THE CONSTITUTION

FAILURE OF THE MEECH LAKE ACCORD—MOTION FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate adjourn now to debate an urgent issue, namely the consequences of the Meech Lake Accord failure.

I am proposing this debate now because we have been through a difficult weekend and I would like to express my own feelings on the failure of this accord.

I am convinced that a number of senators from Quebec and other provinces, at least on this side of the House, would like to express their opinions and feelings following this unique weekend in Canadian history.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in my opinion we should give honourable senators who wish to do so the opportunity to speak to the motion for the special emergency debate. Perhaps no one wishes to speak to the motion; on the other hand, perhaps everyone agrees that we should have it. I should point out that we received no notice of this motion, although it is quite in order to make such a motion without notice. Certainly, the opportunity should be given to any senators who might want it to say that there is no need for an emergency debate on this subject, if they feel the matter is closed and should be allowed to rest quietly.

Hon. Duff Roblin: There is a preliminary step that we must take. We need the decision of the Hon. the Speaker as to whether or not he is willing to admit the order. If he says it is in order to proceed with this debate, then unless it is challenged by those on the other side, we will proceed.

Senator Frith: That is precisely why we should have an opportunity to speak to the motion. The Hon. the Speaker may have to make a decision, and I am sure he and all honourable senators would be interested in the views of senators as to whether we should adjourn for this debate. The final decision is the Senate's.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, we should consider this matter carefully. I have no objection to having an emergency debate. However, I do have an objection to the government springing it upon us. Surely it would have been courteous to let our house leader know about it beforehand.

Senator Roblin: Since when was that ever done?

Senator Olson: Springing this motion on us at 2.20 p.m. is indicative of the way in which the government has been handling things for the last several weeks, and how they got into this kind of trouble.

I am sure all senators on the other side—at least those who go to their meetings—knew about this motion several minutes ago. However, we on this side did not know about it. Surely honourable senators on this side ought to have a few minutes to decide whether or not they wish to give unanimous consent to this motion.

Senator Roblin: The Hon. the Speaker has to rule.

Senator Olson: I understand that, but we on this side need time to think the matter over. When the government acts like this, it is no wonder they get into trouble. I am talking for a few minutes so honourable senators can consider the implications. I am sure that Senator Roblin and others understand that. I have had approximately 15 years' experience in doing this from time to time in the other place in order that the people at the Table and in the Chair can check the precedents and know the consequences of taking this kind of action.

However, it is clear that it is extremely discourteous on the part of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to spring this matter on us at this time.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Bourassa said, "Leave it alone; let it rest!"

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in my experience in dealing with my colleague, Senator Doody, this is unusual. I understand that because of the alleged emergency he might have found himself in a position of not being able to give me the kind of notice that we like to give each other.

Without ever having signed anything to that effect, we have an understanding that we try to avoid surprising each other so that each can advise his colleagues of the business for the day and what will be before the Senate for consideration. However, if there is any discourtesy here, I do not want to return discourtesy for it.

Senator Olson: It is called tactics, I think.

Senator Frith: I am sure it is quite apparent to the government that we have had no opportunity to prepare for such an event as this. I am sure it is understood that in our caucus today we discussed the question of Meech Lake. At that time I offered several versions of how I thought the subject might come before us during today's proceedings, but I did not include this scenario because I did not know that it would happen.

Perhaps we might have a moment to consider the matter; and if the Senate wishes to extend to us that courtesy, we might have an opportunity to caucus for a few minutes so that we can return and respond to the request.

Senator Roblin: You must first of all get the Hon. the Speaker's ruling. You may not have a problem.

Senator Frith: I am asking for this in order to help the Hon. the Speaker in case he has to make a ruling.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, never in my parliamentary experience have I seen an emergency debate be called at the beginning of a sitting without any prior notice to anyone . . . not even to you, Mr. Speaker.

I too am sorry that the Meech Lake Accord failed. The Prime Minister of Canada and senator Murray announced on Saturday that: "Meech is dead."

I feel it may be a bit late, now that the deal is dead, to call an emergency debate. I would suggest that you take that into consideration.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, to answer my honotable colleague, I would like to say that an emergency debate can start immediately after the events. You are not suggesting that we should have met Saturday or Sunday, are you?

We meet today for the first time since the events took place. That is why it is urgent that we discuss them.

If we wait until tomorrow to request an emergency debate, the answer we will get is: "It is too late; you should have requested it yesterday." So, senator David requested it today. He requests that the debate be held immediately because the events are recent and emergency debates are allowed immediately after such events.

Senator Thériault: Are there any precedents?

Senator Asselin: It is clear that my colleague's argument is not valid.

Senator Thériault: Are there any precedents?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: What are you afraid of?

Senator Asselin: Last year, Senator Grafstein raised the same question during an emergency debate about some issue I cannot recall at this time. He was granted his emergency debate. Why should the Senate deny Senator David an opportunity to discuss the important issue we were confronted with last weekend, and which is likely to have a tremendous impact on the future of our country.

I suggest that permission should be granted.

Senator Guay: Mr. Bourassa insisted that we should leave the matter alone, honourable senators!

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, Item No. 19 on our Orders of the Day might help us solve this problem. It says:

> . . . calling the attention of the Senate to the debate and process concerning the Meech Lake Accord.

[Senator Frith.]

The Meech Lake Accord, whether dead or alive, is Item No. 19 on our Orders of the Day, so that all those who want to debate this item should be free to do so.

I wonder about the emergency. When we get to Item No. 19 of the Orders of the Day, all will be allowed to rise to deal with it.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Mr. Speaker, honourable senators, I suggest that if we were to accept Senator Robichaud's suggestion, all senators who have already dealt with this item would be excluded.

Senator Thériault: You, for instance!

Senator Simard: Listen! Either we dealt with this issue or we did not. There is no need for you to get upset, Senator Thériault! We know that you are quite nervous after having elected Mr. Chrétien and I can understand why the Liberal Party is uptight.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: On the same issue, there is indeed another item, following Senator Chaput-Rolland's Notice of Inquiry.

Honourable senators will agree, I think, when I say that Senator Robichaud's suggestion was well intented.

In view of its very nature and without having to go through the whole Question Period and Orders of the Day, I suggest that Liberal senators would show again their good faith by accepting to start this afternoon sitting by dealing with Senator David's motion.

Senator Thériault: No!

[English]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to say, without committing myself, that, obviously, there are people in this chamber whose role in the recent events was such that they have to begin rewriting history as quickly as possible. Therefore, I would support an emergency debate in order to give them the opportunity to twist the facts, and us the opportunity to straighten them out!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I said, the rule that applies is the one that provides that no notice is required. Rule 46(g), on page 17, reads:

> No notice is required of the following motions:
> (g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day;

In a sense, the motion is out of order, since it ought to have come before we proceeded to Orders of the Day. However, I think Senator Robichaud's suggestion is worthy of consideration, namely, that we can debate the matter as long as we wish under an order that already appears on the order paper. Therefore, I renew my request to the Senate, that we rise for a period of 15 to 20 minutes in order to caucus on the question.

Senator Simard: You had better call Mr. Trudeau while you are at it!

Senator Steuart: Who are you going to call, God?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have no objection to debating the Meech Lake Accord, what happened over the weekend, or anything of an emergency nature. However, I was of the impression that the Prime Minister had said on Saturday that the Meech Lake Accord was dead because it had not been approved. If the accord is dead, I am wondering what the big rush is to have an emergency debate, unless it is to revive it, or bury it.

Senator Barootes: Haven't you heard of a eulogy?

Senator Steuart: You mean "urology."

Senator Bonnell: The honourable senator says that it is "urology." At any rate, perhaps the promoter of this emergency debate could inform us now what the emergency is so that we can debate the matter—

• (1410)

Senator Frith: That is required, by the way.

Senator Bonnell: —and support him. If it is a matter of reviving the Meech Lake Accord so that it can be passed again and thus achieve unity in our country, that would be wonderful. If the situation is that the government has made a mistake, and there might be a way by debating the matter here and now, that we could give the government some advice on how to get the accord reopened, then fine. However, if Meech Lake is dead, what is the emergency?

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, as Senator Frith pointed out, the standing order under which Senator David has asked for this debate is 46(g), which I would like to identify specifically:

> (g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance—

Senator Frith: Go on. It continues.

Senator Ottenheimer: Yes:

> —(which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day.

Senator Frith: We have not heard the part within the brackets. We have not heard what the stated reason is.

Senator Ottenheimer: I do not have a transcript of what the Honourable Senator David said, but my understanding was that he indicated the reason for his request was the contemporary situation within Canada today as a result of events that transpired over the weekend. I am trying to draw a distinction. As some honourable senators have said, what is the sense of debating Meech Lake when the Prime Minister and others have said that Meech Lake is dead? We all know Meech Lake is dead. It is not Meech Lake, as I understand it, that Senator David wishes to debate. It is a matter of urgent public importance, which is the situation in Canada today, whether it is in Quebec or in any other province. Surely no one can seriously submit, no matter what one's views on any specific issue are, that we in this country are not faced with a situation of urgent public importance. Whether one was for it or against it, Meech Lake is now dead, but surely today, in Canada, there is a situation—

Senator Perrault: You should have raised it last week.

Senator Ottenheimer: —of urgent public importance. For the Senate to rule that there is not, today, a situation of urgent public importance before the country would be to make ourselves incredible in the eyes of Canada, irrespective of one's views on any specific matter. I do submit that there certainly is a matter of urgent public importance before the country today.

Senator Guay: Bourassa said to leave it alone!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the rules require the proposer to explain the purpose of his motion, I am not satisfied that at the present moment there is in this country a matter of urgent public importance, requiring immediate debate, within our rules. As a matter of fact, it is true, as I am sure Senator Ottenheimer and others will accept, that many of the predictions of dire consequences and matters of urgent public importance, such as the fall of the dollar, a reduction in investment and so on, have not come true.

Senator Flynn: If you want to say that, you can say it later.

Senator Frith: However, that is not the point. The point now is whether there is in this country a matter or a state of affairs that is urgent; some urgent disaster that exists at the present time that should require the Senate to adjourn immediately in order to deal with it. That is the issue before us now, not to debate the question of the pros or cons of that particular situation. We would have to say that there exists in this country what was described before Meech Lake failed as potential panic in the street, such that the Senate should adjourn in order to deal with it. That is why the rule provides, before we go any further, that the proposer of the motion explain and convince the Senate that the situation is of such urgency that we should adjourn the business of the Senate in order to deal with it.

I ask first that the proposer so explain, and then anyone else who wishes can speak on the issue, which is the preliminary issue. I then ask that we be given a chance to consider the matter for a few moments before resuming debate.

Senator Flynn: Enough! Be seated!

[Translation]

Senator David: Honourable senators, I feel that my colleague Senator Ottenheimer explained as well as I could the reasons for the urgency of debating the Meech Lake Accord which, I agree, has now expired. It is very hard for me to understand why you, Senator Frith, and your colleagues do not see it as urgent.

In the five years I have been in this Chamber, I do not remember a subject that should have been discussed more urgently than this one today or at the very least the Quebec senators should have an opportunity to convey to you their feelings following a development that deeply affected the six or seven million inhabitants of our province. If you do not understand that, it seems to me that you really do not understand Quebec and its people.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, this motion has been brought forward without notice. It is clear that it is out of order by reason of it being brought forward at the wrong time.

A motion can be moved without notice for the adjournment of the Senate for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance before the house proceeds to the Orders of the Day. There are certain routine proceedings, very often relating to government business, that in the interest of this house should be dealt with before such a motion may be moved. It is not just the interest of the opposition that is at stake when a procedure that has the effect of pushing aside the important routine business is attempted.

Quite apart from the question of whether or not there is a matter of public importance requiring urgent debate, we do have this prior question, namely, that the proposal he has put before the Senate is, in fact, out of order at this time.

It may well be that later this afternoon, after routine proceedings, Senator David could go ahead with his motion, but I suggest it is out of order, particularly from the viewpoint of the government, that we put aside the well-established practice of dealing first with the routine proceedings.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Stewart's submission that the motion made by Senator David is out of order because it is out of place, obviously, he is referring to the parenthetical part of rule 46(g), which states:

> . . . (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day;

Senator Stewart: No!

Senator Ottenheimer: I thought the honourable gentleman said the motion had been moved at the wrong time because we had to go through other orders of business before we got to Orders of the Day, and that therefore other important matters might be precluded.

Honourable senators, I point out that under the heading "Order of Business" there are nine headings: Presentation of Petitions, Reading of Petitions, Reports of Committees, Notices of Inquiries, Notices of Motions, Question Period, Orders of the Day, and then two others. So the seventh order of business is Orders of the Day, but the standing order says:

> . . . (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day.

It does not say which order of the day. There are nine orders of the day.

Senator Stewart: No, you are misreading it!

Senator Ottenheimer: That suggests to me that before one can get to the Orders of the Day, this is in order. It does not say "immediately after Question Period," which is item No. 6 on the Orders of the Day, but before item No. 7, which is Orders of the Day. It says, "Before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day."

Senator David has certainly fulfilled the requirement in moving his motion before the Orders of the Day. The Hon. the Speaker did not call Orders of the Day. The motion has certainly been made before the house proceeds to the Orders of the Day.

[Senator David.]

• (1420)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first, if honourable senators want to caucus for 10 or 15 minutes to talk about this matter, there is no objection from this side. I believe we would best be served by deciding to get on with this debate as soon as possible. I do not think it is in the interests of the Senate, or of the country, to pretend that this is not a matter of urgent public importance. We are deluding ourselves to think it is anything else. To hang this matter up on a procedural point will bring no glory to the Senate or its members. I suggest we adjourn for 10 or 15 minutes and then return to deal with the situation expeditiously.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Doody that we should—

Hon. Len Marchand: May I have my say? I have been up and down for the past few minutes.

Honourable senators, this is hardly an emergency. I can understand the urgency, but it is hardly an emergency. The plight of my people is well known. Elijah Harper is the one who caused this to happen. He had the guts, the fortitude, and the foresight to stand up in that legislature—

Senator Simard: No, no!

Senator Marchand: —and stop the Meech Lake Accord. Elijah Harper and my people—

Senator Simard: Clyde Wells did!

Senator Marchand: If you are looking for a scapegoat, come to us. Blame us! Blame the Aboriginal peoples, because we did it! It is hardly an emergency. Our people have been left out of this country for 123 years. That is what that was all about. It is hardly an emergency now to stand up and say—

Senator Flynn: Take part in the debate.

Senator Marchand: —whatever you are intending to say. It is not an emergency, and I will not give my consent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: We are not in the Manitoba legislature.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with my colleague, Senator Doody, that we should get to the substance of the question as to whether or not we are to have the debate. I agree that we should adjourn to consider the question. The only thing I ask be made clear before we adjourn, if the inclination is to do so, is whether we have heard all the reasons advanced as to why, to quote the rule, this is "a matter of urgent public importance" requiring the adjournment of the Senate. We have heard from Senator David and Senator Ottenheimer; in their opinion it is clear that there is a matter of urgent public importance to be debated, and that they cannot understand why everyone else would not agree with them. Is there anything else that should be considered in caucus on the question of whether there is at the present time in the country such a matter of urgent public importance within the rule?

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, all precedents show that an emergency debate is requested to allow a legislature, Parliament or the government to solve a problem. That is the parliamentary basis for an emergency debate.

If senator David or any other senator wants an emergency debate, he must prove to the satisfaction of the Senate that it will bring about changes in the country. But I fear that such a debate would arouse passions on both sides of the issue. I would be curious and anxious to hear his or her arguments.

I submit that nothing that can be said in an emergency debate on Meech Lake in the Senate could help matters in any way. It would be foolhardy and dangerous to heat up passions and end up with a situation even worse than the one we now face.

Senator Simard: Then, senator Thériault, go and discuss it with your own caucus.

[English]

Senator Frith: Does anyone want to add anything else?

Senator Flynn: I might just say—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: I do not mean that the events in Calgary are that important, but yesterday and last night—

Senator Guay: That is what you went on about.

Senator Flynn: Senator Guay, please! We have not had a fight recently. I hope we can continue this way.

If anyone who watched what happened in Montreal yesterday and last night—

Senator Thériault: Great!

Senator Flynn: —does not believe that it is of importance, I will say to him that there were consequences of the Meech Lake failure last night in Montreal. Of course, Senator Thériault may not have seen them, but, if he had, I think he would realize what I am saying, as did his friend, Edith Butler, that there is some movement here that needs to be addressed.

Senator Thériault: De quelle manière!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to allow the opposition to have caucus for ten minutes?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1430)

• (1520)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator David's motion is:

> . . . for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak)— which he has done with his motion—

> before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day;

It is clear that the intention of the rule is to provide an occasion for the Senate to adjourn in order to move to a matter of that character, and not to proceed to its ordinary business that day. That leads one to ask the question: What does "urgency" mean?. Beauchesne's Fifth Edition is of some help to us on that score. At page 92, paragraph 287, it says:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the House do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

It seems to me that Parliament is dividing this question today. In the other place there is a sense of urgency on the question of Hibernia. Here Senator David is making a motion, asking us to find that there is urgency—to paraphrase paragraph 287, not with respect to the matter itself, namely, the failure of Meech Lake, but respecting the urgency of debate when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought forward early enough when public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

I did not hear anything from either Senator Ottenheimer or Senator David that would indicate that there is urgency with respect to a debate of this particular matter, that it should be dealt with immediately, particularly when we are in the fortunate position of having order no. 19 on our order paper, which widely defines the question of the debate and the process concerning the Meech Lake Accord. That order stands in the name of Senator Olson, but he is prepared to yield to Senator David when that order is called. The motion Senator David moved does not qualify under "urgency" as it is defined, in view of the fact that we have on our order paper a similar item for debate later this day.

I ask my colleagues to vote against this motion because I think it would set a bad precedent, and I invite Senator David and others to continue the debate under order no. 19.

Senator Simard: You really have your priorities straight!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall not take more time than it takes to say how incredible I find it, that the Liberal Party, the party of Laurier, Lapointe and St. Laurent—

Senator Olson: We thought you were going to say that.

Senator Perrault: We predicted that. We want a Question Period today!

Senator Murray: —would not agree that there is an urgency to debating the failure of a constitutional accord—

Senator Frith: Between now and five o'clock?

Senator Murray: —that would have reintegrated Quebec into the Canadian constitutional family.

Senator Frith: In the words of Senator Flynn, "Oh, gee."

Senator Flynn: No. I say, "What a pitiful group you are!"

Senator Frith: The same to you, sir!

Senator Perrault: Save your speech for later today.

Senator Murray: It is as incredible as it is sad—

Senator Robichaud: What you are saying is nonsense!

[Translation]

Senator Murray: That only goes to show how much my honorable friends opposite are disconnected from the reality in Quebec and in Canada.

Senator Simard: And cheap too!

[English]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this is a matter on which at least all of us on this side want to be counted; therefore, we shall have a vote on the motion.

Senator Guay: Did you bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister, if it is so urgent?

Senator Perrault: You would not want to miss Question Period, would you?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 46(g), it is moved by the Honourable Senator David, seconded by the Honourable Senator Chaput-Rolland:

> That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the consequences of the failure of the Meech Lake Accord.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

• (1530)

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

Motion of Senator David negatived on the following division:

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 1,041 residents of Trois-Rivières, Grand-Mère and Shawinigan, in the province of Quebec, who object to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

For a change, I will read the exact text of the petition.

PETITION

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED

The undersigned citizens of Canada now avail themselves of the ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance, common to your petitioners, in the certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy.

considering the difficult economic situation in a region that has been severely affected and offers a large number of seasonal jobs representing less than 20 weeks of employment annually, we ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mrs. Barbara McDougall, to reinstate immediately the variable entrance requirements in effect in 1989.

We also ask the minister to withdraw temporarily Bill C-21, which provides for a reduction in the benefit period and an increase in the number of weeks required to requalify for unemployment insurance.

Therefore, we ask—as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

Followed by 1,041 names which I will mercifully refrain from reading.

THE SENATE

INTRODUCTION OF TEMPORARY LIMITATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER TO DELAY PASSAGE OF COMMONS BILLS ARISING FROM THE BUDGET—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 28, 1990, I will call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of introducing in the Senate, for a trial period, a self-imposed limitation on the exercise of the Senate's legislative power in respect of the passage of bills arising from the Budget, received from the House of Commons, whereby, after a specified period commencing on the day a bill is given first reading in the Senate, if the Senate has not adopted a motion for its third reading, the bill will be considered to have been read a third time and passed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at seven o'clock in the evening today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

FAILURE OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD—INTERPRETATION OF AMENDING FORMULA—EFFECT OF TIME LIMITS FOR PROCLAMATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question arising out of the events of the weekend.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: They are not important!

Senator Frith: I saw the Leader of the Government in the Senate holding a press conference on television. I happened to have a copy of The Constitution Acts handy when he announced that he was considering referring a question to the Supreme Court of Canada on the interpretation of subsection 39(2), Part V, of the procedure for amending the Constitution of Canada, dealing with time limits on the amending proclamation.

It is the proclamation that effectively causes the amendment, not the initiation or the adoption of resolutions. Subsection 39(1) says that a proclamation should not be issued before the expiration of one year. Then subsection 39(2) says:

> (2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

I thought it was a rather strained possibility, but I understood his reaching for anything available. I took it from his press conference that he proposed a rolling clock theory; in other words, the clock could keep ticking on the basis of three years after any adoption of the resolution, whereas most people have assumed that it was the first adoption that started the ticking that stopped three years later.

I was professionally intrigued by that possibility, although I thought it would not succeed. However, I was unable to understand, if the clock could be kept ticking, why it would be ticking only for Manitoba, and not for Newfoundland. In his press conference the Leader of the Government said that his proposal for a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada depends on the adoption of the resolution by Newfoundland. That seemed to be an obvious attempt to put pressure on Mr. Wells. Why was the clock to be allowed to tick only for Manitoba, where the matter had dropped, and not be allowed to keep ticking for Mr. Wells, who, after all, had asked for the opportunity to have a referendum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend is raising matters that, no doubt, he will want to refer to in his speech, if he makes one in the course of the debate that he says should take place on the Notice of Inquiry put forward by Senator Olson. I shall take advantage of that occasion as well, if he raises it at greater length, to deal with the matter to which he has referred.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

In the course of my news conference on Friday I went so far as to read, in draft form, the question the Government of Canada would put to the Supreme Court of Canada in a reference; I also indicated the position the government would take on the matter. I believe the honourable senator has summarized the argument correctly. I note his professional opinion that it is a strained possibility and would not succeed at the Supreme Court of Canada. I am unable to give a professional opinion of my own on the matter, not being a member of the legal profession. However, I can tell him that the view of the federal Department of Justice is that we would have a strong case to make.

As far as the difference between the Newfoundland situation and the Manitoba situation, I am not in a position to state what the effect of that would be in legal terms. However, I can tell him that the scenario put forward by the Department of Justice was one in which the Manitoba leaders had already indicated their support for the Meech Lake Accord, and a positive vote in Newfoundland would have presented us with a set of facts, as follows: First, nine provinces would have ratified Meech Lake; the tenth, Manitoba, would have ratified it but for lack of time. That would be a different set of facts, to go to the court with, than a situation in which Manitoba had run out of time, but Newfoundland had simply refused to vote the accord.

Secondly, in terms of the politics broadly understood of the matter, we would have been in a position to ask the Province of Quebec, the National Assembly of Quebec, to revote the Meech Lake Accord in order to complete the circle. Politically, it is one matter to ask them to revote the accord when all provinces had indicated their support and quite another to ask them to revote it at a time when nine provinces had indicated their support and one had simply refused to vote it.

Senator Frith: I sense that we agree that there was no connection between Newfoundland's approval and the question as it would have appeared before the Supreme Court in the sense of the argument before the Supreme Court, but, rather, that the government said it would not put the question without prior Newfoundland adoption. It was a political rather than a legal decision.

Senator Murray: That is not an unfair construction, but I would still want to ask our legal advisers to state the situation in their own language for my honourable friend.

FAILURE OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD—ACTIONS OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—EFFECT ON MANITOBA LEADERS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations if he arranged to have a conference-type telephone call to the leaders of the three parties in Manitoba and then requested them to set aside all their rules with respect to interrupting the debate, invoking closure, and preventing Manitoba from following its stated process in having some public hearings, while advising them at the same time that Premier Wells of Newfoundland had agreed to interrupt the debate in the Newfoundland legislature at a certain hour on Friday so that a vote could be taken.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to what Premier Wells told me, I can only repeat what I have said publicly, namely, that he had assured me on many occasions during the week—because I had many conversations with him—that the vote would take place either Thursday night or early Friday morning. He had given that same assurance to others. So I would have felt quite confident in conveying that assurance to the leaders in Manitoba—that is, if, indeed, I did so. I do not recall having done so, but I would have felt quite confident in doing so.

I spoke with two of the political leaders in Manitoba individually at various times during the week. Finally, on Friday night, I spoke to the three of them, gathered in someone's office—

Senator Olson: It was the premier's office.

Senator Murray: —the premier's office in Winnipeg.

The situation in Manitoba should be obvious to my honourable friend, who is experienced and counts himself something of an expert in the rules.

Senator Olson: No; I do not.

Senator Murray: The situation in Manitoba, as acknowledged by the leaders in that province, was that by inadvertence and mischance a procedural problem arose. It was not just for lack of unanimous consent that the situation arose. There were, it appears, faulty or deficient Notices of Motions put on the order paper. The government told me that they had one set of advice from the Table in their legislature and a ruling from the Chair that surprised them. In the course of the week various opportunities were lost to put down Notices of Motions. At least two of the leaders told me that at different times in conversations I had with them.

The members of the Manitoba legislature were, until Wednedsay, prevented from debating, much less voting on, the Meech Lake Accord. The leaders took the position that if 3,000 or 4,000 people were registered to be heard by a legislative committee, all of them should be heard. I argued against that proposition publicly and privately. In view of the serious circumstances, the seriousness of the matter, and of the fact that there had been public hearings through a task force that consisted almost entirely of members of the legislature several months before, and in view of the fact that the three party leaders had made strong arguments for voting in favour of the Meech Lake Accord, I felt the same arguments could be made in favour of getting it voted on before June 23. I so argued this in my discussions with Premier Filmon, Mrs. Carstairs and Mr. Doer.

Senator Olson: There is more to it than that, though. As a matter of fact, some of the information conveyed in that conversation was false: namely, that you had an assurance from Premier Wells that a vote would be taken at eleven o'clock that morning. It is almost incredible that Senator Murray could not have realized that a telephone works rather well from Winnipeg to St. John's. When they checked with him, he said that no such undertaking had been given.

• (1600)

In addition to that, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to tell us about the other tactics he used. In most circles it is called "economic intimidation." That is what was visited on those leaders of the political parties. They were being forced to do what they did not want to do: set aside their rules to introduce a motion to override the objections of Elijah Harper and to vote on the accord without the benefit of public hearings. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind, after listening to the people to whom I have talked, that these are the kinds of tactics Senator Murray engages in, and that, indeed, he had been engaging in them for some time even prior to Friday.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator is taking very serious chances here in some of the statements he has made. First of all, he has attributed to me the utterance of false statements. Let me tell him again—

Senator Olson: Just answer! Did you tell them or not? Answer the question, or at least try to!

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if I told Premier Filmon, Mrs. Carstairs and Mr. Doer that I had had assurances from Premier Wells that the vote would be held Thursday night or Friday morning, it was because I had those assurances repeated to me numerous times. I really do not think Premier Wells would deny for a moment having given me those assurances many times in the course of the week, and having given them to others, including the Prime Minister. As late as Thursday he had given the Prime Minister the assurance that the matter would come to a vote on Friday. There is no question about it in my mind, and I do not think Premier Wells would argue with my recitation of the facts, because the assurance was given so frequently.

Let me tell the Senate the circumstances under which I sought and received that assurance. Premier Wells was pressing upon me the importance, indeed the necessity, of having Prime Minister Mulroney accept his invitation to address the Newfoundland House of Assembly. It is no secret that a number of people advised Prime Minister Mulroney against accepting that invitation. Among the people who advised the Prime Minister publicly against accepting the invitation were at least two or three members of Premier Well's government—and they said as much on national television.

Naturally, I raised these matters with Premier Wells when he telephoned me, as he did on several occasions, to discuss the matter of the Prime Minister's appearance in the Newfoundland House of Assembly. In the course of those discussions I referred also to statements that had been attributed to Premier Wells during his meetings in New England on the occasion of the meeting of Atlantic premiers and New England governors—statements to the effect that he might not bring the Meech Lake Accord to a vote in the House of Assembly. When I asked the Premier about those comments, as I did on several occasions, he assured me that the vote would be held on Thursday night or Friday morning. He told me that the only circumstance under which it would not come to a vote would be if the Prime Minister and the Premier of Manitoba pronounced the process dead. I told him that that would not happen. However, on Friday morning he called me specifically for the purpose of telling me that he was considering going back on his earlier undertaking to hold the vote; that he was considering not having the vote. That was the purpose of his call on Friday morning.

Senator Olson: After you heard that, you got in touch with the three leaders in Manitoba and told them something else; that is the problem. That is when they decided they would not accommodate you any more.

Senator Flynn: You don't have the right to make that assertion!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend has the chronology completely wrong. I spoke with the three leaders in Manitoba on Thursday night, having received the assurance many times from Premier Wells that the vote would be held on Thursday night or Friday morning. I discussed the vote with Premier Wells on Thursday, after Prime Minister Mulroney's speech. The Prime Minister and Premier Wells discussed the vote during dinner that night. The Prime Minister and I returned to Ottawa Thursday night, believing that a vote would be held on Friday. However, before we returned to Ottawa I spoke by telephone with the three Manitoba leaders, and, as my honourable friend has said, I told them that Premier Wells intended to vote on the matter on Friday. If I told them that, it was because I believed it; and if I believed it, it was because Premier Wells had told me.

FAILURE OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD—GOVERNMENT STRATEGY—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, a larger question emerges as to the strategy of the government in this whole process. Certainly, one of the most appalling statements ever made by a Prime Minister was the statement the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney made to the Globe and Mail, to the effect that the Meech negotiations were left to the last moment in order to exert maximum pressure on the participating parties to sign the agreement. These are the kinds of statements that prime ministers leave for their biographies.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Would you please sit down, Senator Flynn! You are a destructive influence in this place, and you are becoming increasingly so!

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Flynn: It is because you are so boring that I rise on a point of order!

Senator Perrault: Sit down!

Senator Flynn: I will not sit down! I rise on a point of order.

Senator Perrault: What's your point of order?

Senator Flynn: Sit down and I'll tell you.

Senator Perrault: I'll sit down and listen, but it won't be profound, I can assure everyone.

Senator Flynn: I don't have to be profound when talking to you, because you would not understand!

A preamble to a question, or, in the honourable senator's case, a speech, which is very often like the preambles of Senator Olson's questions, is entirely against the rules. The members opposite would not let us debate the whole question, but now they want to use the Question Period to make speeches. I ask His Honour to rule on my point, that the honourable senator cannot do what he is doing. I ask that the rules be observed. If members opposite do not want us to debate the matter, we will not let them—

Senator Perrault: That is a ridiculous observation!

Senator Flynn: It is not a ridiculous observation, it is the truth!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: One moment; I am not through. I am asking the Chair to rule. If you have something to say against the rule, then say it!

Senator Perrault: It is a facetious question—

Senator Muir: Down, boy, down!

Senator Perrault: —and it has nothing to do with the matter whatsoever.

Senator Flynn: It is not a facetious question.

Senator Perrault: One would think that after all the years you have spent in this assembly—

Senator Flynn: Your Honour, I ask you to rule. I will not resume my seat!

Senator Perrault: You are frightened of the facts about the disgraceful tactics of your Prime Minister!

Senator Flynn: Who is frightened? You took an hour—

Senator Perrault: Your leader has not acted as a leader of the nation but, rather, as a minor labour negotiator!

Senator Flynn: You took an hour to decide whether you would let us speak or not.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have been asked to make a ruling. Rule 20B reads:

> A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Read the rest.

The Hon. the Speaker: If it is a question of the definition of "preamble", I believe that preambles should be as short as possible.

Senator Frith: Introductory comments are permitted.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Of course introductory comments are permitted! I have talked about the general strategy of the government under the direction of the supreme ruler, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: What was the basis for this strategy? Will he confirm, as the Prime Minister stated, and as reported in the interview in the Globe and Mail, that negotiations were left until the final hours in order to exert maximum pressure on the participants? The Prime Minister then said that he had decided at some point that he should roll the dice. Did the Leader of the Government help roll the dice? Is this the kind of tactic—

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Perrault: —that was designed to achieve the agreement of all the provinces?

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Perrault: Tell me, as we would like to know more about this strategy.

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Perrault: Why did he not initiate—

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Perrault: —meetings with the leaders of the provincial governments—

Senator Flynn: Mr. Speaker, order!

Senator Perrault: —or the first ministers well before the deadline date established?

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Perrault: Why did he not avoid the prospect of having this kind of crisis situation at the last minute? Let us hear the explanation.

● (1610)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, first, I would commend to the honourable senator the statements that have been made since the first ministers' conference by distinguished first ministers such as Premier Peterson of Ontario and Premier Vander Zalm of his own province, who have a version of the events that is far different from that presented by Senator Perrault.

Secondly, so far as the Prime Minister's interview with The Globe and Mail is concerned, I would suggest that the honourable senator obtain a transcript of that interview and read it carefully and see the context in which the questions were asked and answered.

Thirdly, on the basis of my own direct involvement in the matter, I ask the honourable senator to consider this: There was a first ministers' conference, held in November, at which the positions especially of Newfoundland, Manitoba and New Brunswick were made very clear. There was very little common ground among those provinces, which were hold-out provinces, and no reason in the world to believe that another first ministers' conference at that time on Meech Lake would succeed.

In the first few weeks of 1990 I toured the provincial capitals and met with all the premiers. I tried to promote the idea of what Premier McKenna called a parallel accord, a political agreement among the first ministers that would lead to a resolution of the problem. After that tour, it was very clear to me, and to everybody else, that the idea of a parallel accord was not going to fly. The differences were still too great among Manitoba, Newfoundland and New Brunswick. Manitoba still wanted to reopen the accord and amend it. Newfoundland, in effect, wanted to start all over. Indeed, Premier Wells put forward what I might call the "Wells Accord" to deal with each of the issues in the Meech Lake Accord.

It was clear at that point that there was no way that a first ministers' conference on Meech Lake would have succeeded. We waited until mid-March before Premier McKenna came up with his very positive initiative, a companion resolution that would enable Meech Lake to be passed, but none of the provisions of which could be proclaimed until after Meech Lake had been proclaimed. The federal government took the action that we thought constructive under the circumstances; namely, we appointed a parliamentary committee. We gave the parliamentary committee six weeks to hold public hearings and to report, which they did on May 17 or 18. That left us with a couple of weeks to do some further consultations among provincial premiers and to call the conference.

Up to a matter of days before that conference was called I was still in consultation, on behalf of the federal government, with various provincial premiers about some very specific matters that were at stake.

Finally, when the meeting was held, the Prime Minister was in a position to say to the premiers at the opening dinner, "It appears that there are only two important issues still outstanding. One is a process issue; how to obtain the needed assurance that the improvements or add-ons will be made. The second matter is the amending formula as it relates to Senate reform." That was on Sunday night. None of us—no one in this place and no one at that table—would have believed that it would have taken a full week to resolve those issues. Most of us, myself included, thought the meeting would be over by Tuesday. It was not over until the following Saturday, and, indeed, on the final Friday night the first ministers were still discussing the amending formula as it related to Senate reform.

So the inference drawn by the honourable senator and others that a deliberate attempt was made (a) to leave the meeting until the last minute and (b) to prolong the meeting is absolutely not borne out by the facts as I know them—and, if I may say so, I am in a unique position to know them.

STATEMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER AND GOVERNMENT LEADER IN THE SENATE—APPARENT CONTRADICTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Nobody is going to criticize the efforts of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to bring about an agreement.

Senator Frith: Speak for yourself!

Senator Perrault: No, he has invested months of time and energy to bring about a settlement. I am not criticizing the effort. I am criticizing some of the actions and the substance of that effort. I remember in this chamber a few months ago the Leader of the Government saying: "This is a seamless web." He spoke of the proposal as though it were woven out of some gossamer-thin fabric, that if we touched any aspect of it we would not have a deal. I remember the oratory of the Leader of the Government at that time.

The explanation the leader has given today would appear to contradict the statement of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the Globe and Mail interview, in which he said, "There was no way I was going to be forced to call a meeting." You are telling us today, Mr. Leader, that the circumstances were such that it was impossible to call the meeting. Do we take it, then, that you are contradicting the statement made by your leader, the Prime Minister, in which he said that there was no way he was going to call this meeting, obviously drawing on his long experience in labour negotiations?

I used to work with a Minister of Labour and I know the old negotiating tactic. You get as many people in the room as possible and you turn up the heat. You set up a big urn of black coffee in the corner and you hope that, in the morning, totally exhausted, they are going to stagger out of the place saying, "Tell us where to sign." However, those tactics do not work and are unacceptable when you are deciding the future of the nation. You do not do that to a country like Canada—

Senator Doody: What's the question?

Senator Perrault: —which is looking for its future, surely. The leader's explanation is at total variance with the statement given by the Prime Minister to The Globe and Mail, in which he said that there was no way he was going to call a meeting. He said, "The timing had to be just right, and then I decided to roll the dice."

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, very briefly, let me say that the meeting could have been called at any time. It could have been called in February, but it would almost surely have failed had it been called at that time. As I said, when it finally was called, there were only two outstanding issues on the table. To my astonishment, it took a week to resolve those.

The honourable senator refers to my description of the Meech Lake Accord as a seamless web. Premier McKenna acknowledged that it was a seamless web, and so did others. Premier McKenna in particular, when he saw the need for a companion resolution in order to address his concerns, saw that it would be quite impossible to reopen Meech Lake and bring amendments to it without forcing all provinces to retrace their steps and set new three-year time limits. He also saw all the other problems that would have been created. So he acknowledged by his action that Meech Lake was a seamless web.

Finally, let me just say this for the record: There has been some talk and reporting about the atmosphere of the first ministers' conference. The honourable senator talks about turning up the heat. Somebody else talked about intimidation, pressure, and coercion. I am the only person who was in the room other than the 11 first ministers, and I can tell the honourable senator that the discussions and the debates in that room featured none—none!—of the personal acrimony or animosity that has been described since in very imaginative terms by some journalists. The types of interventions made by first ministers were of the kind you heard from Premier McKenna, Premier Peterson and Prime Minister Mulroney in their speeches before the Newfoundland House of Assembly. They were very similar, in terms of the future of the country and what was at stake with the Meech Lake Accord. My observation, as one Canadian, is that the interventions at the first ministers' conference were such as to do credit to the country and to all those who participated. If you do not believe me, again, I ask you to refer to the declarations made since the first ministers' conference by people like Premier Peterson, who said that all this talk of intimidation and coercion and manipulation was so much nonsense. Neither he nor, certainly, nine of the other first ministers felt in any way that they were being pressured, coerced or intimidated.

INTERPRETATION OF AMENDING FORMULA—EFFECT OF TIME LIMITS FOR PROCLAMATION—POSITION OF QUEBEC

Hon. Jack Austin: I wonder if I could return the leader to the question asked by Senator Frith with respect to the proposed three-year rolling clock for the amending procedure. My question is whether, in presenting evidence to the Supreme Court on the position of the provinces, the government would have been in a position to show the Supreme Court that the Province of Quebec would, indeed, re-enact the resolution, or whether the position was that nothing was known of the intentions of the Province of Quebec and would not have been known until the Supreme Court had uttered its opinion.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the question is quite hypothetical at this point, but I think both my friend's question and that of Senator Frith might be looked at by our legal and constitutional advisers in the Department of Justice.

If there is a prepared reply, I will bring it in. I certainly undertake to bring in a copy of the draft question I read at my news conference the other day. That draft question had been prepared for me by the government's legal advisers.

Senator Austin: The minister misunderstood my question.

Senator Murray: No, I did not.

Senator Austin: I am not asking for a legal opinion; I am asking whether, as a matter of fact, he knew what the position of the Province of Quebec would be with respect to the submission to the Supreme Court. Would the Province of Quebec have said that it, indeed, supported the reference by the Government of Canada?

Would the Attorney General for the province of Quebec have supported the legal opinion on which the minister and his government would have been acting? Would the Province of Quebec have undertaken politically to re-introduce the resolution in the national assembly?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know the answers to those questions, but, in terms of the politics of the matter being broadly understood, I would not have put that question to the Government of Quebec absent a positive vote in Newfoundland.

Senator Austin: What the minister is saying is that he was absent two provinces in his application to the Supreme Court of Canada. Even if he had succeeded with respect to Newfoundland, and had obtained an affirmative vote there, he was absent Manitoba and the Province of Quebec because they were beyond the three-year timeframe.

Senator Murray: I suspect that by the time Their Lordships had been seized of the matter it would have been voted on on Friday afternoon by Newfoundland and that it might well have been voted on by Manitoba, but that really depends on how long afterwards Manitoba had voted.

Senator Austin: I am sure the minister was aware that Gordon Robertson had been offering this opinion for some time.

Senator Murray: No, he was offering quite a different opinion. Mr Robertson argued that there was no time limit at all.

Senator Austin: This is a variation on his argument, but the question is germane, and again it is a question of fact as to when this legal theory was brought to the minister.

The subsidiary question is whether this legal theory was discussed at any time during the seven days the first ministers debated the various questions of the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Murray: The answer to the latter part of the question is no.

My friend has referred to this as a legal theory. It was an opinion given by the legal advisers to the government who believed a very strong case could have been made in support of it by the Attorney General of Canada.

It came to me after the declaration of the three Manitoba leaders that it was their intention to vote in favour of the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Austin: Was that mentioned at the time the first ministers were meeting?

Senator Murray: My honourable friend heard the statement made by Premier Filmon last Saturday evening and what the other two Manitoba leaders had to say. My reference is to the speeches actually made in the debate when it finally began on Wednesday in Manitoba. At that point I had every reason to believe, as I indicated earlier, that Newfoundland would hold its vote on Thursday evening or Friday morning.

Senator Austin: I used the phrase "legal theory" not in a pejorative way; it is not a matter of law, because no court has pronounced on it.

In any event, did the minister or anyone on behalf of the Government of Canada convey the possibility of that legal opinion to Premier Wells or to the Attorney General for Newfoundland at that time?

Senator Murray: Speaking of the Attorney General for Newfoundland, I believe it was he who described the Prime Minister as Neville Chamberlain, Meech Lake as Munich, and, one must infer, Premier Bourassa as Hitler, and Quebec as the Nazis. But that is another subject.

Senator Olson: That was because of the tactics that were used.

Senator LeBlanc: What you have added is a distortion!

Senator Murray: That was the statement. What other inference is one to draw?

Senator LeBlanc: Those are your words.

Senator Murray: What other inference is one to draw? He talked of Neville Chamberlain and Munich.

Senator Austin: Perhaps you did not feel like communicating with the Attorney General for Newfoundland.

Senator Murray: Senator Austin is correct when he says that I did not feel like communicating with the Attorney General for Newfoundland.

On Friday morning, when Premier Wells called me to tell me he was thinking of not having a vote because he was under the impression the Manitoba legislature would rise Friday afternoon without having a vote on the Meech Lake Accord, he asked me whether we had various legal opinions on the situation. I told him there were various scenarios before us, as there were, and that all of them were posited upon a yes vote by Newfoundland and a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. I did not go into the details of the opinion with him, but I do not think he needed that.

Senator Austin: He was not, in fact, given the opinion that the leaders in Manitoba now had, and so did not have the opportunity of discussing that legal opinion with you or anyone else.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator would be incorrect to say that the leaders of Manitoba had the opinion. At the time I spoke to Premier Wells—which was before I came into the office on Friday morning—I was aware that there were various legal options that had been presented to the government by its legal advisers. All I could tell him was that those scenarios were designed to solve the time problem in Manitoba, because it was a time problem. It was not a rejection of the Meech Lake Accord. The three Manitoba leaders indicated that they were going to support the Meech Lake Accord. One of them told me that there were perhaps 40 out of 57 votes in the legislature ready to be cast in favour of the accord.

I told Premier Wells that our lawyers had told me that we may well have a solution, that it does involve a "yes" vote by his legislature and a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. I did not attempt to describe in detail what it was, and he did not ask about it. He understands these matters quite well.

Senator Austin: At no time, then, did Premier Wells tell you that it was impossible to get an affirmative vote in the Newfoundland legislature.

• (1630)

Senator Murray: He told me that there was only a small chance of its passing the Newfoundland legislature, and that his motive in not having a vote was that it would be seen as a formalized rejection of Quebec. I told him that if that was his concern, he should have a vote and vote in favour of the accord.

Senator Austin: But, Mr. Minister, if you wanted the Meech Lake Accord to pass, why would you not want Newfoundland to have the benefit of the additional time that would be offered by the constitutional proposition—

Senator Guay: Right!

Senator Austin: —that you were considering at that moment?

Senator Murray: He was not asking for time.

Senator Austin: But he did not even know about the method you were considering.

Senator Murray: I told him that there was a timing problem in Manitoba. I asked him if he had a timing problem and he said he did not. Everyone who wanted to speak in the legislature spoke. I asked him if he had a procedural problem and he said no. Then I told him that, in my opinion, he should vote the accord.

Senator Austin: We are at the nub of this issue, and I would like to help you explain what happened—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Austin: —because the proposition is being put that you wanted Newfoundland to vote Meech Lake down. I cannot believe that that is true. I believe that you would have wanted no negative result in Newfoundland; therefore, I am puzzled as to why you would not want Newfoundland to have the additional time, which your legal theory would have given them, to await an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada on the rolling constitutional approval process.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Rather than saying you would not even use it unless they first agreed to Meech.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, asking Quebec to revote the Meech Lake constitutional accord was predicated on getting a positive vote in favour of the Meech Lake Accord from all legislatures, albeit one, a bit over the deadline.

Senator Frith: But you would not have had to have it revoted if your theory was correct. If your theory was correct, a new clock would have started ticking without Quebec.

Senator Murray: When?

Senator Frith: As soon as the last adoption was made. That is the only argument you could have. Quebec could have done it later.

Senator Murray: The second resolution was passed by Saskatchewan on September 23, 1987.

Senator Frith: So you could just keep using your rolling theory. Even after that, each adoption would start a new clock.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: It is just not logical to connect it to Newfoundland's adoption.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Did Premier Bourassa agree to pass it again?

FAILURE OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD—POSITIONS OF LEADERS OF MANITOBA AND PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: My question to the government leader is a follow-up of questions asked by Senators Frith and Austin and of his response to Senator Frith earlier, in which he was discussing why it was that Premier Wells was in a different position from that of Manitoba.

Twice in response to Senator Austin you have said that the three leaders in Manitoba had agreed to support the accord, as if that meant that Manitoba would support the accord. Was my honourable friend not aware that Mrs. Carstairs had specifically stated that there would be a free vote insofar as her members were concerned; that before making any statements the members would listen to what the people of Manitoba had to say; and that there was no guarantee that it would pass the Manitoba legislature?

Senator Guay: Right on.

Senator Molgat: None whatever. If my honourable friend does not know enough about politics to understand the situation in Manitoba, then he certainly was given the wrong impression, that Manitoba was going to pass this. There was no guarantee. So there was no difference between the position of Premier Wells and the situation in Manitoba, was there?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the honourable senator says there was no guarantee, and, strictly speaking, that is correct. I spoke with two of the leaders and others in the legislature. They had done their head counts. True, it was a free vote; true, the Liberal caucus was divided on the matter; true, the New Democratic Party was divided on the matter. But at the end of the day the statements that were made to me by responsible political leaders in Manitoba were to the effect that there was a solid majority in that legislature who were prepared to vote, when the time came, in favour of the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend may think that, but he does not know how the people of Manitoba think. I can assure you that if the hearings had gone on, they would have shown that the vast majority of the people in Manitoba were opposed to it. In any case, there was absolutely no guarantee that it would pass Manitoba.

I would like to go on to a second question in response to—

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I am amazed that an emergency debate motion on Meech Lake has been blocked while for an hour we have been hearing opposition members ask questions on a problem that was not supposed to be either urgent or of national interest.

I would really like someone to explain such a peculiar, strange, bizarre situation to me. My question of privilege is very simple: on one hand, we are refused an emergency debate and on the other, only questions about Meech Lake are being asked. I consider that wrong and incredibly stupid. I just wanted to say so.

[English]

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I would like to make a point on the question of privilege. I would like to ask Senator David or the Leader of the Government this question: Senator David moved a motion that this house do now adjourn to consider an emergency debate. That is simply a device, and the debate takes place on that motion. When the debate is over, that is it. Tell me how you would have had the debate, because if we had voted in favour of your motion the house would have adjourned. I presume we would have had the emergency debate the next day.

Senator Barootes: No. You withdraw the motion.

Hon. Duff Roblin: This is an interesting point of order, but I am astonished that a gentleman who has spent the years in the Saskatchewan legislature that my honourable friend has does not understand the normal course of events, when motions to adjourn to discuss a matter of urgent public importance are accepted. When the debate is over and all members have had their say, the mover asks for leave to withdraw the motion. That is nothing new. That is the standard procedure in all legislatures in the British Commonwealth. My friend knows that.

Senator Steuart: Exactly, and that is the point I am making. When the motion was put, Senator David got up to speak, and to do exactly what you said and what we all expected—namely, to have that debate. But the Leader of the Government wanted a vote on the motion, and it was all over. If we on this side of the house had voted in favour of the motion, the house would have adjourned. The debate should have taken place when that motion was put. That is the normal procedure.

Senator Roblin: My friend is talking out of the back of his head, and I regret it because I have great respect for him. He knows perfectly well that if the speaker had allowed the motion, or not as the case may be, then the debate should have taken place.

Senator Steuart: Then!

Senator Roblin: But my friend opposite did not allow us to debate it.

Senator Steuart: That is nonsense! The motion was put.

Senator Roblin: It is not nonsense.

Senator Steuart: Senator David knew better than you people to get up and debate it, but they allowed the question to go and we voted on it.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend forgets in an extraordinary fashion that his leader got up and said that he would not allow the debate to take place at that particular time. That is why we had a vote, as my friend knows.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, it does not matter what our honourable leader did or did not say. As soon as Senator David moved the motion, it was debatable. You asked for a vote and we had a vote. Senator David got up to speak. He is the only one over there who was awake. The rest of you were sound asleep. You missed your chance.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Steuart: You should have debated it. I agree with you, that we used to put these motions every third day in Saskatchewan. We would have the debate, and then the mover would get up and withdraw the motion. You missed your chance, and you know it. You do not even know what you are doing over there!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: I would be very surprised if in the legislature of Saskatchewan, when a motion of this kind was introduced, the Leader of the Opposition, who did not want to debate it, would ask for and receive time to go and caucus the thing. What for? In this case it was in order to decide whether or not the Senate would proceed with it. You came back and told us that you were not going to allow us to debate it. Now my friend brings up this cockamamie argument that my friend missed his opportunity. What nonsense!

Senator Steuart: Will you please tell me how we could have stopped Senator David from getting up and debating the motion? He got up, he could have debated it, and we could have done nothing about it. We could have answered him and had the debate. Don't tell me we have had this motion to try to put together a smarmy little deal. You missed the boat, and if you don't know it then you are even more stupid than I thought you were!

Senator Roblin: The trouble with my honourable friend is that he cannot count! He does not know where the majority lies in this house. It certainly does not lie over here. When ladies and gentlemen on the other side of the chamber say that we cannot do something, unfortunately, we cannot do it, because there are more of them than there are of us. That is what happened. To say that we missed the opportunity is just eyewash.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I can deal with Senator David's question. He asked for an explanation. Perhaps he did not hear what we said. Let me say it again.

We did not refuse to have this matter debated today. We voted against a motion to have it debated immediately because there was on the order paper an order dealing with this issue. We have had other emergency debates. Urgency of debate is the reason for such a debate; the fact that there is no other opportunity to deal with it. In other urgency debates we have had there was nothing else on the order paper dealing with the subject.

Therefore, there was no refusal to have this matter debated. It just did not come within the rules for immediate debate. Senator David does not have to agree with me, but I am saying that that is what we decided. We did not adjourn the Senate to deal with the matter immediately but said that it could be dealt with when we reached the order on the order paper, which comes up after Question Period and government business; that is all. It is going to be debated. It is just a matter of its not falling within the rules for immediate debate.

[Translation]

Senator David: My question of privilege, honourable senators, is simply about procedure. If you are logical, Senator Frith, you could have simply accepted my emergency motion and you could have asked the speakers all your questions as the arguments were being made.

We have been talking about Meech Lake for two hours. You have spent an hour of that debating some of your own caucus business of which I am ignorant. The debate could probably be over now although it has not even started. That is, you began it with a question period that so far has dealt only with the subject on which I asked for an emergency debate.

Senator Frith: I understand why Senator David who moved the motion is frustrated because he could not start right away.

The only thing we insisted on is that it not be done right away but later. That means the other business of the Senate, including question period, would be dealt with in order.

● (1630)

[English]

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with my deputy leader very often, but I would like to ask Senator Murray, who knew this was coming, I presume, this question: Had we voted in favour of the motion to adjourn, how would we then have debated the matter? The house would have adjourned. You can get up, Senator Flynn—you do not have to slump down in your seat. Get up and tell us how we would have then debated the matter.

Senator Flynn: Nobody would have acted as stupidly as you have! We would have reverted to Orders of the Day.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Steuart: You voted to adjourn.

Senator Flynn: Yes, to consider a motion. Don't be so stupid!

FAILURE OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD—ACTIONS OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—EFFECT ON MANITOBA LEADERS

Hon. Gildas Molgat: Honorable senators, after this point of order, I would like to revert to my question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Do you act as Deputy Speaker now?

Senator Molgat: No, as a senator, just like you, Senator Flynn. I am sometimes demandless of the House than you do, but anyway! My question is directed again to Senator Murray.

[English]

I simply want to verify your answer to Senator Olson. Is it correct that you, as a minister of the Crown representing the government, advised, requested, and demanded that the government ignore its rules and simply go past any rules of the Manitoba legislature? Is that correct?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, on the contrary. I asked them whether it was possible to invoke closure. Closure is a rule. Closure is provided for under the rules of most legislatures. I asked them whether it was possible to have the debate, to bring the matter to a vote and hold their hearings in Committee of the Whole, as has been done here. On those matters I was told that, no, it was not possible, or at any rate it was not desirable, and there the matter rested. It was not an overly-long conversation I had with the three party leaders in Manitoba.

Senator Molgat: Is it not correct, Senator Murray, that you knew all along what the rules of the Manitoba house were? They were clear. I reminded you in the Senate on at least one occasion, if not several, that you could not wait until the last minute so far as the Manitoba situation was concerned because of a problem that had arisen some years ago on the question of language rights. The Manitoba legislature had agreed to some Senate rules, which were clear and precise. You knew that. The government knew that. Why, then, would you come at the last minute to say on behalf of the senior government to the Manitoba legislature, "Go past the rules that you have agreed to within a matter of five years. Don't pay any attention to them. We have known about them all along, but don't pay any attention to them."?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it was not I, on June 9, who signed a document on behalf of the Government of Manitoba committing it to make every possible effort, I think the phrase was, to have the matter decided upon by June 23. Indeed, Premier Filmon, I believe, added an asterisk such that the decision was subject to the public-hearing process. He must have signed that—I know he did—in good faith and in the full expectation that there was sufficient time to have his debate, to hold his public hearings, and to have the decision made by June 23.

What happened, as I indicated earlier, was that a serious procedural problem arose in Manitoba—not just the refusal of one member to give unanimous consent, although that was a factor. There were serious procedural problems, some of which I think political leaders would agree today were as a result of error on the part of draftsmen, or perhaps even advisers at the Table or in the Chair.

Senator Molgat: But the effect of your advice was that they not abide by their rules.

Senator Murray: On the contrary. My advice was that they invoke their rules, including the rule of closure, and that matters that might otherwise go to a special or standing committee be referred to Committee of the Whole. What I suggested was fully within the rules.

THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

USE OF "NOTWITHSTANDING" CLAUSE BY QUEBEC

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have been trying for many years to find an intelligent answer to a question that puzzles me, and I have found none yet. Perhaps senator Tremblay or senator Murray will provide me with an answer this afternoon. Who knows?

I will not discuss the merits of the Meech Lake Accord. Something else worries me more at this time. It has been said that, since it did not sign the constitutional document in 1982, Quebec was not part of the Confederation, not a full-fledged member of the Confederation, that it was expelled from it.

If that is so from a moral and legal point of view, then why is Quebec the only province to use the notwithstanding clause? I am also setting aside the merits and flaws of Bill 178. That is not the point. The fact of the matter is the principle. If Quebec was not a full-fledged member of the Confederation, how come it is the only province to have availed itself of the notwithstanding clause?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: You are so naive!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend got the facts wrong. Quebec was not the only province to use that clause. Saskatchewan had done it before, in the case of a labour dispute in that province.

● (1650)

[English]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government why he eschewed the basic question of Senator Robichaud—it is a well-known trick and everybody does it—and answered one small aspect, instead of answering the basic question, which is: If Quebec is not a part of the Constitution, how was it that it used the "notwithstanding" clause? That is the question. You have talked about Saskatchewan and, as usual, have evaded the basic question.

Senator Flynn: Order! Question!

Senator Gigantès: Why do you not answer Senator Robichaud's core question? We would like to hear that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, two governments of Quebec never claimed that that province was not bound by the Constitution Act, 1982. They have acknowledged from the beginning that they were so bound. However, there is a world of difference between a constitution that has the willing acceptance of Quebec and one that has been rejected by a bi-partisan vote of their national assembly. That may not make much difference to the honourable senator, but for most of us it is a very important and historic difference.

Senator Gigantès: I have another question for the Leader of the Government. Since we are going to debate the Meech Lake Accord during the debate on order no. 19, I should like to ask this question:

[Translation]

Senator David, I am glad you came back because I was just telling the Leader of the Government in the Senate that it would be preferable, before we have this debate on the Meech Lake Accord following the proposal put forward by senator Olson, that we ask him questions in order to get factual answers that may enlightened the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: You certainly need to be enlightened.

Senator Gigantès: Particularly during Question Period, when we can cross-examine him instead of simply listening to him recite a text prepared specially so that he can give us his version of the facts without allowing us to verify it. That is why I prefer to have Question Period before the debate and not after.

Senator Flynn: That is your business.

NATIVE AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question on another aspect of the discussion we have been having this afternoon. In his remarks on Saturday on television the Prime Minister said that it was a time to mend divisions, heal wounds and reach out to fellow Canadians. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the government intends to move quickly on its commitment to establish a royal commission on native affairs?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend will recall that that was part of a proposal we made to the Manitoba chiefs in the context of resolving the procedural problems concerning Meech Lake and the Manitoba legislature. It was rejected by those chiefs. Further than that I cannot go. The matter is no longer on the table, but I am sure it will be considered at the appropriate time.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I believe the rejection was, as the Leader of the Government has indicated, in the context of the procedural situation at the time.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: It was rejected, and that is the end of it.

Senator Fairbairn: The question of the royal commission is not one that relies on a constitutional amendment or deal. It is a direct commitment between the federal government and the Aboriginal peoples. Under that situation, rather than the constitutional context, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate not feel that there is an obligation on the part of the federal government to proceed with that suggestion, as was outlined in some detail by the Prime Minister in his letter to the Manitoba chiefs?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer is in the negative. I do not feel the government is under an obligation now to take that step or any of the ones outlined in that letter. However, I am sure there will be discussions with the leadership of the aboriginal organizations in the future, and this and other matters will be considered.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

PROGRESS OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate take the same view—that obligations should be put off in time—in the case of the bill concerning Hibernia? This bill was thought to be so important that the Parliament of Canada should reach a decision quickly on it. However, I understand it is not proceeding this week in the House of Commons.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know what is happening in the House of Commons. I will have to consult one of my counterparts there.

Senator Olson: You do not know what he is doing?

Senator Murray: I think the bill in question has been reported out of the legislative committee and is awaiting report stage or third reading in the other place. I have no more information than that on the matter.

Senator Olson: He does not know what the cabinet is doing!

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PARTICIPATION OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES IN BILATERAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. The premiers have mentioned the establishment of a bilateral process with the federal government, especially in the area of communications and manpower. This leads me to believe that this is going to happen in the next few days, weeks or months. If that is the case, the Prime Minister of Canada has a responsibility under section 91(24) of the British North America Act. Even though this is not a constitutional issue, but an administrative issue, would the Prime Minister be inviting the Aboriginal peoples of Quebec to participate, especially to deal with the communications and manpower issues?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, participate in what?

Senator Olson: Bilateral negotiations.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, negotiations are going on continually on those matters and a range of other matters. It is not the custom to have parties, other than the governments involved, take part in such negotiations.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, do I understand that there is no chance that the Aboriginal peoples will be invited by the Prime Minister to take part in this bilateral process? Are you saying that this is an on-going issue and therefore the Aboriginal peoples will not be invited to participate in the issues of communications and manpower?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know precisely what the honourable senator is referring to. Discussions on matters such as communications and manpower take place between the federal government and provincial governments all the time, without any other parties being involved. But if there are matters that directly engage or affect Aboriginals, as is the case in many land claims and other negotiations, of course, representatives of the Aboriginal peoples are also involved. But I have no reason to believe that in the ongoing discussions on communications and manpower there is a particular reason for having other than the representatives of the governments. This is being done largely at the official level at the moment, with representatives of the different governments present and taking part.

Senator Watt: I have a supplementary question. Let us say that that is the case, namely, that they are dealing with an ongoing issue with regard to manpower, immigration, and communications. From what I have been reading, and from what I have seen on the news, the premier of the province would rather deal on a one-to-one basis with the central government rather than allow the other provinces to participate on issues that are related to Quebec.

Could the leader give me some information or enlighten me—if you cannot do it today, perhaps another day—as to whether there is room for Aboriginal people living in Quebec to be directly involved in matters that might not be related to immigration, communications or manpower? In other words, if there were subject matters related to the aboriginal issues, would the Prime Minister then invite the Aboriginal people to participate?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the representatives of the Aboriginal people living in Quebec, while they do not take part in routine government-to-government discussions, have every opportunity to make representations, certainly, to us and, I am sure, to the Government of Quebec.

I myself have met delegations representing Aboriginal peoples in Quebec on several occasions to discuss a wide range of matters of interest to them—matters that are either partly or wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal government. I have heard their representations and conveyed them to the responsible ministers and departments and taken them into account in the development of our own policies.

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO ABORIGINAL PEOPLES IN MANITOBA—NATURE OF CONTENTS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could give us more details pertaining to the letter the Prime Minister sent to the Aboriginal people, the Indian people in Manitoba, and what he offered them. We know he has offered them certain things that they have refused, but could he give us more details of what was offered to them pertaining, for example, to money? Was it in the form of grants, or what was it? There was some money involved in grants in that particular letter. What other matters were contained in the letter?

If I am wrong, would you explain to us the details contained in that letter?

The most effective thing I could do to assist my honourable friend is to bring a copy of the letter in tomorrow and table it here.

Senator Guay: Thank you. I would appreciate that.

ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON CORPORATION

REDUCTION IN STAFF—PROPOSED RELOCATION OF OFFICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I do not know how many more days we have before the guillotine strikes, but I wish to ask this question so that the leader can think about it and dwell on it.

Can the Leader of the Government advise if there has been a reduction in staff of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation or Enterprise Cape Breton? Are there any plans to move all or portions of these offices to Halifax? I would hope that that is not correct.

Is it correct that at the moment we are short staffed in Enterprise Cape Breton or the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and that some wacko from Halifax is brought in to fill in for a day or two and then off he goes, back to Halifax? I called him one day about something and he did not even know what a senator or a member was.

Senator Fairbairn: Shame!

Senator Petten: Shocking!

Senator Muir: I do not know where they picked him up. If he wants publicity, and to go down in posterity, he will be in Hansard for the rest of his life! These are a few of the things I want to find out.

The officers have been doing an excellent job in Cape Breton under ACOA. In fact, they have been doing an excellent job. I do not want anything to take place that will reduce their activities. I should hope that the leader will now devote some time to this. He has been terribly busy, I know. And, God bless him, he has done a good job. It is too bad that things worked out as they did, but I should like some concentration on the question I have posed. If he does not have answers today, perhaps he can get his efficient staff—he has another Cape Bretoner around here somewhere—to assist him.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I was pleased to hear Senator Muir's positive report on the contribution the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and ACOA are making to the economy of Cape Breton. I share his determination that that should continue unabated.

As to the particular questions regarding staffing, I will consult with my colleague, the Honourable Elmer MacKay, who is the responsible minister, and report back either to the Senate or directly to my honourable friend as soon as I have the information.

INTEGRATED CIRCUIT TOPOGRAPHY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Paul David moved the third reading of Bill C-57, an Act to provide for the protection of integrated circuit topographies and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard moved the third reading of Bill C-51, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act.

• (1710)

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak long, nor do I propose to vote against the third reading motion. I want to call the attention of honourable senators to the fifteenth report of the National Finance Committee. I must say that the government's defence of the bill was extraordinarily weak and that the attack on the bill, made by the Canadian Insolvency Association, was most impressive.

If it were not for the fact that without this bill there would be an inconsistency in what is done in various jurisdictions in Canada, I think the bill would have been amended in committee.

The fifteenth report of the National Finance Committee, which appears in our Minutes of Proceedings for June 19, 1990, is important. It casts a considerable shadow on the concept of a deemed trust, which is being employed by the government. The problem is that this government is using various persons—employers, or people who run businesses—to collect taxes for them. These people are allowed to integrate the tax money into their ordinary cashflow for a period. This may well have the effect of giving third parties—for example, persons selling goods or services to that person or company—the notion that he or she is dealing with a highly solvent and profitable business. Then the person, company or business goes bankrupt. At that point the government moves in and says, "Well, although we have cooperated in giving the impression that this is a viable operation, we want our money first. It is a deemed trust.", notwithstanding that the government, by using employers and businesses, has itself contributed to the situation of insolvency. It seems to me that there must be a better way by which economists and lawyers can deal with this problem.

As I said, I am not objecting to the third reading of the bill, but I think honourable senators ought to be fully aware of the evidence taken in committee and of the fifteenth report of the National Finance Committee.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, with your leave I would like to add a few words.

I would like to start by thanking Senator Stewart (Antigonish—Guysborough) and his colleagues for supporting the bill at this time in order to avoid further delay.

I would not go so far as to say, with Senator Stewart (Antigonish—Guysborough) that our defence was as weak as all that. Neverthless, I certainly agree with Senator Stewart that the points made by the groups who came, including bankruptcy trustees, were so important that senators from both political parties who sat on the committee agreed to include in the report a request that the government review the whole area of "deemed trust".

I hope the government will do just that. Thank you for expediting the third reading of this bill. It is a subject we intend to monitor very closely.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I was on the committee and I think Senator Stewart exaggerated the significance of this issue. The problem is with the Bankruptcy Act. We must know whether the government maintains a priority with respect to monies collected on its behalf by certain persons. This is a problem that has existed for some time.

Whether the government should let people who are responsible for collecting money use it as a source of financing is a matter for debate. I think we shouldn't take this to far. We will have to be careful.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I think Senator Flynn's comments are apt. In fact, the first paragraph of the report indicates that the Bankruptcy Act should be reviewed as soon as possible, since a review has been in the works for about ten or fifteen years. The old act exists but is no longer adapted to current needs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

> The Senate in Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to amend the Immigration Act.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, the Honourable Gerald R. Ottenheimer in the Chair.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, awaiting our call is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. If the Senate will permit, I shall ask Mr. Bill Kempling and the officials with him to come and present their case.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to Order of the Senate, Mr. Bill Kempling, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Ms. Ann M. Midgley and Mr. Peter D. Hammond were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to introduce Mr. Bill Kempling, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I do not know whether Mr. Kempling has an opening statement, but I am assured that he would be delighted to answer any questions you might have, and I am sure that he would be pleased to introduce the two officials who will be giving him advice this evening.

Mr. Bill Kempling, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration: Honourable senators, I have no opening statement, but I would be pleased to answer your questions.

Senator Frith: During my intervention in the Senate on Bill C-77 I put forward some questions. Senator Doody's office has provided me with some material that may very well have come from you or from the department.

Mr. Kempling: I am aware of it.

Senator Frith: They were questions seeking information, and that information has been furnished. The answers are quite complete.

Today I would like to read the questions and then make a suggestion. The first question is: Who are benefiting most from the Transportation Loan Program? The answer is quite long, about one page, and includes a schedule or a table.

• (1720)

Number two: What are the levels of service provided to immigrants to ensure that the moneys lent to them are not lost through dealings with unscrupulous individuals who might prey on immigrants? There is an answer dealing with the IOM, the International Organization for Migration, about travel arrangements and so on.

Number three: What percentage of the loans are fully repaid? The figures are given.

Number four: What sort of agreements are in place for the collection by government from those who fail to pay back the loans? There is a detailed answer there also.

Number five: Will the level of funding meet the demand of the growing number of refugees and immigrants? There is an answer given, including a forecast.

Number six: What is the minister doing to provide assistance to those persons in the refugee backlog? There is a full paragraph answer to that.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, since in each case the answer is approximately one page, I suggest we might save some time by simply attaching those answers to the record. The department will then have placed on record in the Senate the answers to the questions raised in debate.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of answers see appendix, p. 2170.)

Mr. Kempling: I will give you my copy.

Senator Frith: That leaves me with only one other question, which, I think, is one that nags most on this subject—the question of the cap. Mr. Parliamentary Secretary, you know what I am talking about, but, for the sake of the record, there is now an upper limit on the amount available for those loans of, I believe, $90 million. Is that correct?

Mr. Kempling: That is right.

Senator Frith: The limits would now be set by regulation, without any cap or any limit. That is, you would set a limit but it would be set by regulation, which would not require parliamentary approval.

Mr. Kempling: That is right.

Senator Frith: I would certainly find it very reassuring if you could tell us that you propose to consult, or at least advise, Parliament of a proposal to increase the limit. I think you propose to increase the limit now to $150 million.

Mr. Kempling: That is right.

Senator Frith: If a further increase were to be asked for, would you undertake to find some mechanism by which to give Parliament an opportunity at least to look at and make comments on the proposed increase of the cap so that it would not be completely removed from parliamentary review? If you could give that undertaking, I will not even pursue the question.

Mr. Kempling: On behalf of the minister, I can give that undertaking. As you know, an annual report is submitted to the House of Commons and to the Senate, and there is nothing to prohibit any parliamentary committee from requesting that the minister appear before it. In fact, such a provision is included in our standing orders and required in the statute.

The same applies to the Senate. You certainly could ask the minister to appear before a Senate committee to give detailed information. However, there has not been a request, I might say, since 1951 for any information on this particular portion of the act. But I can give you that undertaking, that we can flesh out the report a little and do those things quite easily.

Senator Frith: I would like some undertaking—just to be sure we understand each other, Mr. Secretary—that you would let Parliament know before you pass such a regulation. I am not pushing it to a negative or a resolution, but just before the regulation increasing the cap is adopted I would like an undertaking that you would advise Parliament that you propose to do so, without, perhaps, binding yourself to be limited by a resolution; that you would do it before the fact, rather than telling Parliament in a report after the fact.

Mr. Kempling: As you know, the amounts requested by the department would be in the Estimates and they are subject to perusal by the House and by various committees.

Senator Frith: In other words, they would have to be in the Estimates and part of an appropriation act in due course, even though you could increase the cap. I am not so concerned about the appropriation. The cause here, it seems to me, is a good one: to make loans to immigrants who come and need some money to tide them over. If you were about to pass a regulation to increase the cap above $150 million, we would appreciate an undertaking that you would advise Parliament of your intention to do so, and to give Parliament an opportunity to discuss it before the cap was increased—as distinct from what would be in the Estimates.

Mr. Kempling: Yes. I am not sure that it would fall exactly that way. From putting together the Estimates for the department and other departments I know that if the cap were to rise from $150 million to $200 million, that would have to appear somewhere in the financial records of the government, and therefore it would be open to members to dig that out. People interested in immigration are always looking for these things, and we have some very ardent ones in the House who search for them.

Under the process we have, I do not know whether we would go to Parliament in advance and indicate our intention to raise the cap. That might be an option open to the minister. I do not think she would reject it out of hand, but it is something I would undertake to discuss with her.

Senator Frith: If the minister is prepared to take up that option, she could perhaps correspond with us, or let us know through her colleague, the government leader in the Senate.

Mr. Kempling: Fine.

Senator Frith: The procedure that I can foresee is that the regulation increasing the cap could be passed, so that when the Estimates come along the cap has already been increased.

Mr. Kempling: Yes.

Senator Frith: I think you understand.

Mr. Kempling: Yes, I understand.

Senator Frith: This is the only reservation I have about this bill, which I otherwise support.

Mr. Kempling: I give you my undertaking that I will have the minister correspond with you on that particular issue.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I welcome our distinguished colleague from the other place. We know he is most capable, and always has been. The parliamentary secretary has two people with him today. I would ask that they be introduced to the Senate so that their names and positions will appear on the record. I know the secretary depends so much on them.

Mr. Peter D. Hammond, Legal Services, Employment and Immigration Canada, Department of Justice: My name is Peter Hammond, and I am with Legal Services, EIC, Department of Justice.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Ms. Ann M. Midgley, Director General, Settlement Branch, Employment and Immigration Canada: Honourable senators, I am Ann Midgley. I am the Director General of the Settlement Branch of Canada Employment and Immigration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: If there are no further questions, on behalf of honourable senators I wish to thank the honourable member of Parliament for Burlington, and parliamentary secretary, and the two officials who are with him for appearing before the Committee of the Whole in the Senate today to answer questions put to them by honourable senators.

Mr. Kempling: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, to amend the Immigration Act. Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Frith.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the Bill C-77, to amend the Immigration Act, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO SIT AT SAME TIME AS SENATE

Leave having been granted to revert to Motions:

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to sit at 6 p.m. today, Tuesday, June 26, 1990, even if the Senate is then sitting, and that Rule 76(4) not apply in this case.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I know that the government wants to have this bill passed as soon as possible; on the other hand, we are to have a debate today on the future of the country and on its reorganization. Many of us on this side have to attend. We believe it is our duty to be here. I would like the chairman of the Senate Committee on National Finance, of which I am a member, to realize the dilemma in which he is placing us. I would like to ask a question.

Does the committee chairman feel that postponing consideration of this bill until tomorrow would still allow its passage before we adjourn for the summer? Can he give us his word that he will do all he can to make sure that it will be brought back to us before the end of the session?

Senator Leblanc: Personally, honourable senators, I do not mind not dealing this evening with Bill C-52, which is a government bill. However, the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs, the Hon. John McDermid, is to be present and so are senior departmental officials. Can the minister come again another day? I really have no idea. I would have to ask him before I could give you any assurance. People talk about a dilemma, but it is not of my making. There were no scheduling problems when the minister was asked to testify before the Committee on Bill C-52 and we were not aware of the problems that arose this afternoon. Therefore, I cannot be blamed for asking the minister to come and explain Bill C-52 to us. Personally, I would prefer not to meet this evening.

Motion agreed to.

ABORTION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins, for the second reading of the Bill C-43, An Act respecting abortion.—(Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C.).

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, it is indeed a great responsibility and privilege to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-43. As I will be referring in my remarks quite often to basic principles recognizing the supremacy of God and the rule of law, I think it is proper to recall the preamble of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reads:

> . . . Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law.

In this debate we are specifically dealing with proposed legislation about life and death. This is a matter of the gravest responsibility and the most awesome duty. In particular, we will be legislating on both the life and death of preborn children, the future generations of Canadian society.

Abortion always kills a preborn child growing in its mother's womb. It also has grave impact on distressed mothers and families. Furthermore, abortion is not a service or a therapy for health.

Another point we should recall in this debate is that the Supreme Court found in the Canadian Charter no such thing as a "right to abortion." Also important in considering this bill is that the same Supreme Court decided on January 28, 1988, that the state has a valid, substantial and pressing interest in the life of every child before birth, as well as in the security of person of a mother and all other persons.

In the Daigle case of 1989 the Supreme Court justices acknowledged that it is for legislatures to define those "normative principles" upon which they may interpret the term "everyone" in section 7 of the Canadian Charter to include the preborn child. When we legislate a just law on abortion, we must fulfil that requirement so that the defence of preborn children may be truly interpreted and applied.

As creatures of God, who is supreme in Canada's Charter of fundamental principles, we are disposed to seek and to find in nature itself the very imprint of the rule of law. The natural law never contradicts God's justice: Our Supreme Court seeks to observe those "principles of fundamental justice." The judiciary has a profound role as just men and women in applying legislation and its principles. Because of this justice the law is the greatest teacher.

Just law defends and promotes the common good. Fundamental to this is existence itself. The essentials of the common good, recognized in the Canadian Charter, are natural rights inherent to life and recognized by the state, not conferred by it.

The natural freedom to live and grow is not the right of anyone to take away. The Canadian Charter upholds security of person, closely related to the goods of life and health. Security of person could never bestow on anyone the freedom to offend the security of another, let alone to threaten their life. No human being, including the least one resident in the womb from conception, is dispensable for the presumed security of person of another.

A threatening condition of illness, requiring alleviation by medical intervention that unfortunately cannot save the life of the preborn child, is not direct killing, but because of a natural right to life that "everyone" has, and their Charter-recognized security of person, even this intervention must not be taken without due urgency to save the life of the mother.

Another point we have to consider in this debate is the "rule of law." The "rule of law," as it is related to the supremacy of God, requires not "raw juridical might" but that the law be just, according to the natural law placed in man. If natural law were not found in man's makeup, he could never have acknowledged God's supremacy at all. He could never have upheld justice as a virtue. A crime such as abortion rejects mankind's benevolent justice. A just society must at least defend its weakest members.

Defence of the innocent and the presumption of innocence, so fundamental to justice, comes from the origins of all our codified law: "Thou shalt not kill." The rule of law expresses the authentic role of legislators very mindful of justice. We codify statutes for the sake of peaceful order. The first goods of society, the lives of all of its members and the good health that sustains the life of each, are always sheltered and promoted in the well-ordered state that just law defends. A good law is authority's instrument to uphold the common good of society. A bad law is an instrument that fails to reflect the natural order. An unjust law cannot win the assent of conscience and the dutiful obedience among just men and women.

All constitutional language envisions the continued generation of a society. If the rights and freedoms of a charter, such as our own, are suspended for those in their mothers' wombs, they may be suspended for the next generation, eventually ceasing to apply at all. This is the foundation of the nation's most pressing and substantial interest in the lives of all subjects from the moment they are conceived.

When we fail to recognize that requirement of continuity, we fail in our duty to uphold the Constitution, and we allow the heart and soul of the nation to suffer degeneracy. Honourable senators, let us not allow our country to fall into the degeneracy that occurred in Hitler's Germany. It is a sad irony that Henry Morgentaler, a leading promoter of the permissive holocaust in Canada, is himself a survivor of the holocaust in Europe that was dictated by Hitler.

Dr. Abraham, Director of the Department of Medicine at the Shaare Zedek Medical Centre of Jerusalem, recognized a parallel between the Nazi holocaust of six million Jews and the millions of abortions that have occurred throughout the world.

Dr. Abraham told the Institute for Jewish Medical Ethics that fetuses are human beings, and the abortion of the fetus, who is not a threat to the life of its mother, is murder. He also said:

> Murder of one human being would never justify the means to healing, or relieving the suffering of another human being.

Canada's heritage is a fabric of great religions, rich traditions, and noble tongues. This multicultural treasure is a legacy of our Aboriginal peoples, the French and English settlers and immigrants and their descendants. They have a high regard for the same principles of the family and the sanctity of human life. It is for the common good to pass these principles on to all our children and to future generations. Furthermore, medicine has always understood that life begins at conception. From that point on no further humanity is added to any of us; only food, water, and air.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if we could agree not to see the clock and continue on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: To continue, honourable senators, for proof of this, in 1986 the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan accepted from world-renowned experts in fetology and human genetics, such as Sir William Liley and Dr. Jerome LeJeunne, uncontested evidence that a human being's life begins at conception. The uncontroverted evidence was before the Supreme Court of Canada when it heard the Borowski challenge in 1988 and 1989. That court did not deny the evidence as fact.

In case there is any doubt, the present Minister of Employment and Immigration, speaking in the House of Commons on this subject on July 27, 1988, acknowledged during a debate on abortion that we are speaking about killing an unborn child. I quote:

> Let us not be afraid of the vocabulary.

This can be found in the House of Commons Debates at page 18080.

Furthermore, it is now settled that the debate in Canada as to whether the life in the womb is a human being is not over. We know that for sure now. The debate now is whether anyone has an overriding interest or right to kill that innocent life directly and with intent. All of the Judeo-Christian heritage and other cultural influences resoundingly say no. Our 1987 debate over capital punishment concluded with a definitive no for the killing of the most hardened criminals. We reaffirmed the fact that we must always regard life as sacred. In that debate the Prime Minister reiterated the precept that human life is sacred. He said on the occasion of that debate, and I quote:

> It is wrong to take life, and I can think of no circumstance excepting self defence to justify it.

He went on to say, on June 22, 1987, which can also be found in Hansard:

> But before all else, we uphold one simple principle: the inherent dignity of a human being, the inherent worth of a human life. I will resist with all of my strength, all of my life, any action that would diminish that reality and would lessen that value.

Yet, honourable senators, on that day when he fought for the right to life for murderers, did he think of what he might do today? Today, in presenting and promoting Bill C-43, the Prime Minister refused to accord the right to life in the womb to the preborn sons and daughters of Canada. I ask you, honourable senators, how can he reconcile that?

Furthermore, Statistics Canada revealed that 72,693 abortions were reported in 1988-89. That was only what was reported. In 1987 Statistics Canada told us that of the reported abortions, 13,271 women were repeating abortion, some for the fourth time—all of this at taxpayers' expense, and mostly for reasons of convenience.

The birth rate in Canada—not the conception rate—is well below replacement level today. Some 2.2 children per couple are needed to replace our population. The birth rate in Ontario is only about 1.6 children, lower in Quebec at 1.3, and lowest in Newfoundland at 1.28. Demographers find that the Canadian population will decrease to 18 million by the year 2086 if immigration and the birth rate do not increase. Therefore, we must realize that abortion contributes the greatest measurable influence in this rapid national depopulation, with a lot of help from sterilization procedures, drug abuse, sexually-transmitted diseases, marriage breakdown, poverty, homosexuality, and the other social ills of our society.

As I mentioned earlier, on January 28, 1988, upon hearing the Morgentaler appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the state had a valid, pressing and substantial interest in the life of the preborn child, and that the preborn child may be one of those included in the term "everyone" in section 7 of the Charter if the legislators provide that understanding in a statute.

Honourable senators, we as legislators must exert a greater authority in the fundamental understanding of law and its function. We must employ a broader vision than the narrow constraints of expediency. The Supreme Court of Canada, hearing the Daigle case last year, avowed just that. The court invited us in Parliament to defend the interests of the fetus, stating that the decisions based on broad social, political, moral, and economic issues are more appropriately left to the legislature.

We in this chamber must therefore lead the way for the courts to know that the term "everyone" includes human beings before birth. Through just law we can assert that preborn human beings certainly are among the term "everyone". But Bill C-43 does not do that, nor is there any supportive legislation on the order paper today assisting especially poor and single mothers to want their babies.

Honourable senators, Bill C-43 is fatally flawed. That was the testimony given before the House of Commons legislative committee. Bill C-43 fails to define that what is being aborted is the life, the human life, of the preborn child. There is no explanation in the bill of why and how the child in utero loses a presumed innocence or the right to live. I ask honourable senators: What is the substance of the preborn's lack of defences? Without a right to a hearing, even by proxy, Bill C-43 as it stands today implies that the preborn child is not one of those included in the term "everyone" as used in section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We must ask the Minister of Justice for an explanation why that is so.

There are also questions that we as legislators must answer, or so said the Supreme Court in the 1989 Daigle case and in the 1989 Morgentaler finding. Health is provided in Bill C-43 as grounds for an abortion. I ask: Where is it demonstated in that bill that abortion is healthy? A great deal of psychiatric and physiological evidence exists that abortion is not healthy. The term "abortion" does not describe justifiable medical interventions to save the life of a mother imperiled by serious complications in pregnancy. Abortion is the intentional and direct killing of a preborn child—precisely that act against which just law must stand.

Bill C-43 has either misnamed an intervention as abortion or has promoted abortion on spurious grounds, implying that it is a desirable service for some women. Bill C-43 would greatly harm the aspirations of Canadian women, which are surely part of the common good. Abortion is an affront to a woman's dignity, as many misled victims of that procedure attest. Yet, by making abortion widely available, Bill C-43 is a meaningless deterrent. Furthermore, Bill C-43 does not treat abortion as a crime. If it did, at least the information of parents and counselling of young mothers would be regarded as important deterrents. However, Bill C-43 does not even prevent unconsenting mothers from having an abortion.

Honourable senators, please observe the manner in which Bill C-43 would treat abortion as a crime—only if it is not authorized by a doctor. This is senseless, as it implies that something essentially felonious loses that essence as soon as a medical practitioner decides it does. By a doctor's writ, the act of destruction of society's first good becomes a service. By Bill C-43, practitioners may decide who will live and who will die. The vital interest of the state in its own progeny is then relegated to non-legislative hands. That, honourable senators, imperils the future of Canadian society.

I have already spoken in this chamber in support of Bill S-16, in 1988, and Bill S-7, last month, the latter of which is presently at second reading stage. Both offer superior legislation; that is, superior to what we find in Bill C-43. The explanatory note showing the proper purpose of the legislation that I introduced in this chamber reads:

> The purpose of this Bill is to reassert society's vital interest in its unborn children. That interest is as fundamental to the continued existence of our society as it is to the existence of the human race.

Every abortion kills a presumed innocent preborn human being. That is a grave peril to a fundamental principle of justice. Without a hearing, without witnesses, without evidence or proof, it is serious enough that anyone's security of the person be threatened, but that his very life should be taken is unthinkable. Rather than offering abortion, the state must demonstrate care, support, and sincere interest in the offended mother and her family.

It is false to claim that abortion law criminalizes women. A sturdy fence around a precious property does not criminalize everyone as trespassers.

Honourable senators, let us now briefly review the Supreme Court findings, as Bill C-43 was, in my opinion, faultily designed by the misinterpretation of that court's ruling. As honourable senators know, on January 18, 1988, the Supreme Court decision in the Morgentaler case struck down section 251 of the Criminal Code relating to abortion after the law had been amended in 1969. The case did not consider evidence concerning the humanity of children before birth, nor did it consider the abundant evidence of adverse effects of abortion on the lives of mothers, an important factor in upholding the desired security of the person. The principles reiterated in the Morgentaler case can be summarized as follows: One, security of the person within the meaning of section 7 of the Charter includes the right of access to suitable medical treatment for conditions dangerous to life; two, protection of the preborn child is a perfectly valid and pressing legislative intent; three, in seeking to protect the unborn child according to the valid interest of the state, the right of security of the person of the mother and her child is to remain intact; and four, abortion is not a right, it was said—far from it. Abortion is the threat against which substantial legislation is required.

These points have not been well presented in the press, and clarity of these points has already been occluded by the present Minister of Justice. The subjective pursuit of women's aspirations has already been incorrectly cited by the Minister of Justice as a good reason for aborting babies. That, honourable senators, certainly cannot be inferred from the Supreme Court's findings.

In the Morgentaler decision and the subsequent decision of Tremblay v. Daigle from the Superior Court of Quebec in 1989, the Supreme Court of Canada refrained from answering whether the word "everyone" in section 7 of the Charter includes the child before birth; neither did that court determine an answer in the Borowski challenge heard in 1989. The invitation is resoundingly clear for us, as legislators, to give an answer through the aegis of a sound law.

We know that the Charter codifies fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual vis-à-vis the state. Its primary function is to circumscribe the power of the state to infringe what are regarded not as state-given rights but primary and natural rights. The decision of whether the fetus is a person, the court admitted in Daigle, is a normative task for legislators, which clarifies the recognition of rights and duties. In that context personhood is not susceptible to narrow, legalistic interpretations and fictions. In Morgentaler the court found a glaring lack of parliamentary direction on the spirit and application of the impuned section 251. The vacuity in law, therefore, is not so much the absence of a valid abortion law as it is the absence of normative interpretation.

Honourable senators, I have found in Bill C-43, or what flows from Bill C-43, at least 14 flaws, which I can describe as major.

The first flaw is that the very faults of the former section 251 of the Criminal Code—the lack of sound direction provided by legislators and the resulting arbitrary application—also apply to the present Bill C-43. Furthermore, Bill C-43 will, more than the old section 251, be impotent in securing conviction of felonious abortionists and in defending the state's valid and pressing interests of the preborn children and their mothers.

Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that there is no reason why a woman may not obtain an abortion. The doctor who approves an abortion need only be of the opinion that the pregnancy is likely to threaten the pregnant woman's physical, mental or psychological health. Honourable senators, this is tantamount to abortion on demand.

Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that abortion will be legal throughout the whole pregnancy. Bill C-43 will permit, by law, the killing of a defenceless baby at any stage of pregnancy, even to the full term of that pregnancy. This bill, therefore, lays a foundation for infanticide. Babies who had been slated for abortion, but who came into the world prematurely, perhaps may be left to die under the pretense of treatment to do nothing; that is, by exposure, starvation, dehydration or asphyxiation.

Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that this bill will be powerless against the criminal abortionists. Once the deed is done, it is the word of that one doctor against the word of a plaintiff that it was not necessary. The strongest tort against abortion law is that it is an unnecessary deed. However, it is not a matter of how many doctors should collude in an abortion. Ten doctors saying to a healthy woman that she may abort her healthy baby is not health, nor is it justice. The point is that once a medical opinion is carried out, no one could bear the onus of proof of any felonious conspiracy. The star witness already is deceased.

The May 31, 1990, editorial in The Vancouver Sun objected to the hypocrisy in this bill that would force women to lie to doctors and doctors to evaluate those lies.

Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that abortion could be practised anywhere in Canada—on private property, without access to precisely those hospital services required for life-threatening emergencies and pregnancy complications and miscarriage. Furthermore, in Bill C-43 there is no minimum age for the young mother who seeks abortion. There is no requirement that she be informed about the developing life in her womb or the dangers, both physical and psychological, of abortion. Her parents need not be informed of her seeking an abortion. This flaw in Bill C-43 militates against recognizing abortion as anything like a crime. If it did not, then parents would be regarded as important deterrents.

[Senator Haidasz.]

Another flaw in this bill is that in treating abortion virtually as an entitlement lays down no grounds by which a health-care professional may object in conscience to participating in an abortion. Should prosecution be attempted of any medical authority, we are assured by the Minister of Justice that justice will not be done. How unfair and arbitrary.

Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that this bill would allow anyone to perform abortions. Nurses, technicians, interns, medical students, midwives—even relatives or the mother herself may perform an abortion under the direction of a physician. This is dangerous, honourable senators, for it invites mistakes and a lot of harm.

Furthermore, Bill C-43 provides no criminal basis for rejection of an abortifacient drug, such as the drug RU-486, which is a lethal abortifacient, manufactured by the Roussel Company of France. If that drug is allowed in Canada, once doctors are permitted to adjudge on abortion, mothers may attempt, as prescribed, an abortion at home at any stage in pregnancy and witness the stillbirth or miscarriage of her baby.

Another flaw is that, as federal law contained in the Criminal Code, Bill C-43 will make it difficult or impossible for provinces and communities to restrict abortions or refuse their funding.

Senator Frith: Is it Nova Scotia that will be testing that?

Senator Haidasz: Yesterday we heard on the news that the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that states can restrict abortions in their own jurisdiction in certain cases.

