capacity of Montreal, and yet it would appear that the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal did not divert one single vessel of export grain to the port of Quebec. The capacity of 2,000,000 bushels at the port of Quebec was not fully occupied during this period of congestion. The grain backed up to Port Colborne, backed up to the lake ports and afforded not only an opportunity for higher rates but an excuse as well. Hence we have a monopoly on the Great Lakes exacting exorbitant rates, taking, it is modest to say, $5,000,000 out of the western producers. Does it not seem reasonable for the western producers, especially in this time of distress, to expect action on the part of the Department of Trade and Commerce? At least I believe I am right in saying we have reason to look to the Department of Trade and Commerce to control this route for grain. We have a Grain Commission in the West that looks after the western end, but I think, perhaps, I am right in saying that in practice they do not regard it as their duty to keep track of the eastern end I am not sure about that, but judging from what they do I infer that they do not view it seriously as their duty to look after the eastern end of the route. Does it not seem strange, therefore, that the Department of Trade and Commerce—knowing the capacity of Montreal, knowing the enormous crop in the western provinces—were not a little more active in trying to avert the catastrophe that really did occur? I believe the department have been active in seeking a market for our product and in many other lines; but I think I must, in fairness, criticize them for their negligence and indifference to the interest of the western growers in not trying to avert this catastrophe. I do not know whether they interceded with the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to divert some of the grain to Quebec and thus relieve the pressure; I do not know whether they did anything in the way of getting floating elevators that would transfer grain from one boat to another; I do not know what they did. The fact remains, even if they are able to show that they tried to do their best, that there was a catastrophe and it resulted in enormous loss.

Now here is a suggestion I have to make: In past years we have, at about every ten year period, appointed a commission to investigate the grain trade. That commission found irregularities in every case and have given the information to the public. Then, it appears to me, we have practically sat down and allowed the same irregularities or others very like them—equally disastrous, equally against the interest of the producers—to grow up and become so bad that there was another outcry, another commission was appointed, another clean up took place, and then there was another sitting down. Now, that should not be. I think we have reason, as producers of grain far removed from this channel of commerce, to expect that the government, through some of its departments—and I believe it should be through the Department of Trade and Commerce—should see to it that this route is kept clear, and that such abuses should not be allowed to grow up to the extent that it is possible to impose a rate that takes millions of dollars from those producing grain.

I will not say anything about what is taking place west of Fort William because it is now the subject of investigation, and because it is not closely connected with the Welland canal, but my point is that in the case of such an enormous expenditure, while it may or may not be wise to push the enterprise through as quickly as possible, a great deal more gain would accrue to the western producers if the government were active in seeing that the routes through which our grain passes were kept free from those who would prey upon us and take far more for their service than they were entitled to. This has been the case from time immemorial and I think that if we are ever going to get back to reconstruction, if we are ever going to place agriculture in a position in which it ought to be and where it may become prosperous, the government will have to display a little more activity. It will have to see that the route beyond our control is kept free from such practices as have been proven to exist by the report in connection with the Great Lakes rates which has been handed in recently.

I believe the contract for this Welland canal was let at about $55,000,000. It does seem to me that large contracts such as this have a queer way of doubling and trebling in cost after they get started. The Panama canal cost at least four times the first estimate, and there are many other cases that might be cited. In the present instance it is stated the cost will perhaps be $100,000,000 or about double the original estimate, and that possibly it may reach even three times that estimate. So that with capital expenditure and accrued interest the outlay will be enormous before we have received one dollar in benefit; and I think it is plain, from the figures I have given you there will only be a gain of one or two cents a bushel by the opening of the Welland canal until the St. Lawrence route is opened. Therefore, although I think, perhaps, we are the most interested, the benefit we will derive will be slow in coming. I find there is considerable activity on the part of some members of the House of pushing the construction of the Welland canal as quickly as possible. I cannot see where they are going to get much benefit. If anyone is going to derive benefit it is those who are producing grain, or shipping ore, or some of the other freights that are passing down.

There is a matter here that I would like to ask the minister a question upon. It has been stated several times by the minister that the request for this enterprise first came from some western people. I do not doubt for one moment that that statement is true, having come from the minister; but many of us in this corner of the House are in close touch with the farmers' organizations, and have been for years, and we know of none of them that have made that request. I would therefore ask the minister to state plainly just who it was that made that request. I have no doubt that some private individual may have done so, and probably people located around Fort William. They have been looking forward to the time when Fort William will become practically an ocean port. On another occasion I would like to deal a little more fully with that hope. I am afraid, they are doomed to disappointment. There will always be a time after the St. Lawrence route is opened up, and I believe it ultimately will be, when a number of vessels will ply between Liverpool and London and Fort William, but they will be very few in number, very few indeed. There are several reasons why Fort William cannot become an ocean port. There is the length of time it takes a vessel to pass up through the forty-four miles of canal between Montreal and Prescott at the rate of four knots an hour, then through the Welland canal, and there is the higher insurance rate and the greater risk attached to navigation by this route. I think a little study along that line will convince the members of the committee and the people of Fort William that the time when that place will become an ocean port is far removed. I think it well, in the case of each of these products, that we should carefully study the matter. We should not plunge too hurriedly into the opening of the St. Lawrence route, and the deepening of the St. Lawrence river at a cost now estimated at $252,000,000 but which, with our past experience, we may well estimate at two or three times that amount. Unless we move cautiously we will, perhaps, find ourselves in the same position with regard to those enterprises as we are in the case of the Welland canal. There is no thought of stopping it so far as any member of this House is concerned. We all know that it should be completed. It is only a question of how fast we should hasten the work. It is going to involve an enormous outlay, and I do not think the returns will be sufficient to warrant hastening the work, as has been proposed. It seems to me it would be wise to expend our money, for the time being, where it is urgently needed, and rather delay this work, even though it may not be completed for four, five or six years.

I have one word to say in regard to another matter. If we are going to have a bumper crop in the West this year—and the government can judge of that in a month or two—or anything like the quantity we handled last year, it would be well for the government to increase their elevator capacity at Montreal, and provide also some floating elevators. They cost about $100,000 apiece, and with these elevators grain should be transferred from one boat to another at the rate of about 10,000 bushels per hour. If a few of these floating elevators had been available last season, I think much of the congestion causing such an enormous loss would not have occurred.

Mr. ROBB: There is a floating elevator there.

Mr. MILLAR: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says there is a floating elevator there, but I believe that floating elevator at Montreal is not entirely satisfactory. I do not know whether the reason is that it is an old type of floating elevator. The elevators used at New York are entirely satisfactory. I believe such elevators would be of great service. When there is congestion at Montreal, and the elevators at Quebec are not being used to any very great extent, and partly empty, while Montreal is filled to the roof, I think it would be well if the Department of Trade and Commerce would intercede with the Harbour Commission, I suppose they desire to make a record, but it is not in the interests of the country or of the western producer that they should make a record and cause congestion and block the grain. It would be better if they would divert some of the boats and send them to Quebec, so that they could utilize the facilities there. At another time I shall have something more to say in regard to Quebec as a grain handling port. The National Transcontinental cuts off two hundred miles by having a direct route. There is a great saving in distance, and the largest boats can come to Quebec. If the railways were charging the same rates from Calgary to Quebec as they are charging from Calgary to Fort William, nothing more or less, the rate between Armstrong and Quebec would be exactly the same as the present water rate between Fort William and Montreal. Even at the present time it would seem as though some grain could go all rail; but by bringing down the rate to what they are charging in some other places, I think we could utilize Quebec to a much larger extent than we have been doing in the past. That might tend to prevent a considerable quantity of our grain going through American channels. The natural route for grain is by the St. Lawrence, and if we as Canadians are going to be more alert and do what we can to make that route attractive, we ought to be able to retain more of our grain than we have retained in the past. Many things attract grain. The quickness of handling, the fees at the harbours, and a lot of other little things have a great influence on the shipper when he is deciding which route he shall adopt. I would be pleased if the minister would answer the two or three questions I have asked.

Mr. ROBB: Before the minister replies, I desire to make a few observations regarding the congestion of last year. I have no exception to take to the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Millar) regarding the rate of freight that prevailed prior to 1912 from the head of the lakes to the seaboard; nor have I any exception to take to his observations regarding ocean steamers going to the head of the lakes. I understood him to say that that proposition was very remote. I agree with him. But with the deepening of the Welland canal, the larger boats operating on the upper lakes will be able to come further down the river, and to that extent reduce the cost of carrying grain from the head of the lakes to the seaboard.

I rose more particularly to answer my hon. friend regarding the congestion which developed towards the close of the season last year at the eastern ports. There was discrimination in freight rates on the upper lakes long before the congestion developed at the eastern ports, and if any department, or if any government, ever tried to regulate that, it is the government in power to-day, and having failed by persuasion and representation to get the shippers to do what was fair, the government hopes that when it comes down with legislation to try and effect a cure, it will have the support of parliament. It is true that towards the end of the season congestion developed at Montreal, and it is also true that there was and is a considerable capacity at Quebec. Early in the summer, I think it was probably in August, I made a special trip to Quebec to try and work out the elevators at Montreal and Quebec together, some arrangement whereby they could operate. General Tremblay made a special trip up to Montreal to have a talk with the Harbour Commissioners and urged upon them the importance of making great use of the elevators in Quebec, and I am not sure but that the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal were quite willing to co-operate with the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec to divert grain to that port. But the shipper has something to say about where his grain is going to be transshipped, and the shipper had had an experience in the Quebec elevator that was not very profitable. He has not yet learned that there had been a change of management in that elevator and that it is safe to put grain through it. They are putting grain through now because the shippers are confident that the grain will not be mixed, as it was a few years ago; but my hon. friend, I believe, is associated with a large elevator equipment in western Canada, and if his agent refuses to ship grain to any particular port, neither the Department of Trade and Commerce nor any other department could compel him to put that grain through that port. He owns the grain and routes it the way he thinks best. I want to dispel the illusion in the mind of my hon. friend that it is the duty of the government to go and tell the shippers which way they should route their grain. That is not the work of a department of government.

Mr. MILLAR: Did the Board of Grain Commissioners not make a similar adjustment on the Pacific coast during the congestion, by bringing pressure to bear on shippers and railways and those who were handling the elevators? I think they brought about an adjustment of a very similar difficulty.

Mr. ROBB: I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that. I will come to it in a moment. I was not going to touch on that. The duty of the Department of Trade and Commerce is to find markets for the products of this country. We leave it to the people of the country who are doing business to contribute in some degree towards getting their stuff forward. As a result of the experience of last year, the elevator capacity in Montreal will be considerably increased. They have now with the Quebec house a working arrangement which will take care of much more grain, and which, I believe to that extent, will minimize the possibilities of congestion this season.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the arrangement?

Mr. ROBB: It is just a friendly working arrangement that the Harbour Commissioners send along grain when their elevator gets filled up, and I think the shippers now have confidence that their grain is safe going through the Quebec house; that it will not be mixed as it was mixed a few years ago. A few years ago some of the large shippers put some grain through the Quebec house, and No. 1 northern was mixed with No. 3 northern and No. 4 northern with No. 2 northern. This was not a very profitable proposition for the shipper, and he simply boycotted the Quebec house for the time being. It is only recently that he is satisfied it is safe to put grain through the Quebec house.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is another question. I shall have something to say about that. I asked what the arrangement was, and I was told that it was a friendly arrangement. I did not expect that it was a hostile one. I want to know the terms.

Mr. ROBB: In what regard?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the terms of the arrangement between the two commissions?

Mr. ROBB: There is just a friendly understanding as my right hon. friend and I might have an understanding that when he has too much business, he will give me a share of it. Broadly speaking that is the arrangement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was to hinder their doing that before, that is during this past season? Surely they did not need to meet in order to do that.

Mr. ROBB: They did do so towards the end of the season.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did they not do it in time for it to be of some use?

Mr. ROBB: I was answering my hon. friend's observation that the Department of Trade and Commerce had done nothing. I am trying to convince him that we did something to contribute towards that understanding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Too late.

Mr. MILLAR: The minister just stated that they did this towards the end of the season. I believe it is correct that not one bushel of export wheat was diverted from Montreal to Quebec last season.

Mr. ROBB: My information from General Tremblay is that some grain was put in the Quebec house towards the end of last season. It may have remained there all winter.

Mr. MILLAR: I have that statement from the commissioners.

Mr. ROBB: Probably my hon. friend is right. I was away at the time, but that was my understanding from General Tremblay

As regards the Pacific coast situation, I would not like to say this boastingly, but the records are there that we have put more grain through the Vancouver house than had been put through during all previous years from the time of the construction of that elevator.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the minister say "we"?

Mr. ROBB: The government of the day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the minister to say a few minutes ago that the shipper had the routing. I did not know the government had it. How is it that they have the routing via the Pacific coast?

Mr. ROBB: Probably more ships were brought in there and attention was directed to the value of that route.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear. The mercantile marine.

Mr. ROBB: I have not the figures before me, but my recollection is that this year they will have put through the Vancouver house almost double what was put through it last year. When I was in Vancouver last fall, shippers were complaining bitterly and finding fault and one of the newspapers was carrying on a campaign because the government had not built another elevator there during the summer to provide for the extra business. The shippers were complaining that they were not going to be able to route through that port as much grain as there was a market for. I sent for the superintendent of the elevator, and he told me that he was running his house to full capacity. I said: "Are you working it nights?" He said: "No, we are running it only fourteen hours a day." I said: "You must get busy and run this house nights." He complained that he did not have expert elevator men to operate it; that there was a danger of mixing the grades, and that would do more harm than good. I immediately communicated with Mr. Boyd, Chairman of the Grain Commission at Fort William, and instructed him to send to Vancouver one or two foremen who could take charge of the night shift, and also suggesting that they look into the question of operating the Vancouver house in connection with the Calgary house. Bear in mind the situation there is quite different from the situation on the east coast. The department have no control whatever, beyond inspection, over the management of the elevator system either in Montreal or Quebec; but the department will have control of the Vancouver house until the end of July this year and they had control of the Calgary house. I suggested to Mr. Boyd that they work out a system whereby they could operate these two houses together: that when ships were coming in and they saw that the elevator at Vancouver was going to be lightened, they would telegraph to Calgary to send along the reserves. That is the reason why they have been putting so much more grain through the Vancouver house this year.

Mr. MILLAR: Does that experience in the West as compared with the experience in the East last winter not convince the minister that the government should have some control?

Mr. ROBB: My friend, even if he were in this office, might have some trouble in convincing the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal and Quebec. They exist under act of parliament, and I think they claim the right to operate their own houses. They have been doing so fairly well; they have been putting a good deal of grain through those houses.

Mr. MANION: When the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) arose, I was just going to rise in order, in a very few words, to support the proposal of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), asking the government to make a proposition to the United States government for a discussion of the question of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canal. It would appear to me to be a very reasonable request to ask the United States government to enter upon a discussion of this question. The hon. member for Welland made it perfectly clear that that was all he was asking for; he was not asking the government to bind itself. He pointed out the fact that the United States government had about a year ago made to the Canadian government a proposition to discuss this question, but the Canadian government then thought the time was not opportune for such a discussion.

Before I say a few more words regarding that, I wish to deal with a few of the statements made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar). I will deal with them very briefly. In his closing remarks he seemed to draw the conclusion that the whole idea of the building of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canal was the outcome of some imaginative chap at Fort William; that Fort William, being anxious to be an ocean port, had come forward with this proposition and decided to belabour the rest of the country into building the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canal. That, at least, was the conclusion I drew from his remarks. As a matter of fact, the original proposition, so far as I remember—and I think I am correct—started in the north-western states of the Union amongst the grain growers, and the organization gradually became strong and large until the movement took hold of the Canadian people, and the first meeting was held at Windsor, the home of the late Minister of Railways.

Mr. MILLAR: I certainly had no thought whatever that the idea had started at Fort William. I do not know what I said to give my hon. friend that impression.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member said that he did not know why the Welland canal was being built, but that Fort William seemed to be anxious to be an ocean port.

Mr. MILLAR: Among others.

Mr. MANION: He did not say "among others"; he is saying that now. However, that does not matter. I wish to supplement what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) stated regarding ocean steamers. I believe that no one who has studied the question expects ocean steamers to any great extent ever to go to the Great Lakes even to Toronto or Windsor, or to the head of the lakes or Duluth. It is anticipated that if the canal system is ever built, as I have no doubt at all it ultimately will be, those ships taking grain from the head of the lakes and Duluth will be able to carry it to Montreal at a much less cost than is charged at the present time, and without transshipping at Port Colborne or the Georgian bay ports or at Buffalo and going down by the Erie canal to New York. There is not a thought, on the part of those who have given any study to the question, of great ocean steamers landing at the docks at the head of the lakes.

In regard to the building of the Welland canal, I have the same to say as I have said concerning the St. Lawrence system: certainly, Fort William has had no idea of asking for any particular consideration in this respect. There was no move on the part of the people at the head of the lakes in this matter. Naturally, Fort William and the head of the lakes are directly interested in the building of the canal and are supporting it in consequence; but they do so with the complete conviction that it is a good thing in the interests of the country. My hon. friend spoke about rates on grain and pointed out, what he has already indicated to me in private, namely the rates for which grain was carried from the head of the lakes to Montreal previous to the war; and I must confess that when he showed me the figures I was startled by the low charge that was made upon grain over that distance. At the same time, we must not forget that twenty or fifteen years ago everything was very much lower than it is to-day, and I greatly doubt whether we shall ever get back to such rates as the hon. gentleman quoted, such as an average of 4 cents for grain from the head of the lakes to Montreal. Later on in his remarks he pointed out—at least I understood him to do so—that a water rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal of 11 cents was a reasonable one. I think I am quoting the hon. gentleman correctly in that regard. Well, I would consider that a very unreasonable rate if we had the St. Lawrence waterway built.

Mr. WARNER: Would that be 11 cents a bushel?

Mr. MANION: Yes. I should think that if the large shell-like boats at the head of the lakes can transport grain clear through to Montreal, then certainly the rate ought ultimately, except under very special circumstances, to be nothing like 11 cents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It should be more like 3 cents.

Mr. MANION: Yes; probably 3 or 4 cents would cover it, and my hon. friend would then get back to the rates which he quoted as prevailing before the war. The hon. gentleman made the statement, which is correct, that some time ago about 65 per cent of the grain grown in western Canada was shipped to the United Kingdom via New York, in this way: It would come from the head of the lakes to Buffalo, and thence by the Erie canal to New York. The charge from Buffalo to New York alone was 10 cents; and yet my hon. friend points out—what is the fact—that the shippers generally, at least two-thirds of them, chose the American route. They did this for various reasons, and in spite of the fact that they had to pay 10 cents for the carriage from Buffalo by the Erie canal to New York city alone. That is another reason, and an important one, why, if the canal is ultimately built, grain will be carried at a much lower rate than is the case at the present time. I believe my hon. friend stated that in the past year a large proportion of Canadian grain went via New York. I do not think that last year such a large proportion did go by New York; I believe that at least two-thirds went via Montreal.

Mr. GRAHAM: There went by Montreal 153,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MANION: Well, 153,000,000 is a very large proportion of our grain. That is what I understood—about 150,000,000

Mr. MILLAR: I think it is correct that 150,000,000 went through American ports and about 147,000,000 via Canadian ports.

Mr. MANION: I do not think my hon. friend can be correct. What was the crop last year? I think it was about 399,000,000 bushels. The figures were given to me about a month ago by the Department of Trade and Commerce, that there was still in the West about 150,000,000 bushels.

Mr. ROBB: Do not give too much publicity to an inactive market.

Mr. MANION: It is all going out now; it is no longer inactive. But at that time there were about 150,000,000 bushels in the West, and if 150,000,000 also went by Montreal, that would make 300,000,000 bushels. So that 150,000,000 could not possibly have gone by New York.

Mr. BROWN: Is it not true that a great deal of American grain was shipped via Montreal?

Mr. MANION: Yes; my hon. friend, I think, is correct in that regard. However, that is beside the question. Now, I might observe here that one of the greatest authorities on the grain question in the world, as my hon. friends to my left will no doubt agree, is Julius Barnes. He is at all events one of the most reliable authorities, and he has made the statement again and again that the carrying out of this undertaking would save from five to ten cents a bushel on wheat being shipped to Europe. And Herbert Hoover, a man who is internationally known, has also expressed the same view. If we look at the report of the International Joint Commission we shall also find exactly the same thing stated. After two years of study, after a very thorough investigation, they come to precisely the same conclusion, that a great saving would be made to the western farmer by building the canal. In view of these facts, and in view of the statements made by Julius Barnes, by Herbert Hoover and by this commission, I certainly think that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) makes a quite reasonable request when he asks the government to extend an invitation to the American government to discuss this question from the standpoint of the feasibility of the project. I would repeat and support what he said. Such a request would not bind the Canadian government to anything, and I certainly believe that the discussion would lead to practical results. It would undoubtedly be a thorough one, and before either government undertook to commit itself, it would no doubt be convinced that the scheme was in the best interests of both countries.

I believe, from the report of the commission, and in view of the fact that we shall have spent $100,000,000 on the Welland canal, that the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canal could be built for a very small sum of money so far as Canada's share is concerned. And if in raising the money the two governments united in guaranteeing bonds at 4 per cent or 4½ per cent, the necessary funds I have no doubt could be obtained. If the respective governments united in the undertaking, it would not necessarily entail the expenditure of one cent directly by the government of this country. I submit once more that the request that the government take steps to bring about a discussion of this question between representatives of the Canadian administration and of the United States government is undoubtedly a reasonable one, and I hope that in the near future the government now in power will extend an invitation to this end to the neighbouring republic and take up the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) criticizes the cost of the Welland canal, now estimated at not less than $80,000,000 and perhaps more, and he points out that the original estimate was some $55,000,000. This seems to him to be proof that the estimates are now too high. But I would point out that these were pre-war estimates and the contracts of necessity had to be dropped on account of the war. Had there been no war the estimated cost, I imagine, would not have been exceeded to any great extent. But to-day everything costs twice as much as it did before the war, and I think I am safe in saying that an expenditure of ninety million dollars now is no more extravagant than fifty-five million dollars would have been at pre-war prices. So there is nothing strange or wrong about the increased expenditure.

Now, my hon. friend refers to the Oswego canal. I would suggest that he need not worry any more about that. Those who were opposed to the deepening of the Welland canal years ago—I refer now to Buffalo interests largely—always tried to frighten us with the bugaboo of what they were going to do to us on the Erie canal by way of Oswego. As a matter of fact a large appropriation was secured from the state of New York for the canal. I have read of the hopes they had of a 20 or 25-foot draft channel. But the best engineers reported that 12 feet was the best draft they could get, and that not in all places. But in addition to that there are hundreds of bridges over the Erie canal of only 15 feet clearance, and these would have to be raised. With a straight route now from the Welland canal through to—I must say both Kingston or Prescott, or perhaps as a compromise, Brockville—sufficient for vessels drawing 21 feet, my hon. friend can see the absolute impossibility of the Erie canal with its little 12-foot draft and its 15-foot overhead bridge clearance competing with such a route. Even we are complaining that the draft is small and we have to use barges, but our shallowest draft is two feet deeper than the Erie canal's maximum. So at the very best we can carry through our canal, even as at present constituted, much heavier loads than the Erie canal can ever accommodate.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the minister has overlooked one statement I made, that at the present time all but 14 per cent of the grain reaching New York comes by rail; that is, the Erie canal is not cutting very much of a figure in the competition now.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is true, and it never will. But Buffalo, so far as the Oswego route is concerned, could compete via New York by rail and not use the canal at all. The object of the Welland canal deepening is to bring the traffic of the West as far east as possible before transshipping it into smaller boats. Sir William Van Horne on one occasion when discussing this very project stated that he believed it was as cheap to transship to shallower draft vessels at the foot of lake Ontario or farther east and take the cargoes to Montreal as it would be to have larger vessels for the whole route, but I am not going to discuss that subject at the present time. However if the Welland canal deepening will not decrease the cost of transportation of western grain, it will not do anything. I think it will. Some few years ago I had an opportunity of discussing the figures with those engaged in transportation, and, although those figures would not be applicable now, I was informed by these people that they believed there would be an appreciable reduction in the cost of transportation of grain and other products eastward as far as Kingston and Prescott. My hon. friend refers to a saving of one cent a bushel. Does he realize that such a saving or even half of it, on Canada's grain crop would mean a saving of millions of dollars?

When I was speaking the other night I was mildly castigated for suggesting that the western people ever asked for the deepening of the Welland canal. Of course, a great many of the members from the West now are young men, and they perhaps do not remember what happened years ago, but I made several trips through to the coast with Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1907 and 1910—shortly before the calamity befell this country—and one of the main things dwelt upon at every meeting in the West was: When are you going to start deepening the Welland canal? Deputations from one part of the West were urging the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, but from the time we struck Winnipeg until we reached Victoria the Welland canal deepening was mentioned by nearly every deputation that came to us. I asked my secretary to see if anything could be found in the way of representations from boards of trade and other associations that were sent to the department, because hundreds of representations were made orally to every minister of the then government who went West. At random I find the following representations were received: From Winnipeg, Vancouver, Edmonton, Port Arthur, Kamloops, Virden, Victoria, Camrose, Regina, the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Exchange, the Selkirk Business Men's Association, and so forth. I dare say if I were to go to Brockville and open up several boxes of correspondence marked "private" I could dig up hundreds of these representations from the West. But the deepening of the canal is started, and it is for the purpose of making transportation cheaper in the Dominion both east and west. We believe it will accomplish that object. It has cost more money than was anticipated. So has everything else in this country. Even a meal costs more to-day than it did in 1913. One of the difficulties of carrying on national affairs to-day is that everything is much more expensive than it was a few years ago.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was referring at six o'clock to what my hon. friend from Welland and my hon. friend from Rainy River had said in urging this government to communicate with the United States government with a view to holding a conference to discuss the advisability of proceeding with the St. Lawrence deep waterway. Some time ago the Canadian government did receive a communication from the United States government suggesting a conference with a view to making a treaty, but the Canadian government at that time did not see its way clear to proceeding so rapidly in the matter. At a later date a large deputation waited on the Prime Minister and others, when the Prime Minister suggested if I remember correctly, that he would gladly consider it if the United States would make another proposition for a conference without going so far as to say that it was for the purpose of making a treaty. I think my hon. friend was mistaken in saying that the United States government offered to pay a substantial part of the construction cost of the Welland canal.

Mr. GERMAN: That was recommended by the International Joint Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: That recommendation was made by the International Joint Commission in a report containing certain references to each government. Of course, the matter of a great St. Lawrence waterway is very interesting to me. Having lived on the St. Lawrence most of my life perhaps I take a deeper interest in the matter than others not so situated. It is a very big problem and without consulting the other members of the government I would not like to say anything definite as to holding another conference between the United States government and the Dominion of Canada. There are other interests concerned in the proposition besides the Dominion of Canada and the United States. The federal authority, of course, takes cognizance of improvements to navigation, but the construction of the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterway would mean the development of a very substantial amount of power. I am free to admit that this part of Ontario at least is in need of power. In some sections we have the Hydro Electric power, but in most cases it has to be transmitted over such a distance that it is really not cheap power, particularly in places where the consumption does not extend to any great degree. The provincial authorities have also something to say in the water itself, and as hon. gentlemen will remember there have been some disagreements as to the legal rights as between the federal and the provincial authorities. However, I think it has been pretty clearly demonstrated that so far as the water itself is concerned the provincial authorities have at least some ground for making their claim. Then, of course, there is the state authority on the other side of the line. When last I mentioned this in the House some years ago I added another factor, the International Joint Commission, but the commission has since made certain propositions to each government particularly as to the Welland canal. The Welland canal construction was started years ago before the suggestion for the St. Lawrence deep waterway had taken definite shape, I imagine. But this one thing is assured, that the deepening of the Welland canal will form the beginning of that enterprise so far as the connection between the two lakes is concerned, and if the time comes for the proposal of the International Joint Commission to be put into effect Canada will be in a position to lay claim to the share which the United States ought to pay for the construction of the Welland canal.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to say a word or two on this subject inasmuch as I come from a city that is spending twenty-six millions in rebuilding the port of Toronto and improving and enlarging its harbour anticipating that a contract had been made between the cities and towns on the St. Lawrence and on lakes Erie and Ontario and the upper lakes with the government regarding the deepening of this canal. A study of the canal situation in Canada does not disclose any definite and consistent plan such as the people of Canada had in 1829 when the Welland canal was first started. It is true also that water-borne traffic has not had the chance it should have had in competition with the railways of this country, and for that reason we have congestion every year not only in handling the wheat crop but coal and every other basic commodity in this country. Water-borne traffic got no subsidies, bonuses, land grants or hand-outs like railways did.

Money has been spent on some canals that never should have been constructed in the first place and left unspent on others, and three transcontinental railways have been built where probably one or two would have sufficed. The people of this country have spent $900,000,000 directly and indirectly upon the railways of this country, and still we have congestion half the time and the deplorable situation in which the railways are to-day. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the canals have never had the chance they should have had, and if some of the money that has been spent on any one of these transcontinental railways had been spent on deepening the St. Lawrence waterway and the Welland canal, and in addition if money had not been spent on canals that can have no economic value, we would have had much better value for our money and should have taken a great step forward in solving the transportation problems of this country.

As shown by this deep waterways report the Welland canal is one of the most important links in the whole St. Lawrence waterway scheme. The history of the Welland canal goes back to 1829 when the government of Canada, assisted by the British government built the first canal. It was supposed to be a four foot canal, but its dimensions were subsequently changed to the following: a 40 foot lock, 110 feet long, 20 feet wide, with 8 feet of water over the sills. On the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1840 the government took over the canal, and replaced the 40 wooden locks with 27 stone locks ranging in length from 150 to 230 feet with a width of from 26 to 45 feet and 10½ feet of water on the sills.—In 1871 this canal was found inadequate and the Welland canal in use at present was begun on a 12 foot basis and then deepened to 14 feet on the sills.—What is known as the present canal was opened in 1887 with 14 feet of water in the sills but it became altogether too small and a more comprehensive scheme was entered upon which is known as the large ship canal. That is the project that is before the country to-day. This the International Joint Commission considers is absolutely necessary if we are to handle the volume of trade which is offering in the West as well as in the East.

As to this ship channel scheme, my hon. friend the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), who made a very able speech this afternoon on the subject, and who has evidently been studying the canal problem very deeply, offered some criticism. I do not agree with him when he says there has been no demand for the Welland canal. I well remember the movement which led to its demand. I was president of the Union of Canadian Municipalities which embraces some four hundred and sixty municipalities, and we came down and asked the Borden government for the new Welland ship canal. The deputation was received in the old parliament buildings and we asked the government to go on with this work. At the time there was great congestion of grain on the lakes and congestion generally. The government were launching a second transcontinental railway, and a third was under way. Those that came down on that deputation pointed out the great importance of water-borne traffic in solving the transportation problem of Canada. I may say here that unlike the railways the water-borne traffic has never had a fair chance. The railways have had subsidies, land grants, and handouts of all kinds from governments—from the Dominion government and from the governments of the provinces. The province of Ontario and the old provinces of Upper and Lower Canada have paid a very large proportion of this assistance since confederation. In 1896, I think, there was a return brought down by the Minister of Finance which showed that 52 per cent of all the taxes of Canada up to that date had been paid by the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Therefore I say there should be no sectional feeling displayed on this question.

The St. Lawrence scheme is one of the most important economic problems we have on the North American continent to-day. We are dependent on the St. Lawrence and the development along the great chain of lakes for future transportation facilities. Therefore I say there was a demand for this particular work. It was shown there was a great necessity for doing something along this particular line to bring down and regulate rates and give the farmers a chance not only in the West with respect to grain but in many other parts of the country where there was freight to be handled. The government decided to go on with the canal and a very exhaustive inquiry was made and reported on. As a result of that inquiry it was estimated that the cost of the new Welland canal would be about $50,000,000. The minister this afternoon stated it would take $80,000,000 to finish the work, and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle places the probable cost at $100,000,000.

I do not agree with that hon. gentleman that the work should have been suspended during the war. I think it was a great mistake that the government suspended the work because it is now going to cost about 50 per cent more than it otherwise would have done. If the contracts had been awarded at the prices for dredging, for concrete work and other classes of work of that description, the contracts being applicable to a period of years, the canal could have been constructed at a saving of twenty-five or thirty million dollars. That was illustrated by the results which attended similar contracts carried out by the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto. At that time business men and others said "Do not go on with the Toronto harbour improvements, we cannot afford it." The harbour commissioners, however, of whom the late Lieutenant Governor Lionel Clarke, one of the best informed men we had in Canada on the grain situation, was chairman, decided to go ahead with the work. Contracts were awarded to the Canadian Stewart Company on a basis of 19½ cents per cubic yard. That work was accomplished during the war and it helped very largely in connection with unemployment. The lands improved were also of a revenue producing character. If that work had not been started at that time the price would have gone up to 38 or 40 cents a cubic yard, the average rate at present. The work on this Welland canal, undertaken at this time, is going to cost more money by reason of higher cost of labour, higher cost of materials, the difference in exchange, and everything else than if it had been entered into during the war. The Chippawa power canal planned to produce 100,000 horse-power cost $10,000,000. It was extended to develop 550,000 horse-power and the result is that that canal has cost $70,000,000. But that was not due to any errors or mistakes that were made in the plans or estimates. It was entirely due to the advance in the cost of materials, of money, of labour, and of everything else, as a result of the war.

Some of the arguments advanced this afternoon against the ship canal, in my opinion, have no proper basis. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) quoted Mr. James H. Barnes, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and a member of one of the leading grain firms of Duluth, as saying that there would be a saving of ten cents per bushel in the carrying of grain when the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence route are finished. He also quoted Herbert Hoover, and many other authorities in the United States, on the subject. There is congestion at Buffalo and the United States government are willing to pay their share towards the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals. The International Joint Commission in their report recommend that the United States government should pay a large proportion of the cost of these improvements in the Welland canal, and that report sets out the opinions of many authorities in the United States along this line.

To show you the immediate necessity for the building of this canal, I want to refer for a few minutes to the great congestion of the grain elevators. In the West, in North Dakota, and in many other states, this is the case. On both sides of the border the elevators were filled with wheat and could not take in another bushel.

Mr. LEWIS: Would the hon. gentleman tell us on what terms the United States will co-operate with us in carrying out this work? Have they stated the terms on which they will do it?

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot say on what terms the United States will do it at the present time. I have a lot of material here in the report of the International Joint Commission which is too voluminous for me to read but I will be glad to give it to my hon. friend if he wants to peruse it and see the discussion on the matter. I also have here a statement of the National City bank for December, 1922, referring to this Welland canal, the last month that I have any record of in regard to this particular question. It is a very able statement and it has been quoted by all the bankers on both sides of the border, in reference to this subject. It goes on to refer to the grain congestion at the railway stations in the West and all along the chain of great lakes to the seaboard. They quote Mr. Barnes, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce and a huge grain dealer at Duluth and New York who gives a very graphic description of the congestion from his own immediate knowledge. He goes on to refer to the congestion on the Erie barge canal which, as I said this afternoon, was started about the same time as the Welland canal but has now been open for two years. The work on it was not stopped during the war and as a result the people of that country are getting the benefit of that important transaction to-day. Mr. Barnes who, as the member for Rainy River said, is about the greatest expert upon this subject, goes on to speak about the importance of the present Welland route and the figures which Mr. Barnes gives for carrying grain from Buffalo to New York should be carefully noted. This is what he says:

> From the first of September until the first of October in the very height of the crop-moving period of this country, the main channel of export outlet for grain in America, from Buffalo to New York, was practically closed The grain moved from the West until it had congested and exhausted the elevator facilities at Buffalo—18,000,000 bushels.

The same thing happens at Montreal.

> As soon as the unloading facilities were thus exhausted the lake carriers, reflecting the apprehension of their owners that the boats would be tied up with undischarged cargoes instead of being returned, made an advance in the lake rates, in thirty days from 2 cents per bushel for the carrying of grain from Chicago and Duluth to Buffalo to 6 cents.
> The rail rate from Buffalo to New York on the published tariff is 9 cents.

An hon. member this afternoon referred to the combined water and rail rate Port Arthur to Buffalo and New York as 8.274 cents per bushel, and he compared the rate Fort William to Montreal, 6¾ cents a bushel, showing a difference of 2.45 cents per bushel in favour of the St. Lawrence route, and he argued that the business did not go to Canada, but that to Buffalo and New York went 65 per cent of the grain. Those figures are shown to be wrong, according to this paragraph from the address of J. H. Barnes.

The member for Qu'Appelle says the rate is 6 cents, but Mr. Barnes says:

> The rail rate from Buffalo to New York on the published tariff is 9 cents, but as I explained to you practically no grain was moving. The route that was open —the Erie canal—with totally inadequate facilities advanced the rate to 13 cents per bushel, paralleling the railroad which was supposed to carry it for 9.

From Buffalo to Montreal is a water route. It is equipped with the facilities of forty years ago. It can handle a vessel of 250 feet in length when the lake carrier of to-day west of Buffalo is 600 feet in length. That means that the carriers that operate on this 40-year-old route are limited in number and limited more in carrying capacity. Thirty days ago those carriers were operating on a tariff from Buffalo to Montreal of 6 to 7 cents per bushel. Last Saturday 15½ cents was paid for the carriage from Buffalo to Montreal. That is the pressure of grain west of Buffalo seeking an outlet to foreign markets.

The effect of the market rise in prices has been this. In thirty days the foreign price of wheat has advanced 25 cents per bushel, the foreign price of corn has advanced twenty cents per bushel, because these markets are inadequately supplied. The market price in America of wheat has advanced 10 cents per bushel and of corn 10 cents per bushel. That is, the spread between the ultimate foreign price which should be reflected back to our farms, has widened from 10 to 15 cents per bushel because of the lack of adequate facilities to move the crop pressing on the market in the West.

In other words, the lack of a deepened Welland canal and adequate rail and water facilities to properly take care of the crop produced the conditions described by Mr. Barnes. These statements I have read from the report of one of the leading experts on the transportation of grain on the North American continent show the necessity of at once deepening this canal, and until the canal is open, the $30,000,000 which has been spent so far has been wasted and will be of no benefit. I think the people of Canada for this reason should get the benefit of the canal as soon as possible. A good many matters have entered into this discussion that I think should not have been brought up, and I was sorry to hear them discussed. In the first place, there has been too much sectional discussion in this chamber regarding this canal. I do not wish to refer to other routes, because they are not relevant to the question before the House. At the same time many of these routes have a great many advantages and disadvantages, and I believe the route via the Welland canal and the river St. Lawrence which has been in existence since 1829 is the best route. The more we discuss it the more we are convinced that it is the logical route for the carriage of grain to the sea.

A question was raised in this debate about the use of the merchant marine and the boats that would be used with the improved Welland canal. I am sorry that these boats have been offered for sale, because I know that there is a good deal of transportation being carried on, not only in package freight, but in the carrying of grain, coal and iron ore that these ships could get.

[Mr. Church.]

I will give one concrete example. A company called the Kirkwood Company are now operating between the Maritime provinces and Toronto and Hamilton. Last year this company, with one ship, operated as far west as the cities I have named, and they cut six cents per 100 pounds off the carrying charge for package freight. That had such an effect on the transportation business that the Canada Steamships Company have reduced their rate per 100 pounds, and the Kirkwood Company, according to returns brought down to the House the other day, have written several letters to the government in regard to the purchase of the merchant marine ships. They find they can build up a good trade between the Mother Country and the Maritime provinces and the Great Lakes, through the Welland canal.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) has referred to various matters, but the figures which were presented in the report of the Saskatchewan Grain Commission, in 1914, are not correct, because the prices have been raised; there have been several increases in the rates. The Grain Commission in Saskatchewan sat before the war in 1914, and took evidence. Since that time the cost of transportation between Fort William and Montreal has been fluctuating. The hon. member referred to the average rate as stated in some of the government periodicals. These are not altogether correct in some respects because the quotations in some of the returns for the past two seasons show the rates the hon. member mentioned are not correct. The figures given by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners, and by the commissioners of some other ports on the Great Lakes are at variance with these figures, and I have shown the rates quoted in the report of J. H. Barnes from which I have read. The prices to Montreal in the grain congestion last year went up to 13 and 19 cents a bushel. At Buffalo and New York the rates went up in the same ratio. I might say the more you study this particular question the more you will be convinced of the accuracy of my statements. If some hon. members for the West would go down to the banks of the Detroit river in the summertime and spend five or six minutes there, they would see the continual stream of lake freighters of large tonnage passing through. In effect these big freighters all go to Buffalo, because you have no deepened Welland canal to take care of them. The canal is unable to take care of the trade at present. The Erie barge canal cannot take care of the ships and they are delayed there for sixty days. In effect the Welland canal and lake Ontario route is not able to get the business because of the present small canal. When you take the large freighter the Grant Morden, about 750 feet long, you see what they can do. The grain from that one large ship has to be transferred to seven or eight smaller ships at Port Colborne, in order to take it down lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence. The Welland canal has never had a chance to show what it can do either in rates or anything else.

In conclusion, I agree with what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has said about the desirability of having additional elevator accommodation all over the Great Lakes; we should have had it long ago. We used to have seven or eight of these elevators in the port from which I come, and there is not a single elevator there now. The farmers of Ontario sent a memorandum to the government some two or three years ago asking for a terminal elevator in central Ontario. We have never got it. When the Welland canal is finished in 1927 there will be a terrible scarcity of elevator accommodation, not only at Port Colborne but at Fort William, Toronto and other cities along the route. It will take several years to build these elevators. Money spent in that direction I think is wisely expended. The natural route for grain is the St. Lawrence and the sooner we get that route in proper shape the more money will be saved in transportation costs and charges.

I wish to read from the International Joint Commission's report one or two conclusions regarding the Welland canal. At page 178, the conclusion of the commission is as follows:

> Another factor in the situation that should not be lost sight of is the peculiar relationship to the proposed improvement of the new Welland ship canal, a portion of which is now under construction. As pointed out in an earlier part of this report, the completion of the Welland ship canal and the adoption and completion of the St. Lawrence improvement would remove the only barrier to the creation of a deep-water route from the head of the lakes to the sea. This would give at least 25-foot navigation from the sea up to the Detroit river, with a present minimum of about 20 feet above Lake Erie. Although entirely outside the strict terms of the reference submitted to it by the two governments, the commission has been impressed by the fact that the new Welland ship canal is such an integral part of the waterway, and is so inseparably interwoven with the project under immediate consideration, that it should properly be considered as a part of the whole scheme and the expense of its construction should be apportioned between the two governments upon the same basis as the works recommended for the upper St. Lawrence.

About a page or so further on they recommend:

> That the new Welland ship canal be embodied in said scheme and treated as a part thereof.
> That Canada proceed with the works necessary for the completion of said new Welland ship canal in accordance with the plans already decided upon by that country.

I want to say to hon. gentlemen from the West that I believe the people of Ontario are sympathetic to the desire that the West should receive increased transportation facilities, not only by rail, but by water, and they want to see the West grow and prosper. The hope of the country is in the West. They want to see the West receive a measure of relief from the transportation difficulties they have in that great country to-day. With the early completion of the Welland ship canal, all the great boats on the upper lakes will be able to go down to lake Ontario, and this will bring about, not only a cut in the rates, but a more important factor, namely relief from the congestion of the railways and assistance in getting the crop out. It will do a great deal to reduce costs and will assist the farmers as well.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) dwelt on the cost of this canal and many other phases of the problem. The figures fluctuate very much. The interests of the country would be best served by the immediate construction of this canal. In conclusion, I hope the work will be started this year, and that a vigorous effort will be made by the engineers in charge to push it along. The engineers who had charge of the Chippawa power canal had their own plant; they had an electrically driven shovel and other electrical devices of all kinds; the engineering was modern throughout, and they did a great deal of the work themselves, with the result that a great work like that was consummated with very considerable economy.

Mr. LEWIS: I do not know whether any serious objection can be taken to the expenditure on the Welland ship canal at the present time. I think the objection should have been taken some years ago. I do not know whether the last speaker (Mr. Church) spoke wisely and said the truth when he said that $30,000,000 had already been wasted. But the question that I wish to ask at this period is this; What will be the value of the canal when it is completed, if it is looked upon as a unit? I have listened to the various arguments that have been presented in this House this afternoon, and all who have spoken in favour of the Welland canal did so in the light of the larger scheme, in conjunction, I might say, with the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. If the Welland canal has no virtue outside of the larger scheme, it seems to me that at the present time it would be opportune to object to the expenditure that is now being advocated. The argument in favour of both schemes is this, that grain and other commodities will be carried much more cheaply. As regards grain, we heard this afternoon that the grain would have to be handled at least five or six times before it reached Montreal for shipment to Great Britain. I can hardly understand how you are going to cheapen rates when you have to handle a commodity five or six times before it reaches the ultimate consumer.

The question that confronts us at the present time is this: In view of the larger scheme, can we seriously contemplate the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway when we consider that we have only 9,000,000 people, those people already well over-burdened with taxation? Before that scheme can really be contemplated, we need a much larger population and a great deal more work for the canal to do. Are we really utilizing the resources that we now have? The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) said that when he was in the West in company with the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the West was advocating the deepening of the Welland canal. I was wondering at that particular time whether the West had three transcontinental railways that were not being fully utilized, or whether they were even completed. But the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) spoke rightly when he said that we had three great transcontinental railways and that we were not utilizing them to the fullest advantage. As a people we believe in economy. Why should we not utilize these railways to their greatest effect, and then if they prove inadequate, to stop the shortage or to meet any embarrassment we find in the fall season, it will be quite time for us to advocate some larger scheme? I should like the minister to say, after I am through, if there is any virtue in the Welland canal if it is taken by itself, whether it will be of any benefit to the West or to any other part of the country if the St. Lawrence waterway scheme is never completed.

As regards the cost, the hon. member (Mr. Church) said that if we had continued the work during the war, the cost would have been 50 per cent greater. The minister himself said that when the canal was started, it was expected to cost $55,000,000. He then went on to say that it may cost eighty or ninety million dollars, and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle says possibly $100,000,000, which figure, I think, is more nearly correct. In that case, although the war did stop the work, we find that the work is costing 100 per cent more than it was originally expected to cost. How much of the work is completed? Last year the late Minister of Railways gave us a detailed statement regarding the expenditure, the contracts that were under way, and we would be glad to have that information now.

As regards the larger scheme, I understood from the hon. member (Mr. Church) that the United States were willing to build the canal, that is the canal from lake Ontario to Montreal. I have carefully read many of the statements that have appeared in our papers, and I have never heard or read of any public man, any official, stating that the United States were willing to pay for this great scheme. If that is so, I would be glad to be corrected in my statement; but I do not believe such a statement has been made, and until we in this country have been able to pay some part of the principal of our war debt, until we as a people are willing to live within our own budget and taxation which we are able to impose upon the people, it is presumptuous for anyone to advocate a scheme that will involve this young country with a small population in an expenditure of possibly over $300,000,000. For that reason, before I can vote intelligently upon a scheme on which possibly some $35,000,000 has already been expended, I want the minister to inform me how much work has been completed, what contracts have been let for this year, and what the cost of the entire scheme completed will amount to.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend intimated that it would have been better to go on with the work during the war—

Mr. LEWIS: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: —because it would have been cheaper. Does he realize that this would have meant cutting down the wages of the men to 50 per cent of what they are getting now.