Senator Frith: They have different criminal laws there.

Senator Haidasz: It is the same subject.

Senator Frith: The United States has law jurisdiction rather than federal.

Senator Haidasz: Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that as criminal law it would federally enforce abortion as a virtual right. This is a corrupt misuse of criminal law.

Another flaw in Bill C-43 is that it will deter pro-life counsellors from decreasing cases of abortion if they want to counsel anyone that comes to them in a state of pregnancy. Women who succumb to pressure from interest groups have suffered unabating regret and post-abortion trauma. However, because pro-life counsellors are unsupported, even jailed, pregnant women have very little help in coping with the trauma and grieving, which is known to lead to repeat abortions and even suicide.

In the U.S.A. over 13,000 cases of the post-abortion syndrome were identified in the year 1987. Honourable senators, that is another flaw—No. 13. Passing Bill C-43 will cause deep, social unrest. As you know, neither the pro-life forces nor the pro-choice forces accept Bill C-43. As a law, Bill C-43 will aid and abet abortion, which natural law abhors. The peaceable struggle against this unbearable felony will be forced on to the streets, jailing good citizens as prisoners of conscience.

The fourteenth flaw in Bill C-43 is that it does not really legislate, but attempts a shortsighted problem solution. Without solving a dilemma, it seeks to placate a demand for abortion. The defence of the innocent has become a political hot potato.

In general, honourable senators, what we have been hearing in this debate is the unhealthy lauding of but one opinion, that of Justice Wilson—only one of seven in the Supreme Court of Canada. That does not give abortion the title of right. I repeat, even the majority of the people on the Supreme Court found that no such right to abortion exists. To enforce such a vacuous right behind the clamour of abortion activists, unfortunately, the government has sought to fashion a final solution by wording a bill that really serves the good of no one. I say "final solution," because the Prime Minister said, "Do not expect another abortion bill while I am around."

It is noteworthy that when the house voted two years ago on the government proposal of five possible alternatives for permissive abortion law, all these proposals were roundly defeated. Yet the pro-life amendment propounded by Gus Mitges was barely defeated by 13 votes.

In the fashioning of Bill C-43 much was made of the supposed direction of the Supreme Court, that it represents a competition not found in nature between what is good for a baby and what is good for its mother. This resulting confusion in Bill C-43, unfortunately, helped to have it pass—albeit by a narrow margin of nine votes—because the cabinet was not permitted to vote according to their informed consciences, and the Conservative government MPs had a carrot dangled before them.

Honourable senators, abortion legislation is the most fundamental legislation before us, because it treats of the right to life. The specific issue of the grave faults of Bill C-43 is so profoundly fundamental for Canadian life, identity, and survival that it must be given the most sober of second thought.

The corresponding consultative process in the House of Commons and its legislative committee accepted too presumptively the nature of this bill, overlooking its seditious effects as law.

Honourable senators, without substantive amendments to Bill C-43 giving full protection of life from the moment of conception of the preborn child and the full protection of the life of the pregnant woman, Bill C-43 will remain a bad law and, therefore, not worthy of our support.

Honourable senators, at this time I think it would be good to recall what Cicero, a Roman statesman in ancient times, stated. He said:

> For nothing, surely, can be more inconsistent with a well-poised spirit, than to decline engaging in a laudable action, or to be discouraged from persevering in it by an apprehension of the trouble and solicitude with which it may be attended.

We must, therefore, not forget that abortion is an act of violence. To legalize abortion is to legalize acts of violence. Our whole society, our whole juridical structure, will be corrupted if the law itself becomes an instrument of violence, particularly against the innocent preborn.

Innocence must also be presumed and defended in law. Innocence must be upheld in any "just society." The right to a hearing, necessity of proof and witnesses are all denied the preborn child in Bill C-43. This bill presumes that the child borne in the womb is not one of "everyone," as treated in section 7, and treats him or her as less than no one. Even the child's presumptive innocence is ignored by Bill C-43.

The first rule of good government is justice and compassion. The clamour from certain groups for abortion on demand is strident, but not loving to women or children. On the other hand, to those mothers who are caught up in illegal abortion we should show clemency and measures that correct rather than insult. Many of these women are subject already to increasing anxieties and other manifestations of disconsolate grief. The cause of their grief—abortion—we must deter with all our power.

I urge honourable senators to take up this challenge of protecting our nation's profound interest in preborn children and their mothers with perseverence and loving responsibility. We must stem the tide of abortion, which kills 72,000 preborn children in Canada annually, for this is national genocide and moral disintegration.

I believe it is our pressing duty, as free, mature, and responsible legislators in this chamber of sober, second thought, to legislate just laws for the common good. Bill C-43 is not a just law. That is why, honourable senators, it must be defeated.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will not take much of your time this evening on this bill. I outlined its purposes and need at second reading introduction.

I should congratulate Senator Haidasz on his presentation. I, and his colleagues here in this place, know how sincerely and deeply he feels about this subject. I realize that he has put a lot of work, effort, and time into his speech. I do not think this will be the end of the opportunities for Senator Haidasz to participate in this important debate. There will be committee hearings and third reading debate, and I fully expect a further airing of this subject at those times.

Today, honourable senators, I want to address briefly Bill C-43, the act respecting abortion, and to stress once again the crucial importance of this legislation to our nation.

In a free and democratic society it is our duty to bring forward legislation that reflects the various views and interests of society and respects constitutional guarantees. The legislative proposals presented in Bill C-43 are the result of a very lengthy process, involving careful consideration, consultation, and many months of serious study and deliberation in order to respond to this difficult issue in a fair and reasonable way. Abortion has been put into the Criminal Code in order to balance and protect throughout the pregnancy the rights of the woman who seeks an abortion and the societal interests in protection of the fetus.

Abortion is not simply a medical procedure. It touches many of the issues with which the criminal law has traditionally been concerned. The constitutional boundaries for Bill C-43 were set by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case. In bringing forward this legislation the government has always emphasized the necessity to enact a law that will be capable of withstanding constitutional challenge. Bill C-43 represents a very careful effort to comply with constitutional requirements, and we believe that the proposed bill will be a workable law within constitutional parameters. Although this bill may not be the first choice of every member of the Senate, we must ask ourselves the following question: Is this bill not the most reasonable compromise to balance the rights we all wish to protect in Canada, and yet give some recognition to the competing interests reflected in the great debate that has gone on for so many years in our country?

It is time, honourable senators, to send this bill to a committee for study. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee seems to be the appropriate committee. I should stress again that this is not the last time honourable senators will have an opportunity to speak on this enormously important bill. We simply ask at this time that it be referred to committee for study and for consideration. I am sure that many of the points raised by Senator Haidasz this evening will be reviewed at that time. At third reading stage the concerns that many senators have may be addressed again. I commend the bill to honourable senators, and, at the appropriate time, I will move that it be referred to committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not wish to continue the debate. I rise on a procedural point to say that I know that some senators are opposed to the principle of this bill, perhaps for different reasons, and that that is the explanation for the fact that the bill will receive second reading, on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Hoonourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the motion, I think it is worth noting that Senator Haidasz has provided a very detailed critique of the bill, which, if I heard him correctly, contains some 14 flaws. I refer them to the committee for particular study.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE MARTIAL ASSELIN, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON THE OCCASION OF HIS NOMINATION AS LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I just heard that our colleague, the Hon. Martial Asselin, has been appointed Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Senator Ottenheimer: Although we will miss him, I think I can say we all wish him good luck and are all very happy for him. We are sure that in this post he will serve the people of Quebec with the same dedication and effectiveness he showed in his work as a senator.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the principle that brevity is the soul of wit, I concur with Senator Ottenheimer's remarks. I also would like to express our appreciation and congratulate our beloved colleague on this well-deserved appointment.

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I would like to add my comments to those of all previous speakers.

I have known Senator Asselin, the new Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, for many years. I had the honour and the privilege of working with him on various occasions and was able to benefit from his experience and tremendous competence.

As a resident of Quebec City where the Lieutenant Governor of the province resides, I am delighted that someone from the area more specifically from Charlevoix should receive this honour.

It is an honour he certainly deserves. I am sure that he will serve well both his fellow citizens and the Government of Quebec in his new post. I also wish to congratulate him and wish him many years in a new career to which I am sure he will bring the same qualities that made his career in the Senate and in the other place so successful.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION ACT

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer moved the second reading of Bill C-39, an Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of the Canadian Laws Offshore Application Act is to complete and update the legal framework that applies to Canada's marine spaces. It is also intended to make our laws comply with the new provisions of the Law of the Sea.

We exercise our fishing rights in a 200-mile zone. The law for the resources of the continental shelf applies up to the outer limit of the continental shelf, which is sometimes more than 200 miles, especially off the coast of Newfoundland.

International law grants coastal states exclusive rights to explore and develop the resources of the sea and the continental shelf adjacent to their coast within certain limits. However, Canadian legislation does not sufficiently reflect the current state of the law. This is because under the present interpretation rules, no federal law applies beyond the territorial sea unless expressly provided for. Needless to say, some laws must have such a provision if they are to make sense.

To be effective, laws covering fisheries, customs and income taxes must apply beyond the territorial sea. Nevertheless, other important laws, in particular the Criminal Code and some important social or economic provisions, do not usually apply beyond the territorial sea.

Furthermore, provincial laws cannot apply outside provincial territory, which does not extend beyond the baseline or the coastline. This bill is intended to fill the gaps and thus establish a general framework of legal certainty for the development of offshore areas.

● (1830)

The bill will extend the application of federal and provincial laws to the offshore areas in four ways. First, in a declaratory provision, the bill will make clear that federal laws apply to the internal waters and territorial sea. Second, all federal laws will apply to marine installations or structures, including drilling platforms, floating platforms, artificial islands and other structures used to exploit the resources of the Continental Shelf. Third, the bill empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations to extend the application of provincial laws beyond provincial boundaries to the internal waters of Canada, the territorial sea, and to marine installations or structures on the Continental Shelf of Canada. Fourth, the bill will enable the Governor in Council to broaden the application of federal and provincial laws to areas other than marine installations in our 200-mile fishing zone, or in any exclusive economic zone that Canada might create in the future. I wish to emphasize that this bill and its related amendments are totally consistent with the rights and obligations of Canada under international law.

The government attaches particular importance to the application of Canadian criminal law and the jurisdiction of Canadian courts in respect of offences committed on the Continental Shelf of Canada and elsewhere. Under the amendments to the Criminal Code contained in the bill, it will be possible to prosecute Canadians and foreigners suspected of having committed criminal offences on drilling platforms flying the Canadian flag or a foreign flag when such platforms are attached to the Continental Shelf of Canada.

Moreover, the criminal law will apply to all Canadian ships anywhere in the world, and to Canadian citizens who commit offences outside the territory of any state—for example, on the high seas. These provisions will make it easier to ensure that offshore areas are exploited in an orderly fashion. They will also help to protect fisheries officers who, from time to time, must take action in the case of incidents involving foreign ships suspected of breaking our fisheries laws by clarifying the provisions in the Code related to arrest, search and seizure, and hot pursuit on the high seas.

The bill will amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act so as to specify that our baselines include those that have been determined by Order in Council, our historic baselines, and any other baselines at international law. This provision will also help to specify what are Canada's international waters for the purpose of the application of our laws. Baselines are the lines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured outward 12 nautical miles. All waters on the landward side of baselines are internal to Canada.

[Translation]

The implementation of any legislation as technical as this requires consultation with the groups and institutions concerned. The government is committed to ongoing consultations with the provinces and the territories on the application of their laws beyond their boundaries.

I want to stress that nothing in this Act abrogates or derogates from any rights of the provinces, aboriginal groups or individual citizens. These rights are protected under the Constitution and under certain provisions in the bill. However, the government realizes that certain parties will have some questions about the bill. That is why it will come into force in two stages.

First of all, it will be possible to implement the provisions on broadening the application of federal laws more quickly than those concerning provincial laws. The application of the laws of a given province or territory may be broadened before that of a neighbouring province or territory.

Second, under the bill, 60 days' notice must be given before regulations are issued, to give interested parties a chance to comment on the proposed regulations. Thus, implementation of this legislation will take place in a spirit of consultation and co-operation.

[English]

In conclusion, the Canadian Laws Offshore Application Act will broaden the application of federal and provincial laws. It will amend and modernize the criminal law to make it reflect the increased economic and social importance of the waters adjacent to our coasts. In this regard, it corrects certain ambiguities and fills several gaps in our current laws. All these measures will make it possible for our laws to be a reflection of the rights that Canada has acquired at international law.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate ajourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Charlie Watt moved the second reading of Bill S-18, to further the aspirations of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, for many people Bill S-18 might be just another private member's bill, but for the Aboriginal peoples it represents something far more important.

It represents an effort to redefine the relationship between the federal government and the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Bill S-18 is just one step in correcting over a century of ineffective and often abusive federal policies regarding the Aboriginal peoples. It is an attempt to reshape federal thinking and attitudes, which have perpetuated the intolerable conditions facing so many of the Aboriginal peoples of this country. Above all, it seeks to clearly set out the federal responsibility and process for ensuring that Aboriginal peoples are able to take their rightful place in Canada.

In this sense, Bill S-18 might be one of the more important bills to originate in the Senate in recent years. It is a bill that has been conceived, developed, and launched in the Senate, and it will be the Senate's contribution to honouring and fulfilling the Crown's obligation to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Finally, Bill S-18 will provide a clear signal that the Senate intends to carry out the work that began with the establishment of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

The idea of this bill stems from the period following the 1987 first ministers' conference on aboriginal matters. At that time there was a need to develop a new policy and process to accommodate the rights and aspirations of the Aboriginal peoples in Confederation. Instead of responding to this need, the government ruthlessly cut funding from various aboriginal organizations and programs. This situation is made worse by the fact that the government has refused to develop an overall policy on how it sees the Aboriginal peoples taking their rightful place in Canada.

The aboriginal constitutional reform process was a policy initiative left over from the previous administration. The current government did make one honest effort to bring about an agreement for a self-government amendment. However, it quickly lost interest in the process in favour of trying to reach a constitutional deal on Quebec's outstanding demands.

In the meantime, the concept and meaning of aboriginal self-government has been watered down to the point where the term is being used to describe minor administrative arrangements relating to Aboriginal peoples.

Land claims negotiations is one area where the government has been crediting itself with some success. However, land claims is another example of a policy initiative that was held over from the previous administration.

It is true that after more than a decade of negotiations, the government has reached land claims agreements with a number of Aboriginal peoples. Unfortunately, the government has obtained some of these agreements through intimidation and by threatening to abandon all negotiations and cut off funding for discussions and research.

The current land claims policy has other deficiencies. For example, the government conveniently ignores land claims that do not suit its needs or interests. This is usually the case when it comes time to negotiate land claims on low profile matters involving overlap or offshore areas.

The most serious shortcoming in the existing policy is the federal government's refusal to negotiate self-government arrangements as part of a land claims agreement. It refuses to do so simply as a matter of policy—a policy completely based on an arbitrary decision.

Despite the lack of new initiatives to assist the Aboriginal peoples, the government has consistently pursued an unwritten policy of attempting to deny, limit, or off-load its responsibilities and obligations regarding the Aboriginal peoples. Every provincial government and aboriginal group has probably come across this unwritten policy at one time or another in its dealings with the federal government. Bill S-18 would block such an unwritten policy.

The federal government's efforts to deny or limit its responsibility for Aboriginal peoples provides a good example of an important issue that is addressed by Bill S-18. Under section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the federal government has the jurisdiction and the power to deal with a number of matters, including those relating to the Aboriginal peoples.

The federal government fulfills its duties and exercises its powers for most matters coming under its jurisdiction. This is clearly the case for areas relating to the military, the printing of money, postal services and so forth. Canadians would not have it any other way. They fully expect the federal government to act to fulfill its responsibility in areas coming under its jurisdiction. In fact, through its spending power, the federal government even acts in areas where it does not have jurisdiction. Post-secondary education and medicare are two examples of this. However, it is a different story when it comes to federal jurisdiction in matters relating to Aboriginal peoples.

The government argues that it is wrong for people to think that it should act on various aboriginal matters. It argues that its jurisdiction in this area is merely an enabling provision. As a result, the government concludes that it has no responsibility to act on matters relating to the Aboriginal peoples, except for what is provided for in the narrow confines of the Indian Act or in what is set out in arbitrary policies.

Bill S-18 would put an end to this double standard. It would compel the federal government to act in this area by defining the federal government's responsibilities, duties, and obligation to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada. In other words, the government would have to carry out its responsibilities on aboriginal matters in the same way it currently acts to carry out its responsibilities for other matters coming under its jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, I should now like to provide a brief explanation of the proposed Aboriginal Peoples Act. The first part of the bill would provide general protection for aboriginal and treaty rights through the use of various non-derogation and non-abrogation clauses. Aboriginal peoples have felt that such provisions have been made necessary by the government's inconsistent use of such clauses to protect aboriginal rights in federal legislation.

The Aboriginal Peoples Act would also direct the government to initiate policies and programs that would provide the Aboriginal peoples with the means to exercise their right to self-government; acquire institutions and resources necessary for self-government; promote their cultures and values; improve their economic circumstances; and generally exercise their skills and talents.

The same section of the bill would prevent arrangements between the federal government and other governments that would reduce the rights of the Aboriginal peoples or diminish federal authority, obligation, or fiduciary duty regarding the Aboriginal peoples.

The proposed legislation would also result in a major overhaul of the job description normally associated with the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs. Under this bill, the minister would be charged with the responsibility of advocating on behalf of the Aboriginal peoples. For example, he or she would have to promote an understanding among Canadians that the cultures, rights, and institutions of the Aboriginal peoples constitute a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

Moreover, the minister would have to take steps to ensure that Aboriginal peoples would have adequate resources to carry out negotiations, to represent their interests, and generally to preserve and develop their economies, cultures, and governmental institutions.

In addition, the minister would have to take measures and find funding to reduce disparities in economic opportunities between Aboriginal peoples and other Canadians.

Perhaps the most significant aspect of the proposed legislation is found in the provision requiring the minister to enter into negotiations on outstanding land claims, self-government and resources required for self-government, and the modernization of existing treaties and agreements. According to the bill, the minister would have to enter into such negotiations within six months of having received a request to do so from the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Honourable senators, the last point I wish to make concerning Bill S-18 is very important, and one that has come to light as a result of the developments surrounding the demise of the Meech Lake Accord. It now appears that the future of the country will be decided through a series of bilateral relations and bilateral agreements between the federal and provincial governments. This type of approach may not be ideal, but it will probably work as far as provincial interests are concerned. However, it fails to provide a means by which the Aboriginal peoples may participate in decisions affecting the future of this country.

The events of the past few weeks more than demonstrate the danger of trying to freeze the Aboriginal peoples out of such decisions. It is therefore obvious that there is a real need for bilateral relations and discussions between the federal government and the Aboriginal peoples. Bill S-18 would clearly provide the Aboriginal peoples with a process, resource, and capability to pursue such bilateral relations with the federal government on their future in Canada.

In closing, I wish to stress that Bill S-18 is only a starting point for the Aboriginal peoples. It is my hope that they will use the bill as an opportunity to come forward with their views and suggestions in order to develop legislation that will fully reflect their desires and aspirations.

I believe the newly-formed Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples would be in an excellent position to facilitate such consultations. Through the use of such a forum, the Senate will be able to work in conjunction with Aboriginal peoples to develop effective solutions.

For the reasons I have outlined, I call on the Senate to give quick passage to Bill S-18. It is a bill the Aboriginal peoples need now more than ever.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in support of Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Act. This bill is not complicated, and I should like to offer a few comments on the benefits it holds for the Canadian business community.

Honourable senators, the situation now is one where the right of duty on certain imported goods is reduced retroactively. Consequently, it is only fair and equitable that importers of these goods receive a refund for the duties they overpaid during the period of retroactivity. Over and above these refunds, the importers should be paid interest on these sums, because their financial resources have been tied up for a period of time through no fault of their own. As well, honourable senators, the act provides for appeal rights where a departmental decision adversely affects an importer. It is felt that the same provisions should be applied uniformly in all cases. In order to ensure equity and fairness, the appeal provisions should apply in these circumstances as well.

In essence, the bill gives the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, the mechanism to grant the full benefits arising from the orders made by the Governor in Council. Unless this legislation is passed importers will not receive fair and equitable treatment.

Honourable senators, the new customs tariff that implemented the harmonized system on January 1, 1988, included Order in Council authority to allow the government, during an 18-month period after implementation, to respond to requests to restore rates in effect under the old tariff. A recent amendment to the customs tariff extends this authority for a further 12 months. Currently the Customs Act does not allow for these provisions to be fully implemented, given that the authority to refund duties does not cover the entire retroactive period provided for in the tariff. As a result, without an amendment to the Customs Act, importers will be unable to obtain refunds of duties overpaid and accrued interest paid for the full retroactive period.

Honourable senators, this bill provides the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, with the authority to refund duties overpaid in all instances where the Governor in Council has ordered that lower rates apply retroactively. It ensures that all importers are treated equitably with respect to payment of interest on their claims, and it ensures that appeal procedures currently provided by the Customs Act also apply to all importations affected by such Orders in Council. Honourable senators, this bill, in the interest of fairness and equity, should be passed as quickly as possible. I would recommend it for second reading.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody gave me a copy of his speaking notes and other material. He has clearly explained the purpose of the bill, which is to correct an inequity that flowed from certain amendments to the Customs Act, particularly in the harmonized system project.

I suggest we give the bill second reading now. If Senator Doody can produce someone for tomorrow, in Committee of the Whole, we can ask these questions of the minister or his representative at that time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to Committee of the Whole at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SIXTY-NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Roméo LeBlanc, moved the adoption of the sixty-ninth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the debate and process concerning the Meech Lake Accord.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as mentioned earlier, Senator Olson will yield to Senator David.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, may motion has been agreed to, although late. I will give the speech I had prepared for the beginning of today's sitting.

Honourable senators, the rejection of the Meech Lake Accord by two Canadian provinces and the assembly of native chiefs is a new painful experience for the people of Quebec. After three long years of debate, the sudden changes of these last few weeks have shown how fragile the Canadian parliamentary system could be and how vulnerable to intolerable procedural devices. The latest melodramatic episodes have tarnished our natioal and international image. Non one in our country can take pride or feel honour in what has happened. As a Quebecer, I feel a deep sorrow comparable to what I felt during the events of 1970 and 1981-82.

Like it or not, the defeat of Meech Lake is a setback for our constitutional development and our maturity as a nation. This rejection has obviously encouraged a large segment of the Quebec population that aspires to sovereignty-association or independence. I sincerely believe that the death of Meech betrays the intent of the Fathers of Confederation who in 1867 had understood that Canada's future depended on a difficult compromise of balanced but generous tolerance between the two leading groups in our new nation.

Meech is no more. Politicians hasten to find scapegoats and shift the blame onto their opponents. Historians will dissect what actually happened, their task made easier by the passage of time and historical developments. But we who live through the event have the thankless task of rebuilding what we destroyed. I must point out with great regret the harmful role our own House played in this issue.

But to be objective, I must also tell Quebecers that it is wrong to say that the rejection of the Meech Lake Accourd is a rejection of Quebec by all English Canadians or at least by the majority of premiers who represent them.

Premiers Vander Zalm of British Columbia, Getty of Alberta, Devine of Saskatchewan, Peterson of Ontario, Buchanan of Nova Scotia and Ghiz of Prince Edward Island respected their commitment and were faithful allies of the people of Quebec throughout these three years. I take this opportunity to thank them and express my admiration for them. Premier McKenna of New Brunswick, after criticizing the imperfections of the Accord for a long time, nevertheless made a noble effort of reconciliation by submitting a list of proposals to be the subject for coming negotiations. With the assurance of his fellow first ministers who met for a week, his legislature unanimously endorsed the Accord. We thank him.

A special tribute must be paid to John Turner, the outgoing leader of the Liberal Party, whose support for the accord never waivered and who had the courage to re-affirm his convictions before the recent Liberal leadership conventin. Ed Broadbent as well, notwithstanding a few minor hesitations, correctly honoured his commitment and deserves our gratitude.

Finally, the initiative for this gripping and painful adventure of national reconciliation was the work of our Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. Quebecers must not forget that he was the author, advocate and unrelenting defender of this accord whose sole aim, from start to finish, was to bring Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional fold. Despite the deep disappointment he must be feeling, it would be unfair and malicious to hold him responsible for this failure. Many of the comments I heard this afternoon led me to believe that he was the preferred target of our friends opposite. During three years the Prime Minister and the members of his team, particularly our leader, Senator Murray, worked patiently, relentlessly and loyally to convince the new provincial premiers elected during that period that they ought to honour and ratify the signature of their predecessors.

A very special acknowledgement concerning the impeccable behaviour of Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa who, in his televised address, thanked Prime Minister Mulroney for his unfailing support. With firmness, dignity but with moderation, he described the frustration felt by his government and the people of Quebec, yet never did he dismiss his federalist option. I believe this last sentence is significant.

We hope his appeal will be heard and understood. For sure, he will never negotiate a new accord as long as Canada as a whole does not accept the minimum five demands which two recalcitrant provincial legislatures chose not to honour. The ball is definitely in Canada's court, and I hope that the message of Mr. Bourassa, who has the stature of a respected and respectable head of State, will finally be analysed on its merits. Otherwise, the march of Quebecers which we witnessed in Montreal yesterday and which you saw on your television screens will continue inexorably towards their affirmation as a distinct society.

During the past few weeks I was reminded of my professional life as a physician. Many times we tried to save patients but were unable to do so. Medicine's failures, however, have been responsible for some of the remarkable progress we have made today. Using this as a metaphor for Meech Lake, it seems to me that the death of Meech Lake may become a starting point for correcting some of the serious shortcomings in our constitutional system. Society, like medicine, must analyze its mistakes and find new ways to avoid repeating them. Since perfection is not inherent to the human condition, society or legislators, we can only strive towards an ideal that is rarely achieved, and we must do so in gradual stages.

The failure of Meech Lake should be seen as one of those stages, and that is why, despite its imperfections, I personally endorse this proposal with enthusiasm, confidence and pride. I remain convinced that its rejection was a serious mistake, and I fervently hope that the consequences will not be irreparable.

I believe that if Canada is to be one of the leading nations of this world, it must show leadership in taking a more understanding attitude to its own minorities. To promote respect, good will and understanding is as much a matter of the heart as the mind. The post-Meech period demands that we review our entire Constitution, not this inconsistent and often ill-conceived «patching» whose interpretation may vary from one expert to the next. It is my humble opinion that perhaps the time has come to create a kind of royal commission whose mandate would be to draft a second constitution adapted to the needs of a modern Canada. The Commission would have a five-year mandate, which would be time well spent to take some distance and to organize wide-ranging hearings with witnesses from across the country, from all the provinces, and produce a document that is realistic and acceptable to the people of this country.

For the time being we must set aside all prejudices and, especially, our partisan feelings to draw a lesson from Meech and rebuild an exemplary country based on co-operation, not confrontation. It is a possibility, if we agree that our linguistic and cultural differences can become a stimulus for collective and distinctive enrichment.

In concluding, honourable senators, I ask you to understand the tremendous disappointment of the people of Quebec, to work hard to reconcile our differences, and to support the generous and comprehensive historical aspirations of Quebec, which are entirely compatible with the equally specific aspirations of other provinces and territories and Canada as a whole.

Honourable senators, by my reemarks I have tried to transmit to you my disappointment, my feelings, my convictions and, yes, my optimism. Thank you.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would Senator David entertain a question?

Senator David: Of course, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: Did I understand correctly that at the beginning of his speech he said that two provinces had rejected the Meech Lake Accord?

Senator David: I don't know whether I said it in exactly those words, but in any case, two provinces, Manitoba and Newfoundland, did not sign the Accord.

Senator Molgat: I thought you said: "Rejected". That was certainly not the case in Manitoba. The question was never put.

Senator David: I agree that as far as that term is concerned, you are right, Senator Molgat. I should have used the word "ratified". I should have said they did not ratify the document.

• (1910)

[English]

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I originally introduced this inquiry—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, will Senator Olson's interventon close the debate?

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had understood that Senator David wanted to make his speech today and I wonder whether he has now finished it.

Senator David: Yes, I have, Senator Frith.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are others who wish to speak as well. I am afraid that since the debate stands in Senator Olson's name, if he speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate, but I gather that that is not so. Some honourable senators wish to speak this evening and some wish to speak tomorrow on the same subject, and, rather than going through the process of trying to open another avenue or channel, I think we should stay on this order.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that I yielded to Senator David on the basis of the discussion earlier today; that the debate will return to me and that it will go on after I have spoken. I intend to finish my participation at this time, but other honourable senators can speak afterwards if they so wish.

Senator Frith: That is fine, as long as it is understood. Otherwise, the rule would take effect.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as I said a moment ago, I introduced this inquiry and, after a short speech, had it stand in my name so that it would be on the Orders of the Day. As I said at the time, I believed very sincerely that there was under way an attempt to transfer the responsibility from those people involved in the management of the Meech Lake Accord—namely, the Canadian government, including the minister who sits in this chamber—to someone else. In other words, the fault would be someone else's.

We have witnessed the Prime Minister, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations and others attempting to transfer the responsibility for the failure of the Meech Lake Accord to someone else. It was clear to me that members of the government would make that attempt, and that is why I stood this order in my name.

As I participate in the debate this evening, it is more in sadness than anything else. Let us look around Canada. We have never had such bad federal-provincial relations. For example, the Premier of Quebec is saying that he will never come to another first ministers' meeting. The Prime Minister is saying that if Quebec does not come to the meeting there will not be a meeting. If these men mean what they say, that process is over. I suppose we will have to wait until other personalities occupy those positions before we have any tranquility. The strange part is that after these people go on and say what a great country Canada is, they then say, "We are going to wreck it all now because we are not coming to any more meetings."

I do not have all the points in front of me; I would not repeat them anyway because I intend to make a short speech. However, time after time comments have been made to the effect that the leaders in Manitoba or the Premier of Newfoundland caused all the problems. Then Elijah Harper became the problem. I do not think we need explain what Elijah Harper was trying to do. He had every justification, as far as I am concerned, to take the action he took. Aboriginal people in this country have been ignored for a long time, and most recently when the government did not even include them in the so-called parallel resolution they had intended to introduce.

It is sad that a government that is supposed to be the government of all Canada has created this crisis. It is a crisis. It was not there before they started debating this matter. However, the way the whole thing has been managed has created a crisis. There are intense, and perhaps hard, feelings in parts of the country as a result of the so-called great debate that has brought us to this mess.

It is important that we understand the thinking of the rest of Canada. I believe Canada has changed profoundly as a result of this debate. For example, Premier Bourassa will not come to the negotiating table any more. He has said that he will not meet with the provincial premiers; that he will only have bilateral discussions with the federal government on all the issues we wish to discuss, such as immigration, communications and so on.

We have not heard much about it lately, but there used to be something called western alienation. If you think that feeling is dead, you have not been listening or following what has been taking place. Here is what will happen, and I say this without hesitation: There is no way that any one province can deal with the federal government in such a way that other provinces are excluded from getting the same kind of deal, whether it be on transportation, communications, immigration or anything else. Western Canada is pretty tired of having to knuckle under to central Canada over and over again. Absolutely nothing came out of this whole process to improve that situation. That is why I say this whole situation is sad. I think the main reason for all these problems is that nobody has been speaking for Canada. This government has never spoken for all of Canada.

Therefore, what we will have is a different country. It is hard to imagine what kind of country it will be. It will be difficult to set up a structure if the feelings of today are held for some time into the future. This government delivered the present situation to us.

I do not intend to argue the pros and cons of the Meech Lake Accord. I have certain reservations about what was in it, as I have previously stated.

Senator Murray: Some reservations? You fought it every inch of the way. Don't try to rewrite history now!

Senator Olson: I suppose "certain reservations" could mean what the leader has just said.

Senator Murray: You fought it every inch of the way, tooth and nail, root and branch.

Senator Olson: I was not there every inch of the way. The leader was there every inch of the way, and he messed things up so badly that now we have a completely different country.

In many ways I am sad about that, because we did have a country that could get together under previous governments, although we did not always agree. This great country, as the leader describes it from time to time, is the result of those previous discussions. I do not think we can have such discussions any more because of what has happened. The minister responsible for federal-provincial relations surely has to take the bulk of the responsibility for that.

There are many ways to measure something, and one is to look at the result. I am told that there was a great deal of intimidation, especially of the leaders of Manitoba. There were threats of serious economic consequences for Manitoba if the Meech Lake Accord was not passed. I do not know why Hibernia is being held up in the House of Commons today, but I have my suspicions, $2.7 billion worth, and if that happens there will be another consequence because of the mismanagement of Canada's national affairs by this government.

That is the message that seems to be coming from the other place today. During Question Period in the other place only questions on Hibernia were being asked. I hope the government does not have in mind severe economic penalties for Newfoundland because of what has happened. However, after what I have seen, I would not be surprised if the government tried to do that, but it will do so at its peril.

Let me get back to what I was saying a minute ago respecting the western provinces. The Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party, to be honest, have lost control in the west. If there is not to be a corresponding accommodation for what western Canada has been asking since Meech Lake came along, the beneficiary of western Canada will be the Reform Party. That party will wipe out every seat the Progressive Conservative Party now has in Alberta. In fact, that may well happen right away, but things will get worse. The government might well realize that it will not get away with this.

In Saskatchewan and British Columbia another party, other than the Conservative Party, will be the beneficiary. I do not know at this moment whether or not it will be the Liberal Party. That happened a couple of times before, and there were some rather interesting consequences.

I was a member of the Social Credit Party. I believe the Social Credit Party won all but two seats in western Canada in the federal election of 1935. The west at that time had given up on both the old parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives. That is how the CCF got its start in Saskatchewan and in other provinces across the country. In frustration, the western provinces dumped both old parties. If you think they are not ready to do that again, you are just not listening. I think it would be a terrible disservice to Canada to have that happen now.

However, there is more to it than that. Western Canada believes, just as Quebec does, that it can get along without the rest of Canada, if Canada carries on in the way it has. The oil wells will flow, the gas wells will flow, the trees will grow, and the coal mines will be mined. We have great seaports in Vancouver and Prince Rupert. If the government thinks it can intimidate western Canada, it better not kid itself, because western Canada is not listening any more. Western Canada does not want to listen any more. If the government wants to start down this road, and sit around like the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations is doing, trying to blame somebody else, they had better rethink that strategy.

I think the government has to do an enormous repair job, and not only in Quebec is there need for a repair job to be done. Even the government members will understand that if they think about it for a moment.

One tries to understand what has been taking place, but western Canada was given short shrift. What was Alberta offered? Two more Senate seats five years from now—that is, if there is not Senate reform in the meantime.

Senate reform, by the way, is a myth. The provinces really want a redistribution of power so that they can be masters in their own houses, to some extent. I do not know whether the Minster of State for Federal-Provincial Relations ever understood that. He has said that Senate reform might come about. I have been around here a long time and I know very well that there will not be a Triple-E Senate in my lifetime, or in the leader's lifetime either. He knows very well, for example, that the House of Commons would never vote for that, and that is where constitutional amendments eventually have to come from. We have been through this two or three times since I came here 30 years ago. When it gets right down to the wire, the House of Commons will not to vote that the residue of power will be vested in the Senate, whether it is a Triple-E Senate or whatever.

Neither would the first ministers transfer that power to an elected Senate, but perhaps we will not have any more of those conferences anyway. I happen to believe, however, that there will be others occupying the Offices of the Premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada who will not take this kind of head-on, devil-may-care attitude and try to impose that on the rest of Canada.

As I said, honourable senators, I do not intend to make a long speech. There is one other thing, however, that is becoming irritating to the people in western Canada, and that is the expression, "It is the English." I want to tell honourable senators that there are a lot of us out there who are not "the English" doing all of this. Many of the premiers from various provinces, Ontario and others, including the Premier of Alberta, heaped praise upon, and indicated their support for, Meech Lake, wanting to go all the way with it. What is happening now that it has failed? They are trying to make out that it was some kind of rejection of Quebec, which it never was. I am sure the minister may make that argument again, but I say that this was no rejection of Quebec.

I will tell senators what it was: It was a rejection of the process. If we look into it a little deeper we will find that it was not only the process but the tactics that were used in the process that really were annoying. Those who attended those meetings for seven days and seven nights, or whatever it was, said they would never go through that again. I think almost all of them said that. I know Premier Getty returned to Alberta saying that he would never again participate in that kind of process. Premier Filmon, according to a newspaper article, will never forget how Ottawa treated him. He said that he would never participate again in that kind of process. The article states that, while claiming to recognize the aspirations of Quebec, the premier indicated that constitutional discussions directed only at satisfying one province were unworkable.

Senator Murray: Do you agree with that?

Senator Olson: Yes, I agree with that. I think the government has to treat Canadians all over Canada in the same way. If you are not prepared to do that, then you have no right to be the Government of Canada.

Senator Murray: You do not think there was some unfinished business after 1982?

Senator Olson: I believe you have misrepresented what happened in 1982 every time you have spoken about it. I was there, in case you have forgotten. You keep reminding me over and over again that I was there.

Senator Murray: I was seated over there at the time and I voted against it.

Senator Olson: Well, I attended the federal-provincial meeting in 1982. I was a junior minister, but I was there. And I know one other thing—Premier Levesque was there too.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Olson: And he was invited to sign. He decided that he would not sign the constitutional amendment, so why are you saying that somebody isolated him? We knew very well that he would not sign anything that strengthened Canada because he was philosophically opposed to such a thing.

Senator Murray: What position did Mr. Ryan, the Liberal leader, take?

Senator Olson: You keep coming back to the argument that somehow the government of the day drove Quebec away from the meeting. That is not true! And no matter how many times you say it, it will not make it true. I sat for hours between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec and listened, as did other ministers who were there. Quebec was not asked to leave. Quebec was not driven off or isolated, as the Prime Minister has stated, in any way. Of course, if you do not want to accept that, if you do not want to admit that the Premier of Quebec at that time was philosophically opposed to such a strengthening of Canada, that is one thing. He was a separatist. He was in favour of sovereignty association. How would anyone expect him to sign something that would strengthen the Constitution of Canada? He did not want to belong.

Senator Murray: It was imposed upon him against his wishes.

Senator Olson: It was not imposed upon him.

Senator Murray: Oh, yes, it was!

Senator Olson: Oh, come on, you were not there. You act as if you were. It is mischievous to take something like that and perpetuate it as if it were a fact. It is not the truth!

Honourable senators, as I said, I did not intend to make a long speech. I think, however, that some of these things need to be placed on the record, in case anyone has any happy idea that Canada will be the same after what the Premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister have said they will do. It will not be as simple as Quebec's indicating that it will not come to the meetings so we will not have any meetings. I do not think any province, and I don't care which one we are talking about, can make some kind of deal that will be denied to the other provinces.

Senator Murray: Where do you see that?

Senator Olson: That is the consequence of this whole situation. Premier Bourassa has said that he will have bilateral negotiations only from now on.

Senator Murray: They all do.

Senator Olson: Oh, they do. So is there now to be a French Canada and an English Canada? That is a false statement right from the word go. There is a lot more to Canada than a division between English and French. There are the Aboriginal peoples, for example. And what about the nine million people who are not English at all? What about us?

I could go on to tell honourable senators a few things about whether the first to arrive here were the French, the English, or the Vikings. They are my ancestors, and they landed on the continent first. I think Senator Doody could tell us what they have done in northern Newfoundland about that. I do not know what they did with the people—they found their remains, but none of them ever got back to Norway.

Senator Doody: How do you know?

Senator Olson: There is no record of it.

Senator Doody: Well, that's different.

Senator Olson: On that note, honourable senators, perhaps I should close by saying that I think the government has made a terrible mess of what was a great country. We do not know what will happen. I think we have enough strength in all parts of Canada, including Quebec, to perhaps repair the damage.

But I do not believe the same people who delivered us into this mess can get us out of it.

Senator Frith: Well done!

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, we are living historic times which are sad times for me. The death of Meech Lake is a very important event. You will allow a Quebec senator—Senator David is also from Quebec—to say a few words on the constitutional situation.

We have to remember that in 1867, one of the reasons, but not the only one, why Canada adopted the federal system was because Quebec had just adopted a civil code, because it was still of French language and French culture, in short, because Quebec was a distinct society. That is the main reason for Canadian federalism. Other provinces, the Maritimes, for instance, were favourable to federalism. The first Canadian constitutional crisis was not prompted by Quebec. It was induced by Nova Scotia who, in 1868, was not satisfied with Canadian federalism.

Sir John A. Macdonald solved the problem by rightly giving Nova Scotia what it was asking for. Later on, the Constitution was amended.

[English]

Senator Stewart: What was that amendment to which the honourable senator refers?

Senator Beaudoin: It has to do with the spending power, but I would like to respond to questions later, if you do not mind.

Senator Stewart: It certainly was not!

Senator Beaudoin: What do you mean when you say there was no amendment? The Constitution was amended later on, in 1907, for purposes of federal payments to the provinces, but I will return to that point later.

[Translation]

A federal system was chosen partly because of the distinct character of Quebec and also because the Maritimes wanted such a system. Then, and I think we owe it to the wisdom of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George-Étienne Cartier, that form of government allowed Canada, the small British colony lost in the north of the United States, to become, some 123 years later, the seventh industrialized power in the Western world.

I think that they were right, and there have been at least 23 amendments to the Canadian Constitution. I could come back on that point, but I do not intend to do so tonight. The Canadian federalism has changed considerably in time. Macdonald had dreamed of centralized federalism. Sir Wilfrid Laurier preferred a little less centralized version. At first, Mackenzie King wanted federalism to be somewhat decentralized, but he centralized it starting in 1935. Other Prime Ministers followed. That is to say that Canadian federalism has gone through phases, shifting toward centralization at times and toward decentralization at others. Hundreds of rulings were made regarding the legislative jurisdictions. Many constitutional conferences were held on the subject since 1907. The first one dealt with federal payments to the provinces.

The Canadian federalism has indeed evolved considerably. There were other constitutional crises—this was not the first—and and we have resolved all of them. However, we have just witnessed the death of a very reasonnable constitutional amendment which I think will have serious consequences. Never in our history has an amendment caused so much controversy. Some have said: "The process was undemocratic. The people were not involved. The talks took place behind closed doors."

Senator Olson: In the middle of the night.

Senator Beaudoin: Senator Olson, I challenge you to find in the Canadian history one single case of an amendment which was discussed for three years and signed on three occasions by all First Ministers. There is none. Such a case does not exist. This constitutional amendment was debated at length and rejected. One could be for or against it. In this case, however, I am tempted to borrow from great French Minister Maurice de Talleyrand—Périgord an expression which he used when referring to an event during the French Empire: "It was more than a mishap, it was a mistake".

Today, I feel that in the history of our country, a mistake was made. The Meech Lake Accord represented an acceptable form of federalism at a definite time in our history. It was consistent with our current requirements. It met the needs of the day. Yet, it happens sometimes in history that some men or women or political players do not realize the deep significance of some events. In my humble opinion—and I could be wrong—but this is what has just happened. History will identify those most responsible for this failure. Such is not my purpose today.

In one of his books, writer Stefan Zweig mentions the shining moments of human history. There is no doubt that we did not live through one of them. It was rather a dark moment. There is no doubt in my mind that we have just missed an appointment with destiny. We find ourselves today the way we were a few years ago. But in the meantime, Quebec has changed, as clearly evidenced by the events of these past few days.

I just cannot understand those who say that Quebec's five conditions were acceptable, but not the Accord itself. Such an attitude cannot withstand strict scrutiny. The Accord was signed on three occasions, analysed by experts for and against, and explained a hundred times. Personally, I wish that those who opposed the Meech Lake Accord, instead of wasting time, would have told us from the very beginning what they thought of this Accord. If the letter of this Accord is dead, we should at least try to preserve its spirit for tomorrow when we, as Francophones, Anglophones and Native Canadians, may try to resume the dialogue at the first opportunity.

I feel it is most unfair to blame this failure on the Prime Minister of Canada. I suggest that Prime Minister Mulroney and the ten Premiers who signed the Meech Lake Accord, who signed it again in June 1987, and who signed it once more at midnight on June 9 at the Conference Centre—with three new Premiers—made the right decision.

Three years ago, the First Ministers had made the right decision on the Meech Lake Accord. Most of the Premiers went along with it. I deplore that all did not persevere to the very end. History will judge their action.

As to Quebec, I feel it showed tremendous patience and dignity.

What are we going to do now? What has the future in store for us? To be honest, nobody knows. As Victor Hugo wrote once: "The future belongs to nobody but God".

I regret the tremendous efforts I made for years to favour the adoption of the Meech Lake accords. As a teacher, I have been concerned for many years with the constitutional issue, I devoted my life to it and have always enjoyed working in Constitutional Law. It was with tremendous pleasure that I cooperated with Senator Murray.

But to return for a moment to Quebec's part in all this. Quebec has always managed to strongly influence the Canadian Constitution. This time it failed. I wish to emphasize that we, as Quebecers, should be careful not to lump together all English Canadians. A great many sais yes to Quebec. This should be emphasized again and again. Others said no. Some are in high places.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, those in English Canada who said no were not able to read what the events were telling them. A period of great uncertainty is beginning today.

Honourable senators, we must learn to bring more rigour in our debates. I have always thought substance prevailed over procedure. I have always thought the desire of a people, a population or the great Canadian nation prevailed over the narrow confines of partisan concerns.

Let us never forget we were right in bringing Quebec back to the constitutional table. I heard at noon a debate on whether Quebec was legally bound by the Constitution. Of course; no jurist has any doubt about that in Quebec. The issue is not whether Quebec is bound by the 1982 constitutional amendment, that is obvious.

The fact is, as Senator Murray pointed out, that Quebec's National Assembly did not say yes in November 1981. The independence forces were not alone, Senator Olson, there were also Claude Ryan and his party. They are federalists. Care should be taken in our discussions. We wanted to bring Quebec back to the constitutional negotiations. Of course, Quebec is bound by the Constitution. I said it was and would defend that position everywhere.

It is a pity, such a great pity that the debate expanded. Yet, it was the Quebec round. Everyone brought in his demands and the debate took larger proportions. At one point there was even an attempt to solve everything at the same time. That is not possible.

[Senator Beaudoin.]

I am confident Messrs. Mulroney, Bourassa, Peterson and all the other premiers who said yes will in the end be proven to be historically right.

Finally, we must make a distinction between the political situation and the legal process. If tomorrow, in the months and years to come, Anglophones, Francophones and all the various elements that make up this great country of ours, if Anglophones and Francophones want to live together—if, as André Laurendeau said, the political will to do so exists—legal experts will surely find a way to keep them together.

Constitutions exist for people, not the reverse. It is up to the Constitution to adjust to our needs. It is not up to us to adjust to the needs of the Constitution. The same applies to federalism. There is no standard form of federalism, as the Supreme Court of Canada declared. If Canada wants to survive, it will have to adapt and opt for a form of federalism that meets the needs of a country that is not, let us face it, homogeneous. Quebec is what it is. The other provinces are what they are. Quebec has the Civil Code, while the other provinces have Common Law. That is wonderful! What's wrong with that? Quebec is francophone, and the other provinces are largely anglophone. We must learn to live together. I think it would be entirely irresponsible to slam the door shut.

This is a time for sober reflection. We must find a way to reflect together. We must find a way to mature together, at the same pace. When I listen to various discussions, I wonder whether that is what is wrong with us. We are not maturing together. We are not maturing at the same pace.

I don't think Quebec can be blamed for anything. I think it put forward its conditions fairly and squarely. I think Bourassa behaved with a lot of dignity. We will have to be very creative and inventive to get out of this terrible impasse.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to make my own contribution to this debate, following Senator David's motion. New Brunswick was a participant and, furthermore, supported the 1982 constitutional amendment for three or four major reasons we felt were very important: to patriate the Constitution Act from the other side of the Atlantic, to enshrine equalization, to include measures in the constitutional text that would deal with regional disparity, plus a few others.

We thought then that it was not perfect. But we realized it was perhaps time to go through this first stage. It goes without saying that a few years later, in 1985-86, we felt it was desirable, given the desire of all the premiers and of the actual prime minister, Mr. Mulroney, to proceed with the Quebec round.

I will spare you the details on the minimal conditions of Quebec, because everyone knows these conditions which led to the accord. We said it in 1982, it was an imperfect document or constitutional act, but we had to go through that stage, it was one step in the right direction.

Quebec would be legally and morally back in the Canadian family. Consequently, it is with great deception and pain that, like all of you, we Acadians assisted to its failure last week.

Today, the debate was launched mainly by senators from Quebec, all of whom have spent a lot of time and energy to convince their fellow Quebecers who are more inclined toward the separatist option. One can understand their sorrow, their disappointment and their emotions which they expressed after Meech Lake was dead.

The debate has been launched by the senators of Quebec and I would like to join them because Acadians are Quebec's natural allies. The Acadians said yes after some hesitation because they believed it was a first step even though the accord was imperfect, incomplete. A few years later, they wished to demonstrate their well-known generosity and supported Quebec's demands, Canada's demands, constitutional demands which were approved by 95 per cent of the Canadian people, by nine provincial governments, Newfoundland having withdrawn it's support a few years later.

The House of Commons had done its homework, but not the Senate, as Senator David said. It is the Senate that set the ball rolling when it wanted to give a forum to the ex-chief and ex-prime minister Trudeau. They worked hard. They do not seem to have been able to convince the Canadian people but they succeeded with allies like Mr. Wells and others. We know the end of the story.

● (1950)

Honourable senators, whatever the Liberal majority in the Senate or the Liberal Party of Canada may say or do, I think that Brian Mulroney, supported as he was by Mr. Peterson, Mr. McKenna and others, has done a good job. I would like to read a paragraph of an article by Paul-André Comeau in today's Le Devoir about the generosity of the eight other prime ministers. Quebec came out of this process more united and certainly not isolated.

I think it is all to their credit. We owe these people all our gratitude. In fact and here I quote Paul-André Comeau:

It did not reintegrate the Constitution with honour and enthousiasm as was intended at the outset, but Quebec owes it to Mr. Mulroney to have resisted temptation to isolate it as is unfortunately the tradition. Some will continue to criticize Ottawa's tactics in this matter. But the essential point is not there. Quebec does not come out divided or torn apart of that round of negotiations. It may right away and with lucidity start a process in which all living strength and healthy minds will be able to contribute to the creation of a new project.

Of course, Quebec will work on that new project, that new federalism. Acadians will also want to participate as well as Ontarians, the 500 thousands of Franco-Ontarians. Mrs. Rolande Soucie, retiring chairwomen of ACFO, is deeply saddened by the death of the Meech Lake Accord. According to an article in today's Le droit, here is what she says with respect to Franco-Ontarians, and I quote:

> We will now have to consider—

She is speaking about Franco-Ontarians.

> —that there must be a new constitutional arrangement in this country.

She hopes, in the name of her association, that Franco-Ontarians will take part in the adjustment process of this country.

If people are talking about a new arrangement of this country in Quebec, in New Brunswick and in Ontario, there must be a problem! Canada is bound to be different from the country we have known for so many years.

The general secretary of the Francophones outside Quebec, Mr. Aurèle Thériault—who happens to be the son of our kind colleague, Senator Norbert Thériault—told us last weekend that as far as he was concerned, language problems in Ontario and New Brunswick were all settled, that there was nothing to worry about.

Mr. Aurèle Thériault should go back to his province of New Burnswick. There is a political party in that province, the "Confederation Party", which is threatening to repeal the provincial legislation on official languages in New Brunswick as well as Bill 88 that I will tell you more about in a few moments.

That law was passed unanimously in 1982. It recognizes the existence in New Brunswick of two official linguistic communities and the government's obligation through its programs, its budgets and the establishment of distinct institutions, to promote and protect these two communities.

So, Mr. Thériault should not be so confident, for his mandate is to advocate and put forward projects and help establish a consensus. He says that things seem to be settled in New Brunswick. I can tell you that it is not so! Once in office, the "Confederation Party" will get rid of the provincial legislation on official languages and of Bill 88.

In Ontario, thanks to M. Peterson, they had Bill 8. I wonder if another government might not be tempted to delay, take its time and possibly to repeal Bill 8 in Ontario.

Nothing is established until it is guaranteed under the Constitution. In New Brunswick, we want to make sure that Bill 88, recognizing the linguistic communities, will be there permanently. We want to have it entrenched in the Constitution. That is what the Acadians agreed on as soon as they could, while giving their approval to the Meech Lake Accord and urging Mr. McKenna to sign. We want to thank the Premier, even at this late hour, to finally have seen the light and supported the Meech Lake Accord.

Finally, to conclude this part of my speech, I want to come back to the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec and to tell them that in New Brunswick, things are not settled for ever, nor are they in Ontario. I invite them to go on, as Mr. Thériault told us at the end of last week, putting pressure not only on the federal government, but also on the two provinces and in other parts of the country, on the people of Manitoba, on the people of Nova Scotia and on other provinces.

Honourable senators, talking about Bill 88, a short while ago, I was passed on some news, though it was erroneous and incomplete. I was told that the governement of New Brunswick had asked the federal governement to take its time to follow up the formal request unanimously made by the New Brunswick Legislature on 15, June. According to the news broadcasted by Radio-Canada tonight, the governement of New Brunswick would have asked the federal government to take its time and to avoid a backlash, etc., and to go slowly with the entrenchment of Bill 88.

• (2000)

Honourable senators, I can assure you that it was not so. I checked with the Prime Minister's Office at noon. I checked again with reporters a few moments ago. The New Brunswick government and legislature considered that they finished their job. Even though the formal request was made within the context of the debate on the Meech Lake Accord, the New Brunswick government and legislature thought that the federal government had everything it needed to proceed.

I invite the government, the leader of the government in the Senate and all other ministers and members of the House of Commons to proceed bilaterally under section 43. That is what I am told.

I was happy, as most of us were, to see that, despite the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, the Prime Minister and his government seemed willing, to a great extent, to respect the spirit of that accord with regard to Supreme Court and Senate appointments, at least in the provinces which supported the accord.

I think it would be unfortunate that, fearing a backlash, the government of Canada postponed indefinitely the entrenchment of Bill 88. Acadians have been neglected for too long. We cannot wait for another round. We cannot wait for people in Newfoundland, in Manitoba or anywhere else to be ready.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: You are asking Quebec to wait!

Senator Simard: Quebec is going to study its structures and tell us which place it could occupy in a renewed federalism.

Messrs McKenna and Mulroney seem to agree to proceed bilaterally, and I invite them to do the same thing in New Brunswick with respect to Bill 88.

Honourable senators, I insist on this because, in politics, you never know what can happen. In New Brunswick, we have a government with no opposition whatsoever. It has 58 members and its chances of being re-elected are good, perhaps.

In Ottawa also, we have a sympathetic government well implanted in Quebec, with a strong base in that province, which is going to say "no" to a Jean Chrétien who, of late, was telling us again he was in favour of the five minimum conditions. He would like to change a few commas, a few question marks . . . a bit like we did this afternoon.

We wanted to talk about our motion but because . . . you know . . . I don't know . . . it might be better to wait, there are other things . . . like this comma which was not in the right place!

That is what they said this afternoon. Finally they kept the floor for an hour and they talked about Meech as they liked.

They negotiated a bit like Quebec in the old days, one against eleven, one against ten. Senateur Murray did very well. Patiently, we managed to get our debate, and it is continuing.

[Senator Simard.]

I don't think Quebecers are going to forget some rather ambivalent declarations by Mr. Chrétien. I want to quote what he said, as reported in Le Soleil of March 27, 1972.

Senator Flynn: In 1972?

Senator Simard: Yes, senator Flynn, 1972.

We know, Mr. Chrétien has been telling us for the last six months. He said it again during their convention and since then. He is betting on his experience to assume power and solve the constitutional problem. Well, his experience dates back to 1972, when he was saying:

> French Canadians are in no danger of being assimilated, and the last few years are here to prove it.

This was reported in Le Soleil of March 27, 1972.

On March 14, 1990—he certainly is consistent Mr. Chrétien—he was reported by The Telegraph Journal as saying, and I quote:

> French-speaking Quebecers are afraid to be assimilated by the English-speaking majority in Canada and to lose their language and culture, but their fears are unwarranted.

As was reported in the Telegraph Journal, two days earlier, Mr. Chrétien was in New Brunswick, where he said:

> The Accord, in its present form, would give French-speaking Quebecers too much influence on the decision-making process concerning linguistic policies in Canada.

He added:

> One million Francophones live oustide Quebec. Acadians are more French than were are in Quebec.

So that is what Mr. Chrétien, who has great experience in that field, is suggesting. He thinks he can really put Quebec in its proper place, he can succeed at Quebec's expense. He knows that we, Acadians, will not be assimilated, that that is impossible.

Whatever Mr. Chrétien says or does, I think Quebecers will remember the positions he took. What if history was repeating itself . . . in a friendly conversation he was having with a colleague of mine this afternoon, he was blaming the authors of the Meech Lake Accord, the first ministers, for dealing with this issue behind closed doors.

He mentioned that quite often. But let me remind you that Mr. Chrétien was in the kitchen of the Chateau Laurier while the Quebec delegation . . . I, myself, was taking part in that conference, but I was not invited to the kitchen of the Chateau Laurier. Had I been, I probably would have refused to attend anyway. That is where they decided what to do with Quebec.

Senator Olson, you said Quebec was not driven out that night, how would you know, you were asleep when it happened! You were not in the kitchen, at the Chateau Laurier. That's where everything was concocted. The chef was Mr. Jean Chrétien, his assistant, Mr. Romanow!

Senator Olson, you forgot to say something, go ahead!

• (2010)

[English]

Senator Olson: You have that all wrong! He is distorting the facts again. I cannot stand that!

Senator Frith: They cannot help it. Forgive them. They know not what they do.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: I've taken a resolution, one which I invite you to take and not to forget: we must continue to denounce, to unmask, to recount the past actions of Jean Chrétien, Wells and company.

You can be sure that New-Brunswick will not forget. We are solemnly pledging, tonight, to make sure that you don't rewrite history as you see it.

Mr. Chrétien said that he was the chosen guy. I wish to end my remarks on that note. I should be through in about three or four minutes.

He said he wanted to work with Mr. Bourassa. He said so last saturday night. Right from the start he insulted him. He said that Mr. Bourassa had been shafted by the other premiers. Therefore, we dont't trust is ability to negotiate with Mr. Bourassa.

First he insulted him, and then he said: well, I can work with him.

He said that he wanted a strong Canada, in his own way. We know what it means for the Liberal Party to have a "strong Canada"; one modelled according to the vision of Trudeau! And yet he said he could work with Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. Bourassa said that federalism won't ever be the same. We would have some kind of superstructure where every region would be more independant, etc. Mr. Chrétien said he understood all that land he announced that he woud proceed accordinly. His logic was had to follow, I'm sure you'll agree.

Mr. Chrétien also said that he could unite his party. He was confident of that. Of Mr. Rocheleau and Mr. Lapierre, he said good riddance, they weren't happy any way, there was nothing left to do, they were "poor losers".

He will be the one to unify his party and this country.

As I was saying a moment ago, let's not take the chance: lets enshrine Bill 88.

Time goes fast and the next elections will soon come up. I know that for a factsince I have been involved in at least four elections at the provincial level and, if I remember correctly, we were some fifteen points behind in the public polls. The opposition party was fifteen points ahead of us but we won the elections. Yes, Senator Hébert, we were trailing fifteen points according to the polls. The Liberal party was ahead of us more or less like it is nowadays when the election was called. But during the campaign, it wasted its lead and we were re-elected four times.

All this to say that we have a sympathetic government which seems to have the support of the Quebec population. Once the goods and services tax is passed, once all the benefits of the free trade are fully appreciated and Bills C-21 and C-28 are passed—

Senator Hébert: It will take a long while, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: It will be a long while for the opposition, Senator Hébert. A long while for the Liberals. But one can never tell with elections.

Senator Flynn: He already finds the time quite long.

Senator Simard: That is why we will make sure that Mr. Chrétien is going to make the news regularly since we will have denounced him from one province and from one region to the next one since we will be reminding the population that it was Mr. Mulroney who really worked for the country, sometiems in very delicate situations. That is to say that the next election could go either way. But it seems to me that even Mr. Chrétien agrees with me. He said the following to Mr. Mulroney:

[English]

"You should consider your future," and in the same breath he says, "Don't quit on me. I want to fight you." He says, "Oh, yes, I want to fight you. I am the fellow to lead Canada, yet I don't know if I am going to run in a by-election."

• (2020)

There might be an election tomorrow or in the next two or three years. I would not want to leave the future, the protection, and the promotion of Acadians in the hands of Jean Chrétien and the Liberal Party of Canada. That is why I am pressing upon Senator Murray to do all that is within his power to make sure that this thing is done swiftly and correctly.

[Translation]

I am also, sorry I missed this meeting with history. Contrary to what we are being told, I believe there is a crisis in Canada. If we can trust what he said, Mr. Chrétien told us that Canada is in a terrible situation, even though the Expos and the Blue Jays are ahead. It is his way of distorting and underestimating the seriousness of the situation. For him, it is a joke. The Expos and the Blue Jays are ahead. The situation is difficult, but we will deal with it later. Today, Liberal senators are telling us that there is no problem. Meech Lake is dead. It is settled. On the other hand, they spend an hour and a half questioning Senator Murray.

Senator Flynn: And they discussed for an hour whether or not to talk about it.

Senator Simard: The Meech Lake Accord is dead, probably dead and buried. The positive attitude demonstrated by the eight premiers and their retinne, by the party led by Prime Minister Mulroney, and the spirit of Meech Lake must guide the constitutional reorganisation of this country if we are to proceed. I agree that it might be necessary to wait a few years. But it does not mean to continue the paralysis in this House. Again in the spirit of Meech Lake and with the will to better serve Canadians whose parliamentary system provides that elected leaders must decide, I hope the Prime Minister will undertake to fill the Senate vacancies with competent and hard-working people who put Canada's interests first.

Senator Hébert: And vote on the right side.

Senator Simard: No, Senator Hébert, let the Senate do its job, study the bills, Bills C-21's C-28, C-62, and all the others. And at last, let the government operate.

Senator Hébert: No matter what people are asking us.

Senator Simard: Of course, people will continue to ask you, Senator Hébert, not to tax them and to keep VIA Rail trains in operation, even if only 10 per cent of the population use it. You will continue to try to please everybody as you did until 1984. We know where it led us.

I will conclude on that. I hope we will allow the Canadian parliamentary system to work hand-in-hand with an elected House of Commons and a responsible Senate. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Gildas Molgat: Honourable senators, would you allow me a question?

Senator Simard: Yes, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: A little earlier in your speech, you referred to the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court and of senators. Did I understand you well when you said that for those provinces which supported the Meech Lake Accord the agreed process where provinces submit a list would be maintained?

Senator Simard: No, Senator Molgat, I said I hoped the spirit of Meech Lake would be respected. As for the appointment of judges, I am informed that traditionally, consultations with Quebec and other provinces were still taking place.

You put many things on the back of the Prime Minister and I hope he is not so stupied as to accept appointment proposals put forward by Mr. Wells who said no to Meech Lake when the time will come to appoint senators from Newfoundland. I hope you are not that ridiculous. That would be obscene. As for the other provinces, I think that we could abide by the spirit of Meech Lake.

Since I am given this opportunity, I wish to deal with an important matter which I am sorry to say I had forgotten about and about which I care a great deal.

Great is the temptation today for the supporters of the Meech Lake Accord, in Quebec and elsewhere, to advise the Prime Minister to retaliate against the provinces which have disgraced him and which have not respected their signature, such as for instance Newfoundland. In spite of all this, I invite the Prime Minister and the government to keep on giving favourable consideration to the project and to tell us whether—and I am referring here to the Ibernia project—it will go ahead if it is environmentally and financially sound. I think I know the Prime Minister well enough and his statements are here to prove it, to tell you that he is not a person to hold a grudge. I wanted to express my support for this project which will create jobs and will supply us with energy in due course. I ask Quebecers and others who might be tempted to punish Tom, Dick and Harry—

Senator Hébert: That is not nice. Vengeance is not nice.

Senator Simard: No, the times when Liberal governments used to punish riding residents who had voted against them are over. I hope so.

Senator Flynn: Mackenzie King would not give a nickel to the Tory provinces.

Senator Simard: I support this bill and I hope it will pass. Hibernia is not Clyde Wells' project. Maybe you do not know that, Senator Olson. It is not Clyde Wells' project. As a matter of fact Clyde Wells even went to the Supreme Court or to some other court to debate the issue of control over the natural and energy resources of his province. Great constitutionalist though he may be, he lost his case.

Senator Flynn: Thank God!

Senator Simard: It is definitely not his project. It is the project of Brian Peckford, John Crosbie and Ross Reed, of the then Conservative government and the people of Newfoundland.

I just saw some feigning innocence in the House of Commons. Tobin and company rose, scandalized, predicting as they have for two years all the bleakest scenarios, the end of the world if Meech Lake passed. They got up today and said that the Primce Minister must assure them that he would table the Hibernia bill today. I would like to take jake Epp at his word when he says that it is not necesary to have a bill now. There were other ways to start the project and support it. We have nothing to learn from the Liberal Party and we will not be threatened by them. They are the ones—not the native people, not Manitobans, not the three party leaders in Manitoba—who killed the Meech Lake Accord. The natives did not do it. It was Clyde Wells. He withdrew his predecessor's support fro Meech Lake and went back on his word given to June 9, his own signature with asterisks and everything. He killed the Meech Lake Accord, aided and abetted by his mentor who remained in Montreal. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn this debate in my name and let you hear from another Quebecer tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Senator Gigantès, do not push it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Moved by Hon. Senator Gigantès, seconded by Hon.—

Senator Gigantès: Question of privilege, honourable senators. What do you mean by «do not push it»?

Senator Flynn: you say «another Quebecer». You are somewhere in between.

Senator Gigantès: Oh, am I not a Quebecer?

Senator Flynn: Technically you are, yes.

Senator Gigantès: Technically?

Senator Hébert: But that's racism!

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND — FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS — QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Question: Who are benefitting most from the Transportation Loan Program?

Response: Financial assistance under the Transportation, Assistance and Admissibility Loan Program is available to persons who are:

1. immigrants;
2. Canadian citizens and permanent residents in Canada to allow for the admission of their dependants as landed immigrants;
3. persons with a Minister's Permit coming to Canada for permanent residence;
4. Convention Refugees and Designated Class members (persons in refugee-like situations) who are being landed in Canada in order to allow the admission of their dependants for landing;
5. Convention Refugees and Designated Class Members outside of Canada and accepted for resettlement in Canada.

The primary users of the Program are Convention Refugees and Designated Class Members admitted under either government or private sponsorship (see Table A below).

Year	Loans issued to Refugees and Members of a Designated Class	Loans issued to others	Total loans issued
83/84	$9,421	$4,554	$13,699
84/85	$12,390	$7,075	$19,472
85/86	$13,967	$5,221	$19,118
86/87	$16,358	$1,931	$18,289

Question: What are the levels of service provided to immigrants to ensure that the monies loaned to them are not lost through dealings with unscrupulous individuals who might prey on immigrants?

Response: Canada uses, wherever possible, the services of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to make travel arrangements for persons who require a transportation loan to travel to Canada. IOM organized the travel to Canada of some 33,000 refugees and immigrants last year. Because IOM arranges travel for refugees going to a number of countries, it is able to obtain discounts of 40% to 50% on transportation costs. These discounts are passed directly to the refugees in that the transportation loans to them reflect the reduced travel costs.

IOM is a well recognised international organization, which comprises some 36 member states and 16 observer states. IOM was founded on December 5, 1951 as a non-political organization with a predominately operational mandate. IOM's main functions include the handling of orderly and planned migration to meet the specific needs of emigration and immigration countries; the processing and movement of refugees and displaced persons; the transfer of qualified human resources to promote the socio-economic advancement of developing countries; and, the provision of a politically non-aligned forum for the exchange of views and experiences on international migration issues.

Since 1952, IOM has assisted over 4 million persons (3 million refugees and 1 million national migrants) to move to countries offering them permanent resettlement or other opportunities for orderly migration. Canada is a member of IOM and is thus able to use fully the services provided by this organization for the benefit of refugees and immigrants coming to Canada.

Question: What percentage of the loans fully repaid?

Response: The Transportation, Assistance and Admissibility Loans Program (The Transportation Loans Program) was established in 1951 to aid immigrants who could not afford their passage to Canada: those joining their families in Canada, refugees, and people whose occupational skills were in demand in Canada.

Experience with refugee movements and with the Program in general indicates that most loans are repaid and only a very few are written off. From 1951 until March 31, 1990 somewhat more than $265.4 million has been loaned and more than $171 million repaid. Since 1951 approximately 2% of the loans issued have been written off as unrecoverable. In addition, it is estimated that 70% of all loans used have been repaid. A summary of the figures pertaining to the history of the fund is as follows:

Total Loans issued	$265,476,106
Total Payments (1)	$171,161,106	64.47%
Total Write-offs	$ 5,248,678	1.98%
Total Outstanding	$ 89,065,720	33.55%
Estimated percentage of loans fully repaid (2)	$	70%

(1) does not include interest payments of $5,642,564

(2) the volume of loans issued prior to 1975-76 is not available. Estimates were issued in order to calculate the percentage of loans paid in full.

Question: What sort of agreements are in place for the collection by government from those who fail to pay back the loans?

Response: During the first year of the loan, monthly Statements of Accounts are sent and a repayment schedule is established. Based on the debtor's financial circumstances, a deferment period of up to 2 years may be granted. If the repayment schedule is not honoured more active collection actions are initiated. These include personal letters requesting payment and telephone calls to the debtor. If the client is still unwilling to make voluntary payments, the Commission will seek payroll deductions once the client is employed and/or court action if all other avenues are exhausted.

Employment and Immigration initiated a pilot project in October 1987 to evaluate the use of private collection agencies to assist in the collection of immigration loans receivable. The pilot operated for a period of nine months and proved to be successful in terms of financial and service performance. Debtor complaints on the use of private collection agencies were minimal.

The success of the pilot project led to the approval to the use private collection agencies on a regular basis for accounts which :
1) have been established for at least three years;
2) have a loan balance which is greater than $500; and
3) are at least three months in arrears.

Private collection agencies are used only as an extension of our current collection activities, with EIC maintaining sole the responsibility and ultimate control of the accounts.

Private collection agencies have been used since January, 1990. Since that time our collections have increased from an average of $1.2 million per month to an average of $1.9 million per month.

Question: Will the level of funding meet the demand of the growing number of refugees and immigrants?

Response: The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is seeking to increase the ceiling of the Transportation Loan Fund to $150 million dollars. This represents an increase of $60 million over the existing ceiling.

Estimates for the next four years are as follows:

Forecast
($000s)

	Opening Balance	Loans Established	Loans Recovered	Write-offs	Closing Balance
1990	81.1	37.5	22.5	5.2	90.9
1991	90.9	47.1	27.5	4.7	105.8
1992	105.8	53.0	33.6	7.0	118.2
1994	135.3	50.9	38.0	2.1	146.1

If the ceiling for loan funds is increased to $150 million, based on the forecast in the above table, the Transportation Loan Program should be able to meet anticipated demands during the next 5-year planning period 1995. It is expected that the demand for loans will start to level off after 1994 as the Refugee Backlog Clearance Program will have terminated and the majority of persons landed under that program should have already accessed the fund by 1993. The Immigration Levels planning is also forecasting a downturn in the number of private-sponsorship applications for refugees after 1994 and this will also reduce the demands on the loan program.

Question: What is the Minister doing to provide assistance to those persons in the Refugee Backlog?

Response: Persons, who are in the Refugee Backlog are eligible for transportation loans to bring their immediate family members to Canada, once a determination has been made to process their applications for permanent Residence in Canada. In addition to their eligibility under the Transportation Loan Program, Refugee Backlog members are also provided assistance under The Refugee Backlog Information Program. Under this program non-governmental organizations are funded to provide information to Refugee Backlog members on how the Refugee Backlog Clearance Program (RBCP) will apply to their cases, with assistance in completing the forms associated with the RBCP and in preparing to be processed under the RBCP. Once determined eligible for landing in Canada, Refugee Backlog members are eligible for services under the Immigrant Settlement Adaptation Program (ISAP) and may be eligible for benefits under the Adjustment Assistance Program and for language training.

THE HONOURABLE MARTIAL ASSELIN, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, I wish to pay tribute to one of our distinguished colleagues, Martial Asselin, who is soon to become Lieutenant Governor of Quebec.

Senator Asselin, I would like to start by offering you, on behalf of all senators, our sincere congratulations and best wishes for a successful term. We all know that you are worthy of this very high office.

The position of Lieutenant Governor requires a great deal of savoir-faire and diplomacy, two attributes that have become second nature to Senator Asselin.

His career in public service goes back to 1957, when he was elected mayor of La Malbaie, which he remained until 1963. He was so popular that he was re-elected by acclamation.

Almost simultaneously—in 1958—he started his career in Ottawa as the member for the riding of Charlevoix. Except for a brief interruption between 1962 and 1965, Martial Asselin was a member of Parliament until, in 1972, he became a member of the Senate, representing the district of Stadacona.

Senator Asselin is one of those rare individuals whose competence was tangibly recognized by four prime ministers. The first was the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker who appointed him Minister of Forestry in 1963. In 1972, Prime Minister Trudeau raised him to the Senate. In 1979, Prime Minister Clark asked him to sit in his cabinet as Minister of State responsible for the Canadian International Development Agency and La Francophonie. Today, it is Prime Minister Mulroney who has called on his services by appointing him Lieutenant Governor of Quebec.

Senator Asselin has also had important duties at the international level, as vice-president of the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians.

Senator Asselin, you have reason to be proud of your record of service. Throughout your career in politics, in the House of Commons and in the Senate, you always represented your constituents with competence and dignity. You were tireless in your efforts to serve and have earned the respect of us all.

Now you are being asked to meet a new challenge. There are few people who are as qualified and well prepared as you are to accept the position of Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, and I am sure you will be a credit to all Quebecers and to all Canadians.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to Senator Asselin that he has only friends in the Senate, and that we all wish him and his wife Ginette the best of luck.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise, with great pleasure and enthusiasm, to support the remarks of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

[English]

Our tribute is as much a congratulation as it is a farewell, because, as Senator Murray has said, Senator Asselin is leaving us to become Lieutenant Governor of Quebec.

At a time when the country continues to be concerned about its perpetual constitutional evolution, and in particular the role of Quebec in the Confederation, all Canadians can be glad to know that someone with Senator Asselin's experience and understanding—and particularly his experience in an institution such as the Senate, which is bound to continue to play an important role in the constitutional evolution—is leaving to become Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. We are glad to know that he will be constantly at an important place in our country's evolving history.

It is no surprise to anyone who knows him that Senator Asselin should reach such an important plateau. As Senator Murray said, Senator Asselin has been a member of the bar since 1951. Senator Flynn and Senator Asselin were both elected to the House of Commons in 1958. Senator Asselin stayed there until 1972, at which time he was summoned to the Senate by the Governor General, who had seen fit to accept the recommendation of another great Quebecer, Prime Minister Trudeau. It was a recommendation applauded on all sides at the time.

In his maiden speech Senator Asselin made a passionate defence of the rights of Quebecers, and that is emblematic, honourable senators, of his entire career in this place. He has always been a proud champion of his home province and of its securing its vital place within Confederation. That is a goal with which I am sure all senators are in agreement, regardless of any differences there may be on the methods employed for its achievement.

Senator Asselin has been involved in matters other than our constitutional problems. Particular attention should be paid to the time he spent in Mr. Clark's government as the minister responsible for CIDA and La Francophonie. At CIDA he developed a lasting concern for the critical problems of Africa. With respect to La Francophonie, many honourable senators here will remember how he expanded that association's role in Canadian and foreign affairs. He has also spoken knowledgeably on matters respecting economy and welfare reform.

Honourable senators, when one retires or takes another job, one runs the risk of people burrowing into all sorts of history in order to find things to say on an occasion such as this. The difficulty in this case was to pare down the complimentary things that could be said, rather than to find them. I did find that in 1974, before I was appointed to this chamber, Senator Asselin proposed that the government consider selling marijuana in liquor stores. I believe, in support of that motion, he made the usual suggestions with regard to the dangers of anything such as this being controlled by organized crime. I believe he also suggested that it might be a novel approach to deficit reduction. That is evidence of the broadness of Senator Asselin's interests and constructive imagination.

Another thing that is important to remember is that he was our first formally-appointed Deputy Speaker. He served in that role with great distinction and was a most popular occupant of that position.

Senator Guay: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: We all recognize the fairness and wisdom he exercised in that role; qualities that will do him well in the important post he is assuming.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, if I may conclude with the same comments I made yesterday for Senator Ottenheimer's statement, which if I am not mistaken came at almost the same time as the news of the appointment, I would say this: Dear senator, dear colleague, we congratulate you as a well-loved colleague for a well-deserved appointment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, one of the reasons our colleague accepted the position of Lieutenant Governor of Quebec and is returning to live in Quebec City is my forthcoming departure. He could not do without me. I am sure that was a big factor in his decision.

We came here together in 1958. We continued to work together except for a short period from 1962 to 1965, but even then we stayed in touch because we continued to fight for the ideas we always defended here, representing the legitimate interests and aspirations of Quebec.

As was just said, Senator Asselin has had an outstanding, very varied career. He was a minister on two occasions, Deputy Speaker of the Senate, and international president of the IAFSP. He became known throughout the French-speaking countries as an excellent ambassador not only of Canada but of the francophone community in general.

When I return to Quebec City, I will be very glad to know that I can find him easily not very far from my home. This is just a hint for him to invite me over, but even if I did not suggest it, he would have understood.

So I extend very hearty congratulations to him. I am very pleased for him, his wife Ginette, his son and the other members of his family who are very proud of his obtaining such an important position. My wishes and those of my colleagues go with him.

[English]

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I also claim some right to offer my congratulations to Senator Asselin today, because I was in the other place when he came here. We have had a long association—mostly from different sides of the house, although there was a brief period when—and even Senator Flynn will remember—we, as Social Creditors, would support the Conservatives on almost every occasion that came up. It did not last long, but at least it was a good relationship.

Senator Flynn: Do not push your luck!

• (1410)

I want to associate myself with those who have recited some of the details of Senator Asselin's career. Certainly, his career on Parliament Hill has been a long and honourable one. I wonder, however, how he will make the transition from what he has been doing here so well as a member of the Conservative Party to a non-partisan position. He has done his job so well that it seems to me that he will find it difficult to be apolitical, but I wish him well in that endeavour. I join with those who wish Senator Asselin and his family well, both in his new position and in his new location.

[Translation]

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I would like to join my colleagues who congratulated senator Asselin on his appointment as Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. Knowing that other senators have had the privilege of being chosen from this chamber to serve in that very important position in several provinces, I have to say that this appointment makes all of us happy.

He certainly deserves such an honour, having always performed his duties so well in his political career at the municipal, provincial and federal levels. We will miss him, but I know that, even with all his wisdom and all his goodwill, he cannot be ubiquitous. To see him, we will have to go visit him in Quebec City.

Congratulations! You deserve it.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I also want to add a few words to express my true friendship, my appreciation and my congratulations to our colleague, senator Asselin, and to his lovely wife Ginette.

I have not been working with senator Asselin for as long as some of my colleagues and our association in not partisan since we sit on opposite sides of this Chamber, rather than on the same side.

Our friendship dates back to a trip my wife and I made to Japan, with the Inter-Parliamentary Union, during which we met senator Asselin. Since then, I think our friendship has grown. We had the opportunity to travel together a few more times.

I especially want to mention the work senator Asselin has done at the international level. We all know what he accomplished when he was responsible for CIDA. He drew closer to the French-speaking countries of Africa, ties he strenghtened later as member of the International Association of French-speaking Parliamentarians (IAFSP). His tremendous accomplishments were recognized by this international association which chose him as its international chairman. For a Canadian, that was a great step indeed. Since that association is mostly dominated by members from France, our colleague had to be an exceptional man to be chosen international chairman.

Senator Asselin, in my capacity as treasurer, I think I can speak on behalf of our Canadian group in the IAFSP. I want you to know how much we appreciate what you did, how proud we are that you were chosen international chairman, and how we are going to miss your wise counsel. Congratulations and good luck in your new position, which we hope will be a bit less hectic than life as a politician was in Ottawa. Our best wishes to you and your wife.

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few comments to the words of congratulation and approbation of the other senators. I think it is a great tribute to Senator Asselin that he has been appointed to this very important post at this particular time in the history of Canada. It warms my heart and gives me confidence to think that in this post is a man of broad vision and broad understanding, who has, undoubtedly, all the ambitions of the people of Quebec in his heart, but who understands also the visions and aspirations of Canadians generally.

Senator Asselin has, as has already been said, a very broad background and a very broad understanding. He was a distinguished member of the House of Commons, with whom I had the privilege and honour to serve for a number of years. He has been a distinguished member of the Senate for a long period of time, and a member of cabinet. He is now moving on to other very important responsibilities and work.

I have found Senator Asselin always friendly, always understanding, and, although we have had political differences, we have had much more in common than we have had by way of differences or antagonisms. One thing I have always admired about Senator Asselin is that, in my judgment, he is one of the best orators to grace either the House of Commons or the Senate, and when he speaks in English it is impeccable English. His pronunciation is excellent.

I congratulate him on his new appointment. I think it is in the interests of the province of Quebec and of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable Senator Asselin, your appointment to the prestigious office of Lieutenant-Governor fills my heart with joy and pride.

You were kind enough to introduce me in this House in April 1985. Ever since I have appreciated your wonderful leadership as member and then Chairman of the Assemblée internationale des parlementaires de langue française. You entrusted me with responsibilities within that organization and on several missions I was able to appreciate the extraordinary prestige you have enjoyed in the "Francophonie" through out the world.

Your appointment, dear colleague, will serve as an invaluable asset for both Quebec and Canada who play a special role in french-speaking summits. Your unfailing friendship and remarkable experience have enlivened my life in this place. I am grateful to you for it.

I wish you the best in this new turn of your outstanding career. My warmest congratulations to you, dear colleague, and to your wife and family!

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would be furious with myself for not congratulating Martial on his promotion. I call him by his first name since we went to Law School together in 1948. It was already obvious at that time that he had the leadership and a pleasant personality that would make him not only the leader of our group but the chairman of the then student association of Laval University. We could already see in him a politician of the future. Then, naturally, he started his political career at the federal level while I went my way until we met again in the Senate 30 years later.

I would like to wish him the best of luck in his new role as Quebec Lieutenant-Governor.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few words about our friend and colleague Senator Asselin. Unlike my colleague Senator Bolduc, I am not a classmate of his but I was with him in the IAFSP and a political colleague until now as well.

I first met Senator Asselin in the IAFSP, at a meeting in Paris in 1976, I believe. We met several times since then, at IAFSP meetings in Senegal, Gabon and Reunion. You see, honourable senators, we travel a lot in the IAFSP. At that time, I believe I was Speaker of the Newfoundland House of Assembly and during that period, Senator Doody was a fellow member. He sometimes asked me why I was away so often. I told him that I had to be with Senator Asselin and the other senators and members of Parliament to show that the IAFSP was also important for legislators in the English-speaking provinces because French is an official national language for all Canadians.

In any case, I had the pleasure to meet Senator Asselin through the IAFSP. I believe that most of these meetings, maybe all, I do not know, were attended by federal delegates, of course, and also legislators from Quebec and New Brunswick. I think that I may have been the only Canadian there whose mother tongue was not French. Senator Asselin always received me well within that association.

When I arrived in Ottawa, since the Speaker was absent, Senator Asselin as Speaker pro tempore welcomed me in this House.

I always appreciated his contribution to Senate debates and his sage advice in our caucus.

We will all lose a good colleague, a good friend, a man who thinks before he speaks, a thoughtful man who always adds to the deliberations in which he participates.

Senator Asselin, I wish you and your family a successful, interesting, challenging, joyful future.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, you will understand that I am very touched by your tributes on my departure. I am very sorry to leave.

I had a decision to make and I told the Prime Minister that I will serve Canada as Lieutenant Governor of Quebec.

Honourable senators, I spent nearly thirty years of my life here in Parliament. My political career has had its ups and downs, but I leave with the feeling that I fulfilled my responsibilities as a parliamentarian to the best of my ability.

Both in the other place and in this Chamber, I have taken part in important discussions on political, economic and social issues. Whatever they may say about the Senate, I think the most crucial debate this country has ever known took place right here, when we had the debate on the patriation of the Canadian Constitution. Journalists were unanimous in applauding the substance and essence of this debate, and it all happened right here in the Senate.

Of course, at the time the tone was less partisan and perhaps more objective. It is a fact that the opposition did not have the majority it has today. It is also true that it is sometimes tempting to abuse the power one has as the majority. That being said, the Senate has its place in the Canadian system, among our Canadian institutions. I believe our bicameral system must be maintained. For the sake of increasing our credibility, I am sure not many senators would object to changing the way senators are appointed.

Honourable senators, I was very much affected by recent events the Canadian political scene. We had a chance to remedy an injustice. Unfortunately, we failed. You will understand that as a result, my task will be far more difficult and delicate. I have always believed that what made Canada great was the fact that its two English and French majorities, with mutual respect for each others' rights and obligations, came together, with dignity, to govern this country. One will never be able to survive without the other. We are now on the edge of an abyss. It is up to you and up to me to meet this challenge.

[English]

I want to assure my English colleagues that I will cherish an excellent souvenir of my relations with them. Although it has sometimes been difficult, I have always respected the arguments of my opponents, even when I did not share their views. But today the future of this country is in your hands. Being people of honour, I am sure you will take the necessary steps to correct the present situation. I thank you, dear colleagues, for your cooperation and friendship.

[Translation]

I also wish to thank all my friends from my own party who always supported me in joy as well as in sorrow. And my thanks to you, Mr. Speaker for your unfailing courtesy. You gave me your trust when I assisted you as Speaker pro tempore. Thanks to your aptitudes and your good judgment, our work could go on without too many disputes. I will attempt to represent the Crown in Quebec with compassion and dedication. The social groups in need of encouragement will find a real ally in me.

I will bring to the political situation which seems to evolve at tremendous speed all my attention and my 30 years of experience in politics and constitutional affairs.

Honourable senators, I have faith in Canada. I love my country but Quebec has a special place in my heart and I would not like to see it hurt further in the realization of its destiny.

Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.
THE HONOURABLE MARGARET ANDERSON
THE HONOURABLE CYRIL B. SHERWOOD
THE HONOURABLE MARTIAL ASSELIN, P.C.

TRIBUTE ON THE OCCASION OF THEIR RETIREMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, if, as scheduled, we adjourn today for the summer, three of our colleagues will have sat for the last time, since they will reach seventy five years of age before we return.

I would like to pay tribute to these three colleagues of ours in a single speech. I will start with the honourable Jacques Flynn, senator for Rougemont, who was leader of the Progressive Conservative Party in this House from 1967 to 1984, leader of the opposition most of the time, but also leader of the Government, and Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada in the Clark government in 1979-1980.

Such were his cleverness and the respect he earned from his conservative colleagues and from our Party's national leaders that his leadership was never questioned.

Conservative senators knew they had in Jacques Flynn a leader of sound judgment and a very wise man that they could trust.

• (1430)

[English]

Much can and will be said of the passion and eloquence he has brought to our debates. There has been no livelier, no more stimulating, no more spontaneous, and sometimes no more provocative presence in this chamber than that of Senator Jacques Flynn.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.!

Senator Murray: Truly, the Senate will be a duller place without him. Think how forlorn will be Senator Denis and Senator Guay without Senator Flynn. He is a Québeçois through and through, but we have all seen and heard the Irish in him, and have marvelled at what a wonderful combination is made of French and Irish.

There are, however, several other aspects of his career, especially of his career in Parliament, that should be noted today, because they are more important and more definitive of Jacques Flynn's great contribution to this country than the style and verve we shall all remember. Jacques Flynn is, and has been for half a century or more, active in the practice of law. Those of us who are not lawyers sometimes poke fun at those who are, because their counsel does, sometimes, seem to get in the way of our best intentions and to complicate matters, which, to the layman, appear wonderfully simple.

[Translation]

Yet, right from the beginning our Parliament has had the very good fortune of being able to rely on many outstanding lawyers. The fact is that nobody is in a better position than an experienced lawyer to predict the positive or negative impact of a legislative amendment, or even to say whether the amendment will give the expected results. The best lawyers—Jacques Flynn first among them—jealously defend the values inherent in our court system against direct attacks, of course, but most often against the overly good intentions of legislators or public officials.

Any legislative endeavour entails considerations of fairness and justice towards society as a whole, and Jacques Flynn was always among first to see them and point them out to us. The parliamentary precincts have been witness to the splendid and even brilliant use he has made of his extensive legal know-how. The Senate and the entire country are grateful to him for that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Senator Flynn is as much an ardent Quebecer as a hard-core Canadian. Some people would describe that as an inconsistency. And yet throughout our long history our most prominent parliamentarians from Quebec did indeed display both qualities. They realized that for more than three hundred years now Quebec has been, in North America, the focal point of French language and culture.

In that respect, they have been perfectly aware of the unique responsibility of Quebec, of its government and of its legislature, and they have been the staunch defenders of the rights of Quebec and the provinces generally within the Canadian Constitution.

These federal parliamentarians from Quebec have been the most energetic champions of Canadian unity, convinced as they were that our country's strength stemmed from unity.

Jacques Flynn, whose grandfather was the Conservative Premier of Quebec at the turn of the century—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: —is keeping alive this illustrious Quebec and Canadian tradition. There has never been in his mind, nor in ours, any doubt as to his double identity as a Quebecer and a Canadian: he is both at the same time and proud of it.

Finally, I would like to say a word about the Conservative Party's enormous debt to the honourable Jacques Flynn.

During our darkest years from 1963 to 1979 and from 1980 to 1984, Jacques Flynn was one of those who never lost heart. For many years he and a few of his friends and colleagues were the only members of the Conservative Party in Quebec.

[Senator Murray.]

Always in a good and optimistic mood, he has never spared us from his most caustic comments when he thought the Party was on the wrong track.

When our Party had practically no Quebec members in Parliament, Senator Flynn managed to gather around him the Conservatives in his province. A fierce supporter of the Conservative tradition in Quebec and within Confederation—a tradition of equality between French and English Canadians—he became, even while challenged, its symbol and champion in Quebec.

[English]

During my years in the Senate, and especially during the past four years, Senator Jacques Flynn has been in many ways an inspiration to me and always a valued counsellor and a loyal colleague and friend. I only wish it had been possible for him to leave here, now, in the knowledge and with the satisfaction that the unfinished constitutional work of 1982—indeed, of 1867—had been completed with the unanimous ratification of the Meech Lake Accord. His profound disappointment will not shake his own convictions about the true spirit of Confederation, nor will it lessen the determination of those who share his convictions to see them prevail.

Honourable senators, I have spoken at some length about Senator Flynn, because he has been in Parliament for more than 30 years, has occupied a place of leadership in this chamber, and has played such an important role in the affairs of his party in Quebec and in Canada.

More briefly, but no less sincerely, I should like to salute our two departing colleagues from New Brunswick. Senator Margaret Anderson, who comes from Northumberland County and the famous Miramichi River area of New Brunswick, has been in this chamber for 12 years. She was appointed to the Senate by Prime Minister Trudeau on March 23, 1978. She comes from a long family tradition of public service in New Brunswick, her father having served as a provincial cabinet minister for 17 years, under two premiers of that province.

Senator Anderson has upheld the tradition of public service, first, in the Liberal Party, where she has held both provincial and national office. Others are better qualified than I to give an appreciation of her contribution to the party. Suffice it to say that the dominance of the Liberal Party in the Miramichi area has been a long and solid one. During most of my time here I have had the pleasure of serving with Senator Anderson on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where her contribution has been consistently well informed and constructive.

Senator Anderson has brought to this place an impressive record of community service in the Miramichi area of New Brunswick; and in business as president of the lumber firm, W.S. Anderson and Company Ltd. Her experience and her fine personal qualities have served Canada, the Senate, and New Brunswick well. She can leave here proud of her contributions and of the regard and respect in which she is held by all of us.

Senator Cyril B. Sherwood has been prominent in the public life of New Brunswick since 1952, when he was elected to the provincial legislature. As Minister of Agriculture in Premier Flemming's government for eight years, Leader of the Opposition in the legislature and leader of the Progressive Conservative Party for six years, minister without portfolio in Premier Hatfield's government for two years, Cy Sherwood was a member of the New Brunswick legislature for 22 years. He has been a senator for ten years, having been appointed on October 3, 1979, by former Prime Minister Clark.

Senator Sherwood's health has not permitted him in recent years to play as full a role in the Senate as he, and we, would have liked. He underwent heart surgery several years ago. Nevertheless, he has been deputy chairman of our Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and has taken an active interest in that field, as might be expected from one who has been a leader in both New Brunswick and Canadian agriculture for more than half a century.

Senator Sherwood began farming in 1935, and he is proud that a fifth generation Sherwood is carrying on the family tradition of dairy farming in King's County. Senator Sherwood was the first president of the New Brunswick Cream Producers' Marketing Board, past president of the Milk Producers' Association of New Brunswick and of the Holstein-Friesian Association of Canada, and a former director of the Maritime Winter Fair Association, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and the Dairy Farmers of Canada.

I have known Senator Sherwood as a friend for more than 25 years. I can speak from some personal knowledge of his generous contribution to public life in New Brunswick and to the Progressive Conservative Party, in particular. I know also of the esteem in which he is held by New Brunswickers, and deservedly so.

On behalf of the Prime Minister, our colleagues in the government and in this party, I should like to express our thanks and best wishes to Senator Sherwood as he closes this chapter of a long and honourable career in the service of his fellow citizens.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am glad and, of course, sad to have the opportunity to speak on behalf of our side, although not exclusively, about the pending retirement of our three colleagues, referred to by Senator Murray. I want no inference to be taken from this, but I will be dealing with our colleagues in the reverse order to that taken by Senator Murray. As they say frequently at the end of plays and concerts, "in reverse order of appearance."

As Senator Murray has said, in the last few years Senator Sherwood was required by his doctor's strict orders to be absent frequently from attendance in the Senate. Consequently, many of us may be ignorant of his many accomplishments since, because of his frequent absences, we did not get to know him as well as we would have liked.

In Senator Sherwood's long public career he has been a highly successful farmer, a success recognized by his peers in the agricultural industry. They, as we know, are a hard sell. He has been president or director of numerous agricultural organizations, including the Dairy Farmers of Canada and the Holstein-Friesian Association of Canada.

Senator Sherwood's public career has reflected his knowledge of agricultural matters. Elected to the legislature of New Brunswick in 1952, he served eight years as Minister of Agriculture in the government of Premier Flemming. He was Leader of the New Brunswick Progressive Conservative Party, serving from 1960 to 1966. He then spent two additional years in cabinet office in the government of Premier Hatfield.

Since being summoned to the Senate in 1979, Senator Sherwood has applied his talents to many issues. In his maiden speech he expressed concern over many of the environmental concerns that still bedevil us today, even when that subject was not as fashionable as it is today. In particular, he called for the creation of a Senate environment committee in order that this body could better deal with the complexities of environmental issues.

In his 11 years in this chamber Senator Sherwood has addressed many other issues. Given his background, we can imagine—and it is true—that he made a formidable contribution to agricultural issues when he served as deputy chairman of that committee. Senator Sherwood has also spoken on energy policy, housing, and northern development. I am sure all honourable senators join me in paying tribute to the distinguished career of Cyril Sherwood, and wish for him many years of healthy retirement.

Senator Anderson has been a most faithful atttendant to her duties in the Senate. I have been in that beautiful part of New Brunswick from whence she comes, although I did not visit her there. I know from personal experience that there is no finer salmon fishing in the world than in the Miramichi. Salmon fishermen, of course, have a certain amount of intolerable arrogance about that being the only real fishing. While visiting Newfoundland, Mr. Gushue, the president of Memorial University, took me to a trout club not far from St. John's, where we had lunch.

Senator Doody: Murray's Pond.

• (1450)

Senator Frith: Meech Lake and Murray's Pond. In any event, I said to Mr. Gushue, "Do you get a chance to do much trout fishing?" He replied, "Trout fishing? Sir, I am a salmon fisherman. I never fish for trout." That from the president of the local Trout Club. The Miramichi, as any who have been there will know, is a beautiful area of New Brunswick, and not just for salmon fishing.

Senator Anderson was an early advocate for the expanded role of women in society. She is the daughter of a distinguished New Brunswick cabinet minister, and she succeeded her father as the president of the lumber company he had established.

Senator Anderson played a significant role in the development of our party. She was president of the New Brunswick Liberal Women's Association from 1972 to 1976, and I am sure there are many colleagues here from New Brunswick who remember her effective role in that position.

Since being summoned to this place in 1978 Senator Anderson has advocated an expansion of the role of women in Canadian life, a cause for which, although much has been done in Senator Anderson's time in this place, she still feels much more needs to be done. Senator Anderson has addressed many important issues: forest policy in her home province, an area of deep experience and expertise; health care; and the always controversial issue of abortion. I am sure all members who were present at that time will remember the eloquent tribute Senator Anderson paid to the peace initiative of former Prime Minister Trudeau in 1984.

Honourable senators, I speak for myself—and I believe for others—when I say that we will miss most the quality of her presence. I wish to turn around something Mr. Churchill said about Mr. Attlee: When told that Mr. Attlee was a humble person, Mr. Churchill replied, "He has a great deal to be humble about!" The exact opposite applies to Margaret Anderson. She is a person of humility—quiet and modest, but with many qualities she has no reason whatever to be modest about. She has good business judgment, cool common sense, good political judgment, and is intellectually and morally a person of accomplishment and character—a person whom everyone is proud to applaud as being a Canadian.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am glad to have an opportunity today to continue my long- running speech about Senate reform, because a fundamental reform in the Canadian Senate will take place on August 22, 1990—though not necessarily because of my speech. On that day Senator Flynn will no longer be among its members. That fact will certainly change the Canadian Senate. Some will think it represents a loss; others might feel otherwise. Anyone who has observed him and me in the Senate itself, and often in committees, might consider me among the latter group.

Not long after my appointment to the Senate I found myself on the opposition benches; the back ones, in fact, in the corner where Senator Marsden is now sitting. When the Clark administration was in power and Senator Flynn was the Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of Justice, I was a rash, new boy. I cannot remember the exact details, but he was sitting where Senator Murray is sitting and I was sitting back in the corner. An issue had come up involving competition policy, an area in which I fancied I had some experience, having prosecuted a few cases. I stood up and started a series of questions, which led, I admit, to my deciding, brashly and rashly, to take him on—though I do not know where I got the nerve to take on this titan of forensic and parliamentary majesty, but I did.

We went toe-to-toe at it so strongly that afterwards several of my colleagues said to me, as a new boy, "The Senate is not a courtroom." I said, "I know, but Senator Flynn is a lawyer." They said, "Well, perhaps you two can have it out somewhere else, but not here." That started what I think many of our colleagues thought was an all-too-characteristic antagonism. From then on Senator Flynn and I always seemed to disagree about everything politically—sometimes so violently that we both behaved a bit disgracefully, although, of course, he always won the "disgraceful behaviour" contest. I must admit, though, occasionally it was only by a photofinish.

Senator Flynn, Renée, and I were at dinner within the last couple of months. I came in and went over to Jacques and said, "Jacques, I have a terrible problem. I do not think Senator MacEachen will be present for the tributes and I will have to present the tributes for our side. But I cannot think of a nice thing to say about you," to which Renée said, "Don't you two ever quit?" Then Jacques said:

[Translation]

"He is always the one to start. He is at it once again."

[English]

As it turned out—and as you can imagine—I simply had not worked hard enough to find something to say, because I found lots of good things when I tried harder.

Senator Flynn's public career started naturally as the grandson of a former Quebec premier. Concurrent with his political career, he had been a distinguished member of the legal profession, appearing many times before the Supreme Court of Canada. He was elected to the House of Commons in 1958, as has been pointed out, and was regarded immediately as an "up and comer," which is exactly what he turned out to be.

Senator Murray has told us about Jacques Flynn's distinguished career in Parliament, in cabinet, in the Senate, and in the Conservative Party. Quite naturally, he became the government leader in the Senate with the election of the Clark government in 1979, and he undertook the arduous duties of Minister of Justice at the same time—duties that, as I have said, I tried to make as arduous as I could, although not always with much success. In a newspaper interview Senator Flynn remarked that he would not be passive in his new role. I can testify to the fact that he was not.

He then returned to the leadership of the opposition when I was Deputy Leader of the Government. He performed that task with his customary effectiveness—often too effectively for my taste—on a wide variety of issues. As befitting an attorney of his stature, Senator Flynn has made a significant contribution in the areas of constitution and Senate reform, as well as various changes to criminal law.

On a more personal level, I was able to come up with other characteristics of his that I admire. He is certainly abrasive.

Senator Simard: No!

Senator Perrault: No!

Senator Frith: Do I detect the impression that I am using too mild a term?

I never opposed Senator Flynn in a courtroom, but I can imagine that it would be a bruising experience. He is a most effective street fighter—nay, alley fighter some might say, and very good at it. Of course, that is coupled with a great knowledge of the law, great forensic skill, and great oratorical skills. As Senator Murray has said, Senator Flynn is certainly one of the best speakers in the Senate.

Let me close with a mention of the other characteristics I admire. He is not a phoney. In spite of being, in my opinion, frequently wrong—in fact, almost always wrong—he is never in doubt.

Senator Perrault: Always!

Senator Frith: His convictions are strong and he expresses them straightforwardly. In all my dealings with him—and I had frequent dealings with him when I was deputy leader and we were playing these opposition roles—then, as always, he expressed his views in a straight fashion. He was never devious. He was straightforward and honest, and always kept his word when it had been given. Senator Flynn has applied all of those characteristics for a long time to his view of his public service duties. What a shame that he is so often wrong!

As a result of some travelling that he and I did together, I became very fond of his wife, Renée.

● (1500)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: When I say "together," I mean the three of us!

In spite of all the above, I have tried to be as honest and as straightforward with Senator Flynn as he has always been with me. I do wish him and Renée a long and happy life together, now that they have the opportunity to spend more time together as people who, as we know, genuinely love each other, to travel more, and to pursue interests that remain unpursued because of his long and devoted commitment to his participation in the work of both houses of Parliament, the law, and his country.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I never thought that my last speech in this House would be about Senator Flynn.

It is difficult to believe that this very talented parliamentarian is actually retiring. I think it is generally recognized that Senator Flynn has always belonged to the old school of theatrical speakers. Still, his logic and the coherence of his reasoning were impeccable. His comments were always stamped with that great analytical capacity of his. His sense of justice and fairness have always won him the attention and respect of his audience. Although not always in agreement with the content of his speeches, his opponents have always admired his honesty and his strong will. He always made his point very firmly.

His vigourous pleas, his wit and his sense of humour, as well as his talent for parliamentary strategy will be a great loss to this place.

Honourable senators, Senator Flynn was more to me than a colleague whom I have relentlessly seconded in his duties as leader of our party in the Senate. He was also and foremost a true friend who saw me through rough times over 20 years ago now. In those difficult times, I was able to count on his strenght and his wisdom. He always counselled me very judiciously.

I wish to put on the record how grateful I am to him for his friendship and how sincerely I wish it can last for as long as Providence will allow.

As you all know, Jacques Flynn is a "Québécois pure laine" who understood a long time ago the aspirations of our nation. He is also a Canadian who always stood up for Quebec in a strong and unified Canada.

His comments on constitutional problems were always incisive and moderate, based on an inspiring vision of the future of our country. I believe that in this area, he will be difficult to replace.

His contribution to public life, first as a private member and later as Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, Minister of Mines, Minister of Justice, Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and Leader of the Government in the Senate, gives him ample reason to be proud. He has served his country well.

Although occasionally, some strongly worded exchanges with the opposition would break the monotony of certain debates, I am sure there was never any hostile intent, because basically, he is a very sensitive soul, witness his fondness for reciting the occasional poem, looking at paintings and laughing at his own jokes. I asked him the other day why he laughed at his own jokes. He said it was because he thought they were good jokes. But above all, he was always ready to share the concerns of others.

Senator Jacques Flynn, as I said before, besides being a brillant parliamentarian, also has an outsanding legal mind, a fact that was recognized by the Quebec Bar last year when it awarded him the Bar's "Prix d'Excellence".

It was because of all these qualities that the Right Hon. Joe Clark appointed Jacques as Minister of Justice in 1979. Jacques is a legal force to be reckoned with. That great talent and acute intelligence I mentioned earlier is always very apparent when Jacques is in court. I am witness to his successes, since he acted as my counsel several times before the courts, where he defended his cases with great vigour and tenacity. It is a pleasure to see him argue a case in court. He still enjoys and always will enjoy the respect of his fellow lawyers, and judges always listen carefully to his arguments.

Jacques Flynn is someone whose friendship I will always cherish. I wish him an active though tranquil and satisfying retirement. Our best wishes to your wife Renée and your children, Jacques.

I also want to transmit best wishes and greetings from your staff which has always been an important adjunct to your career.

[English]

Before I sit down I want to extend my compliments to both Senator Anderson and Senator Sherwood. I hope they will both have a very happy retirement, and I ask them to take with them my best wishes.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the Senate is in the process of sustaining four severe losses. Had I arrived in the chamber earlier today I would have begun my schedule by paying tribute to Senator Asselin, who will assume new and important responsibilities in the province of Quebec. He has won the respect of all of us during his time of service here, and I wish him well. He is well liked; he is a good friend to all of us; and we are sorry that he is leaving.

For a number of years Jacques Flynn and I opposed each other vigorously across the floor of this chamber, when he was Leader of the Opposition and I was Leader of the Government in the Senate. In our moderate ways we have discussed many issues in this chamber. Occasionally, our voices became raised—on rare occasions. We have discussed and debated frequently, disagreeing more often than not.

It is difficult to accept the fact that Jacques Flynn is about to depart this chamber to go on to other interests and responsibilities. We will certainly miss this active adversary. I will miss him, especially during Question Period, as I contend steadfastly that every question requires deserves an adequate and appropriate preamble, even though that preamble may consume a few minutes or more. I feel it is important. Senator Flynn, in his quiet way, disagrees on occasion, and I concede his right to disagree.

Senator Flynn has always been a very energetic senator, a senator of great ability with a knowledge of the parliamentary system. If we could harness Senator Flynn to the national power grid, every bulb in the nation would light up simultaneously. I have often wondered, had he at some point in his career become persuaded as to the merits of the Liberal Party, what progress he might have made in the "Natural Governing Party" of this country. He might have done extremely well.

Jacques Flynn has been an effective leader and a good senator. During his entire distinguished career he has always believed in a strong and united Canada. We hail him for that. Together with his many colleagues and friends I wish him well as he leaves us. As well, I wish the very best to his wife, Renée. She has been a pillar of strength during his entire career. Honourable senators may recall that it was Maryon Pearson who said that behind every successful politician there is a surprised wife. I suspect that that applies to the Flynn clan. As well, I should like to join in all the other tributes that have been paid to Senator Flynn this afternoon, including the eloquent tribute paid by our house leader, Royce Frith.

● (1510)

Honourable senators, I too regret that Senator Anderson did not come to the Senate sooner. She has really been an outstanding senator, serving with great ability on a number of committees, always placing the welfare of the nation ahead of any partisan concerns and considerations. Her incisive and knowledgeable questioning during her committee work is an example to all of us. Senator Anderson's record of selfless community service is exemplary, and we are certainly going to miss her.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Sherwood, during his time of service, has been a dedicated senator who has represented the province of New Brunswick with great distinction. I join in all of the tributes paid to him this afternoon.

The loss of these four senators is a severe loss for the Senate. It will be a less lively place without them. We hope that in due course replacements will come along, but they will have some very difficult shoes to fill.

[Translation]

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I could not forgive myself if I did not say a few words on the eve of my good friend Jacques Flynn's departure. Several of our colleagues will want to emphasize just how clever and articulate he is, and I fully agree with them.

I wish to congratulate him and thank him for his great leadership. A leader's first responsibility is to define reality. His last is to say thank you. In between, the true leader becomes the servant of his men. Jacques has certainly done that. He always made a point of presenting problems in such a way that we could deal with them without getting discouraged. Never has he asked us for the impossible. Invariably, with a finely-tuned strategy in mind, he would always come up with lots of ideas.

Although we pay you this tribute upon your retirement from the Senate, I would not want to make it a sad event, for you leave behind you tremendous achievements first as a famous lawyer, and then as a Parliamentarian held in high esteem both in the House of Commons and the Senate. It is regrettable that the laws of the land should dictate a compulsory age for retirement, for you certainly still rate among our most active, interested and informed colleagues.

It goes without saying that, in view of the recent events concerning the Meech Lake Accord, if in the future the option of an elected Senate should be accepted, the compulsory retirement clause will no longer apply.

When you took your oath of office in 1961 as Minister of Mines, I had been a member of the Ontario legislature since 1955. I felt that the Minister of Mines was a most influential person. Gilles Vigneault may sing that "My country is made of snow", but personally I feel that my country is much more than snow, it is made of rocks filled with nickel, gold, silver, altogether 14 very precious minerals. That is the reason why I should like to thank you for taking the time to study our problems and minerals. During your very short tenure as Minister of Mines, your department demonstrated an understanding attitude by developing various expansion projects which greatly contributed to the development of all the mining centres in this country, including those in Sudbury and surrounding area.

I have had the good fortune to spend the past 28 years with you in the Senate and I have had the honour to serve the cause and support you in your efforts. I must confess that at times I felt that you were not quite conservative enough. Sometimes in your comments you displayed a certain candour which greatly irritated or aggravated some of our colleagues. But they were always expressed with humour and with the purpose, no doubt, of conveying a message which unfortunately they often failed to understand. To convince is sometimes as difficult as to convert.

I remember an incident which occurred one day when you came to the Senate in splendid form. By way of an excuse for speaking at great length, you told His Honour the Speaker that you had no watch. One of our colleagues commented: "That is true, but you could at least have kept track of the days on the calendar in front of you".

Thirty-two years of active parliamentary life followed your initial election to the House of Commons in 1958 where you held several important functions. Appointed to the Senate in 1962, you distinguished yourself in 1967 as Leader of the Opposition by your deep knowledge of political strategy. Later on, in 1979, you became Leader of the Government in the Senate, Minister of Justice and Attorney General. You enjoyed tremendously all these functions and the well deserved honours they brought to you.

As for me, I am sure I can speak for all my colleagues when I say that your talent, your sagacity and your verve have always been appreciated. Retiring after thirty-two years of parliamentary life with an exemplary record, unblemished and without any adverse publicity is an accomplishment you and your family can be very proud of.

Serving one's community, one's province, one's country and working oneself for one's own people is a joy which in my mind has no equivalent in any other profession. They are right to give you tribute today saying that you deserved well of your country.

[English]

Honourable senators, I should also like to associate myself with what has been said about the other two honourable colleagues who are leaving us today. This place will miss your eloquence, your effectiveness, and your contribution. To all of you I wish the best of health; and enjoy yourselves with your families.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to offer my congratulations to Senator Sherwood for having served well his province and his country. My first contact with Senator Sherwood, of course, was when we were both Ministers of Agriculture. We had a number of meetings and I learned very quickly to admire not only his deep interest but his great knowledge of the agricultural problems in his province and the manner in which he pursued solutions to those problems with the federal government. Since he has come to the Senate he has made an additional great contribution in his own way. He was sometimes a little less noisy than Senator Flynn and I were, but, nevertheless, he has been very effective.

To Senator Anderson I also want to offer my congratulations for her great contribution to Canada and to her province. She and I have been on the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, on and off, for many years. As has already been pointed out, her attendance was faithful. She always read the papers and documents that were submitted, and the depth and quality of her questioning in those meetings was certainly of tremendous value to the work of the Senate.

Senator Flynn, you and I have had a number of discussions, and I will really miss you. I doubt if I can make another speech without your participation!

Senator Doody: That's something to look forward to!

Senator Argue: Always helpful participation!

An Hon. Senator: Encouragement!

Senator Olson: Encouragement, yes. He sits right across the aisle from me now. There is real value in having someone heckling you, because it gives you time to think. I am not sure there is anyone else on that side of the chamber who can perform that important task, so perhaps honourable senators opposite will nominate someone to applaud once in a while.

• (1520)

I do not suppose there is anyone in the Senate who knows the rules better than Senator Flynn. For that matter, I do not suppose there is anyone in the Senate who knows how to abuse the rules better than Senator Flynn. In any event, I appreciated that too.

Senator Flynn was an excellent Leader of the Opposition. I think it was a pity that the Conservatives were elected, because then Senator Flynn could no longer perform the duty of Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, although after the election he performed well as Leader of the Government.

Honourable senators, I associate myself with all that has been said about Senator Flynn's good judgment and his helpfulness in this chamber in an attempt to keep everyone, including members of his own party, within the rules whenever they strayed even slightly from them. I will miss Senator Flynn because he has always been pleasant to be with. He has demonstrated good humour along with great intelligence. He is a decent human being.

Setting aside all the humour, I want to say very sincerely that I wish Senator Flynn and his family the best in the future.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I am glad to join with those who spoke before me in paying tribute to both our colleagues, Senator Anderson and Senator Sherwood, who will be leaving us soon.

I have constantly admired the particularly serene way in which they always dealt with the business of this House.

Therefore, I wish Senator Anderson and Senator Sherwood a retirement as happy, healthy and serene as were their contributions to this House.

About Senator Flynn, I do not have the problem our friends opposite may have had in the present circumstances considering the frequent clashes they had with him in the past. On the contrary, our views spontaneously coincided on many subjects and we agreed on fundamental issues. I can think of two examples, in particular, to illustrate what I mean by that and show how important I feel what Senator Flynn has said and done on some issues in his career has been.

The first example may not be well known for it dates back a long way. Our colleague had just been elected to represent the riding of Québec-Sud in the other place. At the time, a serious problem was creating tensions between Quebec and Ottawa: the federal government was granting money to Canadian universities but the Duplessis government was forbidding the Quebec universities to accept the grant. That was cause for serious concern, and several members representing Quebec in the Diefenbaker government were understandably worried. So, they undertook to resolve the problem.

Jacques Flynn was chosen by his colleague to meet with Premier Duplessis and explore with him various possible arrangements. The meeting was apparently not as successful as Senator Flynn had wished. A few days later, if I remember correctly, he was attending a wedding reception also attended by Mr. Duplessis, and a guest who knew about the meeting asked him how it had gone.

Jacques answered as diplomatically as possible: "We had a good discussion. We exchanged ideas and views."

Mr. Duplessis overheard the conversation and retorted immediately in the way he was well known for: "Not at all. We did not exchange ideas, we each kept our own."

The exchanges of ideas were more productive the following fall, when Jacques Flynn and a few others helped the Premier, Mr. Sauvé, and the federal Minister of Finance, Mr. Fleming, develop the formula named after them.

The Sauvé-Fleming formula set in exact terms tax points, adjustment payments, in short the financial compensation. This became, under the Lesage government and after, the so-called opting out formula which reconciled to a large extent, at least at the time, the exercise of federal spending powers with respect for areas of provincial jurisdiction.

This is the first reason why I wanted to pay tribute to our colleague today: because he played a role in defining a key issue.

The second event is more recent. It happened during the debate on the 1981 proposed resolution to repatriate the Constitution. On December 8, 1981, this resolution had been passed by the Commons and the Senate was going through the last interventions before the final vote.

Senator Flynn said at that time, and I quote:

> Honourable senators, until this morning, I had hoped that the Prime Minister, and the government, would have realized that it was of the utmost importance to bring about immediately certain changes which would have met the main objections raised by Quebec. Here again, when I say Quebec, I do not refer necessarily to the Government of Quebec; I am referring to the province of Quebec in general.

He goes on to say:

> I had hoped that those amendments, especially the one relating to the financial compensation [. . .], by which clause 23 would have been made applicable subject to the approval of the Quebec National Assembly, would have been accepted. then I would have been able to join with the majority in this house in welcoming the passage of this resolution. Unfortunately, such is not the case. Within a few hours, the Canadian parliamentary stage of the constitutional process will be an accomplished fact.
> Once the results of the final vote . . .

It is still Senator Flynn talking.

> . . . have been announced by His Honour the Speaker. I know full well that honourable senators on the other side of this house and certainly some on this side as well, because I do not consider myself as the spokesman for the entire official opposition since various points of views are held within our party—a large number of honourable senators will want to rise and sing O Canada. As for me, I will abstain. I will not be in the mood to sing. I believe that it would be extremely difficult for me to act otherwise. I will rise with all of you. [. . .] I do not want my refusal to join with you all to be misinterpreted.

● (1530)

He has added, however, that he would abstain from singing. I will add that I did not sing either on that day, and I fully agree with what Senator Flynn said to conclude his speech. Here is what he said:

> Before resuming my seat, I will simply say that this resolution contains a germ of disunity, the virulence of which we will not have to wait long to see. Yes, Pierre Trudeau has finally put Quebec and Quebecers in their place. I pray to God, since I have given up begging this Parliament and this Senate, that Quebec having been put in its place, we will not, to our sorrow, discover that place to be outside of Canada.

End of quote.

Honourable senators, those words were said on December 8, 1981. The two episodes I just referred to happened far apart, but do reflect, in my view, some of the permanent features in Senator Flynn's career: clear-mindedness when analyzing situations; loyalty to his fundamental principles; and courage when expressing his beliefs.

I heartily thank him for his legacy to our generation and other generations to come.

In the fall of 1979, when I was summoned to the Senate, Senator Flynn held concurrently the positions of minister of Justice and leader of the government in this House. So, he was the sponsor who introduced me to the strange customs of the Senate, which I found at the time, and maybe even now, quite disconcerting, and even unpredictable. Anyway, since he introduced me to the intricacies of the Senate, you will understand how affected I am by his departure.

As someone mentioned, with Senator Flynn gone, the Senate will never be the same. Personally and fortunately, thanks to the friendship we and our families have developed throughout the years and the fact that we are neighbours in Quebec City, I shall be able to pursue as before our conversations and exchanges, from which I so often benefited in the past, and which I will continue to look forward to, given his clear analytical mind which I referred to earlier.

Honourable senators, Jacques Flynn has now loyally served Quebec and Canada in this chamber for almost thirty years. As much as anyone else, he deserved the tribute we paid him today.

To conclude, Senator Flynn, I wish you and Renée happiness and success in your new endeavours for many, many years to come.

[English]

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I should like to add my congratulations to Senator Asselin on his important appointment as Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. I also wish to extend my best wishes to our three retiring colleagues.

While I have not had the privilege of getting to know Senator Anderson, I am sure she is very special—after all, she comes from New Brunswick.

Many of our colleagues have already paid tribute to Senator Flynn today. When Senator Frith made his comments on Senate reform, he gave us one more reason for reform: namely, extending the age limit so that our energetic senator might remain in the house. Senator Flynn, who has been in the Progressive Conservative Party for many years, has been an inspiration to me. From the mid-1950s I have always perceived him as one who is bigger than life. He will certainly be missed in the Senate, but I hope he will continue his commitment to the Conservative Party, because he has been a tremendous soldier and team player throughout his career in party politics.

I should also like to pay tribute to our colleague, Senator Sherwood. I have had the pleasure of knowing him since 1952. We met during the famous provincial "let's clean house" campaign, which not only brought Cy Sherwood to the New Brunswick legislature but also saw the successful election of Hugh John Flemming, after years of Liberal domination in that province.

That occasion saw Cy Sherwood elected to the legislature for the first time, and I began my career during that election as a "gofor" for the provincial PC campaign. It was a most memorable election; although perhaps not as memorable as the one that followed in 1960, it was still an historic election that had a tremendous impact on the province of New Brunswick. As has been mentioned, Cy Sherwood was appointed Minister of Agriculture. I think it is important to state that he was an outstanding Minister of Agriculture in New Brunswick for eight years. As well, he was a valued member of the Flemming government.

In 1960, when that government was defeated and our colleague across the way became the premier, Hugh John Flemming offered to run as a federal member. He was elected, and Cy Sherwood became the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party in New Brunwick. It was a difficult task, but he did an outstanding job, keeping the party together and leading the opposition. In 1966, after he resigned as the leader, he remained as an elected member of the New Brunswick legislature, always being a team player.

In 1970, when Richard Hatfield became the premier, Cy Sherwood was once again a member of the New Brunswick cabinet, where he remained as a minister without portfolio for two or three years.

Honourable senators, Cy Sherwood has served his province and his country with great distinction, not only in "good times" but in "difficult times." There are certain attributes that in my mind are important for those who serve in public life: friendship, loyalty, principle, and commitment. Our honourable friend to whom we pay tribute today has more than measured up to all of those four attributes. I am not only proud to know him through our various activities in active politics, but, honourable senators, I am especially proud to be a friend. I am sure all honourable senators will agree that Cy Sherwood has served the Canadian community especially well and merits the continuing gratitude of the people of New Brunswick and the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I am sure that it will take me less time to read the blues in a few minutes than it will take some senators who talked before me. However, I should like to pay tribute to four senators who have well served their province and this country.

During my 17 years in the Senate, I have seen several senators sworn in at the same time, but I do not recall having seen four departures in one day. This is why we have spent almost two hours paying tribute not to our departed, but to those who will depart from this chamber.

The two senators from Quebec have exemplary careers and I will not repeat what has been said about them. Suffice it to say about Senator Asselin that the first time I heard about him, such nice things were said that I still remember them to this day. I was told that he had gone through a terrible family tragedy, having lost his wife and children, and that he had demonstrated a lot of courage and determination thoughout his ordeal. I wish him a distinguished career as Lieutenant Governor of the Belle Province.

Everything has been said about Jacques Flynn. I have nothing to add, except perhaps that he had two adjectives to describe those who did not agree with him: They were either naive or stupid. As for myself, I had the privilege of being naive instead of stupid. He was always a courageous fighter. I wish him a happy retirement and good health.

[English]

I realize this afternoon for the first time that I am the senior senator for New Brunswick—and at my age! I realize too that for years I was a colleague of the father of Senator Anderson, who is retiring today because she is about to reach the age of 75. In many respects that makes me feel like a senior citizen and a senior senator.

Honourable senators, Senator Anderson was, and remains, an institution in New Brunswick. She comes from a great business family and a great political family. Her father was a good friend of mine, but he could not support me for various reasons. I remember that, when I was running for the leadership of the Liberal Party back in 1958, he said of me that I would become a good provincial secretary-treasurer of the province in a Liberal government. But things turned out differently, and I was elected Leader of the Opposition, and subsequently—well, the rest is history. Honourable senators, I wish Senator Anderson well in her retirement.

As Senator Atkins has said, Cy Sherwood was elected on September 22, 1952. I was elected on the same date. He was elected on the Conservative side while I was elected in the opposition as a Liberal. He became a minister—a quiet minister, but a very competent one. It was a thrill to watch him in action in the house. He was senior to me and was a cabinet minister, and that commanded my respect. Indeed, Cy Sherwood always commanded respect so far as I am aware.

On June 27, 1960, 30 years ago today, Cy Sherwood went with his government to defeat at the polls. We missed Cy Sherwood as minister, even though he was succeeded by other competent ministers. But Cy was always active, albeit in a quiet way, and was respected not only by me but by the people of New Brunswick generally.

I remember when he became Leader of the Opposition. I remember many things, honourable senators, that transpired in the provincial legislature in the sixties when he was there. I remember one thing in particular during the election campaign of 1963. In those days television was in its infancy. We were almost pioneers in running a political campaign on television. It was direct—we were on air, live. We could not correct mistakes if we made any. Mr. Sherwood, as he then was, was in the studio at about four o'clock in the afternoon and I was replacing him immediately at 4:15. It was only about two days before the election when our paths crossed. I was surprised to see him and he was surprised to see me. We wished each other well. I said, "Cy, I think you are going to win next Monday." He said, "Of course I am going to win." I said, "In King's County," which was a safe constituency for the Conservatives.

Senator Sherwood, I feel sad today that you are leaving. Your whole life has been based on politics. I hope you will continue to serve not only the Conservative Party but also New Brunswick, as you have done so well in the past.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would only like to add a few words to congratulate our colleagues leaving us today.

[English]

Senator Robichaud has said he will remain the senior senator from New Brunswick after Senator Sherwood has retired. You are now looking at the junior senator from New Brunswick, because it has been exactly five years to the day since I came to this place. I did not realize five years ago that I was celebrating a Liberal victory that had been won by your party 25 years before. That was my way of saluting the Liberal Party, and I am sure I will find other ways in future years.

[Senator Robichaud.]

I wish to thank Senator Asselin for his guidance, the tremendous example he has set for all of us in the work he performed with dedication all through the years I have known him. I thank him also for his contribution to the international Francophonie. I speak on behalf of all those who are members of this international parliamentary organization, and certainly on behalf of all Canadians and all members of the Federal Parliament and Provincial legislatures who are active within this organization.

Senator Asselin, I congragulate you on your appointment as Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. You have been a mayor, a member of the House of Commons, a cabinet minister and a devoted senator. No doubt that, together with Senator Flynn, you have influenced much more that you could imagine the decision which I made in the 1960's to participate actively in the activities of the Progressive Conservtive Party, first at the national level, and later on in New Brunswick.

It is common knowledge in Temiscouata and Madawaska that such men as Maurice Duplessis and former Senator Jean-François Pouliot have deeply influenced my development first as a teenager, then later during my college years, and finally as a professional accountant, not to mention my political thinking.

I suggest we should go back to the 1958 election, an election which brought Senator Asselin and Senator Flynn to the Canadian Parliament. You have achieved your ambition and your dream of giving Quebecers a choice. At that time and up until quite recently, it was not easy to be a conservative either in Quebec or New Brunswick. For giving Quebec men and women an alternative at election time and for having done so with so much dignity and dedication, I congragulate both of you, honourable Senator Flynn and honourable Senator Asselin.

Senator Asselin, I join with our colleagues from both sides of the Senate to pay tribute to you as an outstanding lawyer, resourceful Parliamentarian, great Canadian, and to offer you our best wishes in this new appointment which is the continuation of an already outstanding political career. To you, Senator Flynn, I wish much success in your future endeavours.

[English]

I did not know Senator Anderson before I came to this place. I knew of her family and knew that she was devoted to the Miramichi area. Although I was not active in provincial politics, I was aware that she had been president of the New Brunswick Liberal Women's Association. She has served her party, her province, and her region very well.

Over the last five years I have been able to observe, appreciate and take as an example—although not always successfully—Senator Anderson's work. People say I have a high profile, but I have always been impressed by Senator Anderson's cool, steady and dignified way of looking at bills that have come before the Banking Committee. Senator Anderson, I wish you a long life and a happy retirement.

I said earlier that Senator Asselin and Senator Flynn had influenced my decision to become an organizer and, in a very modest way, a helper in the PC Party of Canada and New Brunswick. However, a few years later I got to know the then minister without portfolio, Senator Sherwood. I was not present in 1963 when he led our party. However, I know he shared Richard Hatfield's vision of making our party a truly provincial party. His efforts were not compensated immediately. Francophones could not make up their minds at the time, and certainly could not see their way to supporting the alternative. However, I believe Senator Sherwood planted the seed for future electoral success for our party. In a very impressive way, he changed the electorate for many years to come and for the betterment of New Brunswick.

[Translation]

Senator Sherwood, through your dedication, your modesty and your knowledge of New Brunswick and both its francophone and anglophone communities, you put your mark on our party, on our province and on our country. I wish you a well deserved retirement. I know that you will want to continue to provide us with your precious advice. I will be eternally grateful to you for the courage you have shown all along your career and even through periods of disappointment, I am sure, and your example will continue to give me and others the eagerness to serve better and to listen more, something that is not always easy for me, but I think you will continue to be for me and for many others an interesting and very worthy model. I wish you a very good retirement, Senator Sherwood.

In closing, I would like to go back to Senator Flynn. He too has represented his province, his party and his country with great dignity, always with an incomparable fairness and surely with a lot of courage and dedication. For my part, I will try to take my inspiration from Senator Flynn and model myself upon him. I know that if over the next few years I were to be accused of adding a sound and rash partisanship in our proceedings, I could always say that Senator Flynn inspired me to do so. This will also be my way to remind our colleagues opposite or their successors of the long and outstanding career Senator Flynn had in this House as well as in the other place.

Senator Flynn, I wish you a good career and a good retirement.

● (1600)

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to add my words to those of my colleagues who have expressed their admiration for the honourable senators who are about to retire.

It has been said that Senator Flynn has graced Parliament now for some 30 years. During most of that period I have had the privilege to serve with Senator Flynn, first, in the House of Commons and, more recently, in the Senate. I remember Senator Flynn in the House of Commons as the Deputy Speaker. I can appreciate, now perhaps more than I did then, his knowledge of the rules and his general fairness in the application of those rules. But I was in a particular position in the House of Commons in those days. I led perhaps one of the smallest parliamentary parties we have ever had in that chamber, yet we had a leader in the formal way.

I do not know whether it was at Senator Flynn's recommendation, but the seating plan in those days was much different from what exists today. Instead of relegating the smallest party close to the exit door, we had the privilege—our small band of eight—of sitting close to the Speaker and Deputy Speaker. I can remember—and Senator Flynn has reminded me often of it since—that no matter what subject I might be speaking on in the House of Commons, in one way or another I would drag in the topic of wheat. In those days Senator Flynn thought I was often out of order. I want to say to him now that I appreciated the facility I achieved in catching the Speaker's eye and ear. It was a pleasure to work with Jacques Flynn in the House of Commons.

I cannot in any way be as eloquent as those who have already spoken, but Jacques Flynn is a giant of a parliamentarian. He has a great and sharp mind, and his reasoning is usually, if not always, logical. He can cut through a phoney argument or presentation with great speed and facility. Jacques Flynn, a stalwart son of the province of Quebec, has made his mark for that province and for Canada in his contribution to Parliament.

When Confederation becomes strained, one of the main reasons for the strain and the difficulty is a lack of communication—that is, one area of the country does not know what the other parts of the country are thinking, and certainly does not appreciate what they are thinking.

As a westerner I should like to invite Jacques Flynn to come to western Canada to present to the people of that part of Canada his perspective of our nation's past, present, and future. If he would do that, he would find the hospitality of westerners quite warm.

Senator Flynn: I have experienced that.

Senator Argue: You have been there often before, but we would be happy to see you and to hear from you once again.

I now wish to say to Margaret Anderson that I was privileged to be the chairman of the Agriculture Committee of the Senate for some years. Senator Margaret Anderson then, and since, was one of the most faithful members of that committee.

You, Senator Anderson, have served your country and your province well. You were steadfast in attending the various meetings. When we made our study of the beef industry across the country, and particularly our study of Kent County, your contribution was enormous and greatly appreciated.

Senator Sherwood came to the Senate later than Senator Anderson. He brought with him a tremendous knowledge of the agricultural industry. He too was a diligent and faithful member of the Agriculture Committee, and for a time he was deputy chairman. Senator Sherwood was recognized as an authority on agriculture and was appointed to the Canadian Agriculture Hall of Fame.

These two senators, who are retiring, are important voices for of agriculture. Agriculture is in difficulty today in many parts of Canada. I hope, when the Prime Minister is considering the names of future senators, we shall be fortunate in having appointed to this chamber new senators who have a knowledge of agriculture, because agriculture in Canada is still of great importance and is in great need of knowledgeable and conscientious spokespersons.

The senators, who are retiring today, will be greatly missed. I wish them well, as others have done. I am sure all of them will continue to make a major and important contribution to the welfare of this country.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to offer my best wishes to Senator Martial Asselin, with whom I worked for many years within the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians. I could even say practically from the beginnings of that association as a structured entity.

He did a wonderful job. I wish him fulfilment and happiness in his new responsibilities. I am saying this to him with all my heart.

[English]

Senator Anderson, I had ten years under my political belt when you came to this place, but I knew very well of your active participation in Liberal circles. I know you were appointed to the Senate on the basis of your personal merits, but in a way you are the jewel of the Anderson family—a family that has distinguished itself in politics, in the military, and in the civil service of New Brunswick and elsewhere.

I know you live on Pleasant Street in Newcastle. That says it all. In fact, I suspect that the street was named after one of your most notable characteristics—your pleasantness.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: I will retain fond and pleasant memories of you and of our association here in the Senate, in the Liberal caucus, and in some of its committees.

[Translation]

To Senator Flynn, I would like to express my friendship. Although we sit on different sides in this House, he always was cordial and, in a certain way, friendly to me.

He once told me that although we might lose our temper during our discussions, we can still be good friends once out of the chamber of the Senate. That, Senator Flynn, I always really appreciated from you. I wish you a happy and peacefull retirement.

• (1610)

[English]

Senator Sherwood, I have not had the opportunity of working with you, but I know your reputation. I wish you well in your retirement.

Honourable senators, forgive me for taking these few minutes, but our numbers from New Brunswick are decreasing. We are losing two of our members today, and if certain people, or, indeed, if the people have their way, there will be even less of us in the future. So I intend, as I have done today, to take every opportunity to speak of my New Brunswick colleagues and of New Brunswick problems, and I will remain a good Canadian while doing so. The best to you all.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to extend my best wishes to all those senators who are leaving today, Senator Asselin, Senator Flynn, and Senator Sherwood, and to pay tribute to Senator Margaret Anderson, the member of the group whom I have had the privilege of knowing the longest and the best. As others have said, she has made many important contributions to Canadian life, in the Miramichi, the heritage trust, the historical society, the environmental society, the art club and in many other ways. She has had a distinguished career in business as the president of W.S. Anderson and Company, Ltd.

However, I would like to emphasize something she does not necessarily emphasize, and that is the many contributions she has made to the quality of life of women in this country. She has worked in her church, the United Church of Canada, and was president of the United Church Women; she has worked with the Canadian Girls in Training, an important association for young women; and, as well, she has worked with the Victorian Order of Nurses and many other associations, which have been very important to the community life of women in this country.

I first met Senator Anderson when we both served on the National Women's Liberal Commission of the Liberal Party of Canada, she coming from New Brunswick and I from Ontario. She showed there, as she has shown everywhere, and as I have come to learn from her work on the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and elsewhere, that she was always well prepared; she was courteous but firm with colleagues, witnesses and others; and her solutions to the problems she faces in both her volunteer life and parliamentary life are based on common sense and wisdom.

I wish Senator Margaret Anderson a very long and happy life in New Brunswick and wherever she goes, because I am sure her qualities will continue to contribute to life in this country.

I also wish to extend my very best wishes to all those senators who are retiring today.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators may have noticed at the outset of the sitting today that I tried to get the floor. I had not realized that this was the last day of the sitting and that there would be all these tributes, so I apologize for that intervention. I wanted to do something else.

[Translation]

I want to join those who have complimented Senators Asselin and Flynn. I met Senator Asselin through the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians. As for Senator Flynn, I happened to know him historically and politically, because I always watched very closely the political history of the province of Quebec.

My best wishes to both of you.

[English]

I hope honourable senators will pardon me for taking a minute, but, as a New Brunswicker, coming as I do from the Miramichi, I could not leave without placing on record my feelings, and joining with everyone who has preceded me in what they have said on behalf of my two colleagues from New Brunswick. I am sure, if one were to check the records, this is probably the only time a small province like New Brunswick has lost two senators on the same day.

I know that everything that has been said about Cy Sherwood is true, and that much more could be said. I served with him for 19 years in the legislature and I had the good fortune to observe his work both in government and in opposition. He has made New Brunswick proud, both in this place and in the other place.

To Senator Anderson I want to say that all that has been said about you I have known since my childhood; all the good things people have learned about you, I grew up knowing, through your family and through yourself.

Those on the Miramichi have been fortunate, if I may say so, because they have had two representatives from that very small area serving in the Senate at the same time. We probably have more senators per capita than any other region in the country. I will probably not be able to do as much as Senator Anderson has been able to do for our people on the Miramichi and for our province, but I can assure her that I shall do my best. I would not want the record to show that I had not spoken about my feelings on the day of her retirement, because, if we ever come to an elected Senate, I would never be able to get elected on the Miramichi if I had not said some good words about her.

Honourable senators, when I rose earlier this afternoon I wanted to say that today we are celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of the election of Louis Robichaud as Premier of New Brunswick. It is a moment I will never forget.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to add my brief remarks to the many words of praise that have echoed in this chamber this afternoon. I particularly want to say a very fond farewell to my colleague, Senator Margaret Anderson. Senator Anderson is leaving her career as a senator after a lifetime of success in business, politics, and volunteer service. Since arriving in this place in 1978 she has done the job well for the Senate, and particularly for the province of New Brunswick. No matter what issue Senator Anderson tackles, she always makes sense, commonsense. Her quiet wisdom in this place, in Senate committees and in our Senate Liberal caucus meetings, has been a tremendous contribution to better understanding.

I was looking at a clipping of the day Senator Anderson was appointed to the Senate. She said then that the most pressing issues facing our national leadership were the economy and national union, and that one was no more important than the other. Today her judgment has certainly been borne out, as both those issues are still of the highest priority within our country. I know that when she returns to the beautiful Miramichi she will continue to contribute to the understanding that is so necessary in Canada.

I want to say to Senator Sherwood that it has been a delight serving with him on the Agriculture Committee. His distinguished career in politics is made even more important by his kindness and humanity. I wish him happiness in his retirement.

To Senator Flynn—my goodness, we have been friends for a very long time, going back to when I was a young reporter in the parliamentary press gallery. Over the years the friendship and kindness Senator Flynn has shown me in the various things I have done on Parliament Hill has been most appreciated. We will miss you, not only in the hurly-burly of political life here but, again, because of the personal qualities that have marked your career in politics.

• (1620)

I should like to say to Senator Asselin that he will do a tremendous service to his province and to the country in the position of Lieutenant Governor. He too is a colleague I have known for many years on Parliament Hill.

To all of you I wish the very best of health and happiness with your families in the years to come.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I want to join in the tributes to the four senators who are leaving us today. Allow me to say a few words about Senator Jacques Flynn.

I knew him before being appointed to the Senate. We discussed political, legal and constitutional issues in 1980, 1981 and 1982. Senator Flynn belongs to a great family of lawyers who has made a name for itself in politics.

Upon my appointment to the Senate, he became my mentor, something I have always been proud of. I wish him and his charming wife healthy, happy and long lives.

I would also like to say a word about Senator Martial Asselin who will become Quebec's next Lieutenant Governor. I had the good fortune to know this eminent lawyer and to often discuss legal and political issues with him. I have always considered his ideas very constructive. I wish him and his charming wife good health and success in his important duties.

[English]

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Honourable senators, I have sat here for quite a while this afternoon. Earlier I was hoping that this fellowship and good cheer would never end.

Senator Argue: It almost did not.

Senator Sherwood: However, this last little while I have been wondering if it ever would end!

Honourable senators, I first wish to add my hearty congratulations and good wishes to all those that have been so well extended to Senator Asselin. He has made a tremendous contribution throughout his lifetime of service to his province and to his country. To have the opportunity to serve, as he will have, as Quebec's Lieutenant Governor in these times is, indeed, most fitting and most propitious. He will do a wonderful job in that capacity for his province and for Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Sherwood: I congratulate Senator Asselin and I wish him and Madame Asselin every success and happiness in his new career.

I wish to thank all honourable senators for the very nice things that have been said this afternoon. I cannot commence to deal with them. I would not know where to start or where to end. Certainly, I want to thank all honourable senators in this chamber not only for their kind remarks today but for their courtesies and their help to me in this chamber through these last ten years. I have appreciated the fellowship and the good work done here by all of you.

I just wish I could be speaking today in the knowledge that the Meech Lake Accord had been ratified and unanimously adopted. I am sure my leader here in this place wishes that, and I only wish he could be celebrating that too. He has worked long and hard and has given tremendously of himself in the interests of drawing the country together and getting the accord passed. It is now up to all of us to work through the healing process. Perhaps we will all live long enough to see something great come out of all our concern and deliberations. I sincerely hope and pray that that is true.

Honourable senators, I have enjoyed this place. It never bothered me that the press rarely had anything good to say about us. After all, they were only repeating what everybody else was saying. As someone stated earlier, I guess I came here with a bit of a mission. I intended to take an active interest in environmental pollution. I know that politics makes strange bedfellows, but my big surprise was to find out that it created even stranger authorities on the farm problem.

I shall miss this place. I could rattle off a lengthy list of useful work done by various committees. We have done studies and produced reports that have received honourable and favourable response. We have looked into problems such as poverty and soil contamination. I could go on and list a great many that were not even popular issues when they were approached by Senate committees. We were concerned enough about some of these problems to invest time and effort into searching for solutions before our elected brethren even realized there was a problem. We responded to needs and concerns, not just to potential votes. That is what makes this chamber different. However, I do not want to get into the merits of having an appointed rather than an elected upper chamber. I shall follow with great anticipation the future of this place, and I wish all of you well, whatever may happen.

It has been a pleasure and a privilege to have served with you in this unreformed and unrepentant Senate. Happy days and good health to you all!

Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, just before sitting down, I could not pass up the opportunity to say a few words about Senator Flynn. He was among the first to congratulate me when I was appointed to this place, and he was obviously overjoyed at my appointment. I soon realized that Jacques Flynn was a field marshal with some awfully battered and beleaguered troops. The sight of anything wearing the same uniform as his, and that could walk and chew gum at the same time, would obviously have been a source of relief to him. He made me feel like a much-loved, long-lost cousin, and I appreciated that.

Although I served many years in the legislature of New Brunswick, I was somewhat intimidated by this august red chamber. Senator Flynn, sensing that and wanting to ease me into the situation, favoured me with some views on the Senate. He made our chamber and the work of its committees sound perfectly idyllic. I had visions of men and women with a wealth of experience and knowledge working closely together in order to find the best solutions possible to whatever problems their collective genius uncovered.

● (1630)

Imagine, if you will, my amazement when I took my seat and attended my first Question Period. I had seen ministers of the Crown worked over before—I had been one myself—but, in comparison to that, I had been subject to what was a sissy's game. The Liberal opposition was as tough then as it is now, and since they had a few ministers to grill there was no end to the barrage of questions. So what of Senator Flynn's promise of pleasant, philosophical exchanges? Well, that was it.

Senator Flynn took to it like mother's milk. He was having the time of his life. He looked more like Mohammed Ali up there, and if the Leader of the Opposition telegraphed his punches by wasting too many words in winding up, Senator Flynn was into him with a jab that left him searching for words.

So I discovered that Jacques Flynn was, above all, a politician, just like the rest of us. He loved to cross swords with the other side, and he still does. But apart from being combative, there are many qualities to the man that must be recognized, for they were of immense benefit to the Parliament of Canada and to the federal legislative process.

This is the man who brought to our deliberations, and to those of the House of Commons when he served there, a keen legal mind, an acute sense of fair play, a vast knowledge of Canada, its history and traditions, and an honesty and integrity that have always been totally beyond reproach. His incisive comments on legislation coming before us will, I am sure, be missed, as will his views on the proper course for our two founding peoples to follow in order to ensure a harmonious and profitable future together.

Senator Jacques Flynn can be proud of the contribution he has made to public life. Certainly, I was proud to serve under his command in this chamber, and I shall ever be proud to count him among my friends.

Honourable senators, to my colleage from New Brunswick, Senator Margaret Anderson: I also had the privilege of serving with her father, the late Stafford Anderson, in the legislature of New Brunswick. He was a gentleman of the first order.

When I went there he was the senior member of the opposition in the government of the late Mr. Flemming.

Senator Margaret Anderson has served her region, her native county, and her province in an outstanding fashion. She was very helpful to me, especially on the subcommittee on agriculture dealing then with Kent County, of which I was chairman. Her intimate knowledge of the area adjacent to her homestead was indeed helpful to the farmers we were working with in the region. Her intimate knowledge was greatly appreciated, and I also appreciated her interest and support throughout the entire project.

She has represented her region quietly, effectively, with compassion, with dignity and understanding. I join with all in this chamber in wishing Senator Anderson a healthy, rewarding retirement and many happy years to enjoy it.

Hon. Margaret Anderson: Honourable senators, first, I must also congratulate Senator Asselin and the Province of Quebec in having such a distinguished and able person in the important post of Lieutenant Governor.

I want to thank Senator Murray, Senator Flynn, and the many others who have said such nice things about me. It really opened my eyes as to what I contributed to this place. I had not realized that. If I had been writing my own tribute, I would have said, "She is a good attender."

This has been an interesting 12 years. There have been many changes. I am sure at least half of the Senate membership has changed in those brief 12 years. I shall miss all honourable senators, although perhaps honourable senators will not miss my long, tiresome speeches.

As someone said, I am a member of a political family, and honourable senators will realize that is true when I tell them that one of my main regrets in leaving is that I will create a vacancy. I want senators on the other side to know that I am not retiring today, but on August 7, so do not fill the vacancy right away.

I especially thank those senators who are retiring with me. I will miss them. It is nice to know I am not going alone; that I have company.

There isn't anything else to say except that I have enjoyed my 12 years here. They have gone quickly. Now it is time to go. However, as I said, I do not like to leave a vacancy.

I thank all honourable senators and wish them the best.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am the third to speak because I retire only on August 22nd, Senator Anderson and Senator Sherwood are a few weeks older than I am.

[English]

As the three of us were being showered with compliments, I could not resist remembering the talent of a former leader of this place, Senator John Connolly, who specialized in eulogizing the dead. I also remember Senator Kinley from New Brunswick saying, "When you listen to a eulogy by John Connolly, you almost wish you were the corpse."

Senator Anderson, Senator Sherwood and I did not have to go that far, just to age 75; old age. However, they say we should not complain about old age because it is presumed to be better than the alternative.

Senator Anderson's saying that we are not retiring immediately reminded me of the fact that one should not be eulogized too soon. I remember when Pierre Trudeau decided to retire, for the first time. Everybody made the greatest compliments about him, only to find out two months later that he was not retiring but was coming come back.

[Translation]

I remind you that I am still a senator until the 22nd of August. You have to be careful. That's what Winston Churchill used to say. One day he was told that Anevrin Bevan was dead and he was asked for a few words. Churchill said: "Are you sure he is dead?"

• (1640)

[English]

I have until August 22. As you know, I was appointed to the Senate before 1965, at which time I had to give notice that I would retire at age 75. The other day I was thinking, "Did I really sign that letter? Am I really obliged to go?" I see Senator Frith's face turning white. To all of you on the other side and all those who are looking for the vacancy of Rougemont: Don't worry.! I am going on the 22nd of August.

[Translation]

Life, like love, is a game of chance. My defeat in 1962 allowed Mr. Diefenbaker to keep a minority government and to appoint me to the Senate. Maybe if I had won in 1962 and lost in 1963, nobody would have heard of me after that. I guess that is what we call fate.

I think that, in the 28 years that I spent in the Senate, I saw close to 200 senators leave this place.

There are three survivors among those who were here when I came to the Senate in November 1962: Senator Croll, who, from what I heard, is doing well, Senator Molson, and my very good friend, Senator John M. MacDonald. Two more senators arrived around the same time, Senator Bélisle and Senator Phillips. There are two more of those who are called "lifers", that is those who were appointed prior to 1965. They are Senator Denis and Senator Lang. Senator Denis' career as a parliamentarian is quite phenomenal because he arrived in Parliament in 1935 as the elected member for Saint-Denis. Can you imagine, 55 years? It is extraordinary. I salute him and all those who were there in those days.

I also think about all the leaders that came and went. When I arrived here, it was Senator Brooks from New Brunswick, an extraordinary man. Senator Ross MacDonald, who became Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. Senator John Connelly, of whom I spoke earlier, and Senator Paul Martin. Those who were here when Paul Martin was leader of the government and I was leader of the opposition in the Senate will remember some exchanges that were quite amusing. Senator Perrault mentioned it. Senator Olson and I also had some interesting exchanges regarding those megaprojects that he talked to us about every single day.

And then I was leader of the government in the Senate for just a few months. However, my record was broken by Senator MacEachen who never had the opportunity to act as government leader in this House. I do not know if he longs to act in this capacity some day, it could be. But I think he would get a taste of his own medicine, since he would probably be in the minority by then. After that, there were Senators Roblin and Murray.

Senator Roblin, my assistant for several years, is incredibly dedicated. I don't have to sing Senator Murray's praises, not after the exceptional work he has done lately. Despite the failure, I think we should congratulate him for a job well done.

Naturally, during the 28 years I sat in this House, I was always in the minority. That may account partly for my agressiveness. My party never had the majority. Not once was the result of a vote in my favour. I lost each and every vote taken in this House in the last 28 years. That could change, I hope.

Now, I would like to ask all of you to forgive me my trespasses. I know I have been unfair, I certainly exaggerated in many cases. I know I irritated some of you, and especially Senator Gigantès. Sometimes, he provoked me. I always said that I was the kindest man on earth when unprovoked.

Senator Gigantès: Even when you are provoked.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, I promise you my contrition will be perfect as soon as I step out of this House. A perfect act of contrition.

Now, I also want to forgive all those who have offended me. I forgive, not forget. The battles I had to fight here are the best memories I will keep from my tenure in this House.

I am extremely grateful to all those who have been of assistance to me, my staff, Ron Lefebvre, Cécile Pelletier, and Sonia Gauthier. I want to thank the clerks of the Senate, John McNeill, what an extraordinary constitutional expert, also Robert Fortier, Charles Lussier, and Gordon Barnhart and all his assistants. I am also very grateful to the personnel of the Debates, the constables, all the people who were extremely kind to me, although I did not always deserved it, I admit. I created problems for the unlucky staff of the Debates. As you can imagine, it was not always easy to record what I had to say, and that is an understatement.

But before I quiet down, and because I want you to remember me well, I want to say a few words about the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. It would spare me from taking part in the debate later on.

I will be brief. It may not be very charitable, but it is what I think from the bottom of my heart.

The failure of Meech Lake has delighted those who wanted to say "no" to Quebec as well as those in Quebec who wanted to say "no" to Canada.

Actually, English Canada did not say "no" to Quebec, eight provinces having clearly said "yes". I submit that it is the federal Liberal party and particularly the Trudeau wing (so well represented here) that said "no" to Quebec. Witness the statements of three Liberal members of Parliament, Mr. Prud'homme, Mr. Lapierre et Mr. Rocheleau.

There is no use in pursuing the problem indefinitely. We need to determine how to rebuild bridges, how to renew the faith of Quebec in the perspective of a federalism flexible enough to give it a comfortable position in Canada.

The reflection that is beginning and that will perhaps prove to be very long and difficult may find a new way to achieve this goal. I hope that new efforts, if made, will not be messed up like the last ones.

I should like to say a few words to the Senate on a less controversial matter. Events of the recent days have delayed the emerging of an elected, equal and efficient Senate. Perhaps we could say that something good came of this sorry business.

In the meantime, one can certainly say that the unreformed Senate has much to its credit. When it is working in consultation and in cooperation instead of in confrontation, it can improve legislation considerably. We have had quite convincing experiences of this: the tax reform of 1971 (brought about in this manner), the Maritime Code, the Bankruptcy Act and many other laws that were improved by consultation, not by confrontation.

Besides, in areas of research and inquiries when it is usually easier to be objective, the Senate endeasvours on poverty, childhood, soils, trade with the US, National Defense, terrorism and so on were most valuable and useful.

Even if the election of its members might confer more legitimacy to the Senate, it does not necessarily mean that it would make our institution more efficient. I doubt that proponents of an elected Senate would get all they expect from such a body.

In conclusion, I thank the Speaker of the Senate for the kindness he has shown me. You know, from last week's reception, how grateful I am to all of you for your kind consideration.

I want to say to this gracious lady which is Margaret Anderson, and to an excellent colleague, "Cy" Sherwood, that I wish both of them a most happy retirement and all the health and the happiness they deserve.

For now—

[English]

—I will not say, "Long life to the unreformed Senate," but I can say, "Long life to the unelected senators!"

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-52 PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance respecting Bill C-52, to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts.

A Clerk at the Table:

Your committee, to which was referred—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, does the chairman of the committee agree that the report essentially describes the purposes of the bill and supports its general approach, but has a reservation in the last two paragraphs, which would be the operative part? If any of the report is to be read, perhaps those last two paragraphs could be read.

Senator Leblanc: The report was distributed to all members of the committee.

Senator Frith: Then dispense!

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 2212.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Last night, honourable senators, Tuesday June 26, 1990, the Committee on National Finance heard evidence from the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs and from Department of Finance officials at its sitting on Bill C-52.

Committee members expressed different views, and I for one had already received a number of requests from Canadians anxious to appear before the committee. Most of them had objections to some of the provisions of the bill.

However, when the minister introduced the bill had this to say on page 7 of his presentation, and I quote:

> In concluding I want to comment briefly on the time factor. Given the scope of the bill and the need to hold extensive consultations we had to spend a lot of time on the drafting of new regulations. It became obvious after the evidence heard at the finance committee . . .

He was referring to the finance committee of the House of Commons, of course.

> . . . that Bill C-52 should be passed at the earliest opportunity so that people responsible for the various plans not be left in a state of uncertainty. Nor should we forget that they will soon have to get ready if they want to be in a position to make the payroll changes needed for reporting registered funds on T-4 slips between now and the end of February 1991. To do this they have to be sure that Bill C-52 will not be further delayed.
> Considering that we are pressed for time . . .

Still quoting the minister.

> . . . and since all parties in the other place have agreed to pass this legislation, I urge members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to give serious consideration to the possibility of sending Bill C-52 back to the Senate for adoption as soon as possible.

As you can see from the report, honourable senators, most committee members except me gave general support to the bill. They recognized that the administrators of the pension schemes have been uncertain for some time now and that they will not be able to carry out the necessary changes by 1991 if this bill is not quickly adopted.

For this reason, this bill was adopted on division. I insisted that the report should be tabled without amendment, although it contained remarks which I feel are very important. The Committee felt however that the potential effects of Bil C-52 were not sufficiently considered and feared that the bill would make it impossible for women, especially those forty years and over, who are currently working to provide for themselves an adequate retirement income, that the new obligations in the area of declarations would prevent or discourage small businesses from setting up or maintaining pension schemes with defined benefits and finally that the committee's amendment removing the pension adjustment reversal provided in the draft bill would have no significant effect on the pension entitlement portability and would place young workers changing jobs at a disadvantage.

So the committee accepted to carry out a more thorough examination of Bil C-52 while allowing it to become law because the House of Commons had promised to review the bill every three years to ascertain whether it was adequate to meet the needs of the population.

Next fall, I am planning to move a motion to allow the National Finance Committee to carry out a more thorough review together with consultants. I believe and hope that the Senate will give us permission to carry out a more significant study than that we have done. The last one was not a real one. We heard the minister who clearly spoke very well and we heard one of his officials. We asked a few questions. We certainly did not exhaust the subject.

With this proviso, I will accept to vote for third reading of Bill C-52, on condition that next fall we may carry out a more thorough study and deal again with this issue at a later date.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, everything the chairman has said is quite accurate. However, there is one point that needs some elaboration.

● (1710)

The majority of us in the committee agreed that we could not reach a conclusive position on the bill because, in a sense, it is exploratory. But we agreed, and the representative of the government agreed, that we would not lose sight of the subject matter of the bill, notwithstanding that the bill had become law. In other words, it was agreed by both sides that there would be support for a motion to refer this topic to the Committee on National Finance, and also that the provision would be made to enable the committee to engage the necessary technical consultants.

Senator Frith: It is called a post-study instead of a pre-study!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary to confirm what Senator Leblanc and Senator Stewart said about the approval of members from this side of the Senate who were at the committee yesterday. But if it is necessary, I hasten to confirm it is the wish of senators from the government side who will recommend and do all they can to have this House authorize and allow the sums required so that the study mentioned in the report will really be done as fast and as seriously as possible.

Motion agreed to and report adopted; bill read third time and passed.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray was called to a meeting. I would be prepared to take as notice any questions honourable senators might have.

Senator Frith: So soon in the afternoon?

Senator Doody: Yes, that is right.

NATIVE AFFAIRS

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO ABORIGINAL PEOPLES IN MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Yesterday the Leader of the Government agreed to table a letter sent by the Prime Minister to the Aboriginal peoples in Manitoba. If that letter has not yet been tabled, will he agree to send copies of it to those of us interested in it, if the Senate is not then sitting?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will look after the matter for Senator Stewart.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

RECONSTRUCTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a perennial question. Would the deputy leader inquire whether studies have been completed or received by the government respecting the funding for the rebuilding of the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick?

I have been asking that question for ages. The government always tells me that it is waiting for the studies or reports to be completed. I should like to know where the matter stands now. Will it be another three months, six months, six years, or what?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not have that information, senator, but I will make an inquiry on your behalf.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 26 by the Honourable Senator Muir regarding Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

(The answer follows:)

As of March, 1991, the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation (ECBC) will come under the full auspices of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency (ACOA). As a result of this move, there will be no job losses. Current personnel will remain employed with ACOA.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-77, to amend the Immigration Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of the Bill C-39, An Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the title of this bill explains its purpose accurately. Titles of bills do not always do so, but in this case the title does.

The application of domestic laws to offshore areas raises important legal questions; it is a matter of great importance both legally and politically. The legal questions that are implied in the object of the bill are particularly suitable for investigation by our Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. We should accept the principle of this bill now, give it second reading, and send it off to that committee for study and report.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Ottenheimer, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

> The Senate in Committee of the Whole on the Order of Reference dated 26th June, 1990, respecting Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Act.
> The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Act.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, waiting to appear before us, to answer any questions honourable senators might have on this bill, is the Parliamentary Secretary to the minister. With your permission, I will ask him and his advisers to join us here in the chamber.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to Order of the Senate, Mr. Vincent Della Noce, Parliamentary Secretary to the Honourable Otto Jelinek; Ms. Pauline Sprague, senior counsel, Legal Services, Department of Justice; and Mr. John F. Shearer, Director General, Tariff Programs, Customs Programs Branch, Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to introduce the Parliamentary Secretary to the Honourable Otto Jelinek, Mr. Della Noce, who will be pleased to answer any questions you have on this bill. I am sure he will be pleased, as well, to introduce his advisers.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce, MP, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue: I should like to present Ms. Pauline Sprague and Mr. John Shearer. Ms. Sprague is senior counsel, Department of Justice, and Mr. Shearer can answer any general questions. He is with Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise.

● (1720)

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we welcome the Parliamentary Secretary and his officials before the Committee of the Whole.

Senator Frith: Yes, welcome, Mr. Secretary. To save some time today—not that that is always a desirable objective—in the circumstances of this bill, whose principle the Senate accepts, we simply wish to have something on record at the committee stage to justify what I believe is its unanimous support. I should like to refer to a document that I hope you have. It was furnished by the department and is headed "Questions and answers, proposed amendments to the Customs Act, Bill C-55."

Honourable senators, for the record, succinct answers are given to the following questions in that document:

Number one: Why did Customs and Excise wait until now to seek authority to make technical amendments to the Customs Act? Mr. Secretary, to save some time, perhaps you would agree if I am properly interpreting these answers. The answer is: The fact that no authority to issue refunds for the full period covered by the budget was not discovered until later, and it was introduced shortly after the budget was adopted.

Number two: Will this late measure delay refunds or cause financial hardship to Canadian business? The answer is: The delay is admitted, but it should not in the long run cause financial hardship.

Number three: Why did Customs and Excise not foresee this problem before the inception of the harmonized system? The answer is: At the time the harmonized system was introduced the Customs Act authority was sufficient to cover the situation, and this I think is important. The problem occurred only when the retroactivity provisions were extended beyond the limitation period covered by the act.

The remaining questions are: How many requests for rate reduction has Customs and Excise received? How many further requests are expected?

As for guarantees that the amendments will resolve the problem, that guarantee is given for the current situation.

Then there is the question of how much it will cost. The answer is that no additional cost is expected. It is unlikely that the same situation will recur, and other countries did not generally face this problem because they did not provide for retroactive adjustment of tariff rates.

Question number nine deals with the new June 30, 1992, extension.

Then there are questions 10, 11 and 12, which have detailed answers.

I have summarized those questions and answers, honourable colleagues and Mr. Secretary, simply because I propose that you offer to present that document so that it will be a part of our record. I made these other comments only to try to inform our colleagues as to how those questions were dealt with. I ask, first, if you will present the document, and, secondly, if you or your colleagues have anything to add?

Mr. Della Noce: Yes, senator. There is no problem with having this on the record. The action to reform this duty is very important for the department. There are many Canadian businesses waiting for this refund. This has been a problem since the harmonized price tariff was introduced in 1988, as you mentioned in two paragraphs here. With this bill, I think the Customs Department can solve all or almost all of their problems.

Senator Frith: All of the current ones, anyway.

Mr. Della Noce: Yes, and there is more than that. People are waiting for this legislation. We will be able to refund the money that is owed to them, with interest. They are not only waiting for their money, they are waiting for the interest, because the interest rate is very good at this time, as you know, senator. It will be very good for our people. I know that even in my area people are waiting very anxiously for this. It will also make the Customs people feel good to be able to deal with the money that is owed.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

(For text of document, see Appendix "B", p. 2213.)

The Chairman: If there are no further questions, I thank the Parliamentary Secretary, as well as the members of the department who are with him, for appearing before the Committee of the Whole to answer the questions of senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Act, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO ABORIGINAL PEOPLES IN MANITOBA TABLED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a few minutes ago Senator Stewart asked for a copy of a letter sent by the Prime Minister to Chief Fontaine and his group in Manitoba. I have the letter with me now and I should like to table it at this time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PRIVACY COMMISSIONER

MOTION RE APPOINTMENT REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 16:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz:

That, in accordance with Section 53 of the Privacy Act, Chapter P-21, R.S.C. 1985, this House approves the appointment of Bruce Phillips as Privacy Commissioner.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Pitfield.

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: Honourable senators, with your forbearance, I should like to say a few words with respect to what are called the officers of Parliament. You may ask who are the officers of Parliament. They are the Auditor General, the Chief Electoral Officer, the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Privacy Commissioner, and the Information Commissioner.

• (1730)

Honourable senators will quickly note that there is something very special about the function of "an officer of Parliament." Whatever the role and status of other government officials, the officer of Parliament is the direct and immediate servant of Parliament itself. It is a function with the rank of a deputy head and the independence of a judge.

The officers of Parliament must not be confused with the "officers of the House": The Clerk, the Clerk Assistant, the Sergeant-At-Arms and the Parliamentary Counsel in the House of Commons and their peers in this chamber. The officers of the House are the nominations of the government and serve Parliament. But their appointments do not require the approval of Parliament, and they do not have security of tenure.

The officers of Parliament, on the other hand, are quite different: For them, the approval of Parliament is required both for their appointment and for their removal.

Few, indeed, are the positions in the Government of Canada where appointment and removal both require the concurrence of both houses. Why this requirement? Because in each case the function concerned has been deemed so special in its purpose, so important in its relationship to members of Parliament and senators and what we do, that this rare and particular mix of authority and independence is called for.

As might be expected, there are not many officers of Parliament. And it follows from what I have said that each of them should attract the special concern of each and every member. For the officers of Parliament do the members' work, and they are armed with special powers for that purpose—powers that members do not have individually, powers of a scope or kind that they should be exercised only in the name of Parliament as a whole. The qualities of an officer of Parliament must therefore be very special. Expertise, experience, integrity, and good judgment are very important.

Because the officer of Parliament belongs to each and every member, it is particularly important that a nominee be regarded as non-partisan. A nominee who cannot command the unanimous support of the House—at the very least, the broad support of all parties of the House—cannot be regarded as a credible officer of Parliament, and an officer of Parliament who is not credible is to the body politic and individual rights what an armed revolver is in the hands of a child.

That is why the officers of Parliament are referred to as "consensus" appointments. Traditionally, a government bends over backwards to make certain that its nominee for a consensus appointment is acceptable to all the other parties in Parliament. By "convention," a government does not proceed with a consensus appointment, does not use its majority to force such an appointment, if it is not broadly supported by members on all sides.

Consultation with respect to the appointment of an officer of Parliament is, in my experience, real, frank, and thorough. This is right, because these are the officers of all members, particularly opposition members. The officers of Parliament are there, in large measure, to watch the government, to guard against its excesses, against its improper intrusion. The officers of Parliament belong to the members, not to the government.

Consider now the cases of two individuals: one is a former Privacy Commissioner, Ms. Inger Hansen, the other is the government's presesnt nominee, who is the subject of Senator Doody's motion. I am not acquainted personally with Ms. Hansen, but I believe it was because of her distinction as a former member of the Department of Justice, because of the excellent job she did as Penitentiary Commissioner, that she was appointed an officer of Parliament, with the agreement of all members on all sides in both houses, not once, but twice.

[Senator Pitfield.]

As I said in the Senate a few weeks ago, Ms. Hansen served from 1977 to 1983 as Canada's first Privacy Commissioner, and then from 1983 to 1990 she was Canada's first Information Commissioner. In the first job, she aided members of Parliament in the cause of the sanctity of the individual; in the second, she served to assist in the cause of more open government. During these and prior appointments as Canada's first Correctional Investigator and Penitentiary Commissioner, Ms. Hansen consistently won praise for her courage, intelligence, and integrity.

More to the point, there was no criticism of her by anyone in authority. She was widely reputed to be doing an excellent job. Yet, when her appointment expired a few weeks ago, she was shown the door without so much as a thank you. She was pointedly left without any help from the government to find a job.

I should point out that because an officer of Parliament should be expert, experienced, and politically neutral, a place where suitable candidates are often found is the public service, where, in fact, Ms. Hansen was before her appointment. And because good people have good career prospects, the conventional understanding is that persons taken out of the public service to do these jobs will not be left high and dry after the appointment, which is for a fixed term, has expired. That has always been the understanding, honourable senators. I have never known it to be otherwise. Ms. Hansen had every reason to expect this conventional treatment. She has not received it.

With respect to her personally, that is unjust and ungrateful treatment. Were it simply inadvertence and oversight, it would be the sort of treatment that should anger every senator and member of Parliament, for she served each of us. How can we stand for one of our officers being treated in such a shoddy manner?

However, it is more than that. Such are the circumstances of the treatment of Ms. Hansen that it can only be taken as clearly purposeful, intentional, calculated on the part of the government. It must be assumed to be intended as it appears, a message to every officer of Parliament and every Order in Council appointment: Behave yourself! Watch out! Beware that you do not offend the government of the day, its leader, its party, its minions!

So in this case it is not simply a matter of rank ingratitude for services rendered to all members; it is an insult to every member that his servant is being punished for having served him. Set to watch the government, Parliament's servant is being punished for having done so. How can we stand for that?

What then are the likely consequences of this message? Are they not that officers of Parliament will be inhibited in the fulfilment of their mandates? Is not the consequence of the government's actions to belittle the office Parliament has set up? How can we stand for that?

Why safeguard the powers of an officer of Parliament? Why protect that officer's independence with the security of tenure of the Judges Act if a government can with impunity visit upon a retiring officer the treatment this government is giving Ms. Hansen?

What message does this send to future prospects for recruitment to these difficult and demanding posts? Is not the message, again: Watch out! Beware! Take this job at great risk to your future or to your integrity!

Is that the way members of Parliament want the functions of officers of Parliament to be viewed? Is the function to be made so risky and thankless for the well-qualified that it becomes sought after simply because it is a plum in the gift of patronage?

That issue comes to a head with the motion of Senator Doody, which is my second case. I do not know Mr. Phillips. I bear him no ill will. I am sure he was a paragon in his profession and an outstanding member of the Prime Minister's Office. But, clearly, as an officer of Parliament, the nominee has neither particular experience nor particular expertise. If anything, his training is on the other side of the street. But above all, and for whatever reason, it is an appointment that has been opposed by the opposition parties.

Those members who support this kind of an appointment are telling us that the useful function of an officer of Parliament is to be curtailed, the reach of Parliament encumbered, the capacities of members of Parliament restricted, the independence of officers of Parliament decisively undermined, and that the government is to be given license, contrary to the clear spirit of the law. More important, the members are also sounding an alarm that they will allow the special powers and authority of an officer of Parliament to be put into partisan hands. Honourable senators, I suggest we think about that.

I regret having to speak so forcefully about these matters. I would prefer not to take sides so vigorously; but a few weeks ago I raised this matter in the chamber for the consideration of the government, and, quickly, with what seemed to be a certain amusement, justice was refused in Ms. Hansen's case. It is in that light that I raise my plea to the whole house so that individual senators on both sides may think about it.

If senators agree to this motion, we are agreeing to the punishment of our officer because she served us. We are agreeing to a diminution of the powers with which Parliament has armed us. We are agreeing to the transfer of exceptional powers into partisan hands. Members of both houses on all sides should reflect on what is being done to the functions of an officer of Parliament. They are functions that belong to each of us and that are being performed by our servants. Diminish them and Parliament is diminished.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Pitfield for reminding us of those people who were appointed according to the degree of their independence from the government. However, I am somewhat puzzled. Senator Pitfield suggests that the person who held this particular position was summarily dismissed, which, according to him, was a bad precedent. He then goes on to suggest that the nominee for the position is unsuitable for the reasons he mentioned, including that of being partisan. Senator Pitfield also referred to the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which was headed by Mr. Atkey and is now headed by Mr. Bassett. Several members of that committee had their term expire. They were Conservative appointments, and they were not replaced. They were not given a banquet.

Senator Pitfield: They were part-time appointments, sir.

Senator MacDonald: Of course they were part-time appointments, but I do not see your point. When this lady's appointment ran out, it ran out. It was a seven-year appointment, and it ran out. I do not know the lady, but I am sure she is well qualified; and I am sure that in the system, as you call it, a place will be found for her.

What have we got against this nominee? He has an impeccable record as an award-winning journalist. His integrity has never been questioned. His performance as a counsellor in our embassy in Washington was first class. He was asked by the Prime Minister, because of his previous experience as a correspondent with Southam, if he would work in our embassy in the United States as part of the team working on the Free Trade Agreement, which he did at some monetary inconvenience to himself.

What is the problem? Senator Pitfield must remember the distinguished people we had in Washington, such as Dick O'Hagen and Mr. Gossage. What are we heading for here? Is this something without precedent? Are we to turn down the nomination of the Prime Minister for this important job? Is there any precedent for it? Are we attaching an American limb to the parliamentary system? Are we to take the man before a commission? Are we to get into his sexual preferences, his financial affairs, or his ability to hold a job?

In this chamber there are a number of journalists, such as Senator Doyle, Senator Gigantès, Senator Fairbairn, Senator Roméo LeBlanc—

Senator Simard: Senator Chaput-Rolland.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Chaput-Rolland.

An Hon. Senator: Senator MacDonald.

Senator MacDonald: Myself.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Guay: You missed Keith Davey.

Senator MacDonald: I do not think any one of those people mentioned, or any others that I could think of, are unprofessional or unable to carry on a job as important as this. It is a slur against anyone who has ever worked in a confidential capacity for a prime minister.

I happen to know Mr. Phillips and I speak with some knowledge. There is no question that he was a loyalist. A sycophant he was not. He knows what this job demands, and he would expect no less of himself in the performance of it. I hope Ms. Hansen is properly looked after, but I suggest that that is history. We have another matter here. Your reference to a committee is without precedent, but I hope that that committee will carry on its functions in reviewing this appointment in a professional manner.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I support the comments made by Senator Pitfield and I do not quarrel with the comments of Senator MacDonald, although I do not think his analogies are applicable. We are not looking at the appointment of a press officer in the Canadian embassy in Washington.

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator Frith: We are looking at an appointment of the importance and with the dimensions that were articulately outlined by Senator Pitfield. Also, I agree with Senator MacDonald that, as far as I am aware, this is unprecedented. The motion in amendment that I am about to make is unprecedented, but I make it because I believe, for the reasons advanced by Senator Pitfield, this nomination is equally unprecedented, in the sense that it has abandoned the tradition of consensus that was referred to by Senator Pitfield, and that it has been strongly opposed by the House of Commons. That is also unprecedented.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): For those reasons, honourable senators, I move in amendment, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:

> That the motion be not further proceeded with but that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

• (1750)

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a question. Would a press secretary to Prime Minister Trudeau not be entrusted with an important job, yet put in the Senate? I am referring, of course, to Senator LeBlanc. He could not take on a job of this importance as an officer of Parliament, but he is safe in the Senate.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: He was elected. He ran for election, and you did not.

Senator MacDonald: I did, Senator Corbin. Get your history straight! I did in 1963.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the question of appointing a journalist to the Senate could be debated, but I do not think this issue has anything to do with journalism. It has nothing to do with whether Mr. Phillips is a journalist. That is not a disqualification.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): What is his disqualification?

Senator Frith: I believe Senator Murray was in the chamber when Senator Pitfield was speaking. The principle involved here is the abandonment of the tradition of consensus and the appointment of a clearly partisan person to this job. The motion I am making is not at this stage leading, and may not eventually lead, to a refusal of the appointment, but, because of the important principles raised by Senator Pitfield, I believe our committee should look at this unprecedented appointment. I believe we should take this admittedly unprecedented step, as far as I know, of referring the matter to the committee, because it is in answer to an unprecedented move on the part of the government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to take a minute or two of our time. I had not intended to speak on this matter, but a couple of points have been raised by Senator Pitfield on which I would like to comment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that I ignore the clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: I will take no more than a moment or two. Senator Pitfield has listed the officers of Parliament, as he calls them, among others the Auditor General, the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Privacy Commissioner, and the Information Commissioner. He has said that frequently, if not typically, the background considered necessary and desirable in the incumbent of these positions is a public service background. That has been and is the case sometimes.

Typically, it seems to me that the Auditor General has come from the private sector into government. The two most recent Commissioners of Official Languages, Mr. Yalden and Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, have indeed come from the federal public service. But the first, and one of the truly outstanding Commissioners of Official Languages, the man who wrote the book, as it were, on the position of Commissioner of Official Languages, was Mr. Keith Spicer, who came not through the public service but directly from the world of journalism into that position.

Senator Frith: It was the world of academe, actually.

Senator Murray: And through the world of academe, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition reminds me. The Privacy Commissioner these past few years has been Mr. John Grace, a journalist from the Ottawa Journal, a business associate of the former Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Turner, and, so far as I am aware, not one who came to his position through the public service. In all of those cases—whether it be Mr. Spicer, Mr. Grace, the various Auditors General—they came with the necessary professional qualifications and, of course, with the integrity that is required for such a position as an officer of Parliament.

We have now been told that consensus is necessary, and certainly consensus is highly desirable. We have also been told that governments in the past have "bent over backwards", to use Senator Pitfield's words, on consensus appointments, that the consultation has been real, frank, and thorough. That, frankly, is not my recollection, honourable senators. I recall sitting across the way, six years ago, or whenever it was, when the name of Mr. D'Iberville Fortier was brought in for the position of Commissioner of Official Languages. So slight, casual, and routinière was the consultation that, indeed, it was not a consultation at all. It was a nomination sprung on us by the government of the day. So slight and casual was that process that I seriously considered, up until the last moment, intervening to make the kind of speech that Senator Pitfield made today about the lack of consultation.

There was no real consultation at all. I decided not to make the speech because I had a healthy respect for Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, whom I had known when he was Canadian Ambassador to Belgium, and I decided not to add an unpleasant note to a nomination that I felt would go through in any case.

The consultation process was not real, frank, and thorough in that case, nor in most of the others with which I am familiar. It was strictly casual and routine, if at all. It was a telephone call and a matter of information going from one office to the other to the effect that the Prime Minister and the government had intended to make a certain nomination at a certain time. That is my recollection.

Senator Pitfield says that he does not know Mr. Bruce Phillips. I must say, honourable senators, that that surprises me. Bruce Phillips has been around here as long as Senator Pitfield and I have. I would have thought that Senator Pitfield knew him as long, and perhaps as well, as I do. In any case, Mr. Phillips has been a journalist in this town for lo these many years. Everything Senator Finlay MacDonald has said about his professional qualifications, his integrity, and his ability is true. I fully support what he has said in that respect.

Mr. Phillips has one overwhelming defect in the eyes of Senator Pitfield and some others in this chamber and elsewhere, and that is that for a period of a couple of years at the most he spent some time in a minister's office—indeed, on the staff of the Prime Minister of Canada as communications director.

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: Pardon me, sir, but that is not true.

Senator Murray: Then what is his defect?

Senator Pitfield: I too was a member of a prime minister's office.

Senator Murray: I was about to remind the honourable senator of just that.

Senator Pitfield: My objection is not to that. Indeed, I would support that, as I think you would also. My objection is that the appointment does not carry the approbation of all parties. That is all.

Senator Murray: But why not?

Senator Pitfield: Because it must. The position is that of an officer of Parliament. It must have the approbation of all sides of the House. That is my argument.

Senator Murray: We cannot wait forever for the approbation of all sides of the House. The honourable senator cannot hide behind the "lack of approbation," as he puts it.

Senator Frith: He is not hiding at all!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator surely has something to say either in favour of or against Mr. Phillips and his professional qualifications, his experience, his ability, and his integrity. It is not enough simply to say that he opposes his appointment because others oppose it. Let me say that that should not be a bar to public service.

• (1800)

It should not be a bar to public service of this kind to have been associated on the political staff, so to speak, with a Prime Minister. As I have pointed out, Senator Pitfield and I got our start in this town in the same way, indeed, in the same office, working for the same minister. While I have pursued another route, he has risen in his time to the rank of deputy head, indeed, Clerk of the Privy Council. Senator Austin, whom I first caught sight of in Ottawa many years ago when he was on the political staff of the late Minister Arthur Laing, later rose to the rank of deputy minister in this town. Good for him. Later he was principal assistant to the Prime Minister of Canada.

The present Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Tellier, a man who has served several governments loyally and well, got his start on the political staff of the Honourable Jean-Luc Pépin. And so it goes.

I take Senator Pitfield's statement that he has no objection to Mr. Phillips on the basis of Mr. Phillips' two years on a political staff. Then what is the objection? The objection is that other political parties object.

Senator Frith: No!

Senator Murray: Then why do they object? Let them say why they object.

Senator Frith: You know what the tradition has been. You consult first, and if you cannot get the approbation, then you get someone else.

Senator Murray: I am telling the honourable senator that the consultation of which he speaks has been entirely routinières, in my experience, and a pleasant fiction—a telephone call from the government to the opposition to tell them what they propose to do. That has been invariably so in the cases with which I am familiar.

I regret very much that this matter is being handled in this way. We will vote against the amendment being proposed. There is no reason in the world why Mr. Phillips' nomination should not be confirmed now by the Senate. Those who wish to vote against it should at least have the courage to stand up and say why this man is not entitled to the confidence of the members of Parliament.

Senator Frith: Thank you for the invitation. In due course.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator Pitfield a question. On June 7, he mentioned that Inger Hansen had not been re-appointed. He just based his argument on that point. I see no connection between the problem of Ms. Hansen and his motion. Referring Mr. Phillips' appointment to a committee would not change the problem of Ms. Hansen. Even if the committee refused to appoint Bruce Phillips, that would not solve the problem of Ms.

Hansen. I see this argument, but it is beyond me. I do not know if he really thinks it is relevant. If so, he had better explain it to me because I do not think it is appropriate.

[English]

Senator Pitfield: Honourable senators, I should like to make a clarification that might be useful to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

What I am commenting on and urging members of both houses to reflect upon is the gradual erosion of the function of an officer of the Parliament. These are jobs that have great powers attached to them. The Privacy Commissioner has to deal with files of individuals and the Information Commissioner has to deal with government secrets. It is very important, in my view—and it has been viewed as very important traditionally—that these jobs should have the approbation of members on both sides of the house. Perhaps in the future this will be borne in mind when these appointments come forward. They are only seven appointments out of the 600 or 700 appointments a year that are made by a government under Order in Council.

The erosion of the function of an officer of Parliament is as dramatic in the case of Ms. Hansen as it is in the case of Mr. Phillips. I do not know either of them. I know of them, but I do not know them personally. This is an important issue, and I raise it for the consideration of members of the house, and perhaps of the committee.

Senator Flynn: You did not answer my question. You seemed to suggest that if the government had treated Ms. Hansen otherwise you would not have a problem. This motion has nothing to do with Ms. Hansen's problem.

Senator Frith: He is simply not listening!

Senator Flynn: Don't listen if there is some logic!

Senator Frith: You are not listening to his answer because you do not like his answer.

Senator Flynn: He did not answer the question.

Senator Frith: In your opinion.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Pitfield a question?

Senator Flynn: Yes, but he might not reply.

Senator Stewart: Thank you, Senator Flynn, for your gracious consent.

Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has told us that certain members of this chamber started in ministers' offices and so on. He asserts that those examples should be borne in mind when considering the appointment now before the Senate. Does Senator Pitfield regard those examples, which Senator Murray obviously regards as analogous, as convincing against his own argument? If not, why not?

Senator Pitfield: Honourable senators, clearly, they are not analogous. Those appointments do not require the approval of both houses of Parliament. Why is approval of both houses of Parliament required in the case of an officer of Parliament? It is because those posts belong to the members of Parliament, not to the government, and they have to be considered as such.

If members of Parliament wish to let the tradition disappear into desuetude, so be it. I raise the question for consideration. Is that to happen? If so, do members want those powers left in the hands of members appointed in the manner they are appointed? It is for their consideration.

Senator MacDonald: Are we obliged to reappoint the Auditor General?

Senator Pitfield: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved, in amendment, by the honourable senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:

> That the motion be not further proceeded with, but that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate on the debate and process concerning the Meech Lake Accord.—(Honourable Senator Gigantès).

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I should like to convey briefly the few thoughts I have concerning last week's failure of the Meech Lake Accord.

I have always believed that, in a geographic and social entity like Canada, a federal form of government is best suited to preserve the freedom of each citizen and take into account the differences of various groups.

We need to ask ourselves what kind of federalism is involved. Quite obviously Canadians have at least two diverging views on federalism. Some advocate a strong central government for several reasons: unity of the country, efficient management of public affairs, similarity of public services without consideration for the relative wealth of the regions, and so on.

For 40 years now the Canadian government has favoured that option through an unbelievable number of state interventions. The federal government has been busy defining and managing more than a thousand different programs. The proliferation of so-called national Canadian welfare state policies is marked by the search for uniformity and standardization. So we have been headed towards the kind of centralization which cannot be justified by constitutional considerations, tradition, technology or economies of scale.

This centralized federalism mirrors the aspirations of the socio-democrats who ruled the country during that time, roughly from 1960 until almost now, say until five years ago. It is not irrelevant to ask at the end of this long march toward centralisation what the real effects are when viewed against the declared intentions, the speech notes which inspired them.

A first effect of this political design is that it does not create any wealth, it only redistributes it and not necessarily to those most in need. In this process, we transfer wealth from one group to another in an endless and inconsistent series of victorious but short-lived coalitions to the detriment of the silent majority.

Indeed, the federal government only can impose these gigantic transfers such as the Energy Policy. The second effect of this constant discrimination is the ill-feeling, the constant confrontation among social groups. In fact, it contributes—and there is the real drama—to the balkanization of Canada.

As long as we had conservative governments in the provinces and above all at home, in Quebec, federal-provincial rivalries were bearable, endurable. But we've realized for 20 years now that centralization is, in fact, the natural opposite of harmony between regions of this country because the standardization which results from it goes directly against regional preferences and disparities.

Centralized federalism has a third effect, that is the "cartelization" of provinces. It creates monopolies or near-monopolies and negatively affects competition which, in fact, enables one to see the costs of the actions taken by the players.