Mr. LEWIS: I do not think I said that. I said that at the present time the work is costing 100 per cent more than it would have amounted to under pre-war prices.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend did not mean what I said then I accept his explanation. But I understood him to argue that it would have been wiser to go on with the work at that time because we could have got it done more cheaply. It was impossible to go on with the contracts. They were made on the 1913 basis and the contractors accepted the fair wage clause under which the men would have to be paid the current rate of wages, and during the war the current rate of wages was more than double what it was before. The only thing that could have been done during the war was to devote all the energies of the country to the prosecution of our part in the struggle, and these other things had to be dropped for the time being. I do not see how the late government could have done anything else.

As to the other question, of the United States offering to build their share of the canal, this matter was discussed by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) before six o'clock, when he said that it had been recommended by the International Joint Commission that the United States should pay a certain proportion of the cost. The United States, however, have not accepted that proposition, although it has been recommended. As regards the benefit to be derived from the Welland canal, as I said this afternoon, you cannot make any absolute statement. If the enlargement of the Welland canal, apart altogether from the larger scheme, is not going to be a factor in lowering transportation costs, then undoubtedly the expenditure on it would be a foolish one. But is it not reasonable to suppose that if the larger bulk of traffic can be carried 200 miles nearer to ocean-going vessels and then be transshipped, it must of necessity lessen the cost of the entire carriage? Let me illustrate the point. It is only a matter of hours, for instance, to transfer a cargo from Prescott or Kingston to Montreal for ocean transportation, while if these smaller vessels have to come all the way from Port Colborne, or 200 miles further away, the cost, as my hon. friend can well see, is bound to be increased. In other words, the closer you can get a cargo in large bulk to the point of final shipment the cheaper must be the freight rates. If there were never to be a further deepening of the St. Lawrence channel the enlargment of the Welland canal must be of benefit to the solution of the transportation problem in the way of reducing costs. As a matter of fact, the surveys for the enlargement of the Welland canal were undertaken and were partially complete before the larger scheme was seriously thought of; and it has been contended, and will be accepted as a truism by all men who have studied the question, that the deepening of the canal, allowing larger ships to come to the end of deep water above the rapids, must tend to reduce the cost of transportation.

No new contracts have been let this year. As I pointed out this afternoon, sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 are under construction, while 6, 7, and 8 have not yet been let. The object is to have the contracts let so that the completion of the work on all the contracts will be accomplished approximately about the same time. As to the percentages of work done, earth excavation has been completed to the extent of 48 per cent; watertight embankments, 60 per cent; rock excavation, 31 per cent; concrete excavation, 31 per cent; and reinforcing walls, about 40 per cent. That is for the whole of the contracts.

Mr. KNOX: I was struck with the minister's statement before six o'clock in regard to the strong representations made from the West for the Welland canal; and the same thing has been repeated by the hon. member (Mr. Church) to-night. I remember very well when the minister made his trip throughout the West along with the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but I cannot recall any concrete demand for the Welland canal at that time. I am probably speaking from the producers' standpoint rather than from the standpoint of a representative of some of the corporations or municipalities which the hon. gentleman has spoken of. However, it has occurred to me that if the minister wishes to satisfy the demand of the West in the matter of railway transportation he will be afforded a very good opportunity when he brings down that estimate he has promised for the Hudson Bay railway. I do not want to precipitate a discussion on that item just now, because no doubt we shall have occasion later to deal with it; and the liberal estimate which appears here for the Welland canal encourages me to look forward to equally generous provision for the completion of the Hudson Bay route. I question very much, though, whether we are justified in voting so much money for the Welland canal at the present time. I endorse most heartily what was said by the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) this afternoon, in regard to some of the matters he discussed. He stated, I believe, that so far as he could figure out the completion of the Welland canal would make no more difference to the transportation of grain than possibly 2 cents per bushel. Personally I doubt whether it would make even that much difference. But I think the minister would be well advised to consider some of the other demands that have come forward.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is my hon. friend in a position to tell us by how much the completion of the Hudson Bay railway would decrease the cost of freight? We must have definite information.

Mr. KNOX: The information in this regard will be just as definite as it can be in connection with the other matter. We know from the report submitted by the Lake Freights commission that the rates last year from September to November varied all the way from 3 to 11 cents, and while we have such conditions we can form no idea of the cost of carrying grain from Fort William to Montreal. We know in regard to the Hudson Bay route, taking Saskatoon as a centre, that grain can be carried to Port Nelson for less than it can be carried to Fort William, and we also know that Port Nelson is approximately as near Liverpool as is Montreal. If we can eliminate the cost of lake transportation along with considerable rail transportation there is no doubt that the saving on that route would be very much more than the saving that would be gained by the deepening of the Welland canal. I shall not continue the discussion now because, as I said before, I am looking forward to a very liberal estimate being brought down for this work shortly, and then we will have an opportunity to discuss it further.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised to find hon. members from the West opposing the completion of the Welland canal, for I have the conviction that the development of the St. Lawrence route is the very best undertaking that can be carried out in the interests of the grain growers of the West. It will secure for them a reduction in the cost of carrying their grain to the seaboard that is variously estimated at from 7 to 12 cents a bushel. My hon. friend from Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) seems to argue that before we think of improving our transportation routes we should congest all our railway routes with grain.

Mr. LUCAS: How does my hon. friend estimate the saving of from 7 to 12 cents a bushel on the transportation of grain by the improvement of the Welland canal and the deepening of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not putting that forward as my own estimate, but on the authority of men who have gone into the question very thoroughly, such as the engineers of the International Joint Commission. It is their estimate.

Mr. KNOX: Does the hon. member refer to the deepening of the Welland canal or of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. HOCKEN: I say that when you get the water route from the head of the lakes to Montreal or Quebec available for the through transport of grain a saving on the cost of transportation will be effected which is estimated at from 7 to 12 cents per bushel.

[Mr. Knox.]

Mr. MILLAR: Considering that even last season when there was a great deal of congestion and a monopoly was operating on the Great Lakes a considerable quantity of wheat was carried for less than 12 cents a bushel, how does my hon. friend arrive at his estimate that 12 cents a bushel could be saved between Fort William and Montreal?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think my hon. friend will find that that rate was secured for only two or three cargoes and that it is capable of explanation, but not being conversant with the circumstances I cannot explain such an exceptionally low rate. I do not think any one will attempt to argue that it is not cheaper to carry grain by water from the head of the lakes to Quebec than by lake and rail. It is notorious that the cost of carrying any merchandise by rail is greater than by water. My idea is that the work on the Welland canal should be proceeded with with all possible energy and that the other part of the great water system from the head of the lakes to Quebec should be completed.

In reply to my hon. friend from Swift Current who estimates the improvement of the St. Lawrence channel at $300,000,000, I would point out that he is about $50,000,000 higher than the estimate made by very competent authorities of the International Joint Commission. But there is this factor to be kept in mind, that by improving the St. Lawrence channel we would get a by-product which would pay for the whole cost of the work. That fact was brought out last session, I think, by my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) with some very definite and convincing figures. The electrical energy to be developed along with the improvement of the channel could be made to pay for the whole undertaking, and if we adopted Mr. Gardiner's plan of financing this enterprise, all that the Dominion would be committed to would be a guarantee of its share of the cost of the work. In a book written by him on the St. Lawrence deep waterways Mr. Gardiner, of Chicago, proposes that the government of Canada and the government of the United States should jointly appoint an international commission with authority to issue bonds. It was Mr. Gardiner's opinion that three times the amount of money required for the work could be raised at 4 per cent, it would be such an attractive investment. According to his idea the commission would operate the undertaking without profit. No doubt the commissioners would be properly remunerated for their work but there would be no dividends to pay, and what would usually be diverted for this purpose would go to amortize the debt. So that all the responsibility the Dominion would incur would be the guarantee of its share of the bonds. It follows that the financing of the undertaking would be a very easy proposition, and when the work was completed we would have a deep waterway from Fort William to the city of Quebec, or perhaps lower down, where great cargoes could be transshipped and we would reduce to a minimum the cost of handling the grain from the producer on the prairies to the consumer in Europe. We have vessels now carrying 500,000 bushels—

Mr. MANION: Six hundred thousand bushels.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I was putting it well within the mark. One of these great freighters from Fort William could take 500,000 bushels of grain down to Quebec—not stopping at Montreal necessarily, except that this port has great elevator capacity—or even down to the gulf, and there transship its cargo to two or three tramp steamers which would take it across the ocean. I venture to say that the greatest relief for the agricultural industry in western Canada is to be obtained in that way. I voted for the Hudson Bay railway. I do not believe that that route is going to give the farmers of the West so much relief as they expect, for I am afraid the navigation season will be too short. What I do pin my faith to is the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence deep waterway, and I think my hon. friends who live in the West, and whose interest lies in getting their produce to the world's markets at the lowest cost, should not oppose the spending of money on any link of that great waterway which will ultimately—and shortly, I venture to say—be completed. I do not think there is enough influence anywhere to prevent this project being undertaken and carried to completion, because it is one of nature's great waterways, and only requires to be developed to give its full service to this country. I believe that when Canada can join with the United States to carry out this great international work there will be such a flood of trade through our lakes and down the St. Lawrence that it will astonish the people of this country. If my memory is right, I have seen it stated somewhere that of the grain produced on our western prairies last year less than 40 per cent went by Montreal, the bulk of it, or 60 per cent, going out by Buffalo. There is no reason on earth why 60 per cent of our grain should go out by a foreign channel, especially when we have better means for its transportation, but the big barges on the Erie canal have been taking this large percentage of our wheat to New York and developing that port at the expense of our own ports. I think, Sir, that of all classes of our people those who stand to gain most by the development of our waterways from lake Erie to the gulf of St. Lawrence are the men who grow grain on the western prairies.

Mr. WHITE: Nearly every hon. member who has spoken on this vote has coupled the deepening of the Welland canal with the completion of the St. Lawrence deep waterway. Although the minister has given his view as to the reason why the Welland canal should be finished, I believe that the full benefit of the new Welland canal will not be available until the St. Lawrence route is completed. On May 29 last year the Prime Minister, in response to a question from the hon. member for West York, said that a reply had been sent to the United States government that this was not an opportune time to discuss this question, particularly as the report from the International Joint Commission had only been available for a short time. That objection is disposed of now, of course, by the lapse of time.

9 p.m.

It seems to me that this discussion has revolved a great deal around the transportation of wheat and the problem of getting the wheat from the western prairies out to the seaboard. There are many routes proposed. The route by way of Vancouver has been dealt with previously this session, and a large amount was voted for the construction of an elevator at Vancouver harbour, which will no doubt take care of a great deal of the wheat at the western end of the prairies. The hon. member for Prince Albert is in hopes that the Hudson Bay railway will also transport a great deal of western wheat. It seems to me that the production of wheat in Canada is by no means limited. We have not yet reached the maximum production, and even with all these increased facilities for shipment we shall not be able to handle the crops which are to come any better than those we have handled in the past. The development of the St. Lawrence waterway is not entirely for the purpose of shipping grain. There is also involved in it the question of supplying fuel for Ontario particularly. Recently we have been making efforts to get a favourable freight rate on western coal, but the only rate available, $9 per ton, seems too high for us to be able to bring western coal to Ontario. There therefore remains the St. Lawrence route, which in time will possibly mean that Nova Scotia coal or coke can be delivered in Ontario at competitive prices with the American product, or it may be that

Welsh coal, which found its way last winter as far as Brantford, Ontario, coming from Montreal by rail, will be enabled to come up the St. Lawrence river and into lake Ontario and perhaps lake Huron.

Another object which we have in view is the development of power. About twelve years ago the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario undertook to sell 10,000 horse-power in the municipalities adjoining the Niagara district. The chairman of that commission was told that he would never find a market for 10,000 horse-power, but in a few years the demand had so increased that it reached 275,000 horse-power, and the existing plants being worked to capacity it was necessary to provide further development, and the Chippawa creek scheme was launched with a plant first of all with a capacity of 100,000 horse-power. Ten million dollars was to have been spent on that development, but the demand for power increased by leaps and bounds, and in the end that development is to reach an estimated production of 600,000 horse-power and cost about $80,000,000. Now we are told that if the demand within the next three or four years increases in the same proportion, all the power that is being developed at the Chippawa plant will be taken and virtually all the power that can be developed in the Niagara district will then be utilized; and it will be available at prices ranging from one-half to one-third of the cost at which power can be developed by the use of coal. In my own city of London, which is about 120 miles from Niagara, we contracted about ten years ago for, I think it was, 4,000 horse-power. Some of those who were opposed to the scheme threw up their hands and asked: What will you do? You will never get rid of it. But the result is that the city is now using four times that amount and is calling for more. Niagara power is now being distributed throughout the rural districts. The farmers are beginning to use it, and that demand is going to increase very largely. So, Mr. Chairman, it will be necessary for Ontario to find more power somewhere.

The report of the United States and Canadian engineers on the St. Lawrence development goes to show that about 1,500,000 horse-power can be developed in connection with the construction of this deep waterway, and that probably 3,000,000 additional horse-power can be developed in time. I support most heartily the suggestion of the hon. member for Welland that the United States government be invited to a conference on this question. They came to us asking us to meet them in a conference to discuss the terms of a treaty, but there is no reason why Canada cannot counter with a different proposition. Terms may be discussed, and as the hon. member for Swift Current suggested, the ideas of the United States legislators could be secured on the proposition.

Many figures have been quoted as to what the scheme would mean in the saving of freight on wheat. I have a clipping here which I cut from the Toronto Globe of November 14, 1922. It gives the opinion of Governor J. A. Preus of Minnesota who was in Ottawa about that time. He estimated that there would be a saving of 7½ cents per bushel on grain shipped from Duluth to Liverpool by the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterway. He said:

> This amount was spread over the short railway haulage from Buffalo to New York. The total cost of shipping to Liverpool from Duluth was 15½ cents a bushel. All the farmers of eighteen states bordering on the Great Lakes were anxious to have the St. Lawrence deep waterway constructed as soon as possible. Railway transportation in the United States was very inadequate. Potatoes were rotting in the ground in Minnesota and western states because farmers could not get enough cars to handle their crops.
> The only opposition to the scheme in the United States came from the New England states and New York.

Recent newspaper reports would lead one to believe that many of the railroads in the central states are also favourable to this development. I would like to ask if the government has had any communication from the Ontario provincial government or the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission relative to this project being taken up as a provincial activity.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot speak positively as to that. The chairman of the Hydro Electric Commission, Sir Adam Beck, had one or two conversations with me concerning it, but there were merely suggestions, no definite statement was made as to the province taking up the project on its own initiative altogether. I can scarcely see how the province itself could undertake the entire work because it is so interwoven with the federal situation both in the United States and Canada, but we did have a discussion as to the possibilities of the project. In fact, Sir Adam Beck suggested a partial development of the undertaking for the present, but as to the details of how this should be done I think there was nothing definite said.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There seems to be some opposition among our friends from the West to the expenditure of money on deepening the Welland canal. I believe that there has always been a demand from the West for the deepening of the Welland canal right up to the present time, and I say so after a study of the subject. I have here an old copy of the Sessional Papers for the year 1871, which gives some very interesting facts regarding the canal system of Canada. The whole question came under discussion then and a commission, as usual, was appointed to look into the matter, and the facts brought out in the report published in 1871 are very interesting to any person who wishes to study this question. A series of questions had been submitted to various people all over the country interested in the matter, and among the questions asked was this:

What have been the relative rates, for three years, of freight from Chicago to Montreal; and Chicago to New York?

W. J. Patterson, of the Montreal Board of Trade gives a very interesting set of figures here. Starting with the year 1861 he quotes the rate of freight per bushel on wheat from Chicago to New York as follows:

Year	Via Buffalo	Via Oswego
1861..	27½ cents	27 cents
1862..	26½ "	26½ "
1863..	23 "	22¾ "
1869..	23 "	23¼ "

With freight rates of such a character as this a demand came from the west for the opening and deepening of the canals to reduce the charges, and if we have at the present time a rate of 12 or 13 cents it is largely due to the fact that these canals have been opened and deepened.

Mr. FORKE: When you say "West" do you have regard to the Canadian West?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There was no Canadian West, at any rate not to amount to anything, in those days.

Mr. FORKE: That is what I meant.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The demand came from the West for these improvements much in opposition to the opinion of the boards of trade in the East where it was considered the expense of these canal improvements was too great for the country to undertake. In this same year the question was asked:

What reduction per bushel in the rates of freight from Chicago to Kingston and Oswego would result from the enlargement of the Welland canal to the capacity of the largest class of vessels now carrying from Chicago or Milwaukee to Buffalo?

These same questions are being asked to-day, and there seems to be an almost unanimous opinion that the reduction, on account of the increased cargo carried in the larger boats, would amount to about 3 or 4 cents a bushel. The question is asked why we in the East are interested in this matter? In reply we have to say that we regret that our trade is largely going through United States channels. What were the conditions prevailing at the time to which I refer? I find these figures given in the report from which I have already quoted:

Total receipts of grain at Kingston in season 1870, from United States ports amounted to a trifle over 6,000,000 bushels.

The proportion is computed to be—

In British vessels..	2,256,000 bushels
In United States vessels..	3,785,000 "

In other words over 6,000,000 bushels of grain were being received at the port of Kingston through both Canadian and United States vessels. What is the result to-day? To-day the trade amounts to very little. The large bulk of it, during the last few years, has been going to the United States. We believe that the deepening of the Welland canal, in addition to reducing the freight rate, will restore this traffic again to our Canadian ports, to our own Canadian steamship lines and to our own Canadian railways.

Mr. BROWN: I would not have taken part in this debate at the present time were it not for the assumption contained in the speeches of some hon. gentlemen, an assumption which I am prepared to admit is warranted in some degree because of speeches made from this corner of the House, that the West is unanimously opposed to the project of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways. In spite of the fact that last year, in speaking on this matter, I indicated some doubt as to whether the time is opportune for engaging in the expenditure necessary in that great work, I did express the opinion that the time would come when that work would be a completed fact. Indeed, I feel satisfied that in the not very distant future it will be an accomplished fact. In regard to the Welland canal itself I confess that I had some doubts as to the wisdom of continuing expenditure on that work until the greater project itself was well under way. I may say, however, that in view of the discussion this afternoon, and some thought I had given it previously, I can see that while the full benefit of the Welland canal will not be available until the greater work is completed, there is reason to believe that even with the one link connecting lake Erie with lake Ontario, thus making it possible to bring the grain farther down in the larger vessels, there is reason to believe that there can be a considerable saving effected in the carriage of wheat.

Some few years ago, going back to the larger project, I attended a conference in Winnipeg at which the hon. member for Welland was present together with a number of gentlemen from the United States. I was there representing our farmers' organization at that time. They placed the matter very fully before us, and from that time I have been very sympathetically disposed towards the larger enterprise. It is true we laid down two propositions at that time. We refused to accept it as an alternative to the Hudson Bay railway, nor do I think there is any disposition indicated here to offer it as an alternative. We take it that those members who have spoken from all sides of the House have spoken in good faith when they have said that the Hudson Bay railway will be completed. However, we did lay down that proposition, and we also laid down another: That we could not agree to the expenditure of a large sum of money on the part of Canada until there was some assurance that the benefits that would come, or that should come, to Canada by entering into that larger scheme would not be absorbed by some lake freight shippers combine. I think the fear we expressed on that occasion was well warranted, as was amply demonstrated during last fall which led to government action in the appointment of a royal commission, the report of which is now before the country. Undoubtedly the necessity has been made manifest of having the rates under some control. I will just say again that I have no desire to enter into a lengthy discussion at the present time. I for one would just like to make it known that the West is not absolutely opposed to this scheme as might seem to be implied by some of the things that have been said.

Mr. GERMAN: Before the vote carries there are one or two observations I should like to make further in regard to this matter. In speaking of the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterways, the estimated cost of which is $250,000,000, certain hon. gentlemen made the statement that that estimate will not nearly complete the work. They say it will cost double that and they instance the fact that the construction of the new Welland ship canal has cost, or will cost, nearly double the estimated amount of its construction, I should like to call attention of hon. gentlemen to this fact: The estimated cost of the Welland ship canal was $55,000,000. That was in pre-war times. The canal is divided for construction purposes into eight sections. Four of those sections were advertised prior to the war, and three of them are among the heaviest construction sections on the canal. Yet the tenders for these four sections were all within the estimate. The tenders on which the contracts were made, were within the engineer's estimates for construction. If the whole work had been tendered for as advertised and contracts entered into for its construction previous to the war, those contracts would have all been at prices within the engineer's estimates. The war came on and we all know what happened. I wish to call the attention of hon. members to the further fact that the engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals who made the estimate for the construction of the Welland canal is the same engineer, or one of the same engineers, who made the estimate for the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway, and instead of that estimate being made on pre-war prices, it was made during the continuance of the war and at prices which prevailed at that time, and consequently when he estimates a cost of $252,000,000 or thereabouts for the construction of the deep waterway from lake Ontario to Montreal it is based on the estimate of cost which is above what that cost would be at the present time. So that I will venture to say that the work can be done well within the engineer's estimate. But even at that, in view of the financial conditions of the country at the present time, I would not stand up and speak in favour of the construction of this channel if I did not feel absolutely convinced in my own mind that the work could be done and paid for by the disposal of the electric current which will be developed by reason of that construction. Now, $252,000,000 will not only construct the deep channel from lake Ontario to Montreal, but it will also pay for the construction of the hydraulic plant which will develop at the Long Sault rapids 1,500,000 electric horsepower, one half of which or 750,000 electrical horse-power will belong to Canada. That can be sold at the switch board of the power house retail at $14 per horse-power. Yes, and more than that; because at this very hour hydro-electric power developed at Niagara Falls is costing in the Niagara district $20 per horse-power. The price has gone up by reason of the extra cost of construction, and it is costing us in the city of Welland at this hour $20 per horse-power. So that when I say this horse-power can be sold at the switch board for $14 per horse-power it is well within the mark, and 750,000 horse-power at $14 per horse-power will in thirty-five or forty years pay every dollar of the cost of construction of that St. Lawrence deep waterway.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is not a million and a half horse-power?

Mr. GOULD: I would like if the hon. member could give the pro rata values, or what price is charged in urban districts and in rural districts for power?

Mr. GERMAN: The hon. member means in Ontario?

Mr. GOULD: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: Exactly the same price —no difference. It is "service at cost" in Ontario, and what it costs to produce and transmit is what the consumer pays, no matter where it may be located. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) says it is not a million and a half horse-power. It is a million and a half for the whole development, 750,000 of which would be for Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is only on the international waterways.

Mr. GERMAN: That is only on the international section. Of course another 2,000,000 horse-power can be developed on the remaining sections of the river between the Long Sault rapids and Montreal.

Mr. GRAHAM: All in Canada.

Mr. GERMAN: Yes, every bit of it. The minister has stated that there was a question as to the legal right to use the St. Lawrence river, as between the province of Ontario and the Dominion. I do not think it will serve any useful purpose at the present time to discuss the relative legal rights of the province and the Dominion regarding the use of the waters of the St. Lawrence. I will venture to make this statement and express this opinion—it is only an opinion, and I will be interested in knowing what the newspapers, at any rate in Ontario, think about it—that the people of the province of Ontario are so anxious that this St. Lawrence project should not only be begun, but prosecuted energetically and immediately, that they would be willing, even though they had the legal right to the whole of it, to allow the proceeds of the sale of the 750,000 horse-power which is to be developed to be applied first in payment of the cost of construction, and after that payment has been accomplished that the proceeds of the sale of that power should be handed over to the province, if it was found that the province was solely and wholly entitled to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member mean the entire construction? He does not want us to understand that he is distinguishing between the cost that is attributable to the benefit of navigation and the cost that is attributable to power?

Mr. GERMAN: I was not distinguishing between them at all. I say that I believe that the people of Ontario would be willing that the proceeds of the sale of the 700,000 electrical horse-power which can be developed should be applied first to paying Canada's share of the whole cost of the construction of the deep water channel from lake Ontario to Montreal, which would be $125,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Where would you sell it?

Mr. GERMAN: That question is being asked by many people, "Where would you sell it? There is no market." It is only a very few years ago, perhaps 20 years ago, that electric power was developed at Niagara Falls. I heard that same question asked at that time. "Where can you sell 100,000 horse-power"? I was told by the then Premier of Ontario that we could not sell 30,000 horse-power. I told him that in a very few years we would not only be selling 30,000 electric horse-power, but we would be selling 300,000 electric horse-power, and these words have not only come true, but more than come true, because at this hour, after 20 years of the use of the electric current developed at Niagara Falls, we are disposing in this province, from Niagara Falls only, of 500,000 electric horse-power, and the people are crying for more. That 700,000 electric horse-power would be sold, certainly inside of ten years, and I believe inside of five years. There is no question about disposing of this commodity. If you read the information which is given in the report of the International Joint Commission, you will find that, after a thorough investigation, they say that far and away more than that will be disposed of in a short time. Therefore, I say that there will be no difficulty about the sale and there should be no difficulty about the beginning and the continuance of the construction of that great enterprise.

Those of us who are members of the Canadian Deep Waterways and Power Association are not asking the government to pledge themselves to anything. We are asking them to do only what, in my opinion, is a gentlemanly thing to do. The United States government first communicated with the government of Canada asking them to a conference. The government of Canada said: "No, we cannot have a conference with you now; it is too early." We ask the government now, after nearly two years of office, to say: "Now, we will sit down and discuss this matter with you." Ask them to a conference this time. They asked you a while ago for reciprocity. You ignored that request. You did not wait for them to ask you again; you are asking them now for reciprocity. Therefore I say: They asked you for a conference over this St. Lawrence waterways scheme. You refused it. Now sit down and ask them to join you in a conference; discuss the matter, and if you find that the estimates of the engineers are correct, and that there is a reasonable chance of disposing of the electric current which can be developed, then go ahead with this project which will be a benefit to the whole community.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite understand the hon. member's state of mind when he says that nobody is asking this government to pledge itself to anything. That is a very general attitude. I feel that I should say something, and this time in support of the contention advanced by the minister, that is, in support of the appropriation, irrespective for the time being of the larger project. The history of the Welland canal development, that is, of this last improvement, dates to about the beginning or before the beginning of the war. The project was continued until war necessities compelled its suspension. It was resumed as soon as possible after, in order that we might, as quickly as we could, arrive at the day when the large amount of capital already invested would be making some return. We felt that we could not launch on a very large scale on the renewed prosecution; but we did put in what we thought were reasonable appropriations, considering the circumstances of the time. Following exactly the same policy, the minister puts in now a similar appropriation.

It cannot be argued successfully that the deepening of the Welland canal will have value only when the larger project is complete. If such were the case, then it would be just as cheap to carry grain from Fort William in the canal vessels that now pass through right to Montreal. What I mean is this: If it were as cheap to carry grain over that distance from the Welland canal to Prescott or Kingston in small vessels as in large, certainly there never would have been any deepening at all. We might just as well take the small vessels right on to Fort William. In a word, if it is possible to carry in large vessels the distance from Fort William through the Sault to the Welland canal, though that entails a transfer into small vessels there, how much more will it pay to carry in large vessels 210 miles more, say to Prescott, when no extra transfer at all is entailed? One cannot, if one simply stops there, argue the question any further. Undoubtedly the further you take the grain in the large vessels, the cheaper the transportation. How much cheaper it would be, it may be hard to estimate; but if it is only two cents or a cent and a half, then undoubtedly there is value, even though we do not contemplate that the canal is to be ultimately part of a larger scheme.

It is quite true that if, after we have the best means of transportation, the grip of an ocean syndicate is going to demand whatever figure it likes, we might as well go back and rely upon our railways. We have to have competition, or if we cannot have competition, we must have control. The business of government is to get the best method of transport. That is the basic necessity. After that the matter is one of government; the enterprise feature is over. You must first, though, get the best method of transport. We cannot argue that we should leave it to our railroads.

Water transportation has always had an immense advantage over land transportation, and the advantage, instead of diminishing in proportion, has really been increasing. It is now estimated, I think, and I think very accurately estimated, that the proportion of cost at present rates is about one to ten. What I mean to say is this: Taking the actual investment, cost of carriage, cost of upkeep and all the rest, it is just about one to ten; you can carry about ten miles by water what you can carry one mile by land. The advantage of the water over the land has increased with increased capital investment necessary for railways—of course we have that already—with increased cost of upkeep, increased wages, increased cost of material. Very well; it follows that with that tendency the value of our waterways right into the heart of this Dominion and this continent as a transportation asset multiplies with the years. It is a tremendous asset to this country. When we get it utilized as it can be, we bring the products of the East right into the very heart of the American continent by the largest vessels. Consequently we must first make the best transport lines we can, and having done that, of course government is necessary. There may be a change of government necessary before we reap the harvest, but those things can be attended to in due course.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are not going to delay the work that long.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The work necessary to a change will be undertaken even before the completion.

Mr. GRAHAM: Naturally.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very naturally. The completion of the change will follow quickly upon the undertaking. I was going to refer, though, to opposition apparently developing, not unanimously, but in some degree, from western Canada to this route. I think that is a mistake; I think hon. members will live to regret that they have assumed this attitude. I have never opposed, indeed I have urged, the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I have urged it more as a matter of honest contractual obligation to western Canada than based on any certain assurance in my mind that it is bound to be a commercial success. I say here and now that I would rather stake what little reputation I have upon the value of the investment in the Welland canal than upon the value of any investment in the Hudson Bay road. Twenty years, thirty years from now, those who support the water route right out through our Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence will, in my judgment, have more reason to be proud of their record than those who were very enthusiastic over the Hudson Bay road. Nevertheless, the latter road must as soon as we can complete it, be completed; it would be folly to desist. We had in our estimates of 1921, that is for 1921-22, $5,000,000 odd, perhaps $5,000,000 only, to carry on this Welland canal wark. We were pretty bitterly abused. The lovetaps now administered to the hon. minister in charge of the estimates are very mild compared with the flogging we had to take for daring to do our duty in regard to the same enterprise. Indeed, in the campaign of 1921, I want to remind hon. members, when I challenged the leader of the Progressive party to make good by specific articles the charge of wild extravagance against the government of that time, the first thing he pointed to was $5,000,000 on the Welland canal. That was the most outstanding instance of folly he could think of. We have now $11,000,000 and though there is objection it is not very strong. I venture to say that the objection will get less and less, and that with the opening up of real prospects through our waterway navigation the country will grow in unanimity behind the scheme.

Mr. MILLAR: Before the vote carries I think it only well that I should make a few additional remarks since considerable reference has been made to what I said this afternoon. I agree with every word the leader of the Opposition said until he came to the point where he referred to the comparison between water rates and rail rates. Looking over an American report I noticed that the comparison was nine to one some years ago in favour of water rates on the lakes. Since that time a great change has taken place. If it is ten to one now how is it that the railways from Buffalo to New York have put the Erie canal out of business?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Erie canal is not a really practicable waterway at all. It is a 12-foot water route, and you cannot carry heavy traffic on such a canal.

Mr. GRAHAM. And it is not all of that depth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it is not much better than a ditch.

Mr. GERMAN: It is only a few years since the Erie canal was deepened to 12 feet. It was only 8 feet until recently, and even now it is not 12 feet all the way.

Mr. MILLAR: Well, let us take another case. The Canadian Pacific Railway carries grain from Calgary to Fort William, which distance I have heard variously stated at 1,280 and 1,290 miles, for 15½ cents, whereas on the water route from Fort William to Montreal, a distance of about 1,200 miles, there have been as many as 22 different rates. The rates varied a great deal last season between these two points. I think that what would be considered a fair rate at present would be close to 10 or 11 cents. As a matter of fact I was slightly in error this afternoon when I stated that I thought 11 cents a fair rate. What I really intended to say was that this was an estimate I had seen stated for purposes of argument. I consider 11 cents really too high, and yet the distance for which this charge is made is some 1,200 miles as against the other rate I have cited of 1,280 miles.

Mr. MANION: Just in order to clear the point, I might explain to my hon. friend that the rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal is largely consumed in trans-shipments at the Georgian bay ports, or at Port Colborne. I understood my right hon. friend's estimate to refer to clear open-water transportation such as out in the lakes or on the ocean, but in a canal system the rate is naturally enhanced.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the hon. member (Mr. Manion) is putting the case too strongly when he says that a large part of the expense is taken up in the way he suggests. A little of it is consumed that way, but not a large percentage. Let me refer to another remark made by the leader of the Opposition and by the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). They both seem to infer from the discussion that some of the western members at least are opposed to the deepening of the Welland canal and of the St. Lawrence. I do not know of anyone who is opposed to the undertaking. The remarks I have made and those I have heard have been directed to the question as to when it would be wise to complete the work. That is all; and in order to arrive at a conclusion on that point we have been discussing the advantage that we might gain as shippers of grain, and how much we should save per bushel. I am quite confident the time will come when the St. Lawrence route will be deepened, and properly so; and it is quite well that the Welland canal should also be completed, especially in view of the fact that it has been started. I can agree with some hon. members, however, that it was started too soon, and it is now a question how quickly we ought to complete it.

Reference was made by some hon. members to the amount that would be saved, and the estimates vary from 7½ cents from the governor of Minnesota to 12 cents. Dealing with the high estimate that was suggested of 11 cents from Fort William to Montreal, I divided the cost into two parts: one was 4½ cents as far as Port Colborne and the other 7 cents from Port Colborne to Montreal. Now, it is readily seen that the only saving after the St. Lawrence route is opened up and the Welland canal is completed will be effected between Port Colborne and Montreal, I think that 7 cents is a very high estimate; it is far more than the grain will be carried for. But how will you save 12 cents when it is obvious that the total cost of carrying it is 7 cents as I have shown? That is what I want the committee to understand before this parliament commits the country to an expenditure of $252,000,000, which, as in a great many public undertakings, might probably be doubled in the long run. The member for Welland (Mr. German) suggested that it was probable we should not have to expend a dollar; he suggested that it would not cost the Canadian people one cent.

Mr. LANCTOT: Where will they get the money?

Mr. MILLAR: We have often heard that story. When something is promoted it is suggested that we are going to get something for nothing, but I do not think anyone will be foolish enough to be caught by that sort of thing now. Who thinks that if we deepen the St. Lawrence at a cost of two or three hundred million dollars the Canadian people will not have to shoulder any of that cost? It seems hardly worth serious consideration. Let us rest assured that when the St. Lawrence river is deepened Canada will pay for it and pay more than $252,000,000. The hon. member (Mr. Church) stated that my figures were not correct. That can be readily explained; as I said a moment ago, the rates are constantly varying. There were twenty-two different rates between various points last season, so I think hon. members will realize that by taking certain rates on specified dates one can prove almost anything. The rates I took were average rates, so I think my statement stands.

Mr. GOULD: I have been somewhat interested by remarks made by hon. gentlemen concerning this item. The Welland canal is getting to be quite a hardy annual and we look for its recurrence year after year, although it is pleasing to note that the appropriation is smaller this year and we hope that eventually it will disappear altogether. The statement I am about to make is not in opposition to the Welland canal and I am merely using this work as a key to the larger project which has entered into the discussion, namely, the deepening of the St. Lawrence route. I have taken the figures submitted by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) and made a few calculations. Taking a capitalization of approximately $250,000,000—and I might preface my remarks by referring to the prediction of certain hon. gentlemen that the power development and so on would pay for the whole undertaking—taking this capitalization, Canada's share is $125,000,000, which at 5 per cent—I have increased the interest rate—gives an interest charge of $6,250,000, which would have to come out of the revenue received from the sale of 750,000 horse power at $14 per horse power, or $10,500,000. Deducting from this revenue our bond interest charge of $6,250,000, we have a balance of $4,250,000. As business men, I do not think we would be prepared to deny that it would take the whole of this balance every year to meet the cost of maintenance. Consequently we would have nothing left to retire the bonds, and it seems to me these would have to be looked after by making a charge on the grain brought down by this route. That brings one to the statement made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), that he cannot see how the utilization of the route would enable us to save 10 cents a bushel on the transportation of western grain.

I do not wish to use this as an argument in support of the Hudson Bay route, but, coming from the West, naturally I am in favour of this route, although probably only as an auxiliary to the St. Lawrence route. I do not think any members from the West have tried to make it appear that the Hudson Bay route would divert traffic which should rightly go down the St. Lawrence. I think the Hudson Bay route would look after a part of the country which at the present time is undeveloped, and even with this route in operation I believe that with the further development of the country which, one might say, is naturally tributary to the St. Lawrence route, a still greater traffic would result from the deepening of this waterway. Therefore the Hudson Bay route does not of necessity enter into this discussion.

It has been well brought out by one hon. gentleman that the activities of combines should be circumscribed to the fullest possible extent, because it appears that the longer our transportation route the more opportunities there are for these combines to get in and steal from the individual who produces the commodity which is being transported. When the confidence of the people is restored by the assurance that combines will not be allowed to intervene between the producer and the ultimate consumer, I think there will not be quite so much apparent opposition to expenditures of this character. And then I do not think parliament will hesitate to grant to the government of the day power to undertake all these projects which have been advocated from time to time.

I only rose to sound a note of warning, for if we take precedent as a guide we are justified in assuming that the cost of deepening the St. Lawrence channel, like every other great undertaking, will exceed the initial estimate by a very large figure indeed, and in this event the benefits which would accrue from the development and sale of 750,000 horsepower would be more or less neutralized.

Mr. WARD: Mr. Chairman, I rise to utter a word of protest against what seems to be taken for granted, namely, that the West is opposed to the Welland canal improvement. I am sure that this assumption is not well founded, and can only have arisen because of the fact that operations having been suspended on the Hudson Bay railway, we do not accept the Welland canal as an alternative for the non-completion of the former work. But I am sure that the West is not opposed to the construction of the Welland canal.

Item agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume that everything has been said in connection with the preceding vote, Mr. Chairman. But under the arrangement with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) we were to discuss under that item the figures which he was to bring down under vote 139 providing for an advance of $73,000,000 to the Canadian National Railway Company. I think my hon. friend has the figures and is ready to table them.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. According to the arrangement, the other day, Mr. Chairman, I was to lay on the table a compilation of comparisons asked for by my hon. friend. I will lay it on the table now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. Why not take it as read and incorporate it in Hansard? We want to use it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am quite willing to put it in Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that this statement shall be taken as read?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

NOTE.—In the above statement there have been treated as cash advances certain amounts represented by certificates filed prior to May 31st and applicable to operations to March 31st, but for which the Department of Finance has not yet released the cash.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figures submitted by my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, give a summary of the allocation of the vote. In addition to that he has the details of the estimates, and as those are fairly long perhaps he would table them so we could have the information and save time. For example, these particulars show we are voting this year for the acquisition of property, materials and supplies $2,900,000. I think the House should have information as to what property we are buying for this sum. Then we have our interest and sinking funds on notes, securities or obligations amounting to over $25,000,000, and principal and interest of maturing or matured loans secured or unsecured amounting to $5,000,000. Then again we have construction and betterments amounting to $26,000,000, and co-ordination or consolidation of railway lines and facilities representing over $2,700,000. I would ask my hon. friend to table the details of the estimates of this year and of last year so we will have them for comparison and not consume the time of the committee.

10 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not those details here but I will get them.

The CHAIRMAN: That relates to the vote No. 139.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Loan to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council, upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine, and to be applied in the payment of deficits in operation of the company and the vessels under the company's control during the year ending March 31, 1924, $1,500,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before this matter goes on, it was pointed out by the leader of the Opposition that there was no notice given that this would be taken up to-day. He tells me that he has an understanding with the government, and I just want to see if I am right, that while the item will be called and the discussion proceeded with, it will not be closed to-night so that he will have an opportunity of preparing whatever may be necessary to be prepared.

Mr. GRAHAM: What we had in mind was this: This discussion may be a bit lengthy, and we thought we might as well proceed with some of it, but there is no intention of bringing the discussion to a close to-night.

I might say briefly that the report of the Merchant Marine for the year ending December 31, 1922, is in the hands of hon. members. There is nothing much to add to what is in that report. It may be asked why the figures in that report are given for the calendar year instead of for the fiscal year. It is convenient both for the railways and the Merchant Marine that their year should close with the calendar year, so any discrepancy between the figures of the appropriation and the amount given as expended will be accounted for by the fact that the appropriation runs from March 31st to March 31st, while the business year of the Merchant Marine runs from December 31st to December 31st. I do not know that I can add a single figure to what hon. gentlemen have in the report that is before them.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Did I understand the minister to say that this item would not be passed to-night? There are several hon. gentlemen in this section of the House who desire to speak on this vote who are detained at some banquet.

Mr. GRAHAM: The understanding was that some hon. gentlemen present wished to speak. We are open for speeches, of course. If they take the ground that they do not want either to speak or to put the item through it means a couple of hours wasted.

Mr. FORKE: Usually there is a great rush of hon. members to get on their feet to make a speech, but as no one has risen—

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a good sign.

Mr. FORKE: —this is an opportunity for me to take up a little time to-night. I rise largely for the purpose of seeking information regarding the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The other night I used a phrase that perhaps I should not have used when I said that it might be necessary some day to take the ships of the Merchant Marine out into deep water and sink them. I prefaced that remark with something and followed it with something, so I hope it will never be quoted against me. It brought to my mind how dangerous it might be to use phrases of that kind in the House, because I sincerely hope it may never be necessary to do any such thing with the Canadian Merchant Marine.

I have heard a good many things said of the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, but I have never yet heard anything said in their favour, and I would like some information in regard to the building of these ships: who designed them, what trade were they designed for, why is it that when any matter of shipping comes up in the House the first thing you hear is that the ships of the Merchant Marine are not suited for that sort of work?

I do not know whether the minister is going to be able to tell us just what sort of trade these ships were built for. I have read some of the past debates in connection with the building of these ships, and I do not intend to enter into that phase of the matter at this time. I realize that they were built at a very expensive time, that a good many of them cost from $160 to $195 per ton, while ships that were built in pre-war times could be built for about $50 per ton, and perhaps they can be built even cheaper to-day. I think a very reasonable thing to do at the outset in connection with the Merchant Marine—I know that this suggestion was made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) with regard to the government railways, and I think it would be even more applicable to the Merchant Marine—would be to have these ships valued. I am aware that the minister is trying to sell some of them, and it might not be a good thing to value them too low; nevertheless I do not think it will ever be possible for these ships to pay interest and depreciation charges upon their valuation at the time they were built, but if they were valued at what they are actually worth to-day, and some attempt was made to make them pay interest on that amount, there might be reasonable hope that that could be done.

I notice in the report that the deficit after all charges, including depreciation and interest, amounts to $9,649,478.72—a very large deficit for the people no doubt who pay taxes in this country to make up. I have no doubt that there is going to be a deficit for a long time if an attempt is made to pay interest on the valuation of these ships that were built at such a high cost. I hope we shall get some information during this debate as to what is the matter with the Merchant Marine. Why is it these ships cannot do business on the ocean or on the lakes? We had a discussion the other night about subsidizing a service to the West Indies, and were told that these boats were not suitable for that service. Looking over the debates of past sessions I noticed that the Hon. Mr. Ballantyne made the statement that these ships were suitable for carrying cattle across the Atlantic ocean, but now we are told that they are not suitable for that purpose. The statement was also made in past sessions that the smaller boats of the Merchant Marine were able to compete and would carry grain on the Great Lakes, but now we are told that they cannot compete with the large boats that carry grain that were built especially for that purpose.

I said when I rose to my feet that I rose largely for the purpose of seeking information, because we really ought to know what is the matter. Why is it these boats are unable to compete with other boats? Perhaps I am correct in saying that at the present time there is sufficient shipping in Montreal and other seaports to do all the business that is being offered in the world to-day. I think that is correct. Nevertheless, it seems to me that our boats should be able to take their share of the business. I mentioned the other day that it might be a good idea for the Canadian National Railways to have boats running in connection with the railways that were able to carry cattle across the ocean and set a rate that would be a paying rate. These boats could demonstrate what was a reasonable rate for carrying cattle across the ocean. I have also seen it stated that while these boats are a losing proposition at the present time they bring a certain amount of trade to the Canadian National Railways, and although that results in a deficit so far as the Merchant Marine is concerned it helps to make the railways more paying than they otherwise would be. I believe the time is not far distant, or at all events I look forward to the time when the Canadian National Railways will have a line of ships running in connection with them just as the Canadian Pacific has to-day in connection with their railway. I hope that this Canadian Government Merchant Marine may be only the beginning of a line of ships that will bring trade and create ocean traffic that will help to make our railways pay a great deal better than they are doing to-day.

When I rose I knew that I could throw no light on this matter. I have, to use a nautical expression, been a good deal at sea in regard to these ships, and when I spoke the other day about sinking them in deep water it was only by way of passing a joke. We want to see some value got for these ships, and during this debate I am going to listen in the hope of finding out just what is the trouble, why we have this large deficit, and why we are told continually that these boats are not suitable for this, that and the other trade or any trade we can mention. Immediately we mention the Canadian Government Merchant Marine we are told its vessels are not suited for that kind of work. May I ask, what sort of work they are really suited for?

Mr. DUFF: I do not know whether I will be able to supply the leader of the Progressive party with the information he desires. He is not the only person in Canada who, I who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, also made a speech on that occasion, and he told us that they were having two ships built by the Vickers Company at Montreal, one of 8,100 tons dead weight capacity, and another of 4,350 tons. He said that in addition to those vessels another ship of about 5,000 tons was being built by the Wallace Shipbuilding Company, of Vancouver, and another vessel of 3,550 tons by the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Collingwood. He said the Dominion government had those four vessels under construction. That was the reason, why, in my opinion, the hon. gentleman who now occupies the distinguished position of Speaker of this House approved of that policy. It was also the reason why the hon. gentleman who was lately Solicitor General in this government also approved of the scheme. Neither of these gentlemen, nor any other member in parliament at that time, thought the government of the day intended to spend $80,000,000 in the construction of these ships. Now, Sir, we have also been told that whilst certain gentlemen were in favour of that scheme, nobody opposed it. But if you will turn to Hansard of 1918 you will find that the then hon. member for Red Deer, Mr. Clark, did oppose the government's shipbuilding programme. He said frankly and freely that he did not believe it was a wise expenditure, or that the policy contemplated was wise. Therefore, while some gentlemen approved of that scheme, other gentlemen in the House at that time did not think it was a wise policy to embark upon even in war time. As far as I am personally concerned I did not object to the expenditure of that money in 1918, principally because I felt that while the war was on and ships were being sunk every day it was a fairly good policy for the government to build ships so long as the war lasted. However, as we all know, the war ceased in November 1918, and at that time the keels of four ships only were laid in the shipyards referred to. I contend, and I have done the same thing for a number of years whenever I spoke on this subject in parliament, that the right and proper thing for the government of the day to have done when the war was over and when every shipyard in Britain, in France, and in the United States was busy building ships, was to have stopped the construction of these vessels. They should have stopped building when ships were partly constructed, and perhaps others were under way, in these shipyards.