The powers which Ottawa fails to exercise will not be recovered by the provinces because of interprovincial competition. We often tend to forget that, and everyone then loses its sense of duty which results in a race for favours and privileges. For example, why don't the provinces increase minimum wages since everyone knows that everytime we do so, the number of unemployed increases? But the provinces tend to play down the gravity of the situation and argue that the federal governement will give them unemployment insurance. We could give many more examples that show where the sense of duty of governments and individuals tends to crumble. The change in attitude which has emerged in the last 30 years results in solutions which are more and more collectivist or interventionist in nature.

It is high time, honorable senators, to thoroughly review our federal government system of decentralization and a respect for regional differences are concerned. We may be fighting a losing battle when we try to embark in this other system, that of a decentralized federalism. I want to say now that if it should fail I would have serious doubts about the future of our country.

Besides, this new sharing of power I am talking about is not an exercise just for federal government and the provinces, it must also involve governments and families, indivuals, and also the government and the marketplace, the businesses. We must return to a more balanced sharing of power between the three partners: family, business and government.

In short, we must stop shifting the cost of public services from one generation to the next, that is to our children, through government deficits brought about by centralized federalism.

We must be fiscally responsible because our children will, and rightly so, refuse to pay the pension of those who, when they were in power, burdened them with an excessive public debt.

Honourable senators, I would like to mention that there are profound divisions in Quebec and Canada as to what kind of country Canada should be. There is the centralist vision that has prevailed for 30 years in Ottawa, and still does in certain quarters. On the other hand, there is the tradition of a decentralized federalism which prevails in Quebec since the beginning of the century. Mercier could be the first proponent of that vision, but let's mention Parent, Gouin, Taschereau, Duplessis, and Bourassa. An urgent task awaits us, in my opinion. On the one hand, we must redefine the functions of the family, the market, and the State. On the other, we must also redefine the distribution of power in our federal system by restraining the role of the federal government to functions concerning the nature of things and by letting the provinces respond to the regional preferences of their population. That must be done with the help of a renewed political process which would stop all interest groups, including the Public Service, from controlling governments, to the detriment of everyone's interest, that is the liberty of every citizen.

I conclude my remarks by stating my deep conviction that the unity of the country does not require a strong central government that multiplies so-called national policies but a government who respects true federalism, that is decentralized federalism, respectful of regional differences and the real preferences of its citizens.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, as thousands of people in Canada, I am deeply upset by the turn of events. Many of us cannot understand that a nation such as Canada, with such a great potential, cosuld get involved in such a dialogue, as to whether the Canada we know and love will continue.

As many of my colleagues in this House, I am proud of my ancestors of Acadian and Quebec region. In fact, many of my ancestors are buried in Deschambault, Charlesbourg, Trois-Rivières in Quebec, Port-Royal in Nova Scotia and in many other places. Several of them played an active role in the political history of Quebec and Acadia.

Eventually, they settled in Western Canada where, with people from all countries in the world and all ethnic and religious origins, they worked the land and co-operated as brothers and sisters to help build the West.

My accent in French is that of someone born in British Columbia, the lively western Belle Province where English, French and Chinese are spoken.

• (1900)

In my view, it constitutes a profound national tragedy that men and women from Quebec did not come in greater numbers to the west in its course of development. Had they done so, perhaps we would not have today's solitudes and Canada would have developed naturally, inevitably, and inexorably as a bilingual country.

Yet I can understand why the leaders of Quebec discouraged French settlement in other parts of Canada at that time. Understandably, they wished to protect their language, religion, and culture, just as they wish to protect language and culture today. They have my full sympathy and the sympathy of most right-thinking Canadians. Perhaps it was the only way to ensure cultural survival. Surely the subsequent "la survivance" was tantamount to a miracle. No one had any right to assume that French culture and language would have survived without a great effort.

Those Quebecers who did come west made a significant contribution to the development of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. Few people know, for example, including most of the people of my province, that the first newspaper in British Columbia was a French language publication. Photostat copies of that newspaper are still available as vivid proof that many people of French descent were among British Columbia's pioneers.

My father, who died when I was very young, was fluently bilingual. He was determined to maintain his language and culture. He worked actively to establish a local French-language cultural group, whose members met regularly. There were no subsidies provided by any level of government, but its members never complained. They regarded the ability to access the linguistic and cultural riches of two great traditions as an immense cultural advantage. He left me his books, which I treasure very much today.

The west has been good to our family and to thousands of other families. Of course, we have our share of rednecks and bigots, like the pitifully small minority of sodden idiots who booed the Canadian anthem sung in French in Toronto the other day—but just as pathetic was the nut who desecrated the Canadian flag in Montreal this week. Thank God, these sad souls do not represent mainstream Canada. Unfortunately, however, they receive far too much media publicity in relation to their numbers and their significance.

The trampling of a Quebec flag or a Canadian flag always makes the front page. What happened after the St. Jean Baptiste parade in Montreal last week? There it was—on the front page of the Vancouver Sun, in living colour, a photograph of the Canadian flag being desecrated in the St. Jean Baptiste parade, just as large as the picture of a Quebec flag being trampled and dishonoured by those poor, pathetic souls in Brockville a few weeks ago; a disgraceful episode that was given so much publicity in Quebec publications and on television. These incidents cause right-thinking moderates in this country to despair, because tensions and misunderstanding continue to build between the solitudes in this country. To some people such solitudes have become chasms apart.

A few days ago there was a francophone festival in British Columbia. There were 3,000 French-speaking young people, most of whom were of other than French descent. Their parents had encouraged and assisted them to study the French language and to immerse themselves in French culture. They had a festival of joy—la fête de la columbien—in Fort Langley, British Columbia. They tell me there was not one story about it in eastern Canada, but that picture of the Quebec flag being stomped on was on the front page of the newspapers and telecast over and over again in Quebec.

When I was on the aircraft coming to Ottawa, the person across the aisle was reading the Vancouver Sun, with its front-page picture of a Canadian flag being desecrated. I publicly criticize this western newspaper for what it did. The reader smashed the newspaper with his fist and said, "I'm fed up." I contrast this with la fête de la columbien, which was a great success, a wonderful day at our historical Fort Langley, and a marvelous occasion for English-speaking Canadians and French-speaking Canadians to get together.

I ask my friends in this chamber: Which news item deserved more prominence—the drunken nerds who drag Quebec's flag in the mud or the thousands of young people with a genuine desire to learn French and explore the riches of Quebec culture? Who deserves more publicity—the louts who desecrated the Canadian flag the other day or the great Quebec young people who have visited the west in the thousands in recent years and have formed life-long friendships with other young people in my province? Perhaps our distinguished colleague, Senator Doyle, who edited the Globe and Mail for so many years—one of the great newspapermen of our generation and time—can tell us some of the reasons why the values seem to be totally warped. Newspapers are the instruments of information that affect public attitudes.

Some people in Canada today use language like an arsonist uses gasoline. How else can one describe the reported remarks of Mr. Bouchard the other day when he stated that "English Canada wants us to grovel at their feet." English-speaking Canadians do not want anyone to grovel at their feet. Only the mental cases, who would be better off in institutions, would make a statement of that kind.

Just as tawdry is the language used by the anti-Quebec minority who fling words around like hand grenades at a garden party. You read of these pathetic, little, frustrated groups that have never achieved anything worthwhile in their lives, so they decide that they will attack Quebec or some other entity.

If this country is to be saved, it will be saved by the moderates. The warped view of certain English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians needs to be reviewed and revised. There is one attitude I encountered in my political career—and this is what used to happen if you had a French name in British Columbia. I remember the loony eccentrics—there were a group of them—who campaigned against me in one election during the 1960s. They went from door to door, circulating the slanderous rumour that "Perrault is of French descent and is a former member of the Union Nationale; he abandoned a wife and four children in Quebec." Do you know what happened?

Senator Murray: What did you say in answer to that?

Senator Frith: How much of that are you prepared and able to deny?

Senator Perrault: Fellow senators, I suppose I invited that comment. But let me tell you that I got the biggest majority in my life from the voters on that occasion. They did not like prejudice. They said, "Clearly, this is not the way we should conduct things. We don't need bigotry."

I want to tell you about la belle province de l'ouest. First, we are geographically closer to the Soviet Union than we are to Ottawa. If you wonder why some of our attitudes seem a little distant from the centre of this country—for example, if two jets take off from the Vancouver airport at the same time, the one headed for Russia arrives there first.

To label British Columbia as English is to distort the facts and to invite a fight. It is not a monolithic, English community. In many ways, and at certain times, we dislike Toronto more than the people of Quebec hate Toronto—but for different reasons; economic reasons.

Senator Frith: There are no bad reasons for hating Toronto.

Senator Perrault: There are no bad reasons, but we can think of some, can't we?

While those of English, Irish, Scottish, and Welsh descent make up the largest group in British Columbia, those of German descent are next, along with the Chinese, Dutch, Yugoslavians and dozens of other ethnic groups. Apart from a few minor family quarrels, we get along together extremely well.

I hope no one in Canada thinks there is a conspiracy centred in downtown Toronto, headed by Englishmen, to take away French language culture and rights. If they try, we in British Columbia would join you in the fight.

Most of us are English only in the sense that we speak English in various accents. If you call someone of Ukrainian descent English, in the provinces of Alberta or Manitoba we know what would happen to them, Senator Guay, don't we?

Senator Guay: I know.

Senator Perrault: The fact is that the west has become a great multicultural community.

Our lieutenant governor is of Chinese descent, and he is outstanding. He is learning French. Our premier came as an immigrant from Holland. Even some of our street signs are in language combinations such as French and English, Chinese and English, Japanese and English, and German and English. We enjoy our cultural diversity and the benefits it brings in the arts, education, agriculture, business, and even in cooking.

Vancouver used to be famous, or infamous, for the English boiled dinner served with boring and unappetizing regularity in west coast restaurants, but no more. Our cuisine is as diverse as our community, and we rejoice in it. Predictably, some of our best chefs come from Quebec, but they come as well from every other area of the world.

I will not prolong this speech, but I hope that this summer we can give the moderates a chance and give the people a chance. For example, my local city council sent a resolution down here, which said, "We are behind 'distinct society.' We support the idea of the amendments proposed to the Constitution."

The mayor has also telephoned me and said, "We are doing what we can to help." But does the message ever get through? Is there not a responsibility on the part of the media to publish these events and initiatives and to tell what is going on in the rest of the country so that we do not retreat into two solitudes and become suspicious, destructive, and negative in our attitudes? I am convinced that we can work out our problems.

In my province, the third largest province in Canada, our track record has been good with respect to the Meech agreement—but I do not want to get into the details of it. Suffice it to say that there is a great, huge ocean of support and goodwill there to make this country work and to recognize the legitimate aspirations of those living in the other provinces.

There has to be merit in any proposal for moderation, compassion, tolerance, and understanding if this nation is to remain united. It will be the moderates in all parts of Canada who will save it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, it is good to hear such fine sentiment from my good friend from the west coast. I am sure there could be a measured response from some of my friends from Quebec to this kind of assurance. I am sure the senator means more than just taking a trip to the Gaspé or watching the sports events of the summer that might take place down around Montreal or in that part of the country.

We are reassured. There is sometimes reassurance when Liberals gather. We recognize their good intentions. It was after the Meech Lake death last week that we all drew reassurance from a gathering of Liberals. They gathered in Montreal, a mix of Premier Bourassa, a contingent from Ontario, and my premier, David Pearson, to begin planning a positive summer. I am sure that that is the kind of thought Senator Perrault was bearing in mind. He raised the point whether some of our trouble does not come from the media and the reporting of events along the way. I am the first to agree with him.

About two weeks ago one of the newspapers carried a large picture of a flag-trampling that was over one year old—at least the incident portrayed in the Vancouver Sun was recent. We had a story in one of the newspapers in Toronto the other day, after the death of the Meech Lake Accord, that dealt with the question of who is to blame for this failure. My God, they listed practically everyone in the country with the exception of anyone connected with the media! Yet so much can be laid on the backs of the newspapers, the radio stations, and the television stations of this country for their perpetuating of mythology throughout the long three-year debate—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Doyle: —for reporting stories about the question of time, without explaining the difficulties of time, without explaining that if you reopen the debate and put in matters that had not been covered in the first round you were reopening another three-year exercise. They did not bother to explain that.

It is an example of the cavalier way in which so many writers in the media have dealt with other questions. I think of that favourite line of reporters—I do not care about editorial pages; good grief, they are there to create argument, just like you are there to create argument, and sometimes that is the best we can do.

Senator Frith: Let's make sure he is quoted on that one!

Senator Doyle: Let us examine that favourite line of reporters about this deal, that it was cooked up in the dead of night by 11 men. It does not seem to matter how that has been torn apart by people like Mr. Tessier, people who said, "Look, it took us years to get to Meech Lake." The country was aware of that, and of the time and effort that went into getting to Meech Lake. Yet we perpetuated the mythology, and we are perpetuating it today in the newspaper that I once worked for. We say that the poor Prime Minister stands alone in his difficult situation. He does not stand alone at all! Apart from his own caucus, he stands with all but two premiers.

Senator Frith: That is right!

Senator Doyle: They are right behind him, agreeing with him, defending him. There are not just two premiers who are opposing him but two premiers who have supported him. The press, the media, forget about what those two premiers themselves have had to say.

We all agree that the process is wrong. We need something livelier, something that moves faster. We need something in which the public feels more genuinely involved. We need all of that. We do not need reminders like we heard here yesterday, that what happened in Ottawa and in Winnipeg happened in a pressure cooker; that it was part of a manipulation; that it was, as the media calls it, a case of the Stockholm syndrome—terrorists and their hostages. How far can you stretch the English language—even if you work for the Globe and Mail?

I suppose Senator Murray could feel that there was a bit of terrorism when he went to Winnipeg, and that he was in a pressure cooker, because our Aboriginal friends had an itinerary waiting for him. They said, "No, you do not bring your experts in here. No, you do not get the order of business that you want. No, you do not get a last word. No, you cannot sum up. We have a program for you. You knew this and you knew that. Say what you have to say and get out." That is about what the situation was. I am not faulting the Aboriginals. Like everyone, I will say that they have had so many frustrations that they must be forgiven any excesses they undertake to use, but I do not think we can be accused of putting the Aboriginals in a pressure cooker. They knew where they were. They knew where they were going, and if f anyone was left in a pressure cooker, it was all the rest of us.

What about the one man who has talked about being at his wits' end, Premier Filmon? I can understand how he felt that he was in a pressure cooker. If, at the end of every day, at the end of every hour, I had to report to Sharon Carstairs and to Gary Doer, I would say that I was in a pressure cooker and I just cannot stand it any more!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doyle: We have another problem with Senator Wells.

Senator Ottenheimer: He is not a senator yet!

Senator Doyle: Pardon me, Premier Wells. He may be a senator yet. We are about to get some new senators and he may get picked up in the rush. However, let us get back to Mr. Wells. Mr. Wells has had a lot to say about the pressure cooker. I believe that when Senator Olson spoke yesterday, he was referring to Premier Wells, and he was talking about the fact that so much has been laid on Premier Wells that we could understand how he felt. Well, I am sorry, I should like to go back to the end of the Ottawa meetings, when we had what we thought was an agreement, and each of the premiers was given an opportunity to speak. I am not talking about what was said to the Globe and Mail or the Winnipeg Free Press, or to anyone else as people did their little scrums on their way to and from the meetings in Ottawa. I would like to tell you what Premier Wells said in his formal statement:

> Before closing, Prime Minister, I want to express my personal appreciation to you for your great courtesy and your great tolerance of all of my comments and all of my intervention during the course of the last seven days. I must acknowledge publicly that you treated me with nothing but absolute respect and consideration, and I am grateful to you.

That did not sound like a complaint. However, that was the end of the Ottawa meetings. We know the phone rang often down in St. John's, and we know, apart from calls from Gary and Gary and Sharon, there were calls from the Prime Minister's Office and from Senator Murray, and we all know how that puts the fear of God into you.

• (1930)

At any rate, on Thursday, which was the last day of honest deliberation in the Newfoundland legislature, the Prime Minister spoke to the members. He was introduced by Clyde Wells, and I shall quote that introduction:

> Mr. Speaker, Prime Minister, it gives me a particular pleasure this afternoon to extend, on behalf of all members on both sides of this Legislature, and indeed on behalf of all of the people of this province a very warm and sincere welcome to you . . .
> It is important and I say to you we are indeed grateful for the honour that you have done us. It also gives me an opportunity Prime Minister to reciprocate some of the warm welcome and the very sincere and kind and courteous treatment that you extended to me when I was in Ottawa a couple of weeks ago. All the World knows that we had some difficult sessions. A seven day long dinner meeting is quite a long dinner meeting and there were some very difficult sessions, but, as indicated in speaking Saturday night at the closing of that session, I acknowledged the great courtesy with which you treated me personally throughout those difficult discussions, and I welcome this opportunity to extend a similar courtesy and respect to you.
> Thank you again most sincerely for doing us this great honour, and would you now be so kind as to address the members.

Perhaps honourable senators will say he was insulted by what the Prime Minister had to say. Now we have Premier Wells back on his feet, and he said:

> Perhaps this is the first time in Canadian history that it has been done.

He is referring to the Prime Minister taking part in a debate in the Newfoundland legislature. He went on to state:

> It is a very significant event and I want to assure you, Prime Minister, that I am confident that all of the members, whether they agree with the comments you have made or they disagree, or they agree with some and disagree with others, whatever, they respect your views and I have no doubt that all will take your views into consideration in making the decisions that they have to make, and in the end I am confident that all members of this Legislature will make the decision in the way that they feel is best for Canada.

Honourable senators, a decision was never made, and that is the end of the evidence we have of the pressure applied to Clyde Wells.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

HOLIDAY WISHES TO SENATORS AND SENATE STAFF

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, before my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Government, moves the adjournment, let me, on my own behalf and on behalf of my colleagues on this side, extend to all honourable senators my warmest wishes for a most pleasant summer holiday, and, if I may say so, a well deserved holiday on the part of all.

At the same time, let me reaffirm our gratitude and appreciation to all of those who serve us in this chamber in various capacities—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: —and throughout this side of the Parliament Buildings.

If I tried to list them, I am sure I would forget or neglect to mention some by inadvertence, but I do want them all to know that they are all included.

As our departing friend, Senator Flynn, said today, staff in this place treat us all with extreme kindness, much more than most of us as individuals deserve. They treat us so well because they have such a high respect for the institution and for the functions that we, as members, perform here.

I do want to thank them for their diligence and their kindness, so often much beyond the call of duty.

[Translation]

Finally, I wish you, Mr. Speaker, and all our colleagues a very nice summer. Farewell and see you on September 25.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, let me enthusiastically support every word the Leader of the Government has said with respect to the wish for an enjoyable, restful, and nourishing summer. At the risk of maudlin exaggeration, I would say that at least I feel a very family feeling, and always have, in the Senate in the relationship we have with the staff, who always make us feel exactly as Senator Murray has said, at home, because they are so devoted and loyal. That provides one of the great bonuses, it seems to me, of being a Canadian senator—that is, the feeling of family that exists here, not without exception but in general.

Honourable senators, along the same line, may I take this opportunity to say farewell, at least as far as their formal relationship is concerned, to three members of the family, those we live with every day while we are sitting, and that is three of the pages. We bid farewell to Michelle MacDonald, a native of Prince Edward Island. She has completed her second year at the University of Ottawa and has been with the Senate since September of 1988. Also, a native of St. John's, Newfoundland, Tina Budden.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Tina has also completed her second year at the University of Ottawa and has been with the Senate since August 1988. Then we have Sandra Cruickshank. I do not think she needs to stand, but please do, Sandra.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Sandra is a native of Vancouver, British Columbia, and has been our chief page since September 1989. She has received her BA in Lettres Françaises from the University of Ottawa. She is studying to become a high school teacher—would that I were 13 again and could attend her class! Sandra has been with the Senate for three years and was with the House of Commons for one year prior to becoming a Senate page.

I speak for all of us in thanking them for the pleasure of their company and the loyalty of their service, and to wish them great success in their budding careers.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment, I want to wish a fine summer to the members of the GST Committee as well.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 25, 1990, at 2 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BILL TO AMEND — REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-52

WEDNESDAY, June 27, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SIXTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-52, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related Acts, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, June 14, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following observations and recommendation:

The Committee, at its meeting to review the Bill on Tuesday, June 26, 1990, heard testimony from the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and officials of the Department of Finance.

Bill C-52 provides a reform of the rules governing tax-assisted retirement saving. It restructures the limits on deductible contributions to registered pension plans, deferred profit sharing plans and registered retirement savings plans to make them fairer and more flexible. As well, it amends the Income Tax Act to codify the registration rules that pension plans must satisfy in order to qualify for tax assistance. The aim of the Bill is to make the tax preferences for retirement saving more effective in assisting Canadians to achieve adequate incomes for retirement.

The Committee agrees with the general approach of Bill C-52, which is the product of a lengthy development process involving extensive consultations with the pension industry, employer groups and labour organizations. The House of Commons Finance Committee heard witnesses from all these groups during its review of the Bill, and unanimously recommended a set of amendments that were included in the Bill that passed third reading. The Committee also recognizes the uncertainty faced for some time by pension plan sponsors and the urgency of the Bill's passage if sponsors are to be able to implement the required changes early in 1991. As well, it understands that the House Finance Committee plans a thorough review of the Bill in three years' time.

Nonetheless, the Committee believes that the likely effects of Bill C-52 have not received adequate study. In particular, it is concerned about: the impact of the Bill on the ability of women to achieve adequate retirement incomes, especially women aged 40 or more who are currently in the labour force; the impact on the ability and willingness of small employers to set up or continue to administer defined-benefit pension plans, given the reporting burdens inherent in the new system; and the issue of portability, particularly in the light of the House of Commons amendment that removed the pension adjustment reversal feature from the original Bill and may therefore have adversely affected younger employees who change jobs.

Accordingly, the Committee recommends that the subject-matter of Bill C-52, and the regulations that accompany it, be referred to the Standing Committee on National Finance for further study.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND — AMENDMENT PROPOSALS — QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE CUSTOMS ACT

(BILL C-55)

1. Q: Why did Customs and Excise wait until now to seek authority to make technical amendments to the Customs Act?

   A: When the April 1989 Budget was introduced, Customs and Excise became aware that it did not have the authority to issue refunds for the full period covered by the Budget. After examination, it was determined that amendments to the Customs Act would be required; this legislation was therefore introduced shortly after the Budget was adopted.

2. Q: Will this late measure delay refunds or cause any financial hardships to Canadian businesses?

   A: It may delay refunds for a few isolated cases; however, we do not expect this to cause any financial hardship to importers. The importing community was advised in mid-December that this Bill was before the House.

3. Q: Why did Customs and Excise not foresee this problem before the inception of the Harmonized System?

   A: At the time the Harmonized System was introduced, the Customs Act authority was sufficient to cover the situation. The problem occurred only when the retroactivity provisions were extended beyond the limitation period covered by the Act.

4. Q: How many requests for rate reduction has Customs and Excise received to date? How many further requests are expected?

   A: Approximately 875 requests have been received. Approximately 250 remain to be processed. No more are expected as the deadline for filing requests was December 31, 1989.

5. Q: Can the Minister of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, give guarantees that these amendments will resolve the problem of refunds once and for all?

   A: These amendments will resolve the problem of the current situation.

6. Q: How much will these refunds cost the Canadian government?

   A: Given that we will be refunding duties which were overpaid and that we can process these refunds in the regular fashion, no additional cost is expected.

7. Q: Could the same situation reoccur?

   A: This is highly unlikely. This situation arose because of the massive conversion of the Tariff and the extraordinary measure taken to ensure that Canadian businesses were not adversely affected by this conversion.

8. Q: Have other countries encountered the same problem Canada is now facing?

   A: Other countries did not generally provide for retroactive adjustment of tariff rates. This provision in our legislation reflects our commitment to a revenue-neutral conversion.

9. Q: Will the new June 30, 1992 extension be sufficient to process all requests for rate reduction?

   A: Yes. It gives importers 2 years in which to file claims for refund. This should be sufficient.

10. Q: Who will benefit most from the proposed changes to the Act?

A: All importers, large or small, affected by a retroactive order will benefit from this proposal.

11. Q: Under the proposed legislation, how will importers obtain a refund?

A: Importers will continue to file applications as they have done in the past; the procedures will remain the same.

12. Q: Will importers have to wait 2 years to get a refund?

A: No. Once the legislation is passed, they will be able to submit their application; these will be processed in the normal manner.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, September 25, 1990

The Senate met at 2.00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I give notice that there is a matter of privilege I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators. I am serving notice now so that I may pursue it at the appropriate time.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I, too, rise on a question of privilege. I have no idea whether my question of privilege will be similar to Senator Ottenheimer's or not, but I just wish to advise honourable senators that at the appropriate time I wish to pursue it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Mr. Speaker, at this point, I would like to advise my colleagues that I intend to rise on a question of privilege since I think that my privileges as a senator have been breached in many respects. After the introduction of our new colleagues, at the appropriate time, I hope I will be allowed to rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I, too, wish to bring a matter of privilege to the attention of this honourable chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Guay: Why not do it now?

Senator Barootes: This is a question of privilege which will bring to the attention of this honourable chamber when the appropriate time arises.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to give notice also that I will be drawing to the attention of the chamber a question of privilege dealing with the nomination of new senators. I will do so in due course—and at the appropriate time, to quote my friends.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it would be remiss of me not to get involved in this. On the assumption that the questions of privilege that have been raised by my colleagues do not cover the situation I found myself in yesterday, I also would like to give notice.

Senator Frith: And the filibuster begins!

Senator Doody: I hope it's more effective than yesterday's.

Senator Roblin: A little better than closure!

Senator Perrault: You were not even there! Where were you? You did not even show up.

Senator Frith: A voice from the near west.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Patricia Carney
Nancy Clark Teed
Gerald J. Comeau
Consiglio Di Nino
Richard Bennett Hatfield
Donald H. Oliver
John Sylvain
Noel A. Kinsella
John MacLennan Buchanan
Claude Castonguay
Mabel Margaret DeWare
John Lynch-Staunton
James Francis Kelleher

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and were seated:

Hon. Patricia Carney, of Vancouver (British Columbia), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Martha P. Bielish.

Hon. Nancy Clark Teed, of Saint John (New Brunswick), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Brenda M. Robertson.

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau, of Church Point (Nova Scotia), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Robert Muir.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino, of Downsview (Ontario), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Norman K. Atkins.

Hon. Richard Bennett Hatfield, of Fredericton (New Brunswick), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, of Dartmouth (Nova Scotia), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Finlay MacDonald.

Hon. John Sylvain, of Montréal (Québec), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella, of Fredericton (New Brunswick), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Brenda M. Robertson.

Hon. John MacLennan Buchanan, of Halifax (Nova Scotia), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. John M. Macdonald.

Hon. Claude Castonguay, of Montreal (Québec), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras.

Hon. Mabel Margaret DeWare, of Moncton (New Brunswick), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Brenda M. Robertson.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton, of Montreal (Québec), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Paul David.

Hon. James Francis Kelleher, of Sault Ste. Marie (Ontario), introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. William M. Kelly.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would ask your indulgence for just a moment to permit me to express a word of welcome to those honourable senators who have taken their seats with us for the first time today.

As honourable senators are aware, some 15 new senators were summoned over the last little while by His Excellency, the Governor General, on the recommendation of Prime Minister Mulroney. Thirteen of them have taken the oath today; I want to assure the house that the other two will not be long delayed.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: On behalf of those of us who have laboured for some years in support of the government on this side, I want to express our entire satisfaction with the number of reinforcements who have arrived today. I am sure, however, that I speak for all or almost all honourable senators here in expressing our pleasure at the quality of those reinforcements, the quality of the new senators who have taken their seats today.

We have joining us today two former provincial premiers, one of whom is Senator John Buchanan of Nova Scotia, who, in four general elections and 12 years as premier of that province, has earned the respect and affection of the people of Nova Scotia unmatched by anyone.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: I have had occasion in the past few years to observe at close hand and to be involved in discussions at the national level in which Premier Buchanan, as he then was, was called upon to contribute to the cause of understanding and national unity of our country. This he always did with the greatest of generosity and wisdom.

We are absolutely delighted to have him with us today. I also want to draw to senators' attention the fact that Senator Buchanan has brought with him two outstanding Nova Scotians, Senator Don Oliver

[Translation]

Senator Comeau is strenghtening the Acadian deputation in this House.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: From New-Brunswick, we have of course former premier Richard Hatfield who, throughtout his 27 years of public office in the New Brunswick legislature and his 17 years as premier of his province, has devoted himself to the promotion of a greater understanding between anglophones and francophones, especially in his province, but across the country as well. He has greatly contributed to national unity throughtout his career.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: In this House, Senator Hatfield meets again his former opponent and predecessor, the former premier of New Brunswick, Senator Louis Robichaud, as well as Senator Thériault, who was a member of the New Brunswick legislature.

Senator Hatfield is also reunited with four of his former ministers: Senator Simard, former minister of Finance of New Brunswick, Senator Robertson, former minister of Health, Senator Teed, former president of the Treasury Board, and Senator Deware, former minister of Education.

[English]

I am pleased to bid Senator Teed and Senator Deware a very warm welcome here on behalf of those of us on this side.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: In Senator Noel Kinsella we have a former head of the Human Rights Commission of New Brunswick, a former senior public servant in the Government of Canada, and one who has a special contribution to make to public policy and to the work of this chamber and of Parliament.

[Translation]

For the first time, we had the opportunity today to welcome Senator John Sylvain, a well-known businessman from Montréal, highly respected by his peers and his fellow citizens, and another very distinguished businessman and statesman from Quebec, the honourable Claude Castonguay.

[English]

As well, there is Senator John Lynch-Staunton, a businessman, a former vice-chairman of the executive committee of the civic government, whose grandfather, from Hamilton, Ontario, sat in this chamber in the early part of this century, having been appointed by Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden.

From Ontario I am very pleased to welcome Senator Consiglio Di Nino, an outstanding businessman and community leader; and, of course, my old colleague in the cabinet, the former Minister for International Trade and former Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable James Kelleher.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Senator Kelleher made his first appearance here in this chamber about four years ago, when a minister and a member of the other place. He was invited to the Senate chamber, within 24 hours of having been named Solicitor General of Canada, to help pilot through Committee of the Whole legislation dealing with justice for which he was responsible.

Finally, let me say what a great pleasure it is to welcome from the west coast the first Conservative senator to be nominated to this place from British Columbia since the 1930s and the Prime Ministership of R.B. Bennett. I refer to the Honourable Pat Carney, former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Minister for International Trade and President of the Treasury Board, whose skills as a public person and whose career as a journalist and champion of her native province and of western Canada are well known indeed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, at its best, the Senate provides an opportunity for all members to use their talents and experience to contribute to the public policy process, to the legislative and parliamentary process, and to the wellbeing of our country. This is a place where there is, as the new senators will find, more than ample opportunity to perform honourable service to Canada and to derive the satisfaction that comes from making such a contribution. Therefore, I wish all of the new senators satisfaction, good health and happiness in their new role in the Parliament and, in particular, in the Senate of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, after witnessing this march up the gangway so many times I felt like joining Senator Doody in rising on a question of privilege against this reinforcement of the government benches.

I can understand the sense of expectation that attends the arrival in the Senate. I believe it is up to each of the new arrivals to assess the Senate for himself and herself. I certainly had my own assessment when I arrived, and still have it, which is held under the oath of secrecy until all can be revealed at a later date.

[Senator Murray.]

The sense of expectation that is apparent today will be realized only if the new senators take advantage of the opportunities that are available in the Senate, as Senator Murray has stated, to contribute to the formulation of public policy and to the examination of legislation that comes to us generally from the House of Commons.

I said to my colleague, Senator Frith, that in light of the large number of senators arriving today who are qualified to contribute one ought to establish a Senate watch to determine how longlasting their diligence will be. I say that because it is noticeable that once the initial excitement has disappeared and the initial ceremonies are completed there is a tendency to drift away, and to allow a corporals' guard as it were, or a small group of senators, to carry out the work of the Senate. That would be the first reform that those who come with a reformist attitude could undertake to change the Senate. However, it was not my intention to make that comment.

I wish to congratulate each and every senator. Please do not expect me to praise you as Senator Murray has done; although let me say that I have been known to praise Conservative senators.

Senator Roblin: When?

Senator MacEachen: I like it better when they are leaving the Senate, rather than when they are arriving.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

PROCEEDINGS OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of privilege and will explain it during the next few minutes.

As honourable senators are aware, the process under which I do this is outlined in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition at pages 25 and 26 where it is stated:

> (1) Once the claim of a breach of privilege has been made, it is the duty of the Speaker to decide if a prima facie case can be established. The Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that privilege appears to be sufficiently involved to justify him in giving such precedence (or as it is sometimes put, that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed); and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.
> (2) It has often been laid down that the speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege is limited to deciding the formal question, whether the case conforms with the conditions which alone entitle it to take precedence over the notices of motions and Orders of the Day standing on the Order Paper; and does not extend to deciding the question of substance, whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the House itself.

Therefore, it is my duty to outline that there is a prima facie case and that the matters referred to by me are of a nature which involve privilege. If the Chair so decides, then obviously

I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion at the appropriate time. It is this body, the Senate, which should decide whether or not there has been a breach of privilege.

● (1420)

There are essentially three headings under which I wish to put forward my case.

The first point that I wish to draw to everyone's attention is that in my opinion, with respect to the meeting yesterday of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, some members of the committee were denied the opportunity of fulfilling their parliamentary duty. For a definition of "parliamentary duty" I again refer to Beauchesne's, page 190, item 570. It is stated therein:

> It is the duty of all committees to give to the matters referred to them due and sufficient consideration.

I repeat: "It is the duty of all committees to give to the matters referred to them due and sufficient consideration." But the consideration that members of the committee were able to give yesterday to a document of over 300 pages involved approximately six and one half hours before—

Senator Cools: A long time!

Senator Ottenheimer: Perhaps it is a long time for Senator Cools, who was there, but perhaps it was insufficient time for some senators who feel that six and one half hours for over 300 pages of an extremely complex matter was insufficient. Whether one is for or against the GST, I assume that everyone realizes the complexity of the subject and that it is not a matter with which one can be thoroughly familiar, or examine and judge the various alternatives, in such a short period of time. I do not feel capable of doing that. However, there may be some honourable senators on the opposite side who, through superiority or intelligence, or communication with the divine, have that facility. I certainly cannot claim that. I now wish to refer briefly to that.

It is important to point out that the chairman of the committee, quite appropriately, intended to have a meeting on September 19 and another meeting yesterday, September 24, for tabling the report in the Senate today, September 25. We are in the area of fact here. The fact is that the original intention of the senator who was chairman of the committee was to have a meeting of that committee on September 19 and another meeting on September 24 in order to have the report tabled today. I do not think that is in dispute, but I am informed by the Clerk of the Committee—in reply to a note that I sent him—that that is a fact. These notes were exchanged yesterday. I wrote to Mr. Wilson, saying that in order to meet the September 25th date to table the report in the Senate, "it was originally intended to have the report available for this committee almost two weeks ago. Please inform me what date was envisioned." That letter was signed by me. It was signed by me. The answer that came back said, "Meeting was scheduled for Wednesday, September 19, in addition to today's meeting," which was yesterday.

In order that senators give due and sufficient consideration to the matters referred to them, it would appear that the chairman himself saw it as necessary and beneficial that there be six days between the committee having the report and its referral to the Senate. However, that was not allowed. A motion to the effect that a vote be required at 7 p.m. was adopted. The result was that approximately six and one-half hours were available for debate on that particular matter.

Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of privilege, because what transpired in the committee yesterday is contrary to a parliamentary imperative which paragraph 570 of Beauchesne's quite clearly and succinctly puts as follows:

> It is the duty of all committees to give to the matters referred to them due and sufficient consideration.

I submit that a matter of this complexity cannot be given due and sufficient consideration by all senators on the committee within that period of time.

I should like to refer to another matter, which I believe Senator Poitras will refer to in more detail. However, I believe that one of his colleagues should show an interest and a sensitivity to what I consider to be a breach of his privilege. He will be in a better position, of course, to pursue it. In any event, if the privileges of one senator are involved, frequently the privileges of all senators are involved, and in this way the privileges of the institution itself can be undermined and eroded. This is not necessarily or usually by any frontal attack on the institution, but the privileges of individuals can be negated, minimized, ridiculed, or whatever.

I maintain that the privileges of the Deputy Chairman, Senator Poitras, were infringed when he was denied access to information by the research officers of the committee. Senators who were at the committee meeting will be familiar with this letter from Senator Poitras to the senior analyst of the Research Branch dated September 19. It reads:

> It is my understanding from Senator Buckwold that draft material has been produced by the staff of the committee for consideration by the committee in the formulation of its report on Bill C-62.
> Would you please forward this draft material to me by hand at my office in Room 266-N of the Centre Block before 3:00 p.m. today. I am aware that this material may not be available in its translated form. I wish to have the documentation in its current form.

On the same date, September 19, there is a letter to the Honourable Senator Poitras which says:

> Further to your letter regarding the draft report, I wish to inform you that Senator Buckwold has instructed the staff not to distribute copies to any Member of the Committee, including Members of the Steering Committee. To date, the Chairman is the only Senator to have access to the draft materials. When the first draft is completed and translated it will be made available to all Members of the Committee.

The letter goes on, but that is the substantive part. It is interesting to note and worth repeating the following:

> Further to your letter regarding the draft report, I wish to inform you that Senator Buckwold has instructed the staff not to distribute copies to any Member of the Committee, including Members of the Steering Committee.

Senator Doody: Shame!

Senator Ottenheimer: When I learned of that instruction, it appeared to me to be highly unusual. Without commenting on the privileges of the steering committee or of the other members of the committee, I think it can be well maintained that every member of the committee had a right to such material. Certainly, it appeared to me that the deputy chairman of that committee had the right to that material. Yesterday, among other things, I wrote another note. I wrote the second note to a research officer. I have his name here, but I do not see much sense in reading it, although I do not mind doing so. It was a brief note requesting him to inform me of when it was that he had received instructions from the chairman with respect to denying access to the deputy chairman to this information. I have his reply in which he says that he received instructions the same day that the letter was sent, after having spoken to the chairman on the telephone.

I am not criticizing that research officer. He was given instructions. Whether it was appropriate or inappropriate for him to follow them and the question of whose advice he should have or should not have sought are different matters. It is the source of the instructions, the nature of the instructions and their resulting infringement upon the privileges of the members of the committee that interest me. That is the aspect that is of concern to me.

I do not know whether the costs of the study of the GST amount to $1 million, less than $1 million or in excess of $1 million, but they are quite substantial. To the best of my knowledge the costs for the research work and for the people who did it were not paid by the chairman or by the Liberal caucus. Those costs were borne by the taxpayers of Canada through a vote of the Senate; therefore, the work should be available to all senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Ottenheimer: I am not aware of any principle that would suggest that this work, undertaken at the expense of the people of Canada for the Senate of Canada, should be made available not to the deputy chairman of the committee but only to the chairman. Therefore, I submit that, in that respect as well, the rights and privileges of Senator Poitras, deputy chairman of the committee, were infringed upon, and as a result all our privileges are somewhat in jeopardy. Certainly the rights and privileges of the minority are in jeopardy.

I am sure that Senator Poitras will refer to the matter in greater detail when he speaks.

Another incidence of infringement of parliamentary privilege occurred at the meeting of the committee yesterday in the absence of parliamentary order in the proceedings of the committee. Let me refer to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, paragraph 606(2) which says:

> The Chairman of the Committee is responsible for order and decorum in the committee.

Senator Perrault: For heaven's sake, that is ridiculous!

Senator Ottenheimer: It is a responsibility, not a privilege; it is not something the chairman may do if he so wishes, but, if he does not wish to have order, can dispense with it and impose it again at the next meeting or whenever he feels like it. This is an obligation. The chairman of the committee is responsible for order and decorum in the committee. I am not too concerned with the decorum aspect, but I am concerned with the order aspect.

What does "order" mean? Obviously, Beauchesne is referring to parliamentary order. Standing orders 1 and 2 of the Rules of the Senate I think are worth considering here because they refer to order. Those standing orders state:

> 1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.
> 2. Except so far as is expressly provided, these rules shall in no way restrict the mode in which the Senate may exercise and uphold its powers, privileges and immunities.

Honourable senators, a very restrictive interpretation with respect to parliamentary privilege is indicated in standing order 2. Indeed, to the best of my knowledge, whenever there is any serious consideration of parliamentary privilege, there is a restrictive interpretation, because it is so important for the functioning of a parliamentary institution.

Of course, people will say—and, as a matter of fact, I heard it said yesterday—that irrespective of standing order 1, or the fact that the Rules of the Senate apply in committee, the committee is master of its own fate, that the committee can determine its own procedure, and that by majority vote the committee may do as it pleases. That was the position put forward by the Honourable Senator Frith on behalf of, and with the concurrence of, his colleagues.

With due respect, I do not think that that interpretation is correct. I do not think one can say without any qualification, without any modification, that the committee is master of its own rules, full stop. Surely there are certain principles which cannot be changed by mere majority vote. Surely there are certain principles—like the right to speak within the rules; like the right to impartiality of a presiding member in his or her capacity as a presiding member—that the Senate committee or the Senate itself cannot change just by majority vote.

When it is maintained that the Senate can do what it wishes and can determine its own procedures, that cannot be taken without understanding and qualification, and the major qualification is that certain parliamentary principles cannot be undermined by majority vote. If one does not recognize that, then I think we are all left in absolute political and parliamentary limbo, because whatever legitimacy a committee of the Senate has, it depends upon its nature and function as a parliamentary body as an aspect of the Senate. It has no legitimacy in any other manner, and if it does not act in a parliamentary manner, then it is no longer parliamentary in nature, and then where lies its legitimacy? I am not aware that there would be any.

The enforcement and observance of certain fundamental principles is required in committees of the Senate irrespective of the majority so that the committee does not lose its legitimacy because whatever it would then become it would no longer have parliamentary legitimacy.

● (1440)

Among those characteristics, I would identify the right to speak on motions that are debatable, the right to perform one's parliamentary obligations, and the impartiality, in the sense of the imposition of order, of the Chair.

I want to make a distinction there. We all know that, within the Senate committee, the Chair has views on the substantive matter, on the legislation that, is being considered, on the report being considered, or on the specific substantive issue before the committee for its deliberation. It is recognized without argument that the Chair may say, "I am for it," "I am against it," "I think this, that or the other thing." That is recognized.

The impartiality aspect comes from, if you wish, the dual responsibility of the Chair. However, to the extent that the chairperson of a committee of the Senate is a presiding member, then there is an inherent obligation of a presiding officer to be impartial in that function—not to be impartial in the sense that one cannot have an opinion and vote for one's opinion in terms of the legislation or the report or whatever else, but to be impartial as the presiding member of that committee. When that is lacking, as I maintain it was in this case, then parliamentary privilege is undermined as well.

I do not make this allegation with relish or with pleasure. I served as deputy chairman for a number of months with the present chairman of that committee, and had what I consider an excellent relationship. I recall involvement and consultation with respect to the recommendation that came out of the committee in its report on financial institutions. There was no problem. We did not always agree, but I certainly felt that I had the appropriate involvement.

I do not think that the chairman perhaps wished to or enjoyed acting the way he did, but I really cannot help that. It is not the person; it is the actions and the manner of performaning those duties that in my opinion constitute breaches of privilege.

Another aspect of the absence of parliamentary order in the proceedings of the committee, which is the responsibility of the chairman to maintain, may be indicated when I point out that, on two occasions, members were denied the right to speak on a motion which was debatable, a motion on which they had the right to speak. That is not a privilege; it is a right. That specific motion was what is called "the previous question". Our own standing order 36(3) is very specific on it:

> The previous question refers to a motion "that the original question be now put". Such a motion may be made on a main motion, or on a main motion as amended, but not on a motion for an amendment. When such a motion is put by the Speaker no motion to amend it is in order. It is debatable and senators who have spoken on the main motion or on the main motion as amended may speak again to the previous question but may not move or second it.

I do not think there is any need to continue. I certainly do not wish to quote out of context. However, there is Standing Order 36(3), which says it is debatable.

On two occasions, the Chair refused to allow members to speak on a motion on which they had a right to speak. Indeed, I sent a clear note to the clerk—it is a good thing I had a pen yesterday—saying, "In my opinion, to the best of my knowledge, this is a debatable motion. I think you have a duty, as an officer of Parliament, to inform the Chair." I did not ask him to reply, because communication between the clerk and the Chair is probably privileged, or at least not something one should inquire into. I do not know what happened. I certainly assumed that that responsible person advised the Chair that the motion was debatable. It needed no great parliamentary knowledge on my part, or on his, to read the standing orders.

There was another instance as well—one may regard it as minor—whereby the Chair permitted a motion to be withdrawn without unanimous consent. Again, I would refer to our standing order 23, without referring to the quotations from Beauchesne:

> A senator who has made a motion or presented an inquiry may withdraw or modify the same by leave of the Senate.

The final matter I wish to refer to is the refusal by the Chair to entertain a motion that certain events that had occurred in the committee might constitute a breach of privilege or contempt and that the matter should be reported. On this matter, I would refer, to any who may be interested, to Parliamentary Privilege in Canada by Joseph Maingot, Q.C., page 189, under the heading "Privilege Arising in Committee". I have no doubt that this was written for the House of Commons and is only applicable to the House of Commons. There is no reference whatsoever to the Senate—no reference to anything except the House of Commons.

I would point out to honourable senators that while certain procedural rules, such as time allocations and how various committees are constituted, change from one parliamentary body to another, there is a certain body of parliamentary law and custom which is inherent and intrinsic to a parliamentary institution by its very nature, whether it be a legislature in a province, the House of Commons, the Senate or any parliamentary institution that recognizes the general principles which have developed from the Westminster system, not that they are necessarily identical. I would therefore say that this is relevant:

> Accordingly, a committee may not commit a person for contempt or breach of privilege. Nevertheless, it may report to the House that in its opinion a breach of privilege or contempt has occurred and ask the House to > take action. Therefore, while the chairman cannot entertain questions of privilege in the sense that he is not competent to rule on whether a prima facie case has occurred, as the Speaker may do, the chairman of a committee may entertain a motion that certain events that occurred in the committee may constitute a breach of privilege or contempt and that the matter be reported to the House.

Obviously, the operative word is "may" because it depends on whether the conditions are fulfilled or not. However, I would submit that the privilege of members was undermined because the chairman of the committee would not permit such a motion or debate on such matters of privilege.

I have endeavoured to outline, in some detail, the aspects of privilege which I believe were infringed upon yesterday.

● (1450)

In conclusion, I look forward to the contribution of other members. Obviously anyone can say what he or she wants to, but I hope we do not try to hang our senatorial hats on that fallacious, misleading and dangerous principle that the committees of the Senate alone are responsible for their procedures and may do what they wish. If a Senate committee is alone responsible for its procedures, then it becomes omnipotent and may overlook the most basic rights of parliamentary institutions: the right to speak on a debatable motion when it is in order, the right to impartiality from the Chair and the right to have one's privileges respected. If that is the case, such a committee has no legitimacy and has lost its parliamentary nature. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Speaking to the point of privilege, it would be more economical in time if I listened to the various points and then made my intervention. If it turns out that an intervention is substantially different and is a question of privilege not relating to a committee, I would like to have the opportunity of making an observation at that point; otherwise, I would prefer to hear all of the remarks and then make an intervention.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Why was it necessary to tell us that?

Senator Frith: I made that statement so that I would not be told later that my intention was not timely.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: As we get together after a few months of absence, honourable senators, I believe it is impossible not to draw the attention of this chamber to the behaviour and the image honourable senators give our fellow citizens across the country.

We have been talking about Senate reform for quite some time. I share the view that the basic reform of this institution must be the initiative of its members, through their exemplary conduct, because one after another we have been praising ourselves. The fact that we have assumed this responsibility freely without being compelled by procedural rules will prompt our fellow citizens to renew their confidence in ourselves, and in turn we will deserve it.

I should like to echo the words of Senator Ottenheimer, not only to point to some of the weaknesses I have seen but above all so that we be aware of them in our future deliberations, particularly in committees, because they are standing committees which in many instances irreversibly commit the state of the nation and the country's most important laws.

In spite of a recent experience, I had the opportunity to get better acquainted with many of you, particularly during our travels across this country to hear evidence on the GST. As far as our fellow Canadians are concerned we can still promote understanding and unity, and it is up to us to achieve that on a collective basis.

We went from Newfoundland to the Yukon, and everywhere each of us could have positive exchanges in spite of often seriously diverging views. When time comes to make a point and establish a link it is sometimes difficult to work in perfect harmony.

I give as an example the fact the Senate wanted the committees to have a striking committee made up of members from both sides of this chamber, of course with the majority being represented as such on committees. On a number of occasions, as a striking committee we were able to sit down, have exchanges, work out compromises and find solutions which were not necessarily endorsed by all but which we had to accept on the basis of democratic principles.

These rules may have fallen by the side in the recent past when it became quite clear that we were dealing with a highly controversial issue and that each of us entertained altogetheer different options.

For instance I can still recall September 17 when modern communication techniques enabled us to hold conference calls. Of course they have to be well organized! One day the chairman of our committee, accompanied by our clerk, got in touch with me without having told anything about it to the third member of our committee.

When we could not agree with a decision of the chairman to assume full authority I was unable to make my point with this third member, listen to his opinions as I should, exchange views with him and perhaps reach a compromise.

I believe that in the circumstances, on the spur of the moment and without serious consideration, we forget what democracy means and that, in addition, these are not regular meetings which can be considered as involving the responsibility of the committee.

I believe we were not treated fairly and that we were misled, one way or the another. There were several instances, including the time when the committee's research officer, who had been hired by the Steering Committee, was appropriated by the chairman who denied us access to material prepared by the research officer, which I would qualify as abuse of authority, to say the least.

This brings us to yesterday's meeting, on September 24 at 1.30 p.m. The timing was supposed to allow for both official versions to be distributed simultaneously. They were not, however, which greatly inconvenienced those who received them too late, including myself. That is why we had so little time to prepare for a vote on a text we had never seen before.

Although some opposition members mentioned their ability to read so many pages per minute, we could hardly be expected to absorb all this information in just one hour, even if someone endowed with superior intelligence is able to read and absorb and understand a text, compare summaries of the testimony with the original proceedings and compare the transcript. God knows it isn't easy, since even Senator Frith had trouble producing an acceptable translation of the original text of the motion he proposed yesterday afternoon.

That is why we feel we were misled about how the committee would proceed. I would like to get back to this later on, and ask the Speaker to give this some consideration. The important thing is to have proper legislation, to make decisions on the basis of all the competence and skills we can muster so that we can introduce legislation commensurate with our obligations.

I therefore feel bound to support what was said by Senator Ottenheimer and insist that on all committees, procedures be such that our credibility as senators, as the Senate of Canada, is enhanced and recognized by all Canadians. In this way, legislators, whoever they happen to be, will be respected to a greater degree and our laws will also command greater respect.

[English]

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, pertaining particularly to a question of privilege regarding the breaking of confidentiality. I could have risen on many other questions of privilege after yesterday's committee meeting. However, I will leave that to others.

As most honourable senators know, this summer was a busy one. Those of us who participated in some of the hearings across the country were most anxious, from time to time to ascertain the stage reached in connection with the draft report to see how it was progressing. In asking Senator Poitras, our Deputy Chairman, about this, we found that he did not have the information.

Honourable senators, I want to read a couple of letters into the record. When I say that my privilege has also been violated. I mean to say that the privilege of others has been violated, as well. Relative to the problem of getting information from the Chairman on the progress of the draft report, I can only tell senators that it was extremely difficult for Senator Poitras. He wrote to the chairman of the committee on September 19 as follows:

> Dear Colleague:
> This is to recall to your attention the telephone conversation which you initiated with me last Monday, September 17, during which you indicated over my objections that you were, on your own initiative, construing our conversation to be a meeting of the steering committee. You also indicated that you had not been able to reach Senator Kirby, the third member of the steering committee.
> You informed me that because of "delays in translation" it would not be possible for the committee to have before it the draft report which the committee staff had prepared. You will recall that I requested a copy of the document in its present text, without translation. You refused to provide this to me. In addition, over my objection, you informed me that you were cancelling the meeting scheduled for today, September 19. How a decision to cancel the meeting could be made by you, unilaterally, over my objection, I am unable to understand. You know that I have tried to assist you in every way possible during the committee's work. I am very disappointed and hurt by your action.
> I ask you again to forward to me a copy of the material on the draft report which has been prepared by the staff of the committee for Bill C-62. I am certain you will agree that courtesy and fair play necessitates the sharing of the committee's property and staff resources with those committee members who request access to this material.

On September 19 Senator Buckwold responded to the Deputy Chairman, and I shall read his letter or parts thereof to honourable senators:

> Dear Senator Poitras:
> I have your letter which was transmitted by Fax to me in Saskatoon.
> I would like to clarify the following points:
> 1. The reason for the delay was the inability of the Committee to have the report translated in time for the Wednesday meeting.
> 2. The Clerk of the Committee, Mr. Wilson, advised me on Monday, September 17th that the first draft could not be translated in time for the meeting on the 19th. According to the Official Languages policy of the Senate, both languages have equal status. This is a policy which you have drawn to the attention of the Committee all through the hearings.

Honourable senators, I will not read the rest of that letter. These letters were exchanged on September 19. Can you imagine my interest when, reading in the Toronto Star of September 22, I noticed such things as this:

> In a report to be released Tuesday, the Senate banking committee will recommend the tax bill be delayed until all provinces agree to merge their sales tax with the 7 per cent federal levy, Senate sources say.

The article went on to state:

> Other recommendations in the report that may also delay the government bill include:
> Giving non-profit organizations more generous rebates from the goods and services tax.
> Simplifying the sales-tax credit accounting system for families earning less than $30,000 a year.

Exempting psychologists' health-care services to put them on the same basis as doctors.

Streamlining and simplifying some of the complex accounting procedures for small- and medium-sized businesses.

The press report continues. Well, on reading it, honourable senators, I thought "that really cannot be". Senator Buckwold would not divulge information on the report of the committee before it was given to the committee and to the Senate. Honourable senators, can you imagine my surprise when, on receiving this report late yesterday morning—approximately 300 pages that we were supposed to have read before 1:30 in the afternoon—I saw that it was marked "confidential until presented in the Senate".

I did not have time to read it. I am not a fast reader.

Senator Perrault: You sure aren't!

Senator Robertson: No, I am not a fast reader.

Senator Perrault: That's what you said yesterday. You should have had this read by now.

Senator Robertson: Oh, no, some of us do other things as well, senator.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, what is going on? It seems to me the discourtesy manifested by this press account is only a continuation of the partisanship which the chairman has exhibited during our hearings. But, more importantly, the chairman has breached the privileges of honourable senators on the committee and in the Senate as a whole. I find this action very offensive. I believe it is a prima facia case of abuse of my privileges and of the privileges of other members of the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I shall await your decision in this matter.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I also wish to rise on a question of privilege and a point of order, especially under Standing Order 80 which deals with these issues. If I understand correctly, the committee appointed by this House and presided by Senator Buckwold had the mandate to make a thourough examination of this Bill, to hear testimony and to make the necessary expenses to afford the members from both sides of this House, and not only the senators on the committee an opportunity to peruse the briefs, summaries, testimonies and other documents.

That is what we devoted ourselves to, on this side, for five or six weeks starting in July, at a cost of nearly one million dollars, aside from the sittings held in June. That is to say that serious work was done. The Liberal majority, their president and leader have told us so.

I think those who testified or otherwise took part in the proceedings, even the press, who have been in contact with the senators on the committe throughout this Pan-Canadian journey, soon realized that is was pandamonium, and they would probably have come to the same conclusion as Senator Buckwold did.

I will not be chauvinistic to the point of listing all that was said, all the blunders and all the partisanship shown by the Chairman of the Banking Committee. For the time being, there are three points I should like to make.

First of all, the French version of the document which was given to us on the 24th and which had been promised for September 10th, as evidenced by the stenographic, yet understandable, notes of the Clerk of the Committee, Mr. Timothy Wilson, which mention a meeting which was held on August 27th by the Steering Committee and which was attended by Senators Buckwold, Kirby and Poitras.

I suggest that this explains in part the deadlock which should be broken over the next few days. All Canadians are wondering how we could come to that. On September the 25th, a few hours before the tabling of a report based on a study which was made by the committee members on the 24th on two-hours notice and during a meeting which lasted 5 or 6 hours. My first point is this: the French and English versions which were promised to us for the 10th, according to Mr. Wilson's notes arrived on the 24th: the English version at 10.45 a.m. and the French version at 11.45 a.m., after a sitting of a committee had been announced and notices of convocation had been sent out for September 24 at 1.30 p.m. I suggest this is going a little bit too far. The particular point I want to make is that, as a Francophone senator, I did not have two hours and a half, as my Anglophone colleagues did, to look through this report diagonally, let alone digest and analyze it, and to draw my own conclusions. I suggest that, as a Francophone senator, and according to tradition and convention, the so-called parliamentary customs and usage, my privileges as a Francophone senator were infringed upon.

Also on this point, I give notice that I am prepared to move—I would not want my honourable colleagues opposite to die of curiosity—a motion calling for my question of privilege to be heard by the Committee on Privileges and Election. This will come at the proper time.

Secondly, my colleagues based their case on what they considered to be a question of privilege. I will follow in their footsteps. A question of privilege is a personal matter. I do want to raise it and I intend to move a motion, which will include the three points that I intended to mention.

We have documents signed by the Chairman, Senator Buckwold, in response to a letter that was sent to him by Senator Poitras, vice-chairman of the committee representing the minority in the Senate. These documents state that the clerk was not allowed to give any information or document to anybody from then on, that is from mid-August, not even to Senator Poitras, our only member on the steering committee. I have great confidence in the professionalism of the clerk and his assistants. I thought that, as is customary in order to protect the privileges of all senators, we would be the first, as member of the committee, to get a copy of the draft or the report.

You can imagine my surprise when I read in the Toronto Star dated September 22 long excerpts detailing several options as well as several possible amendments to Bill C-62. So if the clerk did not provide them with these exerpts, and if no one else got copies, who is the culprit? I have to believe chairman Buckwold when he says he directed the drafting process himself and had a copy of the document at the time. I remind you that, contrary to what was promised, we did not receive copies neither on the 10th, the 17th nor the 19th.

And since we found on Monday, September 24, excerpts in the Toronto Star and the Citizen stating possible amendments, for all these cosiderations, I think chairman Buckwold did reveal, undoubtedly by mistake or by accident, the excepts of the report, and that is why I rise today on a point of privilege. I will ask Senator Buckwold to explain his behaviour in due course.

Citation 647, on page 203 of the fifth edition of the Beauchesne, that deals with the premature divulgation of a report reads as follows:

> No act done at any committee should be divulged before it has been reported to the House.

Honourable senators, one could claim that the rules I just referred to, or the citation I just quoted, apply to committees of the House, of this House where we sit today, but let me remind you that, according to citation 75, on page 23, of the same book:

> Many of the privileges of the House extend also to its committees.

So I think these same rules should also apply to committees. Yesterday, Senator Frith gave us his interpretation of the legal opinions we received. I for one still prefer the interpretations of our own legal advisors, who are paid to give us their opinions. Also yesterday, in committee, it was only after half an hour, 45 minutes, if not two hours of discussion that we were allowed to hear from Mr. Duplessis's assistant, who came to explain some aspects of the question. But even then, he had to fight to make himself heard, because Senator Frith has got into the habit of providing Senator Buckwold with his own interpretation.

Finally, after one hour or one hour and a half, we were given some explanations by Mr. DuPlessis' assistant, but as far as I am concerned, they were insufficient. So, I count on the officers of this House to clarify the matter for the Speaker of our House. I understand that the Members of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections will have to decide on the substance of the matter. Honorable senators, I want to take the first opportunity to register my intention to raise that question of privilege and to enquire about all the aspects of the work of the committee.

Of course, there will be other points to raise. Suffice for me to express my support to the statements of honorable senators Ottenheimer and Poitras. It may very well be that the exact words said then will never be known because the liberal majority on the committee decided that there would be report on the 24th of September. They made sure that there would be no record of the dirty work of the liberal majority for future generations. Nonetheless, we heard enough evidence this afternoon to establish that the chairman never gave the floor to the honourable senators every time they wanted to express their views.

I repeat that I will be in a position to move a motion when The Speaker gives us his ruling on my question of privilege. I am in no hurry. In fact, I think that the matter is serious enough (the bill itself and all the questions of privilege raised this afternoon) for the Speaker to take all the time needed to ensure that we are on the right track, that is to say that we respect the Standing Orders, so that Bill C-62 is adopted and comes into effect on January 1st 1991. Thank you honourable senators.

Hon. Paul David: Mr. Speaker, honourable senators, I support the comments made by other senators before me. I think that yesterday afternoon was a very dark moment in the history of the Senate, at least in the five years I have been here.

Honourable senators, there was a breach of privilege, a limitation of freedom, and a serious attack against democracy. I am a member of the Committee of Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have had the honour of hearing many witnesses since June. I have had the pleasure and honour to visit a few more places in some Canadian cities, including hotels in Montreal, Toronto, Edmonton and Yellowknife. I have had the pleasure of coming back to Ottawa for one week of hearings in August.

The fact that there were so many witnesses and briefs—I think there were 280 witnesses, led me to believe the report of the committee would be voluminous.

It was indeed voluminous, since it had, from a quick check, about 318 pages. Short of spontaneously transforming himself into a computer, how could a human being, the best educated senator you could find, analyze, understand and reflect upon such an enormous document of which the French version became available yesterday around noon?

A senator opposite said that an average person reads 80 pages in an hour. I am a slow reader. He forgot to make the calculation because if that figure is correct, even at that speed, it would take four hours to read such a thick document. The report was all the more important considering the first part, 198 pages long, I believe, was a summary of all the evidence heard, divided in various categories. Having heard much of that evidence, I would have liked to see how our research assistants had summarized it. We did not get that opportunity.

The rest of the report was divided into four options. Those that did not entail amendments were relatively short and easy to understand for those who had the patience and the privilege of having read the bill.

The second option called for an amended bill. We still had to read each of the amendments proposed or likely to be proposed, I do not really know which, to check whether they were acceptable to us personally and consult with our colleages and particularly our party caucus to see if they would be acceptable to them.

The third option was to defer consideration of the bill for one year. There were supportive arguments that still had to be examined.

Finally, the fourth option was to refuse to pass this bill.

There was in my opinion another serious breach to our rights. While the committee meeting was scheduled for 1.30 p.m., it was delayed till 2 or 2.15 and we had to make a final determination about the entire document by 7 p.m. the same day. Thus, from the beginning, without even having had a chance to consider the document, to read it or discuss it, we had an inescapable deadline. We had to act within six hours.

This is something that I have never witnessed before in a committee, particularly when we had to deal with such an important report that was submitted to us in such an off-handed manner. This is surely contrary to the principles of wisdom, of reasonableness and of maturity that I was told were typical of this Chamber.

I would not say that they are not, honourable senators. However, if these senatorial principles do exist. I can assure you they were totally violated and trampled upon yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, it is from that point of view, I believe, that the issue you must consider is very serious. It is a matter of determining if the way the Committee acted yesterday is compatible with the sensible tradition of the Upper House, in a supposedly democratic country.

Moreover, the motion which had been submitted by senator Frith between two and two-fifteen o'clock had suddenly been replaced around six, but the ultimatum was maintained: everything had to be ready within an hour. This second motion was to the effect that our house totally reject the bill in question.

I think that this provided us a very sad and very unfortunate example, which affected me a lot and which is still troubling me today. That is why I will allow myself, for once, to be brief while sharing, with my soul and my reason, the profound deception I felt in the course of this afternoon, which has been, I repeat, the worse, the least digestible and the least honorable that I have had to live in this house.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Efstathios Barootes: Honourable senators, I must bring to your attention my complaint of an infringement of privilege in the Senate and its committee by referring first to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, which has been read to you, concerning our responsibility to give due and sufficient consideration to matters that are brought before us as committee members and as senators.

Secondly, in looking at another famous authority, namely Beauchesne—and I quote his epistle—

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Who?

Senator Barootes: Beauchesne, which you people quoted at some length. The great authority stands here. He is a Beauchesne expert.

In paragraph 16, page 11, he states that:

[Senator David.]

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament,—

And this is the important part. He goes on to say:

> —and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions—

He goes on to say:

> They are enjoyed by individual Members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of services of its Members—-

I searched through this portion of "Extensions of Privilege" and found other quotations in the section. Concerning "extensions of privilege" to the committee, paragraph 75 on page 23, says: "Many of the privileges of the House extend also to its committees."

My observation in rising on a question of privilege is that as a senator of this chamber, and as a member of the committee who attended many of its meetings and heard much of its testimony, I feel that my privileges have been violated, abused and abrogated.

Senator Perrault: Oh!

Senator Olson: That is pretty serious!

Senator Barootes: Do I hear approbation or assent from the other side?

Senator Frith: Laughter is what you heard, sir!

Senator Barootes: I feel that I have been denied adequate and sufficient time to consider and study a report upon which limitations have been placed upon my consideration of it by arbitrary decisions, actions, fiats or orders of our chairman. This has been verified to you, as senators, by several quotations of letters exchanged between Senator Poitras and Senator Buckwold; by the responses to other letters from members of the staff of the committee, the research workers and the clerk; and from conversations which Senator Poitras has revealed he had with our esteemed chairman.

It appears to me—and I think that it has been documented—that this report came to our attention in physical form at 10.30 a.m. yesterday and we gathered together to try to draw some conclusions on what was before us.

Senator Hastings: Are you a member of this committee, or were you a member of the committee?

Senator Barootes: For many, many days and many, many meetings.

Senator Hastings: But yesterday?

Senator Barootes: I was there yesterday.

Senator Hastings: Were you a member of the committee yesterday?

Senator Barootes: Are you trying to suggest, senator, that I had no right to attend the committee meeting yesterday?

Senator Hastings: I am suggesting that you were not a member of the committee yesterday—all day yesterday!

Senator Barootes: I sat on that committee and I have every right to be there. I should like to ask you how many meetings of the committee you attended. I will tell you how many—

Senator Hastings: I attended 39!

Senator Barootes: —two!

Senator Olson: Every one!

Senator Barootes: Nonsense! I even had to help him on the airplane to get him up to Yellowknife.

Senator Perrault: You can tell your filibusters!

(1540)

Senator Frith: Dr. David, a stethoscope might be in order.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, with your permission, I should like to carry on.

We received the French translation at approximately 12 noon. Many members of the committee who have attended meetings are from Quebec, and their first language is French. An average senator can barely carry this document to the office, much less read it in that time frame.

Senator Perrault: You have not even read it yet.

Senator Barootes: I have read a great deal of it. What I have read has given me nothing but nausea, I might add.

Senator Perrault: There is not even a crease in the pages. It is a brand new document.

Senator Barootes: I needed help to carry this over here. I am expected to read this in one hour, while I have my lunch, and return with an opinion. It is not enough to look at the 300 pages and attempt to read them. When one reads the material that appears here—and I believe my learned friend from British Columbia has not bothered to read it—one finds that there are no annotated credits and no references as to where the evidence was given. One has to go back to the thousands of pages of transcript in order to check the first 193 pages, and some of the alternatives, to ensure that this was indeed the testimony which the senators heard, and to determine if any portion of the interrogation of the witnesses who appeared before us appears in here. Indeed, it does not.

I give credit to our chairman and the people who prepared this monumental report, because a lot of work has gone into it. Much work has been put into this report to find the selective portions of quotations that meet the needs of the chairman.

Senator Perrault: That is not fair, and you know it.

Senator Barootes: It may be unfair, but it is also true. May I proceed?

Senator Perrault: You are distorting the facts. I do not give you permission to proceed.

Senator Barootes: I do not see any of the testimony given under questioning from those people, only selected pieces of information which suited the people who performed this task. I wanted to do a comparison with the thousands of pages of testimony, but there is not much time in one hour and a half hours to do that.

Senator Olson: You had more time than that.

Senator Barootes: All of this could have been ameliorated, or at least forgiven or understood, if, as is usual in other committees of the Senate, the senators who are members of the committee, particularly the minority members on this side, had had an opportunity to participate in the preparation of this tome. However, we did not. We had not one bit of input. When we asked to have participation, it was denied; it was denied in an arbitrary and autocratic manner by a very fine gentleman friend of mine. That has disappointed me greatly.

Whether it is a matter of legislation or of a study, we have sat hour after hour going over these reports to ensure that what we are producing at least represents a consensus of what we believe from our studies. We have listened to 347 witnesses. Surely we should have had an opportunity to see which little synopses had been extracted and put in here.

Senator Perrault: They are all there.

Senator Barootes: This is a custom that we have enjoyed in all committees in the past. If we disagree at the end, under the customs of this chamber we are not allowed to put in a dissenting report. We are allowed to say that some senators disagreed or the majority or minority disagreed. That is all we are allowed to do. We cannot bring in an opposing position. We did not even have time to read the report, much less prepare an alternative position before we came to this chamber today.

Senator Olson: What were you doing since the end of August?

Senator Barootes: As a committee, we did not see this report; the steering committee did not see this report. None of us in the committee can ascribe parenthood to this report. This is not a report of the committee, honourable senators. This is the Buckwold brief. That is what it really is. It is his last act of condemnation upon this house to present this tome to us and not give us an opportunity to discuss it either before, during or after. We still have not discussed this report in committee. I cannot think of an abuse of parliamentary procedure and parliamentary prerogative of this nature in this chamber in the past. If any of you can, please stand up and correct me.

Even the Czar of Russia gave an opportunity to the Duma to discuss some aspects of matters before them.

Senator Perrault: Get off it!

Senator Barootes: In British parliamentary history, the last person that denied this kind of opportunity was Charles I. Perhaps some of you remember what happened to him.

Senator Frith: That was before my time, I am afraid.

Senator Barootes: This is the kind of despotic and autocratic behaviour of the chairman that has upset me. I have known him for many years and have found him in the past to be such a gracious and helpful friend.

I am particularly grieved that this has been done in this manner. As I watched the committee meeting yesterday, it reminded me of the metaphor of watching trained seals perform, especially when their trainer comes out. The trainer did appear yesterday, and he put them through their hoops. He made sure that the chairman understood what was to be done and ensured that it was done forthwith. These are the things that have troubled me after spending so many hundreds of hours attending meetings, studying reports of this committee and finding this to be the result.

Erskine-May says that a question of privilege can only be decided by this chamber. However, in line with the suggestions made by other speakers, and in view of the various implications, I too should like to have my question of privilege brought to the attention of the Chair. If the speaker finds that the facts that have been supplied here today form a prima facie case of privilege, then I shall ask that the matter be referred to the Rules and Orders Committee of this hallowed chamber. I thank honourable senators for their kind attention and for their response.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, having signified that I would like to participate, however briefly, in this debate, I will take advantage of the opportunity to say a few words on the privileges of the Senate and of the members and on the way in which those privileges were, I feel, abridged yesterday. Senator Ottenheimer pointed out, quite properly, that very often when the privileges of one senator are violated, then the privileges of many who are in the same situation are also affected. In this particular case, that is especially true since all of us who attended the meeting yesterday found it to be an outstanding example of the tyranny of the majority.

Senator Cools: Oh boy!

Senator Doody: We were given no opportunity to participate in the preparation of that report. There were opportunities to participate in the deliberations of the committee as it arrived at its conclusion five hours after the meeting began, but they were limited from the beginning.

Honourable senators, there are a number of clear violations, which I hope His Honour will consider in due time and report upon, not the least of which is the conduct of the chairman with regard to the operation of the committee itself. To my knowledge, this is the first time, at least since I have been here, that a committee chairman has directed exclusively the operations of the committee staff. It has been pointed out by many of my colleagues over the past little while that access to the staff, access to the information that was being garnered, and access to the compilation of the report itself was denied by direct orders of the chairman. That is in complete violation of the traditions and history of this place. All of us who have participated in committee work as chairmen—and I had the honour to do so for a little while—or as deputy chairmen or as members will know that the steering committee—and, indeed, the committee itself—participates to a very large degree in the formulation and final production of the report—that the staff works for the committee. The Senate votes the budget of the committee and the committee directs the staff. The Senate does not supply funds to the chairman to go off on his personal hobbyhorse to do his own thing in his own way in his own time and at his own direction.

However much we might honour, respect and delight in the company of the honourable gentleman—and I am one of those who has—we cannot help but call to the attention of the Senate this flagrant abuse of the position of chairman as demonstrated by my friend. The absolute refusal, in writing, to allow the deputy chairman access to the staff, or the staff access to him, is unbelievable but for the fact that it is documented.

I submit that this situation has to be reviewed and ruled upon for the future direction of the committees of this place. If it is going to be a series of one-man operations, then so be it. We will save the taxpayers money if we assign a study, bill, motion, inquiry or whatever to a particular senator, give him some money and tell him to hire staff and to report back at his leisure. If we are going in that direction, then obviously a change to the rules is required and a reference to that effect should be made to the rules committee. However, to my knowledge, that is not the case at the present time. Right now the rules refer clearly to the committee, to which the subject matter, bill or whatever has been referred, reporting back to the Senate, and so on. That is not what has happened in this case.

In this case the document to be reported to the Senate is the sole vehicle of the chairman of the committee. As has been pointed out by other colleagues present, at around 10.30 a.m. yesterday morning the anglophone members of the committee received copies of the report. Our francophone colleagues received their copies several hours later. The report, as I saw it at the time, contained 172 pages of preamble which, I was told, contained a description and analysis by the staff to justify the recommendations in the report.

The recommendations in the report consisted of four sections, each offering a different alternative. The first section suggested that we should pass the bill without amendment but with recommendations and suggestions—and they were written in—on how the committee chairman felt the government could improve the bill. The second section consisted of a series of amendments which the chairman thought we could present to the Senate to be attached to the bill, which would be sent to the House of Commons. The third section of the report consisted of a justification for a one year's delay in implementing the bill. The fourth section consisted of a recommendation to reject the bill.

The first thing I did upon receiving this report was to look at the recommendations at the back. There was only one recommendation, namely, to reject the bill. I had no idea that there were four sections. It was not pointed out to us, and we had no way of knowing it as we were not privy to the report prior to its delivery. Several hours laterI was fortunate enough to have pointed out to me by a colleague from the other side that there was not just one alternative but four, and that the committee would eventually decide which of the four it would accept. So the committee met yesterday afternoon, about two hours after we had been given the report.

The first indication of what was ahead of us came with the introduction of a motion by my friend opposite, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, who proposed a time allocation and suggested that it was imperative that the report be presented to the Senate by September 25, today, and that in order to facilitate that goal we would be forced to complete the bill by 7 o'clock that evening. That occurred at about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and we were to finish at 7 o'clock. The mechanical parts—the printing, translation, distribution and so on—was to be done in time for the sitting today. So we were placed in a rather, I will not say unusual but unique position of devoting more time to the printing and distribution or the mechanics of the report than to analyzing, considering and weighing the four proposed alternatives. In point of fact, we never did get around to looking at any of the alternatives, because as the afternoon progressed, or should I say deteriorated, violation after violation of the rights and privileges of the members of the committee was committed. The rules of the Senate were discarded and thrown out the window. We were asked to operate on the principle that the Senate committee is the master of its own rules and that we would make up our rules and procedures as we went along.

Senator Perrault: That is ridiculous!

Senator Doody: As a result, in my estimation a whole series of violations occurred, and I would ask honourable senators to consider them. The chairman refused point blank on many occasions to entertain legitimate points of order. He indicated that he had enough points of order and that he was not interested in raising any more. He point blank refused to hear senators who were members of the committee in all but voting privileges.

● (1600)

Senator Perrault: Garbage.

Senator Doody: If it would help, I could mention the names of the senators who were denied the right to speak, but I do not think that would help at this point. I think we have done enough damage.

There was also the chairman's unilateral alteration of the question before the committee by accepting a withdrawal of a motion without the consent of the committee. Honourable senators, this is unheard of. As I said at the outset, the deputy leader presented a motion for time allocation—in effect, a deadline for presentation. Later on in the afternoon he calmly announced that he was going to withdraw that motion and substitute a second motion which, in effect, was for the adoption of the fourth alternative which we had not opened up to that point. He indicated it was the wish of the majority of the members of the committee that section four be the alternative that should be presented to the Senate today, and it was carried by the seven members opposite. Points of order were raised pointing out to the chairman that this was completely out of order—that there was no way that a senator could withdraw a motion he had already presented and substitute another without the unanimous consent of the committee. That is an accepted axiom.

I would refer honourable senators to Rule No. 443 of Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, which says:

> (1) The Member who has proposed a motion may withdraw it only with the unanimous consent of the House.
> (2) An amendment may be withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the House, but neither a motion nor an amendment can be withdrawn in the absence of the Member who moved it.

Honourable senators will note that I was stressing the word "House." Honourable senators, Rule 77(7) of our standing orders quite explicitly states:

> Except as provided in these rules, a select committee shall not, without the approval of the Senate, adopt any special procedure or practice that is inconsistent with the practices and usages of the Senate itself.

Nothing could be clearer, honourable senators. The practices and usages of the House are set forth very clearly in Beauchesne and an honourable member may not withdraw a motion without unanimous consent. Our own standing rules state quite emphatically that a select committee shall not, without the approval of the Senate, adopt any special procedure or practice without the consent of the House. It is as clear as it could possibly be.

Honourable senators, this was pointed out in committee to the chairman. He completely ignored it and carried on as though the situation was an accepted and ordinary one.

The deputy leader once again pointed out that the majority wanted it this way, that the majority ruled the committee, and that the committee was master of its own procedures. If that is not an invitation for tyranny and disaster in the committee system of this place, then I do not know what possibly could be.

I submit, honourable senators, that this is a subject that has to be looked at not only in this context in this particular instance but for future reference, because if that procedure is to be followed in committees in future, then, as I said earlier, the committee system is useless and we should appoint individual senators to do their own thing with public funds in terms of reporting bills and so on.

Honourable senators, there were a number of other unbelievable occurrences in the committee yesterday. We were absolutely refused the right to compare the English and French versions. Earlier I described the timeframe within which these things arrived. Many members of the committee said that it was an impossible situation in that they had not had an opportunity to compare the texts. They did not know whether they were completely accurate or whether they coincided exactly. Honourable senators, we are talking about a 300-page document. We were assured that that was incidental, that we should not worry about that, that it would all be looked after.

The irony of it all was that while this discussion was going on Senator Frith was trying to have his motion translated from English to French and it took the combined efforts of the committee a full ten minutes to prepare this five- or six-line motion in both official languages. There was an unbelievable exhibition of autocracy at its worst.

Honourable senators, there was also the failure of the chairman to put questions to the committee after motions had been moved, including the motion that the draft report be read. Requests were absolutely refused. When it was stated that we wanted to examine the report, we were told "No."

Honourable senators, I directly asked that the committee turn its attention to a clause-by-clause examination of the bill. Is that an unreasonable request of a committee charged with examining an important piece of government legislation? On page 230 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition it says:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable.

This is not only a quotation from Beauchesne, honourable senators, this is a quotation by the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on May 15, 1990 when, in response to a question by Senator Simard about the timeframe of the reporting of this bill, Senator Buckwold very properly pointed out that it was the function of the committee to examine the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word. I raised that point in committee yesterday, honourable senators, and the answer I received was "No." When I asked why, I was told that sometimes the committee does it and sometimes the committee does not do it. Apparently yesterday was one of the days when the committee does not do it, even though this is one of the most complicated and far-reaching pieces of legislation that this august chamber has been asked to deal with since my appointment to this chamber.

Honourable senators, the list of grievances, of violations, and of infringements on the rights and privileges of senators yesterday constituted an unbelievable exhibition. On one occasion we were asked to rule on the previous question, which was a debatable motion and accepted as such. The honourable chairman ruled that it was not a debatable motion and refused to allow debate.

Senator Simard: On the instruction of Senator Frith, of course.

Senator Doody: We asked the law clerk for an opinion. There was no need for an opinion because we all knew what the answer would be. It is a debatable motion. The same question was raised later on and the same ruling was made. The ruling was that there would be no debate, that it was not a debatable motion. This time the law clerk's opinion was not allowed to be received.

Honourable senators, I have never seen an exhibition quite like the one I saw yesterday. The absence of order and decorum in the place, as Senator Ottenheimer has stated, has never before been seen to such a degree in the 11 years I have been here. Decorum is one thing—the chairman cannot be expected to be accountable for the decorum of honourable senators—but the order of the committee is something else. Respect for parliamentary procedures rules, rights and privileges of the Senate and of the senators is the responsibility of the chairman. If the minority group in a committee, or the individual senators on the committee, cannot look to the chairman for protection in a situation like that, then I submit that their privileges are indeed breached.

• (1610)

It appears the day has come when, autocratically, unilaterally and without consultation or consideration, a chairman can say, "We are right; you, I will not listen to. We have made up our minds. This is the end product of this thing. You have until 7 o'clock to do it. You might as well do it gracefully because we are going to do it anyway." That is exactly what happened.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, this was a flawed process.

Senator Lucier: This sounds like Meech Lake.

Senator Doody: This is a process that is a shame and a disgrace to the Senate. It is an exhibition that I would not want to see repeated, if we could possibly avoid it. I submit that His Honour will have to examine this very carefully to ensure that recommendations are brought forward to avoid its happening again.

Honourable senators, I wish to say that, in the event that a prima facie case is made on a breach of privilege of honourable senators, I will be prepared to bring forward the appropriate motion at the appropriate time. I do not know how we can ignore this particular set of occurrences. I do not know how we can tolerate the kind of conduct that we saw yesterday. I submit that, if we ignore it and let it slide, then this place will be the worse for it and honourable senators will never be honoured the protection of the Chair which they really, truthfully and honestly deserve. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Your Honour and honourable senators, I do not believe that Your Honour should have much difficulty with these points of privilege for the following reasons. Each of the honourable senators dealt with the proceedings in the committee, said that their privileges had been breached in the committee, and raised their points of privilege here in the house on events that took place in the committee.

Senator Ottenheimer did that; Senator Poitras referred to proceedings in the committee; Senator Robertson referred to proceedings in the committee—each of them complaining about the proceedings in the committee and saying that they had a point of privilege to raise in the house. Senator Simard, the same, talking about the committee proceedings; Senator David, the same; Senator Barootes, the same; Senator Doody, the same—all discussing events that took place in the committee hearings that they felt gave rise to a point of privilege here in the chamber.

It seems to me very clear that there is no point of privilege to be raised on such matters in the chamber, prima facie or otherwise.

Bourinot, Fourth Edition, page 474, states:

> Until a committee report, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in the house.

Beauchesne, Fifth Edition, page 196, citation 607, says:

> (1) All decisions of the Chairman may be appealed to the committee.

Which is what happened.

> (2) There is no appeal to the House from the Chairman's ruling except by way of a report from the committee.

The report is not yet before the house.

Senator Barootes: Do you want us to repeat it then?

Senator Frith: Citation 608:

> Procedural difficulties which arise in committees ought to be settled in the committee and not in the House.

And there is a reference to Debates from April 6, 1976, page 12507. Standing committees are and must remain the masters of their own procedure.

For many years in this house, the Chair—Your Honour—has refrained from sitting in appeal on procedural decisions taken by standing committees. Those are the principles that apply and the principles that clearly justify Your Honour in finding that there is no prima facie case of privilege here in the chamber on proceedings that took place in the committee.

Of course, there is a reason for that, which is that, if we can raise points of privilege here on proceedings in the committee before getting to the Orders of the Day, then we could conceivably never get to Orders of the Day—as, for example, today. It is a quarter past five and we have not got to the Orders of the Day because these points of procedure were raised on questions that took place in a committee. That is totally irregular. There is no point of privilege whatever. Those points are raised in the committee and settled in the committee.

When, however, the report is made, there is, of course, no reason why honourable senators cannot say, "I am going to vote against the adoption of this report because I was against what took place in the committee." That is perfectly relevant. It is not relevant on a point of privilege, but it is a reason for voting against a report if senators feel so inclined because of the proceedings in the committee. If ever any legislature anywhere wants to constipate totally its possibility of doing anything, it should allow points of privilege to be raised on committee proceedings in the main chamber—and wait a long time to get to the Orders of the Day.

That is the reason, Your Honour, for these rules. They are not just arbitrary rules. They are there because a chamber says to a committee, "We refer this matter to you, and you have to deal with it. You deal with your procedures. You are the masters of your proceedings." If there are questions to be raised, they are raised, ruled on, dealt with and completed there. Then, when the report comes in, people can complain and not want to vote in support of the motion for the adoption of the report, or make comments about its consideration, not on points of privilege but as reasons for voting against the motion. Otherwise, there would be chaos and total anarchy in the main chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will try to be brief, but I want to point out that there is no question of privilege that ought to be brought here on the matters that have been raised. There is no prima facie case of privilege either, because, honourable senators—or Mr. Speaker, since you are being asked to take this into account—the fact of the matter is that what happened in the committee yesterday was that, immediately that the Chair called the committee to order, the Conservative members, members supporting the government or whatever you want to call them, tried to prevent the committee from addressing the issue before them, namely the report on Bill C-62. It was clear that they were embarking on a filibuster, for whatever reasons they have to delay that consideration. We went on for six hours.

Senator Perrault: Six and a half hours!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, not once did any of them refer to the substantive matter that was before the committee—

Senator Perrault: That's right! Never! Not a word!

Senator Olson: —namely Bill C-62 and the report that we were going to send to the Senate.

Senator Simard: We had to read the report first.

Senator Olson: It was completely clear, honourable senators, that they were not prepared to deal with it. I do not know what their motives might have been, but I have some suspicions. I am suspicious that they want some time for the Prime Minister to arrange to swamp the place with some more senators—an action that has never been taken before. I just say that that is my suspicion. I do not know that for sure.

Another thing that has to be taken into account, honourable senators and Mr. Speaker, is that the members on the government side made a complete change of course, 180 degrees. I think it is called a flip-flop or somersault in some cases. All summer long—and the evidence is there—the members, every one who spoke here today, had been urging the members on this side of the house to get the committee report ready at the earliest opportunity, and the earliest opportunity was September 25 because we adjourned until that date. We acquiesced.

Senator Barootes: Did you say not to allow us to consider it?

Senator Olson: We were doing the best we could to accommodate those people who were trying to get the report ready for presentation on September 25.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: But let us get into the committee and the first thing the Conservatives say is "We are not ready to deal with it today."

Senator Barootes: Take a drink of water, would you?

Senator Olson: You took one look at the report and said you could not absorb all of it.

Senator Perrault: They said they were slow readers.

Senator Olson: Whether they read it or not—

Senator Cools: They are slow thinkers.

Senator Olson: —every single one of them who attended the meetings knew what was in the evidence and they could have prepared a minority report.

Senator Barootes: When?

Senator Olson: The last meeting involving public witnesses was in August. That was a long time ago. Surely you could have analyzed the evidence in that length of time. Anyway, this is the kind of farce that these questions of privilege are trying to create. The senators opposite did not want that. After we said we were going to have the committee report ready for September 25, they put their foot in the door to stop progress. They asked the support staff how much time they needed to actually print the report that would be presented on September 25. We were told that if the report was received in the early evening, a copy could be printed for each senator, because each senator is entitled to a copy. But, no, the Conservative senators believed that we wanted to delay it for whatever reason.

Senator Poitras: You did, you did!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as Senator Frith has pointed out, we have seen an impressive display of how questions of privilege or procedure arising in committee are dealt with in committee.

Senator Doody: We were refused!

Senator Olson: No, you were not refused.

Senator Doody: Absolutely denied! No opinions were accepted!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that statement is simply not true. The chairman of the committee listened to several senators opposite pour out their hearts, and whatever else they had, for hours and then made a decision.

Senator Poitras: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: Senator Simard was grieving about everything, all the while delaying the committee from getting to the substance of its work. Senator Ottenheimer and Senator Robertson said that they had the right to have access to work done by people who are paid by the public treasury.

An Hon. Senator: The flunkies!

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: The flunkies. When I was in Halifax I saw at least six people who are paid by the public treasury—not only their salaries, but their transportation, meals, hotel bills and everything else—running around; but their services were not available to all senators.

Senator Perrault: No, sir!

Senator Olson: They were available to Conservative members only.

Senator Perrault: Only!

Senator Olson: So you have done a complete flip-flop on that too!

Senator Barootes: Are you from Senator Kirby's staff?

Senator Olson: I asked for access to the services provided by these people who are paid by the public treasury—those from the offices of the Minister of Finance and the Leader of the Government—who were doing a great job arranging interviews for television crews. I thought that was nice and that we should have equal access to those services. They never offered to help me—not once!

I am saying that it is hypocritical for Conservative senators to complain that they did not have access to a public service when there were public servants being paid out of the treasury who were not offering their services to members on both sides of the committee.

Senator Barootes: You had the "Canada First" committee helping you. Is that not enough?

Senator Olson: I am talking about people who are paid out of the public treasury. So let us stop the hypocrisy that is going on today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is hard to keep up with senators who are constantly doing 180 degree turns. When we try to be helpful they change directions.

Senator Nurgitz: Helpful?

Senator Olson: That is tough to follow. Mr. Speaker, I want to be serious for a few minutes.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: I know I have been serious to this point, but when you describe the hypocrisy of members opposite you have to take it with a bit of levity.

Senator Barootes: How do you spell that?

Senator Olson: I will show you how to spell it. It would be extremely dangerous for us to accept everything that has been raised by members opposite today as a prima facie case of privilege on the floor of this house.

Senator Barootes: We will raise it again tomorrow and then the next day.

Senator Olson: As was pointed out by Senator Frith, if we are going to deal with questions of privilege that arise in committee in this chamber, we will to throw this place into chaos. Everything will come to a stop, because we will never get to the Orders of the Day.

I had approximately 15 years of experience in the House of Commons before I came to this place, and there I saw repeated occasions of members of the House of Commons complaining about some procedure that occurred in the committees. They were turned down every single time. What has occurred here this afternoon is why we cannot allow that to happen. We will get nothing done.

With respect to the unfair, unkind, disparaging remarks about the chairman, I would like to remind those opposite that he listened when someone raised a question of privilege. He gave those matters priority and listened to what the member of the committee had to say. He did not acquiesce to frivolous cases of privilege every time, but he listened and made a ruling in committee, which is the proper place to do so.

Honourable senators, Mr. Speaker, I hope we will use common sense and not transfer dealing with questions of privilege from the committee into this chamber, because we would be setting a dangerous precedent. Senator Frith made reference to various passages in which questions of privilege were dealt with in the committee, and I am sure there are dozens more if one wants to do the research. The committee is in charge of its procedures and what occurs in its meetings. That is something that has evolved over the years.

Senator Thériault: Ask Blenkarn!

Senator Olson: If you senators opposite want to do that kind of character assassination, go ahead. I do not want to do it, but I think it is unfair and ridiculous to make those kind of statements about a chairman who did a tremendous job—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: —of trying to be fair in every situation, I might say under severe provocation from time to time by some of the senators opposite.

I would therefore like you, Mr. Speaker, and honourable senators to take those things into account. I am not going to try to anticipate that senators will take into account the arguments that have been made here today. Perhaps they can look at the transcript and make up their own minds.

Senator Barootes: There is no transcript!

Senator Olson: There is a transcript—it is the Hansard of today. I hope senators will look at the precedents. If they do, they will find that no speaker in the other place, or in any other Commonwealth Parliament in recent history, has allowed questions of privilege that have arisen as a result of procedure in a committee to be brought to the floor of a chamber such as this. In the other place the Speaker would be on his feet—they have different rules—saying that if someone has a question of privilege in a committee, it should be dealt with in committee and not in the chamber. That has been the ruling for years and years. I hope that we shall not destroy the Senate of Canada by upsetting that precedent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I wonder whether we will hear from the Chairman of the committee on this matter.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: No, honourable senators.

Senator Everett: I should tell honourable senators that I do not know whether, in the end, we will be dealing with a point of privilege or, as Senator Frith has said, a matter with which we can deal when the report comes to a vote before this body. Either way, however, serious allegations have been made here respecting the performance of the committee and, most especially, its chairman.

Honourable senators, I served as chairman for better than a dozen years of the Standing Senate Committee on Finance. In that position I, for one, would be somewhat concerned about the allegations that have been raised here today. I must say that if those allegations are not refuted it would have some considerable effect on how I would view the situation—indeed, whether it is a matter of privilege and a prima facie case has been made, or whether, in fact, as Senator Frith has said, we can reject the report of the committee because we did not like what went on in the committee.

But listen, honourable senators, to the allegations as I have heard them here today: access to information and staff was denied to members of the committee; there was a denial of access of the deputy chairman to the staff of the committee and to information; there was a time allocation in respect of dealing with the committee report. The committee report was, as I understand it, fashioned by the chairman and not discussed with the steering committee, nor with the committee, as it was being formulated.

According to the allegations that have been made, points of order were refused; members could not be heard; there was a withdrawal of a motion without the consent of the committee and a motion substituted therefor; the reading of the draft report was refused; and a clause-by-clause study of the report was refused. There was no debate allowed on the motion to put the previous question.

I am not sure whether these allegations can be substantiated. Perhaps they can be knocked down, but the rebuttal I have heard here today is not to knock down the allegations but, rather, to say that the point of privilege has not been raised in the right place at the right time and that therefore a prima facie case cannot be established.

What I am interested in is the committee system, the delicate balance that exists in a successful committee system. I would therefore like to hear from the chairman of the committee against whom these allegations have been made. The manner in which he would look at the allegations and the manner in which he would refute them would influence my thinking and my actions in respect of this report. I think it is an important matter to be undertaken at this time, before it moves forward any further.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether, in the history of the Senate, the chairman of a committee has ever been chastised as this one has this afternoon, and with less reason.

I had not intended to try to explain, react or comment. Many of the things that have been said are just a version of the same problem, it seems to me, that I really did not think it was necessary to lower myself even to comment on what has been going on.

Let me start from the beginning. From the very first day our friends on the side of the government, as the committee travelled around the country, had a plan. That plan was to discredit the committee and to discredit the chairman of the committee. It started from the very first day. The advisors of the group across the way, sitting there so benignly, were meeting several times a day, digging up everything they could and making sure that the media would concentrate on the committee, on the uproar surrounding the chairman, and all of the things that went on in a way that was almost impossible to take. It was so bad that in Halifax, which was in the first few days that the committee travelled, Senator Simard said, "The committee chairman is the worst chairman that this committee has ever had," and Senator Robertson said, "Amen!"

Senator Perrault: That was a really intelligent remark!

Senator Buckwold: We went through this. Let me tell honourable senators that I was followed, as committee chairman, by representatives of the staff wherever I went in the hotel in which we were meeting. Whenever I was in front of a TV camera, there was one of those government gremlins listening to what I was going to say—government gremlins waiting, sitting there, waiting to hear what I was going to say, making little notes.

I remember saying on different occasions, "Come over here—you can hear me better." If I went to the men's room, somebody was following me.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Buckwold: Literally, absolutely, as a matter of fact, I said to the fellow who was following me, "Come on in—at my age I could use a little help!"

Everywhere we went this happened. Really, honourable senators would have found it an amazing exercise, because the strategy was, as it is to this very day: discredit the committee, don't give too much publicity to the bill or to the representations made by those who appeared in great numbers to seriously criticize the government.

Honourable senators, this was absolutely the most difficult experience I have ever had, dealing with uproars, points of privilege and so on. Every morning that we sat there was another one, and honourable senators know it. I am sure they concocted it the night before, and we would sit and wonder what they were going to raise that day.

Senators should have been in Edmonton if they really wanted to see a show. In Edmonton they insisted that the vice-chairman of a House of Commons committee be heard because he had applied well after the deadline and had been refused. We said, "Okay, bring him in. Everybody has half an hour or an hour." This man's name was Murray Dorin, an M.P.

• (1640)

If he ever gets elected in Edmonton again, believe me, I will be elected the Mayor of Beirut.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Buckwold: I do not know how he got away with his life, how an MP could take the abuse from the audience and the near-riot, and then be hustled out to the television cameras by the same gremlins to make sure his messages were broadcast. My friends, you would not believe what was going on. Again, it is the same plan, the same thing today, knock the chairman, keep at him. It is not going to worry me. I do not care. I am a little guy and I am not going to get any smaller; it is no problem.

Every word of the debate was transmitted by telephone to the Department of Finance, or whatever department or leader's office. Every few minutes I would see someone on the 'phone because some witness had said something or a certain question was asked. Obviously, it was of great interest to those on the government side involved in this legislation. Every move was carefully assessed and scrutinized. I am sure the evidence of every witness was discussed in detail by our friends on the other side.

After putting up with this situation for the whole period, we got down to writing a report. We said that we were going to have a scheduled date of September 15. I was advised that it was absolutely impossible to have a translation by that date. I received a letter from the clerk, who had spoken to Senator Poitras. Since Senator Poitras and other senators had insisted that every document, and the evidence of almost every witness, be in two languages, and because we did not have the translation, I said that the committee would be cancelled until we had the translation. Senator Poitras has objected to this. However, I do not know how many times he would be critical of a witness who did not give a brief in two languages. Senator Simard was no better.

As chairman, I stated that if senators were going to be raising the devil about not having the report in two languages, then certainly we cannot do this on September 19, which was a Wednesday. Speaking now as the Mayor of Beirut, on Thursday and Friday it was the Jewish New Year. I stayed home during the Jewish New Year, so it was impossible for me to be present on Thursday and Friday, by which time we possibly would have translation. Therefore, the earliest day we could meet was Monday, and on Monday we met.

The committee and our friends indicate that they were not given the material. I have to admit that I made a decision, to which some people may object. There was so much insistent demand on the part of our friends across the way to be able to transmit every word that was being said that I wanted to keep it under my control. This is a very sensitive piece of legislation for the government and I took my responsibilities very seriously. I said to myself—and it was to myself—that "I am going to keep this to myself because every word will be leaked within two seconds the minute anybody looks at it." I see that my friend, Senator Kirby, who is a member of the steering committee, is present. He was not in the picture either.

It was leaked yesterday by the same fellows who are complaining. The minute it was in their hands I had reporters calling. No wonder they could not read it. They gave it to the press; that is why they could not read it.

I was not outside with the press, but at the end of the day everyone was running outside, wearing out the carpets, and saying how terrible the report is.

We were promised the report at 9 o'clock in the morning by the committee clerk. Of course, the French and English copy should both have gone out at exactly the same time. I cannot control how the clerk distributed it, or how the messengers work. I received mine at approximately 9.30 a.m. Some members of the committee stated that they received it at 10 a.m. or 10.15 a.m. Our French-speaking friends received it around 11.00 a.m. As chairman, my instructions were to send every member of the committee a copy of the report at 9 o'clock in the morning to enable them to have the full day to go through the report, read it and analyze it.

Perhaps I am responsible for the fact that it is a very heavy document. However, senators did receive transcripts of the meetings and the printed reports. Every witness has been reported, even to the last day. Senators should have been doing their homework and reading what people said. I gave no instructions to the authors on the first 190 pages. I advised the researchers to read the evidence and write an assessment. If senators look at it very carefully, which none of you have done, you will find advantages and disadvantages of what somebody said. Quite frankly, some of the assessments I did not like myself and was internally furious that the researchers would say that this case was not quite as good as it sounded. However, that is the way the independent researchers from the Library of Parliament wrote their case.

Senator Simard: You have to allow other members to read it.

Senator Buckwold: All I am saying is that I was keeping it under wraps. If you do not like that, then go back to what I was telling you. I do not know whether I was being shadowed as I walked down the streets of Edmonton. It seemed to me that one of the gremlins was behind me even out on the street. Therefore, I decided to try to keep it to myself. I did not show the report to the leader, I did not show it to Senator Frith. I did not show it to anyone.

Senator Simard: Just the Toronto Star.

Senator Buckwold: That is the type of nonsense that one hears. Some reporter 'phoned me and stated that the Prime Minister, or perhaps it was someone from the office of the Minister of Finance, was prepared to accept some amendments. It is public knowledge, and we all recall that Conservative senators promised some of the witnesses that there would be some amendments. The reporter asked what type of amendments, and I said that we could have amendments.

If you say I leaked the report, you must show me those amendments. They are not in the report at all. Again, you have not read the report, but you have read the Toronto Star. Over four months I have never given one iota of a lead to any reporter, from the Toronto Star or anywhere else, as to what was in that committee report. I said each time that we had four alternatives: We will hold our noses and pass it, and tell them that we do not like it; we will bring in a series of amendments to try to make it more palatable, if that were possible; we will delay it, which many people asked us to do; or we could axe the tax, which so many people requested of the Senate. That is all the information that was ever given to the press. If you want to read the Toronto Star article, check for that day and you will find that it was on that day, or the day earlier, that the Prime Minister or a minister stated that they were ready to accept some amendments. I am sure that was as a result of discussions with Conservative senators who stated that there should be a few amendments, because some of the provisions were so bad that there had to be a few amendments. Even our Tory friends could not stand the stench of some of the clauses in that bill.

• (1650)

We get down to blaming me. We met as soon as we could. Quite frankly, I wanted to keep everything under wraps. The report was not leaked, at least not until it got into the hands of Conservatives yesterday morning when it started to pour out, not to leak out. My secretary had several calls about it.

With respect to the meeting itself, the same thing happened as happened today.

Senator Simard: When did we get the report in French and in English?

Senator Buckwold: I ask honourable senators to keep in mind the so-called great event of September 15 when we did not get the translations. With my not being available on September 16 and 17, we met on the Monday. I also ask honourable senators to keep in mind that it was the commitment of your chairman and the objective of the steering committee to have that report the day the Senate returned.

According to Senator Simard, we travelled the country at a cost of one million dollars, although in fact we are well under our budget of $500,000. That is the kind of line we have been getting all the time—-

Senator Simard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down.

Senator Simard: Let me make my point of order. I was on the committee. Of course I cannot substantiate it, because they made sure that no record was kept. However, 15 seconds ago Senator Buckwold said that I lied to the committee. I am asking him to withdraw. We all heard him say it. Our guests in the gallery heard him say it.

Senator Perrault: Tell the truth, that is all.

Senator Buckwold: Having been rudely interrupted by Senator Simard—-

Senator Simard: I believe it is unparliamentary to say—-

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Simard: I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask him to withdraw; otherwise I will make a motion.

Senator Buckwold: Here we go again. I am glad that honourable senators have seen this type of display, since it is what we had to put up with for two months.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: There were absolutely disruptive and destructive character assassinations. Anything would go just so long as the public did not know what was in the rotten bill.

We heard Mr. Jelinek in Toronto. As Senator Cools reminded us yesterday in committee, Mr. Jelinek came to our committee, at his own invitation, probably being pushed by reports he had heard that things were not going so well. He rushed down to ask whether or not he could be heard. Naturally, we heard him. When he got up, I tell you, honourable senators, I thought he was Billy Graham. He prayed that senators pass the bill right away, because if we did not the whole country would go into ruin.

Senator Frith: It was not to pass the bill, but to have the report ready.

Senator Buckwold: That is right, to have the report ready.

Senator Poitras, Senator Kirby and myself agreed that we would have the report ready on September 25. I am very proud to say that the report was ready on September 25.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: Let us get down to yesterday when this horrible chairman, this ogre who ran the meeting like Frankenstein would run a nunnery—-

Senator Frith: As Senator Robertson would say, "Amen!"

Senator Buckwold: It started out with the same kind of filibuster that is happening today. It is all a bunch of nonsense, and you know it. Some may not like the way the chairman handled a few matters. Perhaps I should not have listened to Senator Frith when on occasion he gave me some advice. However, I honour his wisdom. He is the most knowledgeable man I know concerning the rules of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: He does, of course, next to Senator MacEachen who knows even more. Senators across the way will find that out.

I am sure that the group gathered with some of its new people to plan its strategy as to how it could delay this bill in order to give Mr. Mulroney a chance to appoint his next eight—-

Senator Frith: Or ask the Queen to do that.

Senator Buckwold: That is right, he cannot do it. But he can do a little pushing. I am sure they sat around and said, "What can we do?" The logical thing would be to wreck the committee since the report was delivered late. Believe me, you would want to read the important parts of that report. The first 197 pages are strictly narrative concerning what happened. There are probably 40 pages that should be read, which is not very difficult. Yet they sat with us from nearly 1.30 p.m. until 8 p.m. with not a break. I think we had two five-minute breaks, since I am getting older and need to make use of the facilities. We did not have supper. We just went on with no mention of the contents of the report. There was no discussion of the recommendations. There was not a thing that happened.

The first thing they brought in was a motion requesting one week's delay. We know what the week's delay was for. It was to give Mr. Mulroney a chance to write in big print that he needs more senators. That is all that it was. We knew that. It was just a ruse. Every trick in the book was thrown at us.

The first discussion was with respect to whether or not the committee should delay its meeting to consider its report until October 2. I made a commitment to table the report on September 25. Is there anything wrong with living up to one's word? If anyone told you they did not have time to read that document, do not believe them. These guys could read that document in ten minutes, as they sat in the bathroom, if they wanted to. That is how they could do it. They had their own plan then, and they have their own plan today.

I was supposed to table the report shortly after the new senators were sworn in this afternoon. Thus far I have not tabled it. I do not know what will happen. Senators opposite have now been able to delay this report for half a day. Who knows what will happen in the next day or two, or even what will happen tonight. I am sure that the gremlins are giving all kinds of advice in order to keep this thing alive before we can get to a vote to try to kill a bill which is probably the worst piece of legislation in the history of this country. Not only is it the worst piece of legislation in my memory, but it is the worst piece of legislation in the memory of people even older than me, if that is possible. Never has there been such public opposition, such public disdain, such public disrespect for any legislation that has come before us.

Senator MacEachen: Not to mention the anger.

Senator Buckwold: Not to mention the anger and the civil disobedience. All I am telling Senator Everett, who wanted to know some of the background, is that I thought the procedure was in order.

Senator Frith: In the circumstances of the filibuster.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, in the circumstances.

It was not an easy meeting to control. I am being criticized because I could not control the meeting. Did you ever try to control Senator Simard when he gets going?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: I will not put the finger on others. I have to say that Senator Doody is a gentleman. At least he does not raise his voice and snarl. Some of the others do. However, I will not mention their names. I may have left out some of the accusations brought against your honourable chairman. I may not have covered all of the points. However, I want honourable senators to see what the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been going through for the last many months under a plan to discredit him and the committee, while making sure that the great Canadian public knows nothing, or as little as possible, of this piece of legislation which is being foisted upon it.

● (1700)

So, honourable senators, I am trying not to excuse myself. I am not trying to answer question by question. I hope that in what I had to say you will feel the kind of frustration that, as chairman, I have had to go through; the kind of tricks that have been played on me.

Senator Perrault: Dirty tricks!

Senator Buckwold: I did not say "dirty" because I know that all their tricks are dirty. The fact is that we had a piece of legislation that was extremely sensitive. As I said earlier, every line was being carefully scrutinized concerning what people said or wrote. The two researchers did the writing under my direction and I kept it close to the belt. Believe me, there was no leak at all until yesterday morning.

Before I sit down, I remember saying last night to my friends across the way, in my innocence, as the meeting was coming to a raucous close, "Do not forget that this is a confidential document and is not to be released to the press." I did not finish the sentence before the hilarity on the other side began—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As they went out to give it to the press!

Senator Buckwold: —as they went out to talk to the reporters outside, led by the gremlins that always take care of them.

Honourable senators, that is a brief explanation of your chairman's actions. I was not trying to be unfair. I was honestly trying to be as fair as I could, under circumstances of provocation that not many other chairmen would have endured without getting up and punching someone right in the nose.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 12 of the Rules of the Senate, at six o'clock I must leave the Chair and come back at eight o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8:00 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

PROCEEDINGS OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Patricia Carney: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to speak to the questions of privilege that have been raised and, particularly the points raised by Senator Everett. Senators will recall that this afternoon Senator Everett raised certain questions which he directed to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Senator Buckwold. I noted some of the questions that he asked. He asked if access to information and staff by members of the committee was denied; whether there had been a denial of access of information to the deputy chairman; if it was true, as government senators had indicated, that time allocation was suggested. He also asked if it was true that the report was not discussed with the steering committee; if it was true—this is a government senator—that points of order were refused.

Some Hon. Senators: A government senator?

Senator Carney: An opposition senator.

Some Hon. Senators: He is an independent Liberal.

Senator Carney: He is an independent Liberal, he just acts like a member of the government.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: On a point of personal privilege, I do sit among Liberal senators, but I sit as an independent Liberal.

I might also say, to be precise, that I did not ask any questions; I merely stated that allegations had been made on the other side and I asked whether the chairman of the committee would be willing to rise and deal with those allegations.

An Hon. Senator: Which he did.

Senator Carney: I accept the clarification of the independent Liberal senator. We will see if he votes as an independent.

To use his language, he asked the chairman of the committee to deal with the allegation that points of order were refused. He asked the chairman to deal with the allegation that members were not recognized. He asked the honourable senator to deal with the allegation that a motion was withdrawn without consent and a substitute made. He dealt with the allegation of whether it was true that time to consider a draft report was refused. This independent Liberal senator asked the Chairman to deal with the allegation that clause-by-clause reading had been refused, and he raised other points.

I should now like to note the honourable senator's answers. I had to write these answers down as the honourable senator spoke, and, in that regard, I am sure honourable senators can check Hansard. I think I captured the spirit of his answers.

To the allegation of whether access to information and to the staff were denied, the chairman said that, yes, access was denied. To the allegation that access was denied to the deputy chairman of the committee, the chairman said that, yes, that was true, he did deny access to the deputy chairman. He said that in this chamber. He did not deal with the question of time allocation. If honourable senators check the record, they will see that he did not refer to the allegation of time allocation which, of course, honourable senators on the government side raised.

On the allegation of whether or not the report was discussed with the steering committee, the chairman, agreed that it was not discussed with the steering committee. He said in this chamber that it was not discussed with his fellow member of the steering committee, Senator Kirby. On the allegation of whether points of order were refused, the chairman agreed that maybe he had not been too perfect about points of order. I was present in the committee and at one point—it is difficult to deny my allegation because, of course, there are no transcripts—I heard the chairman say that he did not care about the points of order, that he did not want to listen to points of order, and that he did not care who made them. There is no transcript on the issue of whether members were refused permission to speak, but I can speak to that because I was one of the senators who were refused permission to speak.

Senator Olson: You mean a second or third time.

Senator Carney: To the allegation that a motion was withdrawn without consent and another substituted, no reply was made. On the issue of whether or not there had been time to consider the draft report, which is crucial to the questions of privilege raised by honourable senators on the government side, the chairman said that we could have read it in ten minutes as we sat in the bathroom. That was what he considered proper time to consider this report. He said that anybody could have read it in ten minutes as they sat in the bathroom.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I do not know on what basis the Honourable Senator Carney is complaining about matters which occurred yesterday in a committee of which she was not a member, and not even a senator.

Senator Cools: Precisely.

Senator Molgat: Exactly on what basis does the senator speak about not having the right to do something in a committee at which she does not even have the right to be present?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh! She does.

Senator Molgat: As a private person, yes, but surely not as a senator. We all sat here this afternoon and heard her being sworn in.

My second point is: On what basis is the now "honourable senator" speaking? She gave no notice of a point of privilege.

Senator Doody: She is speaking to the point of privilege.

Senator Molgat: It is normal, should a senator wish to speak on a point of privilege, that notice be given as was given by honourable senators opposite earlier today.

I submit, honourable senators, that the present speaker is out of order.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): On that point of order, the simple truth of the matter is that Senator Carney was a senator from the minute the Order in Council was issued, and it was on that basis that she was admitted to the committee.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: She sat in the committee as a senator. If she was not a senator she should not have been in the committee. Once again, the chairman must have been derelict, because it was an in camera meeting and he should not have allowed it to be open to the public.

Honourable senators, I asked for transcription and I even asked that a tape recorder be present, but both requests were refused. Senator Carney's presence was never questioned; ergo, she was a senator recognized by the committee.

As for her right to speak to the point of order, every senator in this place has the right to speak to a point of privilege and a point of order.

Senator Molgat: You cannot be serious!

Senator Doody: You are interrupting me.

Senator Phillips: Only one speaker!

• (2010)

Senator Doody: As the deputy speaker of this place, please show some respect for the rules.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Molgat: Senator Doody, we now have a new rule whereby one becomes a senator without ever having taken the oath of office! That really is a new rule. Senator Doody, you cannot be serious.

Senator Doody: Absolutely.

Senator Molgat: You cannot be serious. You have spent too much time in parliamentary practice to pretend that you believe that. Come on! Be reasonable! That is not practical. Furthermore, the honourable senator has not given any notice of a point of order. You did, and you spoke properly. However, there is no point of order. Come on! You complain about abuse of the rules and you are proceeding to do exactly that.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on the second point raised by the Honourable Senator Molgat, I will remind him that on many occasions he himself has risen in this chamber on a point of privilege without any notice. I also advise him that later on I intend to take part in the questions of privilege.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no!

Senator Phillips: And I have not given any notice. I would further remind the honourable senator that it is impossible for those of us who have not given written notice to know what the subject is. Therefore, a question of privilege would be limited to the one individual, the one senator, who has provided written notice. I am sure that, as chairman of the Rules Committee, he really does not believe that. He is a master at attempting to raise false points of order, and I find that rather reprehensible. As the chairman of the Rules Committee, he should know better.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, on the first point made by Senator Molgat, I simply wish to remind honourable senators that the chairman was very gracious yesterday in welcoming Senator Carney and other new senators, who admittedly had not taken the oath. He welcomed them to the committee and invited them to take part in the deliberations. He could have raised objections at that particular time, but he did not. He was very gracious in welcoming the new senators to his committee.

Senator Olson: They were senators designate.

Senator Petten: A good chairman!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, if Honourable Senator Carney has completed her remarks, I would like to contribute to the discussion on the point of privilege. Have you concluded your remarks, senator?

Senator Carney: No. Honourable senators will be aware that I could hardly have completed my remarks, because an honourable senator opposite interrupted on a point of order. I do believe that it is not customary to terminate a speech on a point of order.

Senator Guay: You are already out of order.

Senator Carney: We were discussing the allegations made against the honourable senator.

Senator Frith: No, we were not.

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Carney: We have been discussing the allegations all afternoon, Senator Perrault.

Senator Perrault: Yes, but they are out of order. Your intervention is just as much out of order as the earlier ones.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We have not even reached Orders of the Day. There is no motion before the house. There is no question before the house. There is nothing for the house to decide on. We are simply witnessing a series of points of privilege as part of a filibuster.

Senator Olson: Exactly.

Senator Perrault: That's all it is.—

Senator Frith: If Senator Carney wants to get involved in this filibuster, as she clearly wishes to do, then she should at least do it with some semblance of a point of privilege and not talk about a debate on some point that is not before the Senate. The only matter before the Senate is a group of individual points of privilege that have been raised, which, as we pointed out for Your Honour's ruling, are absolutely not points of privilege because they deal with proceedings in a committee. Now we are carrying on with it. Senator Carney says that we were discussing some questions raised by Senator Everett. We were not. He made it clear that he was not asking questions. I ask Your Honour to rule on what basis Senator Carney is on her feet? Will she be raising a point of privilege after this is over?

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am somewhat intrigued by the intervention of my long-time friend, Senator Molgat, in which he suggests that a question of privilege should not be entertained because notice was not given. I have spent many years hearing speakers admonish members of legislative assemblies for not raising points of privilege at the proper time. Propinquity seemed to be the thing. I find it strange to hear the suggestion that privilege has to be stored up and notice given. In fact, I was amazed that so many of my colleagues gave notice this afternoon. It was very courteous of them but, in my judgment, procedurally it was a matter of supererogation. There is nothing wrong with that, but I think it is a very weak argument to propound that not giving notice suggests that questions of privilege cannot be raised.

Senator Frith: In my respectful submission, Your Honour has a duty to decide when you have heard enough on this point of privilege to make up your mind as to whether a prima facie case is made. You are not being asked to decide on the question of privilege, but simply whether a prima facie case has been made for a point of privilege. Your Honour should decide when you have heard enough. Do I take it that Your Honour is going to let this thing go on forever?

The Hon. the Speaker: Not necessarily.

Senator Frith: Are you going to intervene at some point and say, "I have enough to decide whether or not there is a prima facie point of privilege"? In my respectful view, Your Honour, that is your duty.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my respectful view, Senator Frith, I think it has been a tradition in this house, so long as members are within the rules, to let them speak and give their opinions.

Senator Guay: Forever?

The Hon. the Speaker: As long as they are within the rules.

Senator Frith: That is the question.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think we are still debating the points of privilege.

Senator Frith: It is not a debate, Your Honour. There is nothing before the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: We are still talking about the points of privilege. I agree with you that I will not necessarily let this go on forever, but I think that the few senators who wish to speak should do so.

Senator Frith: Your Honour is saying that it is fine so long as it is within the rules. The rules or traditions to which Your Honour has referred require, as Senator Ottenheimer said, only that Your Honour make the decision as to whether or not you have heard enough to determine whether there is a prima facie case. That is all. I submit that you have heard sufficient to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case.

Senator Barootes: Why don't you change seats with him?

Senator Frith: I suggest, Your Honour, that it is quite possible that they will think of some other reason for the filibuster, but, on this point, I think Your Honour has heard enough to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed!

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I started—

Senator Frith: Order!

Senator Carney: —my introduction by saying that I wished to speak to the privilege of others, and I believe that that is the practice of this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Carney: I also point out that the points I am speaking to were raised in this discussion. Honourable senators may not like this word "discussion", but these allegations were raised specifically by the independent Liberal senator opposite who specifically asked the chairman of the committee to deal with them.

Senator Olson: He did not!

Senator Carney: He did say that these were the allegations raised. He said that these allegations had been raised, and he asked the honourable senator, the chairman of the committee, to deal with them. I am simply referring to the questions or the allegations raised and the answers that were given by the chairman. As I point out, the chairman agrees. He told us all that he kept this report close to his chest. That is what he told us all, and he is nodding his head in agreement. He said he kept it close to his chest. He has agreed that he did not share it with the committee. He agreed that he did not share it with the vice chairman, and that he did not even share it with the steering committee, which I am told is a very unusual practice in this house.

Honourable senators, I have raised the point that the chairman feels that this document of approximately 300 pages, which encompasses nearly $1 million—although there is some debate about that—could, in his opinion, be read in the bathroom in 10 minutes. He is more interested in his bladder than his brains!

● (2020)

I wish to speak to the important question of privilege with respect to the translation, which is fundamental to Parliament, both in this chamber and in the other place. The honourable senator pointed out his concern with respect to the translation. He told us how he delayed this report for at least a week due to translation. I thought he spoke passionately about the need to honour the issue of translation, but he also agreed that he released this report in the French translation to members of the committee—the francophone members of the committee—at 11:45 p.m., giving them—

Some Hon. Senators: No! No!

Senator Carney: I might have to alter my statement.

An Hon. Senator: Withdraw it! Withdraw it!

Senator Carney: Listen to me, because he said he gave orders for the report was to be released to everyone at the same time. That is what he said. Those were his orders. All members of the committee were to receive it at the same time. My notes show that he said that members of the Opposition received the report at 9 or 9:30. That is what he said. In fact, in committee Senator Perrault said that he received it at 10:30 a.m. and that the members of the government side—

Senator Olson: Wrong!

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Carney: You can check the transcript, Senator Olson.

An. Hon. Senator: You are dreaming again.

Senator Carney: You will have your chance, Senator Olson. We received the transcript in English at 11 o'clock and the transcript in French at 11:45. That is what the chairman thinks is equal time.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame! Shame!

Senator Carney: Of course, we know that the clause-by-clause issue of this vital bill was never considered. It was rejected, and there is no transcript of that meeting. We have to rely on memory. The chairman was given every opportunity in this chamber to deal with these allegations by the honourable senator the independent Liberal; and after saying that he kept the report close to his chest, that he did not allow the vice-chairman access to it, and that he did not allow others to get this—

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: On a point of order, Senator Everett did not make that allegation. You did.

Senator Doody: You are wasting time, senator.

Senator Gigantès: That is lovely, coming from you. I enjoy that!

Senator Phillips: You are filibustering!

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, you may be interested to hear what the honourable chairman said. He said that this committee tried to discredit him. He said that he was followed too closely in Edmonton, that he was shadowed in Edmonton. He said that people stuck mikes so close to him that he should have been in a media scrum. He said that was the reason he kept the report close to his chest. The reason he kept it close to his chest, honourable senators, was because he felt he had been shadowed in Edmonton. I am not from Edmonton, but I could think of worse fates.

Senator Gigantès: You should be so lucky!

Senator Carney: In answer to these allegations he told this chamber that he planned to have the draft ready by September 15. He then said the translation had to be completed, that there were some Jewish holidays that had to be honoured, and so he could not meet the date he had given the committee. He also told us that he planned to release the report at 9 in the morning. That is consistent with what he told the committee. Instead he released it at close to 12. If he honoured the time for the French translation and for the Jewish holidays, and he tried to release the report at 9 o'clock in the morning, why does he question our suggestion that the committee members be given a week—the very same week that he proposed—to consider this important document in both official languages?

He also made a strange admission—and I think we should check the transcript, because I am sure this will deal with the issue of privilege—and admitted that he had discussed the four alternatives with the Toronto Star. Reflect on that! He told this chamber that he had discussed the four alternatives—the ones he would not discuss in committee and which we never had a chance to see—

Senator Olson: Oh, you had a chance!

Senator Carney: The Toronto Star had many more opportunities.

Senator Barootes: Three days earlier!

Senator Carney: He never discussed them with his colleagues on the committee, he never discussed them with the steering committee, yet he admits that he discussed them with the Toronto Star. That is what he told this chamber.

Senator Neiman: That is totally wrong!

Senator Carney: On this question, he also told us that he knew that the government had said it would consider amendments. This was not strange to him. He said he knew this. He said he knew that the government would consider amendments, and he said he thought this was unreasonable. Instead he has brought in a process that rejects any opportunity to consider amendments or the views of the 350 people who appeared before this committee, along with the 159 suggestions they made.

I am wondering whether or not the honourable senator understands what he has done in this process, because it is not what we consider to be a parliamentary process. I wonder what harm he may have done to the Senate itself in this close-to-the-chest reporting system—

Senator Cools: He cannot match you!

Senator Carney: —and this exclusion of steering committees and committees. I wonder how he would feel if people felt betrayed by this process where, by his own admittance, a chairman and two staffers produced a report of such vital importance to Canadians. I believe that is the central issue in these questions of privilege that have been raised.

In closing, I feel that we have to understand the central issue.

Senator Cools: What is it?

Senator Carney: Some honourable senators on the other side are arguing that we are all members of Parliament. It is the government's view that the power to deal with this kind of bill really resides in the elected House of Commons, that it does not reside in a chairman who keeps a report close to his chest, shared only with two staffers. People should consider what damage this would do to this institution.

I have always been proud to be a parliamentarian and proud of the rules of both houses of Parliament. As we proceed with this discussion we should deal with the issue of how best to uphold the institution itself. People will remember what we do in this place today long after this particular bill is dealt with. Long after we have left this chamber they will remember what honourable senators in this chamber have done to the institution of Parliament. That is the central issue before us today.

Senator Guay: They will remember what you said, too!

Senator Perrault: Mr. Chairman, as a fellow British Columbian, I welcome Senator Carney to this chamber. I would have hoped for a more promising debut, but I welcome her intervention on a non-point of order.

Senator Carney: What is yours?

Senator Perrault: The fact is that I regret profoundly that she was unable to attend any of the hearings in British Columbia, as do thousands of other British Columbians. She was so consumed with concern about the GST that she did not appear at any of the hearings. Had she appeared at the hearings, honourable senators, she might have been appalled, as were other British Columbians, at the conduct of the Conservative Party during those hearings. The members of the Conservative Party were not interested whatsoever in any kind of intelligent dialogue with respect to the GST. They were under instructions, obviously, to destroy the hearings, to destroy democracy, and to destroy everything constructive that was being attempted there.

• (2030)

I regret also that Miss Carney was apparently so occupied with her other duties and responsibilities that she attended none of the committee hearings anywhere else in Canada. Now she has developed a special interest in the matter of the GST, and I welcome that.

I want to point out to honourable senators, however, that these pseudo points of order and points of privilege are totally out of order. This was the observation made earlier by the Liberal House Leader. All of these alleged points were debated in committee yesterday, and the chairman at that time did his very best to accommodate all of those who wished to speak. That is of real significance. to the admissibility of these so-called points of privilege.

What we are seeing here, honourable senators, is an obvious filibuster. The strategy started at 1:30 yesterday afternoon. it really understood, honourable senators, that this report of 300-plus pages is made up, for the most part, of a synopsis of the presentations that were made? Not one Conservative has argued against the accuracy of those transcripts? There is approximately another hour and a half's reading involved in reviewing relevant sections involving the proposed recommendations of the committee. Do senators or the Canadian people really understand that in the six hours of debate yesterday, and in the debate today, which amounts to approximately seven hours, there has been no discussion with respect to the substantive proposals contained in the goods and services tax bill? Not a word. For example, there has been nothing about whether it is going to hurt westerners.

Senator Carney should be aware of the fact that it is going to have a dreadful impact upon the people of British Columbia, Alberta and the Yukon. But she seems so concerned with pseudo procedural points that she is ignoring the welfare of the people of western Canada. She will have her chance to speak many times—

Senator Carney: The honourable senator keeps indicating that I do not know what is in this bill or I do not know about the GST. I was a member of the cabinet that brought it forward. I know more about it than the honourable senator opposite!

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator Perrault: Then apparently Miss Carney is aware of the fact that Remembrance wreaths to be laid on the Cenotaph of Vancouver will be taxable while caviar will be tax exempt. I hope she is pleased with that aspect of the proposal before us!

I wonder why it is impossible for one Conservative to muster one argument with respect to the facts and figures contained in the GST proposal. Why are they so silent? Are they frightened to debate it? Is it because the Conservative party has 8 per cent support in the province of British Columbia at the present time?

Senator Austin: That much?

Senator Perrault: Yes, 8 per cent.

Senator Finlay MacDonald: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator MacDonald: At what time, Senator Perrault, did you receive the report?

Senator Perrault: I received the report at 12:00 noon yesterday and I had a witness to that effect.

Senator Carney: On a point of order, honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Perrault in committee said 10:30 a.m.

Senator Perrault: I received the report at 12:00 noon and I had it read by the time the committee was about to discuss the relevant portions of it. Why was it so impossible for you to do the same? You claim to be a slow reader. For heaven's sake, somebody else here must have taken a speed reading course at some point here.

Senator MacDonald: But, Senator Perrault, you said you received the report at 12:00 noon.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator MacDonald: Did you not have a meeting of your fellow colleagues at that time?

Senator Perrault: No, I did not. We had a caucus meeting, of course, as you did.

Senator MacDonald: Yes, but you have read it?

Senator Perrault: I have now read thoroughly the main recommendations twice, and I hope that you have done the same.

Senator MacDonald: You were at a meeting for an hour or an hour and a half.

Senator Perrault: I had an excellent meeting, yes. Honourable senators, this is part of the filibuster. The honourable senator opposite used to be in show business. This is show business. There is no business like show business, senator, but there is also a GST report here that we should be considering.

[Senator Carney.]

Senator MacDonald: Answer the question, senator. You received the report around noon, which is after the time we received it.

Senator Perrault: Yes, after you received it.

Senator MacDonald: And you had a meeting that lasted an hour and a half?

Senator Perrault: Yes. What is the relevance of that?

Senator MacDonald: When did you have a chance to read it? Your time in the bathroom was really quality time.

Senator Perrault: In the other chamber, senator, the speaker would have stood up and said that Senator MacDonald was becoming tedious and repetitious. He would have ordered the Conservatives to cease their filibuster. I am not going to go into details of the phoney charges that are being marshalled here, because they are not even in order. Why should I do that? But I do plead with the honourable Conservative senators, for the sake of the welfare of this nation, to come to the point at which we can debate this issue.

Honourable senators, the impression is being created here, or the attempt is being made, to say that somehow free speech is being muzzled. You are muzzling free speech yourselves. We should be in a debate now on the substance of the GST proposals. You will at least be given a chance to debate at length, to speak as long as you wish. Yet you are trying to suggest that we are somehow restricting your freedom to speak.

Come on! Be serious about it. People are watching this chamber tonight and you are not making a very good impression.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators—and I would ask you to note that I have followed the rule and addressed the chamber, not His Honour the Speaker, as has been the custom tonight on the other side. For some reason, honourable senators opposite have again decided to contravene the rules and address His Honour the Speaker.

Senator Perrault: I included the senators!

Senator Phillips: I am also aware that I am addressing the chamber after a reception. I have been around here for awhile and I know that that is not the best time to address the chamber; but I am going to take a few moments of senators' time anyway. I hope that most senators will forget the reception and will pay me some attention.

Senator Guay: And save some money!

Senator Phillips: Definitely, Joe—you were always for saving money, especially in the Internal Economy Committee. I always appreciated that.

Honourable senators, I hesitate to take part in the discussion on this question of privilege because for years I have had great respect for the Honourable Senator Buckwold. He is of a different party, and holds a different view from mine. We have often discussed in a very friendly manner our differences and I would like to count him among my friends.

Senator Guay: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: It's coming!

Senator Phillips: I hope that when I am through with my brief remarks I will still be able to count him among my friends.

I was disappointed with his performance as committee chairman. Someone said to me that he made Senator Sinclair look good. I cannot give any better description than that. But I was particularly disappointed in his remarks this afternoon. Senator Everett directed a number of questions to him and asked him to reply to them.

● (2040)

I do not need to remind honourable senators that Senator Buckwold began way off in the distance. He began in Halifax, and worked his way through complaining about various things. He complained about gremlins. I thought of my younger days in the air force when gremlins were blamed when an aircraft did not work. Honourable senators, this committee did not work. It must have been the gremlins.

He then went on to complain about allegations of government supporters mentioning the cost of the committee. I did that to my honourable friend Senator Bonnell on Bill C-22. He did not become paranoid. He attempted to be reasonable throughout the committee hearings. He did not become as paranoid as Senator Buckwold.

My honourable friend, Senator Buckwold, then went on to complain that he had to stay in the same hotel as the rest of us. That is a pity. Senator Buckwold had a suite, while the rest of us had a room. I will not complain about that. Surely, Senator Buckwold could stay in the same hotel. However, if he did not want to, since he completely controlled the staff we would have stayed in another hotel to oblige him.

He complained that he had to eat in the same restaurant as we did. What a pity. I am sorry if we annoyed Senator Buckwold. I am sure that even Senator Cools would have gone to a different restaurant, had been asked. She is very obliging and very sweet; I am sure she would have co-operated.

Senator Buckwold then went on, in his paranoid way, and said that he walked down the streets of Edmonton, looked over his shoulder, and was sure that someone was following him. Honourable senators, in the last ten years has anyone walked down the streets of Edmonton who could not look back and see someone following him? The Mayor of Edmonton walks the streets. He does not look around and complain that the streets are not cleared. The Premier of Alberta walks the same streets. Does he complain about it? No. However, Senator Buckwold complains that the people of Edmonton were on the streets at the same time he was.

He then went on, in his paranoia, to show us the ultimate. He did not have a bathroom to himself and had to use a public bathroom. What a pity. If he had let us know, we could have had the bathroom cleared and electronically sweeped, in case he leaked. We could have put a guard outside the door because the chairman of the GST committee was in there. Is Senator Buckwold so paranoid that he complains that he does not have the bathroom to himself?

Senator Buckwold: I am enjoying every minute of it.

Senator Phillips: I enjoyed your remarks, too, Senator Buckwold.

After all the complaints that he did not have the bathroom to himself, what does he do? He takes the reporter from the Toronto Star with him into the bathroom and there he leaks the whole story. Honourable senators, when you read the report that Senator Buckwold dictated, you will realize that Senator Buckwold dictated it in the bathroom, composed it in the bathroom, and that is where it should stay.

Senator Buckwold's name will go down in history. This report will be known as the "Buckwold Bathroom Bonanza" for the Liberal Party. We have to give a little more consideration to the committee's report than Senator Buckwold wanted it to receive. If he had his way, the committee would have met in the bathroom and, in a very chummy fashion, have approved the report in 10 or 15 minutes. Honourable senators, this country deserves better than Buckwold's bathroom report.

I wish to turn to Senator Buckwold's conduct as chairman of the committee. I have served on a good many committees. I have received courteous treatment and seen other committee members receive courteous consideration from chairmen. Unfortunately, that was not the case yesterday. It was a despicable performance, one that the honourable senator did not enjoy. He kept watching Senator Frith, and I never saw such terror in anyone's face or eyes as when he looked at Senator Frith. He is absolutely afraid of him.

I have received fair treatment from committee chairmen before who were Liberals—Grits, which is the term I prefer. It is much more appropriate, because they were not too liberal yesterday. I cannot believe the performance I saw in the committee yesterday. I cannot believe that a member of the committee, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, would state that the Rules of the Senate do not apply in committee, that a committee makes up its own rules. Senator Buckwold knew differently, but he did not dare to disagree with the honourable senator, and I very much regret that. I wish he had had the backbone and the courage to state his convictions to the committee, instead of giving in to the directions of Senator Frith.

I wish to be fair to my honourable friend. I did request a ruling from the Assistant Law Clerk. Honourable Senator Buckwold, as chairman, agreed that the Assistant Law Clerk could give us advice. He was very reluctant to do that, but I thought that he had made a concession to me. He has told us today that he just wanted to go again to the bathroom. That is what I mean by saying that he has lost a great deal of respect.

The Assistant Law Clerk gave us advice to the effect that the Rules of the Senate apply in committee. My honourable friend listened to them, ignored them, and continued on the same pattern with the same arrogant decisions and the same rejection of minority rights. I am very concerned about that point. The Senate is known and repeated for its committee work. We do not get a great deal of respect for our legislation, but we do receive respect for our committee work. If we follow the pattern established yesterday by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, a pattern established at the direction of the Honourable Senator Frith, we will have destroyed the Senate's reputation.

● (2050)

In closing, I wish to remind you that under the British parliamentary system the rights of the minority are respected and protected. Unfortunately, in Senator Buckwold's zeal to pass the Buckwold bathroom bonanza he forgot his responsibility. He forgot the rights of the minority. I hope that before this debate on the GST legislation is finished he will come to his senses and will correct his actions of yesterday. I invite him to do that at a very early date.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, after these serious allegations, I believe, to quote Senator Everett, that I will take these questions of privilege under advisement. I think they reflect on the whole House. I shall study Hansard, do some research and come back to the House with a ruling as soon as I possibly can.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I will take up exactly two minutes of your time to present the humble petitions of more than 5,000 Canadian citizens.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 120 residents of Kapuskasing, Ontario, who ask the Senate to reject the Goods and Services Tax bill.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 1,417 residents of Alma, Quebec, who ask the Senate to reject the Goods and Services Tax bill.

PRESENTATION OF PETITION ON BILL C-62

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 175 students of the University of Lethbridge, who note that the Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers, and now proposes to include them in the GST. The signatories of this petition urge the Senate to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Poitras: Mr. Speaker, at this stage, I would like to raise a point of order regarding a very specific question.

[Senator Phillips.]

Today we discussed at length yesterday's meeting of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee received a motion from Senator Frith which read as follows:

> That in order to have time to prepare the above-mentioned report, the committee decide today, before 7 p.m., that it will examine the four options proposed in the draft report, each one separately, during a period to be determined by the Chairman of the Committee, and that each option be put to a vote.

This proposal, honourable senators . . .

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, the Speaker of the Senate has already said he would consider the points of order and questions of privilege raised in committee. There are none before us at this time. The next item on the agenda comes under "Committee Reports", which has not yet been called by the Speaker.

The point of order raised here also concerns committee procedures. It is identical to the point of order on which the Sepaker has reserved judgment.

I would ask the Speaker to make it clear that these questions have been taken under advisement by the Chair and that raising questions on which the Speaker has reserved judgment is out of order.

I would ask Your Honour to call this Chamber to order. We have patiently endured this long filibuster, but I think, Mr. Speaker, the time has come to say: Order, please. We can now start on today's agenda, and we shall continue. I am seeking a decision from the Chair.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Ottenheimer is not in order to bring in a report of a committee. He has no point of order. The question called by the Chair was "Reports of Committees." For Senator Ottenheimer to stand up under "Reports of Committees" and attempt to raise a point of order is out of order.

Senator Ottenheimer: The honourable senator—

An Hon. Senator: No point of order!

Senator Simard: You do not know that!

Senator Frith: Again I ask the Chair to restore some order and ask Senator Ottenheimer to sit down. He is not a chairman of the committee and he is not offering a report. I ask the chairman to make—

Senator Ottenheimer: Hopefully, I will do it!

Senator Frith: —the impartial decision that he sits in the Chair to make.

Senator Ottenheimer: The order is still reserved by me. I did rise on a point of order.

An Hon. Senator: Let him give his report!

Senator Frith: A point of order!

Senator Petten: Order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Ottenheimer: I am not—

Senator Perrault: Sit down!

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, the question is that there is no proceeding for the house on which a point of order can be raised.

Senator Ottenheimer: We will take our seats together!

Senator Lefebvre: Be quiet!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to know what is the point of order before being able to judge whether it is receivable.

Senator Frith: There is no proceeding before us. There is nothing on which to have a point of order.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Let us hear the point of order!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce respecting its examination of Bill C-62.

Senator Phillips: Point of order!

Senator Doody: Point of order!

Senator Ottenheimer: Point of order!

Senator Buckwold: —an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act—

Senator Ottenheimer: I am speaking on a point of order.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: You are not in Saint John's, here. Sit down! This is the Senate of Canada! Stop it!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! Order, please!

• (2110)

Senator Ottenheimer: I understand I have been recognized on a point of order and that is why I am continuing.

Some Hon. Senators: Point of order.

Senator Ottenheimer: I have been recognized on a point of order. The honourable Senator Buckwold has not been recognized. We can speak only one at a time. However, if we have to speak together, I presume that we can. It will be a duet.

I do not intend to cede, because I have been recognized by the Chair. Therefore, I will continue to speak until I have an opportunity to make my point of order unless I am directed by the Chair to resume my seat. I will not take directions to resume my seat from anyone else but the Chair.

It is my understanding that I have been recognized by the Chair on a point of order. If the Honourable Speaker orders me to sit down, I will do so. I am a long distance off and there is a fair bit of noise, but am I right in saying that I have been recognized by the Chair to make a point of order?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: All senators must sit down until the Chair—not you, Senator Ottenheimer—decides who is recognized.

Senator Ottenheimer: And not you, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: The Speaker decides.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: The Speaker is standing.

The Hon. the Speaker: What is your point of order? We are now dealing with Reports of Committees. Does your point of order have anything to do with Reports of Committees?

Senator Ottenheimer: It is a point of order, which I shall explain briefly. I certainly do not enjoy endeavouring to outshout anyone—either Senator Frith or Senator Buckwold. I thought that I had been recognized by the Chair, and that is the reason I did so. I do not enjoy doing it, and it is not my habit to so do.

An Hon. Senator: What is your point?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I was asked to give a report of the committee.

Senator Ottenheimer: We cannot both be speaking at the same time. The point of order that I wish to make is this. May I have a swallow of water before the next sentence?

Senator Denis: No water.

Senator Ottenheimer: I will do it without your concurrence.

I will make my point of order very briefly, if I am allowed to. I do not have to be allowed to, do I? I am doing it as a right. Where are my glasses? I will muddle through without them.

My point of order is this, and I will be brief. I will not attempt to outshout anyone again. The point of privilege is before the Senate and before the Chair. The Chair will give the opinion that either there is a prima facie case or there is not a prima facie case. That is the end of it. If there is a prima facie case, then the person who moved it has the right to propose a relevant motion, which obviously is voted on.

The essence of my point of order is this: The point of privilege on which a decision has not yet been made—whether or not there is a prima facie case—is pending. I have no idea what the ruling will be, but if the ruling is that there is a prima facie case and, therefore, a motion can be made, the whole thrust of the point of privilege is that the report which Senator Buckwold wishes to table, its presentation and deliberation by the committee and everything surrounding it in the committee—its getting to this place in this manner and in this way—is tainted, null and void or vitiated ab initio. I do not intend to try to characterize it any further. If it were tabled now, there would be no remedy, because a document resulting from contempt of Parliament or breach of privilege would have received the authorization or sanction of being considered by this body.

However, if there is no prima facie case, obviously the document can be presented. If the document is presented now and the ruling is that there is a prima facie case, depending on the outcome of any motion subsequent to that, there would be no remedy to put the Senate in a position whereby it had not sanctioned a document which could be ruled in contempt of Parliament. The point of order that I am making is that irreparable harm could be done with no remedy by the tabling of this document now. We need to have the ruling on the prima facie nature of the point of privilege before such a decision is made. If the report is tabled now and there is a ruling that there is a prima facie case, there can be no remedy. If the report is not tabled now and there is a ruling that there is no prima facie case, obviously there is a remedy, and that is the tabling of it. In essence, that is the point of order.

Again, I should like to say that I did not enjoy trying to outshout any honourable senators opposite, but I was under the assumption that I had been recognized on a point of order and did not wish that right to be usurped.

Senator Doody: Mr. Speaker, there is a point of order before the chamber. We need a ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would prefer to take this under advisement.

Senator Barootes: Next order of business!

Senator Doody: The point of order deals with the tabling of the document. If the point of order is acceptable, then the document will not be tabled until His Honour makes his ruling. If, for all the reasons that were pointed out by various senators here today, the process by which this document reached us is a flawed one, then it could be contended that the document is not receivable. Obviously it cannot be tabled here this evening until His Honour decides whether or not the point of order is indeed a legitimate one. I support Senator Ottenheimer's position. I contend that His Honour has to make a decision as to whether or not the document can indeed be tabled here this evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to speak on the point of order. I do not understand why Your Honour would have any difficulty making a ruling. Absolutely no precedents have been cited to support the position that Your Honour should refuse to accept the presentation of the report after Your Honour has called for Reports of Committees.

• (2120)

Senator Lefebvre: Exactly!

[Senator Ottenheimer.]

Senator Frith: There is no precedent at all. The only senators that Your Honour is asking to stand up are those who have committee reports to present.

Senator Lefebvre: Right on!

Senator Frith: The report itself is not before the Senate at the time it is tabled. The next thing Your Honour does, having asked for Reports of Committees, is to ask when the report shall be taken into consideration. Obviously, the implication there is that it is not at that moment being taken into consideration. So the report is not before the Senate when it is tabled; it is simply tabled, and that is what Your Honour has asked for.

How Your Honour could find that a point of order, raised by a senator who is not presenting a report for tabling, should be reserved, in order to understand whether there is a point of order, is beyond me. It is so obvious that it is not a point of order.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: There is nothing before the house.

Senator Frith: There is nothing at all before the house. That point of order might well be raised when the question of taking the report into consideration is put; but that question is not yet before the Senate. Your Honour has called for the tabling of reports of committees. A chairman of a committee has stood up. I do not understand why Your Honour wants to delay. I do not know how widespread is the support for this filibuster.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Barootes: Withdraw!

Senator Phillips: Come on! We don't have to make comments that reflect on the speaker!

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith, I must say that I did not appreciate that remark. I am trying to be as fair as I can. Senator Ottenheimer has raised a point of order, and, since I am not sure whether or not he has a point of order, I would like to study it. That is my privilege, and I do not think I should be impugned for taking that privilege.

Senator Phillips: Withdraw!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make a few comments about the point of order. I think that Senator Ottenheimer is attempting to relate the progress of a piece of legislation—namely, Bill C-62—to a separate question, a question of privilege alleging that the privileges of a member of the Senate were somehow abridged during a committee meeting. Certainly it has been alleged many times, both in the House of Commons and here, that privileges of individual members have been abridged. Usually the Speaker adjudicates as to whether there is a prima facie case. If it is found that there is a prima facie case, it is open to the individual member or senator to put a motion. Ultimately the Senate or the House of Commons must decide whether, in fact, a breach of privilege has occurred. That is the procedure. It relates to a possible deprivation of rights or privileges of members of Parliament, and that procedure is now in process.

However, it has never been argued that the progress of a piece of legislation should be stopped or arrested until that question of privilege has been settled. The progress of legislation and the privileges of a member are separate questions. The legislation stands on its own feet and there is a procedure by which we deal with legislation. I have never heard of a member of the House of Commons or the Senate suggest, after his or her privileges were violated at, for example, second reading, that until such time as the Speaker has considered the question of privilege the legislation should not advance.

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator MacEachen: That is a recipe for chaos, apart from the fact that it brings together two elements which logically and procedurally are separate. It is a separate procedure that deals with privilege and a separate procedure that deals with legislation. You cannot stop legislation simply by arguing that a member's privilege was affected as the legislation went through its various stages. That has never happened. To say tonight that we must stop the normal legislative process of Bill C-62 because a question of privilege has been raised by a member during the course of that legislative process is ludicrous. If that were the case, every bill could be arrested at every stage. You cannot have members rising and claiming that privileges have been abused and that the legislation cannot advance until the questions of privilege have been settled. They are two separate questions.

I would also like to urge another point. In my understanding of the rules, a point of order can only be raised when it is alleged that a proceeding that has taken place was improperly advanced. You cannot raise a point of order in a vacuum or pull one out of the atmosphere. You have to base it upon a proceeding that has been called, is before the House and upon which the member alleges an irregularity. At this point there is nothing irregular procedurally in the way Senator Buckwold has presented his report. It has been called by the Speaker from the Orders of the Day, and that is how legislation advances. How can we arrest that advancement and put it in the freezer while the Speaker contemplates whether or not the privileges of an individual senator have been abused? It seems to me that it is impossible even to adjudicate the question of privilege. How does one adjudicate upon a question of privilege before a committee when there is no transcript of what happened?

We have before us at least two separate versions of the events. It is a question of the credibility of those who have spoken, rather than an examination of the procedural sequence in the committee. However, that is a separate argument. My argument is that it would be quite unusual to attempt to link the normal progress of a bill—a bill that has received second reading, been referred to committee and the committee is about to present its report—to the suggestion that the process be stopped cold and frozen while a separate issue—namely, whether the privileges of a senator have been abridged—is examined. They are two separate procedures, both logically and procedurally, and cannot be linked.

I suggest that it would be very difficult to find that we have here a valid point of order. I think that it is very difficult to ask the Speaker to stop the process of legislation, which is conducted by fiat as laid down in the order paper, or to say that the Speaker can now say,if a question of privilege is raised during, for example, second reading, whether that legislation will advance before the question of privilege is settled. That is what is implied here, and that is the reason why I have risen on this occasion. It is an important point that is before us.

• (2130)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall take just a moment of your time. This afternoon three questions of order arose, statements that have been made by honourable senators on this side without challenge by any other honourable senator as to whether or not they were factual. Whether those three matters of order should have been raised this afternoon, now or later, in my humble opinion, casts serious doubt on the validity of the process by which this report is coming to us from the Honourable Senator Buckwold. There are at least three such questions of order.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask: Is it not a fact that the points raised this afternoon were not points of order but points of privilege? They were not points of order. I did not hear anyone say there was a point of order; it was a point of privilege raised in a series of speeches.

Senator Ottenheimer is now raising a point of order which is a separate question, and the Leader of the Government is now asserting that what we had this afternoon were questions of order. I took them to be questions of privilege and so defined by the launcher who has described the process by which questions of privilege are dealt with, namely, culminating in a motion if a prima facie case is established. A question of order is not dealt with in that way. A question of order is settled either on the spot or somewhat later by the Speaker. It does not require a motion from the House.

I come back to the point that when the question of privilege was raised there was no proceeding before the House upon which an irregularity could be founded. This goes back to my point that you cannot pull a question of privilege out of the atmosphere; it has to be founded on a proceeding that develops in the House.

I apologize for making that point in the form of a statement, I really wanted to ask whether the honourable gentleman is now saying that we have questions of order and not questions of privilege.? We ought to know, because the solution will be different.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point made by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. I should, however, say two things en passant. First, not ten minutes ago we heard the Deputy Leader of the Opposition say that the questions of privilege and points of order raised this afternoon had been taken under advisement by the Chair. He mentioned points of order.

Senator Frith: I was quite wrong if I said that.

Senator Murray: The record will show that.

Senator Frith: They were not points of order, they were all points of privilege.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend just ten minutes ago took a different position.

Senator Frith: I did not take a different position.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend said that the Chair had taken under advisement the questions of privilege and the points of order that were made.

Senator Frith: I am flattered that that makes it so. Thank you for the compliment.

Senator Murray: Secondly, my friends and colleagues who rose on questions of privilege immediately this afternoon did so in conformity with the rule that states that questions of privilege should be raised at the first opportunity. Arguably they could have waited until an item was called on Orders of the Day, but they felt it necessary to conform with the rule that requires that questions of privilege be raised right off the top. Senator Macquarrie made reference to this rule in an earlier intervention.

As I have said, three matters of order came up this afternoon. Whether they should have come up this afternoon, or they should be on the floor now or later, I think it is useful for me to identify them. There were at least three points of order that I want to identify.

Senator Frith: Points of order?

Senator Murray: As I say, they cast serious doubt on the validity of the process by which a report may come to us from the chairman, Senator Buckwold, and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Quite frankly, what they recount from the committee—and honourable senators who have recounted them have done so without challenge from the opposition—are three serious errors.

Hon. H.A. Olson: That is not right.

Senator Murray: My friends have not heard me identify them.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: You said, "without challenge."

Senator Molgat: There have been lots of challenges.

Senator Murray: Hear me out, senators. The statement was made this afternoon, not once but several times, that in the course of yesterday afternoon's committee an honourable senator, having put a motion, was permitted by the Chair to simply withdraw that motion and substitute another motion without the consent of the committee.

Senator Frith: Without unanimous consent. There was consent of the committee.

Senator Murray: There are rules. The honourable senator is still speaking for the majority of the committee, but the honourable senator knows what the rule is and he knows what the tradition is on matters of that kind.

Senator Frith: Not in committee.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Murray: "Not in committee" my honourable friend says. Has my friend read the rule?

Senator Frith: Have you read the rule? The committee is master of its own proceedings.

Senator Murray: The committee cannot make rules that run counter to the Rules of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Yes it can. It can make decisions.

Senator Murray: My friend is speaking from a guilty conscience.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: My friend is a great stickler for the rules, but he knows perfectly well what the rule is in respect of withdrawing motions and substituting other motions.

Senator Frith: The only thing that I know perfectly well is that you are wrong.

Senator Murray: My friend knows perfectly well that the chairman of the committee was in error in allowing that to happen.

Senator Frith: No, you are wrong.

Senator Murray: In any case, honourable senators, there has been no contesting of the fact that this happened—that Senator Frith was permitted by the Chair, and without leave of the committee, to withdraw a motion that he had already proposed, and to substitute another motion.

Senator Olson: Wrong.

Senator Murray: No one has contested it.

Senator Perrault: What do you mean?

Senator Murray: The second matter which came up was a question of whether, when a senator—again in this case, Senator Frith—moved the previous question, the Chairman decreed "the motion is not debatable." There again, I respectfully submit, and I think the rules will bear me out, that this was an error on the part of the chairman. He insisted that the motion was not debatable and we know that such a motion is debatable.

Senator Frith: Wrong. In the Senate, yes.

Senator Murray: We know that the motion is debatable and that it would definitely require leave in the committee to allow this to happen.

Senator Frith: The rule is that we settle these things in committee, not in the Senate.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend is agreeing that it is a question of order, that it is a matter of order that we are now discussing.

Senator Frith: Not here. It is out of order here. It is clear from the citations that it is out of order.

Senator Murray: Thirdly—and this is the most serious matter of order—we were told several times this afternoon about the refusal of the chairman to allow the bill to be considered clause by clause. The authorities are very clear on that. The authorities are very clear as to what is the function of the committee. The function of the committee is precisely to go through a bill clause by clause. I have been chairman of a committee. I was once chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and many pieces of legislation came before us. The only time that we made an exception to the rule that the committee must go through the bill clause by clause was when there was unanimous agreement of the committee to dispense with that requirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: I again say to the honourable chairman of the committee that it was a grievous error on his part to refuse the legitimate request of any one senator, let alone a group of senators, that the committee proceed to its proper function, that it carry out the responsibility that the rules entrust to a committee studying legislation, and that it go through the bill clause by clause.

So, honourable senators, those are the three points. I draw your attention, and particularly the attention of His Honour, to the third point, namely, the refusal to consider the bill clause by clause. This, it seems to me, along with the other points I have raised, casts into serious question the validity of the process by which a report may be coming to us from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I hear what the honourable the Leader of the Opposition has said about the proper time to make these arguments here, but, as I say, whether it was this afternoon, or now or later, these are valid questions of order.

Senator Frith: They are not.

Senator Murray: And they throw into question the validity of the process that honourable Senator Buckwold and his colleagues were engaged in yesterday.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with respect to its examination of Bill C-62.

Senator Barootes: We must have a ruling!

The Hon. the Speaker: I think I made it clear to the house that I would like to take this under advisement. I am getting all kinds of arguments which I would like to study early tomorrow morning and give a ruling tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Why not tonight?

Senator MacEachen: Your Honour, I would take it, if I may understand the situation here, that Senator Ottenheimer, supported by Senator Murray, has raised a point of order alleging that the committee report cannot be advanced, and that if you accepted that point of order you would not permit the report to be received. Are we also expecting that the point of order, if settled affirmatively from Senator Ottenheimer's point of view, also carries with it a judgment on the question of privilege? I think that would be an unfortunate linking. I take it that you are asking for some time to deal with the point of order and that you will provide a solution, if you find in Senator Ottenheimer's favour. I have made my argument against the point of order. I do not think we should wait until tomorrow to receive the ruling on the point of order.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: We are quite prepared to give you an opportunity to rule tonight, and we would be considerate in an adjournment period, because I think it is important to settle, and for the country to know, whether the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is not now to be received, at the insistence of the government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I take it, then, that honourable senators would like to recess?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed!

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Guay: Fifteen minutes!

Senator Cools: Fifteen minutes!

Senator Frith: Your Honour does not need a vote on that. You decide. We are asking you to have a recess to make the ruling. You make the decision.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Well, I will take 60 seconds, if I may. There are questions of privilege before the Chair. He has already heard the questions of order that I have identified. I presume that more than one ruling will be forthcoming on these matters.

Senator Molgat: Not necessarily.

Senator Murray: If they are not, then we still have the points of order that I have identified, and on which the Leader of the Opposition and other senators have not commented.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I was rather amazed to hear the Deputy Leader of the Opposition say to the Chair, "You can have a 15-minute recess."

Senator Frith: I did not say that. I did not say that.

Senator Phillips: I hope the Chair is not influenced by that.

Senator Frith: I am amazed to hear you say that, because I did not say that. I did not say "15 minutes". You are wrong, absolutely wrong.

Senator Perrault: Totally wrong.

Senator Phillips: Read the "blues" and see what you said.

Senator Frith: I said it was up to the Speaker to decide to have a recess and how long it would be.

Senator Phillips: Read the "blues", senator.

Senator Frith: There are no "blues" involved in it. I did not say it.

Senator Phillips: I hope the Chair will not be influenced by any direction from the Senate. The Chair is supposed to make the decision, and I hope the Chair will take the time—

Senator Frith: That is what I said, exactly. That is right.

Senator Phillips: —required to do it. It does not have to be today. It does not even have to be tomorrow. With great respect, I say to Your Honour, do not be influenced by directions from the other side.

Senator Frith: Or from that side.

Senator Phillips: Or from this side; I will agree with you on that. You should make the decision, Your Honour, and forget all the direction.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, just one further word so that we will understand what is now before the Senate and before His Honour. I understood that this afternoon there was a series of questions of privilege raised originally by Senator Ottenheimer. In the course of his several remarks he outlined the resolution of questions of privilege, if a prima facie case were established or found in the Speaker's mind. That is one subject. Next we have a question of privilege from Senator Ottenheimer, which is very finely based, namely that Bill C-62 cannot be advanced further from the point of order and that the report cannot be received until a separate question of privilege is not only established by the prima facie case but also a subsequent debate settled by the house. In other words, all of that emerges from his point of order. I have argued that point. Senator Murray raises a separate point of order, a third case, referring to alleged improper rulings made by the Chair in the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Murray: And appeals refused.

● (2150)

Senator MacEachen: He has asked Your Honour to adjudicate upon proceedings in the committee.

Senator Frith: The precedents say he cannot.

Senator MacEachen: It is on that point that I want to repeat what Senator Frith has said: It is not open to the Speaker of the main chamber to adjudicate events in committees. Speakers of the House of Commons have consistently said that the committees are the masters of their own proceedings. If there are mistakes made in the committees, so be it. That is up to the committee. I draw that to your attention in your consideration of the points of order and privilege. My understanding was that you would deal with the point of order raised by Senator Ottenheimer with respect to whether the resolution of the question of privilege was necessary before Bill C-62 could be advanced. That is all I would ask you to rule upon tonight. I would prefer it be done tonight. If Your Honour feels uncomfortable about that, we certainly would not press.

The Hon. the Speaker: As I said earlier, honourable senators, I would feel more comfortable if I could study this issue and rule on it tomorrow.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, before we leave this point, I must say that I disagree. I think that the matter of the point of order—strictly the point of order—raised by Senator Ottenheimer is a simple one and can be settled tonight. I can understand Your Honour wanting to spend some time on the points of privilege that were raised this afternoon, when you would have an opportunity to read the transcripts; but the point of order raised by Senator Ottenheimer is a direct, simple point of order: Can you prevent the forward movement of a piece of legislation by raising a point of order or a point of privilege? That is a simple question, not an involved one, and I do not believe it requires 24 hours' consideration.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, with respect to the point made by Honourable Senator Molgat, while I realize that he is the Speaker pro tempore, the senator in the Chair is the presiding Speaker. Although I do not have his exact words, His Honour has said something to the effect that he would feel more comfortable, or that it would be more appropriate for him to give his decision on that point of order tomorrow. It appears to me to be most inappropriate for any honourable senator, certainly the Speaker pro tempore, to criticize his decision. Surely, as a presiding officer of the Senate, he has stated that he wishes to give his decision tomorrow, and that should be that.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE THE SUBJECT MATTER OF AN ACT TO AMEND THE INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wedneday next, September 26, 1990, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related Acts, S.C. 1990, c. 35, and the regulations made pursuant thereto.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE HONOURABLE PAT CARNEY

REQUEST FOR APOLOGY FOR ALLEGED INSULT TO ITALIAN COMMUNITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A CTV news reporter had asked Senator Carney at her Vancouver home why she did not attend the swearing in ceremony of newly appointed Tory senators in Ottawa. She responded:

> (I) wasn't going to drop everything to stand around with people from the Italian community while they learn where the Parliamentary bathroom is.

This uncalled for and undignified comment has outraged the Italian community. I am asking the Leader if he would ask Senator Carney to make a formal apology to Senator Con Di Nino, his mother, his wife and a couple of relatives who were present—a handful of people altogether. If she does not agree to do that, I wonder if the Leader himself would make such a formal apology to Senator Con Di Nino and to the Italian community to show that the Conservative Party is not tainted with the same type of racial prejudice.

Hon. Patricia Carney: Honourable senators, the allegation is completely unfounded, without truth, and should not have been raised in this house in this manner without any basis of support.

An. Hon. Senator: It is in the paper!

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I do not see why Senator Carney is allowed to respond to this question when she is not the chairman of a committee. Questions posed during Question Period can only by answered by the Leader or by committee chairmen. I am again asking the Leader this question. The reporter who interviewed Senator Carney stated that the report, as it appeared in the media, is correct, and he stands by the notes he took when he posed that question to Senator Carney. I again ask the Leader! Will he ask Senator Carney to apologize to Senator Con Di Nino and his relatives, and will he apologize to the Italian community, for this undignified and outrageous comment?

Senator Bosa: The reporter in question is Mark Shneider, and he attests that this quotation is correct and was reported precisely as Senator Carney stated it. So I am again asking the Leader: Will he apologize to Senator Con Di Nino and his relatives, and to the Italian community as a whole, before the Conservative Party is tainted with the same type of racial prejudice?

Senator Roblin: It is based on a lie!

Senator Murray: My honourable friend is not usually so unreasonable. His obligation, I remind him as a member of this place, is to accept the word of our colleague—not to accept the word of Mark Shneider, or some other journalist. His obligation is to accept the word of our colleague.

● (2200)

I did not rise immediately because I saw that Senator Carney wished to rise in order to make a personal statement in response to the allegation which has now been placed on the record by Senator Bosa and repeated twice. But however many times he repeats this quotation, this article, or whatever it is, the fact remains that Senator Carney has told him and her colleagues, from her place in the Senate, that there is no basis whatever to this allegation. The matter, therefore, is closed.

Senator Bosa: Perhaps the Leader would ask Senator Carney to explain her version of this case so that he can report to us how these things happened. She mentioned the name of the Italian community and the bathroom. The Italian community does not need anyone to show them where the bathrooms are. The Italians discovered this continent!

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, on a point of privilege, because the honourable senator has impugned my honesty on this matter, senators might be interested to know that the television station that employs Mr. Shneider's lawyers advised them that they could not use that information because there was no basis for it. The item was killed by the lawyers because there was no transcript and the television station's lawyers felt that there was insufficient evidence to run it. The allegation ran only because a Liberal colleague repeated the allegation in a public way, which gave the media an excuse to run it. However, the television lawyers felt that there was no basis for the allegation and therefore it could not proceed at that point. I think that helps reinforce my point that this allegation is in itself very damaging. The allegation alleged by the honourable senator has no basis in fact, and continuing to recycle this allegation is harmful.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. References were made to some Liberal colleague who incited the press to carry this story. It is unfair to Liberal colleagues, but, without naming names, no Liberal colleague was associated with any such story.

Senator Carney: If Senator Perrault read the paper, he would identify a colleague not in this house but in the other house. He repeated the allegation in a public way and therefore it was repeated in the media. I think I will not permit the matter to end there. People should not be able to make these kinds of allegations without being able to show that there was validity for them, and in this case legal council decided that there was no validity for the accusation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Did you make a statement or not? We have to accept it if you tell us that you made a statement, but you have not made a statement.

Senator Carney: Yes, I did make a statement.

MONETARY POLICY

EFFECT OF CONFISCATORY INTEREST RATES ON ALBERTA

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I realize the hour is late and I will be as brief as I can. I gave an undertaking to a lot of concerned Canadians in my region that I would ask this question of the Leader of the Government at the very first opportunity, and that is now.

I can tell him that there have been many difficulties since we last met in May involving many important things such as armed forces commitments and so on. But I want to tell him this, too: Government policy is causing the greatest hardship and the greatest distress to the Canadians in my part of the country, I refer to the monetary policy and the consequent interest rates that are being compounded as a result of this. Interest rates may have started to come down. The prime rate has come down 1 per cent from 14.75 to 13.75 per cent. The difference between the Canadian prime rate and the American prime rate is still about 500 basis points.

I would simply like to ask the Leader of the Government this question: Now that the policy initiated by the government has initiated a recession across this country, can the minister tell us what they are going to do to give us some relief from these interest rates?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, without engaging in a debate, I think I should point out that the slower rate of economic growth in the country that was foreseen—indeed it was predicted by Finance Minister Wilson in his last budget—meant that we could not have sustained for long the unprecedented period of expansion that the Canadian economy had undergone. Secondly, I think I should remind the honourable senator that the economic and fiscal policies of the government are working.

Senator Olson: You wanted a recession.

Senator Murray: No, no; the objective of those policies was to contain inflation. My honourable friend is wrong about that. He should at least wait until the statistics from the present quarter have come in.

It is true that the economy has slowed down. That is to be expected. It was foreseen; it was predicted. But the important thing is that the goal of containing inflation is being achieved. The rate of inflation is heading down to 4 per cent annually.

I would have thought that that would be good news to my honourable friend and all of his friends in western Canada.

The third point I wanted to emphasize to my honourable friend is that the bank rate, in consequence, has been coming down week by week for 10 or 12 weeks. My honourable friend is concerned that it is gradual, but the trend is in the right direction. I would have thought that the honourable senator would have had some satisfaction with the trend and some contrition for the wild and irresponsible statements that he made in this place last spring about the direction the Canadian economy was taking.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will respect the hour; it is late, but I can tell the honourable senators that I am going to order a couple of thousand copies of today's Hansard and distribute them to the people whom the minister has said have deliberately caused this kind of hardship. I will pursue this question another day.

[Senator Olson.]

GULF CRISIS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL DEPLOYING CANADIAN TROOPS IN RESPONSE TO IRAQI AGGRESSION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, since we are all concerned with parliamentary tradition and parliamentary practice, why he has failed to follow parliamentary practice today by not tabling the order in council dated September 15 that was tabled in the House of Commons yesterday.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): To what does the order in council refer?

Senator Grafstein: I am referring to the Hansard of the other place at page 13218.

• (2210)

It is a statement by the Honourable Bill McKnight, Minister of National Defence, which states:

> Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to table PC 1990-1995 dated September 15, 1990, an Order in Council, deploying Canadian troops in response to Iraqi aggression.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I thought that document might have been among the many tabled earlier tonight by my friend the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Grafstein: I have examined that and it is not there.

Senator Murray: If it is not there, there is no difficulty in obtaining a copy and tabling it tomorrow.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Is there going to be a discussion in this chamber about that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as a matter of fact there have been some preliminary discussions in the usual channels, if I may put it that way.

Senator Grafstein: On traditional practice? The parliamentary practice?

Senator Murray: Will my honourable friend resume his seat. He asked a question and I am attempting to reply. There was also a second question from his colleague, Senator Olson, as to whether we were going to have a discussion in this chamber about the dispatch of troops and the response of the Government of Canada to the Gulf crisis.

In answer to Senator Olson's question, there have been some preliminary discussions through the usual channels concerning the possibility of such a debate. We would welcome one. Before long I would be happy to bring in a resolution, or have one of my colleagues do so, to provide the opportunity for such a debate.

Senator Grafstein: I say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that we have been lectured today about parliamentary tradition and democratic practice. This democratic practice is as intense as any practice in the parliamentary world. When a parliament of a democratic country deals with issues of war and peace it is incumbent upon the government to convene Parliament, which includes the Senate, at the earliest possible opportunity and bring the order in council forward and make a statement in order that the Senate, as well as the House of Commons, can deal with this issue. The government has not done that tonight. That is a breach of parliamentary tradition, and it is not satisfactory. Aside from what internal discussions take place, I hope that tomorrow the minister will table that order in council so that members on all sides may have an opportunity to deal with this sacred parliamentary tradition.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator talks about sacred parliamentary tradition. At the appropriate time we can debate the response of the Canadian government to the Gulf crisis, what the decisions were, when they were taken, when the order in council was passed, when Parliament was convened, and how the whole process was in complete conformity with the spirit and letter of the law and of our parliamentary traditions. We can and will have a debate on that.

I am sorry that the document to which my friend refers was not included in the documents that the Deputy Leader of the Government tabled earlier. However, as I told him, we will obtain it and bring it in tomorrow. Very soon we will give notice of a motion to provide an opportunity to debate the whole question. We will invite all of our honourable friends opposite to state the position of the Liberal Party on this matter.

Senator Grafstein: I would like to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government the tradition of recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity when war or war-like actions take place that might involve the nation and requires the Government of Canada to deal with the matter at the earliest possible moment. It is not a matter for debate, or of delay. It is a matter of primary importance. There are Canadians who are now approaching a war zone, and this chamber has not had an opportunity to deal with that particular issue in any way, shape or form. While we deal with issues of taxation, which are important, surely the lives of Canadians and the issues of war and peace are more important.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE AGREEMENT ON CANADIAN EMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government stated that the government's economic game plan is working. That is more than can be said for the 160,000 industrial workers who have lost their jobs since the inception of the Free Trade Agreement with the United States. Those were 160,000 well paying industrial jobs, and the source of that information is Statistics Canada. There have been 50 per cent more bankruptcies last month than one year ago. There have been 30,000 bankruptcies.

Senator Haidasz: 78 per cent in Ontario.

Senator Perrault: Is this the economic game plan which is working? I am sure the Leader of the Government might have described the sinking of the Titanic as a navigational triumph. The fact is that you guys have hit the iceberg and you are completely out of touch with what is going on in this country. We are waiting for some good news from the Free Trade Agreement which was supported by so many of the senators in this chamber. Bring us some good news. Tell us why that parts manufacturing company in Toronto is going down south, along with the other companies that have left in the past 12 months. We want a report. We do not want some vague statement that the game plan is working.

A simple question: Do you think the trend is going to continue, or can we see some light at the end of the tunnel?

Senator Perrault: Those companies will keep on going down to Mexico.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend will have an opportunity to debate that, as I say, in a more coherent manner than is possible during the Oral Question Period.

However, I should point out to the honourable senator that if he looks at the unemployment rate in this country he will find that it is below the unemployment rate that existed during much of the 1980s when his own government was in power.

The last time that my friend made those statements about free trade, the jobs it was costing and the companies that had left, I came in here with a whole list of companies, many of them in his own province of British Columbia. On the authority of the people who are making the investments, they would not have been made without the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. The documentation that I brought to this place was so impressive that it struck the honourable senator dumb.

Senator Perrault: I am sure that the information he gathered together from his various sources may have impressed the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As I recall, the list was shockingly and pitifully short. I will be pleased to place an inquiry on the order paper, because we are going to find out whether it is working for the good of Canadian men and women in the industrial sector.

GULF CRISIS

EMBARGO ON SHIPMENT TO IRAQ—EFFECT ON CANADIAN WHEAT SALES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: My question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it is also on the Gulf crisis; but it is of a slightly different order. I do not expect an answer tonight, but I hope the government leader can get it for us soon. As I am sure the minister is aware, the embargo on shipments to Iraq has a very particular regional impact in Canada.

Iraq was the fourth largest purchaser of Canadian wheat, the sixth largest purchaser of Canadian barley. With this cut-off it has an adverse impact on western Canada in particular. I do not quarrel with the decision. However, it is a Canadian decision in conjunction with other countries which has an adverse regional impact. Has the government any plans to correct that impact or arrange for some measure of aid to the particular region affected because of the national decision which affects western Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I think I will take my friend's advice and accept that question as notice.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR RESOLUTION OF IMPASSE IN SENATE ON THIRD READING OF BILL C-21

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to put my question directly to my colleagues opposite but it is customary to direct this kind of question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us, confirm or tell us whether there have been exchanges between his government team in the Senate and the leaders on the other side with a view to putting an end to and resolving the deadlock concerning bill C-21 on the unemployment insurance reform?

I have no problem accepting and listening to the type of questions dealing with the Persian gulf crisis. Honourable senators, I can tell you that in the Maritime Provinces and in New Brunswick in particular there is a crisis, a real crisis due to the refusal of the Liberal majority in the Senate to pass bill C-21. The Premier of New Brunswick has raised the issue on several occasions and his Cabinet colleagues did the same thing—

Senator Lefebvre: Is that your question, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: Yes, that is my question, Senator Lefebvre, you would rather talk about the crisis elsewhere, but I prefer talking about the crisis back home. Honourable senator, could you give us some indications which might lead us to believe there might be an understanding and a solution concerning this problem, just so we might tell the people who have no money and worse still those whose number of weeks is not enough for them to be entitled to benefits that there may be so hope? That is my question.

I think that to put an end to all this the Liberal majority told us today that September 25 is a magic date to pass a bill here in the Senate, to refuse or accept the report on an urgent bill which we want to be in force by January 1.

[Senator Molgat.]

For a year now we have had in this chamber a bill which will have a considerable impact on the current situation and which would enable us to provide better training for our workers, and also a bill which is very important in terms of our economic and fiscal agenda and the economic recovery of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, I fully share the views of my friend, Senator Simard, that the deadlock concerning Bill C-21 should not last for ever. After all, the stakes are considerable for the unemployed, for pregnant women, and for the men and women who want to take advantage of the training programs provided under the bill.

I must say that in recent days I did have discussions about this with one of the premiers. Of course he wants us to pass Bill C-21 at the earliest opportunity.

As to the discussions between the government and members of the opposition, I know there have been unofficial contacts but I remain confident that before long it will be possible to proceed with the debate and, I hope, have the bill approved by this chamber.

VARIABLE ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS

POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCING A BILL IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the leader of the government in the Senate regarding Bill C-21.

Is the government planning to introduce in the House of Commons a bill to give back to the unemployment program the generosity it was always intended to have?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, my friend is referring, if I am not mistaken, to the variable eligibility requirements.

There are other elements of Bill C-21 which are of considerable importance, not only to the unemployed but also to all workers who wish to benefit from maternity leave, retraining programs and education programs.

That piece of legislation contains many provisions of great importance for all workers in this country. The best would be for the bill to be passed by this House as soon as possible so that it can receive royal assent.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I agree with the leader of the government that Bill C-21 has some merits.

I cannot speak for the Liberal Party, but, for my part, I would gladly support a bill in which the government would restore the eligibility requirements as they were before Bill C-21 was introduced.

ENERGY

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the Leader of the Government which I first asked on May 17 and to which an answer was given on June 19. It had to do with a decision of the government on the tax credit requested for the development of the Scotia Synfuels Project.

The Leader of the Government said that he would look into the matter. Subsequently Senator Doody replied saying that the government house leader had been advised that the review process is ongoing, namely, a review of the tax and fiscal implications to be conducted in the Department of Finance and other departments. That is what was said on June 19.

I wonder if it is now possible for the Leader of the Government to tell me whether that review process has been completed and whether a favourable decision with respect to the tax credit for the Scotia Synfuels Project has been reached.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, I am not as up to date on the matter as I should be. I shall inform myself shortly and report to the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I would venture to risk asking permission of the Senate to have all remaining orders, motions and inquiries stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, September 26, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that John Trevor Eyton has been summoned to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated:

Hon. John Trevor Eyton, of Caledon, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Norman K. Atkins.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867 in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE LESTER B. PEARSON

TRIBUTES ON UNVEILING OF STATUE ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am honoured to have been asked by my party to draw the attention of this chamber to an auspicious event today, namely, the unveiling of a statue on Parliament Hill in memory of a great statesman and Prime Minister, the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. The event will take place at about 3.30 this afternoon. I believe discussions are taking place between the heads of our parties in reference to a recess by means of which we may pay tribute to this great man.

I could have prepared an elaborate and flowery statement for this occasion, but having known Mr. Pearson. and recalling how he disliked cant and the grand eloquent disquisition, I decided that I would make one of my unvarnished utterances as we regard a man who was clearly our greatest internationalist and, indeed, our first international Prime Minister, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, and one who honoured Canada as he honoured peace and supported negotiation and conciliation. I did not get to the United Nations until 1957, when I had the honour to represent my country. Everywhere in that assembly, when I was introduced as a Canadian, the name of Lester Pearson came up. In later years as I travelled abroad leaders of lands which I visited would ask me to convey greetings to Mike Pearson.

We have not been long as a nation in the field of international affairs, because for quite awhile our international affairs were conducted by the mother country. Sir Robert Borden, I believe, was the first one to move us into concerns for the world beyond our borders, but in his successor, Mr. Pearson, we illumined and illuminated the international scene.

I, however, think of Mr. Pearson, not so much for the great achievements, but for the man he was. I have always thought that the best that can be said about a person is that, "they take their duties seriously, but not themselves too seriously", and that again is the kind of man he was. Mr. Pearson was self-effacing and capable of turning a joke upon himself. When I think of him—and I think of him often—I recall to mind my own favourite leader, Robert Stanfield, who had the same qualities. I remember an incident when these two were leading their respective parties in the House of Commons. Mr. Pearson, with his usual grace, had invited Robert Stanfield to 24 Sussex Drive for a luncheon. Mr. Stanfield, who was a very good gardener, wanted to see the lawn and gardens. At one stage he looked at a shrub and he asked the Prime Minister, "Well, now, when it reaches this stage, do you transplant or cut back?" Mr. Pearson, who was not a great gardener said, "At that stage I phone the National Capital Commission." That is the kind of man I recall, a person of great personal kindnesses. Had he lived longer, he would have been the great elder statesman of the country, but he was taken from us too soon.

However, his legacy will be with us forever, and I am honoured that I had the opportunity of representing the Senate in the arrangements made to honour his memory by erecting a statue in recognition of his services. Even the statue, which was chosen by his family, reflects a man of greatness and a man of modesty; a man of whom it might be said, in the words of Kipling, that he was one of those who walked with kings but did not lose the common touch.

I am proud to be part of celebrating a great Canadian and a highly regarded internationalist, our own Lester B. Pearson.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to express my appreciation to Senator Macquarrie for beginning this set of tributes to the late Right Honourable L. B. Pearson and to thank him for the generous description he has given of Mr. Pearson's contribution to Canadian public life.

His name, as Senator Macquarrie has stated, is linked very closely—indeed, almost inseparably—to Canadian foreign policy to the extent that Pearsonian diplomacy, as it has been called, still continues as the integral style of Canadian foreign policy and diplomacy despite reviews of foreign policy and sporadic efforts to find a new and more original approach. I believe Senator Macquarrie would agree that his insistence on a unique role for a middle power, his reliance upon multilateral institutions particularly to attain Canadian objectives, is still a cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy.

Mr. Pearson was more than a diplomat; he was a politician and a parliamentarian. We all know the Honourable Paul Martin, who was a close colleague of Mr. Pearson in cabinet, at university and in private life. Mr. Martin used to say, "Everybody thinks Mike is the scholar and I am the politician; but the fact is that I am the scholar and Mike is the real politician." He proved to be an excellent politician in the management of his party and in surviving what must have been the most tumultuous period in Canadian parliamentary history. It was his duty to preside over two minority governments. He never had a majority—a majority eluded him. But it is still a truism that despite his minority status he achieved considerable legislative success and when one takes away the undoubted acrimony that prevailed between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Diefenbaker in those years, there is still a solid record of accomplishment, including, in addition to foreign policy, some new probes into domestic policy.

Certainly Mr. Pearson was alive to the changing scene in Quebec and in those years he was advised very closely on constitutional questions by a person who later became a member of the Senate, the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne. He was, in a sense, Mr. Pearson's Quebec constitutional advisor. In that period, the question of regional development as a major thrust of public policy was in its infancy and he spoke quite frequently in those years about the necessity of new regional development policies.

In any event, I will not go any further in reviewing his career except to say that, in addition to his status as a Prime Minister and a statesman, I could call him a close personal friend. I knew him very well indeed and spent hours in his company on various occasions. When he was Leader of the Opposition, he had, as we all know, a summer home in the Gatineau and he used to play at the Larrimac course. I used to play with him, and only an observer could know who was least qualified to be on the golf course. I made one mistake: At one time I had a better score on that course than he did; and I certainly never permitted it to happen again, because his irritation was evident.

He was a gentleman full of humour and wisdom, and, as Senator Macquarrie has said, not at all pompous; he was friendly to everyone. He had, in a sense, a disarming style with every individual he met. So it is a glimpse into the past to be reminded today that we are unveiling a memorial to his memory.

As we gather to have the unveiling conducted, flying over the Parliament building will be the Canadian flag, for which Mr. Pearson fought so courageously at a time when not everyone in Canada felt it was appropriate to have a distinctive Canadian flag. Now it is accepted everywhere and we are proud to have it. I think that he would be proud to see that the flag is now a source of unity for all Canadians.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last night I was asked by Senator Ottenheimer to rule on a point of order respecting the relationship between the questions of privilege which had been raised earlier in the day and the presentation of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

[Translation]

Senator Ottenheimer described his Point of Order as follows:

> ". . . if the ruling is that there is a prima facie case and therefore a motion can be made, the whole thrust of the Point of Privilege is that the report which Senator Buckwold wishes to table, its presentation and deliberation by the Committee and everything surrounding it in the Committee (it getting to this place in this manner and in this way) is tainted, nul and void or vitiated ab initio. I do not intend to try to characterize it. If it were tabled now, there is no remedy because a document resulting from contempt of Parliament or breach of privilege has received the authorization or sanction of resumption in this body."

[English]

The Chair does not intend to rule today on the numerous questions of privilege raised earlier in yesterday's sitting. It appears, however, that many of the points raised touched on allegations of possible contempt of the Senate and disregard of its rules by the chairman of the Banking Committee or the committee itself. Since the Chair has not had time to review the printed copy of yesterday's Hansard, I will reserve my ruling on these questions of privilege.

If a contempt of the Senate has occurred, the Senate is free to take certain actions to deal with it. However, it does not appear feasible to the Chair that we can turn back the clock and prevent the presentation of a committee report on the grounds that a question of privilege regarding the breaking of the rules in a committee is pending.

For this reason, I must rule that Senator Ottenheimer does not have a valid point of order.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Order! Order! You made your point!

I know that some senators, Senators Simard in particular, feel somewhat ill at ease when ordinary and under privileges people make their voices heard through petitions. It seems to be bothering them a lot but it shows how little respect they have for the basic purpose of our democratic institution which is to let ordinary people be heard. Thank you, honorable senators.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce respecting its examination of Bill C-62, to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Before His Honour puts the question as to when the said report shall be taken into consideration, I have a brief point of order that I should like to leave with honourable senators. It is really the continuation of a dialogue in which the Leader of the Opposition and I engaged last evening.

I am aware that yesterday, in the course of discussion, a number of matters of order came up arising from proceedings of the committee. His Honour has just ruled that neither these nor the questions of privilege would be sufficient to stop the tabling of the report.

The tabling of the report has just taken place. The Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition both argued yesterday and last night that these matters, including these matters of order, are procedural matters internal to the committee and that they must be resolved within the committee and not brought to the floor of the house. However that may be, there was and is at least one matter of order which is not internal to the committee. It is a matter which has to do with the relationship of the committee to this house and with the failure of the committee to carry out its mandate from the house. Therefore, it is for the Senate to deal with it.

It is a matter of fact, stated and repeated several times by honourable senators, and not contested by other members of the committee, that the Chairman, supported, I acknowledge, by a majority of the committee, had refused to proceed through a clause-by-clause consideration of the bill. Consequently a vital step in the legislative process was omitted.

Please permit me, again briefly, to place on the record the relative citation from Beauchene. It is found in Beauchene's Fifth Edition at citation 763:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word > by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable.

It is no accident that the phrase "making such amendments in it as may seem more likely to render it more generally unacceptable" is contained in the citation that I have just placed on the record.

Once a bill goes to committee, it has already received second reading, approval in principle, in the chamber. In the Twenty-first Edition of Erskine May, the foundation of citation 763 is found at page 486. In support of what I have just said, I will read one sentence:

> A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of its principle.

I readily acknowledge that there are many options open to a committee, and I will come to that in just a moment; but the fact of the matter is that in refusing to proceed to a clause-by-clause consideration of the bill, the committee has failed in its duty to the Senate, which is the body which created the committee, which committed the bill to the committee and which instructed the committee to examine the bill clause by clause.

This instruction to a committee is implicit in the authorities I have quoted. As I told the Senate last night, from my own experience as a member of committees, and indeed as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for several years, it is incumbent upon a chairman to ask the committee if the committee is ready to proceed to a clause-by-clause examination.

Senator Olson: The request was never made.

Senator Murray: That is not the evidence. My honourable friend states that the request was never made. The evidence presented yesterday by honourable senators on this side and never contested—and, as a matter of fact, acknowledged to be accurate by the chairman of the committee yesterday—was that they did ask for clause-by-clause examination. My friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, states that he asked for clause-by-clause examination, but that the chairman of the committee—and supported, I presume, by the majority there—refused it.