My own opinion is that it would have been far better, if this government wanted to encourage a mercantile marine, to have gone out at that time and endeavoured to make some arrangement with the shipbuilders whereby shipbuilding would have been continued and a Canadian merchant marine, instead of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, would have been built up in this country, as it has been built up in other countries. But instead of that the hon. member who occupied the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries was determined to go on with his project, and without going into the matter very much further, the result was that $79,000,000 of this country's money was spent in the building of the ships, and these ships, instead of being sold, were operated by what was known as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited. My own opinion is that if the government were determined to operate these ships that they never should have put it in this company form, or placed it under the management of a corporation. At the present time there is not one man who is managing these ships, or who is a director of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, who has one dollar invested in the enterprise. I say that is not the right and proper way to run a business, and you can never get satisfaction out of it. It is purely a camouflage that this project which has cost the people of the country $80,000,000 is being run by men who have no financial interest in the matter.

After these ships were completed, in fact before they were all completed, the government commenced operating, and those who are familiar with ship operation will know that, during the first two years these ships were operated, conditions were abnormal in the shipping business, and that, instead of making 10 or 15 per cent on money invested in shipping, as high as 100, 200 and 300 per cent on the cost of ships was made yearly by different firms operating ships in different countries in the world. It would naturally be expected that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine would participate in the business the other people were getting, or in similar business, and would make large profits on the operation of the ships; but if hon. members will look at the statements that have been furnished by the government in connection with this project they will see that, instead of making a fair profit on the ventures, very little money was made in those years when other people were making large sums of money. Now we come to the present day.

Mr. McMASTER: On the first year's operation of the Canadian Government Merchant think, should have a great deal more information with regard to this project than has been given to them, especially in the last two or three years. Now, if the committee will bear with me, in order that the Progressive leader and the country may know exactly how I look upon this project and how this project looks to me, I will endeavour in the shortest time possible to give all the information which I have at my command. In order to do that it will be necessary for me to go back and review the entire undertaking from the time of its inception. I do not pretend, however, to-night to criticize or condemn Union government or the Conservative government —the Union government for entering into the project, or the Conservative government for carrying it out after they came into power in 1921, or after Sir Robert Borden resigned and the present leader of the Opposition became Prime Minister of Canada. It is useless, in my opinion, for members of parliament, in order to make a point, to go back and throw political mud—shall I call it?—on their opponents and say they were to blame for everything that happened in connection with this or that matter. We have arrived with regard to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, at a time when it does not make very much difference whether the Union government are responsible for the building of these ships or not. The question we have to face to-day in this country and in this parliament is, as to whether these ships should continue to be operated or not. If it can be proved conclusively that these vessels are necessary and if—as some people have tried to make out in the past, and are trying to make out now —we must keep them going to help the Canadian National Railways—if that can be proved conclusively then I say this country should carry on the proposition. If, however, it can be shown that these ships are not necessary to carry on the trade of this country, that there are millions of tons of ships on every ocean in the world ready to transport the products of Canada and every other nation, then I say it is not necessary for this government or this country either to keep on paying year after year the deficits on the operation of these ships that we have been paying, or to run government-owned ships in competition with private enterprise.

Now, Sir, as I said, I do not intend to criticize the Union government for the commencement of this project, but in order that the leader of the Progressive party and the House may know exactly what occurred, I should like for a few moments to review exactly what happened in connection with this enterprise in parliament. I think it was in April, 1918, that Sir Robert Borden, who was then leader of the government, came to this House and proposed that we should vote $25,000,000 for the building of ships in this country. The reason Sir Robert Borden gave at that time for the proposition was, that in view of the fact that hundreds of thousands of tons of shipping were being sunk daily by the German submarines, and in view of the fact that it was necessary in this country to build ships to carry supplies not only to the soldiers at the front but also to the various peoples in Europe, that it would be a good policy on the part of the Canadian people to build ships to help out that very serious situation. Sir Robert Borden, in reviewing the situation at that time, told us that the fourteen shipyards in Canada were busy building ships for the Imperial Munitions Board, which was really a branch of the Imperial government, but he said as soon as these ships were completed it was the intention of the Canadian government to start building ships in those yards with Canadian money and for the Canadian people. We heard it stated in this House a few days ago that not only were the supporters of the Union government favourable to that scheme at that particular time, but that certain hon. gentlemen who were supporters of the Liberal party also favoured it. Indeed it is now said in contradiction, whenever we criticize the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, that members of the Liberal party favoured the scheme. While that is quite true up to a certain degree, yet anybody who takes the trouble to read Hansard of that time will find that when Sir Robert Borden made that proposal there was absolutely no talk of operating ships. Sir Robert Borden only told us that in view of the prevailing conditions Canada was going into the ship building business, not into the ship operating business; and any Liberal members who spoke in approval of the scheme at that time never approved of operating the ships which the government intended to build. I do not know that it is necessary to read exactly what Sir Robert Borden then said. I think I have covered the ground very well, but on April 4th, of the same year Mr. Ballantyne, who was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the Union government, also spoke in regard to the matter.

Mr. FORKE What year was that?

Mr. DUFF: April 4th, 1918. The speech will be found in Hansard of that date, page 346. Sir Robert Borden's speech appears at page 28 of Hansard of 1918. Mr. Ballantyne, Marine, after deducting depreciation charges, was no money made at all?

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member will remember that in the speech I made in connection with this matter, I think in 1921, I furnished a statement to the House in comparison with the statement given us by some of the Marine officials, and made up by the auditors who audited the books of the company. I think I proved to the satisfaction of most hon. members on both sides of this House that the statement as prepared by the auditors, or the people who did prepare it, was not in accordance with the facts, and instead of making a profit those years, after a sufficient amount was allowed for depreciation, without taking into consideration the large sum of interest which was due the Finance Minister, these ships went into debt. I do not need to give the House those figures, but if hon. members will look at Hansard of 1921 they will find all the figures.

Mr. FORKE: What page? If the hon. member will allow me, at page 903 of Hansard of 1920, I find the following statement by the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

> The total net profit, as I stated before, is $1,406,000.

Mr. DUFF: I will give the page of Hansard in 1921. That was after two years' operation. The statement will be found in Hansard of 1921, on pages from 1692 to 1701. There are several statements there which I prepared at the time, and the statement of the operating accounts will show that there was no profit on the business, and in the statement of capital account the figures I gave showed a loss to the country of $58,669,906.22. I remember distinctly when I read that statement the hon. member who was defending the estimate practically tried to laugh me out of court. I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but if hon. members will look at the statement of this year and see what Sir Henry Thornton says, they will find my prophecy has come true, and that these ships to-day, after deducting the interest charges, have practically lost to the country every dollar that the country has invested. I intend to go more fully into that in a moment when I deal with the annual report for this year. The annual statement for this year has not yet been placed on record.

Before I deal with that, I will refer to the matter the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) spoke of a moment ago, as to the profits for the first year. According to the statement submitted to the House at that time by the government the profit shown for the year ending December 31, 1919, was $1,406,767.38, and the following year, December 31, 1920, the profit shown was $598,460.09. These are the two years in which it was supposed that a profit had been made, but if hon. members will look at the statement of 1921, which gives the business to the 31st December, 1920, they will find on the last page what is known as surplus account, and taking the figures of the company, or the government of that day, they will find the statement that they had a surplus at that time of $1,004,233.01 Last year the Minister of Railways asked the House to vote $4,360,720 in the estimates to apply towards the deficits of this company. We find that the present Minister of Railways this year, in what are called the Supplementary Estimates, asked the House about ten days ago to vote an additional amount of $1,700,000. In addition to that we are asked to-night to vote $1,500,000. These three amounts total $7,560,720.

Now, Sir, I want to say, first, with regard to these items, that I did not oppose the vote last year of $4,360,720, because in conversation with the then minister he told me—and I quite understood it—that he had not had time to look into the business. He had only been sworn in as Minister of Railways a few weeks before, and consequently did not have time to go over the whole business and see what could be done; therefore I raised no objection to the voting of that item. As, however, I said a moment ago, in addition to the $4,360,000, we voted the other night $1,700,000. To my dismay, I find that that money, if my information is correct, was given over to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine some time last fall on a Governor General's warrant. Although I am a supporter of this government, I want to enter my protest right here and now against this government voting that money by a Governor General's warrant and passing it over to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. JACOBS: What would the hon. member have done had he been in the government at the time?

Mr. DUFF: I intend to come to that in a moment. One does not need to have been in the government to say what a business man would have done in the circumstances. The total amount which we shall have voted if we pass this item to-night will be $7,560,720. As I read a moment ago, there was supposed to be a surplus on December 31, 1920, of $1,004,233.01. This makes a total of money voted by this House and a surplus profit which is supposed to be in the treasury of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, of $8,564,953.01. What has become of that money? If hon. members will look at the statement for 1921, they will find that that statement on page 16 shows an operating loss of $2,210,724.55. If they will look at the statement on page 16 for last year, they will find that there is an operating loss of $2,384,-189.17. This makes a total of $4,594,913.72. Yet although all these statements show losses in two years of only $4,500,000 odd, the government of this country has voted and asked for $7,560,720 and a surplus of $1,004,233.01, making in all $8,564,953.01. Where has the difference gone? Why did the Canadian Government Merchant Marine want $8,564,953.01 when their deficit, according to their own statement, was $4,594,913.72? It seems to me that it is time a halt was called regarding this matter.

The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) asked me a few minutes ago what I would have done instead of paying by Governor General's warrant $1,700,000 to this company. The proper thing to have done was to let the bank carry the overdraft, as they were doing, until such time as sufficient ships were sold to pay the deficit. I do not profess to have any legal knowledge; but I noticed the other day that we were discussing all day the question whether it was legal to pay or to lend $2,000,000 to some syndicate to buy or rent a property in Paris. I am not quite clear yet whether we were to buy or to rent this property. I am very doubtful whether this parliament has any legal right to vote to an incorporated company called the Canadian Government Merchant Marine any moneys of this country. This company should stand on its own bottom and pay its deficits out of its assets and not out of money voted by this parliament. As I said, I am not a lawyer, but I am very doubtful if there would be a legal right to pay this. If the money can be paid on a legal technicality, I say that this government had no moral right to pay this large sum of money for that purpose, but the deficit should have been paid out of the assets of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Let us see how the matter stands this year. As the statement has not been placed upon Hansard, I am going to read it. The operating account for the year ended December 31, 1922, is as follows:

Operating Account ending December 31st, 1922
Revenue from vessels, closed voyages..	$9,672,413 31
Other revenue, profit on operation of government dock, Vancouver..	30,754 13
Commission on handling outside steamers.	2,619 53
Total revenue..	$9,705,786 97
Expenses:
Operation of vessels, closed voyages.	$11,438,157 21
Stevedoring and wharf expenses.. ..	38,862 14
Operation of agencies..	98,506 61
Interest and exchange..	15,937 25
General expenses—

This is something to make us sit up and take notice.

Management and office salaries..	$311,629 83
Rent, taxes and insurance..	13,153 33
Travelling expenses..	25,713 14
Printing and stationery..	18,336 54
Advertising..	33,015 59
Postage, cables and telegrams..	56,641 82
Office expenses and supplies..	27,478 13
Miscellaneous..	12,544 55
Total expenses..	$12,089,976 14

Or an operating loss for the year of $2,384,-189.17. It will be noticed that, in addition to the operation of these vessels, that is for the payment of crews, supplies, coal, and so forth, office and management expenses in connection with the project amount to $600,000. That is an amount which is absolutely in excess of what it should take to run this business. Think of $600,000 for management and office expenses of this business! Yet you and I are asked to vote $1,500,000 to-night and we voted $4,500,000 last year and $1,700,000 ten days ago. Next year they will be back again for two or three millions more or, perhaps, more for the deficit on operation this year. It is time that we looked at this matter seriously and decided whether it is in the interest of this country to carry on this operation, or if the whole business should not be cleaned up. In addition to the $2,384,189.17 —this is not the darkest side of the picture —this country had to borrow money to build these ships, money which was subscribed by way of victory loans by the people of Canada and on which the government has to pay five and one-half per cent interest. Mr. Ballantyne told us, when he was trying to paint a rosy picture of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, that the ships would pay not only operating expenses, and interest on money invested, but a profit over and above those two items. Instead of that, what do we find? We find that outside of $500,000 which was paid on interest account in 1920 not one cent has been paid since, with the result that there is an amount for interest accrued for a year on notes due to the government, $4,-078,277.74; interest on government advances, $118,759.67; reserve for depreciation, $2,932,-130.14; reserve for outstanding liabilities $40,-000; reserve for doubtful debts and claims $96,122, making a total of $7,265,289.55, or a gross loss for the year of $9,649,478.72.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is, including fixed charges.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, interest and so forth. On the next page, 17, there is a deficit account. This shows a deficit ever since the operation of the steamers. In 1921 there was a loss of $9,116,144.28. Deducting the subsidy received for 1921 for the West India passenger service, of $59,090, this leaves an amount of $9,057,-054.28; to which is added deficiency on insurance recoverable for the ship Recruit of $84,751.90. The loss for the year ended 31st December, 1922, was, $9,649,478.72, making a total deficit for the two years 1921 and 1922 of $18,791,284.90. In other words, the Canadian Government Marine if run as any other business, taking their own statements, has shown a loss of over $18,000,000.

Let us look for a moment at profit and loss account on pages 14 and 15, where it is known as the consolidated balance sheet. The statement reads as follows:

This shows the assets as at December 31st, 1921, to be $72,392,352.27, with additions during the year of $5,331,513.35, or a total of $77,723,865.62; less reserve for depreciation of $6,026,270.69. This therefore discloses a net balance of $71,697,594.93.

Then there is plant and equipment amounting to $74,272.19 and office furniture and fixtures, $37,096.86. Then there is a Department of Marine and Fisheries Suspense, and there is a footnote in regard to disbursements on vessels prior to being put into commission, the total shown being $148,343.71.

Mr. FORKE: At what page is that?

Mr. DUFF: I am quoting from page 14 of the fourth annual report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for 1922, in reference to "Department of Marine and Fisheries, Disbursements on Vessels". I am very doubtful whether that amount should be there at all. I do not understand exactly what it can mean unless the Department of Marine and Fisheries did not pay some of the capital expenditures when the vessels were built. But what difference does it make whether the amount is paid on account of capital expenditure or paid by the Department of Marine and Fisheries? I say that it is very doubtful whether this amount should appear as an asset at all.

The current assets in cash in banks amount to $287,247.82; accounts receivable, less reserve, $840,063.91; advances to captains, crews and agents, $82,784.57; losses due by underwriters, $125,898.68; insurance claims, estimated amount recoverable, $957,326.89; inventories of freights and supplies, $90,936.40; insurance unexpired, $25,037.88; making a total of $74,366,603.84.

On page 15, there appears a statement of liabilities showing the capital stock at $640,900. Then there are notes payable due to the Dominion government of $79,511,660.59. That is what the ships cost, and for that amount notes were given to the Department of Finance. Deducted from this is an amount for payments on account to the extent of $1,985,256.87. Added interest accrued to the 31st December, 1922, accounts for $8,670,787.13, and other advances by the government, $4,873,863.84. Accounts payable amount to $1,099,854.42, and balance of uncompleted vessels, $346,159.63. So that the total liabilities amount to $93,157,888.74.

Now, the assets, as I read a moment ago, amounted to $74,366,603.84, and in view of the other statements I have just quoted it is apparent that there is a deficit to the country or to the Canadian Government Marine, whichever way you like to put it, of $18,791,284.90. There are one or two amounts here in regard to which I should like to get some information after I am through. One of these amounts appears on page 14, amongst the assets; I refer to insurance claims, the estimated amount recoverable being $957,326.89. I presume this is to be recovered from the insurance companies for some ships lost. But if you will consult the other statement for previous years you will find that they have also made an estimate of insurance they expected to recover the previous year, and instead of collecting the full amount they estimated they fell very much short of it. I would certainly say that in this case instead of $957,000 odd being put down as an asset, this amount will be considerably reduced when the insurance companies pay, if they ever do pay.

There appears also amongst the assets an amount of $840,000 odd for accounts receivable, but I should not be very much surprised if that amount were materially reduced when the freights are collected and the expenses in connection with the voyages are paid. According to the statement of the Canadian Government Marine there is a deficit of over $18,000,000. But that is not a fair statement of the present condition of the company. It will be seen at page 14 that there is an amount credited for depreciation of $6,026,270.69. I do not regard this as a fair amount for depreciation considering the value of the ships to-day. According to Sir Henry Thornton's statement, which appears in the front of this book, he admits to the shareholders that the vessels have greatly depreciated in value and instead of being worth $77,000,000 are in reality worth, in his opinion, only $50 a ton dead weight. That in my view is a very generous estimate, but I am willing to accept it for purposes of comparison; and taking Sir Henry Thornton's estimate, it can be readily calculated that the ships to-day are worth only $21,023,865.62. In other words, this country has lost in depreciation on the value of the ships some $56,700,000.

I have here a statement showing the actual financial condition of the company. It is as follows:

Assets
Total cost of ships	$77,723,865 62
Reserve for depreciated value	56,700,000 00
	$21,023,865 62
Plant and equipment	74,272 19
Office furniture	37,096 86
Department of Marine	148,343 71
Current assets	2,384,258 27
Unexpired insurance	25,037 88
	$23,692,874 53
Loss on operation and decrease in value	69,465,014 21
	$93,157,888 74
Total Liabilities as shown on page 15 of Fourth Annual Report	93,157,888 74

You will find if you will add up these two sets of figures on the asset and the liability side that this country has suffered a loss of $69,465,014.21 on these ships since they were built and put in commission. In other words, whilst the ships cost $77,000,000 according to the books of the company, to-day they are only worth $8,000,000, the difference representing depreciation and loss on operation. That is the exact state of affairs of this Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Whether the country desires to go on paying these deficits year after year is for parliament to decide. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not think it is good business to vote any more money to make good these deficits.

Mr. FORKE: Of course, the figures given by the hon. member do not represent the actual depreciation of these ships but are due to the cost of construction having dropped from $165 a ton to $50. Can he give us the actual depreciation in value assuming that the cost of construction had remained at $165 a ton? Does the hon. member understand my question?

Mr. DUFF: I do. The cost averaged about $192 per dead weight ton. In answer, I would say that the company itself has written off $6,026,270.69 for depreciation. My own opinion is, and it was admitted by Mr. Ballantyne, that there should be an allowance for depreciation of 5 per cent per year, but it will be noticed that the company has not made such an allowance, because 5 per cent on $77,000,000 for four years would amount to over $12,000,000. However, I think I am fair when I read this statement and show that we have lost over $69,000,000. In other words, if these ships were sold to-day at $50 per ton, which is more than the current value of ships of the same character in other countries, we would suffer a loss of $69,000,000 on their building and operation.

In view of these facts, as I said a moment ago, is it wise for us to continue making up these deficits year after year? Are these ships necessary to do the country's business? I claim they are not necessary, and in this opinion I am upheld by a number of eminent authorities in various parts of the Dominion. For instance, the Ottawa Journal, in an editorial which appeared shortly after this annual statement was issued by the Canadian Government Merchant Marnie, said:

> The worst feature of the whole proposition is that this loss is sustained without any visible advantage. True, the statement shows that the vessels turned over certain freight and passengers to the Canadian National Railways but the figures cannot be considered as even the shadow of justification for a nine million dollar deficit. Moreover, the corporation operating the ships apparently made them part of an Atlantic combine for the heightening of freights; this, at a time when there was a surplus of shipping, making them of no value whatever to the Canadian exporter.

In addition to this criticism, the Montreal Gazette—which perhaps is one of the sanest papers in Canada—has published several editorials severely condemning the slowness of this government and its predecessors for allowing these vessels to be operated any longer, and in every one it has shown conclusively that their continued operation is not necessary in the interests of the country. Then another paper, the Journal of Commerce, had this to say:

> Canada's state-owned merchant marine, according to reports published by the Department of Commerce, returned a deficit of over $9,000,000 on a gross income of a little better than $10,700,000 during 1921. According to the best information available this condition was not improved during the calendar year 1922. The latest complete financial statement available (1921) illustrates the possibilities of government ownership of merchant vessels.

It has been argued by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) and one or two other hon. gentlemen that these ships were in a combine with a New York Canadian National Railways. I do not think that any shipping man will agree with such a statement, because if the Canadian National Railways have efficient freight agents there is absolutely no reason why they cannot arrange with shipping companies to take freight at the seaboard for transportation overseas at a cheaper rate than it is costing us to-day by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I would suggest that the company sell these ships and transfer the general manager and any other gentlemen who may be necessary to the Canadian National Railways staff so that they may look after the transshipment of freight when it reaches the seaboard. That is the business way. There would be no difficulty whatever for the Canadian National Railways to make contracts with ship owners to carry freight which originates on the system. After all, what percentage of the goods handled by the Canadian National Railways to Vancouver, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, St. John or Portland, was taken overseas by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine? Why, a mere bagatelle. It is not worth talking about, because unless they have changed their 11 p.m. way of doing business within the last few months most of the cargoes carried in their bottoms were from foreign ports. They were compelled apparently to go all over the world looking for freight. So the percentage of goods handled by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and originating on the Canadian National Railways is very small compared to the total amount of freight transported by our great railway system.

It may be argued also that so long as we have the Canadian Government Merchant Marine it will have a salutary effect on freight rates charged by other shipping lines. I cannot discuss what happened before a committee of this House which is still sitting, but I can go back to three years ago when I told this House that instead of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine helping our shippers and producers to secure lower shipping rates that the company belonged to what was known as the "New York Pool." If hon. gentlemen will look up Hansard of April 7th, 1921, they will find that statement in the speech which I then made. I referred to that fact and proved conclusively that these Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships were in a combine with a New York pool to keep up the freight rates. This will be found on page 1713 of Hansard of April 7, 1921, where I said this:

> We find that somebody in an endeavour to promote business for the government boats entered into an arrangement with certain New York shipping interests to come into what is known as the New York Shipping Pool. Now a gentleman who does not know anything about shipping, and who goes to New York among the shipping sharks to enter into an arrangement with them, well, all I can say is Heaven help him. Somebody entered into an arrangement on behalf of these 47 or 63 boats, whereby they agreed not to cut rates, that is to say, the Canadian boats were to take no lower rates from Canadian ports than the New York boats were getting from New York ports. The result was that thousands of barrels of apples from King's county and Annapolis county which were ready to be shipped to the London market and were offered to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, had to be refused because they had entered into this agreement with the New York pool. Were these apples shipped on Canadian steamers, on British steamers, on United States steamers? No, on Norwegian steamers.

Then I gave a list of the ships that were chartered at Halifax to carry these apples because the shippers could not make an arrangement with the Merchant Marine to do this business because they could not cut the rates.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does my hon. friend think that the Combines Bill of the present government will have any effect on this combine?

Mr. DUFF: I have not read it yet, and I do not know what it contains, but evidently the government has not done much so far to get the Merchant Marine out of the New York combine. Our steamers are still in this combine. That was admitted by the gentleman who is at the head of the freight department of the Merchant Marine. He said that they still sat in when these rates were fixed. I want to say that is a pretty poor excuse for the freight manager of the Merchant Marine to give to the people of this country, that these ships were not in the combine and that all he did was to sit in when the agents of the other lines were discussing rates. I say that no business men in this country would allow any other man who was not in agreement with them to come into their office to a directors' meeting and listen to all that was going on unless they knew he was in hearty agreement with what was proposed at that meeting. So I say the Merchant Marine were in the pool, and I think it is likely they are still in that New York ring.

An hon. MEMBER: They were not according to the last account.

Mr. DUFF: That is because your committee frightened them.

Mr. BROWN: Does the hon. member think it is necessary that that condition should continue now that we know the facts?

Mr. DUFF: I say that in spite of the fact that the Canadian Merchant Marine were keeping up the rates to the same figure as the other lines they had a deficit in two years of $18,000,000, and does my hon. friend want to argue that we should have their rates reduced and bring about a deficit of say $25,000,000? I do not think he wants that.

Mr. BROWN: They may get more business in that case.

Mr. DUFF: They cannot get more business because the other ships can get business ahead of them every time. All the Merchant Marine ships get is what is left and the little that the Canadian National Railways put their way. Just look over the ships of the Merchant Marine in the different ports. While they have cargoes when they leave this country, and most of them are cargoes of lumber which any old windjammer can carry, coming back they have practically no cargo at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Why do they not get cargoes? Is it due to mismanagement or to the class of vessels?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think it is mismanagement at all. I think the gentleman in charge of the Merchant Marine had a pretty hard row to hoe. The government should never have thrown these sixty-three ships at him. No other shipping company in the world ever bought sixty-three ships inside of twelve months. They buy one, two, three or four ships and gradually build up their holdings. Consequently I say the gentleman in charge had a pretty hard row to hoe, and he has done remarkably well under the circumstances. There are other causes why these ships do not pay and one is that they are suitable only for carrying bulk cargoes. They can take lumber but everybody knows that for the last two years there has been no money in that. They can carry coal, and yet they have lost money in spite of the fact that the Canadian Government Railways paid the ships of the Merchant Marine I think it was $2.80 per ton to carry coal from Sydney to Montreal when other ships were carrying it for $1.10 a ton. These ships are not suitable for carrying bulk cargoes of coal. Their expenses are too great. I thought I had the figures with me. I think it was $3.80 or at all events $2.80 that the Merchant Marine boats were paid for carrying coal from Sydney to Montreal while other ships were carrying it for $1.10 a ton.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Why did these other boats not regulate the New York pool if they were able to do it?

Mr. DUFF: Which boats?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): You say that these boats could beat out the Merchant Marine. Were they in the pool?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): You say the pool was charging excessive rates. The Merchant Marine were in the pool and these other boats were beating them out. Why did they not beat the pool?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think my hon. friend could have heard me. I said that this New York pool was broken when these apples were carried to England by Norwegian steamers.

Mr. MARTELL: Steamers have to be constructed for special trade. Landlubbers do not understand it.

Mr. DUFF: Here are a few of the steamers which carried those apples from Halifax to the Mother Country because the Canadian government ships refused the shipments. The Caxambu carried 14,000 barrels at $1.50; the Angelica Maresk carried 12,000 barrels at $2; the Knut Hamsun carried 20,000 barrels at $1.75. There were about a dozen of these ships that carried the apples and they made prices outside the pool price, which was $2.50 a barrel. The average price that was charged by these Norwegian steamers was from $1.50 to $2.

Mr. MILLAR: Were they tramp steamers?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, ordinary cargo steamers carrying from fourteen to twenty thousand barrels.

Mr. BROWN: Was the reason the Canadian ships did not get that trade because they were not fitted for carrying it or because they were in the pool?

Mr. DUFF: I think the reason they did not get that business was because they were in the New York pool.

Mr. BROWN: Granting that, could they have handled that trade constructed as they are if they had not been in the pool? Were they fitted for that traffic?

Mr. DUFF: Most of them are not, and for two reasons. One is that if you put 20,000 barrels of apples in what is called a single hold where there are no 'tween decks, before they arrive at their destination four or five tiers of the apples will be smashed. Another reason is that they have no cold storage or at least only one or two of them have. They are ordinary bulk steamers. They are not suitable for carrying coal, grain or practically anything else at a profitable rate.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. BROWN: It is pretty hard for us to understand that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Were these Norwegian steamers that carried the coal from Sydney to Montreal?

Mr. DUFF: No. The Norwegian steamers carried the apples. What I said about coal was that the Canadian National Railways in order evidently to help the Merchant Marine, paid them over 100 per cent more for carrying coal from Sydney to Montreal than they could have had it carried for in other vessels, and in spite of that the Merchant Marine had a deficit of over $9,000,000 on its operations for the year. Now, if they cannot do business on a basis of a hundred per cent more payment than other ships how can they compete with other vessels in the carrying of lumber, grain, or any other commodity and so make enough to save themselves from a deficit on their operating expenses?

Mr. LUCAS: What class of commodities were these ships supposed to carry when they were built?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think anybody knows what they were built to carry. The contracts were awarded during the height of the war and my own opinion is that the hon. gentleman who was then in charge of the Marine department let the thing run away from him. There was no attempt at all to build any special line of ships, and that is the reason why the management of these vessels is making such a poor showing.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): More blundering.

Mr. DUFF: They were war brides, yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I said more blundering.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, it was a blunder. However, that is the reason matters have reached the position in which they are to-day.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that these ships were built mostly for the West India trade?

Mr. DUFF: I am glad my hon. friend asked that question, because the other night when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was endeavouring to get his estimates through a discussion arose as to whether or not this subsidy should be paid, and whether the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine could not be used in the West India business, instead of the ships of the Royal Mail Packet Company or some other vessels. The hon. member for Bow River twitted me with the speech I made in 1919 when I was sitting in opposition.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I may respectfully suggest to the hon. member that I had no intention of twitting him.

Mr. DUFF: You reminded me of it then.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. DUFF: I will take my remark back and say the hon. gentleman reminded me of the speech I made—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Thank you.

Mr. DUFF: —in which I opposed the granting of subsidies. I am still opposed to the granting of subsidies if it is possible to avoid it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: But we have a situation such as we have in the case of protection, and it is pretty hard to get clear of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us try it.

Mr. DUFF: I am willing to try it but I am endeavouring to show my hon. friend how, in my opinion, we can get clear of paying this $338,000 subsidy to the Royal Mail Packet Company, or to any other company on the West India route. Here is my idea of how to do that: This subsidy has been paid for a number of years either to the Royal Mail Packet Company or to some other company. At the time this subsidy was paid freight rates were much lower than they are at the present time, and there was not as much freight offering for West India ports, with the result that, perhaps, it was necessary for previous governments, whether it was a Liberal government or a Conservative government, in order to keep up the traffic between the West India Islands to give a subsidy to a line of steamships. But during the war years when the Royal Mail Packet Company was running on this route the business and the rates of freight were sufficient and they did not require a subsidy. That is the reason why I opposed the subsidy of $388,000 to the Royal Mail Packet Company in 1919. But what has happened since? Here is what the late government did and what the present government are now doing. Both governments are eqully to blame in my opinion and here is what they did. When the war was over, I think it was in 1919, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine management deliberately put four steamships, if I remember correctly, on the same route or practically the same route over which the Royal Mail Packet Company plies. The result was that immediately both these lines of ships were dividing the freight that was offering. Consequently there was not enough cargo offering for both ships to be filled. Both lines of ships were carrying half cargoes and their holds were half empty. Sometimes on the return trip the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine hardly had enough molasses for the crew to eat on the way home and the ships of the Royal Mail Packet Company were almost as bad.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Did they feed the crews of the ships on molasses?

Mr. DUFF: Well, they needed a little molasses to mix with their rum. After that when it was found that the Royal Mail Packet Company were losing business due to the fact that there was a competing line of government ships, or practically government ships, the manager of the former company came to Ottawa. He showed his statement of operations and demonstrated that there was a very large loss with the result that he got the government to increase the freight rates 50 per cent on goods going to the West Indies. Immediately the Royal Mail Packet Company increased their rates the Canadian Government Merchant Marine did the same. They had to. In spite of this fact however these ships, ever since they were operated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have been losing very large sums of money on the West India route.

Mr. JACOBS: Do I understand we were subsidizing the Royal Mail Packet Company and at the same time competing against them?

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely, that is the whole thing in a nut shell. We were paying $338,000 out of one pocket, and then taking a large portion of $9,000,000 out of the other pocket and paying part of the deficit on the operations of vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine competing on the same route. If you call it good business for any department of government to do that I do not. That is the crux of the whole situation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Surely the hon. gentleman does not contend that the whole deficit of $9,000,000 was incurred on that route?

Mr. DUFF: I did not say that, I said a part of the $9,000,000 deficit was incurred on that route. Now, we have never seen a statement of the operations of the government vessels on any one route.

Mr. MARTELL: May I ask a question?

Mr. DUFF: Let me finish the sentence first. I say we should ask the minister, before we vote this large sum of money, to produce to this House and to the people statements showing the results of the operations of these steamships on the different routes, the profit or loss on the routes on which they run. Then we should get some information about this matter. But we have gone at it blindly. We did that last year, and I am as much to blame as anyone else. In half an hour we voted $4,500,000 for deficits on the operations of the Government Merchant Marine, and we voted this year $1,700,000 to cover expenditures under Governor General's warrant. Is that the way to handle the people money? I say it is not, and I for one am not going to do it again.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend contend that we are subsidizing the Royal Mail Packet Company and at the same time running boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in competition with them?

Mr. DUFF: Yes I think I answered that question before. That is quite true. Not only are we doing that but we are subsidizing lines to Australia and also running Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats in opposition to the Australian boats to which we are paying subsidies. Is that good business for the government to carry on? I think you will agree with me that it is not.

I was asked to explain the reason why these government boats could not run on the West India route. I think I got as far as to say that both lines were losing money and they came to Ottawa and got the Minister of Trade and Commerce to increase the freight rate 50 per cent. Now the way to stop the existing situation is this: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is to-day calling for tenders for a contract for a term of years. My candid opinion is that if the minister would say to the tenderers "We will take the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine off those routes if you will do without a subsidy," if the steamship companies got that guarantee they would not want any of the existing subsidy or very little of it.

Mr. FORKE: Who would fix the rates if that were done?

Mr. DUFF: The law of supply and demand would regulate that every time. You cannot fix rates on the ocean. You may fix them for a little while but they are bound to break in the long run.

Mr. FORKE: You say that if the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine were taken off that route the vessels of the other company would easily carry on the business without a subsidy?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. FORKE: That is all right.

Mr. DUFF: I say that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would say to the persons who are likely to tender for this new contract that the management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine would take their steamers off that route so that these men will have sufficient business—because they have to compete with other steamers and other sailing vessels anyway—they would be able to make a profit on their investment and put money to rest without the government having to pay them any subsidy.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would you not suggest putting these government boats on the West India trade and paying them the subsidy?

Mr. DUFF: No. One reason is that the boats are not suitable for the West India business. They are single-decked boats.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are they good for anything?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think they are good for very much. In answer to the question of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) I wish to say these boats are not suitable for that route. It is a well known fact on that route passengers and mails are carried in addition to cargoes. In order to pretend that they were doing something, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine fitted up accommodation on three or four of these boats for a few passengers; one, I think, could carry about 37 passengers. That is quite enough for my argument, that such a boat would not be suitable for this traffic. Boats on this route carry three classes, steerage, second-class, and first-class passengers. In addition to that, they are supposed to carry His Majesty's mail. Men who do business in the West Indies take passage on these boats, and go there. In addition, men go there as second-class passengers and as steerage passengers. They also come from different parts of the West Indies to Canada. Therefore, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels are not suitable for passenger boats. In reply to my hon. friend, I say it is impossible, without the expenditure of a large sum of money, to make these boats suitable. I noticed in the newspaper the other day the statement that it is the intention of the merchant marine to spend money in fixing up some of these boats to carry cattle to England. I was rather amused when I read that item in the paper. I do not know whether it is true or not. Perhaps the minister can tell us. These boats, of course, are not suitable to carry cattle. They could only carry a small number of cattle, even if fitted up. It would be impossible for them to carry any large quantity of cattle. At $20 per head these boats could not carry enough cattle to pay for the coal used in crossing the Atlantic. Yet somebody states in the paper that they were going to fix up seven or eight steamers to carry cattle. The reason that information is given out is, I surmise, that Sir Henry Thornton wants to placate the people who have cattle in this country, and make them believe the Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels are fit for something. Carrying cattle is the last thing under God's heaven that they are fit for, and I say the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have no business spending money fitting up these boats for that trade.

The other day we heard my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and a number of other learned members on both sides of the House discussing a fine legal point as to whether Sir Henry Thornton had a right to take $2,000,000 from the treasury and use it in connection with the purchase of an hotel in Paris. The legal point raised was that the law was against Sir Henry in that proposition—that under the law he had no right to take that money for that purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: I never admitted it.

Mr. DUFF: The minister, like myself, is not a lawyer. I was talking about the question of law. It he had no right to take money out of the treasury for that purpose, and if the law in relation to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine says that before any moneys are spent on capital account they must be voted by this parliament, where is Sir Henry Thornton going to get the money to fit up those ships to carry cattle? This will be capital expenditure, and I say that somebody should tell Sir Henry Thornton that he has no right to spend any money fitting up ships to carry cattle. Even if these ships were fitted up for this purpose, they would not be much good, because they could only carry a few cattle. They cannot carry them on deck across the Atlantic, and how many cattle could they carry on vessels running from five tc eight thousand tons gross tonnage? They could only carry a few when they are fitted up. Are the directors of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine going to allow Sir Henry Thornton and the management of the steamship company to spend large sums of money putting in 'tween decks to carry cattle? If they are going to keep the cattle in the hold in bulk, they would not be in good condition when they reached the other side. They must have 'tween decks put in, if they carry cattle.

Mr. FORKE: I think I saw them loading one Canadian Government Merchant Marine ship with cattle last summer, along with the passengers. I was told it was one of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on which they were loading cattle.

Mr. DUFF: Does the hon. member know how many they carried?

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. DUFF: I say they are not fitted to carry cattle. If they are fitted up to carry cattle and a large amount of money spent on them, they will only carry such a small number of cattle that it will not pay. I say the government should not allow any further expenditure on capital account by Sir Henry Thornton or anybody else. Hon. members understand that, in order to carry cattle, the ships must be properly constructed, so that they can carry cattle in one part of them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. member argue that Sir Henry Thornton is deliberately deceiving the public in this matter?

Mr. DUFF: I am sorry the hon. member should suggest that I insinuated that Sir Henry Thornton was trying to deceive the public.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I did not mean that at all. I thought I heard the hon. member state that apparently the press statement that these ships were to be fitted up was intended to placate certain western interests.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say western interests; I said the people with cattle to ship. That is a different thing from saying Sir Henry Thornton was trying to deceive the public. The trouble with Sir Henry Thornton—and let me say it in the best of spirit—is the same as the trouble of my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland); that Sir Henry Thornton knows very little if anything about operating ships of this class, and less about the trade they are engaged in.

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. DUFF: Nothing. What does any director of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine know about operating ships? Nothing. —except John Sinclair. He is the only man on the directorate that knows anything about it. Not another man knows the first thing about it.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member is right there.

Mr. DUFF: I ask in all kindness, does the Minister of Railways know anything about operating ships?

Mr. GRAHAM: He does not know anything about the operating of railways either.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, he was Minister of Railways for many years, and had a chance to acquire some knowledge with regard to them.

Mr. PARENT: And he was in charge of canals also.

Mr. DUFF: But the operation of ships is an entirely different matter. I say that, inasmuch as the directors are practically without any knowledge of ships, and the deputy minister has no knowledge of ships, it is not fair to the taxpayers of the country who have to be taxed for everything they get, that they should pay this $18,000,000 deficit.

Mr. JACOBS: Do those men know as much about the running of ships as they do about the running of railways?

Mr. DUFF: Sir Henry Thornton knows something about running railways.

Mr. JACOBS: But the directors?

Mr. DUFF: I thought Sir Henry Thornton was a director of the National Railways. He is manager and director, without any shares in the company. I say that, in view of all the circumstances, in vew of the fact that these ships were built during wartime, in view of the fact that the right and proper thing to have done with the ships was to have sold them after they were built, when we could have realized something for them, in view of the fact that we have a deficit on operating expenses and interest to the amount of $18,000,000, and in view of the fact that these ships have depreciated to the extent of from sixty-five to sixty-nine million dollars, and nearly all the money which was used in construction is gone, it is time for the people of the country to say what they want done with these ships. I say these ships are not necessary to the business of the country.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) states they should be used on the Great Lakes for the carrying of grain. How are these little ships, which could carry only a few thousand bushels of grain, going to compete with ships which carry five and six hundred thousands of bushels of grain? It is ridiculous and there is no sense in it. It is useless for anybody to try to make out that these ships can make any money and pay their way or do the business of this country. I want to argue further that even if these ships were making money, even if they never lost a dollar and even if we could see into the future that these ships were going to earn money, it is not fair to this country that this government should carry on a ship-operating business. There is no necessity for it. It is not fair for private enterprise; it is not fair for people who have invested money in ships throughout this country and in other countries, and the government has no right to carry on this ship-operating business any longer.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) allow me to read this sentence of Mr. Ballantyne's statement?

None have been placed on inland waters as yet, but now that we are getting from the yards a large number of ships which are of lake size I should think that a good many will be placed on the Great Lakes shortly.

That is from Mr. Ballantyne's speech in the session of 1920.

Mr. DUFF: That is quite true. Of course they did place ships on the Great Lakes.

Mr. FORKE: He says that they are of big enough size.

Mr. DUFF: He only thought so. He was speaking, of course, in good faith at the time, and he thought he might be able to work them in. The trouble was that they gave those contracts; the ships were being built; they had to take delivery of them; Mr. Ballantyne or the manager had to do something with them, and some of them were put on the Great Lakes, some on the Atlantic and some on the Pacific. The very fact that a number of those ships on the Great Lakes are laid up and not operating, proves conclusively that they are not suitable for Great Lakes business. I think it is a fact that some of them are laid up. The same thing applies on the Atlantic. A number of these ships have been laid up, and an announcement was made three months ago that twenty-seven of these ships were going to be sold. Why would they be sold if they could be used for some purpose?

Mr. FORKE: In Great Britian a good deal of coasting trade is done. Would they be suitable for coastal trade, say between Edinburgh and London,—for a short passage, what they call coasting trade, say between Leith and London?

Mr. DUFF: Of course I do not know very much about shipping in the Old Country, but I think they would be suitable for short distances and small bulk cargoes like coal from Swansea or Newcastle or somewhere else.

Mr. JACOBS: They could be used for rum-runners.

Mr. DUFF: Yes they would be very useful for that.

Mr. GRAHAM: They could not run fast enough.

Mr. DUFF: As I was saying, the fact that twenty-seven of these boats are according to announcement, going to be sold, proves conclusively that the company and the directors think that they are not suitable for the business of this country. In spite of the fact that this announcement came out three months ago, and in spite of the fact, that I think, it was the old directors who decided about a year ago to sell the boats, no attempt has been made to sell them. This money is all lying idle. If Sir Henry Thornton or anybody else knew anything about this business, they would try to sell these ships and get clear of them, at least the twenty-seven that they are supposed to sell. So far as I can see, no advertisements have appeared and nothing has been done to try to get rid of these twenty-seven ships. I believe it is in the best interest of the country that the full number of ships be sold at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They would be no good for anything, according to the hon. member's argument.

Mr. DUFF: But we would be clear of them, whether they are good or not. This country should not be running them at a loss. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) will agree with me that he is not favourable to this scheme of losing $9,000,000 every year in interest on the money.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I want to get the hon. member's argument.

Mr. DUFF: My argument is that the government has no right in the shipping business at all.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Have we a right in the railway business?

Mr. DUFF: The government should sell these ships at the earliest possible moment, take what they can get for them and clean this thing up. The argument about these ships bringing business to the Canadian National Railways has nothing in it. If they get some business on both the Atlantic and the Pacific, there is no difficulty at all for the head of the government railways to arrange with other shipbuilding companies to get business. If Sir Henry Thornton wants to do something for his railways, he could sell these ships and get, perhaps, ten to fifteen million dollars for them. Then if he thought he had to buy some ships, he would have some money with which to buy passenger and freight ships to compete with the Canadian Pacific railway. You have heard in this House no doubt, Mr. Chairman, the argument we had about the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, that the Canadian Pacific has ships. Most of the ships of the Canadian Pacific are of a different class entirely from these ships. Either they are ocean liners. freight and passenger ships combined, or they have turned their old passenger ships into cargo boats and fitted them up properly for that purpose. They are a different class of boats altogether from the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and consequently nobody can make any comparison between the ships of the Canadian Pacific Railway and these tramp steamers which are owned by this country at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member suggest or advocate or support the policy of selling these boats which he regards as unsuited, and investing in boats that would be suitable for the trade?

Mr. DUFF: I would not suggest that because I do not think it is necessary. But if Sir Henry Thornton wants to stay in the shipping business, it would be far better for him to sell these boats, realize ten or fifteen million dollars for them, and put that money into ocean steamships which would carry passengers to this country from Paris or wherever he is going to have that big hotel. I do not think, however, that is necessary. The $15,000,000 that can be realized on these ships can be placed in the public treasury to reduce partly the $78,000,000 which this country has invested in this project. The reason why it is not necessary to have these ships is that Sir Henry Thornton or the manager of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine can go to-morrow and make an arrangement with the White Star line or the Cunard line to run to Montreal, Quebec, Halifax or St. John and connect with the Canadian National Railways both going across the Atlantic and coming this way, delivering cargoes from St. John and other points to the Old Country and bringing passengers and cargoes to ports in Canada for our railways.

Mr. KNOX: The hon. member said just now that these vessels might be used for carrying coal from Swansea. Would it not necessarily follow, if they are suitable to do that, that they might be used in carrying coal from Sydney?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think the hon. gentleman was in when I said a moment ago, to prove that there is not much in that statement—

Mr. CARROLL: Coasting trade.

Mr. DUFF: Let me answer the question in my own way. A few moments ago, to prove my argument that there is not much in that, I said that the Canadian National Railways, that is the railway owned by you and me, allowed to the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, I think it was $3.80 but I will say $2.80 a ton, to carry coal from Sydney to Montreal when other ships were carrying it from Sydney to Montreal for $1.10 and later on for $1.25 a ton. Consequently, I think the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) will agree with me that Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships are not suitable to carry coal from Sydney to Montreal or anywhere else.

Mr. KNOX: Would the same thing not apply to Swansea?

Mr. DUFF: No, it would not apply to Swansea at all. That is a different trade, a different business, a shorter route, and the expenses are very much lighter over there. There are several reasons. I do not care what anybody did with the ships as long as they bought them and took them off our hands. I am not interested in what they do with them; but this government has no right to be in the ship-operating business. Our friends once in a while taunt us with the fact that a Liberal government built the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Whether that was a mistake or not, the Grand Trunk is in a very different position from the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. When that railway was built it invited people to go in and settle along the line, and from M ..cton to Cochrane or Winnipeg, wherever it ends, people went in and settled after the railway was built. Consequently, we cannot abandon it, and so the railway proposition is entirely different from the shipping proposition. Nobody will be hurt if the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are tied up to-morrow and offered for sale. If I were selfish—I am likely to lose votes by the speech I am making to-night. Some of the best captains of the government ships are from my own county; I might say the very best captains belong to that part of the country, one of whom, Captain Sprague, was four years in a German prison.

Mr. MARTELL: Not better than the captains from Hants?