I come back to what I began to say. In my experience as a chairman of that committee, and as a member of other committees, if only one honourable senator asks that the committee proceed with its duty of examining the bill clause by clause, then that must be done. I contend that to dispense with the requirement of proceeding clause by clause takes leave—in other words, it requires unanimous consent.

I said that I would be brief, and I will sit down in a moment. However, let me anticipate one of the arguments that may be raised by my friends opposite on this matter, and perhaps it will save honourable senators the necessity of hearing me a second time on the point of order.

Honourable senators may invoke rule 81 and allege that this rule relieves the committee of the obligation to examine the bill clause by clause. For your convenience, I will read rule 81 into the record. It states:

> 81. When a committee to which a bill has been referred considers that the bill should not be proceeded with further in the Senate, it shall so report to the Senate, stating its reasons. If the motion for the adoption of the report is carried, the bill shall not reappear on the Order Paper.

This demonstrates what I said a few moments ago, that there is an array of options open to the committee, including the option to reach the conclusion that the bill should not be proceeded with further. As I understand it, that option is open to the committee.

Senator Olson: That is what the committee exercises.

Senator Murray: But the committee must consider the bill first. It must consider the bill clause by clause. It is not sufficient for the committee simply to duplicate the debate on second reading, to duplicate the debate on the principle of the bill, and to declare that it has come to a different conclusion than the Senate had reached in its debate on second reading. That course is not open to the committee. If it comes to a conclusion that the bill should not be proceeded with, the committee must have had the opportunity to reach that conclusion on the basis of the way in which the clauses of the bill do or do not fulfil the legislative intent of the decision made by the Senate when it supported the bill in principle at second reading.

• (1430)

So, honourable senators, I must confess that I am not certain as to the remedy for this situation. I suspect the remedy may be to return the bill to committee for the purpose of clause-by-clause examination. There may be some other course open to us, but I do not know what that course might be, nor am I certain at this point whether the remedy lies within the hands of the Chair to decide, or whether it is a matter requiring action by the Speaker. These are matters that I place before honourable senators and before Your Honour. However, I have a valid point of order.

My valid point of order states that the committee has not carried out the instructions of the Senate. That is, it has not carried out its mandate from the Senate. As a first step, I am asking Your Honour to rule as soon as you can on my point of order. Furthermore, I am stating that senators should not be asked to decide when to debate the report, and certainly should not start to debate the report until you have ruled on this matter.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has argued that the committee has not carried out the mandate given to it by the Senate. I take it that the mandate given to the committee is very general, namely, to study and report. In some cases the order paper states that the bill is "referred" to a standing committee. So the mandate is general indeed. Presumably the committee itself is permitted, in line with the arguments made yesterday, to determine its own proceedings. That is my general point.

I wish to comment upon the argument made by Senator Murray that a detailed clause-by-clause study of a bill is standard practice and required in the Senate. I am newer to the Senate than Senator Murray, but one of the surprises I received when I arrived here was to discover that bills were adopted in committee without clause-by-clause study. I remember having an argument with our former colleague, Senator Hicks, and with Senator Frith wherein I asked, "Why do you not have a clause-by-clause study of a bill in the Senate?"

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: You are right!

Senator MacEachen: They replied, "Well, that is not our practice all the time."

Senator Frith: Sometimes we do, sometimes we do not.

Senator Murray: You have the chairman to ask.

Senator MacEachen: Personally I believe that a perfectionist in parliamentary procedure would say that it requires detailed study. I rapidly add that that is not the perfectionist attitude that has prevailed in the Senate. I asked Senator Bonnell if the committee had a detailed clause-by-clause study of the drug bill. He said, "No." The title was carried, as were some amendments. However, no detailed clause-by-clause study was conducted.

I asked Senator Thériault about the UI bill. I asked him if a clause-by-clause study has been conducted. His answer was no.

Senator Phillips: You are not quoting very good authorities.

Senator MacEachen: I believe they are excellent authorities. They were present at the committee. They have stated that the practice is that a clause-by-clause study is not conducted in Senate committees all the time. Presumably, the committee decides whether it should have a clause-by-clause study or not. That is what I understand.

Given the practice, I do not think it is fair to pick out this committee and say, "You have failed in your duties." I do not think that is fair. I would agree if Senator Murray were to take a different tack and say, "In the future, let us insist that the clauses be called." If that is his view, then I agree with it.

Senator Murray: If any honourable senator wants.

Senator MacEachen: Let us not turn the clock back, as the Speaker has admonished us in his ruling.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, what we are engaged in this afternoon—-

Senator Frith: —is a filibuster!

Senator Roblin: —is a continuation of our discussion of the conduct of affairs of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee last Monday.

Senator Frith: In spite of the ruling.

Senator Roblin: I am about to make some comments on that, with particular reference to the point raised by my colleague, the Leader of the Government in this House. So far, I have been a bystander in this discussion. However, I do not think it can be safely alleged that the Senate can afford to remain indifferent to the conduct of one of its committees regardless of how strongly some may feel, such as Senator Frith and the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Frith: And the Speaker.

Senator Roblin: —that the committee is empowered to do what it likes. What goes on in committees is indeed the business of the whole Senate. Some time, sooner or later, we will have to come to grips with the issues that have been raised in respect of the conduct of the committee.

Senator Perrault: You should have come to the meetings.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend would restrain himself for a while and allow me to make my argument, I—-

Senator Perrault: You would know a lot more about it if you had attended. I attended the meetings at least.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is apparently wise in these matters. I am glad he attended. However, I am compelled to rely on the testimony offered by senators in this house. I regard that as information upon which some argument can be based.

My concern in this matter was aroused by the way in which members of the house were making charges about the conduct of the committee, and as they were crystallized by Senator Everett. I do not have the Hansard of yesterday in front of me since it is not available. I will have to rely on my memory as to what those matters were. If the allegations are correct, then it is a matter of concern.

Senator Perrault: You are saying the same thing as Senator Murray said.

Senator Roblin: You will hear it again, then. Just sit and listen to it because it is your duty to listen, as it is my duty to speak.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: The drip, drip, drip of tedium, and the hard rock of ignorance.

Senator Roblin: There is no way that any man opposite, or lady either for that matter, can intimidate me or any other member on this side. We may be the minority, but we have a right to speak, and speak we shall.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is one man here who can, I think, and ought to intimidate Senator Roblin. That is His Honour, who has ruled on the very point Senator Roblin is arguing.

Senator Roblin: The Speaker has not ruled on that point. He has ruled on whether or not the proceedings of the committee should be held up on account of points of privilege. He said that they could not be. That is not what I am talking about at all. I am talking about what went on in the committee in terms of rules of order.

Senator Frith: The Speaker ruled on the points of order; he did not rule on the question of privilege.

Senator Roblin: I am going to continue to make this speech regardless of the barracking I get from the other side.

An Hon. Senator: Go right ahead.

Senator Perrault: You are under instructions, and that is why you are going to continue.

Senator Roblin: I am going to repeat the points raised by Senator Everett, which he crystallized in his summation of the matter. I should like to deal with the defence, and I am going to lay out the charges.

First, there is the fact that certain members of the committee ought to have had access to the writing of the report, but were excluded. These include the deputy chairman and members of the steering committee, to say nothing of other members of the committee who apparently had no rights in this matter.

Second, recognized rules of procedure—

• (1440)

Senator Frith: Your Honour, the senator has said he is about to repeat everything that was brought up yesterday by Senator Everett, Senator Robertson and all senators who spoke on the point of privilege. Your Honour has postponed that ruling, but has ruled on the question of order that the clock could not be turned back to what took place in the committee. Senator Roblin said, "Sit there and listen while I turn the clock back." He said he is not going to be intimidated by anyone, including the Speaker, who has just ruled that the clock ought not to be turned back. Is there any order in this place?

Your Honour should enforce his ruling and simply say that this is a matter of order. Let us proceed. Certainly there is nothing to prevent a point of order being raised. However, when a senator boldly tells us, "I am going to go over everything that was mentioned yesterday. I am going to turn the clock back and you sit there and listen to it, in spite of the fact that the Speaker has ruled that I am not to do that," I ask Your Honour to rule this intervention out of order.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not talking about the points of privilege that were raised yesterday.

Senator Hastings: Speaker!

Senator Frith: That is exactly what Your Honour has ruled on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith, at this point I have yet to agree with you on what Senator Roblin has just said. Let us hear a little more.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is quite satisfactory. The Chair has said that if the case being put forward is a repetition or an attempt to go back into the proceedings of the committee, which was the foundation of the other point of order, and if it is, in fact, to use Your Honour's own metaphor, a turning back of the clock, Your Honour will intervene and say that the intervention is repeating something that you have ruled on and that it is out of order.

Senator Roblin: I must say that I disagree with almost everything my friend has said. His Honour said that you cannot turn the clock back—nor can you. However, that does not prevent an honourable senator from speaking to points of order that have been a subject of debate in this house and which, as my friend will find out before I finish, are related to the point of order raised by my leader. I am going to continue with what I have to say.

I am not going to repeat what was said yesterday regarding the rules. I have an entirely different point to make. If my honourable friend would be patient and hear me out, he will see exactly what I am getting at.

Senator Frith: As long as I know the Speaker is listening on this point, that is quite reasonable. Carry on.

Senator Roblin: If he is listening to you, most of the time he would be making a great mistake.

We have heard it alleged that the ordinary rules of the house with respect to withdrawal of motions and consent related thereto, the debatability of previous questions, and other matters of that kind were not dealt with satisfactorily in the committee. We have also heard that there was a time limitation imposed on what was being said that was not appropriate to the issue in question.

This is where I think I am entitled to make my point. A defence was put forward by the senator who chairs that committee, Senator Buckwold. What I am going to say about him gives me no pleasure. I hope that when these contretemps are over we will still be friends. I do not approve of what he has been doing, and I do not think his defence is adequate.

When you strip away from his speech yesterday what I describe as fustian and rodomontade, if not to say bluster, and if you consign to a decent oblivion his toilet jokes, you find that his main defence is that he was irritated by the conduct of Conservative senators during the course of the hearings.

Senator Olson: Wrong.

Senator Roblin: He was very much irritated by them, and he did not like certain other aspects.

Senator Hastings: The Speaker heard this yesterday.

Senator Frith: Were you here yesterday?

Senator Thériault: He should have been.

Senator Roblin: He was very critical of the way in which these senators occupied their time.

Senator Frith: This is exactly what Your Honour has ruled on.

Senator Roblin: I think it can be said that on Monday the chairman of the committee took some satisfaction in putting that turbulent minority in their place.

Senator Olson: He never said that.

Senator Roblin: That is my interpretation. That is the impression he left with me.

Senator Frith: It is irrelevant what happened in the committee. The Speaker has ruled on it.

Senator Roblin: In the course of his remarks, the chairman did not deny the main charges. He did not deny the charge of exclusion. In fact, he rather rejoiced in it. He was proud of it.

Senator Frith: Order, order! That is exactly what we heard yesterday.

Senator Roblin: I will come to the point, if my honourable friend will be quiet. He can say "order" as often as he likes, but I am on my feet.

Senator Frith: This is complete repetition of what we heard yesterday and on what Your Honour has ruled.

Senator Roblin: My friend will have to sit there and be patient. He will then hear the course of my argument.

Senator Frith: I do not have to sit hear and be patient. Where does it say that? There is nothing in the rules to that effect.

Senator Roblin: As far as the rules are concerned, the chairman made no attempt whatsoever to justify his conduct.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, this is exactly what we heard yesterday. We sat here and listened to this yesterday.

Senator Roblin: When it comes to the time allotted for consideration of the report by the committee, there was no explanation, that I heard, as to why the intention to allow six days, which was provided for early in December, was reduced to six hours. That is something I do not know.

Senator Frith: Are we going to have to go through this all over again tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, and the next day and the next day? Are we going to be able to repeat it over and over again?

Senator Roblin: Can you not take the heat?

Senator Frith: You cannot take the heat.

Senator Roblin: Do you have to act like a circus barker? Sit down!

Senator Frith: The word for what I cannot take is monosyllabic and ends with the same consonant, but it is not "heat".

Senator Roblin: My friend reminds me of a shill man in the circus. No one is going to pay attention to them.

Senator Frith: Order, order! You are out of order. This is exactly what was dealt with yesterday by the Speaker.

Senator Roblin: Just a minute, listen to this. My friend used his majority on the committee to act as if the minority was not there.

Senator Frith: Again, he is talking about what happened in the committee.

Senator Roblin: He used his majority to steamroll the majority. I suggest to this house—and here is where I come to material which my friend should listen to—that this is an event of far-reaching importance.

The explanation offered by the chairman of the committee was not an explanation; it was an incrimination of what went on in that committee.

Senator Frith: There again he is talking about what happened in the committee, which is what Your Honour has ruled on.

Senator Roblin: Let us come to this question of rules, because both the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition have very firm views about rules in the committee.

They have advanced the argument today—

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, the senator himself has said he is dealing with arguments that were presented yesterday regarding rulings that Your Honour was to make. He is now reviewing all the debates of yesterday, even after Your Honour has ruled on the question of whether or not what took place in the committee is to prevent proceedings in this place. That is exactly what Your Honour has ruled on.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon raised the question of—

Senator Frith: If, in the future, after having reserved the matter, Your Honour makes a ruling on a question of order, is it conceivable that senators will be allowed to stand up again and go over the whole thing the next day and the next day?

Senator Barootes: You always do.

Senator Frith: Is he going to repeat what was said yesterday about what the chairman did or did not do? We sat through that for hours yesterday, and did not get to the Orders of the Day. Now he is going to start all over again. Your Honour, surely that is out of order.

• (1450)

Senator Roblin: As my friend, the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon—

Senator Stanbury: Wait for the speaker.

Senator Roblin: —when he discussed the question of rules in committees—

Senator Frith: So the answer to the question is, "Yes, on every ruling Your Honour makes, we are all able to stand up the next day and re-debate it!

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith, I consider this intervention as part of what Senator Murray had to say.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Roblin: I thank my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, for he has had the courtesy, even though he may not agree with a word I have said, to listen to me in a decent silence. I respect that and I thank him for it. I just wish it were more widespread.

The point I want to make has to do with the question of rules in the committee. The gospel, according to Senator Frith, is that the committee is a free agent and can make any rules it likes. That means that anything that is done in that committee, no matter how it might appear to others, is within the purview of that committee and can be done. I want to tell my honourable friend that the rules, whether applied in the committee or out of it, are not ad hoc inventions of the day. Rules in this house and the committee are the result of many centuries of parliamentary growth and development.

Senator Cools: Then honour them!

Senator Roblin: The rules are there for good reason. Those rules are conducive, not only to the conduct of public business, but to protecting the minority, and my honourable friend should not overlook that fact. When the majority in a committee uses its power to overrule completely the rights of the minority, it is going too far. If the Frith doctrine were widely adopted in democratic, constitutional and parliamentary bodies, including committees, it would be a sad day for democracy. Given the rights and the legalities of the matter, it is obvious that commonsense, prudence, justice and good will would indicate that the rules should be respected in committee, particularly as they affect the rights of minorities. I want to tell you that majorities can change and probably will change.

Senator Olson: You have that right!

Senator Hastings: You have that right, Duff: when the British senators arrive!

Senator Roblin: The idea that precedents of this kind are being established with the consent and, indeed, the enthusiastic endorsement of members opposite is a matter which concerns me greatly, because whether I am in the minority or in the majority I intend to stand for the rights of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hastings: Rule Britannia!

Senator Roblin: If I am a member of a majority group in a committee, I shall certainly do what I can to see that the rights of the minority are protected, and that is the great sin and failure of the chairman of this committee. He did not do that.

Senator Olson: That is not right!

Senator Robertson: It is right!

Senator Roblin: Maybe he feels that he was justified in his actions. Maybe he feels that the minority was so turbulent and intractable that they deserved what they got. That may be his view. However, I put it to this house that there is a higher principle than that and that the chairman and other members of the committee should rise above those personal irritations and inconveniences to respect the grand traditions of this house and of the parliamentary system for which it stands. It seems to me that the good name of the Senate has not been improved by what has occurred, and I go so far as to describe it as a shabby bit of business indeed.

Senator Olson: What is going on now is the shabby part!

Senator Roblin: Do you think so?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Roblin: You are entitled to your opinion. I would now like to deal further with the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and that is the question of clause-by-clause study.

One of the important responsibilities of committees is to give due and sufficient attention to the matter that is before them. As the Leader of the Government quoted from the authorities that we rely upon, the fundamental and, indeed, the first rule of conduct of committee's dealing with bills has to do with this question of clause-by-clause study. It is perfectly true that from time to time that rule is not observed, and the Leader of the Opposition is correct on that point. However, I have not heard of an instance where that rule was put aside when some member of the committee requested it. That is the difference.

If a member of the committee has asked for a clause-by-clause study and it has been refused, then that constitutes a dereliction insofar as that committee is concerned because the fundamental purpose of the committee, whether observed or not, is to conduct a clause-by-clause discussion of the bill.

What was the purpose of all these hearings? This committee held meetings beyond number. Many came and had something to say. A great many of them did not like what was in the bill. What is the purpose of having hearings and taking down the testimony if it is not related to the bill itself? Even if the committee decides that it does not want to report the bill or even if the committee decides that it does not want to pass the bill, commonsense indicates to me that you take the evidence and relate it to the clauses of the bill. You then say, "This is bad and the witnesses said so," or, "This is good and the witnesses said so," or, "We don't care what the witnesses said; we're not going to report the bill." So that fundamental task, particularly with a bill of this kind, is important.

This bill is not like most of the bills that come before this house. This one is highly charged, not only with respect to the fisc and budgetary balance—and I shall say something about that with regard to this matter one of these days—but with respect to the extreme interest and importance attached to it by the general public. For this committee to fail to examine the evidence that was before it, to relate it to the bill and to indicate its view of various charges that were made seems to me to be quite inappropriate, particularly when you find that some members of the committee had actually requested that the procedure be followed. So it seems to me that the majority has shown contempt for due process and I, for one, am glad that I had nothing to do with it. I dare say that I have committed some parliamentary improprieties in my time—who of us has not—but this is not one of them, and I am glad that I am not associated with it because it is reprehensible in the extreme.

We have been asked to discuss a report that is incomplete and that is before us because the function of the committee has been abrogated and improperly discharged. Whatever we may think of the principle and the details of the bill, we must have some regard for the right way of doing things. We have not paid attention to the right way of doing things with regard to this bill. No matter how much personal pique, irritation or dissatisfaction there may be with members of the committee—there is plenty of room for that, and I would be the first to concede it—when it comes time to deal with the bill itself, to fail to discharge the elementary principles of committee management and of dealing with bills in committee seems to me to be very unsatisfactory and highly regrettable. Whether or not the point of order is sustained, this house has a duty to consider the matter to ensure that this kind of activity never occurs again.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to make only a brief comment, as I gave my speech yesterday. I would comment on the allegation that the chairman acted improperly. I cannot accept that allegation. Senator Frith, as a member of the committee, introduced a motion, which reads as follows:

> It is for all these reasons that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce considers that Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, should not be proceeded with further in the Senate.

On the basis of that motion it would have been a complete irregularity to go through a clause-by-clause study, because we had just said that we did not accept the bill. It was not that we were accepting some clauses and not others. That was not the case at all. Given the motion, that would have been ludicrous. I do not think anyone can accuse me, as chairman, of acting improperly given that motion. I followed that particular motion, and if anyone could explain to me what advantage there would have been to discussing each and every clause, rule and regulation—

Senator Simard: That is your opinion!

Senator Buckwold: —I am sure I could reply that it would not have achieved much except to satisfy the opposition.

• (1500)

Senator Frith: You are out of order.

Senator Buckwold: It is indicated to me that I am out of order.

Senator Roblin: I, by contrast, am quite willing to hear my friend.

Senator Buckwold: I am just trying to indicate—forgetting what everyone else has said—the position of the chairman in dealing with the particular item that has been referred to by members of the government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is to be a proceeding on the hill involving the unveiling of the statue of former Prime Minister Pearson. The proceeding officially starts at 3 p.m. but the actual unveiling will not take place until about 3:30 p.m. and will conclude about 4 p.m. Senator Doody and I have discussed the matter and it has been suggested that we recess, that Your Honour leave the Chair, to return at approximately 4:15 p.m. at the call of the bell. If we adjourn now, then everyone who wishes to participate in the proceeding may do so.

If there is unanimous agreement of the House, I would so move.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We agree on this side that it is a reasonable request and we are only too happy to facilitate it.

We do, however, reserve the right to add a word or two to the point that is under consideration when we get back.

Senator Frith: It was not my intention to close this part of the proceeding.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.15 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—POINT OF ORDER

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, in response to what was said by Senator Buckwold, I would like to repeat in this House that I was one of those who asked for the bill to be read clause by clause, in English and French. Earlier, the senator explained this was unnecessary since we had a motion before us.

I may remind honourable senators that my request for clause-by-clause reading has no connection with the motion that was before the Senate. My only purpose, and a very important one, was to ensure that each clause was correct, in English and in French, and to make sure the translation of each clause was a faithful rendition of the original. It often happens that the meaning is not the same in both languages. My request was therefore in order, otherwise it would have required the unanimous consent of all members. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I shall be mercifully brief in my presentation.

Senator Frith: I found your brevity yesterday less than merciful, I must say.

Senator Ottenheimer: Well, I am improving with age.

Senator Doody: Don't provoke Senator Ottenheimer. He is a tiger.

Senator Frith: I am taking him up on his promise to be merciful.

Senator Ottenheimer: Since we have had a pause of about an hour, I would like, if for no other reason than my own benefit—although it might also be of interest to others—just to locate where we are. I am speaking on a point of order raised by Senator Murray, and I wish to distinguish between that point of order and one already ruled on. In doing so, I wish to distinguish between the tabling of a report and the reception of a report. One is over and done with. I am not arguing that again. There was a point of order made last night, with respect to the tabling of the report, to the effect that the tabling of the report should not take place until something else had happened, and the Speaker said no, there was nothing to preclude the tabling of the report now. In other words, the Chair reserved its ruling on that point of order until today, and today His Honour ruled that the point of order was not valid, the effect being that there was nothing to impede the tabling of the report.

The report is tabled. I assume that means something to the effect that it is in the possession of the officers of the chamber, that it is on the table and the clerk has possession or responsibility of it, or whatever.

The point of order raised this afternoon by Senator Murray deals with the reception of the report, which, of course, means its consideration by this chamber. I think the essence of the point of order made by Senator Murray is that it would not now be in order for the Chair to put the question: When shall this report be taken into consideration? That is the essence of the point of order of the Honourable Senator Murray. In my opinion, it is almost self-evident that it will be necessary for the Chair to rule on this point of order before putting the question, namely: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

That point of order will have to be decided, obviously, before that question can be put by the Chair. The Chair can decide one way or the other, but there must, in fact, be a decision before that question is put by the Chair.

The arguments have, on the whole, been quite brief. Senator Murray quoted from Beauchesne and from Erskine May, both to the effect that the function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments to it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable. The operative part of his point of order is that it must be gone through clause by clause.

I think two things are quite evident. There might be others, but two things are quite evident. As Senator MacEachen pointed out, there have been times when a bill has gone through a committee without clause-by-clause study.

Senator Cools: Most times.

Senator Ottenheimer: Whether most, many, frequent—

Senator Cools: All.

Senator Ottenheimer: —or average, that we do not know. It certainly is not all and it certainly is not none; I know that. It is not at all times and it is not never; it is sometimes. So, a bill has gone through a committee without clause-by-clause study; that we know.

We also know that Senator Poitras asked the Chair for a clause-by-clause reading in committee, and that Senator Doody also asked for a clause-by-clause reading of the bill in the committee.

So the question boils down to: What is the rule? We are all aware that, by leave, the operation of a rule may be suspended. Any member can speak only once to a motion, but it is not uncommon—and certainly not unheard of—that an honourable member will get up and say, "May I have leave to correct some matter or misunderstanding?" or, "I gave inaccurate information. May I have leave to speak on that?" With leave, that senator may speak more than once.

Another rule is that at 6 o'clock the Speaker leaves the Chair. That is the rule. We are all aware and remember that at times someone will say, "Is there leave to stop the clock?" or, "Is there leave for the speaker to continue, and we will probably finish up in half an hour?" or whatever, and there is leave. That means that there is unanimous consent. There is leave that, in effect, is unanimous consent.

The rule with respect to bills in committee is quite clear. They must be read clause by clause. The fact that leave is sometimes given, or that members do not insist upon the observance of that right, does not change the rule. That is leave, either implied or explicit. It can only be one or the other: explicit or implicit. But the fact that it may be implicit does not make it any the less leave.

I suggest to honourable senators that if, on certain occasions, a member decides not to insist upon the observance of his rights or upon the observance of a rule, that does not extinguish the rule. It merely means that he has not insisted upon its observance. I hope that will be taken into consideration. Naturally the Chair will rule on this point of order before putting the question with respect to the reception of the report, that being: When shall the report be taken into consideration?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, with respect to the point of order, I should like to add that the Leader of the Government raised an argument which, to my mind, was not mentioned here yesterday, and I am referring to the role of Parliament.

I do not want to rehash the issue of committee debate but we must keep in mind that parliamentary procedure exists to protect the freedom of expression. It exists only to enable minorities to exercise their rights. Parliamentary procedure is not an end in itself. It is there to make it possible for members of the Commons and senators to legislate.

Yesterday I heard someone say that everything must be settled in committee. Assuming this were true, the fact remains that the Senate and its parliamentary committees must follow parliamentary procedures. Yesterday I heard the argument that it is up to the committee to settle the matter in committee. Of course, but if the committee itself does not respect the rules of procedure, and since the courts—and I suggest everybody agrees on this—do not have any jurisdiction over what goes on in committees, there is no choice but to seek redress here in the Senate chamber.

I think we have to take into account the argument whereby the issue cannot be entirely settled in committee. It is fair to say that the committee is the master of its own procedure and that everything has to be settled in committee. Indeed, but only when acting within the committee's mandate. But if the committee does not make a clause-by-clause study of a tax bill, I wonder when it will do so. If there is a sacred principle in the parliamentary rules of the British system it is that tax measures must be studied, scrutinized, debated and voted on in committee. That is the very basis of the British system.

So I am suggesting that raising this matter in the chamber before the whole Senate is very much in keeping with our parliamentary rules. I think it is always appropriate to remind honourable senators that committees cannot settle everything themselves and that they are certainly not free to decide whether they will follow the rules or not. Honourable senators, I would hope that these principles of parliamentary law—they are much more important than committee mandates—will be taken in consideration, weighed and studied when the Speaker will rule on the point of order raised by the Leader of the Government. To my mind not only do these principles relate to parliamentary procedures but they also relate to our parliamentary system which I, for one, consider sacred. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I mentioned in an earlier intervention, the points that are being raised today are based entirely, on the same basis that were raised yesterday. So do we want each day to stand up at each stage and repeat these arguments based on proceedings in the committee? Senator Ottenheimer says that this is a different point of order than was raised yesterday because it is being raised at a different stage. That is partly true. Of course it is being raised at a different stage. Yesterday the question was whether the chairman should even be entitled to stand up, speak and table his report. That was the stage at which the point was raised as to whether or not it is legitimate to raise here a point of order based on proceedings in a committee.

Today the same point is being raised. All of the evidence referred to applied to proceedings in the committee. Not a single point was raised that did not refer to proceedings in the committee. So since we are going to go through this every day, or until the "British senators" arrive, let me again put this on the record:

> Until a committee report, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in this house.

If that is accepted—and I understood Your Honour accepted this yesterday—everything that has been said by members opposite is irregular because it referred to committee proceedings.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The report was tabled, senator!

Senator Frith: Of course it was tabled. So what? You are still referring to the proceedings in the committee.

> All decisions of the Chairman may be appealed to the committee.

Everything we heard today was about decisions in the committee. They may be appealed to the chairman of the committee. Continuing with citation 607:

> There is no appeal to the House from the Chairman's ruling except by way of a report from the committee.

Now citation 608.

> Procedural difficulties which arise in committees ought to be settled in the committee and not in the House.

Was there a single point made that was not a reference to procedural difficulties arising in the committee? They were raised yesterday and again today.

We can see what is going to happen. It does not matter who has the minority. It means that we can all go to a committee meeting, raise points of order in the committee meeting and take notes. There might even be a transcript. We may then come into this chamber, raise a point of privilege or a point of order, go through the whole committee proceedings again, talk about the points that were raised, get Your Honour to rule, and then go home and have supper, only to come back the next day to start all over again. Your Honour will not interrupt us. We can keep making the same points over and over again, and I take it Your Honour will rule on the matter or reserve your decision. Nothing will have been accomplished. We will not have dealt with any business. We then go back home, return the next day, raise points perhaps from another committee, and so tie up the main chamber completely and for as long as we want. That is the logical consequence of the interventions made, and would be the logical consequence of His Honour's not imposing and enforcing the ruling that he made today about yesterday's points of order.

Honourable senators, nothing has changed. The filibuster continues. The repetitions continue. I appreciate that the Canadian Senate is probably one of the few assemblies in the world where a full filibuster is possible and there is nothing in the rules against that, but I think that, at least for the sake of variety, our friends opposite could talk about something else. We know that they are on a filibuster, and that is all right. There is no rule against a filibuster. They can talk about almost anything as long as they like, but they should at least change the show. Change the bill of fare somewhat and let us have a filibuster on something else for a change. Don't go over and over the same point.

Honourable senators, I ask that we stop this Act I of the filibuster. I ask that His Honour make the ruling that I think is very simple. He has already ruled that the proceedings of the committee are not the proper basis for a point of order in the Senate. After the ruling, we could at least challenge our friends opposite to come up with something a little more creative.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in 60 seconds or less let me say simply that I am sure His Honour and other honourable senators understood the point I made in my point of order, even if Senator Frith did not. The point was not that the point of order is not a matter of internal procedure of the committee but, rather, the fact that the committee has not carried out the responsibility that was entrusted to it by the Senate. That is a matter for the Senate, not for the committee.

Senator Frith: The mandate given to the committee was, very simply, a reference of the bill. If senators were to look it up in the Minutes, they will see that it is never anything more than to investigate and report. There is nothing in the mandate that says, "and do the following things while you are at it." There is nothing whatever in the mandate given to the committee telling it how it ought to do its job—nothing. It is a simple reference. I have not heard—and I wonder whether anyone in this chamber has heard—any reference to a definition of the mandate. If the mandate were so special, did the Leader of the Government define it when he maintained that the committee failed to fulfil it? He did not make any reference to the mandate.

Honourable senators, this is an extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, May 3, 1990:

> Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the Senate resumed the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir, for the second reading of the Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.
> After debate, and—
> The question being put on the motion, it was—
> Resolved in the affirmative, on division.
> The Bill was then read the second time, on division.

Here is the mandate:

> The Honourable Senator Kelly moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, that the Bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Do honourable senators want to hear that again?

> The Honourable Senator Kelly moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, that the Bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Does this reference add to that words to the effect that the bill be studied clause by clause? It does not. The committee received no such specific instructions.

How could Your Honour conceivably find that there is anything in the mandate to the committee from the Senate other than what is there? It is clear that His Honour understands the point because that is the ruling he made earlier today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on the ruling I made earlier today, I stated:

> It does not appear feasible to the Chair that we can turn back the clock and prevent the presentation of the committee report—

I did not say "the consideration" but "the presentation" of the committee report.

I understand the argument made by Senator Frith and other honourable senators, but again I would really like to read the transcript and consult my procedural experts.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand the desire of the Chair to examine the situation and I hope that we could have a ruling before 6:00 o'clock. I think, Your Honour, that the effect of the delay is evident; that is, that we lost a day on the advance of the report through the procedural arguments yesterday. If we had insisted last evening, it is possible that His Honour would have given us a ruling at 2:00 a.m. and we could have held the debate of the report today.

If there is now a further delay, then senators can see the cumulative effect. I think it puts the Chair in a very difficult position. When can we have the ruling? I do not know whether His Honour expected that he would rule tomorrow, but if he expects to rule later this day, then that would be acceptable, and as soon as possible.

Hon. Pat Carney: I would ask Senator Frith to clarify his remark about the British senators. He used the phrase, "the British senators will arrive". I have a copy of the Constitution Act, 1867 to 1982, in which it states—and the honourable senator knows this section better than I—at section 31(5) the ways in which senators can be disqualified. One of them is if he takes an oath or makes a declaration or acknowledgement of allegiance, obedience or adherence to a foreign power or does an act whereby he becomes a subject or a citizen or entitled to the rights and privileges of a subject or a citizen of a foreign power.

I do not understand the reference to the "British senators", unless, of course, Senator Frith is repudiating the Queen as the Queen of Canada. Perhaps he would like to clarify his reference to the British senators.

Senator Frith: I will do that privately with the senator, I think.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I would certainly hope that the Speaker could find the time to make a quick ruling on the matter raised by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I have some credentials in respect of committee hearings. I have been a senator for 24 years. I have sat for many years on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce when Senator Salter Hayden served as its chairman. He was probably as knowledgeable about the rules of committee hearings as anyone I have ever met, and he certainly ran what we would call a very tight committee.

I was chairman of a committee for many, many years. In respect of the point raised by the honourable senator, I cannot deny that from time to time bills have been studied on a clause-by-clause basis. I cannot deny that Erskine May, Beauchesne and Bourinot indicate that committees should discuss legislation on a clause-by-clause basis. But I can state categorically that the practice of Senate committees has been largely in the hands of the chairmen. It has been rare, in my experience, that bills, especially highly complicated bills like this one, are reviewed on a clause-by-clause basis. As a general rule they are reviewed on a global basis and, for the most part, clause-by-clause study has taken place in committee of the whole.

Therefore, I do not think that the case of the Leader of the Government in the Senate is well made on the matter of the practice itself. I urge the Chair to make a ruling, and to do so as soon as possible. I say that in the context that I am still unsure about how I will vote on the recommendation of this report. I do not think there is anything to be gained by continuing these procedural arguments. As the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has stated, there is nothing to prevent filibusters. In the interests of at least making the appreciation of this report more enjoyable, I would ask the government to please let the ruling come forward, let the report be brought forward, and let us start to debate it.

● (1650)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government has nothing to say whatsoever as to when Mr. Speaker rules on the point of order.

Senator Cools: Convince us!

Senator Perrault: I hope you are not suggesting that we thought otherwise.

Senator Murray: I think it is rather small minded, to put it mildly, of Senator Perrault, Senator Hastings and Senator Cools, and I do not hesitate to name them, to be casting aspersions on the Chair.

Senator Hastings: Do not wave your finger at me. I never said a word.

Senator Murray: Yes, he did. The government has nothing to say about when the Speaker rules on the point of order that I raised.

Secondly, I would like to place my recollection of past events on the record along with Senator Everett's. I sat for a year or two under Senator Salter Hayden when we went through legislation on the Banking committee. At the end of all of the discussion and evidence of witnesses, I have a vivid recollection of his asking the senators, in camera, "Do you want to go through this clause by clause?"; and we would say, "Yes", or we would say "No", as the case may be. I certainly have a vivid recollection, inspired perhaps by his example as chairman of the committee, of him personally making that presentation to senators who were members of the committee and asking whether they wanted to go through it clause by clause.

I do not deny what the Honourable Senator MacEachen stated about what the general practice is. I simply say that, in my experience, when it is decided to dispense with clause by clause examination, that has been done by agreement of the committee.

Senator Thériault: No.

Senator Murray: Senator Thériault says no. I am stating what my experience is. If he wishes to state what his is, then that is his right.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have been here for 12 years. My first committee meeting, following my arrival in the Senate, was under the chairmanship of Senator Everett. I have attended many committee meetings under many chairmen. I am not suggesting that the question raised by the Leader of the Government was never put, but in my recollection I have never heard it.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): For the record, I should state that in this instance I specifically asked for a clause-by-clause consideration of the bill in the committee that afternoon and it was denied.

Senator Frith: No, it was not. It is irrelevant, anyway.

Senator Doody: It was precisely the case. If Senator Frith did not hear me, I can only offer my sympathies, because he must have some problem. I distinctly remember, and everyone else who was listening should remember, that I requested a clause-by-clause consideration of this bill and it was refused. I asked why. The reply from the Chair was that sometimes we do it and sometimes we do not. That was exactly what was said. No one who was present at that meeting can deny the accuracy of that statement, because it is absolutely correct.

Senator Frith: But it did not matter, because it is irrelevant.

Senator Doody: A few minutes ago my honourable friend opposite stated that it was never requested, and that may show on the record. I am correcting the record.

Senator Thériault: I do not know if the honourable deputy leader is referring to my statement. I did not make such a statement.

Senator Doody: No, you did not.

Senator Thériault: Who did?

Senator Doody: Senator Olson said so earlier this afternoon.

Senator Thériault: I recall vividly a discussion on legislation in Committee of the Whole, and never, to my recollection, did we go over a piece of legislation clause by clause in Committee of the Whole here.

Senator Doody: Surely you are joking.

Senator Thériault: We used to do it in the Legislature of New Brunswick, and that is why I was surprised when I came here.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, we are becoming far to involved in Bourinot, Beauchesne's and Erskine May and we are not going back to our own basic rules. In Rules of the Senate Part I, Interpretation, it states:

> 1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Therefore, it is our precedents that apply here. It is not what Bourinot or Beauchesne state; it is what has been the practice in the Senate. Both sides agree that it has varied; sometimes there is clause-by-clause consideration and sometimes there is not.

Senator Murray: Who decides?

Senator Molgat: If a committee decided that there should not be clause-by-clause consideration, then that is the end of it. The committee has decided, and it has followed specifically the proceedings, practices and precedents of this house.

SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if you so wish, we can adjourn, and I hope to be able to rule on this point. I will have to do some studying. I do not know what senators wish to do. It is already 5 o'clock and I hope to be able to return with a ruling If not, I will postpone it until tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to study it. These are difficult points on which I have to rule. I have procedural assistants, and I wish to listen to what they have to say. I also want to read the transcript of the arguments. I think that is why I am here, and that is what I am going to do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour and honourable senators, it is 5.05 p.m. Everyone would admit that there is some similarity between the points of order raised yesterday and those raised today, and that it is not impossible that some of the work done yesterday might be helpful in the decision today. I suggest that we return at 8 o'clock to receive Your Honour's ruling. That would give Your Honour approximately three hours to consider the authorities and the similarity or non-similarity between the two points.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that acceptable to senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: We will return at 8 p.m.

The Senate adjourned until 8.00 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there is a senator without, waiting to be introduced—

The Honourable Senator Mario Beaulieu was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated.

Hon. Mario Beaulieu, of De La Durantay, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Arthur Tremblay.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, earlier today the Honourable Senator Murray raised a point of order with respect to the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and asked the Chair for a ruling. As I understand it, the essence of his point of order is that, because the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee did not conduct a clause-by-clause study of Bill C-62, the Senate should not proceed at this time with the consideration of the report.

It is true that Citation 763 of Beauchesne, Fifth Edition, reads as follows:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable.

[Translation]

As certain senators said, particularly Senator Everett, it would seem that Senate committees have not always followed that practice. According to tradition, Senate committees enjoy full discretion as to how they study bills referred to them. This is why certain committees study bills on a clause-by-clause basis while others do not.

The Speaker does not have to rule on the appropriateness of clause-by-clause consideration of bills. It would be better if matters of this nature were submitted to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders or to the whole Senate rather than to the Speaker. However, because of the fact that certain practices or certain rules have not been followed in committees, the Speaker has been asked to decide whether it would be advisable to delay the progress of the stages following the committee proceedings.

● (2010)

[English]

As I ruled earlier today on the point of order of Senator Ottenheimer, it does not appear feasible that a proceeding can be prevented from happening simply because a question of privilege—or, in this case, a point of order—has been raised regarding alleged infractions of the rules or practices of the Senate by a committee or its chairman. If contempt of the Senate or its rules has occurred, the Senate can take certain action to deal with it. Therefore, I cannot uphold the point of order raised by Senator Murray.

In closing, I might add that there is an obligation on the part of all honourable senators, whether they be in the Senate or in committees of the Senate, that notwithstanding their party affiliations and the seriousness of the great questions that are before them, they obey the rules, customs and traditions of the Senate at all times.

Honourable senators, when shall this report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be taken into consideration?

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Some Hon. Senators: Yes!

An Hon. Senator: Filibuster!

An Hon. Senator: It should have been "Yes".

Hon. Duff Roblin: Not without leave! I want to oppose the motion.

Senator Perrault: It is a government bill!

Senator Roblin: But I want to oppose the motion.

Senator Petten: It is a government bill!

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Roblin: I do not care what government bill it is, when it comes to a truncated and fault-ridden report such as this. I do not care where the bill comes from; it has been contaminated by its process through this committee.

An Hon. Senator: You are out of order!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Roblin: I received on my desk some time this afternoon—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator, the report is not before the Senate now.

Senator Roblin: Senator Buckwold wants to proceed with first reading of the bill.

Senator Frith: Yes, but he has been turned down; so the matter is not before the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: You turned it down!

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I did not know I was so effective.

Senator Simard: He was going for the overkill!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since there is not unanimous agreement, it will appear on the Orders of the Day for tomorrow.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—TWENTY-EIGHTH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Wednesday, September 26, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-39, An Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 27, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: At the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the bill was read clause-by-clause.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I might say that at the conclusion of the hearing the committee was asked what it wished to do. The unanimous request of the committee was that the bill be reported without amendment, and not be read clause-by-clause.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the chairman can tell us if the enacting clause was passed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): The whole bill was passed.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I think Senator Bonnell did not hear me. I said that the entire bill was passed.

Senator Doody: Without amendment.

Senator Bonnell: I wonder if the chairman of the committee could tell us if the title of the bill was passed as a separate motion.

Senator Nurgitz: It was passed as a separate motion.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the chairman whether there was any request from any senator to go through the bill clause by clause; and whether, if there was such a request, it was denied?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Ottenheimer for his question—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Nurgitz: Please understand, honourable senators, you are dealing with the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which, as I am told, is one of the better committees of the Senate.

No such request was made. Had it been made, it would have been done. It has been done clause by clause in that committee.

Senator Cools: On occasion.

Senator Nurgitz: Indeed, on occasion.

Senator Baroutes: When requested.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PUBLICATION OF DEBATES—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a point of order. I would like to know why yesterday's Debates of the Senate have not yet been delivered. Could Senator Doody, the Speaker or someone else provide an explanation? It has been nearly 24 hours since the end of yesterday's sitting and we have yet to receive the printed version of the proceedings.

• (2020)

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know why the question was directed to me. I am not in charge of the Internal Economy Committee. Senator LeBlanc is our chairman. We revere him. We hold him in high esteem. We respect him. We have confidence in him. We fully demand the explanation for which the honourable senator has asked.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, in fact, this afternoon Senator Kenny and I had a moment of speculation as to what time Hansard would arrive today, recognizing that we had a long meeting yesterday. We both agreed that that should be a very important item on the agenda of our next meeting, either of his subcommittee or of the full committee.

At the moment, I do not have a valid explanation. I do not know.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, when can we expect to receive yesterday's Hansard?

[English]

I directed the question to Senator Doody and I expected him to support honourable senators concerned about the late arrival of the Debates of the previous sitting. I am astounded that he would shuffle this responsibility on to Senator LeBlanc. Who is in charge of this place? Is it the government or is it the Opposition?

Senator Doody: It should be fairly obvious to the honourable gentleman, using even the very basic rudiments of arithmetic, who is in charge of this place. The numbers are self-evident.

Senator Steuart: But not for long.

Senator Doody: But it will change shortly.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

THE HONOURABLE PAT CARNEY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Leader of the Government I will direct my question to the deputy leader. It has to do with the subject I raised last night. I raise it again this evening because I have just been handed certain information, of which I was not formerly aware, that appeared in The Calgary Herald. The article states in part:

> In a telephone interview with BCTV, Carney was asked why she hadn't attended Thursday's Senate swearing-in ceremony. Carney replied that she "wasn't going to drop everything to stand around with some people from the Italian community while they learn where the Parliamentary bathroom is . . ."
> In a letter to Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, Volpe accused Carney of lacking "sensitivity to Canada's demographic realities" and demanded she be sacked.
> Carney, appointed to the Senate last month, said in a written statement Friday that she hasn't seen the comments attributed to her and therefore couldn't comment directly on them. She suggested BCTV "distorted" her remarks and insisted she "did not intend to insult any group."

I have two questions which arise from the material which I have been handed. If the honourable senator had not seen the remarks, how can she attest that they were distorted? If she had not seen what had been written about her, how could she claim that her remarks had been distorted? That is my first question.

She said that she did not intend to insult any group. Why does she not do the decent thing right now and apologize to Senator Di Nino and his relatives, who were present at the swearing-in ceremony, as well as to the Italian community, saying that she did not intend to insult any particular group and that her remarks were misinterpreted? Why does she now not do the decent thing?

Senator Phillips: That is a bathroom question. It goes to Senator Buckwold.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Senator Bosa: Apparently Senator Phillips is also associated with that remark.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there appears to be nothing new in that particular piece of literature that was quoted. It appears to be a different newspaper with the same story that was canvassed last evening. An explanation was given at that time, and I see no purpose in rehashing it.

Senator Bosa: The Deputy Leader of the Government is certainly mistaken when he says there is nothing new. There is something new in this article, because it says that she did not intend to insult any group. This news appeared from coast to coast in Canada. If Senator Carney did not intend to insult any group, why does she not stand up and say, "I apologize to the Italian community. It was not my intention to insult the community, nor was it my intention to slight Senator Di Nino and his relatives." They were the only people of Italian origin present while eight senators were being sworn in.

Senator Doody: It seems to me that the honourable senator just quoted Senator Carney as saying that she did not intend to insult anyone, and that just about covers it.

Senator Bosa: I am sorry, I could not hear a couple of words because someone else was talking.

Senator Doody: It is my Newfoundland accent. I said that it appears to me that Senator Bosa has just quoted Senator Carney as saying that she had no intention of insulting anyone. I believe that covers it.

Senator Bosa: Do you mean that that is sufficient?

Senator Doody: You pointed that out.

Senator Bosa: It is written that way in this article.

An Hon. Senator: Is it a fact?

Senator Bosa: I do not know. I am asking you to ask her. I cannot put a question to the honourable senator, because our rules do not permit a senator to ask a question of another senator. We can only ask questions of the leader or the deputy leader.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order! Sit down.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Pat Carney: I rise on a question of privilege. I would ask the honourable senator: Is there a byline on that story in the Calgary Herald?

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Do not answer that. There are rules.

Hon. Peter Bosa: The headline is "Carney accused of slighting Italians".

Senator Carney: Who wrote it?

Senator Bosa: Peter O'Neil of the Vancouver Sun.

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I should like to point out what was said earlier by my colleague. That is the original story which appeared in the Vancouver Sun under the byline of Peter O'Neil. It is word for word the same story. The remarks in it were in the original story, and I refute the suggestion that it was a statement made later.

GULF CRISIS

FAILURE TO RECALL PARLIAMENT FOR DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to turn to another topic. However, before doing so, I should like to welcome the newly-appointed senators, including my old friend, Senator Eyton, to the chamber. I anticipate with keen excitement the important contribution that he and all the new senators will make to the business of the Senate and the affairs of the nation.

Before launching into my question, I should like to share my first impression as a senator. A very distinguished and elderly senator drew my attention to the eight magnificent portraits that surround this chamber. Those portraits symbolize the issues of peace and war and remind us, as senators, that the issues of peace and war are obviously paramount in the importance of the nation.

My question to the deputy leader, in the absence of the Leader of the Government, is this: There is, as we all know, a well-established constitutional convention that Parliament, if adjourned, has to be recalled as soon as possible whenever there is a threat or question of war, or wherever war breaks out, in order to put the armed forces on active service, not only pursuant to section 33 of the National Defence Act, but also based on a precedent and an historic tradition that pre-dates Confederation. That legislation dictates that Her Majesty's ministers are required, whenever such threat appears, to take Parliament—and, through Parliament, the public of Canada—at the first possible moment into the confidence of Her Majesty's ministers in such circumstances with respect to any action taken.

Could the deputy leader request that the Leader of the Government explain to us tomorrow why the Government of Canada failed to follow well-established historic, constitutional and, indeed, democratic parliamentary traditions by arbitrarily refusing to call Parliament 44 days forthwith after war—aggressive action—broke out—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): What war?

Senator Grafstein: —in the Middle East, after the United Nations passed a resolution in early August, and after the Prime Minister immediately responded to a request by Mr. Bush to support such action? Why did the Government of Canada fail to follow sacred parliamentary tradition by not immediately calling back Parliament to take the public into its confidence on these particular issues of pressing importance?

Senator Doody: Senator Grafstein, it seems to me that Senator Murray addressed that question last evening. I distinctly remember the "sacred tradition" phrase. In any event, I will certain pass the message along to him and see if he can provide you with more information.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

ALL-PARTY LEGAL CHALLENGE TO APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL SENATORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: As the house leader is aware, the political parties of British Columbia have joined together in a joint resolution opposing the goods and services tax. The political parties include the Social Credit Party, the New Democratic Party, the Reform Party, the Liberals and most of the Conservatives.

As a result of this all-party unanimity on this point, the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Vander Zalm, has announced that he will enter a legal challenge as to the right of the federal government to appoint eight new senators under that long-neglected clause in the Canadian Constitution.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether or not the representative of the province of British Columbia has been in touch with the federal government with respect to this matter? Have their concerns been conveyed to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister? Has any action with respect to Her Majesty been deferred until the challenge, which has been entered into by the Premier of the Province of British Columbia, has been dealt with by the courts?

Senator Barootes: Did you say Premier Vander Zalm—

Senator Perrault: Would you just listen and let some democracy break out in this place? It would be wonderful if the Conservative Party could become riddled with democracy.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly pass along that series of questions to the government.

Senator Perrault: It is a simple question. Has there been any action to import another eight senators to this place?

Senator Barootes: What does "import" mean?

Senator Perrault: Another eight senators to act as trained seals in the circus you have going. Will a decision be deferred until the courts have ruled with respect to Mr. Vander Zalm's appeal? That is a very straightforward question.

Senator Doody: I stand corrected, honourable senators. I will pass along the simple question to the government.

Senator Perrault: As long as you pass it along, would you please beseech the Prime Minister to treat us to a rare display of candour?

Senator Doody: I have already assured the honourable senator twice that I will pass the question along, and I will continue to reassure him.

Senator Perrault: We will be waiting with rapt attention for your reply.

Senator Doody: Please wait with your breath held.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

OKA STAND OFF—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, in the absence of the Leader of the Government, if he could brief us on the situation at Oka as it has developed over our supper break. As honourable senators have probably noticed, our Aboriginal colleagues have gone off to watch the television, because, in their words as they left their chamber,"some very serious actions have taken place over the past two hours." I think it is important that this chamber be briefed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would love to be able to give you an update on the situation. However, I have no more information than has any other senator. I watched the television for awhile during the dinner break and saw some of the proceedings. I gather that the situation is now under control. It appears that most, if not all, of the people who were in the rehab centre have left and have been conveyed to other quarters. That is what I saw on television. I have no direct information from the authorities, but I shall certainly attempt to obtain some and deliver it to the Senate at the earliest opportunity.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF EIGHT ADDITIONAL SENATORS—POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS TO THE QUEEN—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. Has the government, through His Excellency the Governor General, made representations to Her Majesty the Queen, seeking Her Majesty's counsel or permission to appoint a number of "royal" senators, as provided for under the British North America Act?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer with any certainty, but I certainly hope so.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator cannot answer the question now, will he seek an answer for tomorrow?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would love to be able to present the answer in person tomorrow when the eight come into the chamber, but I cannot tell honourable senators this evening. I shall try to find out the answer, and as soon as I have it I shall pass it along.

Senator Hastings: Will they enter to the tune of "Rule Britannia?"

THE HONOURABLE MARTHA P. BIELISH

RESIGNATION FROM THE SENATE—ANNOUNCEMENT AND TRIBUTES

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, 11 years ago today, on September 27, 1979, I was appointed to the Senate of Canada. I must confess that when Prime Minister Clark called me to offer me the appointment, I was as surprised as I was honoured. It is no false modesty to say that the prospect of coming here and serving in this chamber was beyond my wildest dreams.

Prime Minister Clark reassured me, and the friends whom I consulted encouraged me to accept the appointment. They persuaded me that my experience and background as a school teacher, trustee, farmer, community worker and an active member of women's organizations at the local, national and international level could be put to good use in the Senate. When I asked my husband for his thoughts, his reply was quick and to the point: "Well, it's an appointment, not a sentence. If you say no, you will never know whether you would have liked it or not. If you say yes and you don't like it, you can always resign and home is still here." So I had the best of both worlds.

With that I decided to accept, and I have never for a moment regretted that decision. For me it was not an opportunity for power and fame, as all honourable senators know; rather, it was an opportunity for me to give something back to this country which has given so much to me, my family, my friends and neighbours, and especially my Ukrainian forbears who came to Canada at the turn of the century. That the opportunity came to me at the age of 64 made it all the more welcome.

I have spent the past 11 years among you, serving on committees, criticizing or supporting legislation, representing the Senate and Canada at various gatherings, and always trying to bring a particular perspective to this house: that of a woman, a proud Albertan and a fervent Canadian. I was the first woman from Alberta to be appointed to the Senate.

I am very cognisant of my rich Alberta heritage left by the famous five Alberta women: Emily Murphy, Irene Parlby, Louise McKinney, Henrietta Muir Edwards and Nellie McClung who, in the noted "Person's Case", made it possible for women to be recognized as persons and, therefore, qualified to sit in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I had planned to make a lengthy speech at this time of my resignation. However, because I am doing this today, under the circumstances I am short of time. I should like to draw your attention a report that I am going to leave for the Alberta women's heritage. It is entitled: "Alberta Women in Politics—A History of Women and Politics in Alberta". It notes every woman who has run for elected office, whether provincially or federally, in the province of Alberta. This is a project that was allowed under our discretionary fund. I do not presume that every member of this chamber will want a copy of this report, but certainly those who do will be able to receive one.

Today, on the eleventh anniversary of my appointment the Senate, I have decided to leave you. I was due to retire, in any event, on October 20, but I have decided to advance the date of my retirement by several weeks.

Senator Frith: Why?

Senator Cools: Why?

Senator Bielish: My reasons for doing so can be stated quite simply. The Prime Minister indicated in a public speech earlier this week that he would probably invoke section 26 of the Constitution and appoint extra members to the Senate. If my retirement takes place subsequently it will not be possible to replace me until the number of senators in the western region has fallen to below 24. It could well be that my province of Alberta, which is already under-represented here in terms of population, would be short-changed for a considerable period of time. By resigning now I hope to ensure that Alberta remains at least at its full complement for some time to come.

My second reason for retiring now is that it should ensure that the supporters of the government in the Senate are at full strength. As honourable senators are well aware, I have never been a very partisan person in my approach to public issues. Nevertheless, there are important principles at stake in debates presently going on in this chamber.

I have said repeatedly that it is essential to preserve the accountability of the elected members of the House of Commons to the people of Canada. The decision of the voters in a general election is final. There is a most honourable and useful role that the Senate can play, but it should not exercise power that properly belongs to the elected representatives of the people.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Or to the Governor General, of course!

Senator Cools: Or the Queen!

Senator Simard: Just be patient, please.

Senator Bielish: Without trying to fan the flames of controversy, let me say that in my humble opinion those democratic principles are threatened in the present debate in this chamber. I do not want to see the government lose a supporter on October 20, and by resigning ahead of time I am inviting the Prime Minister to replace me before he takes any action to add extra senators.

Honourable senators, the expectations that I brought to this place 11 years ago have been fulfilled in every way. I believe I can say without any vanity that I have succeeded in putting something back into this country, which has given me so much.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bielish: I have also learned more than I can ever describe to you. I have learned so much about this rich and wonderful country and so much about its institutions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, may I say at the outset that I am sure that all of us, most particularly the senators from Alberta who have had a close association with Senator Bielish, regret the fact that time, which is always marching on for all of us, has brought us to the day of Senator Bielish's resignation.I hope that Senator Bielish in particular will realize that I had absolutely no notice of the announcement which she has just made. Therefore, I have no notes prepared, and so I must collect my thoughts quickly. I wish to say to Senator Bielish that we have enjoyed working with her on a number of matters in committee and in all the functions of this place.

On a more personal basis, her office is on the same corridor as mine, and it was my privilege to see and chat with her often on a number of matters of concern to our part of Canada. I will miss that.

Without commenting on or agreeing with any of the reasons why the announcement was made, I think that Senator Bielish can carry with her a very proud memory of the record of her performance in this place during the past 11 years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: Senator Bielish and I have been involved in a number of matters. She has a very keen and abiding interest in the whole area of agriculture, especially western Canadian agriculture, which is one of the areas in which I have taken a great degree of interest. It is with regret that we recognize that there comes a day such as this, which we must all face, if we live that long. I regret that it is so now for Senator Bielish.

Finally, I want to say on behalf of all of us on this side of the House, and in particular the senators from Alberta, that we have enjoyed working with Senator Bielish. We believe that she has made a tremendous contribution to the Senate. We wish her well.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, let me begin by saying what a great honour and a great pleasure it has been for my colleagues and me to have served and worked with Senator Bielish for the past 11 years in the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Bielish has noted that she was 64 years of age when she was appointed to this place—quite a young 64, as she is now quite a young 74 going on 75—and already at that time a person of very considerable achievement. She had worked for women, and for rural women in particular, in a variety of community activities in Alberta and had been recognized for her diligence and generosity on behalf of the community. She was too modest to place this on the record, but I am going to remind you that our colleague was President of the Alberta Women's Institute from 1965 to 1969. She was Alberta Woman of the Year in 1975; a member of the Federated Women's Institute from 1964 to 1979, and President of that institute from 1976 to 1979; a member of the Associated Country Women of the World Council from 1965 to 1969, and also from 1976 to 1979, and was area Vice President for Canada from 1980 to 1983.

At home, her background was as a school teacher and farmer. She was later elected as a school trustee in her own division in Alberta and became a member of the Further Education Council and member of the Advisory Board on Adjustment of Immigrants to Canada. She was appointed to the Canadian Council on Rural Development and served with the Alberta board of the Red Cross, the Cancer Society, the Council on Aging, the Human Rights Association, and the Consumer's Association. She was appointed to the Alberta Citizen's Advisory Board on Recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, serving from 1969 to 1972 and received the Alberta Government Achievement Award for Outstanding Service in the Community in 1979. And so it goes.

I will not read all the recognitions that she has received over the years, and deservedly so, because of her work for the people at the community level and in women's work at the national and international level. An honorary doctorate of law is a recognition that has been accorded her.

Senator Bielish was, and is, a good citizen—indeed, an exemplary citizen—of her own community and of this country. She is the kind of person destined to make an important contribution to the affairs of this chamber and of Parliament, and to bring a particular perspective to our legislative and public policy work, as a mother and grandmother, school teacher, farmer, and one who has taken a lifelong interest in social and community activities.

She has said that the past 11 years have been a learning experience for her. It has also been a learning experience for those of us who have had the pleasure of working with her, because of the perspective that she has brought to the discussions in this chamber, in its committees and in our caucus. The years have also been a learning experience for many of us because of the exemplary wisdom, generosity and compassion that she always brought to those discussions.

I and all of us on this side will miss her company very much. I say further, without commenting in detail on the reasons she has given for her resignation today, that it is typically generous of her to decide to put the interests of her province, as she sees them—and, yes, the interests of her party and the government she supports—ahead of her own personal convenience, and to take the generous step that she has taken today. I can only praise her and commend her for it, and, on behalf of everybody on this side, thank her for it.

Finally, as I said, she is a person of vast experience and talent, a young 74 going on 75, and I have no doubt that this country, her province and her community can expect, and will receive, further services and contributions from her in the future. Meanwhile, I wish her good health and happiness as she takes her leave of us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I want to state that Senator Olson spoke for more westerners than Albertans when he referred to the resignation of our colleague, Senator Martha Bielish.

As we listened to the recital of achievements that the Leader of the Government placed on the record, I felt that this was a splendid example of how to live life well. Her activities in the Senate, of which I have some acquaintance, showed her to be a very modest, quiet and thoughtful woman—but, make no mistake about it, a determined woman. One could tell from the recital of her activities in the province of Alberta just how she has followed her star in doing what she could as a good citizen of this country.

When I think of the community that she represents, of her experiences from the hard knocks of being a farmer's wife on the plains—and that certainly has been a hard life these past few years; when I think of her leadership in the international field, where she represented Canada so well in dealing with organizations and institutions having to do with a rural woman's life; when I think of her attention to the interests of her province and the nation, her concerns about agriculture, of her interest in promoting the welfare of women in our country, particularly her concern about family life and how it could best be lived, I feel that we have had a colleague who has made a great contribution.

She taught me a lot. I regret her leaving. I realize that I am treading on her heels—it won't be too long before I leave—but I know that her activities in this nation are not over and that she will go, as she has in the past, from strength to strength.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, although I have been in the Senate for too brief a period as a colleague of Senator Bielish, I am conscious of the fact that with her resignation the Senate will miss a certain kind of representation, a certain kind of prairie feminism which she portrayed here.

Senator Bielish's distinguished service in the Senate has been marked by the attributes Senator Roblin has listed: her particular charm, her modesty, her quiet intelligence, and especially her ability to be generous to her colleagues.

Senator Bielish belongs to that group of women, among them my mother, who form a vital part of that enterprise known as the family farm, whose roots are firm in the soil of this country, whose daily work is difficult and taxing, whose vital contribution to the life of this country has been recognized only too recently and whose true worth is really not yet fully appreciated.

I was a colleague of Senator Bielish, through no fault of my own but at the instruction of our eminent whip, on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I enjoyed that work immensely, due in no small part to the ability of Martha, who had a great deal more knowledge, coming from a rural community—even though as a child I grew up in such a community —to instruct myself and others on the intricacies of agricultural policy.

Martha, we shall certainly miss you. We wish you well. I hope that the next few seasons are as wonderful for you on the farm as this one has been, and I want you to know that you will be missed. Thank you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I join with my colleagues in wishing our colleague, Martha Bielish, a long, happy and healthy retirement. I was not appointed on the same day as Martha, but I arrived in the chamber on the same day and we were office neighbours. Martha Bielish and I have spent many hours together in this place as fellow western Canadians and fellow partisans. I know the contribution she has made. Martha has a certain down-home sensitivity to these things. When Senator Olson was making his wonderful comments, she groaned and said that it was sort of like listening to her own obituary. I thought to myself that I had better stand up and remind her that it is an opportunity most of us will not have.

Honourable senators, I join with colleagues and friends in saying to Martha Bielish that she has served this chamber and her country well, and I wish her a long and happy life.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, Martha, I too must add my words of admiration and best wishes as you leave the Senate this afternoon. When I first came to the Senate six years ago Martha was the only woman in the government caucus and I was number two. I do not know what I would have done without her. Some of us know about the "old boys' club", and on certain days it is difficult to find one's way around, especially when you first arrive. I shall never forget her kindness and generosity in those early months. Someone referred to Martha's dedication to women, particularly rural women. Martha made her mark on remarkable organizations, which made quiet progress without demonstrations or placard-waving. That says a lot about the kind of person our colleague is. Martha has brought to the Senate not only good, quiet wisdom and a sense of humour, but also leadership and a dedication to that leadership that is unique. I am so delighted that the book is finished and I will be anxious to read it. Martha, regardless of where your steps may take you in the next while, we wish you well and Godspeed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Madam senator, although there are times that Quebec and Alberta do not see eye to eye, you have been, as Senator Robertson has said, a helpful friend at a time when I felt desolate and alone. You have taught me many things about your province and about this country. I am not going to shower you with flowers . . .

[Translation]

. . . because I think you are a lady, that you are showing today a courage which our foes may find rather bizarre but which is the courage of bravery . . .

[English]

and because you have made things easy for me. I thank you, because I feel that I am better for knowing you.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I have not been in the Senate anywhere near as long as other honourable senators who have spoken on the occasion of Senator Bielish's retirement. I would, however, like to speak briefly.

Actually, I think Senator Bielish and I met approximately nine years ago. She was then a senator and I was a member of the Newfoundland legislature, and we were both attending a meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I do not remember whether that meeting was in New Zealand or elsewhere, but it was a fair distance away.

I suppose that unless one goes north Newfoundland is as far from Alberta as one can come and still be a Canadian.

Senator Lucier: The Yukon!

Senator Ottenheimer: I did say "unless one goes north". I say to my honourable friend opposite that I fully recognize that it is not "from sea to sea" but "from sea to sea to sea". I am sure the honourable gentleman recognizes that when Radio Canada or the CBC states that it is broadcasting coast to coast, from Halifax to Vancouver, it is forgetting a fair number of people elsewhere. No, I specifically made reference to the north. In an east-west context, however, what I said is quite true.

Actually, I have frequently noticed that people from Alberta and those from Newfoundland—

Senator Guay: And Manitoba!

Senator Ottenheimer: —or, to put it another way, Albertans' values and Manitobans' values, or western values and Newfoundland values are quite close. Whether or not that is accurate, I do not know; I can only attribute it, in light of the great difference in geography and economy, to the premise that the values associated with the family farm and with family fishing enterprises are similar. People live close to nature; they harvest what nature and God provide. They know problems, accidents of nature, and weather. They know of hardship, financial and real, in terms of danger and life. Those values, whether springing from the ethos of the family farm or the family fishing enterprise, historically have been of great advantage to Canada, and should continue to be so.

Senator Bielish and I have also been neighbours in the sense mentioned by Senator Olson, in that we have occupied the same corridor. Indeed, our two secretaries shared the office between Senator Bielish's and mine. We would run into one another not only in the corridor but frequently in the room between our two offices. During the past two years we have had a continuing and warm friendship. I have always valued Senator Bielish's smile, her warmth and the sincerity of her person. In my opinion, she is proof that there is room in Canada, and in the Senate of Canada, for people of quiet dignity, who reflect the best of our traditional values, who reflect those family values that have played such an important role in Canadian life.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to add my words of appreciation for her contribution to the Senate, and to wish her well in the years ahead. I would certainly like to have a copy of The History of Women in Politics in Alberta before all 500 copies are gone, and I put in my name for a copy now. I put my name in now. Thank you.

• (1430)

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I too would like to pay tribute to Martha. She was one of my presenters when I was sworn into this house earlier this week. I knew she was due to resign, but I did not realize that it would be today. I do not want to see her departure from this chamber without reflecting on the contribution she has made, not only to this chamber, but also to the Conservative Party.

When I first arrived in Parliament ten years ago, she was one of the first women in our party caucus, along with Flora MacDonald. She has been a warm friend and willing mentor for my years in Parliament.

Much has been said today about her role in representing family values and in representing rural women and farm families. I should like to cast that in a modern tradition. We hear a lot about gender balance, two-income families, and some of the problems of women with careers today. We forget the fact that farm women have always had gender balance—equal work; and farm women have always had the problem of double income, or the lack of it. Martha can take her place with the finest women in Canadian history, and certainly she will have a place. I hope she has written her own story in that book on Alberta women.

In her speech, Martha referred to Emily Murphy and the Alberta women who won for Canadian women the stature of "persons". Emily Murphy was also an Albertan. She originally came from Ontario. She, with her husband, worked in northern Ontario in some of the small sawmill towns. When Emily Murphy went to Edmonton, she was named a magistrate because of her compassion and work in social services. With her horse and carriage she toured the back roads of Alberta and learned about some of the problems of rural families and rural women. She was one of the first people to identify the drug problem. Long before it became popular, Emily Murphy realized there was a problem.

Her crowning accomplishment was leading the charge to have women named as persons so that they could sit in the Senate. I always thought it was ironic, but not unusual, that Emily Murphy never sat in the Senate. Everyone expected that the first woman senator would be Emily Murphy, but instead it was a woman not of her party, which was Conservative, and the next vacancy in Alberta went to a man, because it was considered a Catholic seat. It took 50 years from the time that Emily Murphy led the charge to have women named as persons for an Alberta woman to sit in the Senate, and that was Martha.

Emily Murphy would be very pleased with that. I know she would feel that if she could not have sat in this chamber, then Martha was the one who should have done so.

We will miss you, Martha, and we wish you well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I too would like to join others who have spoken to acknowledge the contribution that Senator Bielish has made to our country. One could enumerate many of the things she has accomplished and done exceptionally well. I will not repeat the list of the many accomplishments that have been mentioned, because it is well known to everyone what she has done. However, perhaps I can enumerate one incident that I recall. By the way, in those days I thought she was much younger than I.

At one time we were both in Holland, she representing the Government of Canada. As the government's representative, she did an exceptionally good job in representing, and speaking on behalf of, the government. In fact, I was proud to be with her. I want to take this occasion to wish Senator Bielish all good things for the future—good health and happiness in her retirement.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to say farewell to Senator Bielish. She has worked in this chamber in the tradition of those women of Alberta who have contributed to the political life of Canada in this century. Her work follows along the lines of that famous group of women which led to Canadian women being recognized as persons. Strangely enough, as has been noted, the women who were in the forefront of the movement that took the case to Westminster failed to receive recognition back in their own country. In fact, none of them ever became "persons" in the Senate of Canada until Martha Bielish came here from Smoky Lake 11 years ago.

Martha brought with her a lifetime of knowledge, of the land, of the people and of rural women—not just in Canada but throughout the world. She has travelled to many conferences and has been recognized, in her contributions, as a true representative of understanding and excellence. Our work together in the Senate has been mainly as members of the Agriculture Committee, but we have also travelled the country with the Special Committee on Youth, and across our northern territories in connection with the Meech Lake hearings.

Martha has had a tough summer in terms of health. I wish her many, many years of not only happiness—which I know she will have with her family and grandchildren, whom she loves—but also strength and health. It has been a privilege to know Martha. She has been frank today in explaining why she is leaving early.Martha and I have not always seen eye to eye on political matters. But that is natural. I have to confess a feeling of sadness that she is leaving in an endeavour to try to ensure the success of a policy that is viewed with dismay in our home province of Alberta. But that, too, is political life. I shall miss Martha, and her red currant jelly, which she gave me every Christmas. I am sure she will miss my pickles. Perhaps we can get together in Alberta. Martha, I wish you every success. Your fame will remain in the book on Alberta women in politics that you were generous enough to give me. You are a fine example of that.

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleagues in wishing Senator Martha Bielish a long and happy retirement. I would like her to know how very much I have appreciated her many kindnesses to me and all of the help that she has provided, particularly in my first days as a senator.

• (1440)

The other comment I wish to make is that it has been a privilege to serve with you on the Agriculture and Forestry Committee, particularly in light of the important contribution you made, because of your family connection with what is now almost extinct, namely, a small family farm. You were able to give us, and others, information that only someone with your background and experience could credibly tell us about. Thank you for that, and my best wishes to you.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, there is an agreeable tradition in this place not always—but often—observed. That tradition is that the seat-mate of the recipient of salutary greetings have an opportunity to speak, and often that person is the last one to speak.

I am new in this seat. I had wondered what prompted my whip to assign me this seat. I thought for a moment that he realized I am one of the most left-leaning members of the caucus and that is why I am here. My next thought was that perhaps he wanted me as far away from him as possible. In any case, I am delighted that it has allowed me to become a seat-mate of Senator Dr. Bielish, even if it is for such a short time.

Senator Bielish pointed out that she was surprised when she was called to the Senate in 1979, which now seems not long ago. I was called in the same year, but I was surprised when, during the summer, groups of senators were appointed and my name was not on the list. I wondered what had happened, but finally Senator Nurgitz and I made it in the last batch.

I admire Senator Bielish. I agree with Senator Robertson that she is the type of person not totally common in political life, because she is genuinely modest. There is false modesty, and there are some who do not even bother with modesty, whether it be false or not. However, Senator Dr. Bielish, in the many tests that she has undertaken in this chamber, has tended to understate herself. In the process, she has over-exulted the good causes for which she has worked. That is a wonderful type of person to be involved in good causes. She has been a champion of one of the finest groups for the advancement of good human causes that I can recall.

Long ago, when I was working my way through college, and when I was a school teacher in the country I do not know how we could have got along without the Women's Institute—again, a group not placard-waving, not headline-seeking, but day after day doing for their fellow human beings that which should be done. As Senator Robertson has said, Senator Bielish is a quiet woman, giving support to good causes.

When Senator Bielish and I were in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, we were the only Conservatives on the Meech Lake Task Force. We saw that the Meech Lake Accord was not popular there, but, God bless those people, they treated us as well as they possibly could.

I remember a stormy committee luncheon, when all of us were discussing the committee proceedings. Senator Bielish said very quietly to some of our colleagues, with her head down, "Some of you have been leading the witnesses, haven't you?" She was right, although we had excellent meetings under the fine chairmanship of Senator Molgat. She very quietly pointed that out. She has done that since she came here. She has been quiet and consistent, knowing exactly where she was going and what causes she supported.

These are tense times. I heard some mild groans across the way. However, I would not be surprised if, in the long run, her early departure from this place is one of her finest gestures. Whether or not we like it, when section 26 is involved, sections 27 and 28 of the Constitution are in place. So, in my judgment, she has done a fine thing. I wish she did not have to do it, but in the long run she has rendered a great service to her province and, indeed, to the constitutional process. I salute her and wish her well.

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I too would like to join my colleagues in wishing Senator Bielish all the best for the future. I heard about her resignation a short while ago. I do not wish to go into Martha's background, as that has been covered by the leader and many others.

However, we do know that she has made a substantial contribution to women's organizations. Martha and I have had many discussions on this matter. She has for many years travelled across the country working with women's institutes, promoting women and women's concerns and issues, particularly in rural Canada. We are pleased that Senator Bielish has made that contribution to women.

Eleven years ago today, in 1979, she was appointed to the Senate. I did not know Martha Bielish until four years ago. I can honestly say that Martha is an honourable person. We are sad to see her go. She has made a contribution to her province by her early departure from this place. For that, we thank you, Martha.

She has put something back into this country by her work in the Senate chamber and in her work for Canadian women, as well as by her activities in the field of agriculture and in helping the people of her province.

Martha, I appreciate the friendship and your assistance you have given me since I became a senator four years ago. I agree with Senator Carney that you were a great replacement for Emily Murphy. Martha, I wish you all the best.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE SENATE

PRESENCE OF STRANGERS IN CHAMBER—MOTION TO ORDER WITHDRAWAL

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I see strangers. Pursuant to rule 17, I move that strangers be ordered to withdraw. Your Honour will notice from rule 17 that that question must be put without permitting any debate or amendment.

• (1450)

The Hon. the Speaker: I believe the honourable senator meant strangers in the gallery from the press.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I notice strangers. Rule 17 says that the question, that strangers be ordered to withdraw must be put without any debate or amendment. There can be no discussion. We will have to have a vote on it.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that strangers be ordered to withdraw from the chamber.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think we shall have to have a vote.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, before His Honour the Speaker asks that the doors be locked, I rise on a question of privilege of the Senate.

Senator Murray: Sit down!

Senator Barootes: A vote is being held!

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to point out to you, regardless of which side of the house you sit on that across Canada there has been an intensive and violent reaction toward the actions taken by the Prime Minister involving the Queen and—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Barootes: A point of order should be called. Call a vote!

Senator Molgat: —and the Governor General of Canada in appointments to this chamber. There has been complete revulsion on the part of the Canadian people.

Senator Barootes: Call the vote, Mr. Speaker!

Senator Molgat: Let us leave aside the public reaction as such. Let us consider the legal reactions to these appointments. There have been a number of constitutional experts who have clearly said that what has been done by the Prime Minister is unconstitutional under section 26.

Senator Doody: Order!

Senator Barootes: Order! Order! Call the vote!

Senator Molgat: Furthermore, since then the matter has gone before the courts.

Senator Barootes: Call a vote!

Senator Molgat: Don't talk to me about order! The matter is now before the courts of Canada, and the courts have set a date as to when this matter will be taken up to decide whether the eight—

Senator Doody: Vote!

Senator Molgat: —storm trooper senators are indeed legitimate senators of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: The matter is before the courts. The courts have set a date for this to be heard and a date at which time a decision will be given. It is not a long, extended time. The decision will be made during the month of October. That is now set. The courts have accepted that it will be done with respect to the legitimacy of the Prime Minister's actions under section 26.

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Barootes: Call a vote!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The bells have stopped ringing. Are you going to put the question, Mr. Speaker?

Senator Molgat: Since then a second point has come up concerning the legitimacy of the action, and the second court action concerns whether or not the appointment of an extra senator in New Brunswick is indeed proper.

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Molgat: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this house cannot proceed any further. There is no possibility of this house proceeding with a vote. If these eight extra senators are going to be included in the voting procedure, their position is not legally acceptable—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Absolutely!

Senator Molgat: —before it is decided whether or not they are constitutional.

Senator Barootes: Order! Call the question!

Senator Molgat: I submit that if we were to take any action at this point in which these eight so-called senators were allowed to vote, subsequently there would be a serious question as to whether or not any action taken by the Senate was indeed legitimate and constitutional.

Senator Barootes: You don't believe it yourself!

Senator Molgat: I submit that the privileges of this house are in very serious breach at this point. We cannot proceed with any vote in this chamber until the constitutional position of these eight individuals is settled!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I, too, rise on this very serious question of privilege. Even honourable senators opposite will know that they have a weighty responsibility not to participate in any action that is a violation of the Constitution. That question is very clear.

We know that when we look around the chamber there are eight senators more than the 104 that are permitted under the Constitution of Canada. Indeed, if we try to find the basis for this, of course, we are ploughing new ground to some extent, because it has never before happened.

Senator Barootes: You must have a precedent!

Senator Olson: Yes, there is a precedent. In 1873 the then Prime Minister, Alexander Mackenzie, made a request to appoint some additional senators over and above the number allowed for in the Constitution.

Senator Doody: Put the question!

Senator Olson: The first thing that is clear is that he was asked to demonstrate that there was a stalemate. He was also informed that he would have to demonstrate that the appointment of the additional senators—in fact, there were six then, not eight, as there are today; that was changed in 1915—was the only way to break the stalemate.

Senator Doody: Nonsense!

Senator Olson: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that neither one of those conditions has been met on this occasion, and that is the only precedent we have of this unusual situation.

Honourable senators, I think, too, that we must look at the qualifications of the eight additional senators. Those qualifications are set down in section 23 of what was the British North America Act, and in that part of it that remained in the Constitution Act, 1982. I shall not read it to honourable senators now, section 23 specifies that a senator must be resident within the province for which he is appointed. It deals with property requirements and so on. But, honourable senators, what we are dealing with now is the matter of senators who were apparently appointed from regions or divisions, which is the term used in the British North America Act.

Honourable senators, we now have 11 senators from New Brunswick. The Constitution clearly states that there must never be more senators from one province than there are members of the House of Commons. There is no doubt about that. There are no qualifications to those words. The Constitution merely states that it should never happen; and here we have that situation before us today.

Honourable senators, we can further look into the Constitution on the matter of qualifications of senators. Section 33 of the Constitution Act, 1982 states:

> If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

Well, honourable senators, a question—a legitimate question—is raised about these qualifications. There has been no attempt to allow the Senate even to discuss the question, let alone, as section 33 states, determine the qualifications of a senator from a region or a division.

● (1420)

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we now have a very serious breach of the process. I suggest that there is nothing worse than having people voting in this chamber, if they are not qualified to be here, and that has not yet been determined. The only precedent in the history of Canada has been violated as well. There has been no vote here that has set up a stalemate. There may be an apprehended stalemate,but that is not the case at the present time.

Honourable senators, I think that the privileges of the senators who are here have been very seriously violated by the presence of this chamber of eight more people who apparently intend to vote than the Constitution calls for, and that the qualifications for adding to the 104 have not been met. In fact, the one precedent has either been completely ignored or violated.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Barootes: I call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that we are to have a vote and I ask the Speaker to put the question, which is his clear duty under the circumstances.

Please do you duty, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I also rise on the question of privilege. I was appointed to the Senate from New Brunswick under the Constitution of Canada, as everyone has known it, as one of ten senators. If the Prime Minister wanted Mr. Ross, who is a good friend of mine, to be a senator, he should have appointed him instead of someone else and not have 11 senators from my province. Furthermore, honourable senators, there is now a legal constitutional question of whether the House of Commons is legally constituted because there is one less member in the House of Commons from New Brunswick than there are senators.

I say to those people who have been appointed under that section that they should have the decency to withdraw from the Senate and not to vote until their case is cleared before the courts.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to address the point of Senator Molgat. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms Fifth Edition, Chapter 5, Page 76, rule 225 states:

> When his attention has been called to a breach of order in the course of a division . . .

as Senator Molgat did

> . . . the Speaker has directed that the division should proceed, and has dealt with the matter when the division was completed.

Honourable senators, I think that we should deal with the division and then deal with the point of order.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I did not appeal a breach of order. I am talking about the privileges of the Senate, which is an entirely different thing. If someone were to come in after the vote is called, that is a breach of order. I am talking about the privileges of the Senate. I appeal to my honourable friends,do not simply take a partisan attitude on this question. This is a far more serious question with which all honourable members should be concerned. It is a matter of the constitutionality of what we are doing. It is not a question of breach of order, it is a question of breach of privileges of the Senate. Are we going to have people in the Senate who have not a clear constitutional right to be here or where there is a question about their constitutionality? Are they going to be entitled to vote in this chamber? That is the question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if there is a question about the constitutionality or, as Senator Olson has indicated, a conflict between various sections of the Constitution, the place where that is adjudicated is not here but in the courts. That is the first point to be made.

Senator Olson: That has already been decided!

Senator Murray: The second matter I wish to raise for the benefit of Senator Molgat, when he talks about privileges of the Senate, is that the Senate is not a club from which my honourable friend can blackball people whom he does not like or does not want to see admitted.

Some. Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: Who did that?

Senator Murray: The fact of the matter is that these senators—like Senator Molgat, like me, and like all other honourable senators here—were summoned to the Senate by the Crown. They are sitting in their seats today as of right. They have taken the oath of allegiance to the Queen, have signed the property qualifications and are seated here as of right. If my honourable friend has something to say about their qualifications to sit here, he can raise that question at the appropriate time.

Senator Barootes: After the vote!

Senator Murray: The situation we are in right now is that on Thursday last a motion was made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. That motion having been made, a division was called. The bells have rung summoning senators to the vote since Thursday.

The whips have entered the chamber and have taken their seats for the vote. I put it to Your Honour that the next step in this process is for Your Honour to put the question and to call the vote. If there are no legitimate questions, and I have heard none so far, about any honourable senators—I would invite my honourable friend, Senator Grafstein, to take his seat. The rules of Parliament, if not common courtesy—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Perrault: Keep your cool!

Senator Petten: What about last week?

Senator Murray: I put it to Your Honour that the next step in this process is for Your Honour to put the question—

Senator Frith: No!

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Murray: —and to call the vote.

Senator Perrault: It is not!

Senator Murray: If my friends have something to say—I have not heard yet a legitimate argument on the question of qualifications—

Senator Perraut: Are you going to insult the courts?

Senator Murray: We will discuss it then. But the question should be put and the vote taken.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

Senator Barootes: You have another one there!

Senator Hastings: We learn well!

Senator Frith: —the point now before the Senate is not to be confused with a point of order. The precedents on a point of privilege or question of privilege are very clear in parliamentary procedure and precedents.

At page 25 of Beauchesne, at paragraph 81, it states:

> By its nature, a question of privilege—

An Hon. Senator: Which edition?

Senator Frith: I am glad to take the time to make that clear. It is the Fifth Edition, Cinquième Edition.

Senator Barootes: You speak in French—

Senator Perrault: Just be patient, for heaven's sake!

Senator Frith: I should tell honourable friends opposite that I am in no hurry.

Senator Barootes: Did you miss with the razor this morning?

Senator MacEachen: It was an interesting caucus!

Senator Frith: All squash racquet injuries are not caused to me by Mr. Wilson!

On page 25 it states:

> By its nature, a question of privilege is of such importance that it may be raised at any time—

It then goes on to state that:

> —makes provision for the precedence of a question of privilege over all other business of the House. A question of privilege arising out of proceedings in the Chamber, during the course of a sitting, may be raised without notice.

• (1430)

Honourable senators, I know that the point of privilege that has been raised here about the qualifications of the senators appointed under section 26 is not taken seriously by some people—apparently not by our colleagues opposite. However, it is taken quite seriously by very reputable opinion in this country. I myself have had communications from law professors, uninvited, and I have read about other law professors who have raised this point. I believe that most provinces are concerned about whether or not the exercise of section 26 was legitimate in this case, and are quarrelling with it. That is the way things are in this country, as they should be. A question such as this might not be taken seriously by a party, or a group of parliamentarians, but may be taken seriously by others. It may be taken seriously by the press and not taken seriously by others.

I assure honourable senators and Your Honour that this is a serious question of privilege to many serious people. I would like to try to explain why the rule that applies to a point of order does not apply to a question of privilege, and should not in this case, since it is necessary that Your Honour understand the essence of the complaint.

The essence of the complaint is that the privilege of honourable senators, including those appointed to fill the vacancies, is affected in the most vital way. I say that, because if there is anything that a parliamentarian does that is central to his or her duties it is to exercise his or her vote. Questions of privilege have been raised of course about whether or not a parliamentarian is allowed to stand and speak. However, all debate, all parliamentary proceedings, everything that happens in committees lead to a vote. To say, "Look, you are saying that a vote is about to be taken, yet you complain that some people in this chamber should not be allowed to vote, but we want you to go ahead with the vote in the meantime." That is the reason why this has to stop now. That is why the decision, not just on the question of privilege but on the qualification of these senators, must be decided before any of us are asked to vote. If that does not happen, then our privileges are being interfered with in a vital way.

Honourable friends opposite think the point is not serious. Let us see if there is any seriousness in this point. Let us turn first to section 26 of the original Constitution which states:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

Thus, there are certain steps which have to be taken. First, there must be a recommendation from the Governor General to the Queen. The Queen then has to decide whether she thinks fit to direct that either four or eight members be added to the Senate.

Is there anything anywhere in parliamentary procedure or precedent to help us decide, judge or evaluate whether certain conditions must exist before such a recommendation can be made? I am sure some honourable senators will be glad to know that the answer is yes, there has been an occasion when something was recorded as to the tests. Senators Molgat and Olson have referred to that. The only time it was tried and got anywhere across the ocean was when Alexander Mackenzie and his cabinet asked the Governor General to request the Queen to appoint six senators, since it was six in those days, there being only three divisions. Apparently the British did not think that enough case had been made out to put it to the Queen. I should like to quote under the heading "Under What Circumstances Can Section 26 Be Invoked?"

> In 1873, the Macdonald government resigned over the Pacific Scandal and the Mackenzie government took office on 2 November 1873. Mackenzie prorogued Parliament the same day, and dissolved it on 2 January 1874. On 22 January 1874, the Mackenzie Liberals were returned with a a resounding majority.
> Meanwhile, in late December, 1873, Mackenzie and his Cabinet advised the Government-General to recommend to the Queen the appointment of six extra senators. The request seems to have been accompanied by a memorandum from the Prime Minister outlining the reasons for the request.

If any such memorandum was delivered in these present circumstances, we do not know about it or I, at least, do not know about it. I have not seen reference to it anywhere.

[Senator Frith.]

> Mackenzie described the purpose of section 26 as "a way to avoid possible complications or inconveniences by giving some elasticity to the system." He refers to the pre-Confederation agreement between the leaders of the two political parties that each party should nominate half of the original senators, and observes that 29 of the 31 senators appointed since 1867 were on the Conservative side.
> Although Mackenzie did not go so far as to argue that Senate appointments must maintain the principle of equal representation between the parties, he felt it was important to prevent an impression that the Senate was "too much the creation of the Administration of the day." Because of the disparity of the Macdonald appointments, "a sufficiently clear case [had] been established to justify the application of the counterpoise provided by the Constitution." Additionally, the extra appointments would ensure that government members were effectively advocated in the Senate.
> The Governor-General, Lord Dufferin, forwarded the request to Lord Kimberley, the Secretary of State for the Colonies . . .

I am glad to hear the Leader of the Government snicker at that point. He has a very good reason to snicker, but it is not the reason he thinks.

> The Governor-General, Lord Dufferin, forwarded the request to Lord Kimberley, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on 26 January 1874, immediately after it became clear that Mackenzie had won the election. On 18 February 1874, Lord Kimberley replied that he could not advise Her Majesty to direct the additional appointments. He noted that the "question was of considerable importance," but felt that the intention of the framers of section 26 was that the power of extra appointments should "be vested in Her Majesty in order to provide a means of bringing the Senate into accord with the House of Commons in the event of a collision of opinion between the two Houses." Consequently, Her Majesty could be advised to use it only when "a difference had arisen between the two Houses of so serious and permanent a character, that the Government could not be carried on without Her intervention . . ."

Are we saying that this government cannot govern without going across the ocean and asking the Queen? I repeat:

> . . . "a difference had arisen between the two Houses of so serious and permanent a character, that the Government could not be carried on without Her intervention, and when it could be shown that the limited creation of Senators allowed by the Act would apply an adequate remedy.
> In short, section 26 was to be used only when there was a collision of opinion between the two Houses of so serious and permanent a character that the government was incapacitated.

● (1440)

Senator Barootes: Absolutely right!

Senator Frith: Incapacitated!

Senator Perrault: You are incapable but you are not incapacitated!

Senator Hastings: You are incapable!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Perrault: Pathetic!

Senator Simard: Please proceed.

Senator Frith: I suggest that the incapacity of the government is not related to this circumstance but to other circumstances. The article goes on:

> Additionally, it had to be at least possible, and perhaps probable, that the extra appointments would resolve the problem.
> There the matter apparently would have rested, since the correspondence was not public, except for a chance remark by the Governor General in the summer of 1876. On a visit to British Columbia, Lord Dufferin found considerable dissatisfaction with Canada. There had been delays in the construction of the Pacific Railway, and a bill to provide for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway in compensation had been defeated in the Senate. In an attempt to assure British Columbians that the government had made every effort to have the Esquimalt and Nanaimo bill passed, Lord Dufferin made the following statement which was widely reported in the press:
> I saw Mr. Mackenzie—

That is, the then Prime Minister.

> —the next day [after the defeat of the bill], and I have seldom seen a man more annoyed or disconcerted than he was.

Honourable senators will note that this was after the defeat of the bill.

> Indeed he was driven in that interview to protest with more warmth than he has ever used against the decision of the English government which had refused, on the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, to allow him to add to the numbers of the Senate.
> Subsequently, motions were introduced in both the House and the Senate requesting the production of all correspondence, . . .

And the document goes on. It turned out, however, that the Conservative majority in the Senate was not prepared to let the matter lie:

> On 19 March 1877, the Senate passed a resolution expressing "its high appreciation of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in refusing to advise an Act for which no Constitutional reason could be offered." In addition, the Senate recorded its opinion on the appropriate use of Section 26.

Honourable senators will note that it was the Senate that recorded its opinion. The Senate said:

> this power was only intended to be exercised upon the occurrence of some grave political emergency, and with a view to the removal of serious differences which should actually have arisen between the Senate and the other House of Parliament, and are not susceptible of satisfactory adjustment by any other means . . .

For example, Senator Simard, a conference.

> any addition to the Senate under the provisions of the 26th clause of the British North America Act which is not absolutely necessary for the purpose of bringing this House into accord with the House of Commons, in the event of an actual collision of a serious and permanent charcter, would be an infringement of the constitutional independence of the Senate, and lead to a depreciation of its utility as a constituent part of the Legislature.
> This appears to be the last official documentation relating to the purpose and appropriate use of Section 26.

Let us get back to the question of the section itself, and the reason for the snicker by the Leader of the Government over the fact that Lord Dufferin sent a communication to His Lordship in England. There is no question, if one looks at the history of this section and particularly at the debates at the time of Confederation, that the purpose was as mentioned: the giving to the Queen of an arbitral function dealing with the whole question of the swamping of the Upper House. And they used the word "swamp" in the debates.

Let me refer to a memo by Lord Carnarvon to the British Cabinet. In it he noted two conditions added by the delegates: first, that the appointments should be made by the Crown rather than by the Governor General; and, second, that their numbers should not exceed six, which, at the time, meant two for each region. He added:

> . . . the intervention of the Crown is to my mind a doubtful proposal: but it is designed to be a check upon popular feeling and the action of the Local Government and I do not see that we can take exception to it.

Accordingly, the third draft of the British North America Act, which was then Section 16, was so worded. So the section went through these various phases and wordings. It is clear that the idea behind it, its purpose, was to retain for the Queen and the Crown in Great Britain the ability to resolve these questions and to play an arbitral role and, as we have seen, to do so only upon making an investigation as to whether the necessary circumstances existed.

Senator Barootes: Senator Frith, would you tell us what you are reading from?

Senator Frith: It is a memorandum that I received from the—

Senator Murray: Parliamentary Library.

Senator Frith: The library, that is correct.

Senator Murray: We have all read it.

Senator Frith: Oh, good! So you have all read it, says Senator Murray. So say you all?

Senator Barootes: We've all read it now!

Senator Frith: No, you have not. There is more if you want to hear more.

Given that background, is it really arguable that section 26 has remained available since 1982? If the history is as I have described—and I know that it is accurate, and I stand by it—if section 26 was placed in the BNA Act in order to retain an arbitral function for the Crown in England on the advice of the British cabinet, is it not very seriously arguable that section 26 lost its effectiveness and has really had no force since 1982, when the Constitution was patriated? Therefore, this question of qualification—

• (1450)

Senator Barootes: Perhaps we need a constitutional conference.

Senator Frith: Make us an offer. Because the question of privilege with which we are concerned deals with the vote and with who is entitled to vote on motions put to the Senate, the qualifications of these alleged "divisional" senators should be looked into very carefully. There must be before us proof of compliance, not with just the taking of oaths and the swearing of allegiance, but with section 26. Will they, for example, present their Writs of Summons executed under section 24? Is there adequate proof that there exist eight vacancies to be filled? Because what section 26 does is create the eight vacancies, which are then filled by these "divisional" senators. Have we had evidence both of a recommendation of the Governor General and of a direction from the Queen? Remember that this is extraordinary. It is not only extraordinary if you read the Constitution, but, historically, it is most extraordinary. It has never happened before.

Do we have evidence of the recommendation of the Governor General? Do we have a direction from the Queen? Are we senators—not divisional senators—not entitled to have evidence that these divisional senators are entitled to vote? I submit we are and that our privileges are interfered with if not. I submit we should be able to see the original, written and signed instruments of recommendation and direction and that we refuse to accept affidavits, certificates, unauthenticated telegrams, photocopies of instruments or of correspondence, and facsimiles of correspondence or of other documents as proof of either the recommendation or of the direction. Particularly, if either the recommendation or the direction did not take written form, it may be difficult for the government to offer adequate documentary evidence; but perhaps they should try. It is for the Senate, honourable senators, to decide whether or not what is offered is adequate.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Section 33 of the act provides:

> If any Question arises respecting the qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

[Senator Frith.]

The essence of the point of privilege is that before any vote is taken in this Senate, the qualification of the so-called "divisional" senators should be settled. Is it in doubt? It is in doubt because the conditions did not exist. Is it in doubt for any other reason? Well, we have been told that they have qualified. Where do we turn to find out when a senator is qualified? Can we look at this with respect to these divisional senators?

Senator Guay: You cannot go in front of the—Senator Murray: It is your last day. Go out in a blaze of glory.

Senator Frith: I am used to standing and I do not mind waiting.

Against that background of an apparent lack of conditions for the exercise of section 26, and doubt as to whether section 26 is still valid, there is a total absence of any evidence before us—those of us who are just ordinary provincial senators—about whether or not the conditions for these "divisional" senators' qualifications have been met. Can a vote be taken without an abrogation of our privileges?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Frith: Let us look at section 23, which states:

> 23. The Qualification of a Senator shall be as follows:
> (1) He shall be of the full age of Thirty Years:

I would think that, except for Mrs. Johnson, there is a prima facie case of that at least.

An Hon. Senator: She looks 21 to me.

Senator Frith: It goes on to state:

> (2) He shall be either a natural-born Subject of the Queen, or a Subject of the Queen naturalized by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of One of the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, before the Union, or of the Parliament of Canada, after the Union:
> (3) He shall be legally or equitably seised as of Freehold for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Free and Common Socage, or seised or possessed for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in . . .

and I would ask you to listen to these words:

> . . . within . . .

Senator Barootes: The law according to Frith.

Senator Frith: No, no, but thank you for the compliment. I would be glad to claim parentage of these words as if I had been given the right to write our Constitution, but this is not the law according to me, it is the law according to the Constitution, the super law.

Senator Barootes: It is interpreted.

Senator Frith: No, there is no interpretation. I am reading the words. Incidentally, if the honourable senator wishes to keep this up then that is fine with me.

Senator Barootes: We are having fun.

Senator Frith: When we have these breaks I feel I have to get back to the context by starting all over again, but I am glad to do that. Section 23 says, "The Qualification of a Senator shall be as follows:" and then it lists "(1)" and "(2)." It goes on to say:

> (3) He shall be legally or equitably seised . . .

Honourable senators, I shall read it all so that there can be no interpretation. It goes on:

> . . . as of Freehold for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Free and Common Socage, or seised or possessed for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Franc-alleu or in Roture, within the Province for which he is appointed, of the Value of Four thousand Dollars, . . .

These senators whose right to vote is the subject of this point of privilege and is being challenged are not appointed for a province; they are appointed for a division. They cannot have it both ways. If they are not appointed for a province but appointed for a division, then how can they possibly say, "This is the province in which I hold the land that qualifies me"?

Senator Hatfield: It is a division.

Senator Frith: But it does not say that. It says "Province." Are they provincial or divisional?

An Hon. Senator: Get serious!

Senator Frith: Yes, I certainly will. It is very serious and I would like you to get very serious. I would like Mrs. Campbell to get serious. I would like the honourable senator to get serious. I am reading from the Constitution and that is a joke to him, I take it. Mrs. Campbell took it seriously. Mrs. Campbell, after initially being taken by surprise, looked at the Constitution and said, "Oh, I have it. There is no problem for the House of Commons in the fact that there are now more senators for New Brunswick than members in the House of Commons. I have the answer. They are appointed for divisions." In that regard, we had something sent out to us just today which describes these people as "divisional" senators. It lists the "divisional" senators as follows:

Forrestall, J. Michael	Maritimes

There is no reference to a province. It goes on:

Ross, James W.	Maritimes
Grimard, Normand	Quebec
Lavoie-Roux, Thérèse	Quebec
Keon, Wilbert Joseph	Ontario
Meighen, Michael Arthur	Ontario
Berntson, Eric Arthur	Western
Johnson, Janis	Western

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Those senators say, or so we are told, that they are qualified; but under the Constitution they have to say that they hold land in the province for which they are appointed. So if I were qualifying them, I would say, "Nominee, do you hold property of $4,000?" "Yes." "In what province?" "Well, I hold it in a division." "Oh, I am sorry, the Constitution does not qualify you."

Then I would ask, "Where are you resident? Are you resident in the province for which you are appointed?" Mrs. Campbell says, "No, no. They are not appointed for a province. They are only appointed for a division." If they are only appointed for a division, how can they qualify under section 23(3) and (5)?

Again, we find that one of our new colleagues appointed to fill one of the vacancies—

Senator Barootes: Ah, ha! They are colleagues! You slipped there.

Senator Frith: No, it was not a slip, Freudian, Jungian or otherwise. I was referring to the senator opposite who said, "Get serious", and who is not a divisional senator but a provincial senator. He is indeed a colleague—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: —entitled, in my view, to vote, and whose privileges to vote are being affected by eight others sitting here who are not colleagues and are not entitled to vote because of these serious questions.

There may be other senators who wish to make some points clear that I have not. I have a good deal more material on the state of this section 26 in 1990.

As to those who think it is not serious, there are lawyers who think it is serious. There are clients of theirs who think it is serious. There are courts that think it is serious enough to have given dates for the hearing. There are many provincial governments that take it very seriously. Apparently, it is really only a joke to the government supporters sitting opposite. Not once when I have said, in response to being asked to tell a joke, "How about section 26 of the Constitution?" has anyone thought it was a joke.

Senator Perrault: The Conservative Party is a joke these days!

Senator Barootes: They should have had you fellows there to help write the Constitution in 1867.

Senator Frith: That is the one I have been reading to you, senator, precisely the one you refer to.

So, honourable senators, I say that I believe this should be challenged and that the question is a serious one. It is being challenged. We mean to await the decision as to whether or not this is serious enough for a court to pronounce on it. I think we should have the benefit of the advice of a court. We can certainly make the decision ourselves finally. However, the background circumstances are so serious that I propose, as a matter of privilege, that no vote be taken in this chamber, that the Canadian Senate should not hold a vote—and I ask Your Honour not to put the question or call for any roll-call vote in the Senate until the qualifications of those "divisional" senators is clear. There is very serious doubt surrounding those senators appointed under section 26. Their qualifications are seriously being questioned across this country, in the journals, in the newspapers and in the universities.

Speaking for myself, I feel that my privileges are very important, one of which is to vote, and that privilege is seriously affected until the power, authority and qualification of those so-called senators is clear. In my view, it is quite clear that there is nothing before us to so satisfy us.

Honourable Senators, that is my question of privilege. There may be other senators who wish to raise other questions of privilege, but I say to His Honour that there ought to be no vote taken in this chamber until we know who is entitled to vote. The entitlement to vote by the eight people in question is seriously in doubt.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourables Senators, I have to admit that I am not enough of a student of the rules of this place to determine whether a question of privilege should supersede the taking of a vote after the whips have walked down the aisle and taken their seats. That is something I will leave to others; it is an arcane subject.

What we are dealing with here is, in fact, the question of privilege in and of itself. It seems to me that we have to find a balance between the validity of the question of privilege and the need for this house to continue to proceed with its business. That is the balance we are talking about. The only way one can frustrate the work of this house with a question of privilege is if, indeed, there is a prima facie case.

If there is a prima facie case, and if the Speaker rules on that, then there may be some justification for interfering with the work of the house. But if a matter is merely raised on the basis that it is sub judice without there being a prima facie case, the work of the house cannot be frustrated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: What we are talking about now relates to the emergency provision under section 26 and whether the appointment of the eight additional senators is unconstitutional.

If we look at the point that was raised regarding Alexander Mackenzie in 1873, we will see that he was refused permission because the Crown said that he did not make a case. That is not the case in this instance. The Crown has, for better or for worse, agreed with the Prime Minister that the appointments can be made. There is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister has acted constitutionally.

Senator Frith raised the matter of property qualifications, but it seems to me that the court will find that one cannot mix divisions with provinces. There are reasons for divisions being used in certain aspects of Senate appointments, but they do not apply to the property qualifications. A senator must hold property in the province for which that senator is appointed, and indeed that senator must continue to reside in that province or in Ottawa.

As far as the matter of there being 11 senators from New Brunswick as opposed to 10 members in the House of Commons, the invalidity does not affect the Senate; the invalidity, if it exists, affects the House of Commons.

If this matter goes before the court, which I gather it will, I think the court will decide that the Prime Minister was constitutionally right in doing what he did. But whether the court does or does not so decide, that decision will be made within the seeming provisions of the Constitution; therefore it cannot be said to be invalid in this chamber unless a prima facie case has been made.

It is true that the court may find that the appointments are invalid. If so, the proceedings that have arisen out of these decisions may be invalid too, but the court will make that decision.

I leave aside the issue as to whether or not a vote can be held up by a question of privilege of this nature. There may be good arguments for that. I was impressed with Senator Frith's argument in that regard, but I do not think that a prima facie case has been made.

I think the Speaker should make a ruling—unless others convince the Speaker to make a ruling in respect of the vote not going ahead in the first instance—on the question of whether or not the prima facie case has been made, and if one is not made, whether the business of the house can be frustrated purely and simply by saying a constitutional matter is before the courts. I think not.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable Senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate drew our attention to the principle—-

Senator Doody: Which of you gentlemen is going to speak now?

Senator Grafstein: The Speaker recognized me, so I will continue.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate drew our attention to a principle which I do not think is correct, and one that has not been followed by a standing committee of this house, and that is if there is a matter of constitutional dispute, as the Leader of the Government has stated there is, that matter should be referred to the courts. It then follows that the House would continue. Following on the comments of the last speaker, this matter really is for the courts.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs thought otherwise on this point following the advice of Mr. Justice Dickson when he opined that it was the responsibility of all parliamentarians—including all senators—that in the case of unconstitutional matters they should not proceed, that it was not for the courts to fix up sloppy activity on the part of legislators.

I think that we are graced today with four premiers who I am sure take their responsibilities as seriously as I do. I feel that when they were confronted with constitutional matters they obviously had to decide for themselves, before they proceeded handing those matters over to the courts, whether or not they were constitutional.

I have been persuaded by the arguments made by my colleague, Senator Frith, but I am equally persuaded by the arguments made by a standing committee of this house, the chairman of which was Senator Neiman and the deputy chairman of which was Senator Nurgitz. Senator Murray also sat on that committee at that time. We dealt with this issue in principle. As I recall, the principle was that we, as senators, are not obliged to proceed with unconstitutional matters if we have a prima facie view that those matters are unconstitutional. That is the principle. In order to facilitate this—

Senator Murray: What is the unconstitutional matter you are being called upon to deal with?

Senator Grafstein: That the Senate itself may not be properly constituted. This is a fortiori—

Senator Murray: The senators were summoned here by the Crown.

Senator Frith: But they are not automatically qualified because they are summoned.

Senator Murray: Show me one that is not qualified! Show me a senator who is unqualified! They all signed the—

Senator Frith: You mean all you have to do is sign something and you are qualified under the Constitution? That is silly! It is ridiculous!

Senator Grafstein: With respect to Senator Everett's point, if, in fact, the Leader of the Government in the Senate affirms that in his view—and the other honourable senators opposite concur—the Crown proceeded constitutionally, then I take it that the Crown and the Governor General received opinions, legal opinions. If that is the case, why would the Leader of the Government not make those opinions available to the Speaker—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Oh, oh!

Senator Grafstein: I have had the opportunity of listening to the Leader of the Government, and I want to complete my remarks. I will not be lengthy. Perhaps the government in this instance—because it is so extraordinary—would table those opinions with the Speaker so that the Speaker, when he has to deal with these very complex and constitutional matters, will have these opinions before him. We would then not only have the word of the Leader of the Government but we would have the opinions upon which his view, as a member of the government, was based, which would facilitate Senator Everett's point. The Speaker and other honourable senators could look at those opinions and come to a determination as to whether or not his constitutional duty is being preserved by proceeding with a vote that may, in fact, be unconstitutional.

Senator Murray: The Speaker does not rule on the Constitution.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I shall speak briefly to this point.

Senator Frith: On brevity, we do not believe you anymore, Gerry.

Senator Ottenheimer: I certainly believed Senator Frith when he said he was going to be brief.

Senator Frith: I did not say I was going to be brief.

Senator Ottenheimer: I listened with interest to the historical analysis and resumé with respect to the appointment of senators under the section 26 provision. I listened with great interest to the Honourable Senator Everett, and I think he is absolutely right when he says that the Chair will have to make a decision as to whether or not there is a prima facie case. If there is a prima facie case, the senator raising the point of privilege has the right to put forward a motion, which then has precedence over other motions. If there is no prima facie case, then that is the end of it.

I would surely not subscribe to the suggestion that if no prima facie case is met, then this Senate, as an integral Upper House of the Parliament of Canada, can do nothing until the Supreme Court of Canada has made a decision. In whichever court the matter is heard—the Supreme Court of a province for example—that decision can be appealed, which could mean that the Parliament of Canada could do nothing for months and that no laws could be passed in Canada for months. The only things that could be done would be those undertaken by an Order in Council.

If we were to wait; if it could ever be acceptable that a house of the Parliament of Canada would totally abdicate its powers and responsibilities by saying that no law can be passed and nothing can be done until the Supreme Court of Canada makes a decision—and we all know that could take many months—

Senator Grafstein: Not if the government cooperates.

Senator Ottenheimer: —and only those with crystal balls can say how many, and the honourable senator has not loaned me his. The ones I have used have been invariably less than truthful. I gave up on crystal balls and Ouija boards a few years ago. So it would appear to me—

Senator Buckwold: But he still buys lottery tickets.

Senator Ottenheimer: —that the matter having come up, a decision will have to be made as to whether or not there is a prima facie case. If there is, the procedure is straightforward; but, if there is not, we are not then, so to speak, going to refuse to exercise any responsibility or to go on strike for a number of months.

To speak briefly again, at the risk of incurring the wrath or interjections of honourable senators opposite—

Senator Perrault: Take as long as you want!

Senator Frith: Take your time!

Senator Perrault: Slow down!

Senator Ottenheimer: —I would like to refer to a couple of matters that have been referred to. One is the question of property qualification—the requirement that senators own property in the province they are representing—and the other is a different provision in section 26, namely, the conditions under which what, in shorthand, has been referred to as "divisional" senators may be appointed. Surely there is absolutely nothing contradictory about a senator owning property in a province—indeed if he owns it anywhere in Canada it has to be in a province or territory—and being a divisional senator. There does not appear to be any contradiction there.

We have also heard that there is no evidence that those senators are qualified. Surely there is no evidence that they are not qualified. From now on, does it mean that any senator who is appointed must prove his qualifications and can be disqualified in the absence of any evidence? Their qualifications are readily available anyway. I would think that what is sworn to in the Clerk's office is readily available to all honourable senators.

The matters referred to in the point of privilege concern the constitutional law of Canada. It has been suggested that the provision of section 26 of the British North America Act is no longer valid or operative. It was not repealed, amended or changed in the Constitution Act of 1982. If it had been intended to have been inoperative, it would have been repealed. If there had been an intention to alter it, it would have been amended or changed. Surely, in the years preparatory to the finalization of the Constitution Act of 1982, the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of nine of the provinces did not forget that there was a section 26. It has not been repealed; it has not been amended; it has not been altered in any way.

Essentially, the argument is one involving the interpretation of the constitutional law of Canada. I suggest, honourable senators, that that is the responsibility of the Supreme Court of Canada. We must abide by it, yes, but to interpret the Constitution of Canada is not, in my opinion, the responsibility of the Senate of Canada.

There are those who suggest that the Senate has perhaps usurped some of the rights, initiatives and traditionally recognized prerogatives of the House of Commons. But surely we are not also going to abrogate to the Senate the rights and responsibilities of the Supreme Court of Canada. The matters referred to involve the interpretation of constitutional text, which is the responsibility of the Supreme Court of Canada; and, as Senator Everett has pointed out, the decision on the continuation— and orderly continuation—of proceedings in the Senate depends upon the ruling of the Chair.

If there is no prima facie case for privilege, then surely it would be a total abrogation of responsibility, and entirely without precedent, for the Senate to take the position that it will not do anything now until the Supreme Court of Canada has given us its view on section 26 and any other sections which might be relevant.

When the Speaker has heard argument, there will be a decision made on whether or not there is a prima facie case. If there is, what happens next becomes quite clear. If there is not, then obviously we will not go on strike for several months.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would the honourable senator explain something to me? He said that the question of privilege—which is hinged on whether or not these senators are qualified, and thereby affects the privilege of all of us—is for the Speaker to decide. But this question of privilege, according to section 33 of the British North America Act, "shall be heard and determined by the Senate". If it is the not the Speaker, then who will determine this? It is the Senate, through voting on the issue, that must determine it. It seems to me that the qualifications of these "divisional senators" are being challenged in this chamber.

Senator Ottenheimer: If I may reply briefly to the honourable senator, I do not think there is any difference of opinion between us. The difference might lie in the expression thereof.

The point of privilege has been made, and it is up to the Speaker to determine whether there is a prima facie case. If that is determined in the affirmative, it is only for the Senate to determine whether there has been a breach of privilege. There is an intermediate step, but I agree that it is the Senate which determines whether there has been a breach of privilege, by way of motion, which is given to the person who originally raised the question, and it takes priority over any other standing orders.

I do not think there is any difference between our points of view. Surely, yes, it is the Senate that makes the final determination of whether a breach of privilege has taken place; but there is a mechanism for so doing. That is, submitting the case. A preliminary finding of whether there is a prima facie case will then be made.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): If I may, I will ask Senator Ottenheimer a question on the very interesting scenarios he has depicted.

If it were found that there is a prima facie case of privilege, then I take it that his view is that somehow the proceedings of the Senate in the future would be affected. I wonder what he had in mind.

If there were a finding that a prima facie case existed, of course, it would be put to the Senate and the Senate would determine whether it did so exist. Would the honourable senator then say that we must have that settled before we proceed further?

Senator Ottenheimer: I will deal first with the first part of the honourable gentleman's question, and yes, I think that, a question of privilege having been raised, it will have to come to its logical conclusion. That logical conclusion, after argument has been heard, will be that the Speaker will decide whether a prima facie case exists. If it did not, my understanding is that that would be the end of the matter, at least for now. If the Chair found that a prima facie case existed, my understanding is that the person who raised the question of privilege would then have the right to be recognized by the Chair and to move the appropriate motion, whatever that may be. That motion would then be debated and voted on.

Depending upon the wording of the motion, I would assume that its purpose would be to conclude that privilege had been breached. It is only the Senate that can make that determination and not the Speaker. All that the Speaker can do is decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. If he were to decide in the affirmative, then, as I have said, it is my understanding that the person who originally raised the matter would be recognized by the Chair. He would have the right to move a motion, and the decision on that motion would then be the determination of whether there was a breach of privilege. That is how I understand it.

Senator MacEachen: I took it, from the earlier point made by the senator, that he believed that if the prima facie case were found and the decision were made, that would then affect the future proceedings of the house. I take it that was his point.

If it came to the point where a prima facie case of privilege were found by the Speaker and the motion were put to the house as to whether a question of privilege existed, is Senator Ottenheimer of the view that the senators in dispute should be permitted to vote on that motion?

Senator Murray: Of course.

Senator Ottenheimer: Yes, that obviously is an extremely important matter.

Senator Frith: So far so good!

Senator Ottenheimer: Barring evidence to the contrary, my understanding is that those senators have taken the oath of office and have fulfilled whatever legal requirements there are. I understand that the officers of the Senate—I assume they would include the Clerk and the Law Clerk—are aware of that, or, if that were not the case, would be aware of that also.

There being no evidence to the contrary, I do not know how one could oblige them not to vote. That is prejudging the issue. Obviously, it could be argued that if they voted, that would be prejudging the issue.

Senator Stewart: So?

Senator Ottenheimer: I understand its centrality—that is quite obvious—but it would not become a pivotal question unless and until there were a finding of a prima facie case by the Chair. If there were no such finding, it would be academic, and I do not mean that in any pejorative sense. But, certainly, if the Chair found a prima facie case, then the question has its centrality.

● (1540)

I suppose, then, in partial reply to the Leader of the Opposition, I would say that that may not be a bridge that we have to cross at all, and it is not a bridge that we yet need to cross. However, I fully recognize that it is a bridge.

Senator Frith: If I understood him correctly, Senator Ottenheimer's point is that if a senator's qualification is challenged, the onus is on the challenger to prove that the senator is not qualified, rather than for the person challenged to prove that he or she is.

If someone walked in here one day and sat in a seat and I asked, "Are you qualified?", would the person state, "I am qualified until you prove I am not."? Is that the suggestion, or did I misunderstand? What led me to ask that was the use of the words "in the absence of evidence to the contrary." I would think that on the issue of qualification the onus should be on the person claiming the qualification and not on the person challenging to prove the negative.

Senator Ottenheimer: Obviously, we are in uncharted waters. I am not aware that there has ever been an occasion where a senator's qualifications have been challenged.

Senator Frith: They have today.

Senator Ottenheimer: Yes, they have now. However, there was no precedent to follow.

Senator Frith: No, I agree. I only wanted your opinion on the onus.

Senator Ottenheimer: There being no precedent to go by, my view would be the following: When a person purports to be a senator, he or she takes the oath of office and attests, by affidavit to the Clerk of the Senate, to various qualifications, of age, property, non-bankruptcy, and, perhaps, as to being compos mentis. I am not sure if that is necessary.

Senator Frith: That has not been done in this case.

Senator Ottenheimer: That being the case, to again use the overworked phrase "prima facie", there is a prima facie case that the person is qualified because an oath of office has been taken before a chief officer of the Senate, and the Clerk has satisfied him or herself that the qualifications have been met. Those persons are obviously non-political, non-partisan officers of Parliament who have an absolute responsibility to treat Parliament, the Senate, honestly, without bias and without partisanship.

Having taken the oath of office, the oath of loyalty, and signed or executed the affidavit or the necessary documents in the presence of the chief officer of the Senate, there is a presumption that it has been done properly and that it would not be attested to as having been done properly if the Clerk were not of that opinion.

If one were to dispute that, there would be some onus of proof on the part of a person challenging it. Otherwise a person could come in tomorrow and say, "Senator Ottenheimer, I challenge your qualifications. Do you have property in Newfoundland", or "are you this or that," and I would have to prove it. However, my answer would be to check with the Clerk. He is aware of the affirmation I made and he is satisfied. I believe the case is similar with the eight senators now under discussion.

Senator Gigantès: They are not being challenged on grounds of property or age, except in one case. They are being challenged on the grounds of possible incompatibility and contradiction between two articles of the Constitution.

Section 26 deals with the addition of senators. There are now 11 senators from New Brunswick when otherwise constitutionally there could not be more than 10. Therefore we are in a constitutional contradiction.

If any of a group of four is unconstitutional, the whole group is unconstitutional.

If the House of Commons continues to function with one less member than it should have, it is unconstitutional. That not only taints the House of Commons, but anything coming to us from the House of Commons with which we have to deal. As Honourable Senator Grafstein stated, according to ex-Chief Justice Brian Dickson, we should not deal with unconstitutional issues. It is our constitutional duty not to touch with a barge pole anything unconstitutional.

Senator Ottenheimer: The matter referred to by Senator Gigantès is essentially in line with my argument. The crux of the question of privilege deals with the interpretation of the Constitution. I maintain that that is the responsibility of the courts, and basically of the Supreme Court of Canada, and that we cannot, or should not, usurp that function.

The honourable senator referred to a possible problem for the House of Commons. I do not think there will be one. However, as Senator Everett stated, that is the problem of the House of Commons, which I am sure it will be able to resolve, and I am not aware of any problem with respect to the Senate. We are going back over many issues on which we both have different viewpoints.

Senator Gigantès: Section 33 of the original Constitution states:

> If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

Senator Ottenheimer now states that it is not the Senate but the Supreme Court. Which is it?

Senator Ottenheimer: I will not repeat my speech. The matter came up as a question of privilege which will require a ruling by the Chair as to whether or not it is a prima facie case of privilege, and then one will know what the procedures will be. The question of qualifications came up in the context of, or with reference to, the interpretation of the Constitution. It could have come up in reference to something else or in another context. However, having arisen in the context of the interpretation of the Constitution, I regard that as being the responsibility of the Supreme Court of Canada. From the privilege aspect, the Senate will be able to resolve that when the Chair makes a ruling. There are two aspects: first, the purely parliamentary matter being submitted on which there will be a ruling on the prima facie aspect; and, secondly, a matter on which presumably the courts will adjudicate on—a responsibility which we should not usurp, and which I do not think we are competent to so do. We are not the court of final appeal in a judicial sense.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I, too, rise on a question of privilege. The presence here this afternoon of eight persons, who undoubtedly would be worthy senators if summoned under section 24, raises a question about the legitimacy of this house sitting here this afternoon. How does that affect my privileges?

I was summoned here to represent the people of my province, Nova Scotia. There are certain bills on the Order Paper of the Senate. We are all familiar with the GST bill. The people whom I represent will be affected by the outcome of any vote on that bill. Similarly, there is a bill with regard to abortion. Presumably the government proposes to have the eight persons, ostensibly appointed under section 26, vote on that bill. That bill is of great importance to the people whom I represent. Consequently, the validity of those votes affects my role as a representative of the people of the province of Nova Scotia.

• (1550)

As Senator Ottenheimer stated, it is true that ultimately the constitutionality of the summons issued under section 26 will be determined by the Supreme Court. But surely we are obliged to take due caution with regard to the bills that we send up for Royal Assent. If there is any ground for questioning the validity of decisions made by the Senate by reason of the participation of persons concerning whose presence here there are serious questions, then, surely that is a matter we should examine. Clearly there is a prima facie question of privilege.

Any vote in which these eight otherwise entirely estimable persons participate will be questionable. Those votes will be questioned in our courts of law. The longer the uncertainty persists, the more the actions of the Parliament in which they participated will be questioned.

In addition to that, there is the court of public opinion. The court of public opinion is not to be dismissed lightly, particularly in Canada, with regard to taxation matters. We all know—and we have heard this said by all political parties in Canada—that in this country we rely greatly upon the ordinary person to assess his own taxes. But if the ordinary person feels that a tax is eminently unfair, and, at the same time believes—honourable senators, I am having great competition from a filibuster on my immediate right.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Do not let them get you down. I defend your right!

Senator Stewart: Thank you, Senator Roblin; I can always depend on you. Apparently two notable speeches are being rehearsed here. We will be able to enjoy those speeches in a moment or two.

The court of public opinion is important, particularly when tax legislation is concerned, because we rely upon people to assume that any tax that they themselves are administering is fair and that it is legal within our system. In fact, some will go so far as to say, "Yes, this tax is unfair. But it was made by due process. Therefore, I will try to get it rectified by due process."

Honourable senators, if we go ahead and pass the GST, for example, with the participation of persons whose eligibility has been questioned, the court of public opinion may decide that because our process was flawed, the public may decide that it has no obligation to cooperate willingly on taxation in the future.

The eight persons to whom reference has been made may all be estimable persons, other than for the purposes of section 26. I wish to argue that that section has been used improperly in this instance. That is the first ground of my point of privilege. I will state my first contention briefly, and then I will explain it.

I argue that by reason of changes in other parts of Canada's Constitution, section 26 can no longer produce the result intended by those who enacted it. It has become inoperable by reason of obsolescence. It is really a relic from an earlier Constitution of Canada. It is a relic, an empty shell.

Imagine that you are wandering on a nice day on a beach in Nova Scotia and that you see a shell. You say, "Ah, a snail." But you do not move it, because if you did so you would disturb the little creature who lives in that shell. But pick up section 26 in 1990. Examine section 26 and you will find that nowadays it is only a hollow shell, that the life has gone out of it, that there is no vitality in this shell, only water and sand. When that section is used now, it is simply the illusion of validity that the shell creates on which reliance is being placed. In other words, section 26 is devoid of life. Why? Let us look at the section.

What does the section require if it is to serve its purpose? It requires impartiality, first with regard to the Governor General, and, second, with regard to the Queen.

Let me read what a distinguished constitutional authority, an authority applauded on both sides of the House has said. I am reading from the The Canadian Journal of Economic Political Science, 1946, page 160. The author here is Senator Eugene Forsey. He states that:

> The constitutional practice of that time—

And here he refers to 1873-74;

> —was that the Canadian Cabinet advised the Governor-General to make the "recommendation" to the Queen; that the Governor-General, if he accepted the advice, made the recommendation; and that the British Cabinet advised the Queen whether or not to "direct" the appointment of the extra Senators.

Here Senator Forsey refers to 1873-74. He goes on to state:

> On this occasion, the Governor-General accepted the advice of his ministers, but the British government declined to advise the Queen to direct the appointments, the refusal being dated February 18, a month and eight days before the opening of the new Parliament.

That is an accurate description of how the section was intended to operate.

The Governor General did not have to accept the advice of his Canadian ministers. He was impartial in those days. He was generally a British peer, perhaps from Scotland or Ireland. He was not fully dependent on his Canadian ministers.

There is another section in the act that is instructive with regard to the independence of the Governor General from his Canadian ministers, and that is section 55, dealing with Royal Assent. It states:

> Where a Bill passed by the Houses of the Parliament is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's Assent, he shall declare, according to his Discretion, but subject to the Provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's Instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's Name, or that he withholds the Queen's Assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the Signification of the Queen's Pleasure.

In other words, when the British North America Act, 1867 was made, it was assumed that a Governor General could, in the case of a government bill, withhold the Queen's assent. The kind of independence that was such that he could withhold Royal Assent from a government bill, and that was done. That is the kind of independence that underlies the word "recommendation" in section 26.

What is the situation nowadays with regard to the Governor General? We have had two in succession who have been active Canadian politicians. Governor General Jeanne Sauvé was a member of the Trudeau cabinet. She underwent a period of sanitization in the chair of the other place and then advanced to Government House. In the case of the present incumbent, the only thing that seems to have intervened between his valuable participation, I am sure, in the other place a government house leader was an election in which he was defeated. Is that impartiality? Can anyone argue that there is even a pretence of impartiality such as is assumed by section 26 in that situation? I submit not.

As we all know, the Governor General now takes the advice of his Canadian ministers. How then can the basic assumption of impartiality, which is fundamental to section 26, be present? Clearly, it is not.

Let us turn to the case of the Queen and the words in the section, ". . . the Queen thinks fit . . .". What does the history of the section reveal? What it reveals is that when the politicians from Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were at Westminster preparing the draft of what became the British North America Act, 1867, they did not want to include anything like section 26, for various reasons. They were very sensitive concerning the representation of the provinces in the Senate. It was the British government which persisted in insisting that a clause be included to break a kind of absolute deadlock between a government with a majority in the House of Commons on the one hand and an uncooperative Senate on the other. That is a matter of record.

Various drafts were tried. The third draft in the process read as follows:

> If any Money Bill passed by the House of Commons is rejected by the Senate for any one Session, or if any other Bill passed by the House of Commons is rejected by the Senate on three consecutive occasions, and if in such case or cases the Governor-General shall ascertain that such Bill or Bills has or have been carried by the majority of voices from two out of the three divisions of the Kingdom—

For example, Quebec and the Maritimes.

> —then and in such case it shall be lawful for Her Majesty to create additional Members of the Senate, preserving the rule of equality between three Divisions of Upper Canada, Lower Canada and the Maritimes.

That was the "formula approach". It was not adopted. It is interesting to speculate as to why. I suspect that one of the reasons it was not adopted was because it would have permitted a certain amount of packing of the Senate if a money bill had been defeated only once. We know that the representatives of Lower Canada, which is now Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, were determined to assure that the Senate had full legislative competence with regard to money bills, once those bills came up from the Commons. They were not prepared to allow money bills to be downgraded insofar as the legislative process was concerned.

Having rejected the formula approach, they turned to the arbitrarial or impartiality approach. They decided to rely upon the Governor General who, in those days, was in a position to be impartial. They decided to rely also upon the Queen who, in those days, was in a position to be impartial. The British ministers objected at first to the involvement of Her Majesty's British government in this matter. The clear assumption was that the Queen would be advised not by her Canadian ministers but by her British ministers and that it would provide the type of impartiality that the section assumes, the kind of impartiality which was evidenced in 1874.

We know that the Queen as advised by her British ministers now has no jurisdiction in Canada. Where then does she get her advice? The government says that she must get it from one of the parties involved in the dispute. She is to act impartially, but we are told that she is obliged to listen to the Prime Minister.

Senator Everett: Could I ask the honourable senator a question for clarification?

Senator Stewart: Yes, go ahead.

Senator Everett: You said that it was assumed that the Queen would be advised by Her British ministers, did you not?

Senator Stewart: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could you give us a citation or some indication as to how you arrived at that assumption?

Senator Stewart: I could go on at some length in that regard. For example, in 1874, as we have seen from the example cited by Senator Frith, the Colonial Secretary of the day became seized of the request from Mackenzie and did not feel that he, as a British minister, should even take it to the Queen in her right of Great Britain.

Let me repeat again what Senator Forsey, who has examined this record very carefully, said:

> The constitutional practice of that time was that the Canadian Cabinet advised the Governor-General to make the "recommendation" to the Queen; that the Governor-General, if he accepted the advice, made the recommendation; and that the British Cabinet advised the Queen whether or not to "direct" the appointment of the extra Senators.

It seems to me that is an accurate précis of the two steps set out in section 26.

Is that satisfactory, Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Yes, it is. Thank you.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, it is clear that section 26 is now only a hollow shell. It is only a constitutional relic from bygone days. The Prime Minister should not have imposed partial advice, the advice of one of the parties to the alleged dispute, upon the Queen, a person who manifestly must decide impartially if this section is to be used as was intended. That is one point. Let me read to you what Senator Forsey said at page 162 of the same article with regard to the 1874 incident.

> The British government's reply . . .

That is, to Prime Minster Mackenzie's request—

> . . . was a frigid and uncompromising refusal. It totally ignored both Mackenzie's reasons for advising the appointments, laying down instead the principle that the Queen could be advised to exercise the power only "in the event of an actual collision of opinion between the two Houses when it was made apparent that a difference had arisen of so serious and permanent a character that the Government could not be carried on without Her intervention, and when it could be shown that the limited creation of Senators allowed by the Act would supply an adequate remedy." In this case nothing of the sort had been shown.

Senator Finlay MacDonald: Senator Stewart, will you permit a question?

Senator Stewart: Yes, Senator MacDonald.

Senator MacDonald: Is it not a fact that the reason Mackenzie failed was that he based his case on an anticipation of a deadlock and he could not prove it? Have we not got a completely dissimilar situation now?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the reason I referred to the 1873-74 incident at this time was to show that it was the Queen as advised by her British ministers who performed for the purposes of section 26.

Senator Finlay MacDonald now raises quite a different matter. I will come to that, in my own way, almost immediately. In the debate which took place in the Senate in 1877—the debate to which reference has been made earlier—the only person in the Senate at that time who had participated in the discussions at Westminster, described what had gone on. I should now like to quote from the Debates of the Senate dated March 19, 1877. I am quoting the Honourable Senator R.D. Wilmot, New Brunswick. He said:

> After some argument they again returned to their Council Chamber, and after another long discussion they agreed upon the constitution of the Senate as it now stands in the Act, adopting the 26th clause as a safety-valve in the event of a dead lock. This, in his judgment . . .

That is, Senator Wilmot,

> . . . would not arise except under circumstances where the public mind was greatly agitated on some question of great interest, similar to the reform question in Great Britain.

I will explain his reference to "the reform question" in a moment.

> The Senate was to be a territorial representation, especially for the purpose, among others, of guarding the interests of the smaller provinces, and to resist any encroachment on the part of the larger provinces, which held so much larger a representation in the House of Commons. Holding the view that the 26th clause should only be acted upon in a case of great emergency, he . . .

That is, Senator Wilmot,

> . . . certainly was surprised when he learned that the Government had attempted to add to the numbers of this House in the interest of party.

That is to say, he was surprised at what Mackenzie had tried to do in 1874.

I read that passage because it is revealing as to the circumstances in which it was thought that section 26 might be used—the very question Senator Finlay MacDonald has asked us about.

Why did Senator Wilmot refer to a question similar to "the reform question in Great Britain"? What he was talking about, of course, is what had happened in Great Britain in 1832 with the first Reform Act. We all know the basic facts about that famous episode, so I will not give you all the details.

The government of the day had put through the House of Commons a bill to reform the representation of the people of Great Britain. That bill went to the House of Lords and there it was rejected. Then there was an election. The government brought in the bill a second time and it passed the House of Commons. The bill then went to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords, notwithstanding that there had been an election on the reform question, was at the point of defeating the bill a second time. At that point, in those circumstances, the King thought it proper and constitutional for him to agree to let it be known that if the Lords persisted he would agree to the summoning of a number of additional peers, sufficient to assure that the bill would pass.

Let me imagine a modern parallel, Senator MacDonald. Let us imagine that in 1988 the Senate, after the election, had persisted in refusing to pass the free trade bill. The kind of circumstances that Senator Wilmot said was in the minds of those who wrote section 26 would have prevailed. That is the kind of major constitutional crisis they had in mind. They had in mind the kind of situation which prevailed in Great Britain in 1910 and 1911, and which led to the Parliament Act, 1911 of 1910 and 1911.

We are dealing here with the composition of one of the two Houses of the Parliament of Canada. The Senate is a much more important body in our Parliament than the House of Lords in the British Parliament. The Senate is here to represent the people in the provinces. I do not know whom the British peers represent. At one time it was said that they represent the "beerage". The Senate of Canada is a federal body, designed to protect the less populous provinces; accordingly, its composition is of fundamental importance.

Let us look at the legislative situation we have now. Senator Finlay MacDonald quite properly asks us to look at that situation. We have in mind three bills. There is Bill C-21. The motion with regard to that bill has stood on the order paper since May 23, 1990. Who has prevented it from being dealt with one way or another? It is not a Liberal senator. It has stood week after week at the request of Senator Ottenheimer, a supporter of the government. We have requested a conference on that bill. A conference is an old, well-established technique for trying to break a deadlock on a bill. The government has said no—I was about to say "our way or no way", but I will restrain myself—to a conference. They say that they are so committed to the bill as it now stands that there is no point in going to a conference. That is their position, not ours.

Let us look at Bill C-28, the so-called clawback bill We amended that bill and sent it back to the other place. The House of Commons saw fit not to accept our amendments. There is a motion on our order paper with regard to insistence, byt that motion was put down late in June, shorthly before the Senate adjourned for the summer on the government's motion, and it has not been advanced. I am told that it was introduced on June 19. Why should we guess as to the outcome of a vote on that motion, particularly in a close house?

Then we had Bill C-62, the bill on the goods and services tax. This house has passed that bill at second reading. We now have an unfavourable report from the committee. I would not like to have a large sum of money riding on the outcome of a vote on a motion for concurrence in that report, that is a vote in which only senators summoned under section 24 participated. Who is to say how certain Senators would vote?

Why has the government jumped the gun? Why this anticipation? This is not a situation comparable to that described by Senator Wilmot, nor is there a demonstrated deadlock. Had the government dealt with Bill C-62 in another way, its case insofar as the legislative situation is concerned would have been stronger. I am not referring to the operability of section 26. That is another question. If the government had allowed Bill C-62 to be dealt with by the due process in the Senate, and if at the end of the road the Senate had not passed the bill, then it would still be open to the government to do what they do in Great Britain under the Parliament Act of 1911. In other words, they could have introduced the bill in another session. This session could have been terminated. Another session could have been started at once. The government could have put the bill through the House of Commons this fall with closure and time allocation. It has shown no hesitation in using those rules. The bill could have gone through House of Commons house in at the most 10 days. Thereafter it would come over here. If at that point the bill was in danger, there might be some basis for the government's argument that the Senate had set up a radblock. The government could point to some evidence that the Senate was not likely to pass this bill. Now, however, it has only its own guess as to how Senators will vote.

On two major grounds the Prime Minister's application of section 26 is unacceptable. First, as I have argued—of course, the matter ultimately will have to be settled by the courts, as it will be—section 26 has been robbed of its vitality by reason of other changes in our Constitution. The impartiality which was the manifest intention of this section—the intention revealed clearly by the history and by the words of the section—is no longer available. Second, the circumstances now prevailing do not constitute the kind of legislative stalemate, the great emergency, bringing the Parliament of Canada to a grinding halt, or circumstances in which, in the words of Senator Wilmot, "... where the public mind was greatly agitated on some question of great interest, similar to the reform question in Great Britain."

Honourable senators, it is my contention that the eight senators summoned under section 26 have not been duly summoned. If they participate in votes of this house, those votes will be questionable and, what is more, public opinion, which is very important with regard to the performance of the law, is likely to question the legality of those acts. There are some bills of great sensitivity—and I have mentioned not only the GST bill, but the abortion bill—on which, when this house pronounces its opinion, there should be no shadow of doubt as to the legality of what this house has done. For those reasons, I suggest that there is a prima facie case of privilege, a case which in the interests of all honourable senators, of the eight senators summoned under section 26 and of all Canadians, ought to be declined. The matter ought to be dealt with by the Speaker and by this house in as urgent and as expeditious a manner as possible.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is a little difficult, if one could know at this stage of rather wide-ranging debate, to determine whether or not there are any points of concern that should be stated or perhaps reiterated; but I shall try to avoid trespassing on the rule of repetition, although it might be almost unavoidable in some cases. If ever there were an argument for reform of the Senate, it has been demonstrated by discussions that have been taking place in this house in the last little while.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: In 1981 I had the privilege of bringing in a motion to this very chamber in which I suggested that in order to convey some legitimacy, both with respect to our representational capacity and to our responsibility, an elected Senate would be the way to go. I say here, quite frankly, that there is not a person in this chamber who is responsible to anyone but himself, and there is not a person in this chamber who represents anyone but himself, despite the fact that some of us may claim a certain territorial allegiance.

Senator Bonnell: What about the man form Alberta?

Senator MacEachen: What about Senator Waters?

Senator Roblin: The fact is that we are a body that is appointed, and that is certainly coming to a very sharp point in the discussion we are having here.

I was interested to hear my friend who has just spoken talk about the court of public opinion. I say that if this body had paid any attention to the court of public opinion, it should have paid attention to the court of public opinion with respect to the Senate, and I think it would have been found rather difficult to muster a majority of those who might be polled from time to time to support the continued existence and legitimacy of this body as it stands today. So it is all right to call on public opinion when it suits you, but to pay no attention to when it has another connotation.

I also want to make reference to the use of section 26 of the British North America Act. We are told that it is a shell, that the use of it is illegitimate, questionable and anachronistic, and that it ought to have no effect in this day and generation. Yet, it does not take a very long memory to recall that in 1982 members of this chamber, along with the members of the other house of the Parliament of Canada and the premiers of the various provinces, after widespread public hearings to boot, ruled on the Constitution that was to govern our affairs from thus onward. Strangely enough, clause 26 of the Constitution that is presented to us today as a shell and of no account, of no value, was included in the Constitution as approved. We either have to bring a charge of carelessness of a monumental character to justify this fact, or else we have to say that it was left in there because there was thought to be good reason for it.

Reference was made to a man whom I am proud to call a friend—I refer to Eugene Forsey—and his comments that were delivered ten years or so ago under other circumstances. If senators had had the opportunity of listening to his views in 1990, and his views on the issue now before us as to whether the Prime Minister of Canada has the power or the right to invoke section 26, they would find that he would give it an emphatic endorsement.

Senator MacEachen: Did you hear him on the day the appointments were made when, out in the hallway, he said that it was an improper use in these circumstances?

Senator Roblin: If that is the case, I will have to revise that particular portion of what I have to say; and I have no hesitation in doing that because we are speaking here, as everyone knows, pretty extemporaneously and I am relying on my memory, which does not always prove to be correct. However, I do not think my argument hinges on what Dr. Forsey thought at one time or another, I have much more important arguments to make, and if my friend will sit down, because I do not intend to be interrupted—he can question me afterwards but not at the moment—I will continue with the points I have to make.

It should be well remembered, when we consider the legitimacy of the Prime Minister of Canada's action, and consider the charges that have been brought against him by the gentleman who preceded me about the legitimacy of his action, people seem to have overlooked the fact that the GST, like it or not, unpopular as it undoubtedly is in every corner of the land, was part of the election program in 1988.

Senator Perrault: No, it was not. Free trade was the issue and it is not working either!

Senator Roblin: It was part of the election program of 1988. It was put before the people and was included in the mandate that was then received.

I remember an interesting visit to the House of Lords in which they told us—and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will remember this—how they dealt with matters they did not like coming from the House of Commons, particularly in the days when there was a labour majority in the House of Commons and a Conservative majority in the House of Lords. They said that if it had been included in the election campaign they would not argue about it and, in any case, if it was a matter of important government policy, they very seldom introduced what they would call "wrecking amendments." The legitimacy of the House of Lords' amendments received some impetus when the Commons realized that they were approaching their job of sober second thought in a way which did not interfere with the supremacy of the House of Commons and the parliamentary system. It seems to me that there is some kind of lesson for us in that.

I want now to deal with the question of partial advice to the Queen. Does anyone think that Her Majesty in the United Kingdom does not receive partial advice from her ministers? Of course she does. Does she not accept the advice that her ministers give her? Of course she does, because that is one of the conventions of our Constitution.

Senator Perrault: What about the loyal Opposition?

Senator Roblin: If the Queen were to be obliged, or if it were even thought proper, to consult with the Opposition on matters for which she received a recommendation from the government, it strikes me that it would be a complete reversal of all that we have learned in the development of a limited monarchy and responsible parliamentary government in this nation. Dismiss that argument from your thoughts, because it was not worth the breath expended on it.

I want to go a little further on this and come to the root of this matter, which, I suggest, has not been touched on today in the way that I think it should be, and that is: What is the reason for the conflict between these Houses; and is it a conflict of sufficient importance and fundamental consideration that the Prime Minister should be justified in making use of section 26 of the British North America Act? My presentation to you is that it most certainly is, and I want to give reasons why that is the case. Perhaps I can preface what I have to say by giving you the opinion of some others, because we have been favoured with that this afternoon and it would perhaps be allowable for me to do the same thing.

I would quote from an article in my local newspaper in Winnipeg, which states:

> What the Liberals in the Senate propose to do with the goods and services tax has nothing to do with sober second thought. It is simply the abusive use of illegitimate power.

Senator Perrault: Who wrote that?

Senator Roblin: The editor of the Winnipeg Free Press who is a pretty bright fellow. I might say that he is a card-carrying Liberal, unless he has changed his political allegiance and perhaps he has. In any case, this editorial goes on to say:

> . . . Senators . . . are determined simply to impose their will on the government and on the House of Commons to which that government is responsible. That is a dangerous and irresponsible abuse of power which should concern all Canadians, whatever they think of the GST.

I will come back to that because there is an important thought there. Some of us in this House are carried away with the GST. We think it is a very unpopular measure. We think that those senators who wish to kill it stand in the limelight of public opinion and approval and that this is something which, on those grounds, can be justified.

However, I say to you that matters of this sort, which have come to form a constitutional crisis in this country, cannot be considered in that light because it sets a precedent. It sets a precedent that will arise to haunt any of you who are liable to sit here for the next five or ten years. That certainly does not include me. I am perfectly certain, however, that it will set a constitutional precedent which we will all live to regret, because, if there should be a change of government in the next election and a Conservative majority here, what will we expect to happen? I do not know, but a precedent is being established that we will live to regret.

What is that precedent? The precedent here is not a matter of exercise of powers, whatever they may be—and I hope they will certainly change. The issue is the conflict between the rights that this house is claiming for itself to defeat this legislation and the basic parliamentary conventions on which our whole system is grounded.

Let me explain exactly what I mean. The power of the purse is point number one. Any of us who have had any knowledge of the development of the Constitution in England, upon which our Constitution in the last resort rests, understands very well what I mean by "the power of the purse" and how the Commons extracted from the monarch and, later on, from the House of Lords, as was demonstrated in 1911, that they and they alone had the power of the purse. The power of the purse in the hands of the elected representatives is fundamental to Canadian parliamentary democracy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: Are we, in this House, attempting to usurp that power? You bet we are. We have these Bills before us, Bill C-21 and Bill C-28, which have been languishing—I almost said "in durance vile"—in the legislative process. They take their origin in the budget of 1989 and are essential to the policy of the government to reduce expenditures, which all my friends opposite usually think is a good idea. They have been thwarted, have been held up, have been denied for whatever reason. They are not part of the law of the country. Now, with the debate we are having on the GST, the same sermon could be preached in spades, because it is the same issue: Who has control of the purse, who has control of the budget of this country? Is it the Senate of Canada or is it the House of Commons? Whatever else we may claim are the powers of this house or the virtues of this house, I say that to overrule the House of Commons in matters of this kind is, in my opinion, wrong and should not be attempted.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: There are some who say, "Well, they have not actually done it yet. The GST is still alive, there is no confrontation, there is no crisis." Whom do you believe: Senators on the other side stating as publicly as they knew how that they were going to do everything in their power to kill this bill, and then say there is no crisis or constitutional confrontation? What a ridiculous argument that is that is trotted out seriously for our consideration here. The question of the power of the purse is one which I think the House of Commons must struggle to retain.

● (1640)

Regardless of what we think of this tax, regardless of what we think of their budgetary policies, once we have placed our objections on the record and had them face up to that, if they do not take our advice, then this House should not stand in the way of what the democratically elected House of Commons has done. If we do something wrong, no one can get rid of us—not until we die or reach the age of 75. If they do something wrong, God help them next election time. That is the difference between these two houses, and that is why we should not do this.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: As I say, the power of the purse is a very important issue in this whole debate. Although I never expected to be making a speech like this on a question of privilege, it seems to me that these things are really all bound up in the matters we have before us.

There is another issue at stake here, and if I can lay my hands on it, I will gladly tell you all about it.

Senator Bonnell: Take your time. We have all day.

Senator Roblin: You will be tolerant with me, I know. I am not really concerned about it. I cannot lay my hands on it, and it does not come readily to my mind, having embarked on one train of thought. However, this question of the power of the purse is, I think, fundamental.

The other constitutional convention which hinges on it, comes from it, bears on it, and is inseparably linked with it, is the question of responsibility. The question of responsibility is also at issue because, by defeating these finance bills, we are trying to do things in the Senate which the House of Commons could not do without bringing into question the responsibility of the government. If the people in the other House tried to amend those finance bills the way in which we have done; if the people in the other House were not going to support the GST, as we threaten we will not do, then there would be a consequence, and that consequence would be that the government would fall. If they did in that other chamber what we are trying to do here, the government would fall, because it would no longer have control of the public finances. That is exactly the position we are attempting to take here. We are saying that we are going to do things which they could not do in the House of Commons without bringing down the government. The government is, in that sense, responsible to us, because we are taking the same issues on which responsibility hinges in the other House and attempting to develop them here in the way that we have.

It seems to me, when we are talking about this whole situation, that to pretend that there is not a crisis is a mistake. There is a crisis. To pretend that it is not serious is a mistake. It is very serious. To pretend that the institutions of parliamentary government are not under question in these discussions is a mistake, because they are under question.

We have to ask ourselves whether we, in this chamber, are going to take upon ourselves—unrepresentative and irresponsible, in the sense that I have mentioned, as we are—to defeat these measures. We should be quite clear about this. This point of privilege is aimed directly at the activities of this House, because if these members could not vote, then, obviously, the government's policies would not pass and the consequence I have outlined to you would indeed be with us and have to be faced. So I come back to the central point, that there is, in fact, a clear and present reason why the Prime Minister should exercise this power to have these persons appointed to this house.

We come now to the question of whether section 26, or some other section with respect to the conditions of membership, should apply. I agree with Senator Everett that they are two entirely different issues. There is one set of rules which obviously apply to those of us who are appointed here in the normal course of events, but to attempt by implication to say that they also cover the eight extraordinary appointments to this House which do not represent provinces at all but which represent regions, is, I think, stretching it too far. I do not think the connection can be fairly made.

It seems to me that those who have raised that cloud, that miasma of legal objection—oh, there it comes to mind. I intended to be a lawyer when I was younger, but I stumbled across that quotation from William Shakespeare: "The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers."

I am not as blood thirsty as that, but I do not think that the legal arguments that are being put forward today go to the heart of the matter. The heart of the matter is that this is a constitutional issue; the heart of the matter is the Canadian Constitution; the heart of the matter is the relationship between two houses in a responsible parliamentary system, and whether or not an elected body should attempt to overrule an elected body on matters which are clearly matters of confidence in the government.

It seems to me that those eight people who joined us have the right to be here. They have taken the oath. They were properly appointed. The section under which they were appointed, section 26, is not a shell; it is far from being a shell. It is powerful and necessary, and I am glad it is there. I think it has been properly used. The question of a privilege is not well founded. It ought not to be given any priority.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin indicated earlier that he would answer a question or two.

He said that because section 26 was not repealed in 1981-1982 it was intended to remain operative. Would the senator make the same argument with regard to section 55, which still stands in the act, and refers to the Governor General withholding the Queen's assent and reserving bills for signification at the Queen's pleasure? Is that, too, a section of the act which could properly br used in 1990?

Senator Roblin: I am not going to answer that question. I would have to look at the section to see what it says. I am talking about section 26. There may be others of the same character: However, my point relates to section 26.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for that answer.

He has explained why the provision with regard to what is called "the Senate floor," which has come up with regard to New Brunswick, should not be regarded as evidence that section 26 has become obsolete. Would he explain why it is proper to summon senators under section 26, notwithstanding that even if the Prime Minister had wished to have Newfoundland and Labrador represented by an additional senator, or the Territories, he could not have had an additional senator from that province or from the Territories?

Is that not additional evidence that section 26 is a relic from another age and is, indeed, only an empty shell?

Senator Roblin: That is my honourable friend's view. He made that point quite clear. That is not my view.

Senator Stewart: I am asking the honourable senator to help us, but he refuses.

Senator Roblin: I would be pleased to help amend the Constitution in more ways than the one before us, if I had an opportunity.

Hon. Gerald A. Beaudoin: Honourable Senators, I want to respond to the question raised by Senator Stewart. When section 51 was enshrined in the British North America Act in 1915, and when section 26 was amended that same year, it was by the same statute in Great Britain. So it is impossible that the British law officers were not aware of this. There is clear evidence in law that section 26 is still valid and is not obsolete.

The fact is that they amended that section at the moment they enshrined section 51A in the Constitution. So obviously there is no such thing as an obsolete section 26.

The power that is enshrined in section 26 is still valid. I am sure the law officers of the Crown have ruled that way.

If I may continue on this question of privilege. Honourable senators, we forget that since the Statute of Westminster of 1931, since the independence of Canada, and at least since 1982, the Queen referred to in section 26 is not the Queen in Right of the United Kingdom; it is obvious that it is the Queen in Right of Canada, and if there is a convention here, it is the convention that the Queen shall follow the advice of the Canadian Prime Minister, not the law officers of the Crown in Great Britain.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Beaudoin: I am surprised that people think it is the Queen in Right of the United Kingdom. Obviously it is not. If the honourable senator wants some advice from the Supreme Court of Canada on this matter, all he needs to do is to look at the Munro case of 1966, when the Supreme Court construed section 16 of the BNA Act and referred to the Queen, they referred to the Queen in Right of Canada. Obviously the same principle applies to section 26, and it is the Queen in Right of Canada.

I have never understood how one could come to the conclusion that it has to be the Queen of the United Kingdom. Is it because she is more impartial? What kind of theory is that? It is the same person acting in a different capacity.

So I believe that section 26 is not obsolete. This is not the first time we are concerned with a case like this. In the Disallowance case of 1938 the Supreme Court of Canada said that the power of disallowance was still valid even though it had not been used for a long period of time. It is true that section 26 has not been used for over a century, but that does not mean it is dead. The power is still there.

Senator MacEachen: Only the powers of the Senate are dead according to Senator Beaudoin. Everything is alive but the powers of the Senate, as Senator Beaudoin has frequently argued.

Senator Beaudoin: That is quite another matter.

Senator Frith: Except that in your text book professor Beaudoin and Senator Beaudoin are not the same person.

Senator Beaudoin: We have to follow precedents. Senator Frith knows very well that the last authority in legal matters is the Supreme Court of Canada, and in the Disallowance case the Supreme Court of Canada said a section is not obsolete because it has not been used for a long period of time. That applies to section 26.

The advisor of the Crown is the Prime Minister of Canada. Section 26 refers to the Queen in Right of Canada. I cannot understand for one moment how one could raise the unconstitutionality of a section of our own Constitution. Even a first-year student in law knows that. That is very surprising to me.

Section 26 is in the Constitution. Some people have said: "Oh yes, but there is a convention that says it has not been used, so it is obsolete". If there is a convention in this case, it is that the Crown should follow the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada; if there is a convention in this case, it is that the last word should be left to the House of Commons; if there is a convention in this case, it is that the fiscal program of an elected government should remain with the House of Commons and not with an unelected Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Beaudoin: Sometimes people refer to 1873. There was no collision between the two houses at the time of Prime Minister Mackenzie. As a matter of fact, the law officers of the Crown in Great Britain said no to the Governor General of Canada. They were right because there was no collision; no deadlock. In this case we have a report that says in black and white that this house should kill the bill; if this case is not a collision, what is a collision? It is obvious that there is a collision. The difference between the Mackenzie precedent and the actual precedent is that at the time of Mackenzie, it was the Queen in right of the United Kingdom; now it is the Queen in right of Canada. The procedure is clear cut. It is obvious that it is legal.

Senator Molgat raised the point of the sub judice doctrine. If we stop to speak each time there is a complaint before a court in Canada, we will never get anything done. No sub judice doctrine is applicable here. Of course, if the government had chosen to refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, then I would understand that we would invoke the sub judice doctrine. That is not so in this case because this matter is too clear cut. There is no case referred to the Supreme Court.

Section 26 is not obsolete. There is no convention that constitutes an obstacle—on the contrary. All conventions are in favour of the Prime Minister. Some people say that what the Senate is doing is a paradox, but it is not a paradox. There was a crisis in the United Kingdom in 1910, and the Prime Minister threatened to appoint more lords.

Senator Stewart: After an election!

Senator Beaudoin: Of course, but he threatened to appoint more lords. Finally the Crown agreed, but it was not necessary in the end. It is simpler in this case because we have a section in the Constitution that provides for the very case we are talking about. So I fail to see a prima facie case of privilege in this matter. If we are concerned with a privilege today, it is the privilege of the eight appointed senators to be here and to vote.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Beaudoin: That is the privilege that is at stake in this case. If there is a convention in this case, it is that of responsible government. The basis of our government is that Cabinet is responsible to the House of Commons; Cabinet is not responsible to the Senate and shall not be governed by the surveys.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, if he has no objection, I would like to put a question to Senator Beaudoin.

Senator Beaudoin: Please proceed, Senator Molgat.

[English]

Senator Molgat: If I understand you correctly, you cited a number of conventions. With respect to one of them you said if there is a convention it is that the House of Commons has the final say on financial matters. Is that a correct interpretation?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Beaudoin: Yes.

Senator Molgat: Where does that convention come from?

Senator Beaudoin: Under the union of two Canadas—1840-1867—Baldwin and Lafontaine in 1848 were responsible for the principle of responsible government. The 33 Fathers of Confederation considered this as a convention of the Constitution. You may say that, strictly speaking, we may defeat the bill here, and I do not deny that. But, if we do so, especially with respect to a fiscal program of government, we are violating a convention that has been respected since 1848 and 1867. I draw a distinction between a convention of the Constitution and the legal text of the Constitution.

You know very well that in the Patriation case of 1981 the Supreme Court said that the conventions of the Constitution are part of the Constitution of Canada. If we violate them, there is no remedy in law, only in the political arena. Personally, I will fight for that convention because that is the basis of our parliamentary system.

Senator Molgat: But you agree, Senator Beaudoin, that there is a marked difference between a constitutional convention and one on which there has never been a test insofar as money matters between the Senate and the House of Commons are concerned. There is no established convention.

Senator Beaudoin: No. The Constitution of Canada, according to the Supreme Court in the Patriation case, is composed of three elements: the legal text—the British North America Act and the 23 amendments, the common law principle and decisions of courts such as the Supreme Court, and the conventions of the Constitution. There are three elements. We have to distinguish between what is purely legal and what is conventional. I am not saying that on my own; the Supreme Court of Canada has said it, and that court is right.

Senator Roblin spoke about this a moment ago. You say that we have the right to say no to a bill coming from the House of Commons. Legally speaking we may do that, but if we systematically go against three major bills of the government, which was re-elected in 1988, concerning its fiscal policy, we are violating a convention of the Constitution that has been firmly established in the history of Canada. That is all I say; no more, no less.

Senator Molgat: It has never been tested.

Senator Beaudoin: What do you mean it has never been tested? It has been tested. When the government is defeated on a budget in the House of Commons, it may do two things: resign or call an election. If the government is defeated in the Senate, there is no remedy because the theory of responsible government does not apply here, but it is a violation of the Constitution.

Senator Molgat: Senator Beaudoin, is it not within the power of the government to withdraw the bill? There is no question of defeating the government. The government can withdraw the bill. There is a remedy.

Some Hon. Senators: No! No!

Senator Simard: And Bill C-21 and C-28 I suppose.

Senator Beaudoin: Why should the government do that?

Senator Stewart: Senator Beaudoin, I wonder if you would answer a short question. As I understand your argument, you say that the conventional constitution is that the government is to have its way with regard to what you call money bills. And you argue, I think, that section 26 is in the Constitution to enable the government to have its way on money bills.

Senator Beaudoin: No, I never said that.

Senator Stewart: Oh, I see. How do you connect those two propositions, then? I thought you were talking about section 26, not something else.

Senator Beaudoin: No, no. Section 26 was enshrined in the Constitution just for the purpose of a deadlock or a collision between the two houses after a long term of office of one particular party. That is the reason for it. And I cannot see in the history of Canada a better case than this one in which to use section 26. I cannot imagine for one moment how the court of last resort in this country, if it is seized of this problem, will rule otherwise.

It is true that we may interpret the Constitution, but when the language of the law is clear and lucid, I think we have to follow what is stated there. There it is stated that the Queen—and it is the Queen in right of Canada and according to a convention—advised by the Prime Minister may appoint eight new senators, two per region. That is exactly what she is doing.

Over the weekend, some people said, "Yes, but did you think about section 51A?" Of course section 51A is involved. But if there is, by hypothesis, a problem, it is not in the Senate. The appointments of the senators are obviously valid.

Senator Stewart: Senator Beaudoin, you are repeating, perhaps with greater clarity, what you have already said twice. What I want to know is this: What was the point of talking about a convention that the government has to have its way with regard to money bills? How does that tie in with what you are now repeating?

Senator Beaudoin: Of course, if the government wishes to implement section 26, according to history it has to show some kind of deadlock. We have before us a clear deadlock. It is not an apprehended deadlock, it is right there. Senators opposite want to vote in favour of killing the bill. What else do they want? They want to stall three bills, and those three bills form part of the fiscal policy of the government.

There is nothing more important or sacred in the British parliamentary system than a decision of the House of Commons in the field of taxation. Consider the principle of taxation without representation. The representation of the people is in the House of Commons. It is clear cut. I regret that I cannot add anything.

Senator Grafstein: Would the learned senator respond on whether or not it is within the conventional power of this place to deal with amendments to tax legislation?

Senator Beaudoin: Well, we have had a debate on this point. I made a speech during that debate. Again, I cannot add to what I have already said.

The only thing is this: If the house of the elected people persists in going on with its fiscal legislation, I think the last word should be left to the House of Commons.

That does not mean that an amendment may not take place at some time, but the last word in a deadlock, according to the Constitution, is certainly that of the other house.

Senator Grafstein: But the learned senator agrees, based on his reading of the Constitution and the conventions surrounding the Constitution, that this house may amend tax legislation and money bills. He is saying that if there is an ultimate contest, that is a different question, but in the first instance clearly this house might amend tax legislation or money bills.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this has been an interesting and scintillating afternoon in the Senate. There has been much intellectual content in the speeches we have heard made by Senator Beaudoin and other honourable senators. Surely this dialogue reinforces the case for a referral of this matter to the courts. In my view, that is absolutely essential.

In microcosm, in effect, we have heard the kinds of debate and presentations which might be heard in the courts of the land in respect of this controversial matter, with strong opinions being held on both sides of the question. This simply reinforces the view that the government's actions should be referred to the courts so that we know that we are proceeding on solid legal grounds.

With respect to my status here, honourable senators, I am a regular senator.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Perrault: I am not a divisional senator. I am be ashamed to say I am not a member of that exotic group? What should we call them? Are they to be known as the "M Squad"? Should we call them "The Mulroney Specials", "The Mulroney Marauders", or just plain "The Tory Territorials?

Senator Simard: What are you quoting from now, senator?

Senator Perrault: Whatever their status is, we should know whether they are entitled to sit in this chamber as quickly as possible. It is unfair to them and it is unfair to the house that their status be a subject of conjecture, shall we say.

Honourable senators, I am here as a representative of the province of British Columbia. It is the third largest province in Canada, and I will tell you frankly that British Columbians of all political parties, including most Conservatives, are most unhappy with the way the government has been proceeding, not only with respect to Senate appointments but with respect to the GST.

I see Senator Carney shaking her head angrily at my remarks. I will tell her that the Conservative Party in British Columbia has 8 per cent public support at the present time, and that is plummeting. The only person in society who is more lonely is the Maytag repairman.

Senator Muir: That's an old one!

Senator Perrault: It's an old one, but a good one, senator. The support for this measure in your province is just about as bad.

Senator Muir: No!

Senator Perrault: Many people have talked and written about the Senate GST report, including some editorialists, who have never been burdened with reading it. It is always easier for one to write an editorial if one has not read the report under assault. That is the case, I fear, with some editorial writers today. I spoke with two or three editorialists over the weekend and not one of them had read the Senate report, but they all felt very indignant about its conclusions. I said to them, "You must have extrasensory perception."

If there were to be a bill sent to us from the House of Commons which represented a gross violation of human rights, would honourable senators feel a responsibility to use their ultimate power of veto to stop that violation? Of course they would. They would not hesitate.

All we are talking about here is the degree of power which should be exercised by the Senate, based on the measures which come to us from the other place. That is what we are talking about. We are asking ourselves whether the GST situation is serious enough to warrant an almost unprecedented action on the part of the Senate.

Well, honourable senators, there are some interesting things being said about the alleged misuse of power in the Senate. The Justice Minister, the Honourable Kim Campbell, has a continuing credibility problem in my province. She was a great supporter of William Vander Zalm and the Social Credit Party, and then she resigned her seat to become an instant, overnight Conservative.

Senator Simard: Are we still on the question of privilege?

Senator Perrault: Yes, we are still talking about it—very much so. I know the senator has a difficult time tracking what is going on here, but I would ask him to try.

● (1720)

The other day the Minister of Justice for this beleaguered government stated, "We just had to act against the Liberals in the Senate". Why? We are holding up all sorts of bills. Until this summer's parliamentary recess, 286 government bills had been passed by the Senate since the election of a Conservative government in 1984. Of these, 267 were passed without amendment in our Liberal majority Senate, which is accused of being a force to block the government's will. Another 19 were passed with amendments, including those where the House of Commons accepted some or all of the Senate amendments. Only two bills are being delayed and are awaiting consideration by a Commons-Senate conference to resolve differences.

I suggest, honourable senators, that we would have resolved these problems long ago if we did not have that great Alberta charmer, Harvie Andre, in the negotiations. This is the same Mr. Andre who has been attacking the Senate for most of his political career, and now he even refuses to sit down in a conference to work out difficulties with respect to the "claw-back" proposals and unemployment insurance changes.

The question is, should a Minister of Justice lie? The Minister of Justice, serving in the other place, has not been telling the truth. I suppose the second question to be asked is whether this a serious enough bill to reject or slow down, perhaps to be sent back to the government for redrafting and reworking?

I suggest to honourable friends in the Tory ranks that they do not go into northern Canada in the next few weeks. Their lives might be in danger. Canadians living in the north are enraged at what obviously is a draconian tax burden which they are going to be asked to carry. My friend, the Honourable Paul Lucier, an effective representative of the north, knows what we are talking about.

Those members of the committee who studied the GST and held hearings in the north—

Senator Simard: They never had a chance to read the report.

Senator Perrault: You were talking so much you never allowed any input, senator. You have not won many raves for your performance.

The GST credits would fail completely to take into account the high cost of living in Canada's remote regions. The GST would apply on the final price of goods and services inclusive of transporation costs, which are a significant component in the price of goods and services offered in the north. The fact is that central Canadians would pay substantially less tax on average than those living in the north, in western Canada, and in the Atlantic provinces. Why should westerners and northerners pay 7 per cent on the transportation input into getting goods to their homes? When honourable senators opposite pledge to support this measure and say to the Prime Minister, "Ready. Aye, ready", many of them are acting directly against the best interests of their own regions, and some of us are not prepared to do that.

The other day I heard from a veterans organization which stated that the federal government will tax the Remembrance Day wreaths and the poppies that are put on cenotaphs. I did not believe it and I checked it out. It is true. Caviar is going to be exempt, but memorial wreaths for downtown cenotaphs will be taxed. Can senators support that? The Royal Canadian Legion deserves the support of every one of us to prevent this type of stupidity. Surely senators opposite are not going to sit there and be obedient blue ciphers and vote for this. There are all sorts of anomolies large and small, yet members opposite say they are not serious enough to defeat or reject the GST.

When the Liberal members of the committee were first presented with this challenge of holding hearings on the GST, it was the majority view that probably the best course of action would be to bring in a number of amendments to correct any deficiencies. There are so many deficiencies. I hope senators opposite have studied the report thoroughly and realize the opposition across the country, not only from labour but also from many areas of management. The GST has been described by John Bulloch of the independent business organization as "without any question, the worst retail sales tax in the entire world."

What model are we following? We are following the model of the Ivory Coast which introduced the tax for the first time in 1960. That great haven of tax reform, the Ivory Coast, started the tax at 12 per cent and it loves that revenue cash cow so much that now the tax has been increased to 25 per cent.

Senators opposite wonder why we are concerned and why we are opposing it. Yet another reason is that even if the eight senators are seated legally and add their obedient votes to your majority, we cannot obtain any assurance from the government that some money will be used to reduce the debt and the deficit.

In committee we heard testimony from coast to coast—Please read the report—alleging that the present tax system is grossly under-utilized because too many people have escape routes. I suggest senators opposite check the list of people who earn more than $250,000 or even $500,000 a year who do not pay any tax.

Senator Barootes: Every loophole created by the Liberal government.

Senator Perrault: You have not made a constructive contribution in years. Do you think it was an easy decision to enter serious objections and to oppose a tax measure of this nature which would change the face of Canada?

We are heading into a recession. The other day the Minister of Finance stated that his calculations were wrong and that the situation was worse than he thought. There was $1 billion worth of miscalculation. Is this the time, in the interests of this nation—and these are not partisan considerations—for us to march in and add a 7 per cent goods and services tax to the woes of the people of Canada?

Senator Barootes: It is not adding 7 per cent. Learn a little mathematics.

Senator Perrault: The goods and services tax federally will be 7 per cent and the provincial taxes will be at least equal to that amount. Is this the time to do it?

When New Zealand introduced a similar tax, it had a 6 per cent rate of inflation the first year and a disastrous recession.

Hon. Pat Carney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether Senator Perrault is now involved in debate on the bill itself or whether he is speaking to the question of privilege. He seems to be talking a great deal about the bill. Many of us look forward to an opportunity to debate the bill, but I understood, Your Honour, that this was a matter of privilege.

Senator Perrault: You will have an opportunity to debate this at length. However, some of us are concerned about the admission of eight trained seals into this chamber determined to vote for a tax measure which could be disastrously bad for all of us. That is the source of our concern.

In my province of British Columbia there has been unbelievable anger at government tactics to pass the GST. British Columbians are as one in opposing this tax—Liberals, Reform Party, Social Credit, NDP, and most Tories—as we can see by the statistics.

At one time Conservatives described themselves—and they did so quite frequently, ad nauseam, as far as Liberals were concerned—as the heirs of the British parliamentary tradition. They said that Liberals did not respect that tradition, but that they did. They opposed closure and all the devices that would limit free speech. Do senators know how many times closure was used in the House of Commons to ram the GST through that chamber? Are you not affronted by it? Do you have any pangs of conscience about it? It was so bad in the other chamber that Chairman Don Blenkarn apologized a few weeks ago and said that his conscience bothered him, that he wanted to express his regrets for his undemocratic methods.

Senator Buckwold: I did not know that he had a conscience.

Senator Perrault: Is that the new tradition of conservatism? At one time they upheld the rights of the Opposition, but not now. I am proud to be associated with a party which has always believed in the rights of the Opposition. Senator Roblin, who has just spoken, was appointed to the Senate by Pierre Elliott Trudeau—

Senator Murray: On the recommendation of the Tory leader.

Senator Perrault: In contrast, hordes of Tories are brought in for every government position that is open in Canada. I am proud of the fact that I belong to a party that had a generosity of spirit to bring in some Conservative appointees to the Senate, regardless of their limitations.

• (1730)

Even as late as 1988 the Conservative Party used to assail our ears with speeches of how they just loved the provinces and wanted to get along with the provinces, whereas they alleged that the Liberals did not get along with the provinces. But this was to be a new Canada. This was reconciliation. We were all to be friends together. But as soon as my province, supported by others, suggested that it would challenge the appointment of these eight supernumerary, additional senators to the chamber, immediately the government made representations to London to circumvent the provinces and get them out of the way. That is what happened.

Senator Barootes: You are flattering yourself!

Senator Perrault: That is what happened.

Senator Hastings: We know what you did!

Senator Perrault: We know exactly what you did.

Senator Barootes: Check your notes!

Senator Perrault: To creep over to London to ask their permission to appoint eight additional senators is an affront to nationhood.

Senator Austin: Absolutely!

Senator Perrault: It is an affront to Canada in 1990, and you know it.

Senator Barootes: It surely was an affront to the Liberal Party in the Senate!

Senator Perrault: Every strategem has been employed to circumvent the angry provinces. Every premier in Canada, with the possible exception of one, is opposed to this. Your provinces—the people—are all opposed to the GST. Yet your leader is asking you to stand up and vote for it. Does it cause any problem for you when you are told that you will have to pay more for stoves and refrigerators because of the tax on transportation inputs—

Senator Barootes: Wait until the tax comes up!

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: May I ask you a question?

Senator Perrault: —than they are in Toronto?

I wish to say something about the imbalance in the Senate. At this time we need a Triple "E" Senate. Senator Waters, you are right. I am with you on it.

An Hon. Senator: Resign, then!

Senator Perrault: It is time that we did something basic in Senate reform.

The Prime Minister has strutted around this country saying how he would fundamentally reform government in this country. He was to have a reformed Senate.

Senator Barootes: Who did that?

Senator Perrault: What did he do? He made it the most loaded, one-sided, pork-barrelled Senate in the history of Canada! The province of British Columbia, with six members, could not get even one additional senator appointed among the eight. Perhaps there were not enough Tories to choose from! That must be a problem. They could not find enough Conservatives to appoint. There were two extra senators appointed in Ontario and Quebec.

I wish to say this to my friends in Quebec:

[Translation]

I find it distressing that another instance of discrimination against the people of Western Canada does not seem to upset our Conservative colleagues from Quebec, who fought for years for the rights of their own province.

[English]

Where is the justice for western Canada now that you have your two extra appointees? There has not been a word from you about this whole outrageous method of appointing senators. Perhaps the time has come for reform. Perhaps we should have a unanimous federal-provincial resolution to change it. This present system is not good enough.

Do you wonder why there is western alienation? It is because of actions of this kind by governments of this type. It is wrong, and you know that it is wrong.

I will now put on the record some of our concerns. If respect for Parliament and politicians is rampant—and it is in this country—there is no wonder. A fearful price will be paid for the outrages that have occurred in this chamber in the past few days.

Since August 24, 24 people have been dragged into this chamber to make up the majority that you now have.

Senator Hastings: One a day!

Senator Perrault: Do not bother talking about the proposed GST on principle or in detail; do not try to meet the concerns of the regions of Canada who feel that they would be victims of discrimination. Just bring in that compliant majority and get the vote through.

Committee members could not obtain any assurance from the government's representatives or any of its politicians at the hearings that they would even look at the tax problem posed by transportation costs. No wonder people in this country are angry—particularly in the west, the north and in the Atlantic provinces. This big, smug, compliant, self-satisfied group that you have hauled in here is an affront to all of us. Despite all of the faults in the GST, they believe that no action should be taken by the Sente. I would say to Senator Forrestal, who is attempting to interrupt, that he should try to come up with some Atlantic facts. I do not know how he would justify silence to the people he represents.

An Hon. Senator: Don't worry!

Senator Perrault: No, because you are not running for office.

An Hon. Senator: Nor are you!

Senator Perrault: On Friday I offered to resign and to take on a critical person who had called in to an open line show. But they hung up; they would not take me on.

Senator Fairbairn: That is correct!

Senator Perrault: I have a witness to it.

If certain senators are here illegally, any action taken by Parliament would be rendered invalid. It has been said more eloquently by others in this debate today, but for the sake of Canada let us proceed fairly and decently. Let the courts tell us about the eight additional senators; and let us know about the Governor General's role. Did he consult Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition before he rendered his decision and conveyed his message to Her Majesty? The Loyal Opposition has a special place in this country—the Conservatives know this from long experience.

I wish to speak to some documents and put them on the record of the Senate. I hope this will not take too long.

Senator Bonnell: Take your time!

Senator MacDonald: Senator Perrault, could I encourage you to speak until six o'clock? The quality of your remarks compared to those of Senator Beaudoin does more for this side than any strategy we could think of!

Senator Perrault: Is that the extent of your contribution to the debate? If so, you have reached new intellectual heights for your performance in this chamber. Congratulations!

The first document I am reading from is dated September 21, 1990. It is headlined: "B.C. Eyes Legal Challenge to Senate Squeeze." How is that for a headline?

Senator Doody: Excellent!

Senator Perrault: I want to bring you through this chronology and do it slowly.

You said the other day that some of you were slow readers. I wish to help you with your problem. This article states:

> The B.C. government is looking at legal action to challenge any move by the federal government to force through the Goods and Services Tax by adding more senators.

Please not that paragraph. It represents, in a forthright fashion, the position of the province of British Columbia. It goes on to state:

> Finance Minister Mel Couvelier and Attorney General Russ Fraser responded today to reports that federal cabinet ministers are considering using Section 26 of the Constitution Act to add additional senators in an effort to force through the GST.

That stirred some action down here, didn't it? You held a special meeting on this. You decided, "We have to act before B.C.'s case can be heard!"

Senator Barootes: We are not worried about B.C.!

Senator Perrault: "Forget about all that old friendship stuff with the provinces. This is hard ball. Let us roll the dice once more." That was your government's attitude.

Senator Hastings: We care about B.C.!

Senator Perrault: The news release goes on to state:

> Fraser said, "We believe use of Section 26 in this way is not constitutionally permissible. We are examining a legal challenge to any such manipulation of the Senate."

Those are tough words, are they not, from a friendly province? They say that you are "manipulating the Senate." They did not say that the Liberals were manipulating the Senate, but they seem to be upset about some of the things you have done.

The press release goes on to state:

> Couvelier said that the GST is "an open-ended tax grab.

That is what Ronald Reagan said in 1985, when he rejected it for the United States. He said that "It is nothing but a discredited revenue grab used by governments in trouble, so it will not be introduced in the United States." Do you remember that quotation? Mr. Couvelier went on to say that:

> —the GST is "an open-ended tax grab. It is an inflationary tax that will creep higher in years ahead."

Senator Barootes: Who is that rocket scientist?

Senator Perrault: Do you want to hear Willy von Braun or someone? He went on to say:

> "It will be extremely expensive to administer, and will hurt business."

That is the view from our province. We think that business will suffer seriously. Oh, yes, the free trade deal was the last dream idea that you had. We have already lost 160,000 industrial jobs in Canada as a result of that.

Senator Barootes: It has nothing to do with that!

Senator Perrault: I hope that we will have a separate debate here in a few days and you can hear what the economists are saying about the results of free trade.

The news release further states:

> The two ministers said that any federal government move to add additional senators above the current level of 104 would be an affront to residents of British Columbia, who have made it clear that they want an elected Senate.

To that I say, "Amen." It is the same in Alberta and in the other provinces of Canada. Anyone who has been to Australia knows that equal representation, or near equal representation, works. We need it.

Senator Barootes: You will have to get a new job, Senator Perrault.

● (1740)

Senator Perrault: I am quoting again Mr. Couvellier who stated:

> It is regrettable that Prime Minister Mulroney would choose not only to ignore the B.C. Senatorial Selection Act but also to impose the cost of additional senators upon all Canadians just so he can push through the GST.

All the other provinces have taken the same position. In the face of the need for cooperative federalism, is it in the interests of this nation to proceed in this fashion?

Mr. Fraser said that B.C. is currently having detailed discussions with Alberta in an effort to join it in a court action expected to be forthcoming shortly from that province. The Alberta court action is expected to be based on the premise that the GST violates the Constitution.

As we move along in this chronology, we see a news release put out by the Attorney General for the Province of British Columbia on September 25. This statement really caused panic in government offices in Ottawa. It was decided at that moment that some serious overtures must be made to the Governor General and that he must get on with the task of getting the eight appointed before the B.C. appeal could be heard. The title of this release is: "B.C. Challenges Ability to Create Extra Senate Seats". The dateline is Victoria. It states:

> An Order in Council was signed today which will allow the B.C. Government to go to court in order to challenge the Federal Government's ability to create extra Senate seats under a never-used provision of the Constitution Act, 1867, Attorney General Russell G. Fraser announced today.

I now quote Mr. Fraser who stated:

> Our position is that the federal government can't unilaterally add four or eight Senate seats just to resolve existing differences between the Senate and the House of Commons.

Of course, that is the position which many Canadians have taken. We certainly hold that view on this side of the House. The news release continues:

> When the provision was created it included a two-step process to allow for a decision which would be independent of the recommendations of the Government of the day.
> Federal ministers have been recommending that the provision for adding extra seats be used to force legislation, including the Goods and Services Tax, through the Senate.
> "British Columbians will not accept the addition of extra Senate seats to be filled by patronage appointments just to force unpopular legislation through, " added Fraser. "The required element of independence is no longer present and we believe the mechanism simply can't be used. We will ask the Court of Appeal to decide if this 123-year-old section is still operative."
> The Government has passed an Order in Council to bring certain questions on this issue before the Court of Appeal under the Constitutional Question Act. In addition to the strictly legal questions, the Court will be asked to consider whether a constitutional convention exists to govern the way this provision is used.

The Attorney General knows his history. He states that a previous attempt in 1873-74 to add extra seats to the Senate was rejected by Britain. Is there anything incorrect in this news release so far, honourable senators? I think it is rather well done. It continues:

> At that time the British Government stated that the provision was only to be used where the differences between the Senate and the House of Commons were so serious and permanent that the government could not carry on without the extra seats.

Something I cannot believe is that senators opposite seriously believe that they have credibility when they have not even debated one paragraph of the Senate report which we spent months preparing.

Senator Barootes: Who spent months preparing it, Senator Buckwold or you?

Senator Perrault: The government went to the Queen. I think they misused Her Majesty very terribly. I think the monarchy has been terribly misused on this occasion.

Did the government tell the Governor General that it was a deadlock, that the Liberals would not allow debate? We were not in the process of trying to debate anything. We have not discussed one aspect of the GST. Yet apparently the government went via the Governor General to Buckingham Palace to say, "There is a deadlock". That is basically dishonest. It is the type of dishonesty which should never be practised by governments.

Mr. Fraser went on to say:

> "We have a strong precedent to rely on, and we do not feel that the present differences are serious enough to meet this strict test . . . If the Court accepts our position we expect the Federal Government to respect that decision, and not pack the Senate.

That was British Columbia's position, which was communicated to senators. What kind of response was made by your government to the Province of British Columbia? Is the government willing to table the appropriate documents? How did the government answer that B.C. appeal? For heaven's sake, British Columbia is the third largest province in Canada. Was our only problem that we are located on the west coast of Canada, on the Pacific Ocean? Were we not central enough to command some attention?

I have a document in my hand from the Province of British Columbia. It is an order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, Order in Council No. 1451, approved and ordered September 25, 1990. It is signed by Mr. Lam, our outstanding Lieutenant Governor, and states:

> On the recommendation of the undersigned, the Lieutenant Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Executive Council, orders that the questions set out in the attached Schedule be referred to the Court of Appeal for hearing and consideration pursuant to the Constitutional Question Act.

It is signed by the Attorney General. In my other hand is the schedule which was attached. It states:

> 1. In light of the constitutional development of Canada, including the enactment of the Canada Act, 1982, is s. 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 inoperative?

That question has been eloquently debated today. Senator Beaudoin spoke about it. I was under the impression that he once wrote a book in which he stated that the powers of the Senate were virtually unlimited. I wonder if he has made an agonizing reappraisal of his position?

Senator Beaudoin: No, I have not. Read the whole book.

Senator Perrault: I apologize. Perhaps I did not get to the final chapter. There might be something there that I missed.

The second point of this document states:

> 2. If the answer to question 1 is "no", who has the legal authority to direct that members be added to the Senate pursuant to s. 26?
> 3. If the Queen or the Governor General retains legal authority to direct that members be added to the Senate pursuant to s. 26 is either obliged to follow the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada?
> 4. If there is legal authority to direct that members be added to the Senate, is the exercise of that authority limited by constitutional convention to circumstances where differences between the Senate and House of Commons are of so serious and permanent a character that the Government cannot be carried on, and such differences are not susceptible to satisfactory adjustment by any other means?

The last is a rather important referral. As I and many other speakers have expressed, we feel that we have not had adequate opportunity to debate the GST report. I wonder if all senators have read through the report. Perhaps the new senators have not seen it yet. It might be useful to read the report before we enter into debate.

The fifth point in the document states:

> 5. If the answer to question 4 is "yes", would the terms of the constitutional convention be satisfied by the actual or potential failure to resolve the differences between the Senate and the House of Commons over Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and other Acts, Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and other Acts, and Bill C-28, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and other Acts, considered either individually or in combination?

That is the list of the questions submitted by the Attorney General for the Province of British Columbia. They are candid and straightforward questions. I think it would be useful for all of us, wherever we sit in the house, to have the court's appraisal of these questions as well as its views with respect to them. Is there anything to be served by continuing the GST debate and by making decisions before we know the mind of the court on these matters? Of course not.

Perhaps there are other useful measures which could be taken in the Senate in the meantime. This court referral is absolutely pivotal and of great importance for many reasons to the future of legislation that comes from the other place, as well as measures which originate in this chamber and which go to the other place.

The last news release, dated September 27, 1990, from the province of British Columbia, is headed, "Senate Challenge Will Go On". It says:

> VICTORIA—British Columbia will continue to challenge the right of the Federal Government to go to the Queen to request the appointment of additional Senators, Attorney General Russell G. Fraser stated today.

Honourable senators, I must say that I am in agreement with this next sentence:

> 'We believe that the Federal Government no longer has the right to ask the Queen for her assistance in running this country,' said Fraser.

That was British Columbia's position, and there are many Canadians from all parties who feel the same way. This is an imposition on Her Majesty, and she should not be involved in this way.

Mr. Fraser asked the question:

> If we need to ask for her assistance why did we bring home our Constitution?

That is a good question. I would like to hear some views from representatives of our central provinces—Quebec and Ontario. Can they tell us why we need to ask for Her Majesty's assistance after we have brought home our Constitution?

The news release goes on to say:

> The British Columbia Government believes that section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is inoperative. The Court will be asked to determine if the two-step mechanism which was originally intended can still be used. British Columbia says the process is no longer available.
> All the powers of the Queen, as the Queen of Canada, are now exercised by the Governor General. That means section 26 would require the Governor General to make a recommendation to himself and then to act as he "thinks fit". That is impossible, and section 26 can therefore no longer be operative.

This is the position taken by the province of British Columbia. Some senators are shaking their heads. Obviously they disagree, and that is their right.

Mr. Fraser goes on to say:

> The Prime Minister could have referred a question to the Supreme Court, which is the process we are following, . . .

Why did we not refer it to the Supreme Court? When I say "we", I am talking about the people in Ottawa. Why did the federal government not take that initiative and refer the question to the Supreme Court? That would have been a gesture to all provinces in Canada that this government is trying to do the right thing. Fraser then added:

> He could have asked the Supreme Court whether there is legal authority to direct that members be added to the Senate. That would have been the proper way to proceed.

That would have been the proper way to proceed. Mr. Fraser indicates, of course, that this would have been acceptable to the province of British Columbia. Mr. Fraser goes on to say:

> What's of even greater interest is why Brian Mulroney feels he has to have the seats to pass a bill which is supposed to be revenue neutral.

This is a new consideration brought forward by the province of British Columbia.

> If the GST is revenue neutral the Senate's conduct can't prevent the Government from carrying on.

That is a rather telling point, I think.

Senator MacDonald has left his seat. I suppose that if you cannot stand the heat, you do not stay in the kitchen.