Mr. DUFF: So that if I were selfish I would not advocate the selling of these ships. But I say that in the interests of the country this is the only proper course for the government to take. Now, this government has had sixteen months in which to decide the question. It came into office in December, 1921, or in January, 1922, and while I can quite understand that the late Minister of Railways did not have time to look into the problem, nevertheless the government has now had ample opportunity to study the whole situation and to make up their minds on the matter. Instead of voting this $1,500,000, and supplying further amounts during the recess—because the Government Marine will need more money—the government should at the earliest possible moment suggest to the Merchant Marine that they sell some of these ships. No one would be injured by the transaction and it would be in the best interests of shipping in this country. The rates would not be increased on cattle or grain or coal or lumber, because there is no trouble for any man who has a cargo to get tonnage to carry it. For that reason therefore I urge upon the government again, instead of paying this $1,500,000 over to the Canadian Merchant Marine, to instruct that corporation to sell some of these ships and pay to the banks the money it owes them and later on try to sell the rest of the ships for whatever can be obtained in order to meet as far as possible the principal the government has advanced on this undertaking.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is not much mystery about the position of affairs in regard to these boats, or as to why they were built. The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) wants information. Well, the matter was started, as pointed out by my hon. friend (Mr. Duff), in 1918 when civilization had suffered losses amounting to some fifteen millions of tonnage, and the insistency for boats was tremendous. So that we went into the boatbuilding business. In 1919, there was still a tremendous shortage of boats, Canadian commerce could not move, and there was great need for further shipping. We went into the business as other people did and we know what has happened. We have had a collapse in every direction in connection with the earnings of boats. But this is not only a matter of government experience; it is the experience of private companies and owners as well. I can pay the hon. member this compliment, that he is just recommending the course he and other vessel owners have had to follow themselves. I heard someone sympathizing very much the other day with the hon. member because of the difficulties he had experienced, having gone into the boatbuilding business believing that there was a great necessity for more tonnage. He lost a great deal of money in consequence and therefore got out of the business. There are many others in a similar position. The International Marine, one of the largest corporations of the kind in the world, wound up their whole operations last year, if the newspapers are correct, with a rather uncomfortable deficit. But I do not know that the matter is really as bad as the hon. member would have us believe. I want to get a little information from the minister.

Mr. FORKE: I asked a question earlier in the debate, but it has not yet been answered. Who was responsible for designing and building a type of ship that apparently is not useful for anything?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Horse marines.

Mr. FORKE: I do not wonder at there being losses in depreciation and so forth, but surely there should have been built ships that would have been suitable for some kind of trade. Someone must be responsible in the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The ships were built under the supervision of first class naval architects. They are staunch, strong, seaworthy general purpose boats, that have made money in the general carrying business. I do not know how things are to-day, but I know it has been stated by boards of trade that general purpose ships are renumerative, and I know that some of the trips of these vessels were of that character. The boats are good; there is nothing the matter with them.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. member think they could carry raisins from Australia without danger?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No doubt the hon. gentleman is looking forward to tremendous shipments in that particular trade and he may ask his question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) in whom he has tremendous confidence. Looking over the report, it seems to me that while it is accurate as a matter of bookkeeping—

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us finish this question first. We will get to Hants later on.

Mr. MARTELL: The best seamen come from there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We may discuss that later on. It seems to me that a good many of these losses are hardly worth debating on the issue as presented by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). They are not operating losses. I find, according to the statement—and I wish the minister would check me as I go along—that the net loss on operating account to date is $3,559,711.75.

Mr. DUFF: For one year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For the whole time.

Mr. DUFF: Where does the hon. member get those figures?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The total deficit given by my hon. friend was $18,791,000 odd, and I am taking off the different interest items and depreciation. The whole total of these interest items and depreciation items is $15,231,573.15. I have just added it up roughly, but I think I am approximately right.

Mr. DUFF: No doubt the hon. member heard me say that when the government pays over this vote it will have paid to the Government Marine some $7,500,000. In addition to that it will be observed that there is a surplus of $1,000,000, which makes a total of $8,500,000. If what the hon. member says is correct, that there is a loss of only $3,000,000, what have they done with the other $5,000,000?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I want to find out. It seems to me that some of the other items were cross entries, and the government have been asking for something that has not to do with deficits in operations. The most I can make out of the real deficit of operation is $3,559,711. I think that is pretty nearly the conclusion reached by the hon. member for Lunenburg.

Mr. DUFF: Only I think I made the deficit something over $4,000,000. But there is still $4,000,000 gone somewhere.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Over and above that?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, there is no sign of it in the statement. Why do they want this money to-night?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that really all the money that need be voted to look after this service is sufficient to cover the actual out-of-pocket losses, just as we do with our railways. We do not vote depreciation and interest payments to the railways when we own the investment ourselves. For example, we do not vote anything to cover our investment in the Intercolonial or in the Transcontinental. The only money we ever vote on interest account for the railways is something that the railways must pay, not what they owe us. So it does seem to me that nothing ought to be voted except the actual out-of-pocket loss in connection with the operation of this line. In other words, whatever the actual out-of-pocket payments are, those ought to be the full extent of our liability.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is exactly what it is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I think my hon. friend will find he is wrong.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, the hon. member for Lunenburg narrated a series of votes—I confess I did not have the figures before me. For last year he gave us $4,000,000, and for this year he said the vote would be in excess of $4,000,000, and I think he got it up to over $8,000,000.

Mr. DUFF: The money that has been voted and will be voted, if this item goes through, is over $7,500,000. In addition to that, the company showed a surplus in 1919 of $1,000,000, which added to the $7,500,000 makes $8,500,000. Now, the very most that can be shown as deficits is some $4,000,000 odd. In other words, they will have about $5,000,000 more than the deficits amount to. Why do they want all that money?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am afraid my hon. friend has got mixed in his figures. In the first place, the surplus, if surplus there was, in the year he mentioned would I presume have to go to pay interest on loans.

Mr. DUFF: No, nothing was paid.

Mr. GRAHAM: It does appear in this statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was only half a million dollars paid.

Mr. DUFF: In 1920.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not $7,000,000, it is $6,000,000, and I am going to show how it is made up. The amount provided was as follows:

Main Estimates 1922-23..	$4,360,720 00
Further Supplementary Estimates 1922-23 (including Governor General's warrant, $1,000,000 of November 20, 1922).. ..	1,700,000 00
Total..	$6,060,720 00

Operating deficit for the year ending December 31st, 1921..		$2,210,724 55
Operating deficit for the year ending December 31st, 1922.. ..	$2,384,189 17
Less amounts received for subsidy West Indies Service	59,090 00
		2,325,099 17

Here is something that I explained in the beginning, but my hon. friend has not taken it into consideration because it was not in the annual statement. The calendar year is the business year of the Merchant Marine, but the estimates of this House are made up to the 31st March. This explains the following:

Operating deficits for months January, February and March 1923, $457,770.13.

That was in last year's vote and in this year's calendar expenses.

Mr. DUFF: You are still losing money this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: Last year.

Amount advanced July 15, 1922, for working capital..	$ 930,697 68
Capital expenditure to March 31, 1923..	55,564 55
Balance of appropriation not required.	80,865 92
Total..	$6,060,720 00

The amount we are asking for is the estimated amount of what the deficit will be. The figures I have given are not for this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How can my friend make that out unless the returns given by the company are all wrong? The hon. member for Lunenburg starts out with this surplus of 31st December 1920. I assume that is an operating surplus.

Mr. DUFF: That is what the report says it is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very well. Then we have the two other years 1921 and 1922. Accepting these figures of loss just as given by the hon. minister we have got $4,594,913. If that be the operating surplus, as is shown—

Mr. GRAHAM: Deficit.

Mr. DUFF: Operating loss.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But we ought to deduct the operating surplus of $1,056,767 from that loss before we get our net position.

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see any escape from that when the company bring down the result of the whole of their trading in their last annual report. The minister is quite right if he takes the last two years by themselves, but we have everything brought down in the last report signed by Sir Henry Thornton. I think if the minister looks into that he will find I am correct.

Mr. GRAHAM: In what are you correct?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to get at how much ought to be voted, and how much we are going behind. I was taking out of that statement items which, while they are very real to the investor, so far as we are concerned to-day, are book-keeping entries. I find the total of book-keeping entries on this consolidated balance sheet of the report of 1923, $15,231,573.15, leaving real out-of-pocket charges of $3,559,711.75.

12 m.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot follow my hon. friend's calculation.

Mr. DUFF: I think my hon. friend is right, because if you deduct the $1,000,000 surplus from my amount the figures agree.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, it is checking it another way.

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask the minister to look into that and see if we are not right.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would suggest that when you pay half a million dollars into the Receiver General's receptive hands you cannot get it out without a vote.

Mr. DUFF: That was paid a long time before the surplus of $1,000,000 was shown on the books. It was paid two years before.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. DUFF: I beg your pardon, it was. It was paid before this $1,000,000 surplus was shown.

Mr. GRAHAM: What year was the $1,000,000 surplus shown?

Mr. DUFF: December 31, 1920.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was a deficit of over $2,000,000 in 1920.

Mr. DUFF: On December 31, 1920, the account shows a surplus of $1,000,000. Previous to that this $500,000 was deducted from the earnings of the company. It is useless for the minister to say that this $500,000 was paid out of the $1,000,000 surplus.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will not argue about it, as we will get a full statement to-morrow. There would be no place to put it but in the Receiver-General's hands and there would be no way to pay it if there was not a surplus.

Mr. DUFF: The statement of 1919 shows a profit of $1,400,000; the 1920 statement shows a profit of $600,000; that is $2,000,000 altogether. The $500,000 was paid out of this $2,000,000 and after allowing for depreciation left a surplus of $1,000,000, the amount my hon. friend stated. The $500,000 was deducted a year before the $1,000,000 surplus was shown. What good is it for the minister to argue that the $500,000 came out of the $1,000,000 surplus? It came out of the $2,000,000 profits that the company was supposed to earn.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will have a statement made up to date to-morrow concerning all the transactions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member for Lunenburg asked a rhetorical question as to what Sir Henry Thornton would know about boats. Well, to be fair to Sir Henry Thornton I should think he operated in England just about as many miles of ocean traffic as he did land traffic. Certainly for fifty per cent of his total mileage he would have water mileage to the same extent.

Mr. DUFF: That is coastal boats and passenger boats.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, boats to the Continent and back, to Flushing and other points. I think Sir Henry Thornton has had a good deal of experience in regard to boats.

Mr. MARTELL: What was the extreme distance between the termini of the route of these ships?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If we were to follow up that question it would lead to other considerations concerning Sir Henry Thornton and I do not care to follow the subject. Certainly there is just as big a difference between the termini in this country, from the Pacific on the one side and the Atlantic on the other as there is on these water routes in connection with the railways in England. But I do not think that is a fair way of looking at it. I just wanted to point out that he knew something about this marine business.

I should say for the benefit of the leader of the Opposition who asked as to the cost, that the cost of construction was greater than he thinks. The original cost was $191.95 per ton on the average. With that can be compared the cost of the American Shipping Board for the work done at the same time, which was $215 per ton. Our work actually was $23.05 a ton cheaper than was the work done in the yards that are nearest to us and where the fairest comparison can be made. I wanted to ask a further question, and that is, is it true that the business of the Canadian National Railways is carried on in so far as lake and water services are concerned at a charge 100 per cent greater than there is any justification for? The minister shakes his head. I think that was a very serious charge made by the hon. member for Lunenburg. If it be true that the practice of the railway is to subsidize these boats by paying them twice as much for their services as would be paid to other boats, it is rather an extraordinary situation. The hon. member has given the exact figures here to-night. It may be that he is entirely mistaken in his information, but I think the minister should go into that and let us have some information on that point. On the other hand, to be fair, Sir Henry Thornton, who knows about shipping because he has done almost as much shipping work in England as railway work, says that these boats have been a great feeder to his system. I would like to know what the minister thinks of that.

Mr. GRAHAM: If hon. gentlemen will permit me, as we do not intend to pass this vote to-night I would like the item to stand. With regard to the figures given by the hon. member for Lunenburg I think if the hon. member looks at his figures as to charges made by these boats of the Merchant Marine he will find that he has made a mistake. This is my information. However, that can be looked into.

Would the committee allow me to put through item 358 for the running of the canals all over Canada? This item is some $33,000 less than last year. It is for the purpose of the working of our canals.

Mr. MARTELL: Before we leave the Merchant Marine, some time ago I asked a question of the ex-Minister of Finance in regard to shipping and he told me that he wanted to finish his sentence. He was a long time finishing it.

Speaking of shipping, I represent a county that built the largest sailing ships that were ever built in Canada. The W. D. Lawrence was built at Maitland in the county of Hants. I did not rise for the purpose of prolonging this discussion. I heard some very pertinent questions put to the minister and the hon. member for Lunenburg by the leader of the Progressive party, and I did not hear him get many answers. I simply want to say that I absolutely agree with the hon. member for Lunenburg in the criticism which he has made of the Merchant Marine. The time has come in this country when the Merchant Marine should be disposed of. I believe that we are running riot as regards government ownership of all sorts of things. My hon. friend from Toronto in the course of his address asked if these ships were thoroughly equipped in every manner for the purpose of carrying on business. Now, any person who knows anything about ships or who has ever lived near the sea shore and has seen some of the ships of the Merchant Marine knows that they are absolutely unfit for ninety per cent of the trade which offers to-day. Any person who goes aboard them knows that the hatches are so situated that it is absolutely impossible to load or unload with quick despatch. Nor as my hon. friend from Lunenburg says, are they fit for the transportation of cattle. It is true they may be able to take over a few cattle, but they cannot take them over with profit to this country. I think the quicker we get clear of these boats the better. If we are going to have a shipping trade at all, let us get ships that are able to take the trade offering to the Old Country, ships of the proper type, not the ships of the Merchant Marine built not for the purposes of trade but for the purpose of supplying employment to people during the war and giving contracts to friends of the late government. The quicker we get rid of them the better it will be in the interests of Canadian industry.

I would suggest with all due deference to the Minister of Railways, who is an excellent man, that the quicker the administration of shipping in this country is put in the hands of men who are seamen—and if he wants me to find him seamen and will give me the patronage I will bring them up even from that historic county of Hants—the better it will be, but so long as the shipping interests of this country and its ships are to be run by a bunch of landlubbers so long will the people of Canada be compelled to pay an immense amount in deficits. It is not fair to the people of this Dominion that we should go on year after year voting money to pay deficits on these ships. It is all very well to vote the money. Then during the recess Governor General's warrants will be issued for the purpose of supplying money to a lot of landlubbers to carry on the foolish scheme, and if I or any other hon. member goes to the minister and asks for something in the way of improvement of port facilities or improvement in the trade facilities in his constituency he is told that he cannot get it because the Finance Minister has not got the money for it and could not make that particular grant. But in the meantime we are voting millions of money to the Canadian National Railways —and the quicker we get rid of that the better, though that opinion may not be received with joy by most people in the country but we have them upon us and we have to take care of them—and millions more for the Merchant Marine. Let us get rid of these ships of the Merchant Marine, this great octopus. If we cannot do anything better with it than we have done in the past I would ask that it be given to some son of Israel to be put on the dump pile. It is not fair to the people of this Dominion to go on voting money to make up deficits on the Merchant Marine year after year. I was hoping the hon. member for Lunenburg would move for the cutting out of the vote. Liberal as I am, I would vote against any government that persisted in continuing votes for the Canadian Merchant Marine.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not intending to speak on this question but when we have such great authorities as we have heard tonight differing so much about the utility of these boats it seems to me the only way to settle it is to give them a better trial than they have got yet. I have listened to the ex-Minister of Finance and he tells me that these vessels are of modern pattern and built like freighters, and are as good as could be put into the service. I want to believe that story because we are in need of boats. On the other hand the hon. member for Lunenburg and the hon. member for Hants tell us almost that they are not worth the powder to blow them up. Now which is true? I do not know. Coming from the West, as my hon. friend says, I am supposed to be classified among the landlubbers. Well I do not object to being that at all but I tell you what I want: I want to get some of these boats that will carry cattle overseas. We have been in correspondence with Sir Henry Thornton and he has finally decided to try out six of these boats for this purpose, and before they are blown to Kingdom come I want to give them a trial. We have been discussing this thing three or four times this winter and spring. Now we have got to it again and fitting them up temporarily it is probable that without very much expenditure they will probably be ready in ten days or so. After a trial we will know more about them. They will have served their purpose, for three months they will have had a fair trial and then we shall know definitely one way or the other. We shall probably then have some information as to what disposition ought to be made of these particular vessels, or some larger ones that may be put into service for this special purpose we have in view.

Item stands.

Mr. MACLEAN (York):

1. With reference to the proposal of the British government to expend £10,000,000 upon the creation of a naval base at Singapore, is it a fact, as stated in the British House of Commons on first of May last by Mr. Eyres-Monsell, Financial Secretary of the Admiralty, that—"This work was approved by the Dominion Conference in 1921 and it was most strongly represented by the Dominions"?

2. Is it a fact that Mr. Eyres-Monsell, at the same time and place, said, with reference to the expenditure, that—"he had great hopes that the Dominions, which had a very direct interest in the work, would see their way to co-operate with us in this direction"?

3. Is it probable that the hopes of Mr. Eyres-Monsell will be fulfilled?

4. Is it a fact that Colonel Amery, First Lord of the Admiralty, at the same time and place said—"He had no doubt that the Conference to be held in the autumn would endorse the conclusions arrived at by the Conference of 1921"?

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. Has the attention of the government or the department of Marine been drawn, since the Great War, to the methods constantly employed in the North Sea and elsewhere whereby the exact position of a ship in a fog can be accurately determined, those methods being to explode a small depth charge on the ship, the resultant sound being recorded at two wireless stations; or the simpler one of sending wireless messages to two or more stations which can by comparison of results, fix the position of the ship?

2. If so, has provision for the use of either of these methods been adopted by the erection of suitable substations at Cape Race near which the S.S. Marvale recently went down, by either of the government of this Dominion or that of Newfoundland?

3. If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Radio direction finding: Yes. Sound ranging: Yes.

2. Radio direction finding: Yes. The Canadian government erected radio direction finding stations at Cape Race, Canso, and Chebucto Head in 1918. They have been in constant operation 24 hours a day since they were opened. Cape Race is 21 miles from the reef on which the Marvale struck. Sound ranging: No.

3. Radio direction finding: Answered by No. 1 and No. 2. Sound ranging: No sound ranging stations of the type mentioned are in practical operation as an aid to navigation in any country of the world. The department is keeping in touch with the development of these systems and does not consider it would be justified in recommending any expenditure in this reference at the moment.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—TIES

Mr. HANSON:

1. Were tenders called in 1923 for a supply of ties to the Grand Trunk Railway, such ties being for use in or to come from the Matapedia Valley in the Province of Quebec?

2. If so, who were the tenderers, and at what rates?

3. Who obtained the contract and why?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: I think on reflection my hon. friend will agree with me that the detailed information asked for in this question is such that it would not be in the interest of the Canadian National Railways that it should be made public. That is my answer.

GREAT LAKES—DIVERSION OF WATERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any complaints been received from the Dominion Marine Association, or harbour commissions on the Great Lakes in reference to the illegal diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes through the Chicago drainage canal?

2. Is the Government aware that this diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico is having disastrous effects on the carrying capacity of ships and on the levels of the lower lakes and the St. Lawrence?

3. What does the government propose to do in the matter?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes, but not recently.

2. The government believes that the diversion at Chicago has injuriously affected the navigable capacity of the connecting channels of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence river.

3. The matter is under consideration.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

TERMINAL ELEVATORS AND THE GRAIN TRADE

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. (a) How many public terminal elevators in Fort William and Port Arthur have private terminal elevators which are owned by the same company, or practically the same company, or whose shareholders and executives are interlocked and associated in both enterprises; and how many of these said elevators have facilities for direct connections for transferring grain from the private elevator to the public?

(b) Has any direct transferring between a public and private elevator ever been done, or reported to have been done?

(c) Is the practice being carried on at the present time?

(d) By whose authority was the transferring, if any, done?

(e) Does the Canada Grain Act not state that a private and a public elevator shall have no physical connection?

2. Is all the grain at a terminal point, as provided by the Canada Grain Act, officially weighed in and out of all elevators?

3. Are all elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur weighed up annually as provided by the Canada Grain Act? If not, why not?

4. Does the Inspection Department inspect grain and issue certificates according to section 27 of the Grain Act?

5. (a) In the loading of grain on boats at waterfront elevators situated at Port Arthur and Fort William, what method of inspection is carried on by the Inspection Department?

(b) Are samples taken from the belt in the tunnels of the elevator, or are the samples taken from the running stream of grain when it is running into the boat, or is it taken both in the tunnel of the elevator and from the running stream?

(c) In the case of a difference between the sample taken at the tunnel and the one taken from the running stream into the boat, which sample is considered official?

6. (a) Does the Inspection Department determine the amount of excess moisture that is contained in tough, damp and wet grain, and place same on each certificate issued for off-grade grain?

(b) Does the terminal elevator take out the excess moisture above normal, when drying grain as per their tariff?

(c) Are moisture tests made before grain is dried in public terminal elevators to ascertain what shrinkage or loss will be charged the owner of the grain by the elevator performing the drying? If not, how is the shrinkage arrived at?

(d) Does the Inspection Department verify and see that terminal elevators take out all excess moisture over normal on grain they are drying according to their tariff?

7. What authority does the Inspection Department demand of a terminal elevator as to ownership or authorized agency, before any parcel can be loaded out; and is inspection made accordingly to ensure that the quality of grain or grain by-products ordered out by the owner or authorized agent is up to that received by the elevator from the owner?

8. Does the Inspection Department issue and charge a fee for inspecting grain or grain by-products that do not represent the quality as ordered out by the owner or authorized agent?

9. If contract wheat contains one to two per cent of small and shrivelled wheat, does the Inspection

Department make this car a "clean to clean," or do they put one or two per cent dockage, as the case may be, on this car?

10. What are the charges levied by the government for inspection and weighing grain in each consecutive year since 1912?

11. Is grain arriving at a public terminal elevator in the Western Inspection Division, carrying a grade certificate and binned under government supervision, as provided for by the Canada Grain Act, subject to another inspection charge on being loaded out? If so, why the duplicate inspection?

12. Are the weighing and inspection charges based on the actual cost of the service rendered, and how is this determined?

13. Is the owner of grain, the grade of which is in dispute with the Inspection Department and placed for survey, entitled to a sealed portion of official sample the survey is determined on? If so, from whom does he obtain same?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

CANADIAN MERCANTILE MARINE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, papers, writings and documents of any kind, passing between any member or department of the government and the Canadian National Railways or Canadian Mercantile Marine managers or directors or officers, since January 1st, 1922, relating in any way to the vessels of the Canadian Mercantile Marine, their use or suitability, or making in any way recommendations as to sale or other disposition of said vessels.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

VANCOUVER EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I should like to supply some information that was asked for the other day by the hon. member for St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert (Mr. MacLaren) in connection with some employees whose services had been dispensed with in Vancouver. I have a statement from the secretary of the department to the effect that the contention of my hon. friend is right that the names of Messrs. Cruit, Flewin, Irvine and Beattie should have been included in the original answer. They were left out through an error on the part of the record clerks who prepared the information for our office. It is to be noted, however, that these names were not actually struck off our pay roll until the 30th April and that they were given notice on the 31st January, not on the 28th February as stated by my hon. friend. That is probably the reason for the error.

NAVAL BASE AT SINGAPORE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to call the attention of the House and the government to the answer of the Prime Minister just given to question Number 4, asked by the hon. member for South York. He said that the government had no information. As regards the first question, which is the pith of the questions, the government has not only information, but all the information. The question is:

With reference to the proposal of the British government to expend £10,000,000 upon the creation of a naval base at Singapore, is it a fact, as stated in the British House of Commons on first of May last by Mr. Eyres-Monsell, Financial Secretary of the Admiralty, that—"This work was approved by the Dominion Conference in 1921 and it was most strongly represented by the Dominions"?

The government has the full report of that conference in its possession, and can certainly give an answer to this question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government has not any information as to what happened in parliament in England.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The House has the report and it is open to any hon. member to examine the report. The government has received no information as to whether any such statement was ever made in parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question is: "Is it a fact that this was approved at the conference?" The government has the information as to whether or not that is a fact, and the question whether it is contained in the report does not matter. The government is asked a question in the House and should answer it, because it has the full information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report of the conference has been laid on the Table of the House, and it is open to any member to examine it. I will be pleased to lay it on the Table again, if desired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The blue books are laid on the Table, but that does not absolve the government from giving an answer to a question regarding them, much less does it excuse the government for giving the wrong answer.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like the House to have an opportunity before the session closes, of discussing in committee what took place at that conference.

PUBLIC DEBT—MATURING OBLIGATIONS

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I would like the Minister of Finance to state if the government will provide an opportunity, before the end of the session, to discuss the question of meeting our obligations which are due this year, before next session. I understand nearly $200,000,000 will have to be paid before next session.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I think on a motion to go into Supply is the proper occasion for such a discussion, and the hon. member will have opportunity to discuss this matter then. I do not think it requires any special order.

ALIEN ENEMY PROPERTY

CLAIM OF GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AGAINST UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I observed in the press some days ago, but made no mention of it pending the return of the minister concerned, that a section of the government had gone down to Washington with a considerable retinue. There were the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) and the Hon. William Pugsley.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was in the retinue. There were also Mr. Mulvey, Under Secretary of State, Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, and some others. Could the Minister of Justice report to us results commensurate with the size of the delegation?

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): If the House wishes that I should state the object of our visit and the result, I will do so. The object of the visit to Washington was to press the settlement of a claim that our government has against the government of the United States in reference to the seizure of certain properties seized by the Custodian of Alien Enemy Property of the United States. In 1918 and 1919 the Custodian of Alien Enemy Property of the United States government proceeded to seize certain certificates of shares and bonds of Canadian companies which were owned by enemies residing in Germany, which certificates and bonds were then deposited with different institutions in the United States. Our own custodian, proceeding under our war measures act, had also seized some, if not all, of the same securities. Some of the companies which had been ordered by the American courts to pay their dividend to the Alien Property Custodian paid some of the dividends and then ceased to pay, on account of the vesting orders which had been issued by our own courts. We tried to arrive at a settlement "à l'amiable." The Alien Property Custodian of the United States government came to Canada. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was then our custodian. I understand that he had some conferences with the representatives of the American government, and Mr. Mulvey was a party to the conferences. The question under discussion was whether we had any right in those securities, or whether they were to be left in possession of the American government. It was important that the dividends should be paid or deposited in the hands of one of the two governments. It was agreed that, pending the discussion, the dividends should be paid to the American government, and that the question of law should be decided by an arbitrator or by a judge of Canada or of the United States. Some of the Canadian companies continued to pay the dividends to the Alien Property Custodian of the United States. After a certain time that very question which was in doubt and discussed between the two governments was decided by the American court, at the request of the American officer, in reference to certain certificates of American companies which had been sequestered by the Alien Property Custodian of the Imperial government, and which certificates were deposited in England. The question was debated and decided in favour of the American government. Taking advantage of that decision, our attorneys tried to induce the American government to turn over to the Canadian government those certificates and bonds. Proceedings have been going on for some years—since 1920. After consultation with our attorneys we were advised that it would be preferable that we should try and arrive at a settlement with the American government without litigation, and we were advised that if we had the opportunity of meeting the President of the United States, the Secretary of State and the Attorney General of that country, perhaps, after those three decisions—there were three decisions on that very same point—the American government would consent, without arbitration and without litigation, to hand over those securities to our government. Accordingly our custodian, the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Copp), Mr. Newcombe, Mr. Mulvey, and myself decided to go to Washington. Hon. Mr. Pugsley was not one of our party. We met the Secretary of State of the United States, who declared that he was perfectly willing to turn over to Canada the securities mentioned but thought the President would be governed in the matter by the advice of the Attorney General, and that the only trouble in the way was the fact that after the orders had been rendered by the American courts, vesting those securities in the Alien Property Custodian of the United States, they did not see how that officer could take it upon himself to turn those properties over to Canada. We answered that we should invoke the three judgments which were rendered by the American courts at the request of the American authorities, and we did not see that there was any necessity of litigation any more, since the case had been decided in favour of the American government and, consequently, in our favour. The same objection was repeated that there was a distinction also, because registration had been made of those same stocks in favour of the American officer, and they were of opinion that it was necessary that a judgment should be rendered by some tribunal. We had the advantage of meeting the President and repeating the same argument. We were told that the American government were heartily disposed to liquidate the situation as promptly as possible, and that they would be willing to expedite any case that might be instituted by our government before any of the courts of the United States. We suggested that we would prefer to proceed before one of our courts as the American government did in proceeding before one of their judges. Later on, after those two interviews, a conference took place between the Assistant Attorney General and our representative, Mr. Conboy, and it was then agreed that to expedite matters, if we were to institute one or two cases in Canada, assigning one or two companies to appear before such court to be instructed to deliver to the Canadian government certificates for those same stocks, the American government would appear, so that the judgment would be binding upon the American government and upon the companies. This we found most satisfactory.

As to the bonds, there may be some distinction to be made. Certificates of stocks are only evidence of property, while a bond is something by itself. We contended all the same that no distinction should be made. There is also the question of dividends which were paid to the American government. Our intention is to proceed, as I said, in one or two cases, to have the principle decided of the property in the stocks. If the judgment goes in our favour, necessarily we shall be entitled to dividends paid to the American government. As to the bonds, something has to be done. We are now considering what is to be done, and when and how it should be done. On the whole we consider that we have accomplished something, and we hope that after a comparatively short delay, we shall get the securities to which we are entitled.

[Sir Lomer Gouin.]

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Loan to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council, upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine, and to be applied in the payment of deficits in operation of the company and the vessels under the company's control during the year ending March 31, 1924, $1,500,000.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Last night I promised to bring a statement down for the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I had to send to Montreal for the material and I expect it some time during the afternoon. If the discussion on this item goes on, I should be glad to give the information to my hon. friend a little later on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask an explanation from the minister regarding a statement made yesterday evening. I do not in any way question the accuracy of the statement. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) said that it was a fact that the Canadian Government Railways paid the ships of the Merchant Marine, I think it was $2.80 a ton to carry coal from Sydney to Montreal, while other ships were carrying coal for $1.10 a ton. Is there any explanation?

Mr. GRAHAM: I intimated last night that I thought the hon. member for Lunenburg must have been misinformed. The rate was $1.50.

Mr. DUFF: Might I say that the hon. member for Lunenburg was not misinformed. If the hon. member will turn up the Auditor General's report—I forget the page, but I will get it—I can prove conclusively that my statement was absolutely correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The hon. member for Lunenburg referred last night to an item of $96,122, reserve for doubtful debts and claims. That is an item on which we should have a little explanation. Has the Canadian Government Merchant Marine been in the habit of running accounts or giving credit for goods transported? Is it unable to collect some of those accounts at the present time?

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot give my hon. friend the item offhand; but, of course, in a business of this magnitude, there are some claims outstanding. I know in my own business, when I am making a statement, I set aside a certain amount for doubtful claims that may be paid hereafter or that may turn out to be worthless.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have never known any transportation company, railway or steamship, to take any chances on claims for freight. I understood these were always collected before the goods were delivered and in many cases before the goods were received for transportation. I can hardly understand the Canadian Government Merchant Marine running monthly or weekly accounts for freight charges, if that is what this means.

Mr. GRAHAM: In many accounts for transportation, three or four different companies are interested because of interchange of freight, settlement of rates; and this is a reserve amount put aside to meet any of those settlements that might be unsatisfactory. This might not mean that the private individual had not paid his freight to some transportation company.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not think there has been any other question asked as often in this House as the question: Why cannot the Canadian Government Merchant Marine be made to pay? This question has been repeated again; and again I might say that I was a little disappointed yesterday evening when the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) took his seat and, in my opinion, did not make even an attempt to explain the matter.

Mr. DUFF: It is pretty hard to satisfy everybody.

Mr. McBRIDE: I claim to have had just a little experience in connection with steamboat work, and I have made the statement at least twice on the floor of this House that the smaller boats up to, say, 5,000 tons will never pay. I think it is incumbent upon me to explain that statement and show why, in my opinion, they will not pay. I am not criticizing the building of the boats; I am not criticizing the workmanship; nor am I criticizing the captains and the crews that operate these boats. But I do criticize the man who was responsible for the designing of them; I criticize the architect. I do not know who he is; I have never heard his name; but in my opinion it is evident that he never had any practical experience so far as freight boats are concerned. He may be a first-class architect from the standpoint of passenger steamers, but freight boats are an entirely different proposition.

Let us consider the construction of some of these freight boats of 5,000 tons or less—I am referring to those that I have seen. They have a fair, clean run behind, but from the centre they taper off more in the fashion of passenger boats towards the bow. A freight boat should carry its beam well forward to the bow; the boats to which I am referring are less than five thousand tons and ought to have had anywhere from ten to fifteen feet more of a beam to give them carrying capacity. If that were the case they could carry at least a third more freight than they are able to take as they are, and it would not interfere with their speed to any extent. In a steamer that makes from eight to ten knots, it does not affect the speed to any appreciable extent to have a blunt bow, and this affords added carrying capacity. These boats are not built in that way; they are more like passenger boats. Then their engines and boilers are placed in the centre, which should not be. The engines should be placed in a freight boat as near the stern as it is possible to get them. The boilers should be placed in the stern of the boat, taking up as little room as possible, just giving the firemen space enough in which to work. The firemen do not require more than room enough to enable them to attend to the boilers. In the bow of the boat there should be a bulkhead or watertight compartment, or tanks to hold water, so that when the boat is running light the tanks can be filled to prevent the ship from pounding in the sea. A boat in which the machinery is situated in the stern must have some ballast in the bow, because if she pounds in the sea she is bound to do herself material damage. These boats are not constructed in that manner. The centre of a freight boat of this size should be left entirely free for freight, but, as I have already pointed out, the machinery in these particular steamers is all in the centre. There should be two hatches instead of, as is the case with many of these boats, the whole decks covered with hatches. I think the architect sacrificed utility to beauty. Undoubtedly the boats do look well at sea; but that is not the main consideration in freight steamers. These boats should have carrying capacity, which is not provided in these particular steamers. As regards the boilers, any person who has had any practical experience in connection with machinery will admit that a boiler in a freight boat should have a lead anywhere from 25 to 35 per cent over the engines, for the simple reason that when inferior coal is being used the firemen can still keep up steam. And, besides, it is much easier on the boiler. These boats have not got that feature; at least I have not seen it in any of those that I have looked over. I consider the boiler of a steamer the most important part of its equipment. When you have to force a boiler to keep up steam by forced draft, you are apt to have trouble with the combustion chamber, and the probability is that you will spring a leak. On getting into port with such boilers the first thing that has to be done is to draw fire and cool off the boiler, and it takes anywhere from 36 to 48 hours to cool one of those large boilers. Furthermore, it requires a considerable time to get up steam to do justice to the boilers. During all that time the boat is lying in port and expenses are running up. I am of the opinion, therefore, that it is a big drawback to these boats that the boilers have not a lead over the engines. The disadvantage would not be so great if they could use oil fuel, I am referring to boats that are using coal. There is another consideration, too. If the boilers had the lead I suggest, the boats could use slack instead of good coal. The firemen would have no difficulty in keeping up steam with slack coal, which is about one-third the price of first-class coal, and in that way a great saving could be made.

It has been suggested that these steamers should be provided with passenger accommodation. In my opinion they are not built for that purpose and never will be a success as passenger carriers. There is no doubt in my mind about that; and if any more money were invested to provide for passenger accommodation on these steamers it would be only so much more money thrown away.

Taking these things into consideration, I believe that the best thing that the government could do would be to get rid of the smaller boats as best they can. We have got into this mess and we must get out of it. But I want the House to understand that the government is not the only one that has got into difficulties in connection with shipbuilding. There were some people in Vancouver who built boats for the government, and when the government refused to give any more orders they formed a company and built ships for themselves. Some of these ships cost over a million dollars, and one in particular was sold last fall, I think, for $250,000, or less than one-quarter what it cost originally. Parliament should understand therefore that the government is not the only one that is faced with this proposition. I cannot see how these boats will ever pay running expenses, and when these ships cannot take care of themselves and pay the running charges, surely the sooner the government get rid of them the better it will be for the whole country. I do not propose to offer any opposition to this item, but I do think that the minister should give the House some guarantee that he will endeavour to get rid of the boats in whatever way he can before another session of parliament is called. We should not be asked to vote a sum of money year after year to keep up something that is of no benefit to the country. What right has this House to vote the money of the taxpayers each year in the way of a bonus to keep in operation these boats that are competing with ships owned by private companies? I do not think it is fair to the other companies. Those other companies have to pay their crews, and interest on their investment, and, in a great many cases, income tax. Why then should this government vote sums of the taxpayers' money year after year for the purpose of competing with private companies that are doing a legitimate business? I do not think it is right, and I certainly hope that before another session comes around the minister will see his way clear to have some at least of the boats disposed of.

Mr. DUFF: I rise to apologize to the House for the statement I made last night which the minister referred to a moment ago —that freight was paid to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats on coal carried by them from Sydney to Montreal at the rate of $2.80 per ton.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was a member over there who said it.

Mr. DUFF: Somebody said it anyway, and I said so, too. The minister points out today that I made a mistake and that the freight rate charged was $1.50 per ton. Well, I have to apologize to the House because I made the rate too low. I do not know where the minister got his information, but if he will turn to the Auditor General's report for 1922 he will find the following at page W-116:

Freight on coal, Canadian Government Merchant Marine: Sydney to Lévis, 3,110 tons at $4 per ton—

An hon. MEMBER: What!

Mr. DUFF: Four dollars per ton, when other boats were carrying coal for $1.10 per ton.

Mr. GRAHAM: What year?

Mr. DUFF: I am quoting from the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1922. Continuing my quotation:

Sydney to St. John and Halifax, 19,202 tons at $2.60; Louisburg to St. John and Halifax, 29,337 tons at $2.60.

I am quite sure that other boats would have carried this coal at half the rate to the two latter ports, and at less than half to Levis. And yet the minister says the coal was carried at a rate of $1.50 per ton.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will have that checked up. The item referred to goes further back—

Mr. DUFF: This is the last report of the Auditor General.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be for business done in 1920 I imagine. It goes back further than the business I was referring to, which was done in 1921. I thought that would be far enough back. The manager told me last night that he thought $1.50 was the rate. He telephoned to Montreal this morning and his figure was confirmed. It referred to 1921, a year later. I will have the item looked into; there may be some explanation of the very high rates quoted.

Mr. DUFF: I just wanted to show that I was right in my statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend might be right in that statement, but the other half of the statement, that privately-owned boats were carrying coal for $1.10 per ton, might be wrong. The two years might have got confused.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, no, it was the same year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, of all hon. members here I can make no pretence to any practical knowledge of either shipbuilding or the shipping business, but I think it is due to the House that some short review should be made of the history of the Canadian Government Mercantile Marine, to clear away any misconceptions that might arise from these discussions.

While I do not disagree—as I usually have to, very reluctantly—with everything said by the hon. member for Lunenburg, (Mr. Duff); because a part of his review of the history of the matter is not out of accord with my recollection—I fear the House would get the impression that something approaching insanity, something unaccompanied by the slightest sense of public duty, had animated the late government in its mercantile marine policy, that in our hurry to get rid of all the funds of the country we had put them into expensive vessels which when built were not fitted to carry passengers, package freight, cattle or coal, indeed, were not much good for anything save as a spectacle of extravagance and waste; and that having committed this folly, we proceeded to add another, to seek to operate these vessels under a board, none of whose members had any financial interest in their operation.

I think hon. members are fairly well acquainted with what has taken place, and in that respect the hon. member for Lunenburg, to do him justice, was not grossly and violently wrong. It was in 1918 that the enterprise of shipbuilding was first launched upon. It was not in 1918 that the first public agitation to that end was commenced. Well I recall in years previous from the benches of the then opposition a determined campaign was opened to compel the government to establish for Canada a mercantile marine. The champion of that agitation he who was most eloquent and most persistent, he who excelled in both those qualities, was the Hon. William Pugsley, now seated in a less contentious post. Previous to that agitation we did not undertake the work. The demands upon the Treasury were very great, the prospect of a large government railway mileage was not immediate, the success of the German submarine campaign was much less a menace than it became later on, and the call for ships the world over was nothing at all in 1916 and 1917 to what it became in 1918.

In 1918, $25,000,000 was appropriated to help meet the situation on the part of Canada. The Prime Minister of the day came to parliament and secured approval of that appropriation, and he set out before the House the entire programme as then contemplated by the administration. Up to this point I do not think the two accounts of what has happened differ.

Previous to the armistice contracts were let for forty-five ships, and these included the smaller ships that are now the subject of so much discussion. These smaller ships at that time could be built quickly, they were needed quickly, they had a very, very pressing service immediately to perform, and therefore they were included in the ships first laid down. The contracts went on. In the spring of 1919, though the armistice had been signed and peace was almost certain to be declared, it became evident not only to this country, but, I think, to every other country that the need for ships was even greater than it had been twelve months before. When I say it became evident, I fortify the phrase by the assertion that every other country answered to the demand at least in equal degree proportionately to what this country did; some countries answered in much greater proportion. I mention in this regard particularly the United States of America.

Then, in 1919, other circumstances came in sight of very great and immediate consequence relative to the shipbuilding programme. Not only was the world's shipping depleted and the world suffering seriously from such depletion at that time, but Canada, having already acquired at the close of 1917 the Canadian Northern Railway, had in view the acquirement of the Grand Trunk Railway. Indeed, its acquirement seemed to be inevitable by one process or the other. Hence there could be seen in view a tremendous railway system owned and operated by the government in competition with the other great Canadian transportation system, the Canadian Pacific Railway. There were other circumstances as well, the force of which does not now come home to the mind with the same weight and by anything like the same pressure with which it was brought home to the minds of hon. members of this House of all political persuasions in 1919. Those were the days of very rapid demobilization. Our soldiers were coming back by the hundreds of thousands, and the country was utterly unable to absorb with the speed of their return the men who had done service overseas. Unemployment is at all times a very serious subject matter for a government's consideration. But unemployment when suffered by men returning from a terrific conflict differs from other unemployment. The demand then must be met; public opinion will permit nothing but that it be met to the full power of the government. The pressure for these ends I can, of course, very easily recall; I was in the midst of it. I ask hon. gentlemen to keep in mind that pressure of that kind is a just pressure, and, what is more, it is an irresistible pressure. Money spent in providing employment, even if we assume it is spent in the construction of something of no great value, is not wholly money wasted; if we had not provided it in one form or the other we would have paid it out in cash. The situation had to be confronted and surmounted. It was confronted and surmounted, and the construction of more vessels was one of the methods by which this end was attained. Now, I have mentioned three circumstances; all were of consequence. Others I might review, but those three circumstances, I say, were of exceeding consequence indeed. I emphasize again that among the vessels first laid down, contracts for which were signed, executed and in process of completion at the time the armistice was signed, the smaller were included; a sufficient number of the larger vessels for other purposes was not included in the first laid down. The government, therefore, in April, 1919, laid before parliament proposals for the construction, I think it was, of eighteen more —at all events, of the balance.

Mr. DUFF: That is right; eighteen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I ask hon. members to recall that included in that government were hon. members who now sit opposite; included in that government was the former leader of the Progressive party. All concurred in submitting to parliament proposals for that construction, and I do all of them justice when I say that they were moved to that view by the considerations I have sought now to impress again on the committee. Not only did we ask for the money for the purpose—that is to say, for such amount of it as could reasonably be expended in 1919-20, but we informed parliament of the character of the vessels to be constructed; informed parliament of all the details that parliament has a right in every case to be furnished with before being asked to approve of the proposal made. The approval was given in 1918; the approval was given in 1919, and I doubt if any subject matter has ever been placed before this House that received in each case so unanimous an approval on the part of parliament as did the subject matter of our mercantile marine construction. In 1918 I can remember no dissentient note whatever. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) refers to a doubt expressed by the then member for Red Deer. I do not dispute it. I have not had time to look it up; my recollection was that was in 1919 rather than 1918. However, beyond the doubt expressed by him, which, I think, was based on the view he so consistently held that everything except raising wheat could be done cheaper in England or Scotland than in Canada—outside of that I know of no dissentient or discordant note of any kind from any quarter in the Canadian House in either year. In such form the estimates passed and the contracts were subsequently let for these additional vessels. I ask hon. members to keep in mind this fact: Though the vote was passed the government was not bound to go ahead; the government had the authority of parliament to do so, but had circumstances altered it would have been quite justified in changing its policy and coming to parliament later with an explanation. But the circumstances that obtained in the fall and winter and spring of 1918-19 were just as pressing and just as powerful all through the summer of 1919.

SUPPLY

The House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have carried the record of the decisions of parliament up to the spring of 1919. In that summer the balance of the contracts were let. In the spring of 1920, the government came to parliament again, not with any new proposals at all, but with an estimate of the amount that would be required to proceed with the work on the proposals that parliament had adopted the year before, the amount that would be required for the then ensuing year, because, of course, ships of the size then being built could not be constructed even in that year. Parliament voted that money. It was merely a vote carrying out the previous programme unanimously adopted, without a dissenting vote in the House of Commons. I think I am safe in saying, although I have not had time to review the debates of 1920 for the purposes of this discussion, that there was no contention in the House even in 1920 against going on with works that were under way; nor was there reflection passed upon the wisdom of the course that had been adopted finally in the spring of 1919. The facts were that at that time other countries were excelling themselves in the same way; that the demand for space, instead of falling off, was as strong as ever; that though conditions in Canada were improving somewhat, the necessity for keeping employed those still at work on our ships, a large proportion of those men being returned men, was just as great and pressing as before. So the work proceeded, and it was almost completed in 1920, only a relatively very small appropriation, I do not know whether it was $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, being required in 1921. This appropriation was determinedly opposed. By this time changes had taken place in the whole mercantile work. By this time deflation was under way. By this time there was a surplus of ships. There was no demand any longer for more; indeed ships were a glut on the markets of the world. Certain hon. gentlemen then saw their chance, and they who had voted for the entire project and for its continuance, turned around and held parliament up in a determined effort to prevent the vote from going through.

Mr. BLACK (Huron): What time was that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be in the month of April or May, 1921. The opposition was a little belated, but I am not dwelling on those matters now. I am not criticizing hon. gentlemen opposite for their concurrence in the policy adopted, because I think that policy of ship construction was right from a business standpoint at the time we were carrying it out, because the demand for space in Canada, for the use of our docks and harbours for building ships came from all parts of the world. We had to prohibit the building of ships even for neutral countries all through 1920, and at the time we were refusing to build ships of a certain character wooden ships, we were importuned by private owners, private constructors to be allowed to build the same class of ships in this country.

Mr. MARLER: The right hon. gentleman said a few moments ago, if I mistake not, that there was great unemployment in 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MARLER: If there was a demand from other countries to build ships in our docks, what was the necessity of our occupying the docks in 1919?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not say that we could have had them in 1919; but we could have had them in 1920, and I am not sure that we could not have had them in 1919. I will tell my hon. friend why we did not. We felt that it was better at that time, when Britain and her allies were sadly in need of ships to make up what the German submarines had destroyed, to keep the docks for our own purposes. I well recall—and I say this with no idea of making a contentious matter of what the present Speaker said at that time—the strong approval coming from the then hon. member for Maisonneuve because we did this with a policy of holding our own ports and harbours for the construction of vessels for ourselves and our allies. Great Britain was building ships in Canada at that time through the agency of the Imperial Munitions Board.

This carries us through the programme of ship construction. Now it is said: "Very well; you were right so far as that goes; you did what the best minds and the best judgments in the world, trained and experienced in the subject, were doing at that time. But after they got through, you should have sold them when the price was high. You should not have started to operate them yourselves. You should not have formed a company to operate them. You should not have sought to operate them as a government enterprise. You should have sold them when the price was good and the selling was good." I admit that the selling was good and the price was high. Doubtless, even though we needed the ships later on, it would have paid to have sold them and later on to have bought others. I wonder if that is not the experience of everybody in this world? Is there in the world to-day a business that would not be far better off now if it had just sold its assets two or two and a half years ago and then bought what it needed later on? When did this demand arise in parliament for the sale of our ships? Did any hon. gentleman hear it in 1919 when some of the ships were on the way to completion, when some of them were completed? Did any hon. gentlemen hear it in 1920 when most of them were completed and when the company was formed, in operation, and showing a profit to this country? Nobody ever heard such a claim. The demand came, as it always comes in private life, after the event. You always know the market after the event. Then the complaint came that we should have known this before and sold when the price was good. But there are other considerations that affect a government than merely the level of the market. By this time we had acquired the Grand Trunk Railway; by this time we were owners of a system of 23,000 miles of railway, and what is more, we were in competition with the best organized, biggest and, perhaps, best managed single business enterprise in the known world, the Canadian Pacific railway. We were in severe competition with them in every line of activity, and we found our competitor with 440,000 tons of shipping at its command ready to serve its system in this country, ready to drain from all the ports of the world the world's business to the Canadian Pacific in Canada. Was it to be thought that we were to face that competition, and while we were addressing ourselves to facing it, disarm ourselves of what mercantile marine we had? Certainly, if we had known the market and known we could have later on bought more cheaply, that would have been the course. But aside from a prevision of the market, I do not see that any argument could be made that we should have adopted any such policy. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have to-day in their annual statement a mercantile marine asset of some $59,000,000 at cost of construction. The Canadian Pacific fortunately built their vessels at a much cheaper cost than we did. Why? Because they built them sooner; they built them before the war, in the main, although it is true they have built some since. But their average cost of construction is below ours, their tonnage being above ours. The Canadian Pacific Railway to-day have, proportionately to their mileage, far more mercantile marine tonnage than have the National Railways. I doubt not they have double the amount: I think they have double, proportionately to their mileage, the tonnage that the National Railways have.

Some complaint, however, is made. It is said: "You did not build cheaply enough; you should have built by tender, and you could have justified your vessels at the time you built them because it was a war necessity. When the whole enterprise was entered upon you could have got them built more cheaply." Well, I venture to say this, and I am glad of the chance to say it in justice to an hon. gentleman who is no longer a member of this House: No enterprise of the Canadian people was ever better managed from a business point of view than was the construction of the Canadian Mercantile Marine, and I invite hon. gentlemen opposite, if they have any question as to that, to be good enough to follow their policy of commission-making just a little further and appoint one, two, or three experienced shipbuilding men—and they can appoint a judge of their own choosing at the head—to investigate the whole subject of the Canadian Mercantile Marine I would welcome, and every hon. member on this side of the House would welcome, such an investigation; and certainly no one in this Dominion would welcome it with more avidity than the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Our Mercantile Marine was not built by tender for the simple reason that it could not be done. You cannot let by tender for the building of ships when you have fourteen docks in Canada, all of which must be engaged; nor can you build at the same price in one as you can in another. What country in the world does build its ships by tender? I do not know of any. I know that when we were building our 65 vessels, the United States were building 1,553, and they did not do the work by tender. Great Britain was building too at a very rapid rate, but she was not building by tender. We asked for the construction of a vessel of a certain type; we asked for quotations on that type of vessel to be built at a certain place; and we did not accept the lowest quotation. In every case, I think, the lowest we considered too high, and after the lowest was in a price was fixed and the builders were told that if they could not accept that price they could not get the work. The result was that we built our marine at an average cost of $191 per ton at the same time that the United States were building ships of poorer quality as the event shows, at $50 to $100 per ton more. At the same time, too, Great Britian was building at a cost equal to our own.

Mr. JACOBS: I understood that we were building in order to provide work for the unemployed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes in part, but that did not mean that we would pay more for the ships than they were worth. The provision of work for the unemployed was one of the reasons for the building of the ships, but I did not say it was the only one. I stated three main considerations, one of which was work for the unemployed, and I venture to say that had the unemployed factor been the only consideration, and we had not yielded to it, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and the exceedingly alert-minded member for Montreal (Mr. Rinfret), would have been at the head of a delegation to press upon us the need of the unemployed of their city.

Mr. MARLER: What other hon. member for Montreal did the leader of the Opposition refer to?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I referred to the hon. gentleman who first interrupted me, the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), but I have equal confidence that the tender heart of the member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Marler) would also have been moved. I have not a doubt of it.

Mr. JACOBS: May I suggest that they did not require my services inasmuch as Mr. Ballantyne was looking after Vickers and other large concerns.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, Mr. Ballantyne was looking after the workingmen, and the services of the hon. member were not required. But I say that if Mr. Ballantyne had failed in his duty the hon. member's services would have been enlisted and most willingly given—

Mr. JACOBS: As an opposition member—

Mr. MEIGHEN: —to get the ships built.

Mr. JACOBS: —I should have had a fine chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member did not show any opposition in 1919. The time he began to oppose the thing was after the whole programme was under way and nearly completed and when there was no danger on earth of anyone being thrown out of work by this opposition.

Mr. JACOBS: I was merely an observer at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I know that, and the hon. gentleman came into opposition at a time when there was no danger that his opposition could possibly cause anyone in his county to lose work. Nobody was going to leave a ship three-quarters built, and when the hon. gentleman began his opposition he was perfectly aware that it could endanger no one in his constituency. What was the reason of the laughter of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret)?

Mr. RINFRET: I always enjoy my hon. friend's speeches whether they convince me or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I admire the ingenuousness of the reply. Now what about the quality of the ships at the prices paid for them? I have read a speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who has become an expert on the subject of shipbuilding and the use of ships. I had lots of time and I read the speech; and one would gather from it that these were ships of a very poor quality. There was nothing that the hon. gentleman knew of which they could carry at all; at least I did not come across, anywhere in his speech, anything to indicate that he thought they were fit for any purpose whatever. And I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) this afternoon. Does anyone imagine that the government of this country put $70,000,000 into ships without getting at least the best opinion at its command as to the nature of the ships required? Does anyone suppose that the government did all this without having availed itself of the best inspectors to supervise the execution of the work and to pass upon the soundness of the design? If hon. members have any doubt and believe that there was carelessness in that regard, again I invite them to institute an inquiry, and I venture to say that they will find that no better ships were built by any country or any individual firm than the ships that were built by us, nor were there any ships more suited to the needs of the time.

Mr. JACOBS: What are they suited for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are suited for anything. What are they not suited for? We are told that they cannot carry package freight. Well, twenty of them were specially built to carry package freight. Of these, 18 have 'tween decks for the purpose, and 2 of them have three decks. They were built for package freight, and built by the best designers whom we knew anything about.

Mr. JACOBS: Can they carry cattle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were not fitted to carry cattle and they were not carrying cattle because there were no cattle to carry. But all they need is stanchions for the purpose, and they will carry cattle the same as any other ships. The hon. member, with his astute mind, must have noticed that in the quotations from the letters read by the Minister of Agriculture, that hon. gentleman always took great pains not to read the whole of any letter. He read little quotations to show that the ships were not fit to carry cattle, but on examination of the quotations it will be found that the letters referred to the smaller ships and the smaller ships only. There is nothing whatsoever in the quotations to indicate that the larger ships were being referred to. The smaller vessels are intended for the Newfoundland, the West Indian and the lake trade. They are fitted for that trade and have operated successfully. They are well fitted for coal and ordinary freight. But more; there has never been any evidence yet of any defect in the construction of a single one of the 65 ships.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some hon. member smiles. Will he tell me what the evidence is? There is not a tittle.

Mr. FORRESTER: One is at the bottom of the ocean.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and the insurance is collected. But that did not show any defect in this ship. The Titanic is at the bottom too, and the insurance is not collected. No, I say again, there has not been a tittle of evidence, nor a suggestion of any defect in construction of a single vessel. They are well constructed of the best material. I have heard men say, who ought to know, that there are no other vessels so well built as these. I go so far only as to say that there are no better vessels in the mercantile marine of any land. And again I invite that the statements I make be tested. I do not know any other way of convincing hon. gentlemen.

Mr. JACOBS: How many of these vessels have been wrecked?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One has sunk, one at the time of the last report I read had been rammed. I am not certain that because a vessel is rammed by another it is an evidence of faulty construction. Beyond that I do not know of any of these vessels having been wrecked. But the best ships on earth may be so lost. Ships do not control the weather, nor the rocks, nor the meanderings of other vessels.

Mr. RINFRET: Neither do governments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor do private companies. So that seems to be the close of that incident.

Mr. FORKE: I should like to make a suggestion, if I may interrupt the right hon. gentleman. I know that the members in this quarter of the House are very, very anxious to get the fullest information about these ships. When I was in Montreal last summer there were no ships idle in the harbour but three or four of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. What is the reason for their idleness? I hope the right hon. leader of the Opposition will understand that I am not finding fault, I am not blaming anyone in this connection. Indeed, I do not think there is really any severe criticism of our Government Merchant Marine. What we really want is information, because it does seem lamentable that we should own millions of dollars worth of ships that we cannot do anything with. I mention this so the right hon. gentleman may know the feeling in this part of the House in regard to this subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I find that the hardest question to answer. I was in Montreal, too, a little while ago and saw three or four of our government ships idle, while ships of the same kind, as I was told by men who know, were busily engaged. I am afraid I must express the fear that there is lack of sympathy in the management of these ships, lack of a desire to make them a success. It may be a fact—and I do not feel in a position to argue to the contrary at the present time—that the purpose for which these ships were built immediately having been served, it might be the part of wisdom to dispose of some of them. That would apply, I fancy, if it applies at all—I do not admit that it does apply at all—to the smaller vessels and it would be no reflection on the wisdom of the original policy. In my judgment it could not apply in any way whatever to the larger vessels. It is true that these vessels could be bought to-day for a much smaller sum, but $191 a ton was low relative to the cost of construction of other ships at the time these were built. The Americans built wooden ships at a cost of $200 a ton at the same time as compared with our cost of $191 a ton for steel ships. We were importuned to build wooden ships too. Many were the errors that were avoided, and that was one.

Mr. DUFF: If my right hon. friend will allow me—the government did build, or start, four wooden ships.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. A loan was made to a private company, and this was solely for unemployment purposes at Victoria. But those were not government ships.

Mr. DUFF: The government lost money by them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I think we did. In fact all money that went toward unemployment was lost money. I do not know any other way of attending to the unemployed except by losing money. Of course, there is a way of avoiding this loss, by throwing the unemployed overboard, leaving them to their own resources. But it was a question of helping the unemployed, and we thought that was an avenue through which some help could be given. The United States government built 226 vessels, and not one of those ever got to sea.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those were wooden.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. But the hon. minister should remember that his next door neighbour to the present Minister of Finance urged the government at that time to build wooden ships, but we resisted his importunity. And his was not the only importunity; from every end of this country we were pressed to build wooden ships, and the main credit goes to the business judgment of the then Minister of Marine that we did not build any such ships. He was the piece de resistance against that policy.

Mr. JACOBS: Would they not have cost less?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They cost the American government more. I think they would have cost this government less, but in the light of subsequent circumstances they would have been worthless. Ships that the American government built of wood and concrete never got to sea either. The American government spent $700,000 per ship on these 226 wooden ships, that is, $160,000,000. They were junk when they were built. In a word, the American government spent more on those wooden ships twice over than the whole cost of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I am not sure that I can tell from memory just how many wooden and concrete ships they built, but a considerable number, and I know that those, too, were junk when built. The American government is to-day operating about two and a quarter million tonnage—a small part only of what they built. They built eleven million tonnage at a time when we were building three hundred thousand tonnage. My figures may be wrong.

Mr. DUFF: Three hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. That eleven million tonnage cost the American government $3,500,000,000, and on the portion they got rid of they lost colossal sums, and they are not over the liability yet, because they had to make contracts with the shipbuilding companies, and these will have to be arranged. On the small portion they operate of two and a quarter million tonnage their loss, irrespective of interest on cost and of depreciation, is $50,000,000 per annum. The total loss to the American government now on the ships they built amounts to $20,000,000 per month, or $240,000,000 per year.

Mr. JACOBS: Have they not advertised them for sale?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they have sold the wooden ships for junk. But the American government have not the same reason for a mercantile marine that we have. They have no national system of railways to operate in competition with a big privately owned system; they are in a wholly different position. They did not manage the construction of their mercantile marine as well as did the Canadian government, the scale of operations was far greater than ours and far more faulty, and, further, the use to which the ships were afterwards put could never at all be compared with the sound judgment of the course pursued in this country.

I was about to dwell for just a moment upon the effect which the possession of our National Railways should have on any argument on this question. Hon. gentlemen say: Get rid of the ships. Well, confidentially—if I may use the term in parliament—I am not very much afraid of the government selling the ships, I am not very much afraid of their selling the National Railways.

Mr. JACOBS: Who will take them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know there are men to-day who would take the National Railways infinitely more quickly than anyone would have been ready to take them when we were rescuing their component parts from bankruptcy in private hands. They have a system to-day that would attract capital from anywhere, and they know it. Hon. gentlemen smile. I know something about this subject. I had invitations even at the time we took these railways over, but I am not afraid of the government selling the system. There are hon. gentlemen in the government who can sense public opinion a little more accurately than that. The anti-government ownership campaign was made for campaign purposes, it was not made for practical business results when they were in power. And the same is true in large degree of the mercantile marine. They may sell some of the ships. While I do not feel disposed to say—because I do not pretend to be an expert on the quality and purpose of ships—that no sale would be justified, I say determinedly that anything like a wholesale disposal of our mercantile marine would be folly in the light of the position of this country to-day. I do not feel any fear that the government will commit this folly, notwithstanding all the importunities of perhaps some of their supporters and doubtless of other interested persons throughout this country.

How are we going to compete with the Canadian Pacific without a ship at all, when they are carrying trade to their system from every quarter of the world? Besides, we could not to-day have our trade treaty with the West Indies, which trade treaty is worth something, which trade treaty is not a detriment like some trade treaties which have been since. We have a preference to-day, not only better than we had before, but better than other countries have, with Jamaica, for example,—with whom we do considerable business—of 25 per cent. We could not continue that; we could not have had it—

Mr. JACOBS: Are we not subsidizing vessels to other parts of the world?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we are subsidizing the Royal Mail Steam Packet vessels at $400,000 a year, and if we get rid of our Canadian Forester and Canadian Fisher, which run down to the West Indies, we will subsidize a lot more. It simply means an extension of the subsidy policy. Why, all over the world to-day we have to subsidize. And still we are thinking of disposing of the ships we have—at least, we are talking about it; we are not thinking very seriously. Yes; we could not have had our trade treaty with the West Indies if we had not had these two freight vessels of, I think, 10,500 tons each, and with a capacity for 30 passengers on each, running down to these islands. One benefit we get from the vessels is the trade that results therefrom—we have had a lot more, and hon gentlemen know it—is this: We succeed in capturing a considerable share of the American lumber trade on the Pacific. Our vessels running from the Pacific coast to New Zealand and Australia have been a paying enterprise, and what is more, our others are not losing at the figure hon. gentlemen would like us to believe. There is a 4 per cent charge for depreciation here. I am assuming in what I say that the very best management is taking place, although I must admit there are consequences that I cannot harmonize with that assumption. We have a charge for depreciation of 4 per cent. Well, at 2½ per cent, out at interest—the same interest as that on which the computation is made in the statement—the whole capital cost would be disposed of in twenty-five years. That is an actuarial computation.

Mr. MARLER: The boats would not last that long.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They would not? Hon. members opposite are just through voting $400,000 to the Royal Mail Packet steamers that are from thirty to forty years old—an old type of vessels, nothing like the type of the ones we are discussing. And the hon. member says ours would not last 25 years. Why not?

Mr. MARLER: I say that a vessel twenty-five years old of this character is absolutely antiquated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Antiquated? How is it that vessels thirty-nine years old are not antiquated?

Mr. MARLER: Because vessels thirty-nine years old were purchased or built at a very much lower figure than these vessels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What difference does the figure make as to whether they are antiquated or not? The 2½ per cent applies on the whole cost.

Mr. MARLER: But 2½ per cent on a large cost is very much more than 2½ per cent on a comparatively small cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, but there is 4 per cent here on the total cost. The cost does not figure in the question when the 2½ per cent will run out.

Mr. MARLER: They are not earning 4 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not talking about earnings; I am talking about what sum in depreciation will take care of the whole capital cost.

Mr. MARLER: How are you going to write it off if you do not earn it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not talking about writing it off. The hon. gentleman has missed the point altogether.

Mr. MARLER: I do not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If 2½ per cent of the capital cost will take care of the whole capital cost in twenty-five years, then I say 2½ per cent is sufficient. The hon. member said they would not last twenty-five years, and he gave as a reason that they had cost so much.

Mr. MARLER: No, I did not give that as a reason.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is the reason he gave me.

Mr. MARLER: I said nothing of the kind. The question of their costing so much does not make them last a longer or a shorter time. What I said was this: The boats are not earning sufficient to write off what my right hon. friend says is sufficient for depreciation, 2½ per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not claim they were.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MARLER: How does the right hon. gentleman expect to write it off if the boats are not earning it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, there is 4 per cent written off now.

Mr. MARLER: That 4 per cent is a book-keeping entry, it is true.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I say 2½ per cent would be ample.

Mr. MARLER: So you would reduce simply the book-keeping entry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, in order that we may know what the loss is.

Mr. MARLER: I think the hon. gentleman is speaking very theoretically.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the book-keeping entry is theoretical if what I am saying is theoretical. What I am saying is that the loss shown is greater than the actual loss, for the reason that the 2½ per cent, instead of from 4 to 5—I think it is between 4 and 5—is a sufficient depreciation to take care of the whole capital cost in 25 years, and the vessels should last very much longer than that and still be of use.

Mr. DUFF: Will the right hon. gentleman allow a little explanation? He is 5 p.m. quite right in saying that 2½ per cent will take care of the first capital cost in thirty years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Twenty-five.

Mr. DUFF: But there are other reasons why depreciation must be set to rest. One reason is that ships can hardly ever be insured at their full value, and in case the company should lose some of them during the thirty years it is necessary to put a certain amount of money for depreciation to rest to take care of the difference between what the vessels are insured for and what they cost. That is one reason why it is necessary to put to rest for depreciation a larger amount than 2½ per cent or even 4 per cent. Then, there is another reason: It may be found necessary during the twenty-five years to spend a large amount of money for the repairing of boilers and engines or to make other extraordinary expenditures in connection with the ships.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I can see some force in the first; at least, I can not say that it is valueless as an argument. But in the second I cannot, because any cost of that kind is included in the annual charges.

Mr. DUFF: Not extraordinary expenditures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see why they would not. However, what I set out to show was that the figures are at least a very ample presentation of the present loss. And how absurd after all it is to be charging 5½ per cent interest against the war cost, especially of 45 ships that had to be built for the purposes of war. That is a charge against the war; that cannot be computed in the decision as to what our loss is and in giving us some idea whether or not we should proceed.

Then, I have another complaint to make: I do not believe we are getting the benefit of these ships that we ought to get. I never have very much faith in an enterprise that is being managed by those unsympathetic to it. Up to the time we got the Grand Trunk into the system there was some excuse for the Grand Trunk business going to an American line—the White Star line, but since then I do not know of any excuse; I would like to hear of one if there is any. We ought to be getting the business that is going to the White Star line for the Canadian Mercantile Marine, thereby adding not only to the returns of the mercantile marine but to the returns also of Canadian railways. Why should our business be going there? My information is—I hope I may be wrong; I hope a change has been made—that that business is not coming to us yet. If we had the business the White Star line had for the Grand Trunk and which we now ought to have for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, then there would be a very considerably improved showing, if not, indeed, a favourable showing in the total. I know of no reason why those who can manage a railway cannot manage a mercantile marine. I think the results of the last three years show that a railway can be managed by a business directorate even though it is owned by a country. What insuperable obstacle is there to prevent the managing of a mercantile marine when its management is necessarily associated with a railway?

Now, what I have said I have stated with a view to placing fairly before the committee the reasons that actuated the late government in the course it took, and in order that hon. members may have some idea of what we really have, instead of the idea they too easily get from some of the speeches made in this House, namely, that we really have nothing of value. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), said "Oh, they are too slow; they do not go fast enough." Well, the speed of these vessels varies from 11½ to 13, or at the lowest, 11. What I am saying is not something which I give merely on my own authority; the speed of every vessel was tested before we took it over. I do not know whether or not any of those assisting the minister at this hour can give the official records, but I know the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries can do it, because he has the records. The records run, for all the vessels except the two largest, the Forester and the Fisher, 11½ to 12; the Forester and the Fisher are 13. Now, what I say is this: If there is any just criticism it is that they are fast. Freight-owners do not want fast freight vessels because it takes too much in coal to operate them. Eight and a half and nine knots an hour is about what they want, and as a matter of fact though the vessels owned by the Canadian Mercantile Marine can run at eleven and a half to twelve knots and two of them at thirteen knots they do not actually do it for the reason that it is a more expensive operation; but the capacity of the vessel is there and it is utterly absurd, indeed, it is an injustice to this House, for the Minister of Agriculture to tell us that the vessels are of slow construction. They are fitted for all the purposes for which good vessels are fitted, and they are designed by the best designers that could be found. They are of British design and they are of a design, let me inform my hon. friend the member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride), that the British are now using in the construction of their vessels. Thirteen of them have cold storage facilities, and all of them are equipped with the telemotor for steering. A great many of them I think, or nearly all of the larger vessels, are oil burners and some combine oil and steam. They are modern in every particular in respect to construction, and they are of the design that is being used at this time. Of course if we could have foretold conditions, had we had some superior wisdom that nobody in the world has had, we might have made money by a sale which, however, I think would have necessitated new purchases later though at a smaller sum. Outside of that the course pursued has been wise having regard to all the circumstances of the period.

Mr. DUFF: Is it not a fact that the old directorate of which Mr. Hanna was the president decided to sell twenty-seven of these ships more than a year ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a fact that the old directorate recommended a sale of the smaller vessels, and they may have been right in so doing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I compliment the right hon. the leader of the Opposition on at last offering to the House some reasonable praise of these ships, and the policy of the government that built them. I am not going to commend that policy or defend it. I thought at the time that it was a foolish if not a wasteful one. Experience has shown that the policy was wasteful but has not yet definitely proved that it was foolish. It may be interesting to those of us who are looking on with the attitude of laymen rather than expert seamen to notice that most of the attacks on this policy come from hon. gentlemen on the side of the House that is not at all sympathetic towards public ownership. That is, perhaps, one of the most significant features of this debate. I would submit to the committee that if they look at the history and situation of the Canadian Pacific Railway there is hardly a gentleman who will contend that the great position it has reached in the world to-day could have been attained had it not expanded steadily in the direction of sea control. It is with great pride as Canadians that we look on the extraordinary expansion of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's business in the Orient, on the Pacific, in the South Seas, on the Atlantic, in fact everywhere ships go. I cherish the ambition that our own system will experience a similar expansion. I would like to see our business expand in corresponding degree with that of the Canadian Pacific, and I hope that in time it will even excel it.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has my hon. friend from Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), who expresses a certain amount of derision at that observation not got a similar ambition? I hope he has. The time may come, I hope it will, when the Canadian National lines will be in the ocean business an equal with the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. JACOBS: As a publicly-owned concern?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As a publicly-owned concern.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend is an optimist.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have faith in the people which perhaps my hon. friend has not. May I suggest also that there is rather an inconsistency between the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in defending a vote of $2,000,000 for the purchase of a hotel in Paris with a view to expanding the business of the Canadian National Railways in Europe and their present attitude in regard to the Canadian Mercantile Marine. They argued in favour of development of business in Europe with a view to its transfer to the Canadian National lines. That, perhaps, is not an immediate possibility but we hope it will be realized in the future and we expect that the Canadian National lines will expand with the development of that European trade.

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) yesterday delivered a speech which, to me at any rate, displayed moderation and a knowledge of the subject that was encouraging. I wish to congratulate the hon. member on his speech which is one of the best he has made in this House. But during his remarks he quoted from the Ottawa Journal, the Montreal Gazette, and another paper. The only remark I have to make with respect to these quotations is that they were all from papers that are violently opposed to national ownership. That also is significant.

Mr. DUFF: That is something in their favour.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That depends on the point of view. As for the quality of the ships themselves the leader of the Opposition has dealt very fully with that phase of the subject. But there is one little item in the press, that may be of interest to the members of this committee. It deals with the seaworthiness of one of our ships, the Canadian Fisher. It is very rarely that a vessel has to endure the buffeting of a gale of a type such as the Canadian Fisher had to endure and comes through safely. I think the hon. member for Lunenburg will agree with me that the vessels which come safely through that kind of experience are wooden sailing ships, and others of buoyant character. Now, the article I wish to quote appeared in the Montreal Gazette of October 3rd, 1922, and it is headed:

> Government ship in cyclonic gale.
> Canadian Fisher successfully weathered violent hurricane near Bermuda.

I simply wish to place this article on Hansard in order to indicate to those who have spoken so freely in condemnation of the utter uselessness of the ships of the Canadian Mercantile Marine that in reality they are very seaworthy. Now this is what the article says:

> Passengers who arrived in port on the Canadian Forester, of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, had exciting tales to tell of the cyclonic gale which swept over the Atlantic on Thursday, September 21, causing considerable damage in Bermuda. These passengers were on the Canadian Fisher, also of the C.G.M.M., which was caught at the edge of the vortex and was buffeted for eight hours in a wind which records taken on board the Mutive, the survey ship, indicated a maximum velocity of 103 miles an hour, with an average velocity of 98 miles an hour.

Mr. DUFF: On the edge of the cyclone?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On the edge of the vortex of a cyclone.

Mr. DUFF: Travelling at a velocity of 103 miles?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So the article reads. It says that the average velocity of the wind was 98 miles an hour. Does the hon. member question the statement?

Mr. DUFF: I do certainly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. member question the statement that a cyclone can have a velocity of 98 miles an hour?

Mr. DUFF: The centre of a cyclone will have that velocity but not the edge.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To resume the quotation:

The Canadian Fisher, Captain Fergus Ferguson, proved to be a stout ship and weathered the gale wonderfully well. All the boat covers were ripped free, while the canvas dodgers on the bridge were torn to pieces. One piece held on to a stanchion on Monkey Island and the force of the blow bent the upright. The heavy plate glass windows on the wings of the bridge were shattered into little pieces. Some damage was done to the Marconi house and the engine room telegraph on the poop deck was wrecked.

There were only two casualties, a fireman receiving a scalp wound after having been pitched against some fittings, while Mr. Stoddard, the second officer, was struck by the end of a broken signal halliard, which whipped across his face and left him a cut and a black eye.

The Fisher was near Bermuda when the cyclonic gale broke and Captain Ferguson swung around so as to give the ship plenty of sea room. The wind started out of the northeast and swung around the compass, the Fisher shouldering her way around with the wind. She was driven at full speed and made about a knot an hour, meanwhile being driven thirty miles sideways.

Calm Night Followed

The wind blew with indescribable fury, whipping heavy rain across the mountainous seas. It was an amazing revelation of the power of an angry sea. After the gale had blown over and while the sea was yet running high, the sun came out in the afternoon and was followed by a glorious starlit night.

The Fisher had been warned of the approach of the cyclonic gale by heavy seas and also by wireless. The barometer dropped very rapidly, falling to 28.10, which is a very low mark. The barometer rose as rapidly as it fell.

On arrival at Hamilton the passengers subscribed to a memorial to Captain Ferguson expressing appreciation of his seamanship, courage and resourcefulness, and also praising the actions of the other officers, the crew and more particularly the engine room staff.

And the crew, and more particularly the engine room—

Mr. DUFF: It does not say she used oil.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Regardless of what she used the feat performed by a steel built freight ship going through a cyclone of that character, close to land, with little or no sea room, having to drive seawards, and only able to make a knot an hour, while the force of the gale drove her thirty miles sideways, is a tribute to the seaworthiness of the vessel.

Mr. DUFF: These thirty-year-old ships of the Royal Mail Packet Company and ships of other lines have to contend with these hurricanes every trip they make.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That may be true, but it does not take away from the merit of this particular feat.

Mr. DUFF: Not at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On a previous occasion I cited the case of one of the Government Merchant Marine ships which on her maiden voyage made 13,000 miles with untried engines without a single breakdown. These are instances that have come to my attention that prove much that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has said on behalf of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. It was very encouraging to one who has hopes for the development of national ownership in this country that he should have so wholeheartedly expressed the opinion that these boats could carry anything, and after listening to the speeches of the right hon. member, I must say that my opinion coincides with his.

There has been considerable criticism of the size of the ships and the necessity of getting rid of the small boats, because they cannot make money. As a layman, it is very puzzling to find such conflicting evidence given, not only from all corners of the House, but from the press itself. I picked up a copy of the Boston News Bureau, a daily financial paper, of Monday, March 19, 1923, where, in an article headed "British Shipping Languishes" I find the following:

In some trades ships of about 9,000 tons are proving too big for the cargoes offering with boats of about half this size of more manageable proportions. Owners who recently have added larger sized ships to their fleets are in many cases regretting it.

Much that has been said by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) with regard to the expense of building these ships, the vast amount of money the taxpayers have had to pay and may have to pay in the future has truth, but the amount of this vote is unquestionably warranted. After all, can we not look at this question in the spirit, at any rate, of recognizing the disabilities that exist, accept the Merchant Marine as a war legacy, and then set to work to endeavour with sympathetic minds, with the best interests of the Canadian National at heart, to do what we can to improve the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and make it a paying part of our system? After all, we can hardly expect that line to pay on the original capital cost, but that is what some hon. members opposite appear to expect to-day.

Mr. DUFF: Is it not a fact that the statements for the last two years show conclusively that whether the ships cost $200 a ton or $100 a ton, they could not declare a dividend on their cost?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman tell us what line makes money now?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is exactly the question I had in mind. I am much obliged to the right hon. leader of the Opposition because the same thought was in my mind—what shipping line has made money in the last two years?

Mr. DUFF: Quite a few.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like the names of the lines similar in traffic and tonnage to this line which have made money. I doubt if the hon. member can cite a single instance. This, at any rate, is one point worth considering—how can we expect these lines to pay on the original capital cost? It is utterly out of the question, and cannot be done, considering the present conditions. May I say further that that point might be emphasized by adding that one cannot expect the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to pay as long as the vessels are being used simply as supplementaries to other lines, or other steamship services now in existence. The other day I read a despatch, I think it was from London, England, in which comment was made regarding the establishment of a new passenger service from Canada to the West Indies by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The article winds up by saying:

> It is to be hoped that the passenger line between Canada and the West Indies will be as great a success as the freight service they have established between the two countries in the past 18 months.

Another despatch from London, England, dealing with the fact that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are entering on west coast business, says:

> The policy of Canadian Government Merchant Marine throughout has been to supplement rather than to compete with existing service.

I would respectfully suggest to the committee and to the hon. member for Lunenburg that if we would transfer to the Merchant Marine the subsidies we are paying to the Royal Mail Packet Company in connection with the West India service, the Australian service and other service, the outlook for our marine would be much improved.

Mr. GRAHAM: When the Merchant Marine inaugurated the Australian services the subsidy lapsed, I think in 1921. It was $140,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I sincerely trust there will be no attempt made to renew the subsidy, and I am confident that may be one of the reasons why the Pacific service is showing a reasonable profit. One point that might be of interest to hon. members in this part of the House will be found in a despatch from Toronto on October 2, last, which reads:

> Six Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels which have been lying idle all summer in Goderich and Midland have now been ordered into commission by October 10, to handle grain from Fort William to Georgian Bay ports. Each vessel has a capacity of 100,000 bushels of grain. The crew for each boat will number twenty.

And so on. It is an interesting thing to us and has puzzled many members from the West why the Merchant Marine was not used in connection with the lake service. Everyone knows how the combines on the lakes raised the price for handling grain to a point that was out of all reason. Great use in my opinion could be made of our Canadian Government Merchant Marine to break the combine on the lakes, and if the government intends to bring in legislation in this regard I would suggest that at any rate it take its marine out of all combines, keep it out of rate combines and use it in order to break them.

It may be quite true there are several of these small boats that will not pay. If that be the case, if an investigation by the minister indicates they will not pay, by all means let us tie them up till we can sell them, but let us keep the boats as to which there is a reasonable hope that they will pay, and make use of them to the best advantage, and around these, as a nucleus, let us develop our great Canadian national fleet of the future. I think there is great hope in this service. I would not like to see it done away with, or sold or given away. There is too great an agitation at the present time for it, and as far as I am concerned I think we can support this vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: The question of public ownership of the Merchant Marine has come to us as the result of the war. I will not discuss how or why it came, but it is here. What are we going to do with it? I know some of my friends believe that we should dispose of the Merchant Marine to the highest bidder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member means the lowest bidder.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not think that. It is easier to say these things on the outside looking in than it is to do them on the inside looking out. First as to the stability of the ship, I have never heard any person question the stability of these ships that form the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Whether it was wise to build them or not, so far as I have been able to find out, they were built well. The United States constructed a large number of ships. I had the honour of being at the launching of some of them that never got any further than the bay in which they were launched. I refer to the wooden ships. The United States are in a great dilemma now with a large number of ships on their hands, with overhead charges piling up, with interest accumulating and no business for many of them. The head of the Shipping board, Albert D. Lasker, has made a report to the President that might be of interest. I will not read it, but I will give just a short synopsis of it. He recommends the formation, for the operation of 450 ships, of eighteen subsidiary companies with a central company to which these eighteen subsidiary companies will be responsible. That would, I think, be 25 ships to a company, if each company had the same number of ships. But the division is not made in that way, as I understand the matter; but rather the ships on each route will be managed by a company, and the 450 ships are thus divided. It is interesting to know that Mr. Lasker, at the conclusion of his report, advised the government of the United States that they should continue to keep in mind the ultimate destiny of the ships, and that was the return of them to private ownership. That may take many years, and the life of the ships may be pretty well exhausted before that time arrives. In the meantime, the United States is endeavouring to make these ships useful and self-sustaining so far as possible. This much must be remembered: Supposing we sold all the ships—and I am in favour of selling some of the smaller ones—that would reduce our annual interest charge, but it would not wipe it out; we would have an annual interest charge to all eternity on the amount of our loss. So, as regards that, selling these ships would not rid us of that annual expenditure.

A question was raised by my hon. friend as to the speed of the larger ships. It is true that in tests they did run up to 13½ knots an hour, but no ship can well be run in fair weather and bad weather up to its full test, because that would be very expensive. For instance, as regards a locomotive on one of our express or freight trains, sometimes a difference of ten miles an hour in speed will nearly double the consumption of coal. There is a limit to which a locomotive or a boiler can be driven; if you go beyond that limit, you increase the cost very much more materially than by pushing it up to a certain point. But the average rate of the vessels in fair weather and bad weather is from 10 to 11½ knots an hour. 11½ knots, I think, being the speed of the two larger vessels. Freight shippers contend that for perishable goods that speed is not sufficient, but that the ships should have a speed of several knots an hour more than that in order to carry perishable goods across the ocean. Whether that be true or not, I am not an expert and I cannot say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would depend on whether they have cold storage or not. Twenty of ours have cold storage.

Mr. DUFF: Every man wants to get his goods to the market as soon as possible.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is one of the questions raised. As to the arrangement with the White Star and the Cunard lines, I must say in reply to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that I did not find anything but sympathetic feeling towards the Merchant Marine except for the smaller boats. In fact, Sir Henry Thornton and every one of the directors with whom I have conversed are strongly of opinion that we ought to keep the larger boats and sell the smaller ones, and they are very sympathetic in the belief that the larger boats are very useful. I think, before the Grand Trunk came into the organization, the Canadian Northern had a working arrangement with the Cunard line. Now they have the Cunard and the White Star. The committee can readily understand that the Canadian National is endeavouring to get its share of immigration, that is, passenger business. Our ships up to date are not prepared to carry passengers to any great extent, and in order to get a share of our immigration traffic, arrangements must be made with some lines of steamships that are capable of carrying that immigration and that carry both freight and passengers. I am strongly of the view that if the Merchant Marine is to be useful, its greatest use, perhaps, will eventually be in connection with the Canadian National line. I do not want to tell tales out of school, but I might intimate to the members of the committee that the returns from some of the routes are looking much better this year up to date than last year. It is true that last year was a fairly disastrous year for shipping, and many of the larger companies lost money. I will not give any details, but I am informed that some companies that we imagine are making large amounts of money on certain routes, last year lost very large amounts of money on those routes. My idea is this—and I think it is the idea of the government; my hon. friend wanted me to state it—that the question of government ownership and going into government ownership is one thing, and the question of doing the best you can with it is another. I am not going to discuss the question of public ownership. We have public ownership, but we want to do the best thing for the people of Canada with it. Unquestionably the small ships are very staunch ships, but on the Great Lakes this is what they have to compete with. To do any business on the lakes they have to be specialized, as I understand the matter. The lake trade is ore, coal and grain, and if these vessels cannot carry grain on the lakes, with prospects of getting some return cargo, we cannot get a cheap rate. Take one of these vessels of ours on the lakes, staunch though it may be, a good ship for its size; admitting all that, it cannot to my mind possibly compete in the grain carrying trade with a ship of the whale-back kind. Such a ship is specially constructed with its machinery in the stern with practically the entire remainder of the ship open for cargo space.

Mr. DUFF: It carries five times the cargo.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, and it is loaded or unloaded twice as easily. One can readily see that in order to get the best results, we cannot, with a small ship, compete with that class of vessel. For package freight I think our smaller vessels are well adapted, and for coasting trade, for instance on some of the routes in the Old Land that were named by my hon. friend, I believe these smaller ships would be specially adapted. I hope for possibly that particular route for which they would be specially adapted, a fair offer may be made for the smaller boats. This question was put to me the other day at one of the elevators. It is nothing against those smaller boats except for that particular grain carrying trade. One of our own elevators at Port Colborne suggested that they should be allowed to charge the smaller vessels an extra rate for unloading. We asked why. To me it was rather peculiar that a government elevator should charge the government boats more for unloading. They proved to me conclusively that in the case of the larger boats they could unload twice as quickly as they could in that of the smaller boats, being able to use both derricks. I do not wish to go into further details. We want to do the best we can in regard to the suggestion made by the preceding board and the present one that we should, if possible, dispose of the smaller ships and in the meantime put to the greatest advantage the larger ships that we have.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I agree largely with what the minister says, but I wish to protest against the attitude of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), not because of his antagonism to the National Railways, but because of his attempt to discredit the railways owing to some reputed failure in connection with the boats built by the government of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: No; the two things are altogether separate.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They undoubtedly are separate, but an attempt is being made to associate them in an effort to damage the National Railways. If it can be shown that these ships have failed it is believed that the National Railways, in conjunction with which the marine is being operated, will be discredited in consequence. So far as I can see the idea is gaining ground rapidly in Canada that the acquisition of these railways was a splendid thing, and I think that the ships that are necessary to handle traffic in connection with the railways should be maintained. Shipping is complementary to railways in the transportation system, and I hope that the pledge the government gave some time ago that they would give the National Railways a fair trial will be comprehensive enough to include an equally fair trial of the boats which we have paid so much to secure and which are now in our possession. Some of these boats, I have no doubt, can be successfully operated and they would help to solve the transportation problem. I believe the government would be amply justified in carrying out a fair policy in this respect even if it did cost a little, because, from now on, the National Railways, I am convinced, will prove a valuable asset to this country. If these ships can be operated successfully—and I do not see why they should not be—they will constitute an important adjunct of the National Railway system, and we shall see that we made no mistake whatever in nationalizing our railways. I am quite confident that from now on the returns from these railways will surprise the people of Canada. As I said not long ago in this House, the greatest railway system in the world to-day is owned by the people of Canada, who are its only shareholders. And in the United States there is no salvation for the great American roads unless the government of that country comes to their relief. Those railways cannot finance themselves to-day; they cannot get the money. Everything considered, therefore, I think we have every reason to congratulate ourselves on our National Railways; and so far as the ships are concerned, I wish to tell the hon. member for Lunenburg that they are not tramps. I was more than surprised last night to hear the hon. gentleman refer to them as ships of poor quality, tramp ships, of which he was ashamed. I am glad the testimony has come out to-day that they are not tramps, which is not a proper term to use in reference to them.

Mr. FORKE: The term is all right as applied to steamers.

Mr. DUFF: What would you call them?

Mr. GERMAN: The hon. gentleman will understand that a tramp ship is not necessarily a poor ship.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I know quite well what a tramp ship is. The point has been made that if the ships were really properly organized under a company they could handle the business better. A tramp ship is supposed to go around from place to place looking for cargo wherever it can find it, and when reference is made to our ships as being tramps I take it that that sense is implied. And that is what I object to. Now, I repeat that we have not an inferior class of ships for the money that we paid for them. The United States have a large number of poor ships on their hands, and the man in charge of their marine has recommended a national policy in connection with them. We are not going to sell our ships as mere junk. Let us keep them until we can find reasonable employment for them. It has gone out now that the government is prepared to receive proposals for the smaller ships, and I believe that if we keep the larger vessels and really make an effort to get work for them we shall find the Canadian flag in various parts of the world.

Mr. DUFF: In a statement which the minister made last night he said that there was a loss on operation of the vessels for the first three months of 1923 of $457,770.13. A statement was issued by Sir Henry Thornton for the period up to December 31, 1922, showing certain items. I have not got that statement by me, but perhaps the minister can find it. However, I have my own notes. In the consolidated statement, the profit and loss account, the minister will find certain figures. One has reference to accounts receivable, amounting to $840,063.91. That could only mean the amount for freights owing to the different ships in commission. On the liability side there is an amount, balance of uncompleted voyages, of $346,159.63, which can only mean, if I am right, the probable expenses in connection with these vessels. If that is correct, then these two items in the statement show a profit of $493,904.28. I want to have an explanation of that. The minister says there is a deficit in the three months' operation of some $457,000, but if these two items are correct, then apparently there is a profit of $493,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: In these accounts some of the amounts receivable may be in the banks on the other side of the water. The losses to which my hon. friend refers are from January 1, to March 31, of this year. The others were for last year.

Mr. DUFF: That cannot be right because it says, "Balance on uncompleted voyages."

Mr. GRAHAM: That is for last year.

Mr. DUFF: But the ships were still on the voyages and would complete them this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is completed voyages.

Mr. DUFF: There is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that is the cost of the uncompleted voyages.

Mr. DUFF: Which would be completed in the three months of this year?

Mr. GRAHAM: That might be accurate. It would only be an estimate, I suppose, of the actual cost of the uncompleted voyages.

Mr. DUFF: Very good. Then what is the $840,000 for accounts receivable? Is that for uncompleted voyages or for voyages which have been completed and freights which have not been remitted?

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine it would be largely freights unremitted from some other companies. It might be interchange of freight, due maybe from the Canadian National Railways or some other lines. But it would be bills receivable generally speaking.

Mr. DUFF: Would not some of it apply to these uncompleted voyages?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think not.

Mr. DUFF: Then these vessels on the uncompleted voyages would have no freight to go against the $840,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say that.

Mr. DUFF: There is another matter I would like cleared up. I find that last night the minister spoke about the $500,000 paid in interest coming out of the surplus of $1,000,000 shown on December 31st, 1920. Will the minister state if he has some further information in regard to this?

Mr. GRAHAM: I find I was too modest. There was a difference last night in regard to $1,000,000, if I remember correctly, out of which I said I understood $500,000 had been paid in interest. Whenever there are any surplus earnings from these boats they pay interest on the notes the government holds against the companies. Now, that whole $1,000,000 was paid in interest.

Mr. DUFF: When?

Mr. GRAHAM: As per statement on page 17 of the annual report for 1922. So the whole $1,000,000 we were discussing last night was returned in interest on notes held by the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is by boats that were paying?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to say a word with regard to the reason given by the minister for handing over to the White Star line Canadian National freight. He intimated that the Canadian National Railway Company was anxious to get part of the immigration business. My comment is that I do not think passenger traffic is of very much value to a railway. It is true it is better to have the maximum number of passengers for the trains you are running; but this is not the paying traffic of a railway, it is the freight that makes a railway go. So I do not see on that basis why we should be catering particularly for passenger traffic at the expense of freight. But the case doubly deserves consideration when we have a Mercantile Marine too. We want passenger traffic for it, whatever it may be. Passenger traffic I think pays on the water, but it does not pay on the land. Consequently we want all the traffic we can get for our Mercantile Marine. I cannot subscribe to the theory that we ought to be giving our Canadian National freight to the White Star line in order that we may get a few immigrants off their boats. I suggest to the minister that he get all the freight he can for his own line, and by so doing he will get all the passengers he can for his ocean lines.

Mr. DUFF: There is another question I would ask. The $1,700,000 does not appear in the 1922 statement. When was this passed over by the government to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be passed over, I think, in November. I am only speaking from memory. There was a $1,000,000 expenditure by Governor General's warrant, and then $700,000 was added in the estimate that went through but a few days ago. I imagine that the two sums were to pay accrued indebtedness for the past year.

Mr. DUFF: The money was paid over then before December 31st, 1922, when the last statement was made up?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not all of it. The million dollars would be, but the seven hundred thousand dollars only went through the House the other night.

Mr. DUFF: That has not been paid?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say, I do not know.

Mr. DUFF: It was not paid in 1922?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. DUFF: I notice by the statement they only account for something over $4,000,000 paid by the government to the Merchant Marine. We voted $4,200,000 last session and $1,000,000 by Governor General's warrant, but the statement only shows, $4,750,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might not have been paid over before December 31st. It was late in the autumn when it was passed. Of course, it was to pay accounts for that year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As representing a western constituency, I wish to emphasize that this is not a matter merely of eastern or local importance. It should be clearly understood, it seems to me, that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is an essential part of the great transportation system of which the Canadian National Railways form the main portion. Two questions have arisen in the course of this debate, one as to the suitability of the boats. While that has been emphasized by some hon. members, I do not think it has been made clear that these boats are not suitable for the trade, or could not readily be adapted for it. But we have had put forward frankly as the major contention, the fundamental opposition on the part of some members to government or national ownership. I for one was very glad to hear the minister state that the government intended to give the Canadian Government Merchant Marine a fair trial.

I should like to say that in visiting some of these boats and talking with the officers and men I was struck by the fact that already there is developing a very great loyalty on the part both of the officers and crews towards the Canadian government service. Further than that, some of the men who know the shipping history in the provinces down by the sea have urged upon me that we should preserve our Government Merchant Marine as a safeguard against the shipping trust—shall I call it?—which has grown up on the Atlantic seaboard. They say that some years ago a great many Canadian seamen were practically driven from Canadian waters because of the encouragement given to other boats, ordinarily called "Norwegian" boats, which were then introduced. Later the same group who had assisted the Norwegians became interested in steel, coal and other industrial concerns and were given special consideration at the expense of Canadian seamen. Still later, oriental crews were employed in the coastwise trade. It also should be pointed out particularly that some of these same big interests are today operating on the Great Lakes, as has been revealed in the reports of the commission investigating those matters. It would appear that if we are to prevent a monopoly of the financial and industrial interests which might very readily control the shipping both on the lakes and on the ocean, we shall have to own and control our own ships. We need, of course, in addition, a great deal more in the way of inspection, and also the services of some commission which will deal with the whole question of freight rates. There may be, as pointed out, the advisability of getting rid of some of these ships. Undoubtedly we ought to mark their present values down to present market prices. Some hon. members tell us that these ships are of very little use, and that they would have to be sold for very little. I suggest they be marked down to the fair market value of to-day, and then we can treat with the profit and loss on that basis, not on the basis of any inflated or fictitious war value. These are details of administration but I should urge that we would do nothing whatever to impair the present service or make it difficult to carry out the underlying principle of government ownership and control.

Mr. DUFF: Is it a fact that Sir Henry Thornton, who is president of Canadian Mercantile Marine, Limited, is also a director of Canada Steamships, Limited?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes: The Grand Trunk system has been represented on that board for some years; there are traffic arrangements between them. Sir Henry Thornton holds no stock in Canada Steamships Limited and has no interest in that concern except to the extent of seeing that we get our full share of the lake traffic. Mr. Dalrymple, I think, had represented the Grand Trunk on that board, and Mr. Hanna himself the Canadian National. Upon the two being amalgamated they asked the president to go on the board. It is immaterial whether he is on or not; one of the other directors would do just as well. As I say, Sir Henry Thornton has no interest whatever in Canada Steamships except to see that the Canadian National gets its share of the business.

Mr. DUFF: We cannot expect lower freight rates if Sir Henry Thornton is a director of Canada Steamships Limited. I say it is a mistake for him to be a director of that line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two years ago it was much worse than a mistake; it was a "crime."

Mr. DUFF: A crime, then. I am still willing to call it a crime.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can remember that the hon. member for Lunenburg was at that time even more emphatic on the subject than his leader was. There were assertions about an "interlocking directorate—"

Mr. DUFF: All right; I have not changed my views in that respect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice that. "Interlocking directorates"; "inter-related business," "superorganization,"—all these things were the curse of the country and the outstanding instance was the presence of Mr. Hanna on the board of Canada Steamships Limited.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has any effort been made by the government to prevent the Canadian Government Merchant Marine from going into the areas covered by these steamship lines? It is repeatedly emphasized in this debate that the Canadian Government Mercantile Marine should be used in an effort to break up these combines. We have undisputed evidence at the present time that there is a combine which is helping to raise the rates. I had some extracts to read on this point, but it is a little late now. If the vote is held over till after recess I might deal with them.

Mr. GRAHAM: That matter will be discussed when a report from the committee of the House is presented; it is not discussable at this stage, or I would have dealt with it during the consideration of these items.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to unduly detain the committee as I understand the minister is anxious to get away and I think he has been very patient throughout this discussion. But I wish to enter my protest against the proposed sale of twenty-seven ships of the Canadian Mercantile Marine. I have had twenty-five years' experience as a harbour commissioner and solicitor for vessel owners in the district from which I come and I wish to say that if the National Railway system is ever to become a success it must have lake and ocean services. One of the main reasons why the Canadian Pacific Railway has been such a striking success is because it has vessels engaged in the ocean and lake service as feeders. It is now proposed to sell these twenty-seven ships. Why do the management not sell their hotel and railway services also? If they are going to get rid of one agency for the building up of their business, why not dispose of them all? For my part I would not sell a tug, or a scow, or a dredge on the strength of the information that has been placed before the committee during this debate. I will go further and say that I do not believe the proposed sale commends itself to the wisdom and judgment of the country. The people who are concerned in shipments on the Great Lakes to-day want competition. A commission has conducted an inquiry into lake freight rates and practically before its report has been brought down, certainly before it has ever been considered by the House, and after the commission has taken considerable evidence, the recommendation is made that these twenty-seven ships be sold. These vessels were not built altogether for use to-day; they were intended to meet the needs of the future. I do not know of any other country in the world that is proposing to dispose of the ships in its possession in the manner that is contemplated here. Of what avail is the expenditure which Canada has made on its inland harbours, its ocean ports, and its canals if, before we have actually established the necessary ocean and lake services that are so urgently required, we cripple one of the agencies necessary to bring about cheaper transportation? With all due respect to the gentlemen who compose the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Sir Henry Thornton is not a "cure all" for the transportation ills of this country, far from it, some of the things recommended by the management of the National Railways and Merchant Marine do not commend themselves to us on this side of the House. How is it that so many private people all over Canada and the United States want to buy these vessels? It is said that these ships cannot navigate the lakes. I would point out that nine of them were built at Collingwood, others at Port Arthur, and others again at Toronto, Midland and other places and they can do lake work on the Great Lakes. I wish to enter my emphatic protest against the proposed sale. I do so as the representative of an inland port which is spending twenty-six millions on harbour improvements.

As showing the need for improved transportation facilities on the lakes, I would point out that there is a Kirkwood shed in Toronto to-day twice the size of this chamber which is so full of freight that no more can be squeezed into it. The Kirkwood Company have illustrated with one vessel the success which can be made in operating on the lakes. They have applied to the government to be allowed to take over two or three more vessels, having demonstrated to the municipalities along the shore of lake Ontario that they can successfully manage lake shipping. I am very much surprised at the action of the government in recommending this sale. Stress has been laid upon the fact that these ships were built during the war and some ask why they were built at all. This is not relevant but they were built for war emergency, to add to shipping tonnage and help unemployment.

During the years 1916, 1917, and 1918 the unemployment conditions were such that the shipbuilding industry was a blessing to the large cities of Canada. That industry gave employment to twenty-six different classes of labour including ship carpenters, pattern makers, wheelwrights, engineers, skilled plate workers, and boiler makers. They were all skilled workers and the most of them consisted of returned soldiers. During their service at the front they were only paid $1.10 a day and on returning to Canada were badly in need of employment. That is one of the reasons why so many of these ships were built. I think the difficulty in the way of the successful operation of these ships would be overcome if the government would engage the services of practical marine men. The whole of the vessels in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine could then be re-routed in such a way as to give results that would not only pay the fixed charges but leave a handsome profit.

It has been said that public ownership is responsible for the situation in which we find ourselves in this matter. That is not the case. If these ships were re-routed in the coasting and lake trade, put to other uses and given a fair trial, it would be seen after the lapse of two or three years what a great success would be achieved. The Canadian Pacific Company has for years had an admirably managed and most successful service on the ocean and on the upper lakes. The Canada Steamship Company has also been operating a lake passenger and freight service. The operation of its ships in the Niagara district and on the St. Lawrence has been a success. Unfortunately this company has frozen out competitors on a number of routes, for example, on the north shore of lake Ontario between Toronto and Belleville. Having freed themselves from competition they can charge whatever they like in the way of passenger and freight rates. The vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine offered us the prospect of relief from these excessive charges but the action of the government seems likely to prevent its realization.

I do not wish to occupy an undue amount of time—I think the House has sat far too long; I would not complain if prorogation were taking place to-night—the federal Australian parliament can do its work in ten weeks, so should we—but I would direct attention to page 51 of the report on lake freight rates wherein it is set forth that a monopoly exists, that there is no competition at the present time, and that conditions are not what they should be. The lake ports are congested, and there is no regulation of the rates on grain, iron ore, coal and package freight. The more I study this problem the more I am convinced that a mistake has been made in regard to the disposition of these ships. I repeat, they were not built simply for the purposes of to-day. What was contemplated was to provide for the needs of the future and if we part with these vessels now we will be making a terrible mistake. No other country in the world is taking such a step as that. Great Britain was wise enough to foresee the possibilities that underlay the combination of coal and steel, and the great part transportation facilities would play in their development.

The greatest industrial expansion of England did not come from Cobdenism and free trade, but from the union of steel and coal. The great British navy started and as a merchant marine fleet. Seventy-five years ago men of war were added to it. There were no dreadnoughts in those days. Drake, Frobisher and Hawkins were men of the merchant marine, and they went out to the seven seas of the world and made England the great maritime country it is to-day. The Americans have taken a leaf out of their book. They had a conference in Washington. Did they adhere to the terms of the conference? No. Have all the war plants been reduced to a peace standing? No. I know that many of the shipbuilding plants have been busy lately constructing ships on the Atlantic seaboard—war plants turned into peace plants and building ships for their merchant marine. You will see they are busy building ships by private contract for private owners and also building some for the government. Very shortly the United States will go out to the seven seas of the world, and they are going out to the seven seas to get the balance of trade; they will catch up with England's merchant marine, surpass her and will they hope become the mistress of the seas, so far as the merchant marine is concerned.

In conclusion, I do not agree with this recommendation. We have spent, I think, $900,000,000 in direct and indirect aid to the railways of Canada. The deficits were last night placed by the minister at about $6,000,000 and all we are asked to vote to-night is $1,500,000. I think that all the money that requires to be voted here to-night is just sufficient to meet the actual out-of-pocket charges, because you do not require to vote depreciation and interest—on railways or the merchant fleet, which you own yourself. Therefore, I say the country can very well afford a million and a half this year to give the Merchant Marine another trial for two or three more years, not only on the ocean services but on the lake services. I believe if the government gives it a trial it will get an increased business; if the ships are re-routed, they will get not only the coasting trade, but the smaller vessels will get the business on the Great Lakes. There is a great opening for these freighters on the lakes. They can come down through lake Erie and lake Ontario, down the St. Lawrence and go out along the seaboard and also do a coasting trade. That was shown by the report laid before the government a year or two ago. Is it a proper thing to sell ships when the market is flooded and gutted? A large number of boats along the Hudson are offered for sale but the owners will not sell them just now because they hope to get a better price than that offered. At present the market is glutted and it is no time to make the sale which has been proposed. The Merchant Marine can be utilized to carry coal and can be converted into ships which will carry cattle to the Old Country, and other packet freight from the Maritime provinces to the head of the lakes including coal.

It has been said that the Merchant Marine representatives sat in at the meetings of the Atlantic Combine, and they have been criticized for it. Notwithstanding that, the head of the Canadian National Railways becomes a director of the great monopoly, the Canada Steamship Company. Sir Henry Thornton cannot serve two masters. He never should have become a director of this large shipping concern, the Canada Steamships Company, which froze out all the smaller companies carrying freight to Buffalo and Toronto from the head of the lakes. Yet the government allows one of its National Railway directors to become the head of this monopoly. It has been stated that he becomes such a director because the National Railways has an exchange of traffic with the Canada Steamship Company. It has an exchange of traffic with the Michigan Central, Lake Shore and Baltimore and Ohio. Is it right that Sir Henry Thornton should then also become a director of these three American railways as well? I believe it is wrong and that the people will not approve of it.

I wish to utter my protest against the proposal before the Chair to-night. I believe the time will come when we will see that it is a mistake. These ships were built for Canada, to give the National Railways a chance, and to act as feeders for them on the lakes and the ocean, in order to see what could be done in an economical way by assisting water-borne traffic to reduce the great freight charges which the people out West and throughout Canada are paying to-day.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I desire to call the attention of the minister to an inquiry that was made in the Senate and which reads:

> Upon what terms were the freighters T. J. Drummond and J. A. McKee leased to the Great Lakes Transportation Company for the season of 1923 as to the price to be paid for the use thereof and conditions (if any) as to price to be charged for carrying grain.

As I understand it, these are first-class freighters capable of carrying 100,000 bushels of grain, and they are at the present time actually engaged in that traffic. I would like the minister to state the terms upon which these freighters were leased to the Great Lakes Transportation Company, the length of the term, and all the other particulars. Will the minister state whether he considers it wise and proper that at this time, when it is alleged that there is a combination, these vessels should be in the employ of those who are alleged to be in the combine?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a very general practice to lease a ship at so much per day. I do not know what the rental is. We have a number of ships of our own on the Great Lakes fully equal to any demand that will be made upon us.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There are three other vessels the Kearsage, the Arthur Orr and the George Orr.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those vessels do not belong to the Merchant Marine.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved the second reading of Bill No. 205 to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 3—Disabilities in respect of which pensions claimed.

Mr. MARLER: I think perhaps a slight amendment would improve this section. The section says:

> Pensions shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability resulting from injury or disease or an aggravation thereof, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule A of this act.

That refers to disability pensions which are always payable to the man himself. I think if the words "or in respect of" were struck out of the first line, it would be an improvement. Likewise on page 2, at the bottom, I find the words—

And in respect of members of the forces who have died, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule B of this act, when the injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in disability or death in respect of which the application for pension is made was attributable to military service as such.

I think if the words—

In respect of which the application for pension is made —are struck out in that place, and also the same repetition in lines 5 and 6, the clause will be made clearer. I throw out this suggestion to the minister for what it is worth. I have studied the clause with some care.

Mr. CALDWELL: It looks as though it would cut out soldiers' dependents if you cut out the words "in respect of" in the first line of clause 3 (a). As proposed to be amended it would read:

Pension shall be awarded to members of the forces.

The expression "in respect of" would refer to pensions in respect of their dependents. I may be wrong, but that is my understanding.

Mr. MARLER: The pensions in schedule A are pensions payable to the men themselves, not payable to dependents at all. The pensions in schedule B, which is referred to in the following part of the same clause, are pensions payable to dependents. The only man who can receive a pension under schedule A of the act is the man himself.

Mr. BELAND: I beg to disagree with my hon. friend—I am sorry. Schedule A refers to the men themselves, but it also refers to:

Additional pensions for children for above ranks, first child, second child—

And so on. Children are dependents. That is why the words "in respect of" are in the clause.

Mr. CALDWELL: And the pensioner's wife and children are entitled to a certain proportion of the pension as well as the pensioner himself, and this would be cut out if those words were removed.

Mr. BELAND: That is correct.

Mr. LADNER: The first line of paragraph (c) of clause 3, subclause (1) reads:

An applicant shall not be deprived of pension.

He is only an applicant, and until he gets his pension, he cannot be deprived of it. Would it not be better to use the word "denied"? I think that would make the clause clearer. The remainder of the paragraph describes the obstacle that will not stand in his way to a pension.

Mr. BELAND: Of course we have the same purpose in view. Does my hon. friend believe, if we replace the words "deprived of" by the word "denied," that would make the clause clearer?

Mr. LADNER: Yes, and less capable of technical construction.

Mr. BELAND: I have no objection to the change in this case.

Mr. LADNER: I move that the words "deprived of" be struck out in the first line of clause 3, subclause (1) (c), and that the word "denied" be substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS: Clause 3 (b) "pre-enlistment disabilities," provides in the fifth line that:

No pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which at such time was wilfully concealed.

It seems to me, if any man has served in the theatre of war and has passed before the army officials and the doctors, the onus should not be on the man himself. I do not see that it is possible for any man to conceal wilfully some disability and pass before three or four doctors at least three times before he gets into the actual theatre of war. If such a condition did exist, if those doctors failed in their duty to find such a disability and the man actually worked in the theatre of war, the responsibility is not on the man himself, but on the doctors and officials who allowed him to pass.

Mr. POWER: What would the hon. gentleman do in the case of a man who went overseas with a glass eye and who did not inform the doctors that he had a glass eye? The doctors, perhaps, did not notice it, or if they did, they passed it over. Would the hon. member grant this man a pension for the loss of an eye if he returned in the same condition as when he went over?

Mr. LEWIS: If the army had any doctors who passed a man with a glass eye and who had no more insight into human nature the blame is upon the government.

Mr. POWER: Would the hon. gentleman give the soldier a pension?

Mr. LEWIS: Who is to prove that he had a glass eye before?

Mr. POWER: I am giving an extreme case. I know of the case of a man who had a glass eye and who went overseas. He is in perfect health, and he has the same glass eye as the one he went over with. I do not think he is entitled to a pension.

Mr. LEWIS: Is he claiming a pension under the disability clause?

Mr. POWER: Not at all.

Mr. LEWIS: Then the case settles itself.

Mr. LADNER: If we are at the end of section 3, I should like to submit to the committee an amendment to be inserted after section 3 as section 3A dealing with the question of attributability. In paragraph (a) of sub-clause (1) of clause 3 of this bill, we find the words:

> Was attributable to or was incurred during such military service.

There arises the very important question of what is commonly called "attributability." Around that has been built up by the Pension board a procedure in which frequently the onus of proof in such cases, as has been contended by many, is placed upon the applicant. That is, when you have a case of some doubt, like neurasthenia or tuberculosis or something of that kind, the applicant puts in an application, and although the Pension board say that there is no question of onus of proof, yet the experience of many, including my own, shows in fact that there is, according to the interpretation of the act by the Pension board. They say that, in their opinion, "attributability to service" does not exist. The same problem arose in Great Britain, and there they passed a special act this year. I have taken out the main section of that to add as clause 3A to this bill. It is of such importance that I think it is wise to read the proposed amendment carefully in full to the committee so that they will understand it. I propose to add as clause 3A:

> 3A. For the purpose of the Pension Act and amendments thereto and notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the provisions of the said act and amendment thereto, or any other act, where a member of the force who has left the naval, military or air force service is, or at any time after the date of his leaving that service has been found to be suffering from tuberculosis, neurasthenia, cancer, or any other disease or incapacity which could reasonably be attributed to war service, such member shall be deemed to be suffering from a disease attributable to, or aggravated by naval, military or air force service, as the case may be, unless or until it is shown that the tuberculosis or neurasthenia or cancer or other disease or incapacity was neither attributable to nor aggravated by, such service; and for the purpose of this provision, acceptance for such service shall be conclusive that at the time of joining such service the officer or man was not suffering from any such disease or incapacity.

That is practically the provision in the English act which seeks to overcome this difficulty. It will be seen that the applicant must first establish a reasonable case; he must first submit to the Board of Pension Commissioners a prima facie case. The applicant is in a somewhat awkward situation. A widow, for example, may not have available the evidence which the law would make a conclusive case. So that when it is shown that a man enlisted as A1, and apparently was in good physical condition when he went overseas, that he did service, and perhaps was given some hospital attention, and then returning was suddenly found to have tuberculosis, he could perhaps show a prima facie case. The effect of this amendment would be that unless the board could show by evidence or medical testimony that the applicant or the person suffering from any disease or incapacity did not have such disease or incapacity, proof of which must be established in order to comply with the provisions of the act, then the applicant must be entitled to the benefit of the doubt. I do not know whether I have made myself perfectly clear. However, let me state the matter again to put it beyond all possibility of misunderstanding. If it appears that the applicant has all the material facts in his favour, then it is to be presumed that he has a prima facie case. The board may show by medical testimony, or in any other manner consistent with the evidence in cases of this kind, that the applicant is not entitled to a pension because, perhaps, the disease or incapacity was not attributable to war service, or for a number of other reasons which would deprive him of his pension under the provisions of the act. I beg to move the amendment which I have read, a copy of which I am sending to the minister.

Mr. BELAND: I must read it a couple of times before I can say anything upon it; it is rather complicated.

Mr. CARROLL: Tubercular patients, I think, have given to the Pension board more worry than any other class of applicants; and when I say that I simply mean that their cases have been involved in so much medical technicality that, I am sorry to say, I do not think tubercular applicants have received that fair meed of justice which they deserved at the hands of their countrymen. I am afraid, however, that my hon. friend (Mr. Ladner) is going very far in his amendment. If he would just confine it to tubercular and cancerous patients, I would strongly support the amendment, but when he adds the words "or other disease or incapacity" it seems to me he is going far afield. My idea in rising now, though, is to ask the minister to inform the committee whether the amendments to the Pension Act are in any way loosening up in regard to tubercular patients. I understand that this is one of the very serious questions which the commission, whose report has been submitted, have had to deal with. I have not had time to read the amendments through, and the minister might enlighten the committee as to how tubercular patients are to be benefited under them to any greater extent than they were under the original act.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Hon. members have received a circular from the Dominion Alliance. Have they been consulted in reference to the drafting of the bill?

Mr. BELAND: Everybody has been consulted. In reply to my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) I might make a few observations in reference to the principle of the bill. I might have stated them before the Speaker left the chair, but I will repeat now what I said two or three days ago when the Pension estimates were under consideration. When the original act was passed, what is known as the "insurance principle" was embodied in it. The insurance principle means that a man who served between the declaration of war and the declaration of peace will be pensioned for any disability which has been incurred by him during his service, whether such disability is or is not attributable to that service. It was, as Mr. Rowell said in the House when the bill was introduced in 1919, an insurance principle which was larger than the principle of any pension law of any other country in the world. I repeat, that clause 11 of the bill of 1919—which is the vital clause because it provides for the awarding of pensions—stipulates that a pension should be awarded for or in respect of any disability when such disability not only was attributable to service but had been incurred during service although not directly related thereto. Let me give the House an example. Two soldiers are in charge of a truck loaded with munitions on the way to the front to serve a battery. They stop the truck and one of the men jumps off, crosses the ditch, runs into an orchard, climbs a tree and picks some apples. Whilst doing so he falls and breaks a limb. This is a disability incurred on service but not attributable to service. The other man remaining on the truck has the misfortune to lose an arm and a leg through an enemy aeroplane bombing the truck and exploding the munitions. This man's disability is attributable to service as such. Hon. members will see the difference. In 1919, when the first Pension Act was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Rowell, it was stated that any disability incurred during service would be pensioned. This principle disappeared one year later by the amending act of 1920. I do not want to delay the House unduly, but I think this explanation will enable hon. members to understand the purpose of the present amendments.

When in 1919 Mr. Rowell was in charge of the legislation then introduced he was asked what it meant. In reply he said:

> Under the law as it now stands—

As he presented it.

> —our pension system is really an insurance.

Then Mr. Griesbach—now Senator Griesbach—asked him:

> Why introduce that element?
>
> Mr. Rowell: Our law as it stands is broader than the pension law in any other country, so far as we know. The insurance feature which I have mentioned is not in any other law, so far as I am aware. In that respect we give the soldier the benefit of insurance during the whole period of the war.
>
> Mr. Griesbach: That is the principle that underlies all pensions.
> Mr. Rowell: No. The principle underlying all pension is disability due to service. Under our pension law, if a soldier contracts disease under a purely normal condition having no relation at all to service, he becomes entitled to pension. It is really an insurance system.

The law was passed in that form, so that from September 1, 1919, to September 1 of the following year, when the law was amended as I shall point out in a few moments, the principle underlying the Pension Act was that any disability incurred during service was pensionable.

Let us come to one year later when the act was amended.

Mr. CALDWELL: What year was that?

Mr. BELAND: The year 1920. In that year old section 11 was repealed, and the following was substituted therefor:

> The commision shall award pensions to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule A of this act, and in respect of members of the forces who have died, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule B of this act, when the disability or death in respect of which the application for pension is made was attributable to military service.

The first act read:

> Was attributable to or was incurred or aggravated during military service.

When this was proposed to the Pension committee—of which I was a member—the representatives of the Pension board were asked whether this amendment would affect the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and the answer was, "No, the C.E.F. men are not going to be affected." In order to make my assertion clearer, let me read a few words from the evidence given before that committee by representatives of the Pension board. A question was asked Dr. Burgess—who is one of the medical advisers of the Pension board—as to what would be the effect of the amendment. His answer was:

> Prior to the late war pensions were paid for disabilities attributable to service—

Prior to the late war.

> That was amended for soldiers disabled in the present war, in order that pensions could be paid for disabilities whilst on service It is now the intention, I understand, to return to the previous stand, that is, that pensions should be paid for disabilities attributable to service.

He was asked:

> The point is raised that this constitutes a distinct breach of contract. The men enlisted on the understanding that if anything happened during the period of service the state would pension them.

Dr. Burgess answered:

> This will not affect late members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force injured during the war.

This makes it absolutely clear as to the intention at that time. Further, Mr. Arthurs, one of the present members of this House, said:

> That should be made abundantly clear.

The chairman, who was Mr. Cronyn, then a member of the House, answered:

> We agree to that, and it must be noted.

Further, Mr. Margeson, who was then one of the pension commissioners said:

> We are anxious to make this change because the permanent forces are brought under this act.

So it was made abundantly clear to the committee that as the Canadian Expeditionary Force at that time no longer existed, and as at the same time a certain number of soldiers were remaining under the colours as part of the permanent forces, pensions should be awarded to members of the permanent forces only when the disability or the death was attributable to military service.

Mr. CARROLL: Suppose a person who was in the Canadian Expeditionary Force did not make his application for pension until ten or eleven months after his discharge, say, in 1919, he would come under the act of 1921, and there would be a breach of contract, I would think, with that person. There have been very many complaints on that score.

[Mr. Beland.]

Mr. BELAND: I was coming to that. In 1919 the insurance principle was incorporated in the act. In 1920 the provision embodying that principle was struck out of the act and it was made clear that disability should be pensionable only when attributable to military service. But the statement was repeated in the committee of this House that that would apply only to men who remained on service in the permanent force; that the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force would not be affected in the slightest degree. That was in 1920. In the following year, 1921, the act was made a little bit narrower by the addition of the two words "as such" to clause 11, meaning that no pension could be awarded unless the disability or the death in respect to which the application was made was attributable to military service as such. Now, I must go back for a moment to the act of 1919, because there is a paragraph in section 11 with which we must be familiar if we are to understand clearly what has happened. The paragraph to which I refer is as follows:

> Provided, further, that when a member of the forces has suffered disability or death after the declaration of peace, no pension shall be paid unless such disability was incurred or aggravated or such death occurred, as the direct result of military service.

The following year this whole clause was wiped out and the clause to which I referred a moment ago was adopted by the House, on the understanding that only the members of the permanent force would be affected by the new clause 11, that so far as the men of the Canadian Expeditionary force were concerned they would be pensionable under clause 11 as adopted in 1919. The proclamation of peace took place on the thirty-first of August, 1921, and the Pension board thereupon proceeded to interpret the act as it had been amended in 1920 and 1921. In other words, we were face to face with a situation which was absolutely untenable, namely, that if a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force died five minutes before midnight on the thirty-first of August, 1921, his dependents were pensionable, because his death was the result of disability incurred on service but not attributable to service, whereas if he had the misfortune to die ten minutes later, five minutes after midnight, his dependents could not be pensioned, because he had died after the declaration of peace, though of the same disability incurred in the same manner. The Pension board then sent out a circular or a minute in which they informed all the medical advisers that in future pensions should be awarded in respect to disability or death only when such disability or death was attributable to military service as such. During the last months of 1921 this new principle was applied not only to members of the permanent force but to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and numerous complaints on that account came from returned men in all parts of the country. They were especially numerous and pronounced during the first months of the year 1922, culminating in the presentation of their case by representatives of the veterans in June of last year and the decision to appoint a royal commission to investigate these matters. Now the royal commission has held its investigation on that phase of the subject, and its report is to the effect that there has been a breach of contract with members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in regard to pensions; that it was made clear in 1920 that any amendment then passed was to be applied not to the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force but only to members of the permanent force, and the commissioners recommended that the act should be restored as it was in 1919. The purpose of this bill ,therefore, is to restore the insurance principle as embodied in the act introduced by Mr. Rowell and passed by the House in that year.

Now, how could we do this? We amend the interpretation clause; we say that the "war" means that period between the fourth day of August, 1914, and the thirty-first day of August, 1921, both days inclusive. Then we drafted a new clause 11. I say "we," because I did not myself undertake to draft the clause. I knew what the spirit of it should be, and I asked more than one experienced draftsman to draft it for me. I have submitted the redrafted clause to a number of eminent lawyers and they say it carries out the purpose the royal commission had in mind and the desires of the veterans generally, and that it fulfils the meaning of the act of 1919. We decided that clause 11 should be in two parts, subsection 1 and subsection 2, that subsection 1 should deal with men who had rendered service during the war and subsection 2 with men who had rendered service after the war. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the bill before them they will see that clause 3 reads in part as follows:

(11). (1) In respect of military service rendered during the war,—

If you read paragraph (a) from first to last you will see that it restores the insurance principle. It says:

(a) Pensions shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability resulting from injury or disease or an aggravation thereof, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule A of this act, and in respect of members of the forces who have died, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule B of this Act, when the disability resulting from injury or disease or the aggravation thereof in respect of which the application for pension is made or the injury or disease or the aggravation thereof resulting in the death in respect of which the application for pension is made, was attributable to or was incurred during such military service.

This is a complete restoration of the insurance principle as it existed in 1919. It is in the opinion of the royal commission, I believe it is in the opinion of the veterans generally, and, as far as I can judge, it carries out the purpose absolutely. Now, the second subsection says:

In respect of military service rendered after the war.

That is in respect of service rendered by men who remained in the force after the declaration of peace. I think that "force" must mean the permanent force, or perhaps some other body of men in the militia still serving although the war was over. Now in respect of these men it is said that—

Pensions shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability—

I will not read the whole clause—when the disability or death—

—was attributable to military service as such.

So, repeating myself and in order to make myself perfectly clear to hon. members, there are two classes of men: Men who served between the 4th August, 1914 and the 31st August, 1921, when the declaration of peace was made, for whom the insurance principle is restored, and a second class of men who served after the declaration of peace and who are still, I believe, in service but in regard to whom no pension shall be awarded unless the disability is attributable to military service as such. There are a number of subsections but these, of course, extend the principle.

Mr. MANION: I understand the minister to point out that there is really no change in the spirit of the act itself. This is simply clearing up the spirit of the act. Am I correct?

Mr. BELAND: That is right.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the minister a question? He has given a very clear and concise statement—

Mr. BELAND: I am not through yet.

Mr. LADNER: I beg your pardon.

Mr. BELAND: I am sorry but my hon. friend will have an opportunity of speaking again. The hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) wants to know whether, as far as tubercular cases are concerned, this bill will place them in a better position than they occupied under the act as it was before. I say, yes by all means and in this manner: Under the act of 1920, if interpreted according to the letter and not the spirit, and under the act of 1921 which is still narrower, an ex-soldier suffering from tuberculosis could not receive a pension unless that tuberculosis was attributable to his service as such, whilst now if tuberculosis was incurred during his service whether it is due to the service or not he may receive a pension.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I ask the minister a question to clear up a point which I think is not quite evident? Will the minister please look at the last few lines of paragraph (a). It says:

—the application for pension is made or the injury or disease or the aggravation thereof resulting in the death in respect of which the application for pension is made, was attributable to or was incurred during such military service.

Would the minister make it quite clear what is involved in the term "military service?" Does that mean "in the actual field of warfare" or does it mean "service in Canada, or service in England?" How does he explain the term there "during such military service?"

Mr. BELAND: I shall be pleased to explain to my hon. friend. One must read the whole of clause 11.

(1) In respect of military service rendered during the war.

So that paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) have reference to that first line in respect of military service rendered during the war. That means service rendered anywhere —in Canada, in England, in France, in Siberia or anywhere at all,—as long as the man was under the colours.

Mr. MANION: I understood the minister to answer me one way and I think he answered my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) another way. In other words, I understood him to answer my hon. friend that according to the law as it was if a man took consumption or any form of tuberculosis, not attributable to service but during service, he would not have a pension in the past. That is what I understood him to say.

Mr. BELAND: I do not say it was in the pension law, but under the interpretation of the act as it existed in 1920 and 1921, and since then, he was not entitled to a pension.

Mr. MANION: I wanted to make that clear. I certainly do not agree with the minister, at least that was not my understanding. My understanding was that any disability a man incurred during service has been pensioned right along.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, no.

Mr. CARROLL: If it is attributable.

Mr. BELAND: Oh no. There are 500 cases I am informed by the Pension board to-day.

Mr. IRVINE: I wanted to ask the minister if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) would not bring out the spirit of the act even more clearly than the original form would?

Mr. BELAND: I do not believe it would: I think it is too involved. I would not advise loading up section 11 as it has been drafted. It has been drafted carefully. It has been submitted to the royal commission and to the veterans, and they agree that as far as legislation goes this will meet the purpose. I do not say that no amendment can be made at all. I have just accepted one which appeared to me to make the meaning absolutely clearer; but I feel that the amendment my hon. friend has moved is not going to make things any easier in any way. That is my impression.

Mr. LADNER: I would like to ask the minister a question just on the point of the subject matter of our discussion, that is in connection with the attributable feature of the bill. The last two lines say "attributable to military service." Now, the minister has given a very clear statement of the history of the law, and undoubtedly he is to be commended for reverting to the insurance principle. But all that the minister has said about the insurance principle, to which it is proposed to return to-day under this bill, does not at all relate to the point of my amendment or the subject matter of the discussion which followed it and in which I endeavoured to place the matter clearly before the committee. What I am getting at is this: Supposing a person has developed tuberculosis two years after the war. Before that person could claim a pension he must establish attributability to the war because he may have got his disability under peace conditions after his discharge. In endeavouring to establish that his tuberculosis was attributable to the war he must produce certain evidence, the difficulties of which must be apparent to every member of the committee. The difficulty for the applicant in the past has been that when he has brought all the evidence possible before the Pension board it has then been of such a kind as not to conclusively establish his claim to the satisfaction of the board. The result has been that the board have in many cases misinterpreted the law in their own way. My idea is to change the law so as to prevent such an interpretation. The board has taken the stand "We are not satisfied that this is attributable to the war, because the statute makes the positive assertion that the claim cannot be considered until it is established that the ailment is attributable to the war." And the board says it is not attributable. The effect of my proposed amendment is that, if the applicant shows a case which could reasonably be attributed to war service, and a considerable doubt exists, then the board, with all their expert knowledge, must give the benefit of the doubt to the applicant, unless they can say, "We have evidence on our files, and have medical testimony, to show that, although you have established a reasonable case, we have gone one step further and we can show that your case is not sufficiently sound, and that the facts do not show that this tubercular affection was attributable to war service." I am not raising this point as a purely personal matter. Many people have spoken to me about it, and some associations are endeavouring to have this change made. What objection could there possibly be, if a person makes out a reasonable case before a commission, to give that person the benefit of the doubt, unless the board can show that it is not reasonable, and that the man is not entitled to have the pension? In that respect, the proposed amendments do not touch the case at all. They relate to a different subject matter, namely the insurance principle, to which the minister has addressed his remarks.

Mr. BELAND: Medically speaking, does my hon. friend contend that some diseases cannot be reasonably attributed to service?

Mr. LADNER: I understand that in a case of cancer or carcinoma, after about the three years' period, medical testimony shows that it cannot be reasonably attributed to military service. But if it arose within one year, then it could reasonably be attributed to such service. In such a case, if the applicant is afflicted with cancer within eight months or one year, and surrounding indications show that pains and so on existed prior to discharge, and while on military service, that would be a reasonable case, and should be allowed; unless the board can produce other testimony to show that, notwithstanding the reasonableness of the man's contention, there are stronger contentions to show that the cancer was not attributable to service.

Mr. BELAND: I am unable to see the difference which the hon. member refers to. First of all, during the first year, all men were treated by the department free of charge, and every case of disability that resulted during the first year, you might say after discharge from the service, has been treated and pensioned. Cancer may be attributed to service. I know of a case where cancer inside has been attributed to service, where a man has been kicked by a horse during his service and the cancer developed two years later. In that case the man was pensioned. Why? Because the traumatism that he had suffered at the time of his service might have been the cause of his present disability.

Mr. LADNER: I know of a case where, instead of being kicked by a horse, the person was injured in an aeroplane fall and developed a cancer, but the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment considered the case was one of appendicitis and treated him for it, until they opened him up and found that he had cancer. Then they operated on him and he died. It was established on sworn affidavit that the man had the fall from an aeroplane, that he was injured, and that he complained of pains in the area where cancer subsequently developed. There were three affidavits to that effect. Subsequently he died, and in that case there was a reasonable presumption, as we say in this case, that the trouble could reasonably be attributed to war service, The commission held the opinion notwithstanding, that the cancer was not attributable to war service. My point is that that applicant should have received that pension, unless the commission could show, medically, or by something more than inference or medical theory, that he should have been denied the pension.

Mr. BELAND: How would it serve the hon. member's purpose if he had his amendment in this case? How would the case be met by the amendment?

Mr. LOVETT: And did the cancer develop after he was discharged?

Mr. LADNER: We do not know that, because the doctors of the board treated him for appendicitis.

Mr. LOVETT: How long was that after he returned from the war?

Mr. LADNER: Before he was discharged.

Mr. BELAND: What prevented his friend from getting the pension? Was it the medical opinion?

Mr. LADNER: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: If this amendment were to pass, how would he get the pension?

Mr. LADNER: Because there was medical opinion on the other side and the applicant, under this section—

Mr. BELAND: Medicine is not an exact science.

Mr. LADNER: The applicant under this section would have had a case which could reasonably be attributed to war service, and prima facie the applicant would have a right to the pension and the board would then be obliged to produce other evidence to rebut the presumption of the right of the applicant to a pension. The tubercular cases are really more in point.

Mr. BELAND: In all sincerity, if the hon. member had been sitting on the board, would he have awarded a pension in this case?

Mr. LADNER: Most decidedly so.

Mr. BELAND: That is the reason why we provided for appeals.

Mr. LADNER: But the parliamentary committee rendered a decision against the decision of the board.

Mr. BELAND: That is exactly why we provide for appeal. It does not matter how you surround the law with amendment after amendment, which makes it so involved that not even a lawyer can see through it, if you have no appeal board or no appeal court you cannot give entire satisfaction. Perhaps this is a case that should be allowed. I will conceive it to be a case that should be allowed; surely in this case, if my hon. friend's contention is right, that appeal will be sustained. We are going to provide for appeal. Do not try to involve the act, because by such an amendment you might destroy the purpose of the section as it is framed, and it has been framed with the greatest of care. I assure the hon. member there is no intention to deceive anybody there, and certainly no intention to deceive the returned man, because this is the carrying out of the recommendations of the commission.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. MARLER: In making any remarks with respect to this amendment, I wish to recall to hon. members of this committee the remarks which I made last year when the report of the parliamentary committee on pensions and re-establishment was presented. I stated at that time, and I state again now, that in my opinion the country owes to every returned soldier the fullest and the best treatment which can possibly be given, compatible with the resources of the country; I think I used the words "the future welfare of the nation." I have not changed my mind in the very slightest degree since last year. I think that every returned man, and the dependent of every returned man who has died, should be given, not only a perfectly fair and equitable deal by this House and by the country, but in addition should be given the most generous treatment that can possibly be accorded him. On the other hand, I think you, Mr. Chairman, and all hon. members will admit that when any claim is made against the country, no matter from what source that claim may come, there should be a certain amount of substantiation, a certain amount of evidence adduced in support of that claim before the money of the people is paid out. That theory holds as regards returned men the same as regards any other citizens in Canada, excepting in this, that as regards returned men, any claim that they may have, direct or indirect, must and should be and, I am certain, is intended to be, treated with the utmost generosity in every particular.

The minister has explained to the committee to-night section 11 of the act. That section is the governing section of the whole act. He has explained the difference between the insurance principle and the "due to service" principle. He has told the committee that, under the act of 1919 the principle at that time was the insurance principle. Subsequently, in 1920, that principle was made the "due to service" principle. There was a very great distinction, and the distinction was this, that under the insurance principle any disability of any kind incurred on service, the slightest aggravation of any disability the soldier had was pensionable in full and his dependents also could have a pension. Under the "due to service" principle, the soldier had to show that the disability from which he was suffering was due to military service. That is now entirely wiped out and the insurance principle is returned to. Any disability from which a soldier may be suffering up to the 31st day of August, 1921, is pensionable, providing that it was incurred on service, or in any way attributable to service, or in any way aggravated during military service. Those words are very significant, and they are premising the remarks which I intend to make on the amendment which my hon. friend (Mr. Ladner) has brought forward to-night. I want the committee to bear in mind the date whereof I speak, namely the 31st August, 1921. The war ended substantially on the 11th November, 1918. The Canadian Expeditionary Force was disbanded—I am speaking from memory now and I should like to be corrected if I am wrong—if I mistake not, on the 31st December, 1920. All the soldiers were disbanded at that time; but notwithstanding that disbanding, the "incurred on service" principle, or the insurance principle is brought along to the 31st August, 1921. Any returned man or the dependent of any returned man has to show up to that date, many months after he took off the King's uniform, that the disability, no matter how slight, the aggravation, no matter how slight, is pensionable, not only for himself, but for all his dependents.

Now let me come to the point which my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) brings up. I quite understand his point, which is this. He says that the onus of proof should not be on the returned man; that it should be entirely either on the country, the Pension board, or whoever acts for the country.

Mr. LADNER: After a prima facie case has been established.

Mr. MARLER: I will read the amendment just in a moment. According to this, what has any returned man making a claim for pension to prove? He has to prove any illness, not necessarily an illness caused by a gunshot wound, not necessarily an illness which he might have suffered while he was overseas, but any illness at all which was incurred on service. If he has been damaged by reason of that illness incurred on service, even an ordinary illness which he might have had at home, he is pensionable, and if he dies as a result of that illness, his dependents are pensionable also.

Every man in the army has a medical history sheet. It is true that when men joined up in the army, their medical history sheets were not made out in the most careful manner; but while they were in the army, their medical history sheets were kept in a fairly accurate manner, and everything that occurred while a man was on service was entered on that medical history sheet. That is reasonable and proper proof as to the state of the man's health during his service. Then he left the service. Some men were discharged on what is known as the short form. The short form simply discharged the man as fit. The long form gave a history of the man's condition at discharge. When a man reported on discharge that he was not physically fit, the long form was used, and that obviated many difficulties. But many men reported on the short form, and it is of those that I wish to speak at the present time. When a man was discharged out of the army on the short form as fit, he may have become sick one year, two years, three years after the 31st August, 1921, the date of the declaration of peace, and his record during the war, his medical history sheet may or may not have been clean. If he becomes sick years after the war, he is pensionable provided that there is the slightest connection between his illness and the illness which occurred while he was on service. Mark this; this is not a question of a military illness, not a question of a wound which he might have received; but if he had a natural, ordinary illness on service and later on after discharge, notwithstanding the fact that he was discharged with a clean record, if there is any connection set up in any way between the last illness I speak of and the first illness, he is pensionable. That has been the practice.

I quite admit—and I am sure the hon. member who moved this amendment is actuated by the best possible motives—that some mistakes have been made in the past. But what does this bill bring down in that respect? This bill brings down the question which we will have an opportunity of discussing in a few moments of the boards of appeal. Some of us may have feelings on that subject; some may not think the boards of appeal, as proposed to be constituted, are correct; others may think they are correct. But there they are in the bill at the present time. Let me revert now to the position in which I was a few moments ago. That is to say, if a man falls sick after being discharged as fit, and he goes before the Board of Pension Commissioners, he has one examination. The board say: "No, you had a clean medical history sheet during your service. It is true you were not sick; it is true you are sick now. We can see no connection between your present illness and the illness which you suffered on service. Therefore we cannot pension you." That man says: "I will appeal to the district appeal board," and he does so.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the district review board can change the substance of law? My amendment relates to the substance of law. It is a different proposition. An appeal would not affect that.

Mr. MARLER: The district review board, as the act is constituted at the present time, can adjudicate, not only on questions of fact, but on questions of law.

Mr. LADNER: But as it will be constituted.

Mr. MARLER: As it will be constituted, it can adjudicate even on the question of the extent of the man's disability. It can adjudicate on anything it likes.

Mr. LADNER: But it cannot change the law.

Mr. MARLER: No, it cannot change the law, but it can get at the very point which the hon. member has in mind. It can say that the man's illness is attributable to, or was incurred on service. There is not the slightest doubt that the board can adjudicate on that point. That is one of the main points for which these boards are constituted, and indeed when we come to discuss that part of the act some of us will probably question whether that is not, in fact, the main function of the board, to adjudicate on the question whether the illness is attributable to service or not.

Now let me come to my hon. friend's amendment. I repeat that so long as we understand what this amendment means, so long as hon. members desire to accept it, so long as parliament as now constituted desires to take upon its shoulders the burden that the amendment may entail, I have nothing to say. All I desire to do is to suggest to this committee what the effect of the amendment is; and I am not speaking from the point of view of dollars and cents, because dollars and cents are not the most important consideration in a matter of this description. But the question is, will the amendment unnecessarily, unfairly, and without sufficient opportunity of proof itself, involve the country and give to claimants an advantage to which they are not entitled? What does the amendment say? It was read rather hurriedly, but that was no fault of my hon. friend; I think the hon. gentleman introduced the amendment in perfect good faith. It says:

> For the purpose of the Pension Act and amendments thereto, and notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the provisions of the said act and amendments thereto, or any other act,—

Please note these words:

> —where a member of the force who has left the naval, military or air force service is, or at any time after the date of his leaving that service has been found to be suffering from tuberculosis, neurasthenia, cancer, or any other disease or incapacity—

In other words, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian Expeditionary Force was discharged on the 31st December, 1920, notwithstanding the fact that the insurance principle in this act extends to August 31st, 1921, the amendment will make certain to any man at any time who has served in the war, whether he went overseas or not, or whether he got to a theatre of actual war or not, the absolute right to say that the illness from which he is now suffering is due to military service or was incurred while he was on service.

Mr. LADNER: Only if he can prove a reasonable case.

Mr. MARLER: That is not what the amendment says. If my hon. friend will allow me to read it I will discuss it with him later. I am only too glad to discuss the matter with him. The amendment continues:

> —which could reasonably be attributed to war service, such member shall be deemed to be suffering from a disease attributable to, or aggravated by naval, military or air force service, as the case may be, unless or until it is shown that the tuberculosis or neurasthenia or cancer or other disease or incapacity was neither attributable to, nor aggravated by, such service; and for the purpose of this provision, acceptance for such service shall be conclusive that at the time of joining such service the officer or man was not suffering from any such disease or incapacity.

Let hon. members fully understand, if they want to pass the amendment, that they will have to take the consequences of so doing. The last sentence of the amendment means that every man brought into the Canadian Expeditionary Force is eligible for a pension whether he got out of Canada or not, whether he reached England or not, or whether he reached any theatre of actual war or not. Such a man is eligible under this amendment, no matter at what time in his life he may contract the diseases mentioned therein, "or any other disease". An hon. gentleman mentions, and properly so, that a man might have been only a few weeks in the army, half an hour, perhaps, when he was discharged, and he would naturally be subject to this amendment. Let us take some cases that have actually happened, so that we shall not be talking mere theories. There were many men who enlisted in the army and who were very anxious to go overseas to serve their country. Thousands upon thousands of them did so and they deserve enormous credit. The fact is that they besought physicians who examined them to pass them for service and I know of many such cases in Montreal, which is no exception. There were such cases all over the Dominion, and some of my military friends in the House will probably confirm that statement. These men were taken on and to all intents and purposes they were perfectly well. As soon as they left a high altitude, as soon as they got to sea and reached England they contracted various ailments of one kind or another, which were not very serious. They were pensionable. There were other men who were discharged and sent back to Canada, never having served in any theatre of actual war; they were never near a theatre of war, and many of them never got overseas. But the amendment will cover men of that description. Now, I claim, in all sincerity, that the amendment is inadvisable, and I have no desire whatever to deprive ex-service men of their rights. On the contrary, I think they should be given everything that the country can give them. I will stand by that, as I have done before. But I do claim that under the act as now drafted, under section 11 and under the other clauses providing for courts of review and a federal board of appeal, the ex-service men are given every possible opportunity to prove their cases. Some hon. members may say—I do not say it myself—that at the present time these men perhaps are not getting what they should get. I think myself that as a matter of fact the Board of Pension Commissioners, except in isolated cases, do pension men to the best of their ability. But even if the men do not always get a fair hearing, you have boards of appeal. The act is so drawn that every man has an opportunity to show any reasonable connection between the disability from which he is suffering and the fact of his having enlisted. Is not that fair enough? Or are we going to take an amendment of this description, not knowing what it will entail?

Mr. MEWBURN: Mr. Chairman, a year ago when the minister's estimates were up I recommended that a commission should be appointed to inquire into the hundreds of vexatious cases that had arisen in the last few years in regard to the treatment of our returned men by the pension commissioners. My suggestion perhaps went a little further than what the minister proposes to-night, but I congratulate him on having appointed a royal commission, I congratulate the commission on the very able report they have submitted to the minister, and I am very glad indeed that he has introduced this bill. I have read it over carefully, and while there are other sections in the act in which many of us could suggest changes, I believe, taking it on the whole, that this bill is most commendable and meets a long-felt need. I am sure all of us could detail many cases that have come to our personal knowledge in which we consider that grave injustice has been dealt out to our returned men. I might instance one case which is probably typical of dozens. The man went overseas, served his country, developed pneumonia, was in hospital, came out before he should—which was probably his own fault—insisted on going back to service, and remained at the front to the end of the war. During the demobilization, as we all know, the feeling on the part of every officer, non-commissioned officer and man in the Canadian Expeditionary Force was to get out of the army and back to civil life as quickly as possible, and to accomplish this they exercised their ingenuity to the fullest extent to secure their discharge papers and left the service as class A men, whereas if they had been medically examined they would not have been so classified. The particular man whose case I am dealing with got back to his job without delay. A year later he developed tubercular trouble and is now in the Hamilton sanitarium. His medical history sheet discloses that he had pneumonia overseas and that he passed out of the army Class A; but the doctor at the sanitarium, an expert on tuberculosis, says that the man's trouble was caused through service at the front. That man has not been paid one cent by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment since he has been in hospital.

Mr. BELAND: That is a clear case for appeal.

Mr. MEWBURN: It is Captain Nicholson's case. I wrote three letters myself, but his case was turned down. As I understand it now, that man's case can be appealed and reviewed, and if he can substantiate by expert medical evidence that his tubercular trouble is attributable to service he will be entitled to compensation.

The only suggestion I would make is in regard to section 11, subsection (a). I think probably the word "reasonably" might go ahead of the word "attributable," so as to make the line read, "was reasonably attributable to or was incurred during such military service."

Probably I am the one principally responsible for the record office for the Department of National Defence. I took a great deal of trouble in connection with its establishment. I remember very distinctly bringing a recommendation before Council in the early stages of the war, for as minister I felt that nothing should be omitted by the government, or the Militia department, to ensure a proper record being preserved of the service of every officer, non-commissioned officer and man belonging to the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I took this course advisedly, having some knowledge of the fictitious claims made against the American government after the Civil War. I felt it was incumbent upon the government or the minister in charge that the country should be protected against unreasonable claims, and although I am not taking any credit for it; the credit belongs to the departmental officials —I believe that our records are the most perfect of any preserved by the belligerent countries. Those records are so complete that to-day our doctors scrutinize them when tubercular and other troubles develop after returned men have gone back to civil life, although as a matter of fact I believe the trouble is reasonably attributable to service. I congratulate the minister and shall be glad to support his bill.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to ask a question, not of you, Mr. Chairman, nor of the minister, but of the members of this committee. Before doing so I must give the setting. For nearly a whole year we have had a commission of very able men dealing with the subject now under discussion, and they have submitted an elaborate and evidently carefully thought-out report—a report which singularly enough appears to have been received with satisfaction by everybody concerned, and more particularly by the returned men. We have the further fact of the hon. minister in charge of this bill coming before this House making this statement—and I have heard it at least half a dozen times—that it was his intention to bring down legislation carrying out the full intent of the report of this royal commission. He now tells us that he is doing so, that he has studied the act very carefully—and he has shown us to-night that he has a grasp of the subject which I am sure no one else possesses—and that he has had the very ablest draftsmen frame these amendments, and he tells us further that he has submitted these amendments to the people who after all are most vitally concerned—the soldiers themselves—and to the Ralston commission, all of whom have signified their approval.

The question I now ask the committee is this: Can we, sitting here to-night, expect to obtain such a grasp of the subject as would enable us to amend or improve the work of the royal commission, of the minister and of the draftsman? I think if we attempt to do anything of the kind we shall only add confusion, and that we had better accept the amendments in the form in which they have been submitted to us and see how they work out for a year. If this were the work of the Pension commission I would say: Let us scrutinize it down to the last syllable and the last comma, because I do not think we are satisfied with their interpretation of the act. But under the circumstances outlined I think we might do well to pass these amendments of the minister more or less in their entirety.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to a suggestion along the same lines as that indicated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). All members have received, I have no doubt, and certainly the members from Toronto, the statement issued the day before yesterday by the Great War Veterans' Association, and I would ask that it be made a part of the record of this debate, so that we can say that not only has the royal commission reported what they think is in the interest of the men, but that the men themselves, the members of the Great War Veterans' Association, endorse the report This is the communication, Mr. Chairman:

OTTAWA, June 13, 1923.

Re Pensions Appeal Procedure

Sir,—I am instructed by the Legislative Committee of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance to solicit your support of legislation designed to establish the form of pensions appeal procedure recommended by the Royal Commission on Pensions and Re-establishment. The principal features of the procedure so recommended are set forth in Sections 9-13 of the Bill proposing certain amendments to the Pension Act which is now before the House of Commons.

I may explain that in each province, evidence and suggestions, relative to this subject, were placed before the royal commission by a committee representative of all groups of ex-service men. Great care was exercised by these committees in weighing all ideas discussed and in advancing those most practicable under conditions prevailing in respective provinces. It is believed that the recommendation of the royal commission on this matter embodies the principles generally regarded by ex-service men as fundamental in any provision for appeal. It is also believed that the form of appeal procedure recommended will achieve the maximum of satisfaction with a minimum of expense.

Experience gained in dealing with the grievances of individual ex-service men before and during the inquiry of the royal commission has led this organization to the conclusion that thousands desire to appeal from decisions of the Pensions Board. This experience has also resulted in the conviction that the procedure outlined by the royal commission offers advantages vastly superior to any plan yet proposed. This procedure ensures justice with economy and invites confidence. It may not be amiss, therefore, at this juncture to point out some of these advantages.

The procedure recommended enables a discussion preliminary to appeal which will tend to eliminate appeals without legal ground or, of a frivolous character and those caused by obvious errors. In this way, without undue restraint upon the appellant, the work and expense of the appeal administration may be materially lightened.

The constitution of the appeal boards as recommended by the royal commission ensures a commonsense treatment of the appeal, free from professional bias and undue emphasis upon technicalities. Members with legal and medical experience can most readily deal with legal or medical aspects of the claim, and the presence of a member with industrial experience will provide a viewpoint most essential in estimating the degree of incapacity as gauged by the requirements of the labour market. It is also most essential that members of every board should have knowledge of conditions which prevailed on active service.

To avoid dissatisfaction, it is desirable that the large number of appeals awaiting consideration at the outset, should be reviewed with all possible speed. The hearing of each appeal will necessitate a careful examination of the appellant's service record a proceeding which, with the present system of records, requires a great deal of time, even by those with experience. The procedure recommended will provide a personnel available and competent to engage in a review of all appeals lodged, without undue delay and continuously while necessary.

The proposed district review boards are easily accessible to the prospective appellants either from the standpoint of location or time. If at the outset this work were entrusted to officials unable to engage therein without interruption, many men in certain occupations would find it difficult to appear during the appeal proceedings. Furthermore, it is presumed that the district review boards will arrange hearings in various centres in the district as may be convenient.

While the procedure recommended is designed to adequately cope with the initial deluge of appeals, nevertheless, it offers the most certain assurance of ultimate economy in administration. The administrative machinery may be telescoped as the volume of appeals may diminish. Provision is made for a gradual centralization based upon the federal appeal board which would not be possible under any other scheme proposed.

One of the foremost advantages of the proposed legislation is that uniformity with regard to decisions and procedure in the various districts is definitely safeguarded. The required reference to the Pensions Board and possibly at a later stage the Federal Appeal Board, provides a balancing and harmonizing influence. There is little danger, as the work progresses, of any variation of decision at different points upon appeals based upon similar evidence. Under any lack of the other schemes of district appeal procedure proposed lack of uniformity would be inevitable. Another advantageous feature of the appeal legislation in view is that federal supervision may be exercised over all decisions as regards expenditure of federal funds.

I trust that these views may receive your favourable consideration and support.

Yours faithfully,

C. G. MacNeil,
Secretary, Dominion Veterans' Alliance.

Here we have the Dominion Veterans' Alliance endorsing this scheme. I agree with the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) that we ought to be very careful about disturbing this very well thought-out plan as so endorsed.

Mr. CALDWELL: Mr. Chairman, as a past member of the Pension committee of this House for three years I wish to corroborate some of the statements made by the minister to-night. I desire first, however, to congratulate him on the bill which he has introduced. So far as it is possible to remedy by legislation the disabilities under which the returned man has been suffering, I think his bill will achieve that end. However, I want to go just a little further than any hon. members have gone whom I have heard speak to-night. I did not have the advantage of being in the House when this matter was discussed on Monday evening. I am speaking now of the interpretation of the act. I think it will be practically impossible to pass a pension act that will be so administered by the present Pension board as to get justice for the returned man. Hon. members may not all agree with me in that, but I feel sure that a good many of them will. I want to cite a special case to prove my contention, a case which in my opinion is fully covered by the act, but in connection with which justice has not been done, and I doubt if it ever will be done while the present chairman of the Pension board holds that office. He has always taken the attitude that once he makes a decision he must not reverse it for fear he will be admitting he had done wrong.

Mr. POWER: Oh, I object to that.

Mr. MARLER: I take exception to my hon. friend's attitude in that respect.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have the floor.

Mr. MARLER: I simply want to register my objection.

Mr. CALDWELL: I want to cite this case so that the facts may be understood. This man enlisted within ten days after war broke out, went to France, and came back discharged as no longer fit for service. He was one of the men referred to by some hon. members here to-night as those who were anxious to get back to civil life. He was over military age when he enlisted; he served two years and then broke down under the strain. He had three sons of military age who enlisted and were in training while he was overseas; they went to England on the same vessel that brought the father home. He was therefore very anxious to get back to his family—a wife and three small children. As I say, he was discharged as no longer fit for military service, not even as A-1. He tried to carry on in civil life, but he broke down within a month and went under the doctor's care. He made the mistake of not going to a military hospital and undergoing examination by military doctors. He employed a civilian doctor, and by the way, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment paid that doctor's bill afterwards—I presented it—to the extent of $100. After carrying on for upwards of two years under conditions such as these, trying to work, breaking down and going under the doctor's care—not entering a military hospital but undergoing treatment by his own practitioner—his condition at last compelled him to go to a military hospital. He was sent to a sanitarium in St. John, New Brunswick, which is

10 p.m. under the direction of a very competent man, Dr. Farris by name. After being under Dr. Farris' care for a matter of three months he was granted full disability pension for tuberculosis; I hold in my hand a copy of the communication notifying the man that he had been granted that pension. But after that pension had been paid for two months it was discontinued. The case had been reviewed by a medical man here in Ottawa who had never been within five hundred miles of the pensioner, who had two months before been granted a full disability pension. His pension was cut down to $5.30 a month, which was supposed to be in respect to a gunshot wound in his knee—and that pension was for himself and his wife and three children. I at once got in touch with Dr. Farris, whom I know very well, and whose ability and honesty have never been questioned. I asked him what he knew of this man's case. I knew the man personally. I knew he was a hardy robust man before he enlisted; that he had returned from the front broken in health and that he has since been unable to do a day's work, or, if he has done it, should not have done it. I would like to read the following letter from Dr. Farris dated April 6, 1920:

Dear Sir,—Driver James B. Tompkins, No. 5216, 1st Field Co., C.E. C.E.F., was a patient in this institution for several months. I believe he had pulmonary tuberculosis. He went out of here in good condition with the disease quiescent. I examined him again in the fall of 1919 and thought he was not so well and recommended his return to this institution. I was surprised to learn that his pension had been cut off and the Pension board did not believe he had tuberculosis. He had had pleurisy and bronchitis before discharge and he had a hemorrhage about a year after his discharge. On March 10th, 1920 he was admitted here again, as his wife said he was in a very bad condition. I was unable however to find any definite tuberculosis this time. His lungs had cleared up and his general condition was fair. I found his heart weak and I believe he has arteriosclerosis. I feel confident that this man had tuberculosis at the time of his discharge, that he made splendid improvement while in here, and that he has taken pretty good care of himself since, but—

This is what I want hon. members to notice particularly:

—that he is unable to do but a small amount of work, apparently due to arteriosclerosis and also to tuberculosis. He certainly should get more than $5.30 per month for his pension.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

I also communicated with the doctor who attended him in his home after his discharge, and this is the letter I received from him.

WOODSTOCK, N.B., December 28, 1920.

May say for your information that I attended this man first on July 10, 1916. I believe he was discharged from the army in June, 1916. The man had at that time a slight hemorrhage from the lungs I have attended this man ever since, and there is no doubt that this trouble was induced by active service. He was a strong, robust man before going to the front, and since that time his health is such that he is unable to earn a livelihood. He has spent several months in a sanitarium, but the trouble is still present. This man without doubt should have been receiving a pension since this trouble started.

I have repeatedly taken this matter up with the Pension board, submitting these facts to them for their information. They did not have Dr. Farris' letter or either of Dr. Grant's letters at the time they discontinued the pension, and I was fully convinced that upon receiving this information they would reverse their decision and reinstate the pension. But they persisted until last year in refusing anything more than the pension for gunshot wound that I have mentioned. Here is a letter from Dr. Grant dated March 3, 1922—and I may say this letter was unsolicited; Dr. Grant wrote me knowing that I was interested in the case. He says:

WOODSTOCK, N.B., March 3, 1922.

Mr. J. B. Tompkins is ill again and has had another hemorrhage from the lungs, his condition is certainly unsatisfactory so far as any improvement is concerned.

Dr. Grant at that time took the matter up with the Camp Hill hospital at Halifax with a view of having this man admitted for treatment, because he was in very poor financial circumstances and was unable to pay a doctor. The Pension board was unwilling to admit that he had a claim for pension. This was the reply Dr. Grant got from the Camp Hill Hospital in Halifax, dated March 16, 1922:

Dr. N. P. GRANT,
Woodstock, N.B.

Your communication of the 10th inst. relative to the marginally noted man has been passed to this office.

You are advised, please, that B.P.C. Ottawa, have definitely ruled that this man's pulmonary condition is not to be regarded as due to service. No steps can therefore be taken to have him admitted to any S.C.R. institution.

They refused to admit him to a sanitarium even for treatment, although he and his three sons had given splendid service. The three sons went over in 1916 and served during all the remainder of the war.

Mr. BELAND: He was ultimately admitted, was he not?

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes. I will come to that later. Dr. Grant forwarded a copy of this letter to me and I at once took the matter up with the D.S.C.R. here. After my insisting very strongly that action be taken they did admit him to a sanitarium for treatment, and upon my taking the matter up quite strenuously with the Pension board they granted him an increase in pension. Here is the letter from the Pension board dated July 28, 1922.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is going beyond relevancy to the matter under consideration when he reads extensively from these letters.

Mr. CALDWELL: I was not present when the principle of the bill was before the House the other night. However, I should like to be permitted to refer to these communications.

The CHAIRMAN: I question whether that record can be read. A good deal of what has already been read has been irrelevant.

Mr. CALDWELL: I will bow to your ruling, but I would like to refer to it if I may not read it. On July 28, a communication was received from the Pension board saying that they had granted him a pension of $21 a month for himself, his wife, and three children. I think it is a 15 per cent disability that gives a pension of $21 a month, and they made this retroactive for the whole period from his discharge, after, for three years, refusing to give him anything but $5.30 a month and stating that his condition was not due to service. Then in July, 1922, they yielded a little and they admit that his condition is possibly due to service and they grant him a pension that I consider an insult to a man who has given the service that he has and who is not able to work as he is not. But due to the fact that he must live, he has gone out and worked repeatedly for a short time. Each time he breaks down and comes back on the doctor's hands. His wife, who is not a trained nurse at all, leaves the children with him when he is not able to work and she goes out and endeavours to get nursing in order to try and keep the wolf from the door. Their home is mortgaged, their taxes are not paid, they are in a very critical financial condition. The three sons who have returned have married and have had as hard a time as most returned men to re-establish themselves, and should not have to support the father and mother and the smaller children. However they have had to contribute from their very meagre earnings, after maintaining themselves, to the upkeep of the family. One of the sons bought a farm from the Soldier Settlement board, made his 10 per cent payment down, but owing to adverse conditions has lost that. So that this family that have given such great war services do not feel, nor do their friends feel, that they have at all had justice at the hands of the Pension board.

An hon. MEMBER: What pension does the man get now?

Mr. CALDWELL: He is receiving a pension of $21 a month for himself, his wife and three small children Every doctor that examines him tells him that he should not work but he finds that he must do so. When he works a little he breaks down and comes back again on the doctor's hands. When he gets on his feet he endeavours to work again, but without success. These facts have repeatedly been brought to the attention of the Pension board. The letters I have quoted from have been referred to the board. I have taken the case up repeatedly with them. Their last stunt was to call in a tubercular expert to go over this man's file of papers. That was on May 29th, 1923. I have a letter from the board stating that the medical expert, after reviewing the man's file—here in Ottawa whereas the man lives in Woodstock, N.B.—had decided he was not entitled to a pension.

Now to substantiate the statement which has already been made by some members, and which may still be repeated by others, I may state that I think the present Pension board have made their position untenable by the attitude they have taken towards the Pension Act and towards pensioners. For instance in the case of the amendments of 1920, and 1921, questions were asked by various members of the parliamentary pension committee who wished to assure themselves that those amendments would not affect the men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Had the members of that committee—I think I can speak for myself anyway and I believe the same remark applies to other members of the committee—believed that those amendments would have been applied to the men who served in France, or in any other theatre of war, they would not have been passed. But the Pension board, or their representatives, said those amendments did not apply to the Canadian Expeditionary Force, but simply to the men in the permanent force, and applied to conditions after the war was over. It was stated without hesitation that the amendments would not apply to any man who had served in the overseas forces. Accordingly the amendments were allowed to go through. For that I think we are all to blame. I think a separate clause should have been framed to deal with the permanent force leaving section 11 as it was. However, I am pleased that the minister has brought down section 11 in its amended form.

I now wish to quote from the report of the Ralston commission to substantiate the claim that the Pension board have not given the pensioner the benefit of the doubt in a great many cases. On page 114 the report of the commission reads as follows:

> Sufficient has been shown, in the evidence before the commission, to quite justify the conclusion that the statement that the applicant is given the benefit of any reasonable doubt cannot be taken as expressing by any means an invariable principle of pensions administration. Numerous cases were presented in which, in the opinion of the commission, there was clearly a reasonable doubt established in favour of the applicant, but pension was refused; and in many of these the applicant showed not only a reasonable doubt but a preponderance of evidence in his favour.

This is the finding of the royal commission after having had submitted to them, I think I am safe in saying, hundreds of cases in which the pensioner was not given the benefit of reasonable doubt. I do not wish to weary the House by quoting copiously from the report but in many places it is stated that statements derogatory to the pensioner were taken at their face value while facts established in his favour were not considered. That is to say, that facts operating adversely against the pensioner were given very great prominence in the matter of deciding on pensions. I can personally vouch that I have found this to be the case. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to weary the House but I must say I feel very strongly on this matter. As a member of the Pension committee of this House for three years I have had as good an opportunity to know the attitude of the Board of Pension Commissioners towards the pensioners and towards any change in the Pension Act that would be for the benefit of the pensioners as any hon. member in this House.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I rise to speak only because I wish to emphasize and make a little more clear, if I can, the necessity, as I believe it, of giving in a case of doubt, the decision in favour of an applicant for pension. I think the minister did not quite understand the purport of the amendment when it was proposed. No one desires to lay violent hands on this section 3—a long section with many subsections and, if I may be permitted to say it, well drafted—but I want to put this case to the minister: Suppose there is an applicant who is suffering from a disease which if attributable to or incurred during military service would entitle him to a pension. Suppose we have one suffering from such a disease who goes before the Board of Pension Commissioners. There are two doctors who say, "Your disease is attributable to the war or to your military service." There are two doctors on the other side who say flatly "Your disease is not attributable to your military service." In other words, suppose, as very often happens, it is a case of fifty-fifty, that there is no preponderance of testimony in favour of the plaintiff, that the verdict can only be the Scotch verdict, "not proven." Now, what is the position of the Pension commissioners? I do not know whether they are sworn to administer their duties faithfully or whether they take an oath of office. No doubt they do do that whether they take such an oath or not. They are in this position then, "We cannot award a pension. The case is evenly balanced. We cannot say this is attributable to the war, nor can we say it is attributable to military service. Therefore it is impossible for us, under this admirably drawn act, to award a pension." What I desire is that when the case is on an even balance the onus of proof shall favour the applicant, and that the even balance shall be immediately disturbed by saying that the applicant is entitled to his pension. The British House of Commons has done that; the government introduced an act. I believe it was in 1922 or 1923. We are told we have the best Pension Act of any country that went through the war but we do not have it in this respect. We may have been liberal with those entitled to pensions, but that is not the only consideration. I would like the minister to tell this House if it is possible under this admirably drawn act, for the Board of Pension Commissioners, discharging their duties faithfully according to the oath of office, if they take it, where the evidence is evenly balanced, to decide in favour of the applicant and grant a pension. I submit it is not.

Mr. BELAND: Of course the Pension board may decide in favour of any applicant, if there is a difference of opinion between two medical boards. There is nothing at all in the act that would preclude a decision in favour of an applicant, if two medical men pronounce against the attributability and two pronounce in favour of it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am afraid I have not made myself clear. The members of the Board of Pension Commissioners must discharge their duties honestly. Instead of taking two doctors for and two doctors against, I will take one doctor for and one against. The applicant comes before the board and makes his claim under section 3, subsection 11 (a), and one surgeon says "Your disease is not attributable to nor was it incurred during military service." The other surgeon, equally credible, comes forward and says "Your disease is attributable to or was incurred during military service." What is the board to do? The board may say that either of these two distinguished surgeons is entitled to credibility, but that "We cannot believe A any more than we can believe B; it is an even balance, the onus of proof is upon the applicant, and therefore we have to deny the pension". Of course, as the minister says, there is nothing to prevent the board from granting a pension, but if the board is discharging its obligations as men sitting in judgment, it is impossible under the law to give a pension to the applicant.

Mr. BELAND: I beg to differ with my hon. friend. There is nothing whatever in the act that precludes the board from awarding a pension in the case he has cited. My hon. friend is speaking of attributability, but we go further than that in this act. We say that if it is attributable to service the man may be pensioned and shall be pensioned—not "may" but "shall"—also if the disease was incurred during service. It is absolutely impossible to go further, and if you attempt to go further you confuse matters entirely. I admit that very often one medical opinion is set against another medical opinion. Medicine is not a science of geometry nor of mathematics, and doctors disagree. How can we expect that they will not disagree, when lawyers disagree on a given statute? When the Pension board refuses a pension in a case such as my hon. friend mentioned, the remedy would be to appeal. I do not know whether my hon. friend is a lawyer by profession or not.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: Then, as a lawyer he knows that contradictory evidence is submitted in the court in almost every case. It is a matter for the judge to estimate the evidence of one party as against the evidence of the other party. In numberless cases the evidence is contradictory, and if the litigant loses his case before one court it is open to him to appeal to a higher court; if he is not satisfied with the second court, he may go to a third court, or he may go as far as the Privy Council.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Although it appears to me that I have laboured hard I have not made myself plain to the minister.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, the hon. member has made himself very clear.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister must admit there are many cases where the evidence is evenly balanced. The applicant has just as much in his favour as the defendant has in his favour; in other words, there are cases where there is no preponderance of evidence, you are in a dilemma as to where the right may be, and you would seek to have some additional evidence in order to decide the case. But it is not forthcoming. In that case the board has no option and no alternative but to refuse the pension.

Mr. BELAND: On what does the hon. member base that assertion? Will he quote me one single line in the act that precludes the awarding the pension?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will read the section. Such a provision does exist in the English Act. I am sorry now to take up the time of the House, but I must do it. The section of the act reads:

> In respect of military service rendered during the war—
> (a) Pensions shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability resulting from injury or disease—

Let me skip a few words here.

> When the disability resulting from injury or disease or the aggravation thereof in respect of which the application for pension is made or the injury or disease or the aggravation thereof resulting in the death in respect of which the application for pension is made—

Then what?

> —was attributable to or was incurred during such military service.

Suppose a man qualifies under the first part of the section I have read, and comes as an applicant for a pension, what must he show? He must show that this disability, disease or the aggravation thereof was attributable to or was incurred during such military service. Suppose he produces evidence, as I have said before, and that ranks fifty in authority, and there is evidence against that which amounts to fifty; there is an even balance, and that man, under the act of the hon. minister, must be denied his pension, if the Pension board does its duty.

Mr. BELAND: All I can say is that I beg to disagree with my hon. friend. I ask him to quote one single sentence in this act that would preclude the awarding of a pension in such a case under this act. He cannot show one single sentence. Of course, there is no such preclusion in the act, and my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, knows it. It is a question I understand of appreciation of medical evidence as presented. It is not a question of one doctor as against another. I would not set my medical opinion against the opinion of a professor of pathology in McGill University or Queen's University, though it might be one medical opinion as against another medical opinion. It is for a competent board to judge the situation, to appreciate the evidence as presented, and to award or refuse a pension according to their judgment and their conscience. There is in the act nothing that precludes them from awarding a pension, even if the evidence is not adduced.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the applicant have to prove that his disease was attributable to his military service?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Or incurred during military service?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Or incurred during military service?

Mr. BELAND: That is different.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I was stating just one case. It is very plain that if you can prove that your disease was attributable to military service, you get a pension. I will put the matter in this way. Does the minister admit that an applicant must prove that his disease was attributable to or was incurred during such military service?

Mr. BELAND: I do not say that he has to, and there is in the act nothing that says that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What does the language mean?

Mr. BELAND: The language means that he may make application for a pension for a disability which is attributable to or incurred during service.

Mr. RYCKMAN: He must show that.

Mr. BELAND: He may and, no doubt, he does show all possible evidence that is in his possession. It is for the Pension board then —and they do this in every case—to resort to securing medical opinion from their advisers in this regard, from the medical sheet, from whatever is produced by the man, and to base their judgment thereupon.

Mr. MANION: I think possibly I may offer just one suggestion that may help to clear up the point. Probably the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) is correct as to the legal letter of the law, but at the same time it would be an absolute impossibility in many cases for men applying for pensions to prove that their disease or disability was due to or was incurred during service. Take the case, for example, of a man who became ill a year after his discharge. He was discharged as fit. His case is laid before the medical board who finally say: "Well, the evidence looks as if this might have occurred at that time." Unless there is some medical record, it would be impossible for that man to prove in a legal sense, that his case was due to or was incurred during service.

Mr. RYCKMAN: He has to do that now.

Mr. MANION: I do not think so. The argument I was making the other day was that you cannot live up to the letter of the law, as the Pension board has been inclined in the past to do.

Mr. BELAND: That is my impression also.

Mr. MANION: I hope this amended act will put an end to this living up to the letter of the law.

Mr. LUCAS: The last few lines of paragraph (b) of clause 3 read:

> Provided that no pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which at such time was wilfully concealed, was obvious, was not of a nature to cause rejection from service, or was a congenital defect.

As regards a man who had a congenital eye condition, if it was proven that his condition was aggravated by service, would he be denied a pension?

Mr. BELAND: No. He would not be pensioned for the pre-existing disability, but he would be pensioned for the aggravation in this case. If that was not a congenital defect, or if it was not wilfully concealed, or if it was not obvious, then he would receive a pension, not only for the aggravation, but for the pre-existing disability if he reached an actual theatre of war. That is the purpose of paragraph (b).

Mr. MacLAREN: In reference to this discussion about proving a case, I would suggest that there is practically no such thing as a man proving his case. A man may prove his case, in the event of an application on account of some obvious disability, by the evidence of his comrades who saw it occur. But that happens only in a certain number of cases. As regards many diseases, such as medical diseases, these things are not proved. I do not suppose the minister would suggest for a moment that these cases are subject to proof.

What then is the question? It is a matter of a man submitting his case to the Pension board. If a man submits a reasonable amount of evidence, then his case is established; but one does not mention that in the same breath as proof. The case is not proved to a mathematical demonstration, but it is accepted on the establishment of a reasonable case. I think we are a little liable to confuse these terms in that sense.

As far as I can gather from reading the amendment, it conflicts with the latter portion of paragraph (b). That may not be the case, but I consider this amendment is of such a length that it should be printed and circulated amongst the members. Personally I do not feel able to discuss it until I have had a fair opportunity of reading it over very carefully. Many very serious difficulties have arisen in connection with pensions over the fact of obscurity and difficulty in interpretation. I fear we have expected too much of the Pension board in that respect, because they have had great difficulty from the act just as have returned men and others who are interested. We should be most careful to see that we make this act now as amended as perfect as possible. Especially we should gain from the experience we have had in the last few years of difficulties that have arisen through imperfectly and obscurely drafted acts. This amendment is too lengthy to be read over in this way unless we have an opportunity of reading it carefully as we have had of reading the bill. I, therefore, would suggest that if the amendment is to be proceeded with, it be allowed to stand for this evening until printed copies can be distributed amongst the members.

Mr. BELAND: The four last lines of paragraph (b) to which my hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren) has referred are a repetition of the act of 1919 and have remained in the act ever since. They are not new.

Mr. MacLAREN: The minister misunderstood me. I am referring to the amendment proposed to the bill.

Mr. BELAND: The amendment now before the committee?

Mr. MacLAREN: My remarks are not on the amendment, but on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK: As I understand the matter, the insurance principle was contained in the 1919 act. Is that correct?

Mr. BELAND: We called it so.

Mr. CLARK: Then in the 1920 amendment, that was wiped out?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Is it not a fact that since the act was amended in 1920, pensions have actually been awarded to ex-members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force on the insurance principle?

Mr. BELAND: If that is a question, I shall answer it.

Mr. CLARK: I was going to give, perhaps, a concrete illustration of that. For instance, if a man who had suffered during service from a light form of tuberculosis, let us say, had been cured and had gone back to service, and subsequently to his discharge, say in 1921, he again developed tuberculosis and applied for a pension, is it not a fact that a pension would be granted in such a case where the medical history of the man showed that he had suffered from the trouble on service.

Mr. BELAND: I think so.

Mr. CLARK: In other words, although the act was amended in 1920, the insurance principle has been carried out during subsequent years?

Mr. BELAND: I pointed out a minute ago that the due to service principle did not appear to have been applied until 1921. My hon. friend perhaps has not in mind that the declaration of peace took place only on the 31st of August, 1921, although the act had been amended more than a year previously.

Mr. CLARK: I was not thinking of that, but of cases that arise to-day, cases of tuberculosis, or any other disease, the origin of which can be found in a man's medical history sheet. What I am suggesting is that a pension will be granted even to-day as the law now stands. Is not that correct?

Mr. BELAND: I think it happens, yes.

Mr. CLARK: Well, as I understand the matter, these amendments which are now before the committee are simply for the purpose of crystallizing the practice which is now in existence.

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. CLARK: I cannot get any meaning from the minister's answer, then.

Mr. BELAND: Though in some cases pensions might have been awarded on the insurance principle, in at least 500 cases, I am informed by the Pension board, pension has been refused on that very account, because under the act as it stands to-day, the disability in respect of which the application is made may not be attributable to service, even though it might have been incurred on service.

Mr. CLARK: I agree with the amendment to that extent, in so far as it corrects that feature. I want to emphasize what the member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) said. I agree with his interpretation of this amended bill. True, we may be looking at it from a legal standpoint; we must take that into consideration. But suppose you have a case in which there are say, two doctors, on either side. The case comes before the Pension board and we find that after a perusal of the opinion given by the doctors in the first instance, the two medical men on the Pension board absolutely agree with two of them against the man, so that there is an adverse decision. It is very dangerous for the man's case if there is equal evidence on both sides, and even if the two doctors on the Pension board disagree, the situation is serious. So long as it is necessary for the man to show that his disability is attributable to service or was incurred on service there is going to be dissatisfaction, and there are going to be difficulties. It is my desire to see this dissatisfaction obviated and these difficulties overcome as far as possible this present year. I believe that this section will be of service to some extent, but you cannot get away from the fact that evidence must be produced that the disability is attributable to service. After a period of two or three years there will be considerable difficulty in satisfactorily proving this, and there must be differences of opinion where there are medical men. Furthermore, I can quite understand that applicants for pensions will be firmly convinced that their disabilities are attributable to service, or were incurred on service, and these men will be able to obtain independent medical opinion supporting their view, though you may find medical opinion produced by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment unanimously opposed to it. There will always be differences of opinion among medical men, and that is going to give rise to difficulties and dissatisfaction. The minister says that this is where the appeal board comes in. That may help to some extent, but even the appeal board will be faced with the problems presented by the member for East Toronto, and I am not satisfied that this section is going to meet a very large number of cases which are bound to be appealed as soon as the appeal boards are constituted if the subsequent sections are adopted. In my experience, these sections simply crystallize what has been the practice of the Pension board. I have had no particular difficulty in cases which I have presented to them where I could show that disability was attributable to service. Where I could do that I have had no particular difficulty in having the insurance principle applied. Yet I quite understand that there have been cases all over Canada, some 500 in number, which have arisen where that principle has not been applied. In that regard I agree with the amendment, because that principle, I think, should be applied. I submit, however, that we are not getting over the whole dissatisfaction, which is bound to result when the bulk of these appeals come before the board.

Mr. POWER: Whilst I agree to a large extent with my hon. friend from Toronto and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Clark) that something should be done to take the onus of proof as to the attributability of the disease off the applicant, I think the amendment offered by the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) opens the door altogether too wide. Let me give an extreme hypothetical case. A man, let us suppose, was called to the colours and drafted in 1918. He reported to the barracks and was given harvest furlough. He was probably ten minutes at the barracks when he was given furlough, and he went home to his farm. Before he reported back again the armistice was declared. Thirty or forty years afterwards he develops tuberculosis. Under the amendment, the fact that he reported to the barracks, was medically examined and passed as fit, is conclusive evidence that he must have contracted tuberculosis on service and he would be entitled to a pension. I think hon. members of the committee will agree that that is opening the door a little too wide and would certainly lead to a considerable abuse. As I have already stated, I agree with the other legal lights that at present the onus of proof is on the applicant, and something should be done to open the door a little wider in this respect, but I think we are going a little too far under the amendment offered by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner).

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that as we have been discussing this amendment for a little over two hours, and as probably all opinions in regard to it have been elicited, we might as well decide one way or the other and get on with this bill.

Mr. MARLER: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) deals with the definition of the word "attributability", which I think he desires to incorporate in the act. The amendment now before the committee goes a great deal further. I do not think it is advisable to define the word "attributability", I think any definition will only tend to narrow its meaning. But if it is desired to define "attributability" in such a way that the onus will not be entirely on the soldier, let us make an amendment along that line.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): A year ago, Mr. Chairman, I might not have supported this amendment, but to-day, after my experience in the interval, I am inclined to support it. The onus of proof at the present is too difficult for the applicant to sustain. Let me remind the minister of one case which illustrates this very strongly and will convince him that something must be done to alleviate the applicant's burden. I brought to the notice of the department the case of a man who after having a pension for four years finds himself suddenly deprived of it because the Pension board discover they made a mistake. What mistake did they make? Referring to their records, they find it reported that there is a scar on the left side of this man's neck which was there before the war. The man denies this and states that after he was discharged he went over to Glasgow and there had a slight operation performed, of which this scar is the mark. The board refuses to accept his statement or to take any steps to prove or disprove it. As a result the man has to go to the trouble of sending over to Glasgow to get some person there, who is not interested in his case, to go through the hospital records. What are the facts? This man had a slight operation performed in Scotland in 1910—he worked from 1910 to 1914 in the shipyards there—then became a fireman on a convoy, worked right up to 1914 in perfect health—served a year or more on the convoy—jumped his job at Montreal—went to Belleville and enlisted—and a month later showed signs of tuberculosis. That is a very unfortunate case, but it is not the only one I have brought to the department's notice. I find it is very difficult for the applicant to bear all the burden of proof, and yet there is nothing in these amendments to relieve him of that burden in any way.

Last year I supported the amendment that time should not count with a tubercular case. The man perhaps had been under a gas attack with no immediate bad effects. I think tubercular cases should be in a class by themselves. Neurasthenic cases should also be sympathetically considered if the men can prove they suffered shell shock while actually at the front. There are one or two of these amendments that appeal strongly to me, and if the minister is prepared to relieve an applicant of the full burden of proof I shall support them.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman, may I change the amendment in the fifth line? I should have put after the word "who" these words: "having served in a theatre of actual war."

The error arose owing to the English act being differently worded.

Mr. MARLER: Mr. Chairman, I protest vigorously against an amendment like this being read into one of the most complicated acts on our statute books. I believe that not half a dozen men in the House can read the amendment correctly into the act, and for myself I decline to take the responsibility of dealing with an amendment of this description without having it put before the law officers of the Crown for their consideration.

Mr. LeSUEUR: From the discussion so far it appears that a number of members feel that this section puts upon the applicant the onus of proof. That, of course, is the ordinary legal principle in all courts, and one would naturally expect it to be the case here. I understand that the minister's interpretation of this section is that the matter is entirely in the discretion of the Pension board.

Mr. BELAND: Hear, hear.

Mr. LeSUEUR: To make it absolutely clear I have been wondering if it would be satisfactory to him to insert before the word "attributable" the words "was in the opinion of the board reasonably attributable." That might possibly cover any question of doubt in regard to the onus of proof.

Mr. BELAND: I have no objection to the words being inserted.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member introducing the amendment (Mr. Ladner) shall have leave to add in the fifth line thereof after the word "who" the words "having served in a theatre of actual war"?

Mr. BELAND: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Then the question is upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner).

Amendment (Mr. Ladner) negatived.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the clause carries, I would ask for a definition of the words "wilfully concealed" in the fifteenth line in subsection (b). There was a period of enlistment when the greatest care was not exercised by the medical examiners in passing volunteers, and many men were accepted without being thoroughly examined. A large number of men were so anxious to enlist that although they may have suffered from such a disability as flat feet or poor eyesight, which afterwards developed into a serious condition, they did not disclose it at the time for fear they would be rejected. Who is to determine when a man wilfully concealed any disability?

Mr. BELAND: In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the board has experienced any difficulty at all, certainly since I have been minister I have not heard of a single complaint in this regard. "Wilfully concealed" I think would mean, for example, the case of a man who on enlistment failed to mention that three of his toes were missing, and after discharge, because of having served in a theatre of actual war, claimed a pension for the loss of those toes. Well then, the board would say, "You lost them before the war?" and if the answer was in the affirmative, the board would say, "You wilfully concealed that when you enlisted." I do not think this restriction has caused any difficulty. The words "wilfully concealed" were in the original act of 1919: they were in section 25 (3) of the act of 1920; they were in the legislation of 1921 and 1922. If there has been wilful concealment and a man is confronted with that provision of the act, he admits it immediately and there is no further difficulty.

Mr. LeSUEUR: Before the committee proceeds with clause 4 I would like to crave the indulgence of the minister and of the committee to propose an amendment to the interpretation clause, subsection (b) of section 2, in which the words "widowed mother" are, to some extent, defined.

Mr. BELAND: Is my hon. friend referring to the Pension Act?

Mr. LeSUEUR: Yes. Under section 47 of the Pension Act, supplementary pension is given to the widowed mother, wife or children of persons domiciled and resident in Canada at the outbreak of war who enlisted in the military forces and who died in service or as the result of service. Last year the House in its wisdom defined the words "widowed mother" as extending to and including a mother deserted by her husband. I wish to propose an amendment to the interpretation clause, comprising the addition of the following words:

And also a mother whose husband is in a helpless and dependent condition.

Possibly I can best explain what I believe to be the justice of that amendment by citing a case. A boy who had been the support to a certain extent of his mother and a rather sickly father—the father was unable to work continuously—enlisted in the Royal Air Force. He went to the front, fell within the German lines and was killed. The father later became paralyzed; today he is a helpless paralytic, who has to be fed by the mother of this boy and given close attention. The result is that simply because her husband is living, though in a helpless condition, she is unable to collect any supplementary pension in respect of her son's death. From a monetary standpoint she is in a much worse position than if the husband had died; if her husband were dead she would be clearly entitled under the act to collect pension. As it is, she has to give her time to the nursing of her husband; it is a drag on her resources to maintain him, and solely on account of the peculiar wording of the act she is prevented from obtaining a pension. My amendment is to cover cases of that kind.

Mr. POWER: I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendment just proposed is out of order in that it involves additional expenditure on the part of the Crown.

The CHAIRMAN: I may say that the resolution which preceded this bill provided in part as follows:

That enactments be made respecting pensions for military servics rendered during the war and after the war, which shall be made retroactive to the first day of September, 1919, and all cases in which pension has been refused, reduced, discontinued or underrated by reason of the fact that the proposed legislation was not included in the Pension Act shall be subject to review by the Board of Pension Commissioners—

And so on. There is no limitation in the resolution which prefaced this legislation as to the amount of public expenditure that is to be involved. As to the question of a private member not having the right to move an amendment in committee which would increase the public expenditure I may quote the following from May, page 461:

This principle, however, is apparently disregarded when the recommendation of the Crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms, places no limitation on the amount of expenditure to be authorized by the resolution. As the resolution sanctions, without any specific limitation, the application of money to be provided by parliament to certain purposes, when the clauses in a bill founded upon such a resolution are before the committee, the freedom of action sanctioned by that resolution can be exercised.

11 p.m.

So I must rule that the hon. member's point of order is not well taken.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss the matter at length but I would call your attention to decisions rendered on a similar matter four years in succession when amendments to the Pension Act were brought down. On those occasions I proposed that a certain extension be applied to the words "widowed mother" in the act, and that widowed mothers be granted additional pensions. On every occasion my amendment was ruled out of order by the then chairman of committees, the present member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). I think these decisions should form some kind of jurisprudence; at least, they ought to be looked into before the Chairman gives a definite decision on the point of order raised now.

The CHAIRMAN: I have made some inquiry into that, and I am informed that in those instances the resolutions in each case dealt specifically with each particular part of the subject matter of the bill; they were not only very definite in that respect but they were very explicit as to the exact extent to which the bill and the powers and rights created by it went. I understand that the resolution which prefaced the introduction of this money bill was prepared in the widest terms so that the minister would be in a position to consider any amendment that might be offered.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is that there be added to the interpretation clause the words:

And also a mother whose husband is in a helpless and dependent condition.

The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. BELAND: The purpose of the amendment is to consider as a widowed mother a mother who is not a widow but whose husband is in a helpless condition and utterly unable not only to earn his own living but also to care for himself. There is in the Pension Act as it exists to-day, in clause 34, subsection 3, the following provisions:

When a parent or person in the place of a parent who was not wholly or to a substantial extent maintained by the member of the forces at the time of his death subsequently falls into a dependent condition such parent or person may be awarded a pension provided he or she is incapacitated by mental or physical infirmity from earning a livelihood, and provided also that in the opinion of the commission such member of the forces would have wholly or to a substantial extent maintained such parent or person had he not died.

I believe the case referred to by my hon. friend would be covered by section 34, subsection 3 of the existing law. I do not think his case would be improved by adding as he proposes to the interpretation the expresison "widowed mother." I have no serious objection to accepting the amendment of my hon. friend. It will have very little consequence financially and I realize the force of the point my hon. friend has made, as to the position of the widowed mother under the circumstances he has mentioned. As far as I am concerned I do not see anything that would be unjust in the proposition of my hon. friend. I even believe it would be fair and generous. I would suggest, however, that my hon. friend read clause 34, subsection 3, carefully and see if he does not think that the case in question is covered by that particular subsection.

Mr. LE SUEUR: I appreciate the remarks of the minister as to the fairness of the proposal but section 34-3, as I read it, refers to a member of the Canadian forces. This amendment is proposed to cover the case of a member of the royal forces and refers to the supplementary pension to a widowed mother, and would come under section 47 of the Pension Act.

Mr. BELAND: I am afraid in that case the point of order raised should be seriously considered. At any rate we might perhaps wait for a few seconds until my hon. friend has thoroughly considered the effect of the subsection which I quoted.

Mr. LE SUEUR: I am satisfied on that point.

Mr. MANION: I have read the clause to which the minister refers and it does not seem to me that it would cover the case represented by my hon. friend. Anyhow since the minister admits that the amendment would meet the case and would only involve a very small expenditure, why not accept it and let us pass on?

Mr. BELAND: I will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before you pass to the next clause there is a matter I would like to bring up but I do not know whether it would be appropriate to do so at this stage or not. I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to the time of the appearance of disability. In the case of a widow an amendment was passed by this House last year to the following effect:

(1) Pensions shall, in all cases, be paid to the widow of a member of the forces without reference to the time of appearance of the disability, which resulted in his death, unless and until it is substantiated that the marriage of such member was contracted with the intention of procuring pension for such widow, and not a bona fide carrying out of the agreement, provided that such disability shall not have been caused by the act of such member or through vice, and that pension be only payable while such widow remains unmarried.

I believe that amendment was rejected by the Senate. What I should like to ask the minister is, whether it is at all possible for him to see his way clear to reintroducing some clause that would cover that particular point. There was a case in the city of Winnipeg, perhaps the minister may recall it, of Lieutenant Phinney, that very well illustrates the unjustness of the present arrangement if I might just mention that case in a few words. Lieutenant Phinney died as the result of a disability incurred upon active service, and within the meaning of the Pension Act, incurred prior to the time of his marriage. He enlisted with the Fort Garry Horse in August 1914, but in an effort to reach France he transferred to the Imperial Forces. He was taken sick and returned to Canada and discharged in March 1916. His health recovered and he again volunteered in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and was given a commission in the Canadian Field Artillery. He proceeded overseas and went to France in October, 1917. In February 1918, he was gassed and evacuated to England where he remained in hospital for some time. He made a complete recovery and was discharged A1 for active service in May 1918. Prior to returning to France he was married in England. He served with distinction until the conclusion of the war, winning the Military Cross for his splendid daring and skill in bringing his battery into action in front of the infantry lines at the battle of Cambrai. Upon discharge he was in receipt of a pension, but upon his demise the widow was refused pension on the grounds that the marriage had taken place subsequent to the appearance of the disability. His marriage was contracted at least six months prior to the armistice. The Board of Pension Commissioners admit that death was attributable to service. There has never been any question of "fortune hunting" in this case but because of the inclusion of this unjust provision in the act pension is denied the widow of this splendid soldier.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I have no amendment to offer but it seems to me that the amendment of last year probably covers the ground. If not is there any other way in which the minister could meet the situation.

Mr. MARLER: Where can we find the text of that amendment?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is an amendment, I believe, which was introduced last year.

Mr. MARLER: I cannot find it any place.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is possible I have the amendment here that is referred to. I could not follow the wording as given by the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) but it appears as section 5 of the amendments of last year. By the way, this is one that had been suggested by myself before the Pension committee during three successive years; it was defeated by a very small majority for two years but last year it carried in committee, was recommended to the House in the report of the committee, was passed by the House, but was rejected by the Senate. The amendment reads as follows:

Subsection one of section thirty-three of the said act, as amended by chapter sixty-two of the statutes of 1920, is further amended by inserting after the words "married to him" in the second line thereof the words "within one year after date of discharge from the forces or".

That covers, I believe, a very limited number of cases. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) when he says there is very great hardship in some of these cases. For instance, a member of the forces who enlisted and went overseas but was not married, contracted a disability due to his service and came back and married afterwards and his widow gets no pension if he dies of his war disability. There is another clause in the Pension Act—and I am sorry I have not got a copy of the act before me—which provides that a pension may be granted to a wife if a man lived with her before he went overseas even if not married to her. I think the comparison is odious, and I do not like to make it, but I think, in the case of the man who married even within one year of his discharge or of the appearance of his disability, that his widow should be entitled to the same pension as if he had been married before going overseas. There was an objection raised to it in the first year, and the first amendment I moved two years ago was that if he was married within five years of his discharge, or after the appearance of his disability, the widow would get a pension. The next year

I cut it down to two years after his discharge, and last year I think I went the whole limit and made it one year after his discharge. That made it impossible for any one to take any advantage of this provision because that one year had expired, and there would be no possibility of any woman marrying any returned soldier for the sake of the pension she might get. I would hate to attribute such a motive to any one. But that possibility was obviated by making it one year from his discharge or the appearance of his disability because that time had already expired.

I strongly urge the minister to make this amendment to this bill. I think the number of cases was quite limited. I do not remember the exact number, but it was given to us. I think the chairman of the Pension committee, who is here tonight, would remember what the number was. The Pension board gave us an estimate—of course it was only an estimate—of the number that would be affected by this amendment, and if my memory serves me it was a limited number.

Mr. POWER: The Pension board could not know what would be the number of claimants under the proposed amendment, because a large number of people, knowing that the Pension Act precluded them from obtaining a pension, would not make any claim.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think they gave us an estimate of the possible number.

Mr. POWER: How could they?

Mr. CALDWELL: The estimate would not be based on actual mathematics, but I believe they gave us their opinion. I know of one or two particular cases—

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 4. I understood the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) desired to ask a question and I thought the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) was seeking to do the same. We are on section 4, but, of course, if the minister desires to answer the question—

Mr. CALDWELL: I will wind up by asking the minister if he proposes bringing in an amendment to cover this feature in the Pension Act.

Mr. BELAND: It is not covered at all by the present amendment. The Pension Act deals with this case, and no widow can be awarded a pension if she marries a man after the appearance of the disability. I would suggest that we deal with all the sections of the present bill, and, when we are through, perhaps the amendment may be suggested as a clause that could be added to the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL: Thanks.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Pensions in accord with extent of disability.

Mr. BELAND: This is a repetition of the clause in the Pension Act.

On subsection 2—How extent of disability estimated.

Mr. BELAND: This is a repetition of the clause in the act.

On subsection 3—When no deduction of pension.

Mr. BELAND: This is the clause in the present act repeated verbatim.

Mr. MANION: I had a suggestion to make as to a brief amendment. It would come under clause 26 of the original bill. Should it be added here or later on?

Mr. BELAND: I think we should wait till we get through these clauses.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Date of coming into force.

Mr. CLARK: I understood the minister to raise a point of order in regard to an amendment to the previous section which we were dealing with. I have an amendment to offer to section 33. Do I understand the minister to desire that any such amendments shall be postponed?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, postponed until we have gone through the sections, unless they come directly under any of them.

The CHAIRMAN: Unless it is to amend the bill as presented to the committee, the minister has requested that the amendments be postponed until the bill has passed the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask the minister to consider certain cases of soldiers who are Canadians who served in the Fenian raid and in the South African war. They were very old soldiers, and in their desire to get over to England, they joined the British Expeditionary Force, left Canada, and went over. I understand they do not get any pension under the Pension Act or under these amendments. Could the minister not include those cases? Colonel Ralston thinks they should be considered. As I say many of them are very old soldiers and they are entitled to something. They do not get anything under existing legislation. They were in a hurry to get over, and qualified and went over in the British Expeditionary Force.

Mr. BELAND: This question has been dealt with by parliamentary committees and they have always refused to carry out the suggestion. There are very few such cases. In fact, I think there are only two Fenian raid pensioners.

Mr. CLARK: Following up the remarks of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) I wish to refer to a case which was presented to the Pension board, I know it is not provided for by the act, and perhaps the minister would consider it in framing these amendments. It is the case of a man who joined the Canadian forces and found there would be some delay in getting over. He, therefore, took his discharge in Canada, paid his own way to England, and was drowned on the Lusitania. It can be proved conclusively that the man was a member of the forces here in Canada, I think a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and took his discharge from that force in order to joint the British Expeditionary Force so that he could get to France more quickly. As a matter of fact in that particular case the man's discharge from the Canadian Expeditionary Force is of the same date as the sinking of the Lusitania. Is there any provision for such a case as that?

Mr. BELAND: No, there is no provision, but I am a little surprised to hear that the date of his discharge would coincide with the date of his drowning.

Mr. CLARK: That is a fact. I have investigated it.

Mr. BELAND: There is nothing in the act that would cover such a case. This man was, as we would say in French, sitting between two chairs. He was between two armies. He was discharged from the Canadian army, proceeded to England, being no longer a member of the Canadian force, and was drowned before he joined the Imperial forces. That case is unfortunate.

Mr. CLARK: Has the Privy Council power to pass an order in council dealing with such cases where the facts prove conclusively that the case is a just one? Has the Privy Council power to pass an order in council bringing such a case within the Pension Act so that the board can award the pension laid down in the schedules to the act?

Mr. BELAND: There is no power conferred in the act on the Governor in Council to pass such an order. I am very reluctant to receive that power from the committee to award a pension, when we think it should be reasonably awarded. I realize, though, that this is an extraordinary case, perhaps one of its kind, but the man was a member of neither force at the time he perished. I do not know where the remedy would be.

[Mr. Beland.]

Mr. CLARK: I understand last year on the recommendation of the parliamentary committee, an order in council was passed for payment of a pension to a nursing sister.

Mr. BELAND: I am not aware of that.

Mr. CHURCH: I agree with what the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) has said. I think there are many of these cases throughout Canada. I know of a case similar to that mentioned by the hon. member, the case of a colonel, one of Canada's oldest soldiers. He served at the time of the Fenian raid, the Northwest rebellion; he was one of the principal officers in the Canadian contingent in the South African war. He received no pension on account of all those wars. He left the soil of Canada because he was qualified and the British were after our qualified men. He paid his passage to England; he served for three or four years over there and he returned. Because he signed up with the British Expeditionary Force and not with the Canadian Expeditionary Force, he is not, under existing legislation, entitled to a pension. This case was brought to the attention of Colonel Ralston, and I received a letter from Colonel Ralston stating that there was nothing in the present Pension Act; that it was a matter for the government to consider an amendment to cover a case like this. There are many cases like this. Four or five of the oldest soldiers we have are cut out altogether. They are disabled and they cannot get civilian positions. Many of these men are poor, and I think the minister might very well look into the matter and see that it is considered at the end of this amending bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—District review boards.

Mr. MARLER: This brings up the whole question of the review boards. I do not know whether the minister desires to discuss this clause to-night or not. I have some remarks of considerable length to make on this clause.

Mr. BELAND: Make them as short as possible.

Mr. MARLER: I will certainly do that. I know I have seen this bill before; but when a complicated bill like this is brought down and put through second and third readings the same evening, it is pretty hard to grasp the whole situation. I have no objection to clauses 9 and 10. I should like to speak on clause 11.

Mr. BELAND: The hon. member has no objection to clauses 9 and 10?

Mr. MARLER: Not as they stand.

Mr. BELAND: That is some progress.

Mr. MARLER: I want to speak on clause 11.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I move that sub-clause (3) of clause 9 be amended by adding these words "provided that no staff officer or ex-staff officer be eligible for appointment to such board."

Mr. CLARK: What is the hon. member's reason for that?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): My reason is, that the attitude of staff officers in the army is too much the attitude of the Pension board. I have never seen on active service a staff officer, or a brass hat, or an officer wearing a fur collar on his military coat, that was human.

Mr. BELAND: This is a direct reflection upon the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark). I resent it very strongly, and for that reason I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. MARLER: I should like to know from some of the military gentlemen in this chamber what the effect of this amendment will be. Will it mean that we can get the best class of men for these appeal boards or not?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): We can get men without number who are not and never have been staff officers and who will be better men for these boards than those who have been staff officers.

Mr. MARLER: How does my hon. friend define a staff officer? What is the exact meaning of a staff officer?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It is defined in the King's regulations. If my hon. friend had ever been in the army, he would know that.

Mr. MARLER: I have been in the army, but I have never been a staff officer and neither has my hon. friend.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Federal appeal board.

Mr. CLARK: I want to know something about sub-clause (4) of clause 10. Does that mean that the chairman of each district appeal board is to be paid $7,000 a year and each member $6,000 a year? Are there nine appeal boards throughout the country and nine chairmen receiving $7,000 a year?

Mr. BELAND: This clause has reference only to the federal appeal board. Clause 9 dealt with the district review boards.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Appeals to district review board:

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I move that the following words be added at the end of sub-clause (1):

Which recommendation, if favourable to the application for pension, shall be final and shall be adopted by the Board of Pension Commissioners.

In support of that, I may say that I see no reason for sending this application for pensions from pillar to post. The Pension board deals with it. Its decision is adverse. Then you have the district review board, and I submit that the opinion of the district review board, if favourable to the applicant, should end the matter. There is no reason why the government and the public should desire to set aside the decision of the district board, if that decision is favourable to the applicant. Such a decision, I think, should be regarded as final.

Mr. BELAND: I am unable to accept the amendment. The royal commission has set out very clearly what the procedure should be in the matter of appeals, and I believe it is only proper that when a decision has been rendered by the district appeal board more favourable to the applicant such recommendation from the district appeal board should be forwarded to the Board of Pension Commissioners that they may carry it into effect; and in case they refuse to carry it out, automatically that decision of the district board will go to the federal appeal board for confirmation or alteration. My hon. friend will see later, as we proceed, that no alteration of the district board's decision can be made by the federal appeal board unless the appellant who received the favourable decision is given an opportunity of appearing personally before the federal board. I think that is a guarantee that the whole scheme will work with some uniformity.

Mr. MARLER: Has the minister considered how many appeals are likely to come to the federal appeal board under subsection 3? The federal appeal board must review substantially every case that goes before the district board.

Mr. BELAND: They will have as many cases as are decided upon by the district appeal boards, with the exception of those appeals, decided by the district boards, which are carried into effect by the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MARLER: There is an appeal from the decision of the district appeal boards. In other words, if a soldier appeals to the district appeal board and that board says his case was not properly treated by the Board of Pension Commissioners, the commissioners can appeal to the federal appeal board, if they want to.

Mr. BELAND: They may refuse to carry out the recommendation of the district appeal board, and if they do so, automatically the appellant's case goes to the federal appeal board.

Mr. MARLER: That is not the way the bill reads.

Mr. BELAND: It is. Let me read the provisions for my hon. friend. They are as follows:

(4) In cases where the recommendation of the district review board is more favourable to the applicant than the decision appealed against, the federal appeal board may not disapprove the recommendation without giving the applicant an opportunity to appear personally, or be represented before it, at a hearing in the district in which the applicant resides, or at the seat of the federal appeal board as may be deemed more convenient. On this hearing, the federal appeal board shall make such final decision as may appear just.

The section my hon. friend refers to is this:

(2) In case a recommendation more favourable to the applicant than the decision appealed against is not carried into effect within a time specified by regulations made under the powers hereinafter conferred, or in case of a recommendation not more favourable to the applicant than the decision appealed against, the recommendation and fyle containing all papers in regard to the case shall be forthwith transmitted by the Board of Pension Commisioners to the federal appeal board, and the Board of Pension Commissioners may at the same time submit for the information of the federal appeal board a statement of their reasons for not carrying into effect the recommendations of the district review board.

So that if the Board of Pension Commissioners should refuse to carry out the decision of the district appeal board in, say, Halifax, they will have to transmit the decision of the district board in Halifax to the federal appeal board, with a statement of their reason for not carrying it into effect, and the decision of the federal board shall be final.

Mr. MARLER: It is my opinion, which I offer for what it is worth, that section 11 constitutes exceedingly cumbersome and expensive machinery for the country to carry out. It means that every single decision, good, bad or indifferent, can be appealed from. I do not believe that the federal board will be able to function owing to the enormous number of cases which are likely to come before it, and in addition to that it is my opinion that the soldiers themselves will find the procedure unsatisfactory. I do not want to go into the matter in any great detail, because one could say very much about it; but this is not the system which has been adopted after a great deal of experience in England. There the practice is that the soldier may appeal on a question of entitlement, that is to say, as to whether or not his injury or aggravation is attributable to war service, which immediately brings him under the act. But on a question of assessment, unless it is the final assessment—and there are final assessments there that is where a soldier is given a certain pension for a definite period—the soldier has an appeal to the boards constituted under the department. In my opinion, I repeat, this is expensive and cumbersome machinery, and I doubt whether the federal board will be able to function. The district review boards will be encumbered with an enormous amount of work, and I do not think that the federal appeal board will be able to deal with all the cases that will be submitted to it, nor do I think that the soldiers will be any more satisfied than they are to-day.

Mr. CARROLL: I think we are all committed, first, to the unit appeal boards, and also to the federal appeal board. My hon. friend (Mr. Marler) has made a deep study of the question and he is sincere in the views he advances. But I am not concerned at present as to whether this procedure is either cumbersome or expensive. I hold the view that if it is in the interests of the returned soldiers of Canada it should be made effective. As the minister has pointed out, if the district appeal board's decision is not carried out by the commissioners, there is a further appeal to the federal board; automatically, on the refusal of the board of commisioners to carry out the district board's finding, the matter is taken to the federal board. That is only in keeping with the principle that underlies our courts of law. We have various courts of law that are both cumbersome and costly; nevertheless, they are very effective. I believe that the gentleman who framed the report of the Ralston commission, and who is a sound lawyer, saw the point of view of the British people in affording every opportunity of appeal to the returned soldiers.

Mr. MARLER: This is not the British system of appeal in these cases.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not saying that it is the British system in regard to pensions, but it is undoubtedly the British principle of jurisprudence. The principle embodied in the provisions of this bill follow that principle as closely as possible.

Mr. MARLER: Follow what?

Mr. CARROLL: The system of British and Canadian jurisprudence.

Mr. MARLER: It does not follow the British system of pensions.

Mr. CARROLL: I have already stated that the system proposed in connection with these appeals is not the British system in regard to pensions. What I am pointing out is that it is consistent with British principles of jurisprudence. It provides an appeal step by step to a tribunal which will be ultimately binding. With regard to the amendment of my hon. friend from Yukon (Mr. Black), I know that that hon. gentleman is absolutely sincere in his regard for the welfare of the returned soldiers of Canada. The hon. gentleman's amendment, however, might work very disastrously to the cause of the returned soldiers.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, let us consider the matter. Does the hon. member desire to make the district appeal board's decision final?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If favourable to the applicant.

Mr. CARROLL: Then I do not think that is quite fair. The applicant, of course, is a returned soldier, and while I desire to see everything given the returned man that we can possibly give him, at the same time we must administer British law impartially both to the applicant and to the other party interested in the matter. There must not be one law for the applicant and another law for the Board of Pension Commissioners. If you have a court of appeal it must be open to all who are interested in the questions it has to decide; and if you have a district appeal board and you declare that a decision which it makes that is unfavourable to the returned soldier shall be appealed against, but that any decision in the returned man's favour shall be final and be subject to no appeal, then you are obviously creating class legislation in this country, which personally I do not like. I emphasize once again the fact that I am as favourable towards giving to the returned soldiers all that we can possibly give them as is any other member in this House, but I do say that we must treat all alike. I agree with my hon. friend from St. Lawrence (Mr. Marler) that the section will be rather cumbersome and perhaps somewhat expensive. But I do not regard this as any insuperable objection to it, for I certainly think it will safeguard the rights, both of the returned soldiers, whom we all want to see protected, and of the exchequer of Canada. I am therefore thoroughly in favour of the provision.

Mr. MANION: I want to say just a few words in regard to subsection 2 of section 10 with reference to tenure of office. It has been pointed out that the commissioners shall be appointed for a period of five years. There are three of them, two at $6,000, and one at $7,000, or, in all, $19,000; and over the period of five years this will mean a total expenditure of $95,000. We are therefore tying ourselves up for this amount for salaries alone, and the minister knows very well that in addition to this there will be secretariats of various kinds, besides travelling and other expenses. Instead of making these appointments for five years, I would suggest that we make them for two. For this reason. Supposing at the end of a couple of years that this system was not found satisfactory, or that under it practically all appeals had been dealt with, and that consequently it was desired by any government then in power to do away with this expensive civil service, under the present legislation they could do nothing, whereas if we made the appointments for two years they could be renewed from time to time while the necessity for the board continued. I know the argument will be advanced that it would be difficult to get men to serve for two years, but I do not think so. I fear that we are building up not only in this branch but in all other branches a civil service which is an appalling expense to the country, and I think the time has come when we should take seriously into account the large salaries of these executives. I think, without interfering with the efficiency of the proposed board, we might very well cut down the tenure of office to two years.

Mr. BELAND: Mr. Chairman, it was also my desire to have this federal appeal board appointed for as short a period as possible. I may point out that the Board of Pension Commissioners is appointed for ten years, and the salaries are exactly the same, $7,000 for the chairman and $6,000 for each of the commissioners. It is of course impossible to fix lower salaries for the federal appeal board commissioners than those we have granted to the Board of Pension Commissioners. Now, if we should reduce the appointment to two years I am afraid it would not be possible to find three outstanding men willing to give up their vocations and devote the whole of their time to this work, because it is provided in one of the subsections of section 10 that these commissioners shall devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duties and shall not engage in any other occupation. That is my reason for thinking they should be appointed for five years. I asked the opinion of the members of the royal commission on this very question, and at first they suggested ten years, but on further consideration they thought five years would be more satisfactory. The members of the district review boards will be appointed for one year only and will be part time men, in view of the fact that after a year we expect there will be a great contraction of their work. It may be that by that time the number of appeals will have decreased so considerably that two or three district boards will be sufficient to deal with them. But I believe it will be the sentiment of parliament in the years to come that there should always be in Ottawa a federal appeal board above the Board of Pension Commissioners. To-day we are the only belligerent country in the world without an appeal board. I grant the expenditure will be large, but what we have to do is in discharge of what we consider to be a national duty to our returned men. I remember when the Land Settlement Act was introduced in this House by the previous government the measure contained so many provisions that appeared cumbersome and difficult of application that we doubted whether it would be a success. During the first year there is no question but what we will experience many difficulties under this measure, and whether we shall be able to overcome them entirely or not remains to be seen, but I hope we shall be able to rise superior to all of such difficulties.

Mr. LOGAN: In reference to the point raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), while there may be some question as to this measure being cumbersome, I was very much impressed to-night by the speech of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He pointed out that for one year an able commission, presided over by a very capable soldier-lawyer in the person of Lieutenant-Colonel Ralston, had been travelling all over the Dominion investigating soldiers' grievances, and as a result of the evidence submitted to them they had made certain recommendations. They have made certain recommendations, and I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that we might fairly accept those recommendations. They come as the well-matured suggestions of those who have had to do with questions of this kind, and I hardly think that we here to-night, who may not, perhaps, have had much experience in the matter, should suggest changes in the proposals made by the commission. In reference to the appointment of a district board the Ralston commission says:

> After considering all the suggestions received from representatives of ex-service men and the systems in vogue in both Great Britain and the United States the commission has come to the conclusion that an appeal procedure which would meet conditions in Canada and fairly protect the interests of both the ex-service man and his dependents, and the country, would be the following which is hereby recommended:
> (a) The establishment, under the Department of Justice, of a district review board for each of the nine D.S.C.R. districts, and of a federal appeal board for the Dominion of Canada, the personnel of each of these tribunals to consist of a medical man, a lawyer and a layman, at least two of whom shall be ex-service men.

Mr. CARROLL: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that every Great War Veterans' organization in this country recommended that before the Ralston commission?

Mr. LOGAN: That makes their recommendation all the stronger. I think we may very well declare that part of the section carried. I suggest also that the recommendation of the Ralston commission in reference to subsection (c) be adopted, namely, that the time within which the entering of appeal may be made be one year instead of three months. On page 17 of their first interim report the Ralston commission say:

> The right of appeal to be open for one year from the coming into force of the regulations, or for one year after the decision complained of, whichever may be last.

But in the bill the one year is changed to three months. I think that three months is entirely too short a time within which appeal may be entered, particularly having regard to the fact that our soldiers are scattered all over the face of the globe. I do not know why we should not adopt the recommendation of the Ralston commission and make the time one year. I beg to move that—

The CHAIRMAN: There is already an amendment before the committee, moved by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black). Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt this amendment?

Mr. SHAW: I think the minister's attitude in connection with this amendment is a correct one. He has very properly referred to the question of uniformity. You cannot have a final decision by one district board which may be entirely out of harmony with the final decision of a board somewhere else. An automatic appeal to the federal appeal board secures uniformity throughout the whole Dominion. If you do not have uniformity you will have continual complaints from soldiers, because many of them will find out that in one part of Canada the soldiers get one sort of treatment, and in another part, another. So that an appeal to the federal appeal board is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) would seem to indicate that the district appeal board is of no use whatever. Why have a district board at all if you are going to go on to a federal appeal board? Why not make your appeal direct from the Pension board to the federal appeal board? The district review board is of no use; it cannot give a decision that will be acted upon in any event. It is only an additional expense and an additional worry to the returned soldier. He will make application to the Pension board for pension; if the board rules against it the appeal goes to the district review board, and no matter what decision they give, there must be an appeal to the federal appeal board.

Mr. CARROLL: Not necessarily.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If the decision of the district review board is in favour of the applicant, why not make it final? The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) undertook to show how the amendment could be embarrassing to the returned soldier; there is nothing more impossible in the world. It would be most satisfactory to the returned soldier—in fact, too satisfactory. How anything could be too satisfactory to the returned soldier to suit this House I am at a loss to understand. Why keep him dangling between one board and another? If the Pension board says no and the district review board says yes, why not let it go at that; why worry the soldier by asking him to go to the federal appeal board? Is not the country satisfied, is not the returned soldier satisfied, if the district review board decides in his favour?

Mr. CARROLL: Then the hon. member is in favour of doing away altogether with the federal appeal board?

12 m.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Not if the decision is against the returned soldier. Give him another chance; let him go to the federal appeal board if the decision is against him. But if the decision is in his favour the public should not want to combat the decision. I do not think the minister wants to do it; I do not think the taxpayer wants to do it. It is an imposition on the returned soldier to force him to go from that district board to the federal board if the decision of the district board is in his favour.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that if the district review board decides against the pensioner he does not then go before the federal appeal board?

Mr. BELAND: He does.

Mr. CARROLL: The point taken by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) is very much stronger than anything I could have said. Suppose, for example, that in the district of Halifax, which comprises quite a large area, a man suffering from tubercular disease gets a decision from the unit appeal board which gives him a pension, and out in Calgary a man under exactly similar conditions gets a decision against him. There is no doubt that there would be dissension if that condition existed. The man in Calgary would say, "Well, the eastern man has got the best of us; he has a decision from his board that we are unable to get from ours." The method proposed is based on the same principle as that which applies in the case of our courts: we have a trial judge, we have the Supreme Courts of the various provinces, then we have appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. That is what I was trying to point out to my hon. friend from Montreal a few moments ago. There is one question, however, I would like to ask the minister: I think I heard him say a little while ago that these amendments as drafted had been presented to the federal command of the Great War Veterans' Association, who had expressed themselves as being in favour of them. Is that correct?

Mr. BELAND: As soon as the bill was printed I sent a copy of it to the office to which my hon. friend refers. The only suggestion I received from them was that the time within which appeal should be made might be extended to one year. That is the suggestion the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) made. They also suggested something along the line referred to by my hon. friend from Winnipeg, with regard to marriage after the appearance of disability.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I do not think it could be suggested for a moment that if the Great War Veterans' Association or any soldiers' organization were asked whether a decision of the district board favourable to the soldier should be final, they would not say yes.

Mr. BELAND: Of course they would say yes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Sub-section 2 says:

In case a recommendation more favourable to the applicant—

And so on. Who is to say whether the decision is more favourable or not to the applicant, who is going to be the judge of that?

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend asks who is going to say that?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Yes.

Mr. BELAND: Any child could say it. If you have a 20 per cent disability and you appeal to have more and 30 per cent is granted, I think anybody can say it is more favourable. If you have no pension, and you appeal, and you are awarded a pension, I think it is more favourable, but if your appeal is not granted then the recommendation is not more favourable. My hon. friend has not given any thought to that.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I have given some thought to the matter. The hypothetical cases which the minister has cited are easy of discernment. If a man's disability is fixed at 20 per cent and it is increased to 30 per cent it is easy enough to see that it is more favourable. But if the district board gives a decision in the ambiguous way in which the Pension board has time and again given it, and which no one not even a lawyer can interpret, it is going to be very difficult to say whether it is more favourable or unfavourable.

Mr. BELAND: No such decision can be rendered.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): They may have given a decision which in the end does not grant a pension but still it may be argued that it is more favourable than the decision rendered by the Pension board, and who is to say whether it is more favourable or unfavourable? I want the wording to be such as will make the decision of the district board final and let it go at that, that is if we desire to ameliorate the condition of the returned soldier.

Mr. MANION: I think a very strong argument has been advanced by the hon. member for Yukon. I know that very often in the past there has been a complaint among the soldiers that in case of an examination by a local board as to pension the result was told to the applicant and then the report was sent into the Pension commissioners at Ottawa, and there was some cutting down of the decision. I think the minister will admit that on many occasions under this clause there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction. Certainly it has appeared to me many times to be rather a strange thing that when a local board of whatever number of doctors, three I think usually, examine a case and, we will say, award a 40 per cent pension, that after they have sent in their report to the Pension board it has been cut down to 20 or 30 per cent. It has always appeared to me very strange that the Pension board should presume—because that is the proper word to use—to alter the decision of the three men who have examined the man. In the same way in the cases mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Black) there would be some questions asked. It is true that the law makes provision that the applicant may appear before an appeal board but if unsuccessful he would have to pay his own expense.

Mr. BELAND: Not before the federal appeal board.

Mr. MANION: He would if he was unsuccessful.

Mr. BELAND: Not if he was unsuccessful.

Mr. MANION: Then I have read the clause wrongly.

Mr. BELAND: I will read the clause if my hon. friend will listen to me:

The expenses of the successful applicant in appearing before the district review board shall be paid on the scale now allowed applicants brought in for periodical medical examination, and the expenses of applicant or his representative in appearing before the federal appeal board shall, if the attendance of either be required by that board, also be paid on the same scale.

Mr. MANION: Yes. But there is the provision "if the attendance be required by that board." He may not be required by the board. They may decide without requiring the attendance.

Mr. BELAND: Will my hon. friend bear with me for one more second?

Mr. MANION: Yes. Will the minister tell us what clause he is reading?

Mr. BELAND: I am now going to read sub-section 4 of section 11:

In cases where the recommendation of the district review board is more favourable to the applicant than the decision appealed against, the federal appeal board may not disapprove the recommendation without giving the applicant an opportunity to appear personally, or be represented before it, at a hearing in the district in which the applicant resides, or at the seat of the federal appeal board as may be deemed more convenient. On this hearing the federal appeal board shall make such final decision as may appear just.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering subsection 1 of clause 11 to which an amendment has been moved by Mr. Black (Yukon). Is it the pleasure of the committee that the amendment be adopted?

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MANION: I just wish to go a little further in order to get the point cleared up. I do not think that the two clauses the minister has read are necessarily to be interpreted as he interprets them. I think they may be interpreted that way or they may be interpreted otherwise. To repeat what the minister read:

> The expenses of the applicant or his representative in appearing before the federal appeal board shall, if the attendance of either be required by that board, also be paid on the same scale.

The other clause quoted by the minister says, they shall give him the opportunity of appearing. Suppose they do not require him to appear but he takes the opportunity of appearing? I think the clauses conflict.

Mr. BELAND: They cannot reach a more favourable recommendation without giving him the opportunity to appear.

Mr. MANION: I would not say that the interpretation is absolutely as the minister makes it.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I should like to ask the minister who is to decide when the recommendation is more favourable or otherwise under section 2?

Mr. BELAND: Well the decision itself expresses the fact in plain language.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Who is to interpret it, the minister, the board, or the returned soldier?

Mr. BELAND: No; the decision itself. If the appeal of the man for an increased pension is not sustained he does not get a more favourable decision. If he gets an increase of pension he has a more favourable decision. Nothing could be clearer.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

On subsection 5—Time for appeals.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Logan has moved an amendment to subsection 5 to strike out the words "three months" and substitute the words "one year" in lieu thereof.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is that in accordance with the recommendation of the commission, and is it satisfactory to the organizations of ex-service men?

Mr. BELAND: The royal commission recommended one year. I consulted the Department of Justice and asked them what was the procedure in the law courts. They intimated to me that a month or thirty days was usually the time allowed for an appeal. I concluded that perhaps three months would be a reasonable delay, that is how that period came to appear in this clause. The recommendation of the conclusion was for one year. I realize that three months is too short and I am willing to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 10—Payment of expenses.

Mr. MARLER: There should be another section here in order to tie up the appeals with the Pension Act. I bring that to the attention of the minister, as section 11—

> All appeals under this section shall be tried and decided under the provisions of the Pension Act and amendments thereto.

It is in order to tie up the appeal board with the Pension Act itself.

An hon. MEMBER: It is tied up now.

Mr. MARLER: No, I do not think so.

Mr. BELAND: We should have a little more explanation. I did not catch the purport of the amendment.

Mr. MARLER: The purport of that amendment is that when these boards of appeal are established they shall look to the Pension Act and amendments thereto as the basis of their appeal in law.

Mr. BELAND: Is that not implied?

Mr. MARLER: No.

Mr. POWER: When we constituted the Supreme Court I do not think we said, "All decisions shall be made according to the law."

Mr. BELAND: I would think it was implied.

Mr. MARLER: The House can take it or leave it as it thinks proper, but I have gone through the section with the greatest care with those who understand the subject, and they tell me that they approve of my suggestion.

Mr. CARROLL: This is an amendment to the Pension Act, and all appeals and all trials under the amendment must be in conformity with the Pension Act.

Mr. CALDWELL: If any amendment is to be made to the Pension Act no such clause as this should be added. If it is necessary, of course I have no objection to it, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. LOGAN: In my humble opinion this amendment of my hon. friend, with all due respect, is ridiculous. You might as well put at the end of every act we pass a provision that the court shall adjudicate according to this act. It is the law, and they have to adjudicate according to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I am inclined to think the amendment is going to destroy all the good this present bill would accomplish, and that it will tie up the Pension Act in such a way that it will not function. I take it that it is nothing more than an amendment put forward by the sympathizers of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. member has no right to make that allegation, and I ask him very kindly to withdraw it. I can give him my word there is no such suggestion. I have studied the matter with great care, and I am just as much in favour of the returned man as he is. Perhaps he has not the discernment to see it. This is a fair and open amendment. I do not force my opinion on the hon. member. I suggest that he withdraw the allegation he made.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I do not see that there is anything in the allegation to take exception to. The amendment presented is absolutely unnecessary. Many hon. members of this House and people outside of this House have studied this particular act. We had a commission that sat for a year for the purpose of suggesting legislation which would have no restrictions to prevent it from functioning. Each member of this committee sitting here to-night is just as eager to have legislation brought in that will function properly as are those members who are submitting the different amendments. As far as the allegations go, I cannot see that there has been any reflection, but it is a well known fact—and the opinion has been expressed in this House—that the Board of Pension Commissioners have not functioned as the people of Canada think they should function; and that is why this particular legislation is introduced. Therefore, I cannot see how I can support the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. CALDWELL: Before the bill is reported, I have an amendment which the minister asked me to withhold until the other provisions of the bill were passed. It will be an amendment to section 33 of the Pension Act.

Mr. BELAND: Section 15 of the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL: The amendment is—

> Subsection 1 of section 33 of the said act as amended by chapter 62 of the statutes of 1920 is further amended by inserting after the words "married to him" in the second line thereof the words "within one year from the date of discharge from the forces".

Mr. POWER: I rise to pretty nearly the same point of order as the last one. This amendment involves additional expense to the Crown. It is true in your decision, Mr. Chairman, you stated the minister had given notice and had brought down a resolution which was in very wide and general terms and could cover all possible amendments, but I will call your attention to the resolution. It says:

> Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Pension Act, chapter 43 of the statutes of 1919 and the amending acts, and to provide—
> 1. That enactments be made respecting pensions for military services—

The amendment proposed by my hon. friend for Victoria and Carleton is not respecting pensions for military service. It is respecting pensions granted in respect of military service.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am surprised at the hon. member.

Mr. POWER: The widow of the soldier does not get any pension for her military service; so that under the strict interpretation of the wording of the resolution the amendment of my hon. friend is out of order. The widow gets a pension on account of the military service of her late husband, but she does not get any pension for military service.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that not true of all soldiers' widows who do get pensions?

Mr. POWER: Yes, it is true.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think nobody but a lawyer would think of such a technical interpretation.

Mr. POWER: When a man has been caught up on these technical points so often, he does not see why somebody else should not suffer, particularly when he is pleading a bad case.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am glad he admits the bad case.

Mr. POWER: I submit under the terms of the resolution the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I fear I must rule against the hon. member. The resolution preliminary to the bill, section 1, says:

That enactment be made respecting pensions for military services rendered during the war and after the war.

It does not say to whom these pensions shall be paid for the services rendered by those who did render such services, and pensions are payable to either dependents of those who might be classed as dependents. I think, in view of the discussion which has taken place, and in view of what the hon. member knows as to whom pensions are payable, that it must mean any person the House may decide is entitled to a pension.

Mr. POWER: All through the Pension Act we find these words, "pensions shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the force." When they say "in respect of members of the force" they mean to dependents on account of the services of members of the force. So that if the minister, when he brought down his resolution, wished to allow the field to be open for amendments which would grant pensions to other than those who actually earned the pensions on the field of battle, he would have said "for military service" or "in respect of military service." I submit that is the wording of the act; it is carried all through the act, and it has been carried through the act since 1919.

The CHAIRMAN: I feel I must find that the wording is more general and wider in the act than in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Caldwell).

Mr. CARROLL: What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. CALDWELL: The effect will be to grant a pension to the widow of a soldier who marries after his disability has appeared, if he was married within one year after his discharge.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Is this the same amendment that was passed by this House a year ago?

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes. After due investigation by the Pension committee last year, it was recommended in the report of the Pension committee that this should be embodied in the act, and it was passed by this House, I think without any dissent.

Mr. POWER: Yes, there was.

Mr. CALDWELL: Possibly by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power); but I do not think we took his suggestion seriously, even at that time, because he is very sympathetic to the soldier and his dependents. We all know that. When the bill went to the Senate, the bill was amended by cutting out this clause.

Mr. POWER: Whatever the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) may say, I have serious objection to this amendment, and I have objected to it even since I have been a member of the Pension committee, that is, since the session of 1918. I seriously and conscientiously believe there should be some finality about these pensions. The woman who marries an ex-soldier after the appearance of a disability, enters into this bond with her eyes open. She knows he is suffering from a disability, and she should not be pensionable at his death. If we now allow this widow to obtain a pension, I am morally certain that at the next election, —or if not at the next election, the election after that, because at the next election there will be a good government in power, but at the next election after that there might not be—we shall have this placed before the party which is in power: "You have already granted a pension to the woman who marries one year after the appearance of a disability. Why not extend that to five years?" The hon. member for Carleton told us at one time that he wished to extend it to five years. They might be asked: "Why not extend it to ten years? Why not extend it to the very moment before the death of the ex-soldier?" We shall have an ex-soldier at the age of seventy-five or eighty marrying a young woman and have pensions continuing in aeternum. We shall be paying more than they do in the United States, where they are paying more for pensions to-day than they were at the end of the Civil War. I am afraid to open the door. There are many cases which deserve sympathetic consideration; but if we once open the door, election after election we shall have to extend this and extend it until such time as we shall have a pension bill that the country will not be able to stand.

Mr. MANION: All kinds of promises were made at the last election.

Mr. POWER: Yes. The hon. member made some, and so did I.

Mr. CALDWELL: The pre-election promises of the hon. member for Quebec South seem to be haunting him somewhat.

Mr. POWER: No, they are not.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have no fear of pre-election promises because I made none. I do not feel that this is a radical thing to do at all. It was passed by this House last year without any serious dissent. It is a matter of justice due to the widow of a soldier, who married him within one year after his discharge. There is no danger of opening the door. Three years ago I moved this amendment in committee that it would be applicable to anyone married within five years of the discharge. At that time the five years had not elapsed, and there was an objection that this might be taken advantage of by some women wishing to marry a soldier for his pension. I did not feel there was danger of that then; but due to the fact that the year has expired some time ago, I do not think there is trouble to be feared in passing this amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I feel that the door should be open to some extent to provide for a certain number of cases, and to provide for that certain number of cases, the door must be open for at least a year. There are a number of cases particularly of men who went overseas in the early stages of the war and who came back to the Old Country and got married. In that respect I fail to see how these particular widows can be provided for unless we open the door for at least a year. Although I am not in favour of going to any great extent, I should like to ask the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) in just what way he would provide for those that enlisted in the early stages of the war, went to France, returned to England and married, again returned to France and afterwards met with casualties, if we do not open the door for at least a year. Because those men enlisted in all good faith, went to France and back and were married, this all taking place before the Pension Act was drafted, before we had a Pension Act or any pension regulations. In that way I feel that this amendment is only meeting a situation that the country believes is fair and right.

Mr. POWER: I would simply not give a pension to a woman who married after the appearance of a disability.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Does the hon. member not think such women are entitled to pensions?

Mr. POWER: No.

Amendment (Mr. Caldwell) agreed to: yeas 21; nays 17.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. CLARK: I beg to move:

That section 33, subsection (2) chapter 43, 1919, be amended by striking out the words:

"Provided that the death occurs within five years after the date of retirement or discharge of the date of commencement of pension."

I will explain this in a few words. I brought the matter to the attention of the minister the other evening and, while he did not express himself, I understood him to be unfavourable to the proposition. It is this. Suppose a man was wounded overseas and was 100 per cent disabled. He came back to Canada and his wife cared for him for a period of five years. He dies in the sixth year, and in order that his widow shall receive a pension she must prove that the man's death was strictly attributable to service. If she cannot prove this, the pension is not awarded. On the other hand, if the man dies within the five year limit, the widow is entitled to the pension. My contention is that if the man was so severely wounded as to come within any of the classes 1 to 5 the circumstances of his family are practically as bad as they would be had he been killed. In fact, viewing the matter apart from the question of his wife's affections, and considering, for the purposes of argument, merely the material aspect of the case, it would have been probably better had he been killed outright, because his wife must necessarily suffer considerably in supporting him. I think, therefore, that the time limit should be wiped out. I have in mind a particular case which I brought to the minister's attention and with which the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) is familiar. The case recently arose in that hon. gentleman's constituency of one Private MacPhail.

Mr. FORKE: This man was absolutely blinded and was gassed, so that he was utterly unable to earn a cent in any way. He was a burden to his wife and died recently. Yet she cannot get a pension.

Mr. BELAND: The Pension Act provides that if a pensioner, who comes within the classes 1 to 5, that is to say, who receives a pension of 80 to 100 per cent, dies from any cause other than service before the expiration of five years, the widow will be pensionable just as though he had died from disabilities due to service. The provision was inserted in the Pension Act originally for the purpose of meeting the cases in the first few years of high disability pensioners. For instance, a man may have lost an arm or a leg or an eye. He would receive a disability pension which would entitle his widow, if he died within five years, to a pension, whatever might be the cause of his death. That provision was made, I take it, for the purpose of affording the pensioner sufficient opportunity the more easily to support his disability. Since then the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act was passed by this parliament giving the privilege to any man in any physical condition whatever to secure insurance just for the asking and without medical examination. Such cases as my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) and my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) have mentioned would therefore come under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. Any high disability pensioner could insure his life for $5,000 or less in favour of his wife and if any accident happened to him and he died of any other cause than disability due to war service his wife would receive the insurance. But in this case to which my hon. friend has referred, we must fix a time limit, and five years was considered reasonable. We hear of it now because the five years are up in some cases. Still it is the privilege at the present time of all those high disability pensioners to insure for $5,000 as a maximum. I submit that to the committee and am willing to abide by their decision.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BELAND: What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark):

That section 33, subsection (2) chap. 43, 1919, be amended by striking out the words: "Provided that the death occurs within five years after the date of retirement or discharge or the date of commencement of pension."

Mr. BELAND: Do I understand it is the intention that for all time to come these men shall receive a pension, no matter what the cause of their disability is?

Mr. CLARK: Not at all. Where a man is so severely wounded in the field that he becomes 100 per cent disabled, I want his case to be treated in the same way as if he had been killed. Because he is a 100 per cent disability case, therefore he is of no more value to his wife than the dead man would be to the widow.

Mr. FORKE: It may seem almost amusing to talk in this way, but in the particular case referred to the man was 100 per cent incapacitated. He was blind, he had been gassed, and was absolutely a burden upon his wife.

Mr. CLARK: There are many such cases.

Mr. MANION: It is apparent that in the case explained by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) the wife might be placed in a worse position than if her husband was killed, because if later he dies her pension is cut off, whereas if he had died at the front she would receive a pension. I think it is a very reasonable request and should be accepted.

Mr. BELAND: I do not think we are at present in a position to decide this definitely. I would propose to my hon. friend that instead of five years we say six, which will cover all the cases now pending.

Mr. CLARK: It will not cover the very case cited by the leader of the Progressive party.

Mr. BELAND: When did this man die?

Mr. CLARK: Just a few days ago.

Mr. BELAND: He will be covered.

Mr. CLARK: No, he was discharged early in 1917.

Mr. FORKE: This happened in the first year of the war when the man had only been overseas for a short time. He was taken prisoner by the Germans and through maltreatment he lost his sight. He came back in the early years of the war, and his case did more to enliven enlistment in the Brandon district than anything else that happened. It created that war spirit which proved such a stimulus to enlistment everywhere. But I can see the difficulty the minister has in mind.

Mr. MARLER: Is this the case the hon. member brought up before the parliamentary committee last year?

Mr. CLARK: No.

Amendment (Mr. Clark) agreed to. Yeas 25, nays 21.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the minister made any provision in the new legislation to take care of those Canadians who belonged to the British Expeditionary Force and do not get any pension at all?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that some of those men get a small pension of $17, and are total disability cases. The pension is too small for their support. I think we might take care of such cases and make up the deficiency under our act.

Mr. BELAND: They have the option of taking the Canadian or the British rates.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion):

That there be added to subsection 2 of section 26 of the Pension Act 1919, and amendments thereto, the following: "Provided however, that the Board of Pension Commissioners shall have discretion to pay the pension to any person who was being, or was entitled to be, supported by the pensioner at the time of his last examination."

Mr. MANION: This amendment is to cover such cases as I cited a couple of days ago. Suppose a man is being paid a 70 per cent pension, it is a temporary pension and he has to be examined every six months. Perhaps he gets into trouble or deserts his wife and children, goes across to the States and fails to reappear for examination. According to my understanding his pension is cut off. This amendment is to give the commission discretion to continue the pension to his wife and children as if the man had complied with the conditions. I think it is only just to the wife and children that this amendment should be accepted. There are not many such cases, but when they do occur great hardship results to the man's dependents. I do not think the minister could have any objection to this proposal, for discretion is left entirely to the commission.

Mr. BELAND: It is a new principle entirely. A man may have died from any cause other than a war cause, and a pension would be awarded to the wife and children for three or four years after he died when in the ordinary course they would not be entitled to anything.

Mr. MANION: If after looking into the case the commission feel the man would have been allowed a pension, it would be entirely at their discretion to award a pension to his dependents. I do not think there are many cases which are left to the commission's discretion under this legislation.

Mr. BELAND: There are a great many cases of desertion.

Mr. MANION: It would be up to the commission to decide whether the wife and children should be given a pension. However, I am in the hands of the committee.

Amendment (Mr. Manion) agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, before the bill is reported I wish to again refer to a type of case which I mentioned the other evening and which I think should be provided for in this amended bill. The case is that of a man with a wife in Canada going overseas and contracting a bigamous marriage, although there were no suspicious circumstances and the second wife thought the marriage was bona fide. Subsequently the man was killed at the front and the widow in Canada claimed a pension. The act as it now stands requires that a pension shall be paid to one wife only. I made the proposal that under the circumstances I have outlined the pension should be payable to both women or at least that there should be a discretion in the Board of Pension Commissioners to so order. I put the facts of a particular case before the minister, and he stated that it could be dealt with without amendment. I wrote him to find out how, but I have not yet had a reply. Possibly he has not yet received my letter.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. POWER: Did my hon. friend say that the man left two widows?

Mr. CLARK: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Then one of them could not have been his widow.

Mr. CLARK: Technically, that is so. But these are the facts: The man had a wife in Canada, went overseas, committed bigamy, but so far as the second woman was concerned she knew nothing about his previous marriage until after his death. She came to Canada, claimed a pension and was refused because the first wife made a similar claim, which was allowed.

Mr. POWER: But under the present act the commission may, in its discretion, give a pension to the unmarried wife. So I do not know what my hon. friend has to complain of. I think I remember two or three years ago a case similar to that cited by my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark). A man had been separated from his wife for seven or eight years, proceeded overseas, committed bigamy and later was killed in action. Both widows put in claims. The Board of Pension Commissioners, if my memory serves me right granted a pension to the unmarried wife on the ground that the first one had deserted him and was not entitled to any consideration. She had not written to him or had not lived with him for seven or eight years, therefore they thought the second wife was more attached to him, though she was not married to him—she could not have been, because he had already contracted marriage with another. For these reasons they gave her the pension. So that the Pension board has discretion to do the same thing in the case my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. CLARK: The board has discretion, it is true, but here is a case where the wife who was left in Canada had a family and there had been no separation. The deceased, however, after going to France, had married this other woman on the 29th of January, 1916, and he was killed on September 29th, 1916. A daughter was born of that bigamous marriage on January 4th, 1917. Both of these women are absolutely above suspicion, and consequently it was perfectly natural that the Pension board should award the real widow the pension. But it cannot be said that the woman who went through the form of marriage on the second occasion is not entitled to consideration. She contracted the marriage in good faith; her marriage certificate is produced and is above suspicion.

Mr. POWER: After reflecting on the various phases of the Pension Act regarding the unmarried wife and cases such as the one mentioned by my hon. friend. I make this observation: that the boys are going to have a very good time in the next war.