Senator Barootes: It is not the heat that is bothering him. It is the smell.

Senator Perrault: I would like Senator MacDonald to answer the statement put forth by the Attorney General of British Columbia. There is no money forthcoming if you get the answer right or wrong. This is not a jackpot show. Mr. Fraser said this:

> If the GST is revenue neutral the Senate's conduct can't prevent the Government from carrying on. Constitutional convention requires such a crisis before the Prime Minister can act to pack the Senate.

That is a good statement. I hope that Senator MacDonald is going to speak on this point of privilege.

What does "revenue neutral" mean? Are the new senators provided with a blue guidebook explaining Tory terminology?

The news release goes on to say:

> The Province had hoped to obtain directions, and a hearing date, from the Court of Appeal tomorrow. The application has now been adjourned to next week at the request of the Federal Government.

From time to time I have disagreement with the Social Credit Party. I have my partisan differences with the NDP and Reform Party, and with the Conservatives, but all parties in my province have acted perfectly properly with respect to the GST. They have asked the right questions. They are supporting this referral to the court. Indeed, there are other considerations now being advanced in the province of British Columbia. They were referred to briefly earlier today. There is a theory in B.C. that section 26 is extinct. However, we are concerned that by naming to the Upper Chamber an eleventh member from New Brunswick, the Prime Minister appears to have violated another section of the British North America Act. This has been covered completely, but I should like to go over it again to ensure that we all understand it.

The act says that New Brunswick is allowed ten members in the House of Commons. Subsection 51(a) says that no province shall have fewer MPs than it has senators. Clearly there are very serious questions here about whether the government is violating the Constitution of Canada. It is essential that we have a ruling on that before we get into a GST debate and the votes that inevitably will follow.

The Justice Minister of Canada was rather taken aback at this information when it was provided to her. In an interview, she said that there was nothing in the Constitution that prevented the Prime Minister from using the Senate-stacking provision. However, she agreed that the issue was there. She said that she may go to the Supreme Court of Canada for clarification, that it was a complex issue and that they were reviewing it. I know that a right-minded Minister of Justice would not even hesitate. I am sure that she is planning to obtain the opinion of the court on this matter.

The Justice Minister also admitted that it could lead to New Brunswick getting an extra House of Commons seat. In B.C. we have a great affection for New Brunswick. Many of our outstanding people were born and raised in New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces, and have made a great contribution to British Columbia.

New Brunswick has a population of 721,400. It now has ten MPs and eleven senators. That is a healthy representation. I know that Senator Carney would agree with me when I say that by comparison British Columbia with a population of 2.9 million, has 32 MPs and six senators. There is a job to be done to provide greater equality of representation in both the House of Commons and an elected Senate. Fairness is the model we need. Many people say that we will never have an elected Senate in Canada—but all it takes is generosity of spirit and practical common sense.

In the United States, Rhode Island has two senators. Senator Waters will agree that the U.S Senate works rather well, despite the fact that New York also has two senators, as do all of the states. In Australia, there are ten senators for every state. A nation as large as Canada must have that second elected chamber to bring the problems of those regions effectively to the attention of the central government. I am glad to see that Senator Gigantès, who has a great generosity of spirit, supports that idea.

Mr. Fraser, speaking in the province of British Columbia, said that it is interesting that they appointed a senator and then added another MP to balance it. If that is the Conservative's game plan, perhaps the Leader of the Government can tell us whether or not an extra riding will be created in New Brunswick to accommodate what appears to be a difficulty.

Senator Murray: There is no difficulty.

Senator Perrault: The courts will determine that. There is no need to dispute it, because you hold one view and some of our people hold a different view.

Mr. Fraser said:

> It is no wonder we in British Columbia want Senate Reform.

Well there it is. The fundamental question for all of us—for the media, the Province of British Columbia and other provinces—is whether or not there is a sufficiently important measure threatening the welfare and the future of Canada, in connection with which the Senate should exercise the power it undoubtedly possesses.

• (1800)

When I was Leader of the Government in the Senate, it was my view that we must first strengthen the Opposition to make sure that there was viable democracy in this place.

Senator Barootes: You sure didn't do that much!

Senator Perrault: I assisted in the appointment of a number of Conservative senators. Senator Roblin will confirm that. Secondly, I felt that under normal circumstances the Senate existed to improve and not to block proposed legislation, whether from a Liberal Government or a Conservative Government, and there is a letter substantiating my commitment to that view in the files of the Conservative Party and of Mr. Joe Clark.

However, the circumstances today are unusual. There have been predictions by many competent people that the GST would trigger a deep recession verging on a depression. These concerns are so considerable that for the first time in history all of the political parties of my province have asked me, as well as other senators representing British Columbia, to move immediately to do what we can to defeat this measure. I believe that I have a responsibility to my people. I wonder whether there is not a way for this bill to be withdrawn so that major improvements and changes can be made to it, instead of perhaps condemning it to oblivion. Is a salvage operation possible? The concerns I have expressed today are not held lightly by the people with whom I have discussed this matter. I have received representations from many people in other regions. The Province of British Columbia has gone to the extent of running a questionnaire in the press appealing to the people of British Columbia to write to all of the senators of that province asking them to stop this measure.

May I suggest this: Let us have a federal-provincial conference this week to have the ministers of finance review the situation that now exists in their provinces. Is this recession as bad as it appears to be in certain parts of the country? Let us get together and have a conference to discuss what really must be done to reduce the deficit. Let us have a commitment that will ensure that the tax measures now on the books are being properly and fairly employed. We are all Canadians, and all of us are interested in making this a better country.

We do not want this exercise to be merely a partisan dispute, with politicians struggling for power. It is far more than that. We can see the devastating effect of the recession on some communities in Ontario, and Ontario senators will know what I am talking about. The same can be said for the Atlantic provinces. I see my friend Senator Macquarrie seated opposite. He knows the seriousness of the problem. Let me relate a short story. Not long ago I phoned a company in Nanaimo, British Columbia. I said, "I understand that you have electronic parts for hi-fi equipment and I need a particular part." The person to whom I was speaking said, "Yes, but it will be a rather late delivery because we have moved the plant to North Carolina where the wages are lower." So the economy is in trouble. Cannot we as Canadians get together and have a meeting to discuss our economy—our own mini economic summit? Do we have to go to New York, to the United Nations, to talk about all sorts of world problems when the biggest problem today is the serious malaise that exists right here in Canada?

Senator Barootes: You are getting lost now!

Senator Perrault: I am not getting lost; I am saying that the priority is at home right now and that we must work to that end.

Honourable senators, I have appreciated this opportunity to discuss some of my ideas this afternoon.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to this question of privilege, and particularly to a point that has been made. It has to do principally with section 51A of the Constitution Act. I am one of six senators from Alberta, which is in the western division. In considering the make-up of Alberta senators, by my count five senators will vote one way and one senator the other with regard to Bill C-62. In fact, one of those senators has arrived here through a form of election, and that impresses me.

Senator Carney: He was appointed by the Prime Minster.

Senator Hays: That is correct, but an election was held prior to the appointment under the Senate Selection Act of the Province of Alberta. That selection process resulted in the appointment of Senator Waters, and I am pleased to see him here today.

In any event, I estimate that five senators will vote one way and that Senator Twinn will vote the other way. I will not pursue the question of the appointment of the eight new senators, as that argument has been well made, although I do not necessarily accept the legitimacy of those eight senators. If, however, there is legitimacy in the appointment of those eight new senators, I would seriously question four of those appointments.

A serious question revolves around section 51A of the Constitution Act, which indicates that there shall not be fewer members of Parliament than senators from a province. The total number of members of Parliament for the Maritime region is 25. The Prime Minister has attempted to appoint 26 senators from that region. It occurs to me that section 51A, in addition to ensuring that a province does not have fewer members of Parliament than senators, also plays an important role in the electoral and voting dynamics in Parliament. That importance relates to the fact that only four and not eight senators should have been appointed, because now we not only have a province with more senators than members of Parliament, but we have a division of Canada with more senators than members of Parliament. I believe that calls into question the legitimacy of the appointment of at least four of the eight senators appointed under section 26.

Honourable senators have indicated that it is ridiculous that business should be carried on by Parliament, and particularly in this chamber, while such a matter is decided by the courts. The point should also be made that it is equally ridiculous to accept that any such business done may have to be undone some time later, particularly when one looks at the controversial nature of Bill C-62, which, I am sure, is in the back of all our minds as we participate in the debate on this question of privilege. If Bill C-62 is implemented before the question is settled, it will surely give rise to litigation. That I believe is a worse alternative than to proceed with business when there is a legitimate question as to whether or not at least four of the eight senators have been appointed in accordance with the Constitution.

Your Honour, I could go on, but it is almost six o'clock.

Senator Grafstein: May I ask a question of my honourable friend?

Senator Hays: Certainly.

Senator Grafstein: Is my honourable friend saying that it is difficult for us to proceed with the business of this house, with business received from the other place, when that other place is improperly constituted?

• (1810)

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I wish I could claim the constitutional expertise of many of my colleagues in this chamber but I cannot. Mine is a simple point. It is that any business done by Parliament may be in question as a result of the point I have made. To the extent that it is, it seems to me unacceptable that we should leave the question unanswered, and I believe there is a prima facie case that there has been a breach, if not as to the eight, then certainly as to the four. That is my point.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I appreciate that the time is short, but I will take only a few moments. First I wish to speak briefly with respect to the eight newcomers who have been led to believe they are legitimate senators. I would assure them that there is no personal animosity on the part of any of us. As a matter of fact, we feel pretty badly that they have been so abused and embarrassed.

I have an important suggestion to make, which is that because of the embarrassment they have already suffered, and because of the embarrassment they may well suffer if the Supreme Court of Canada decides they should never have been appointed, it seems to me that they should either resign or withdraw from the Senate—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Stanbury: —until such time as a decision has been made about the legitimacy of their appointment. If I were in their place, that is what I would wish to do. I would have no desire to sit and be abused—not personally, but in terms of the legitimacy of my appointment—over a period and be led into making decisions. If my "legitimate" colleagues—I guess I have to call them that—insist upon using them as part of the government's majority they may well suffer the additional embarrassment of finding themselves a few months from now, having made decisions of great import to the people of Canada and having those decisions declared null and void because of the illegitimacy of their appointment.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, it is six o'clock.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 12 of the Rules of the Senate, at 6 o'clock. I must leave the Chair and come back at eight o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

[English]

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I was speaking when we adjourned for dinner, but I do not propose to proceed further.

MOTION TO ORDER WITHDRAWAL OF STRANGERS WITHDRAWN—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have had a short discussion with Senator Doody, and we propose the following: That you grant me unanimous consent to withdraw my motion dealing with the strangers, and that we then adjourn until Wednesday, October 3, at 2 o'clock to give both sides an opportunity to confer with their caucus colleagues; and that we start a new session on Wednesday.

Senator Doody: A new sitting?

Senator Frith: A new sitting, not a new session, although that is a solution you might consider. We propose that we start a new sitting and that everyone's position, including the Speaker's, remain exactly the same; that we commence on Wednesday at 2 o'clock with the "strangers" motion no longer before us, gone, and that we continue from where we are at present. Senator Doody will make the motion, and I recommend that we support it.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what Senator Frith has said is substantially correct, with the clarification he made about the new session. We at no time agreed to a new session, but we have agreed that we would adjourn this evening to return at 2 o'clock on Wednesday, October 3. I am not sure if Senator Frith has to make a formal withdrawal, but leave is granted.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I would like, for the sake of clarification, to find out if the point of privilege will still be an issue tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Yes; nothing is changed. Everything is exactly as it stands at this moment and will stay that way until Wednesday, October 3, except that the motion about strangers has evaporated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Then I shall leave the chair.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, October 3, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 3, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when we left yesterday—

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down!

Senator Frith: His Honour the Speaker was not on his feet when we adjourned yesterday and I thought that today we were to be exactly where we were when we adjourned yesterday.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have a—

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, were we not to be exactly where we stood yesterday? Was that not understood?

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down!

Senator Frith: I am addressing His Honour the Speaker, not the other senators. When we adjourned yesterday I understood everyone was to be exactly where he was.

Senator Barootes: Let the Speaker speak.

Senator Frith: When we adjourned yesterday we understood that we were to be exactly where we were, and we were in the midst of a question of privilege and I want to wind that up.

The Hon. the Speaker: I intend to address that later.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a return from the Clerk of the Senate showing that the Honourable Senators Walter Patrick Twinn; Wilbert Joseph Keon; Michael Arthur Meighen; Normand Grimard; Thérèse Lavoie-Roux; James W. Ross; John Michael Forrestall, Janis Johnson; and Eric Arthur Berntson have taken and subscribed the Oath of Allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, and have made and subscribed the Declaration of Property Qualification required of them by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said Declarations.

Accordingly, the senators' Writs of Summons will be printed in today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

SPEAKER'S RULING CONTESTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question of privilege raised and debated yesterday objected to the right of eight new senators to take their seats and vote in the Senate of Canada.

In the discussion the Speaker was asked to rule whether or not a prima facie case of privilege existed. I have reflected on that matter and I think I need not hear further to make my ruling.

Since the question raised is more properly one which deals with an interpretation of the Constitution Act, 1867, the Chair must be guided by the reference in Bourinot's Fourth Edition, on page 180, and Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, on pages 38-39, citation 117(6), that:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

As the parliamentary authorities state, whether or not these appointments were constitutional is not a matter for the Speaker to rule on. Consequently, I cannot find a prima facie case of privilege in the matters raised. Therefore, I rule that this question should not be further debated.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to register an objection on several points.

First, when we adjourned yesterday—although I have not had an opportunity to examine the record—I think everyone on both sides would agree that it was understood that we would be in exactly the same position as we were in at the time of adjournment, and that nobody's position was to be changed. My understanding was that we were to start off on the basis of everybody's position being as it stood at that moment.

What was the state of affairs at that moment? At that moment we were in the midst of a question of privilege. At that stage the debate had not been completed. Nothing had been said to indicate that the debate had been closed. Nothing had been said to the effect that a ruling was to be made. In fact, the plan was to have Senator MacEachen, on this side, speak to the point of privilege at the beginning of today's sitting.

So, clearly, in my view, there has been a breach of something, and I suppose it is a breach of faith.

Senator Barootes: No.

Senator Austin: Absolutely.

Senator Frith: Do I understand that there are some senators who were present yesterday when we adjourned, who are saying that it was not understood that every position was to be the same? Can someone please see if it is in the Debates?

Senator Austin: I have been advised that there are no Debates.

Senator Frith: The Debates are not ready yet. Well, let me point out that nobody's position was to have been prejudiced, neither ours nor the other side's, nor the Speaker's, and that everyone was to be in the same position and the adjournment was not to prejudice that position. How has our position been prejudiced?

Rule 33 says the following:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen,—

Which it has:

> —a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

That does not say, "or if the Speaker find a prima facie case or does not find a prima facie case.

In my submission, that is the rule governing the procedure for points and questions of privilege in the Senate. The whole concept of a role for the Speaker is foreign to this place and is a role that takes place in the other House. It is clear that the Rules Committee has decided—and the Senate has agreed and has had it as part of its rules for a long time—that questions of privilege are dealt with in the Senate in accordance with Rule 33. They are dealt with by senators and I do not believe that the Speaker should be called upon to talk about prima facie cases, as he is called upon the House of Commons and in some other legislatures. I know, from having talked to Senator Ottenheimer, that that is the case in the Newfoundland Legislature and I know that that is so in other legislatures, but not in the Senate. The Senate has dealt with these situations not through Beauchesne, not through anybody else's customs, but through our own black and white rules.

QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS—MOTION TO DISENTITLE TO VOTE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I had proposed to make a motion yesterday—and today because my position was not to be changed; but we are not in the same position and I have been prejudiced by what the Speaker has done and by his ruling, and I must take objection, Your Honour, to your having done so. I stood at the beginning to say that we were supposed to be in exactly the same position, and Your Honour immediately changed that position. My motion was to be—and is:

> That pursuant to Rule 33, the Senate take the following action—

Using the words:

> —on the question of privilege now before it;

Present tense. It was then before it, and I wanted to deal with it as before it.

> That pursuant to Rule 33, the Senate take the following action on the question of privilege now before it;

[Senator Austin.]

> That the so-called "Divisional Senators" referred to in the debate, namely,
> Forrestall, J. Michael, Maritimes
> Ross, James W., Maritimes

Do I take it that Your Honour is saying that I cannot present that motion under Rule 33?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Well, honourable senators, I should like to rise on a point of order.

• (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am asking the Speaker whether it is his position that the —-

Senator Barootes: Address the Senate!

The Hon. the Speaker: I think you should address the House.

Senator Frith: Then His Honour does not have a role. That suits me very well. That is exactly my point.

The Hon. the Speaker: I listened to arguments all day yesterday, and I think I understand the arguments sufficiently to make a ruling.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Therefore, is His Honour saying that I am not entitled, under Rule 33, to make this motion? Is that His Honour's ruling?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Senator Barootes: Address the Senate!

Senator Frith: I am speaking to the Speaker regarding his ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yesterday I was asked repeatedly by both sides to give a ruling. I have given a ruling.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: His Honour was not asked to make a ruling. His Honour was being asked to listen, as were other senators, to the question of privilege that was raised —-

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: I was in the middle of my speech.

Senator Frith: Yes, there was a speech being made at the time, and Rule 33 is clear on this. It states:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen—

Surely, no one would argue that it had not arisen.

> —a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

I want to understand His Honour's ruling so that we can respond to it.

Is it His Honour's ruling that that motion cannot be made now because His Honour has dispensed with the matter? If so, he has gone against Rule 33.

His Honour knew that I wanted to stand and speak to the question, particularly since we were to be in exactly the same position we were in when we adjourned.

It is my submission that His Honour has interfered with that right and broken the understanding we had when we adjourned yesterday evening.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: In order to set the record straight—and I am not entering the debate at all—in my speech yesterday I did ask the Speaker for a ruling.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Did Senator Everett want a ruling before the debate was completed?

Senator Everett: I am correcting the record. Whether I was right or wrong, and whether I was within the rules or outside of the rules, I did request the Speaker to give a ruling.

Senator Frith: Did the honourable senator want the Speaker to make that ruling before the debate was completed?

Senator Everett: I requested a ruling on the point raised by Senator Molgat.

Senator Frith: But before the debate was completed?

Senator Everett: I did not place any time limit on it.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators—

Senator Murray: With the greatest of respect, we have heard from two honourable senators opposite.

Senator Stanbury: I want to make the point that I was in the middle of my speech on this matter.

Senator Murray: We will check the record on that when we get the record, but my clear recollection is that my honourable friend announced that he had finished his speech.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, a point of order has been raised by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Frith: It was more than that. I am not permitted to make a motion? You have heard what I had to say anyway.

Senator Murray: I heard what my honourable friend had to say, and he has asked for a ruling from the Chair—

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: What are you talking about?

Senator Murray: A moment ago my honourable friend asked for a ruling from the Chair—

Senator Frith: I asked him whether or not that was correct.

Senator Murray: —as to whether he is now entitled to put the motion, which he read, under Rule 33.

Senator Frith: Let me be perfectly clear, because you obviously listened to me. What I asked for—and I imagine this will not change what you want to ask for—was: Is the effect of His Honour's ruling—although I had stood up, I had to sit down—that I cannot make my motion under Rule 33.

Senator Murray: That is a point of order, and my friend has asked His Honour the Speaker to rule on that matter.

Senator Frith: To explain his ruling!

Senator Murray: No, to rule as to whether the effect of his judgment—

Senator Frith: Let us not quibble.

Senator Murray: —means that my friend cannot put the motion he has read pursuant to Rule 33. I would contend that that is indeed the effect of Your Honour's ruling. I would contend that the motion, which my honourable friend read, is the same; it is based on the same matter that was raised in his alleged question of privilege yesterday, which was debated all day yesterday. I believe Your Honour had been asked by several senators whether there was a prima facie case of privilege. Your Honour having ruled that there is not, surely it is not open to an honourable senator to bring forward a motion under Rule 33 on a question of privilege that does not exist and that Your Honour has ruled does not exist.

My friend has tried to contend that the whole concept of prima facie questions of privilege being adjudicated by the Chair is a matter utterly unknown to the Senate and that we do not act that way here—that is something they do in the House of Commons, perhaps in the House of Assembly in Newfoundland and elsewhere. I contend otherwise, honourable senators, and I cite no less an authority than my friend Senator Frith, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. This exchange did not occur a couple of years ago, but a few days ago, on September 25, 1990, when we were discussing a series of questions of privilege. My friend Senator Frith said, at page 2239 of Debates of the Senate for that day, as follows:

> Senator Frith: In my respectful submission, Your Honour has a duty to decide when you have heard enough on this point of privilege—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: That surely addresses the alleged breach of faith my friend has raised.

Senator Frith: That was a different point altogether.

Senator Murray: Continuing with Senator Frith:

> —to make up your mind as to whether a prima facie case is made. You are not being asked to decide on the question of privilege, but simply whether a prima facie case has been made for a point of privilege. Your Honour should decide when you have heard enough. Do I take it that Your Honour is going to let this thing go on forever?

The Hon. the Speaker: Not necessarily.

Senator Frith: Are you going to intervene at some point and say, "I have enough to decide whether or not there is a prima facie point of privilege"? In my respectful view, Your Honour, that is your duty.

Later in the same column:

Senator Frith: Your Honour is saying that it is fine so long as it is within the rules. The rules or traditions to which Your Honour has referred require, as Senator Ottenheimer said, only that Your Honour make the decision as to whether or not you have heard enough to determine whether there is a prima facie case. That is all. I submit that you have heard sufficient to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case.

Senator Barootes: Why don't you change seats with him?

Senator Frith: I suggest, Your Honour, that it is quite possible that they will think of some other reason for the filibuster, but, on this point, I think Your Honour has heard enough to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case.

● (1420)

My honourable friend's declaration today—that the concept of the Speaker's intervening to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege is unknown to the Senate—is contradicted by the very position he took here a few days ago on September 25. I put it to honourable senators that Senator Frith has now raised a point of order demanding his right to move a motion on rule 33, which I believe does not exist under our rules. He may not do that because His Honour has already found that a prima facie case does not exist.

If His Honour wishes to deliberate on these matters, I trust that he will take full account of the excellent advice he received from Senator Frith on September 25 last.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the well-known author, H.L. Mencken, a famous cynic and agnostic, was once asked by another journalist, "H.L., suppose, when you die, the first thing you see before you is Jesus and the 12 Apostles? What would you say then?" He said, "I would say: 'Gentlemen, I was wrong.'"

Honourable senators, the points raised by the citations given by Senator Murray are accurate, of course; I have said that. I believed them to be correct. I was persuaded that these arcane procedures brought to the Senate from other places applied here, or I would not have said so.

But Senator Bonnell will testify that he came over to me and to Senator MacEachen yesterday and showed us rule 33. I believe that I was wrong on September 25, that we were wrong, and that rule 33 applies—

[Senator Murray.]

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Simard: And Senator Bonnell was right!

Senator Frith: Rule 33 applies, and, honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: My question of privilege—and I do not ask Your Honour to rule on it—is that when we adjourned yesterday it was clearly understood that everyone's position was to remain the same.

Senator Stanbury: Precisely!

Senator Frith: And before us at that time, still up in the air, was a question of privilege dealing with the legitimacy of these senators, and His Honour ought not to have started a fresh proceeding before that question of privilege was dealt with in some way or another. In my view, it should have been dealt with under rule 33, with the debate continuing until someone, if he or she wished to do so, was able to make a motion.

That was yesterday. The Speaker has made his ruling—improperly, I believe. However, that has happened.

Therefore, pursuant to rule 33, I move:

That, pursuant to rule 33, the Senate take the following action on the question of privilege that I have now raised;

That so-called "Divisional Senators" referred to in the debate, namely,

Forrestall, J. Michael, Maritimes
Ross, James W., Maritimes
Grimard, Norman, Quebec
Lavoie-Roux, Thérèse, Quebec
Keon, Wilbert Joseph, Ontario
Meighen, Michael Arthur, Ontario
Berntson, Eric Arthur, Western

be declared not entitled to vote at any time on any question before the Senate, until each one's qualification to do so has been legally verified.

I have the motion in writing in both official languages. The motion is made pursuant to Rule 33 and, in my submission, is regularly made, no matter what was said on another occasion.

Senator Murray: I hope that the point of order I raised a few minutes ago will be taken into consideration by Your Honour before you accept the motion of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Frith: He does not have to accept it; it is made.

Senator Murray: My honourable friends do not wish me to repeat the point of order that I raised.

Senator Frith: But it has nothing to do with this. Your point of order was on the other ruling.

Senator Murray: No. My point of order was with regard to my friend's right to make that motion—

Senator Frith: Then.

Senator Murray: —now that the Speaker has ruled that there is no prima facie case of privilege.

Senator Frith: That was on another point of privilege. I have just raised a new one.

Senator Murray: Then I say it is the same point of privilege.

Senator Frith: How could it be the same one? It was based on what the Speaker did today. It could not be based on something that happened yesterday.

Senator Murray: If my honourable friend insists that it is a different point of privilege, then His Honour now has the duty, in the words of my friend, to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege.

Senator Frith: Not now that I have made a motion under Rule 33.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, let us be clear on the rules of this place. Rule 33 is clear and unequivocal. There is no provision in that rule to prohibit a member from moving a motion based on a question of privilege whether or not a prima facie case of privilege has been acknowledged by the Speaker.

I know that over time some senators have, in fact, asked the Speaker to make a ruling on this matter of a prima facie case, and that is the practice in the House of Commons. I was there for several years, as were a number of senators opposite, and there were long debates to try to persuade the Speaker to acknowledge that a prima facie case existed. That could follow with a motion, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That does not apply here, because under Rule 33 there is clearly and unequivocally no provision for that.

Rule 33 states: ". . . a motion calling upon the Senate to take action", which is what has happened, "may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall" take precedence over all other matters before the Senate and also Orders of the Day.

Therefore, we do not have to search all the authorities in Erskine May, Bourinot, or any of the others. Our rule is clear when dealing with a motion put before this house on a matter of privilege. There is no equivocation at all that a senator has that right, because it states: "When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate", and surely there is no greater privilege whether or not senators are here legitimately. That is the question, because they are going to vote.

We have to go by our own rules. If we do not like the rules, we had better change them. However, the rule at the moment is that a senator may, as Senator Frith has done, move a motion without notice respecting a matter of privilege. It does not ask the Speaker to deal with whether or not it is a prima facie case.

In fact, if one wished to get into this a little deeper, the authority of the Speaker in this chamber is not even nearly the same as that of the Speaker in the House of Commons. I was a member in the House of Commons when we debated for approximately four or five years changing and significantly increasing the authority of the Speaker to rule on matters. We even got to the point where there was absolutely no appeal from a Speaker's ruling in the House of Commons. We know that. We know the reasons for it, too. It is because some members of the opposition—and I was never one of them—abused the system so badly that Stanley Knowles, myself and others, spent half our time discussing procedural matters, hour after hour and day after day. That is the reason for those changes.

• (1430)

However, although we do not have those rules here, we do have Rule 33 in our Rules of the Senate—and everyone has a copy of that publication in their desks. There is no qualification in Rule 33 as to whether a senator has the right to make that motion without notice. That is clearly stated in that rule. However, our committee, in bringing back that recommendation, did spell out the situation clearly, and we, as a Senate, accepted it. There is no question at all that Senator Frith, or any other senator, has the right to call for such a motion.

Senator Murray has that look on his face. I think he has found something that I might have said at some time in the past. Every once in a while I forget myself and I address this chamber by saying, "Mr. Speaker." I regret it right away—not because I do not like to address the speaker, but because I know that it is wrong.

Senator Frith: Remember Mencken's rule!

Senator Olson: I know that several other senators from the other side of the house jumped to their feet when I said "Mr. Speaker." They shouted, "Point of Order! That senator is not addressing the chamber. He is obliged to address the chamber and not the Speaker." But we know that.

Honourable senators, we must accept our responsibility. The reason the rules in the Senate are designed the way in which they are is so that this chamber will be in charge of its own procedure. We have not given the Speaker the authority that the Speaker in the House of Commons has.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: We have the numbers!

Senator Olson: We should maintain that situation. Therefore, I suggest that Senator Frith's motion should be accepted and placed on the Order Paper, because that is what is provided for under Rule 33 of our rules.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I wanted to have one word. Senator Olson did intervene on September 25, at page 2231 of the Debates of the Senate, where he said:

> Honourable senators, I will try to be brief, but I want to point out that there is no question of privilege that ought to be brought here on the matters that have been raised. There is no prima facie case of privilege either, because, honourable senators—or Mr. Speaker, since you are being asked to take this into account—the fact of the matter is that what happened in the committee yesterday—

And so on. My friend was clearly raising the question of whether there was a prima facie case of privilege, and he was addressing "Mr Speaker."

Senator Olson: I was not!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Murray: There was also a brief citation from an even more eminent authority, the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, which is found at page 2246 of the Debates of the Senate September 25, 1990, this past week. Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, Leader of the Opposition, said:

> Certainly it has been alleged many times, both in the House of Commons and here, that privileges of individual members have been abridged. Usually the Speaker adjudicates as to whether there is a prima facie case. If it is found that there is a prima facie case, it is open to the individual member or senator to put a motion.

I will repeat that. He states:

> If it is found that there is a prima facie case, it is open to the individual member or senator to put a motion. Ultimately the Senate or the House of Commons must decide whether, in fact, a breach of privilege has occurred. That is the procedure. It relates to a possible deprivation of rights or privileges of members of Parliament, and that procedure is now in process.

The honourable Senator MacEachen referred several times to the Senate and the House of Commons, to Members of Parliament and to senators. There was no doubt in his mind as of September 25, any more than there was in the minds of Senator Frith and Senator Olson, that a prima facie case of privilege has to be made out before a motion can be put, and that it is up to the Speaker—

Senator Frith: In spite of Rule 33. Are you reading it out of the book, then?

Senator Murray: I have read the book. I have read Rule 33. I am telling you that there was no doubt in your mind, in the mind of your leader or in the mind of Senator Olson on September 25 last that a prima facie case has to be made out, and that it has to be adjudicated by the Chair.

Senator Frith: It does not say that in the rule.

Senator Murray: I have just read three citations from eminent authorities on the front bench—

Senator Frith: You are only able to cite flimsy authorities like me. The rules are more important than my opinion.

Senator Murray: Let me make it very clear—

Senator Frith: I appeal from my earlier position. I renounce it. I repent. Mea culpa.

Senator Murray: Your Honour, just so that there is no misunderstanding on the part of anyone, I am asking Your Honour, after due consideration, to rule on the point of order that I have raised.

Senator Frith: What is the point of order again?

Senator Murray: That the motion cannot be put, unless a prima facie case has been made out.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, all that the Leader of the Government has said is most interesting. It is fine to poke fun at each other, but when we come down to it we have to go by the rules.

I associate myself particularly with the question of privilege raised by Senator Frith because my privileges were offended as well. I was in the middle of a speech on this matter. However, that is all behind us. What we are talking about now is a fresh question of privilege which arose out of something that happened not more than half an hour ago in this chamber. It is that privilege which was offended. It is that privilege which is the point upon which Senator Frith has made a motion, based upon a rule which is incontrovertible, which is easily read and which has nothing in it about a prima facie case or anything else.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my point of order is fairly simple. I heard today a very humble senator, namely Senator Frith, admit that he was wrong.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Thériault: Therefore, it seems to me that if someone such as Senator Frith can admit that he is wrong in this case, then the Leader of the Government should stand up in his place to say that what he has just said is also wrong.

Senator Perrault: Have the courage to do the same!

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, if both gentlemen are wrong, then we are in absolute terra incognita. I do not think that both gentlemen can be wrong.

I have a couple of matters to raise. One deals with the authority of the Speaker of the Senate. There was a comparison made between our Speaker and the Speaker of the House of Commons. It was pointed out that those authorities are not the same. I think everyone agrees with that proposition. The method of coming to that office is quite different in the two houses. The Speaker in the Senate is appointed by the Governor in Council, whereas the Speaker in the House of Commons is elected. I have been corrected a few times for commencing my remarks with the words "Mr. Speaker", which came from force of habit. However, it is appropriate to say "honourable senators", and I endeavour to accommodate myself to the conventions.

• (1440)

An important distinction in its consequences is that a ruling of the Speaker in the Senate is appealable, whereas in the House of Commons it is not. We do not maintain that one can ignore a decision of the Chair in the Senate, but the point is that one may appeal it. Our rules permit that procedure. This would not be a new or untried course of action for honourable senators opposite or, to the best of my knowledge, this side. That is one remedy which honourable senators in the opposition have used in the past and may wish to use again today.

The point I am endeavouring to make is that it is not appropriate to ignore a ruling of the Speaker. However, under our present rules we have the option of appealing it. In the past, honourable senators opposite have frequently appealed a ruling of the Chair and have usually been successful. Often this success has momentum, and perhaps they would be successful again. Certainly the mechanism is there.

That is not the main point I wish to make. Much ado has been made with respect to our rule 33. The thrust of the argument is that the whole consideration of prima facie is not relevant, and two reasons have been put forward. The first reason is that this is a procedure only in the House of Commons or other legislatures; the second reason is that there is no reference to it in our rules. I should like to deal with the second reason first.

To the best of my knowledge—and I have never read them in their entirety—I do not believe the words prima facie are mentioned in the standing orders of the House of Commons.

Senator Olson: Yes, they are.

Senator Ottenheimer: Perhaps they are. I said "to the best of my knowledge". In many legislatures the words prima facie are not mentioned because their currency was developed in commentary by experts in parliamentary law with respect to the whole question of privilege. The non-mention of the words prima facie is not in itself indicative of anything.

The other argument is that the procedure of establishing a prima facie case is applicable only in the House of Commons or other legislatures. In my opinion, that is without foundation. There are many differences between one legislature and another—such as the question of numbers for a quorum or how long one may speak. Almost every legislature has a time period—30 minutes, 45 minutes, an hour—for questions. We, in the Senate, have no time period for questions.

There are many areas where the rules are different. However, I would suggest—and I have said this before when arguing a different point—that there are certain principles which inhere in a parliamentary body as a parliamentary body; for example, the right of everyone to speak within the rules. That inheres in a parliamentary body as such. A decision, even if it is carried by a majority, that only members of the government will be heard, that nobody will hear anyone in the Opposition or vice versa, is invalid. Perhaps technically such a rule could be passed by the majority. I do not think that such a body would remain a parliamentary body because that rule goes to the very heart, the very intrinsic nature of what is a parliamentary body.

In my opinion, the procedures and practices in forming questions of privileges are of a similar nature. They are intrinsic in parliamentary tradition and are as operative in the Senate as a parliamentary body as they are operative in the House of Commons or other legislatures as parliamentary bodies.

May I direct some comments specifically to rule 33. It has been maintained that rule 33 is there and that, therefore, that is the end of the matter. Of course, all rules are there, and tomes have been written about them. Erskine May puts out about 700 pages every year and a half to update the editions, much to the chagrin of librarians working under close budgets. However, there is more to those publications than just the rules. Rule 33 reads:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

Senator Stanbury: Absolutely!

Senator Ottenheimer: I submit that rule 33 is descriptive and perhaps prescriptive of what happens when a prima facie case has been made.

Senator Frith: Where does it say that?

Senator Ottenheimer: It is not immediately operative.

Senator Frith: Nice try, Gerry!

Senator Ottenheimer: Let us look at the effect if it were immediately operative. If it were immediately operative, one means of postponing the conduct or public business would be to have a senator get up and make an allegation that there has been a breach of privilege and immediately put a motion on the order paper. Notice would not have to be given. That motion would precede any other motion and would continue until it was resolved.

Senator Frith: Or adjourned.

Senator Ottenheimer: Or adjourned.

Senator Frith: Isn't that what it says?

Senator Ottenheimer: Or adjourned, but that could in theory continue ad infinitum. There would be no modification of rule 33. It would be possible for a senator to make an allegation—

Senator Frith: That proves that you don't like the rule! That's what it says.

Senator Ottenheimer: That is what it says, but it is my contention that that rule is prescriptive of what happens when a prima facie case has been made because that is exactly what happens in such cases. The person is recognized, moves a motion—of which he does not have to give notice—and that motion takes priority on the order paper and continues to hold that priority until it is adjourned or resolved.

Therefore, honourable senators, it is my submission that Senator Frith's motion is not in order, there having been found that there is no prima facie case, and the subject matter of the motion is identical to what was debated yesterday. The Chair has found that there was no prima facie case. Rule 33 describes what happens when there is a prima facie case, and since there is no prima facie case, the motion cannot become operative.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I cannot tell you how earth-shattering and disillusioning it is for an independent member of this chamber to discover that his rights and privileges are subject to error on the part either of government members or of opposition members. In the face of that discovery all I can rely on as an independent member are the rules as prescribed here.

● (1450)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lawson: The rules are very clear and specific and I insist that the rules that apply to the Senate apply.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, it seems to me that Senator Ottenheimer is doing what he did the other day, which is what he says we should not be doing—discussing issues and trying to avoid the substance of Senator Frith's complaint.

What I am about to say about the divisional senators, I beg them to believe, is nothing personal. I think they are admirable human beings.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Gigantès: Nor will I use any wounding words.

Senator Barootes: Sit down then.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Barootes is from a part of Greece where they behave in that fashion. Perhaps they were under the influence of the Turks for too long and he learned bad manners.

I always suspected that Madame Thérèse Lavoie-Roux was truly, at heart, a Tory ever since the day she and her husband demolished my car in Montreal. I remember asking her, "Why did you do this to me? Why did you not do it to a Tory?" Now I know why she did it to me. She, herself, somehow knew that she would end up as a Tory.

Honourable senators, I would like to read to you the opinion of a legal scholar.

[Translation]

The author is a lawyer who holds a Ph.D. in constitutional law and teaches law and political science. He is quoted as saying in Le Devoir:

> The current situation in Canada in connection with the recourse to section 26 of the 1867 BNA Act concerning the appointment of four or eight senators to the Upper House and with the position of the Queen in this matter must be considered in light of the law and the precedents.

It is a very interesting article. If Senator Beaudoin has not seen it yet, he might listen to my comments before he gets a chance to read it.

> To understand the question it is necessary to quote the non-official French version as well as the English text of section 26, the latter alone having force of law.

Here is the French version of section 26:

> Si la Reine juge à propos . . .

These are very important words which will be repeated.

> Si la Reine juge à propos, sur la recommandation du gouverneur général, d'ordonner que quatre ou huit membres soient ajoutés au Sénat, le gouverneur général pourra, par mandat adressé à quatre ou huit personnes (selon le cas) . . .

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is the honourable gentleman quoting from Bourinot or some particular rules of the House? Is the honourable gentleman speaking to the point of order?

Senator Gigantès: I am speaking to the substance of the point of privilege.

Senator Doody: It is a point of order.

Senator Gigantès: We have a point of privilege on the floor which takes precedence over everything else.

Senator Doody: We do not have a point of privilege on the floor.

Senator Frith: Of course we do

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès:

> . . . ayant les qualités requises et représentant également les quatre divisions du Canada, les ajouter au Sénat.

Now here is the official English text, according to Professor Langlois.

[English]

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

[Translation]

> But could Section 26 have simply become obsolete? In other words, Canada's situation, both constitutionaly and legally, having changed so much since 1867, Section 26 would have lost its original meaning and become obsolete. Some may argue that point. From the almost colonial status it had in 1867, Canada has progressively moved towards full sovereignty, especially with the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930, through the Status of Westminster in 1931 up to the Constitutional Act of 1982. Legally, the status of the Crown has changed a lot; for instance, the kingdom has been canadianized. The Queen is no longer Queen of Canada because she is Queen of Great Britain; She is Queen of Canada through the will of the Canadian people and her role as the Queen of Canada is protected by Section 51 of the Constitutional Act of 1982.

As to Canadian affairs, she is no longer seeking the advise of the British Government: she must rely on the Government of Canada. On this, we all agree. The role of the Governor General has also changed in the same direction. From the representative of the British Government in Canada he was once, he has become the personal representative of the Sovereign of Canada.

Senator Murray: I rise on a point of order. I have listened quite attentively to the remarks made my friend Hon. Senator Gigantès. He is involved in a debate on a motion on which the Chair has not yet ruled whether it is acceptable.

[English]

I would like to ask Your Honour—and I will do it in one sentence, whether Your Honour intends to rule now on the point of order that I have raised concerning Senator Frith's motion; or whether Your Honour wishes to hear other honourable senators speak to the point of order; or whether Your Honour intends to reserve his judgment.

Senator Frith: There is before us a point of privilege, not a point of order.

Senator Murray: There is before us a motion which my friend moved. I raised a point of order as to its receivability given that His Honour had already ruled on the question of a prima facie case of privilege.

Senator Frith: That was another question of privilege. It is not this one.

Senator Murray: Then my point of order is very simple. If it is another point of privilege then His Honour has to decide whether that point of privilege is a prima facie case.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Murray: This is a point of order. It is a very simple proposition. My friend understands it. He has moved a motion. I have raised a point of order. I would like to have a ruling from the Chair either now or after the Chair has heard other honourable senators or at the Chair's convenience. However, because my friend, Senator Gigantès has now entered into a discussion on the substance of a question of privilege, I would like to know what is the standing of my point of order on Senator Frith's motion.

● (1500)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the point of privilege that I raised, and which is before us at the moment—namely, the subject matter of a motion under rule 33—is clearly in order. I do not know why you have to go for precedents. The rule says that if a point of privilege has been raised, a motion may be made at any time. I do not know what more authority we need—tables of stone, or the Charter of Rights? The rule deals with a situation where a point of privilege has been raised. One has been raised, and it is a different point of privilege based on something that happened today, not on something that happened yesterday. That point of privilege has been raised. Surely no one is arguing about whether a point of privilege has been raised.

The rule then clearly says that a motion may be made at any time. How can there be a question in the course of a point of privilege where a motion has been made that is absolutely four-square within rule 33? Is there any question about the fact that it is a point of privilege that has been raised on an event that took place today and a motion that can be made at any time?

Senator Murray: To assist Your Honour, let me repeat that—

Senator Frith: I am sure this will be of great assistance to him.

Senator Murray: My point of order is—

Senator Frith: You want to move an amendment to the rule.

Senator Perrault: That is what he is trying to do.

Senator Murray: No. My point of order is that before the senator can do that he must make out a prima facie case of privilege acceptable to the Chair.

Senator Frith: It does not say that at all.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, Senator Frith asked me to straighten out the record, and I would like to do so. I have the blues here from yesterday. At the end of the sitting, at eight o'clock last night, I asked the following question:

> Honourable senators, I would like, for the sake of clarification, to find out if the point of privilege will still be an issue tomorrow.

Senator Frith answered:

> Yes; nothing is changed. Everything is exactly as it stands at this moment and will stay that way until Wednesday, October 3, except that the motion about strangers has evaporated.

Senator Cools: See?

Senator Everett: That is the record that exists, but I would like to go on to say that in respect of the point of privilege, it seems to me that when Senator Molgat rose yesterday, he might well have made a motion under section 33. He did not do so, and there was widespread discussion throughout the chamber on the point of privilege that he raised. The Honourable Speaker ruled on that at the beginning of today's sitting. Therefore it would seem to me that one of the questions the Speaker would have to rule on now, if Senator Frith proposes his motion, would be whether it is in order, in light of the fact that there was full discussion, or ample discussion, as far as the Speaker was concerned. The Speaker made a ruling on the discussion that perhaps would have ensued had Senator Molgat made his motion and therefore the Speaker is seized of all the knowledge he requires to make a ruling that the motion is out of order. That would be one view.

Senator Frith: On the old point of privilege.

Senator Everett: On the old point of privilege.

Senator Frith: Not on today's.

Senator Everett: But the ruling, in effect, that since your motion would duplicate what he has already decided, the decision has been made.

Senator Frith: No, because there was no motion made, as you yourself have said.

Senator Everett: That is correct. I am merely saying how I can see one interpretation of what the Speaker will have to rule on now. Alternatively he will have to rule on the point raised by Senator Murray that before you can pose a motion under section 33 you have to have established a prima facie case, and if that case is not established, then the motion is out of order. However, those are the two elements on which the Speaker has to rule, and I would call on him to rule on them now.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I think we really ought to clarify one point. Whatever the question was that Senator Molgat raised yesterday, it was as to the general eligibility, if you will, of the eight appointed senators. The motion today, whatever it is, goes much beyond that, and it speaks to a specific point, which simply is that until there is a legal decision made, they should not be allowed to vote in this chamber. That is an entirely different matter.

Senator Murray: That was Senator Molgat's point.

Senator Frith: He never made a motion. You cannot have it both ways. He did not make a motion.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, the reason I have been reading to you this text is to demonstrate, as does this professor, that, indeed, article 26 may be caduque, in French terms, and therefore the motion of Senator Frith, asking that they not vote until the courts decide on this issue as to whether or not section 26 is valid or has been rendered totally inoperative by history, is important. That case is going to be before the courts and may also have to be decided otherwise. This is a new point, a new question of privilege, a new motion, put forward by Senator Frith, and it is to that one that I am speaking.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I would submit that the pith and substance of the argument put forward yesterday by honourable senators opposite is the same as the substance of the motion put forward by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition today.

Senator Stanbury: Not at all! The circumstances are different.

Senator Ottenheimer: It all deals with the right of eight senators to sit and speak and vote in this House. That is what it is all about. One can phrase a motion on that subject, I am sure, in hundreds of different ways. Both the English and French languages are capable of an infinite variety of words and phrases and adjectives and verbs and everything else.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Gigantès: Don't forget the prepositions!

Senator Ottenheimer: I leave the honourable prepositions to my honourable friend.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. I like that.

Senator Ottenheimer: But the essence of the motion today, and the essence of the submissions of honourable members yesterday, dealt with the right of eight senators to participate in the deliberations of this House. I would therefore support Senator Everett's request for a ruling by the Chair as to whether or not the motion before the Senate is in order. I think it would be helpful also—although this is at the discretion of the Chair—to determine whether or not it is required to establish a prima facie case, and whether the finding earlier today with respect to there not being a prima facie case in terms of what was debated yesterday may still be operative, because we are dealing essentially with the same question in different words and forms, that question being the right of the eight senators to sit and to vote here.

In closing, there has been a fair bit of opinion back and forth with respect to standing order 33. Some maintain that it is immediately operative, that it has no qualification, no antecedent, that it is all-governing and that it is almost divine in its nature and immediate applicability and non-dependence on anything. There is another point of view, which I share, and which I believe others share, namely, that rule 33 prescribes or describes or directs what may or will happen if there is a finding of a prima facie case. I will just point out what is, I suppose, the most obvious of all our standing orders, and that is standing order 1, headed "Interpretation":

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

I would submit that the practice in the House of Commons is not totally irrelevant, since it is one of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada.

If there is obscurity, ambiguity, doubt, inconsistency, contradiction, a variety of practices from which one cannot glean a consistent pattern of decision, or of jurisprudence, for lack of a better word, in the Senate's procedures, then obviously the procedure in the House of Commons should be a guide. Indeed, Standing Order No. 1 makes that point.

It is debatable, in my opinion, that there may be a prima facie case, but until there is a ruling that it has been made, one cannot proceed with a motion taking precedence, even under Rule 33, because my interpretation of that rule is that it describes what happens after the prima facie case.

It may be argued that our practices are inconsistent, inconclusive and ambiguous. Obviously, if that is the case, I think it is in everyone's interest to have a clear and consistent pattern. If that is the case, then surely the practice followed in the House of Commons should be a guide—not the sole guide, but an important one.

I believe that before proceeding further it would be helpful and necessary—in order that we know where we are going and what is transpiring, and with some certainty of the rules under which we are operating—that the Chair make a ruling on these matters after having given whatever deliberation and thought it feels necessary.

I think that if we proceed without a ruling, we are drifting about in a turbulent sea with a number of shoals and not enough navigators to keep us away from them.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise on the point my colleague from Newfoundland is trying to make. Surely anyone here who has had experience in a legislature, and who can read French or English, can easily see that Interpretation Order No. 1 does not apply to a rule as clear as Rule 33.

I quite agree with the honourable senator from Newfoundland that in some cases an interpretation of Standing Order No. 1 may have some bearing when there is no other guide, but Rule 33, honourable senators, is crystal clear.

I will not repeat it since it has been read into the record. It is clear in the English language, and it is possible "encore plus clair dans sa version française".

Honourable senators, it may well be that Rule 33 should be changed. I can honestly tell honourable senators that when I first came to the Senate I had a hard time adjusting to the rules. First, I was tempted to address the Speaker; secondly, I thought that the Opposition members—I was on the government side—were very childish; but I became accustomed to that.

When it was first suggested to me that the Speaker of this House should be the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, I said "of course"; but then I was reminded by my experienced colleagues that I was not in the New Brunswick legislature or the House of Commons and that the role of the Speaker in the Senate is quite different in that he is appointed by the Prime Minister. Let us not kid ourselves by thinking it is simply an Order-in-Council appointment. I have lived under three or four Speakers since coming to the Senate, and those appointments were always made by the Prime Minister. Because of that, the Speaker of the Senate does not have the same authority as Speaker in the House of Commons, or, for that matter, a Speaker in any of the provincial legislatures. Because of that I have learned over the years that we are governed by the rules.

The rules are changed every once in a while. Should the Supreme Court of Canada decide that the eight senators who were sworn in behind closed doors have equal rights to those who were sworn in in public, then the government members will have a majority and the rules can be changed. Surely, honourable senators, until that is done we must abide by the rules.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Barootes: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Frith: I do not think that applies, so I cannot.

Honourable senators, I want to make something very clear and remind honourable senators that the question of privilege that occupied us last week, and on which the Speaker gave a ruling this afternoon, was started by Senator Ottenheimer. He launched that question of privilege on the basis of his understanding of the—

Senator Murray: The Speaker did not give a ruling on that this afternoon.

Senator Frith: Yes, he did.

Senator Murray: The Speaker ruled on a question of privilege raised by Senator Molgat.

Hon. Duff Roblin: It was not Senator Ottenheimer's question of privilege that was ruled on, it was Senator Molgat's.

Senator Frith: I am pleased to be corrected by another paragon on the other side. I have been wrong twice today; I am having a bad day, I suppose. I hope I will not be wrong three times when and if the Speaker makes his ruling.

The question of privilege that occupied us last week was raised by Senator Ottenheimer and put on the basis of asking His Honour to decide on a prima facie case.

What is before His Honour now is a motion —-

Senator Murray: And the point of order.

Senator Frith: Yes, and the point of order that was raised on that motion.

The motion does not start with the words "Pursuant to the practices of the House of Commons". It starts with the words "Pursuant to Rule 33".

Is it too much to ask, then, that when a motion that starts with the words "Pursuant to Rule 33", we look at Rule 33 before looking anywhere else?

If the motion starts with the words "Pursuant to Rule 33", let us see if it is pursuant to Rule 33. Let us see if it meets the tests.

• (1520)

What is the first test?

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen . . .

Senator Barootes: It has been decided!

Senator Frith: Is there any doubt? Can the record be changed? I stood on a point of privilege raised today on proceedings that arose today—

Senator Doody: Yesterday!

Senator Frith: No, based on the fact that something took place today that was a breach of an understanding of yesterday. So it was an event that took place today.

Let us review. Is there any doubt that a question concerning the privilege of a senator—I said I was rising on a point of privilege—has arisen? Is there any question that it has arisen?

An Hon. Senator: No.

Senator Frith: It has arisen. Then:

> . . . a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon—which is exactly what it says. It says that the following action be taken, so it is qualifying so far.

> —may be moved without notice . . .

It was moved without notice, and then the consequences follow:

> . . . shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration . . .

et cetera. Had a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, a committee or a senator arisen? Yes, it had arisen. Was a motion made calling upon the Senate to take action? Yes, it was. Was it properly moved without notice? Yes, it was properly moved without notice.

Why is there a need to turn to anything else? In all the time that I have been involved in this practice, I have never had a situation any more four-square within the black and white words of a rule or statute than this. I do not see there being any room to turn to any other practice. Perhaps points of privilege can be raised and motions put under some other practice, but that is not the point. This is made pursuant to a rule, and it is clearly in order under the terms of every word, letter and comma of that rule.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I hesitate to pursue the matter, but Honourable Senator Frith's submission is essentially that the rule, taken literally, without the application of anything further, is self-executing.

Senator Frith: If it is clear, yes. The interpretation rules in any court will tell you that. You do not have to go anywhere else if the words are clear. You may if the words were not clear, but they are clear.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I wish to make an—

Senator Bonnell: Brief!

Senator Ottenheimer: —accurate comparison of certain rules. I wished to listen to Senator Frith's remarks, so I was unable to scan our whole rule book. But in that brief period I was able to identify a few rules that are not immediately self-executing or operative without interpretation, modification, understanding or some limitation. As I say, in that brief period I located four examples, and I will refer to them briefly for comparative purposes.

The first is Rule 32, which says:

> A debate shall not be in order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

We all know from attendance at one day's Question Period that that rule is not applied without modification or interpretation.

Senator Guay: Privilege is different!

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Ottenheimer: Everything is different. Senator Frith referred to Rule 33, and I just referred to Rule 32. Another one that is different is Rule 20B on page 10, which says:

> A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

That is not an immediately self-executing rule of the Senate. There is an interpretation applied to it, otherwise there would be few questions. My esteemed friend, Senator Perrault, has been known to give the occasional preamble.

Senator Perrault: An explanatory operation!

Senator Ottenheimer: I am sure it was that, yes.

Senator Perrault: You are slow learners so we have to go over everything in detail.

Senator Ottenheimer: Rule 22:

> A motion or inquiry prefaced by a written preamble shall not be received by the Senate.

I am sure we have had inquiries preceded by preambles. I only have one more example because time did not permit a thorough reading of the rules. In any event, I cannot read my own writing with respect to it, but it is evident that the rules are not automatically, literally, immediately self-operative without interpretation, precedent and the surrounding relevant material. If that is the case with Rule 32 with respect to the preamble to a question not being permitted, I suggest that Rule 33 must be equally understood in its context.

Senator Thériault: Surely Senator Ottenheimer, who has had experience in another house, knows better than to try to make the point he has just made. The rules he cited are here for the protection of the Senate. To my knowledge it has never been proven that they are not operative. I am not saying that they are being put into operation every day, but he has not proven that they are not operative.

Senator Roblin: Question Period! Come again!

Senator Thériault: He has not proven that they are not operative.

Senator Roblin: Come again!

Senator Thériault: To my knowledge he has not tried, since he has been here, to make them operative. But that does not take away from another rule that is clear and seems so simple that it is not worth debating. Surely for once the Leader of the Government can eat a little humble pie and admit he is wrong.

Hon. Michael A. Meighen: Honourable senators, I would not wish to take an undue amount of your time, but I, along with the eight others who have come here, have now been sitting in this chamber for one day and a half listening, as Senator Ottenheimer has said, to the same debate, which is really a matter of our privileges as much as anyone else's.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1530)

Senator Meighen: We, surely, have as much right as anybody else to suggest that those privileges—our own—have been abused, as they have been as much as anybody else's privileges.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Hang around for awhile!

Senator Meighen: We received the same invitation as that extended to other honourable senators to become a member of this honourable body. It came from the same authority. We swore the same oath of allegiance. We swore the same oath of qualification. We entered this chamber and took our seats.

We heard today that the Clerk has reported that our qualifications have been accepted, that they are being published and that His Honour the Speaker has so reported to this chamber. What more, honourable senators, should we be required to do before we can take our part in the deliberations of this chamber?

Senator Doody: Nothing!

Senator Meighen: Surely, if our status is in any way in question, looking no further—in the absence of any clear direction perhaps in our rules—than to the House of Commons, where a similar situation arose after the last election, surely the procedure is that we can take our seats and participate.

It is the courts that will determine our status—not the Leader of the Government, not the Leader of the Opposition, and not, with great respect, you, Your Honour. And if the courts rule that we are not eligible to sit in this chamber—which I cannot conceive of—then, of course, we will be obliged to withdraw.

In the meantime, however, can the people of this country expect that the Senate should fold its arms and do no further business?

Senator Perrault: We are not suggesting that!

Senator Meighen: Can the people of this country expect that we should continue for an indeterminate period of time not to do the nation's business but, rather, to haggle over questions of privilege, and mainly our own privilege as senators of this honourable chamber?

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we have been here for two days now. For two days we want to take part in the debate. I would respectfully ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule on that point and to allow us to take full part into the deliberations.

If it was ever decided elsewhere that we have no rights, which seems unbelievable to me, it goes without saying that we will comply without opposition nor hesitation. Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker . . .

[English]

Honourable senators, we eight find it distressing and, I must say, humiliating not to be participants in the deliberations of the Senate of Canada!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems that someone in the chamber has started the debate on my motion, so I assume that it is in order.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, returning to the point of Senator Ottenheimer, he discussed Standing Order 32 in comparison to rule 33. In Standing Order 32, after reference to the brief explanatory remarks, one sees that the operative verb is "may be made". Rule 33 states:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall . . .

Turning to Part I of the Rules of the Senate, under the heading "Interpretation", it states:

> "shall" is to be construed as imperative, and "may" as permissive;

It seems to me that the points made by Senator Ottenheimer were specious, although he himself is not a specious person. I attribute this to a temporary and involuntary lapse on his part, because he is the most estimable, agreeable, wonderful person, like the eight who have come here and who properly feel uncomfortable about this situation. It is not of their doing, nor do we enjoy putting them to any discomfort personally.

Honourable senators, I should now like to continue the remarks I began earlier.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

> Since it has already been estalished that the Queen of Great Britain could not intervene any more in Canadian affairs, and that the Governor General had become her personnel representative only as Queen of Canada, one can argue that section 6 is no longer valid probably since 1931, certainly since 1982.
> If section 26 is no longer valid, what latitude did Her Majety have with regard to its application?

This is a very important discussion.

> Assuming that section 26 is still valid, we must look closely at the parameters within which Her Majesty could act. Section 26 gave her plenty of room to maneuver because it says . . .

● (1530)

[English]

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, on a point of order, the honourable gentleman is completely out of order. In his speech he is making constant references to the Queen. Reference 316 of Beauchesne, at page 103, states:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in S.O. 35, it has been sanctioned by usage that a Member, while speaking, must not:
> (g) use the Sovereign's name for the purpose of influencing a debate;

The honourable senator is completely out of order in discussing the Sovereign in this house.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, first, I have not used the Sovereign's name, I have only used the title. Second, I have not used it to influence a debate. I am reporting the views of a constitutional expert who is interpreting section 26 of the British North America Act, which mentions the Sovereign. There is no way is which one can discuss section 26 of the British North America Act without discussing the central person to this section, who is the Sovereign.

I will continue.

[Translation]

> Her Majesty's decision was not a simple ministerial act performed at the request of the Canadian Government; the Queen had to judge the opportunity of this act and this judgment is part of her very own sphere in which the government does not interfere. The Queen had to follow precedents, if any, and, if not, to set one in motivating the act.
> We are unaware of any precedents with regard to Section 26, as it was never enforced. However, one important precedent exists in Great Britain pertaining to the House of Lords, but it must not be used in Canada, given the first whereas clause in the preamble of the 1867 Constitution Act.

He quotes the whereas:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom:
> Therefore, the Senate is to Canada what the House of Lords is to the United Kingdom. The only differences are that no senators are hereditary and that the number of senators is set in the Constitution, while the number of Lords is not.
> Two sovereigns contributed to the establishment of this precedent: Edward VII and George V, in 1910. What was the situation then? In 1909, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lloyd George, introduced a budget in the House of Commons. This budget was of populist inspiration and aimed at taxing the wealthiest people more heavily. It was passed by the House of commons, but rejected by the House of Lords, a non-elected body whose members did not represent anyone. Faced with the rejection of its budget, the Asquith government, seized this opportunity to assert the power of the House of Commons and called a general election which was naturally weighted against the House of Lords.
> Everybody thought that the electorate, having to choose between a populist budget and the aristocratic House of Lords, would not hesitate. They were wrong. Asquith's Liberals hardly retained power, to do so they had to conclude an alliance with the Irish members who, in return, demanded Home Rule for Ireland, nothing less than the reinstatement of the Irish Parliament which had been abolished in 1801, when Ireland was united with Britain.
> Home Rule for Ireland was unthinkable, because the House of Lords had been systematically blocking every such bill for about thirty years. To have the Home Rule Bill pass through the House of Lords, either the number of Lords had to be greatly increased or their power had to be diminished. Since the government wanted to diminish the power of the House of Lords not only for the Home Rule Bill, but for all bills, they presented the Parliament Act allowing for a suspensive veto of one month for money bills, and of three sessions for all other bills. The Parliament Act seemed doomed in the House of Lords.
> Therefore, the Asquith government asked the King to add enough new non-hereditary members to the House of Lords to ensure the Parliament Act would be passed. Edward VII refused, informing Asquith that he would only do so if the Asquith governement were reelected at the next general election and repeated its request.
> Asquith requested the dissolution of both Houses and another election was called. For all practical purposes, the situation was the same as it was after the election held a few months earlier. Asquith managed to remain in power but was still dependent on the support of the Irish members. Edward VII died and was succeeded by George V. The Asquith government had the Parliament Act passed by the Commons, and the House of Lords, duly informed by George V that he would appoint all the peers required to adopt this measure, passed the bill.
> The situation in Great Britain was far more serious than the present situation in Canada. A non-elected House had completely rejected the entire budget of a government that had a majority in the House of Commons. This was unprecendented. Nevertheless, the King refused to intervene unless a general election was called.
> In Canada, the Senate is blocking a bill that is very important to the government, Bill C-62, which introduces the goods and services tax, but the situation is a minor one compared with the situation in 1910. Why did the Queen grant the Mulroney government what her great-grandfather denied the Asquith government and Lloyd George? Politicians come and go, but institutions remain.

Before a court, this kind of argument could be interpreted by the judges to mean that Section 26 of the British North America Act is no longer operative and that the eight distinguished individuals who were recently appointed should not have been appointed. Consequently all bills on which they voted would be voted on unlawfully.

There is also the weight of the House of Commons where New Brunswick's representation is now unconstitutional. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Mr. Speaker, are you proposing to rule now?

The Hon. the Speaker: I will take the matter under advisement and rule tomorrow.

Senator Molgat: Before you do, I wonder if I might add a few points. Quite frankly, I hate to do so in light of the extended debate. I am sure the new senators wonder what we are doing. Nevertheless, because of the present circumstances in Canada, the matter before us is indeed of substantial importance and we cannot escape it.

I do not blame Senator Ottenheimer in the least for the problem we are dealing with. I am sure his intentions were absolutely proper. However, when he presented his statement on privilege last week, the first thing he did was to read to us two sections of Beauchesne to set the stage for what he was about to say.

The problem is that he was importing into this house a rule that does not belong in this house, and with very good reason. This house does not want to give Mr. Speaker authority, because he is not elected by senators. The Speaker in this house is appointed by the Prime Minister of the country and traditionally this house has refused to give its Speaker the same authority as that given to the Speaker in the House of Commons. It is not the fault of the Speaker who is sitting here now, or of his predecessors. It is because of the composition of this house and the whole background and history of the Senate. We were not prepared to give the Speaker authority because he was not our choice. That is the basis of it.

Two years ago I presented a bill asking that we have an elected speaker. It was talked out and never passed. I give notice now that I will reintroduce the bill, because I think that is the direction in which we have to go.

Senator Ottenheimer, I am sure with the very best of intentions, introduced into the debate that day procedures from the House of Commons. Quite frankly, we should have stopped him at that time. We should have said to Senator Ottenheimer that we understood he came from another house with another background and that those were his rules, but here in this house there is a clear rule. The reason for the rule here, and the reason for not asking the Speaker to make a finding of prima facie is quite clearly because we think senators should decide that. That is why Rule 33 is written in the manner it is written in. If a senator feels it is a point of privilege, he or she rises and explains the point of privilege and then the other senators determine whether or not there is a point of privilege. It is the senators who decide, and that is the history of this house.

Senator Ottenheimer read sections of Beauchesne and all the rest of it. We only deal with Beauchesne and with what goes on in the other house when we do not have a clear rule. Rule 33 is a very clear and direct rule. However, Senator Ottenheimer asks us to look at the other rules, for example, those relating to oral questions.

Senator Ottenheimer, it is true that we do not follow our own rule in that regard, but we do not go to those of the House of Commons. Those of the House of Commons are very strict rules. We have our own procedures, practices and past experience.

We have to set aside what Senator Ottenheimer stated, set aside what Senator Frith stated, set aside what was stated in the speeches and return to our own rules and precedents. I am prepared to live by the precedents of this house. I say to those senators who feel that there is an extended debate this week, you should have been here last week. The shoe was on the other foot. If you find the speeches repetitious this week, you should have listened to them last week. I invite senators to read Hansard.

To return to the point I raised, we are moving in a bad direction by importing a rule that we do not need and which we have not had in the past. Let us go back to our own precedents and rules and base it on that.

• (1550)

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, last week I could see the people on the opposite side salivating, almost like the wolf in Little Red Riding Hood.

Senator Perrault: Keep it non-political!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: Today they seem to have a different attitude.

As I listened to their presentations on the point of privilege, it was quite obvious that they objected to certain members being admitted to the Senate. That was going to detract from their own privileges. Rule 33 states:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate . . . has arisen—

In my opinion, it has arisen and has been decided; the ruling is here. That finishes it for us. I look at rule 47(1), and exactly the same issue arose today concerning the eight senators. In fact, their names have been read into the record. Rule 47(1) states:

> A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative—

I submit that it is exactly the same situation, and, therefore, the decision that has been made by the Honourable Speaker shall hold, namely, that rule 47 is operative and that rule 33 has already been cleared.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I should like to rise in partial response to the honourable gentlemen and ladies who have recently entered this chamber and bring to the government's attention—and to the attention of all honourable senators—a serious problem relating to the consequences of proceeding with matters in this chamber, as well as matters on the other side, if some serious question arises with respect to the constitution of both this and the other House.

Senator Murray: Oh!

Senator Grafstein: I see that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is smiling. Let me, with some seriousness, address an issue that was brought to my attention by learned counsel today. I asked—as have all of us—legal counsel and others about the consequences of proceeding if there is some taint, either in this place or the other place, with respect to legislation or votes that might go forward. I am sure that if all honourable senators would seek their own counsel on this, they might also find that there are several serious consequences.

The first one, in particular, is the consequence of the government's proceeding with a tax measure. The tax measure carries, and a court subsequently finds that the tax measure is ultra vires because of the Constitution of this place or the other place. The dire consequences for all taxpayers in Canada is the following—and this took place in British Columbia.

Air Canada proceeded to challenge legislation introduced in British Columbia to put a tax on airplane gasoline. The Supreme Court of Canada this year found that that tax measure was ultra vires. However, the consequence was that the Supreme Court of Canada found that Air Canada could not collect from the government the money it had paid under a law that was ultra vires—that is, unconstitutional.

The consequence here could be that the Canadian taxpayers could, in due conscience, proceed to pay tax pursuant to tax measures passed either in this place or the other place, and a year or six months from today it could be found that this house or the other was not properly constituted and the tainted tax measures, as a result, were unconstitutional. Each Canadian taxpayer would then be in a position of not being able to claim back the moneys that he had paid. That surely is a serious question for all citizens of this country.

An even more serious question concerns another pending vote that we have, which deals with the most controversial legislation we will see in this decade—not on the GST but the abortion legislation, which includes criminal consequences. Think, honourable senators, as I have tried to do in the last few days, of what will happen if subsequently such a measure comes forward, as it will; if such a measure is proceeded with, as it will be; if a vote is taken, as will be done; and subsequently a court finds that this house was controverted due to its constitution.

Senator Murray: I thought that you were going to call for a vote on that!

Senator Grafstein: Think of the consequences and the concern that every Canadian citizen would have with respect to law and order in this country; respect for peace, order and good government.

I raise this not as a whimsical matter. I am very sympathetic toward the honourable gentlemen and ladies who have recently entered this place and, more specifically, toward the comments made by my friend to the far right.

Senator Murray: That is Senator Meighen.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Grafstein: This is a matter that should be of concern not only to members on this side but to all members and to the Honourable Speaker.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, if I may reply to that point of law.

I was listening very carefully what Senator Meighen just said. If the question of the unconstitutionality of a nomination may be raised following a report by the Clerk of the Senate, which is an obvious proof that a senator is sitting here in a perfectly legal way, well, the same thing could be said for every senator here.

I find surprising that a question of privilege can be raised immediately following a ruling made by the Speaker of this House.

Rule 33 says: ". . . has arisen". What happened since the Speaker made his ruling? It is simply that some senators here do not aggree with it. One cannot raise a question of privilege because one does not agree with the Speaker's ruling. The Speaker made his ruling. Now it is this House's ruling. On that point, I think I agree with what the Governement leader has just said, that it is a repetition of the same argument which we heard yesterday following the Speaker's ruling. I think this behaviour is contrary to the rules of this Chamber.

About the point of law that has just been raised, you ask: what would happen if we find out in six months that eight senators are seating here illegally? This would not invalidate their work. What they would have been doing would be absolutely valid. There is such a thing in law as the principle of de facto. Should there be ever a judicial hearing, the courts would deliver a verdict in due time.

I say once again that the eight senators have the right to sit in this Chamber. The eight senators who have been appointed, and we have the report from the clerk, sit here in conformity with the law and the Constitution. I think we must get on with the debate on the matters before us. If later on the courts give a ruling, then it would be another matter. It would be another debate.

I will also reply briefly to Hon. Senator Gigantès who read at length from a long newspaper article. The person who wrote the article says section 26 is null and void. To prove his point, he goes back one hundred years and re-writes the section to show what it means. There is no stopping history! The Queen of the United Kingdom was our Queen in 1867. She is today the Queen of Canada.

The Governor General who was the representative of the British government in the past represents now the Queen of Canada. Section 26 cannot be changed. It remains what it is. Everybody knows, and the Supreme Court said so many times, that constitutional law is constantly evolving. The Constitution cannot be interpreted today as it was in 1867. Keep playing that game and we will revert to colonialism. We will revert to the status we had in 1867. How preposterous.

The eight senators that have been appointed are Canadian senators. They are not "British" senators:

Senator Frith: You are substantiating my motion. Keep up the good work, Senator Beaudoin.

Senator Beaudoin: You started the debate.

[English]

Senator Grafstein: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Beaudoin: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: Would the honourable senator not agree that it would be in the national interest to have the question of uncertainty put to rest as quickly as possible?

Senator Beaudoin: No. I disagree strongly on that point, senator. I have not seen thus far any opinion from any expert in this country which has clearly demonstrated that section 26 is obsolete. If there is such opinion, I would like to see it.

Even the article which the honourable senator opposite has quoted is not entirely affirmative. If it were, it is clear that it could not be said about section 26, "Okay, the Constitution is frozen at 1867. The Queen is not the queen of Canada." I regret to say that our history is there. The Queen is the Queen of Canada. The advisor to the Queen is the Prime Minister of Canada.

The Clerk says that the new senators qualify as to property, and that they have sworn the oath of allegiance. That is the end of it. You may go to the Supreme Court, but you will lose.

Senator Grafstein: The decisions of the courts are obviously difficult to predict. There appears to be serious divided opinion on this issue, not just in this place but in some of the regions represented by honourable senators. The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario are raising these serious issues. Those are uncontroverted facts. I see that the former Premier of the Province of New Brunswick is agreeing with me when I say that there are provinces which are contesting this matter. Thus, there is serious division in the country on important constitutional matters.

It is quite true, as the honourable senator has said, that it might be, in his view, clear. Obviously, it is not in others.

Since this place and the other place are now being held in some disregard in the country, would it not be in the national interest for the government, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to bring these matters to a head as quickly as possible, and to agree to a reference as quickly as possible so that provinces and individuals would not have to pursue their courses of action which might take months or years in the courts? Senator Beaudoin, as a distinguished Dean of Law, would you not agree that that would be in the national interest? In order to facilitate that, would you not impose upon your side to bring the matter forward? I am sure that this side of the Senate and the Opposition in the other place would concur in order that we could, in the national interest, bring these matters to a head. If we are wrong, that will be the end of it. However, if you are wrong, there are serious consequences.

Senator Beaudoin: I will add one last comment. When something is clear cut, there is no need to refer it to the court. If matters that are clear cut are referred to the court, we will always be before the courts. We make a reference to the Supreme Court when we have a doubt. We just do not have a doubt.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I should like to ask Senator Beaudoin a question. It is helpful to have the benefit of his professional advice.

In the memorandum prepared by the Library of Parliament, we are told that when the British North America Act was being prepared, Lord Carnarvon noted—

Senator Roblin: We have heard this about 15 times before.

Senator Stewart: Yes, but this afternoon we have the opportunity of having genuine expert guidance on its interpretation. I do not think we should let that opportunity slide by.

Senator Balfour: Are you being sarcastic?

Senator Stewart: If an honourable senator on the government side is questioning the credentials of Senator Beaudoin, I certainly do not concur with that honourable senator.

Senator Roblin: Come on, you can do better than that.

Senator Stewart: I take Senator Beaudoin quite seriously. I am asking a serious question on which he may be able to give us guidance.

Lord Carnarvon, we are told, noted two other conditions added by the delegates from British North America: that the appointments should be made by the Crown, rather than the Governor General, and that their number should not exceed six. He added that:

> The intervention of the Crown is to my mind a doubtful proposal: but it is designed to be a check upon popular feeling and the action of the Local Government and I do not see that we can take exception to it.

Those were his Lordship's words. They are, of course, not statute law.

I should like to turn now to the British North America Act, as it was then called. The scheme explained by Lord Carnarvon is embodied there. Provision is made in section 24 for the summoning of ordinary senators by the Governor General on the advice of the Prime Minister.

If we then turn to section 26 we find an entirely different procedure. Section 26, in part, reads:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit . . .

It is clear that different tests are being applied in the case of the senators to be summoned under section 26.

Nevertheless, Senator Beaudoin tells us this afternoon that, in effect, the two sections say the same thing. The Prime Minister advises; the Governor General summons. In both cases, there are limitations as to the numbers to be summoned; in both cases there are requirements as to where the senators may come from. The fact that the Act contains these two separate sections led me to believe that an attempt was made—and I believe a successful attempt—to ensure that there was, as Lord Carnarvon said, a desire that the Crown—which at that time menat the Queen as advised by Her British ministers—would exercise a check upon the Canadian Prime Minister. That is why we have the two sections and not one. That is my interpretation. I believe I see Senator Beaudoin giving a nod to that.

Senator Beaudoin says that now "the Queen" in section 26 means the Queen as advised by Her Canadian ministers. He said that yesterday and he repeated it emphatically today.

There are two quite distinct processes. The second process seems designed to achieve impartiality. I think Senator Beaudoin is correct when he says that "the Queen" now means the Queen acting on the advice of Her Canadian ministers. However, the intention of section 26—the manifest purpose of which is an appeal to an impartial body when there is an alleged stalemate between the ministers and the Senate—can no longer be achieved by reason of the changes to which Senator Beaudoin has made reference. Has section 26 become a limited version of section 24? I need assistance on that point, and I will listen carefully to Senator Beaudoin's reply.

Senator Beaudoin: We are debating a question of privilege and a point or order. I do not want to postpone the decision of the Speaker; on the contrary.

What I have to say has already been said. The only point I should like to make at this time is that the Supreme Court is interpreting the Constitution of Canada today; we are in 1990. The Constitution was written in 1867.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Senator Beaudoin: There are many cases which say that the Constitution is essentially an evolutionary document—a living tree. We could speak for hours and hours on that, but that is not the problem.

We have to interpret section 26 as it is today. It is clear-cut that it is the Queen in right of Canada, and the Prime Minister has the right to advise the Queen. He was justified to do that, having regard to the deadlock that we are facing here. We have to get rid of this deadlock. I have nothing else to say.

Senator Stewart: I understood Senator Beaudoin when he said that the first time. I should like to ask him another question.

Senator Beaudoin dealt with the prospect of this matter going to the courts. He said that there was no doubt in his mind as to how the judges in the courts would decide. However, he also said-and I believe I wrote down his words correctly—that if the court should rule otherwise, then there would be no serious de facto consequences.

• (1620)

Allow me to take up the point to which Senator Grafstein referred earlier. I refer to the abortion bill. Let us look forward to the situation, the quite possible situation, in which that bill passes this house with most government senators supporting the bill while most senators on this side vote against it. The bill may pass by reason of the votes of some of the eight new senators, the bill becomes the law of the land and goes into effect. Months pass and abortions are performed under the provisions of the bill. What remedies are available to the children who have been destroyed?

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Murray: Oh, come on! Sit down; enough of that!

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray dismisses it!

Senator Murray: I certainly do! This is nonsense!

Senator Stewart: He says that this is nonsense. He is not concerned. It is trivial; it is beneath his sublime dignity and importance!

Senator Murray: Sit down and save that stuff!

Senator Stewart: I am directing my question to Senator Beaudoin because he is an expert. I ask him: What is likely to happen? What remedies are available? I put the question to the honourable senator, not as a debating point but as one which is of deep concern to many people in the province that I represent in this chamber.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I would like to try to set Senator Grafstein's mind at ease with respect to the point he has raised. I suppose it is possible that a court may find that the appointment of the eight senators was improper. However, I believe that, given that they were duly sworn in and took the oath, a court would be loath to invalidate the acts of the legislative body. Let me give, as an example, the situation experienced by Manitoba. Manitoba came into Confederation on the basis that French would be used in the courts and in the legislature. In 1890, and again in 1916, the legislature invalidated the use of French—

Senator Gigantès: Shame!

Senator Everett: —both within the legislature and the courts—

Senator Roblin: And the schools.

Senator Everett: That is correct. Eventually, in the 1980s, the matter came before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court could have invalidated all the acts of the Manitoba legislature going back to 1890 had it chosen to do so. However, it did not. It validated those actions and merely said that the statutes that had been passed had to be translated into French.

I therefore suggest to honourable senators that if the court were to or find that the appointment of the eight senators was improper, it would in no way invalidate the actions of the Senate during that period because, indeed, those senators had been duly and properly sworn in. The courts are loath—and I defer to the expertise of Senator Beaudoin on this point—to frustrate the work of a duly constituted legislature. So, to address Senator Grafstein's point, I think he will find that the court will take a similar course, even if the action that is contemplated here were to succeed in the court.

Senator Grafstein: I have another question for Senator Everett.

Senator Doody: Give us a break!

Senator Grafstein: I raised the question, not only in terms of the legal consequences but also in terms of respect for law and order, respect fo4r peace, order and good government by the public. Is the honourable saying that the francophones of the province of Manitoba were happy and satisfied with that result?

• (1630)

Would it not have been better in those circumstances to deal with the matter—if they could have dealt with the matter—expeditiously? Would that not have been in the national and public interest? It is not only a question of legalities; it is a question of respect for law and order.

Senator Everett: Surely it is also a matter of a balance between the legality of the situation and the fact that legislatures have to perform. If I took your point, you could then frustrate any legislature in the country by merely creating some sort of action that would be brought to the courts and then saying that the matter is sub judice so that the legislature cannot deal with it.

Senator Murray: Exactly.

Senator Everett: That is an impossible situation and it is my guess—although I would not put money on it—that the courts would take the same view.

Senator Grafstein: I think, honourable senators, the question is not just one of immediate consequences; it goes to the whole question of clear and present danger. This is not a matter of triviality.

The purpose of the so-called "appointed eight" has to do with a matter of national consequence: a deadlock between two Houses. This is not a trivial matter of some negligence over the years; this is a matter of national debate between two Houses, and the allegation made by Senator Beaudoin is the apprehended or real deadlock between two Houses. It is not a trivial matter.

Clearly, you have to elevate this and segregate it from trivial cases and include it with cases of great national importance. If this is not an issue of great national importance, why is it that the government of the day called upon an extraordinary provision—that some senators say has never been used—in order to deal with this matter?

If this is not a matter of national emergency and national consequence, I do not know what is. It is not a trivial matter about which the courts may say, "We do not want to frustrate the will of the legislatures because there has been negligence on the part of some legislators and a particular matter was not proceeded with in a proper fashion." Surely it is beyond that?

Senator Everett: Believe you me, the question of whether or not French or English was spoken in the legislature and in the courts of Manitoba was not a trivial matter.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: Surely, senators, we are still paying for the consequences of that neglect.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: A Liberal government did that.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I think one of the important points in the decision that Mr. Speaker will have to make—and I do not envy his position, because such decisions have always to be dealt with during periods of great tension and they are hard to make—is that the events of last night are pertinent to any decision made. I regret that I do not have the printed transcript of the Debates, but I do have a copy of the blues. I should like to recite what went on last night. "At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed". There then follows:

> Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I was speaking when we adjourned for dinner, but I do not propose to proceed further.

Senator Murray: Right. That settles that little controversy.

Senator Molgat: The transcript then goes on as follows:

> Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have had a short discussion with Senator Doody, and we propose the following: That you grant me unanimous consent to withdraw my motion dealing with the strangers, and that we then adjourn until Wednesday, October 3 at 2 o'clock to give both sides an opportunity to confer with their caucus colleagues; and that we start a new session on Wednesday.
> Senator Doody: A new sitting?
> Senator Frith: A new sitting, not a new session, although that is a solution you might consider. We propose that we start a new sitting and that everyone's position, including the Speaker's, remain exactly the same; that we commence on Wednesday at 2 o'clock with the "strangers" motion no longer before us, gone, and that we continue from where we are at present. Senator Doody will make the motion, and I recommend that we support it.
> Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what Senator Frith has said is substantially correct, with the clarification he made about the new session. We at no time agreed to a new session, but we have agreed that we would adjourn this evening to return at 2 o'clock on Wednesday, October 3. I am not sure if Senator Frith has to make a formal withdrawal, but leave is granted.
> Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I would like, for the sake of clarification, to find out if the point of privilege will still be an issue tomorrow.
> Senator Frith: Yes; nothing is changed. Everything is exactly as it stands at this moment and will stay that way until Wednesday, October 3, except that the motion about the strangers has evaporated.
> The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?
> Hon. Senators: Yes.

Honourable senators, it is clear that the position—including the position of the Speaker—was to remain exactly the same and that the matter of privilege was still to be before the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Did I understand earlier from Your Honour that the Chair was reserving the decision on the point of order and the question of privilege before the House this afternoon? If Your Honour is reserving the decision, we could proceed to other matters on the scroll that we would like to attend to before 6 o'clock.

Senator Frith: Is Your Honour reserving?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

THE HONOURABLE JOSEPH-PHILIPPE GUAY, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the statutory or constitutional resignation of our colleague, Senator Guay, today brings to an end a distinguished political career spanning 35 years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I should say that the notes I am reading were prepared for Senator MacEachen who is unable to be here at the moment. I will read them, so please imagine that they are the words of Senator MacEachen. I will then add some comments of my own.

In 1955, Senator Guay was elected to St. Boniface Council, and went on to serve as Mayor of St. Boniface from 1960 to 1968. In 1968 he was first elected to the House of Commons and served the constituency of St. Boniface until 1978, when he was summoned to the Senate.

While a member of Parliament, Senator Guay served as Minister Without Portfolio, Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Minister of National Revenue.

Senator Guay's contribution to the Senate has been significant, as evidenced by his work on numerous committees such as the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages—which is of particular note—the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, where he served long and loyally, and membership in various parliamentary associations and friendship groups.

No one can accuse Senator Guay of not having a sense of humour. In February of 1973, the "scrappy Liberal" from St. Boniface entered the House with big white bandages on his face. Earlier in the week, two Nova Scotia Conservative MPs had hinted that Senator Guay might be in for a bit of a beating if he kept badgering a certain MP about the province's rusting heavy water plant. In fact, one of the eight divisional appointees, who have occupied so much of our attention—I cannot resist saying "my friend"—Michael Forrestall, suggested that Senator Guay take out insurance "against fattened lips and a flattened nose."

Senator Murray: Senator Forrestall?

Senator Frith: "My friend." When Senator Guay rose and stripped the bandages from his face and chin, he gave no explanation other than his famous huge grin.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

• (1640)

On a more serious note, Senator Guay has been a tireless advocate for unity. During an impassioned plea for Canadian unity in a visit to Portage Collegiate Institute, he was moved to tears as he tried to relate the feelings of Quebecers toward Canada. The same passion and commitment was brought to his work as Minister of State for Multiculturalism. Senator Guay argued that it is in Canada's interest to recognize the cultural richness which ethnic diversity brings. He was always able to see the broader picture. He said:

> There is a richness which Canada will always have, which not too many other countries have: multiculturalism in a bilingual country. It's got to work.

If I may make a parenthetical comment on Joe's remark about the richness that not too many other countries have, I had the occasion, along with two other members of Parliament, to spend about an hour and a half with the Dalai Lama when he was here. He mentioned how impressive he found the fact that we had a Department of Multiculturalism. This was, perhaps appropriately, just before Gerry Weiner was scheduled to see him. He, in his own way, said, "A separate ministry of multiculturalism? That is very good, very, very good."

Senator Guay has received a wide array of honours and awards. However, I would suggest that Senator Guay's most coveted reward is having had the opportunity to serve the people of his province and country for more than three decades.

Let me add just one more point—a personal one, although not individually personal to me. It is not hard to understand why Joe Guay has always been elected to whatever he wanted to get elected to. It is absolutely impossible not to like him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: However, the reason, I am sure, people elected him, is not just because they liked him. If you have spent any time with Senator Guay, you know that he is always telling you that he was home or that he was talking to someone and had been told this or that. One can imagine him, in his beloved St. Boniface, being greeted with a "Hi, Joe" on the street, in houses, in public places, or wherever he was, and I am sure he would always answer, but then he would start listening. Everyone knew that Joe Guay always listened to the people of Canada and the people he represented.

We are certainly going to miss you, Joe, but we are glad that the people of St. Boniface might get to see a little more of you, for which I am sure they will rejoice.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition just mentioned, our friend and Manitoba senator Joe Guay will be celebrating his seventy-fifth birthday tomorrow. He is therefore leaving us today and going back to his countless friends in Saint-Boniface.

It is at occasions such as this that you realize how time flies. Even though he is still hale and hearty for a man almost seventy-five years old, senator Guay's career nonetheless spanned thirty-five years, from 1955 to 1990, as senator Frith mentioned. Considering how demanding public life is, there is only one conclusion one can reach: that is absolutely remarquable!

Looking back at the course of senator Guay's political career, we realize that it is characterized by a great stability.

His political life can be divided in three approximately equal periods: twelve years at the municipal level, a little more than twelve years in this House and, in between, ten years or so in the House of Commons.

Everywhere he met success. He started by becoming mayor of Saint-Boniface and I was told that he was tremendously popular throughout his four mandates. In the Commons, he was Parliamentary Secretary and Chief Government Whip. Allow me to digress for a moment to point out that the job of the whip, as our friends senator Phillips and senator Petten can confirm, is one of the most difficult and demanding. The key to success is talent as a conciliator and a sense of humour. And senator Guay is really a master of these two skills (the typical iron hand in a velvet glove) which enabled him to fulfill his task with great success and honour, without making enemies of his opponents.

Senator Guay was then sworn in as Minister of State for Multiculturalism and later as Minister of National Revenue in the government of Prime Minister Trudeau. Here in the Senate, in addition to discharging his ministerial responsibilities for a while, he made an outstanding contribution to the proceedings of a number of parliamentary associations. He was also very active in many committees, and it is on this point that I should like to put some emphasis on his work as member of the Joint Committee on Official Languages. I have had the privilege of being co-chairman of that committee with our colleague Senator Corbin, and it is in that respect that I want to convey to Senator Guay my deep admiration for the work he did there.

Senator Guay has always been very proud of his Franco-Manitoban origin. Son of an old-stock family, he has always been the champion of the interests of French-speaking people outside Quebec and the relentless and courageous defender of their rights. As mayor, member of Parliament, minister or senator he has always been the dignified representative of the people in his community.

In conclusion, honourable senators, may I say to Senator Guay that we will miss him and that this chamber will never be the same without his ringing voice.

Honourable senator, on behalf of all members of the Senate, and more particularly my colleagues the Progressive Conservative senators, I can tell you that you have nothing but friends in this chamber. Personally and in the name of the Prime Minister and of all our government colleagues on this side I wish you a long and happy retirement.

[English]

If I may return for a second to the vernacular, let me tell my friend, Senator Guay, that we will miss him. We will miss very much the pleasure of his company in this place. I wish him goodbye and God's speed, au revoir, good luck and a happy retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: As a fellow Manitoban, I claim, perhaps inadvisedly, the right to speak next on this occasion to wish Senator Joe Guay well in the next stage of his career, as I am sure he still has a great deal to contribute.

Honourable senators, in spite of the fact that Joe Guay and I have been on opposite sides of this chamber, I have never found it difficult to work with him in the interests of our native province of Manitoba when in any way they were in question.

I think that reflects an aspect of Senate life which is often overlooked: that members with different political views can work together; and I am happy to have had the privilege of working with Senator Guay on matters that have affected our native province, perhaps not in unison, but certainly in close companionship.

I cannot speak for his work during his time in the House of Commons because I was not there, but I have to tell honourable senators that the record that has been recited today is, indeed, impressive. I am sure he fulfilled an important role in that House representing, as he did, the constituency of St. Boniface.

My reflections go back even further than that. Joe Guay and I were labourers in the same vineyard a long time ago. He and I were partners in work which we thought important that was going on in the province of Manitoba in the field of reform of municipal government at that time. He was the mayor of St. Boniface. I am sad to say that city no longer exists as a municipal entity. It has been absorbed, which I think is a great pity, because it did represent the Franco-Manitoban spirit and soul in our province. Joe Guay made sure that was the case when he was the mayor of St. Boniface.

We worked together on reforming the system of municipal government in that province. We worked together on problems of language, which were referred to earlier by Senator Everett, and we were able to make some changes, which I hope were advantageous. I found Joe Guay to be a splendid workmate and a good man to have on your side if you wanted to get things done. He was always able to bring intelligent, informed and non-partisan views to issues that were, in essence, political. He was always able to bring a wider view to bear on the subjects nabefore us.

I am particularly mindful of the fact that he spent five years in the Navy, and I have no doubt that it was certainly a formative experience in his life.

Joe Guay has been one of the keenest supporters of the Canadian idea, with all its ramifications respecting the two languages in our country.

I know that Senator Guay is a Knight of St. Gregory the Great which, in itself, speaks loudly for his stature in the community. We know that we are talking about a member of the Senate who has made his way through the institutions of politics and is able to look back upon a career of great importance. He has made contributions of no insignificant nature.

I particularly salute Senator Guay now for his work in the province of Manitoba when he and I were a great deal younger.

I wish my dear colleague, the Hon. Senator Joe Guay, good health, good luck and a long and happy life.

[English]

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will be brief.

I was already on Parliament Hill when Joe came here in 1968. Through a coincidence, his office was number 218 and mine was number 217, so I quickly became acquainted with Senator Guay.

I can say to all honourable senators today that the next four years were some of the most satisfactory years, in terms of personal relationshipsm, I have had with the members up and down the corridor. He was very agreeable. His staff and my staff shared a lot of common interests, and relations between us were carried out very amicably.

I should tell Senator Murray that Senator Guay advised me that he was born at 11:04 p.m. on October 4. So, it may be that he can vote up until 11:04 p.m. tomorrow, but that would be simply a technicality.

I will not go into the record of his achievements. Many senators have done that before me, but, on a personal note, it has been a great pleasure to work with Senator Guay. He takes with him a great record of achievement, not only respecting the positions he held, but in human relations.

Senator Guay is an extraordinary human being in the manner in which he can get along with people. We will miss Senator Guay and we wish him well in the future.

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable Senators, it is my pleasure to rise in this chamber to thank and congratulate our distinguished colleague from Manitoba who will be leaving the Senate today for a well-deserved retirement.

As some honourable members of this place will provide you with numerous examples of Senator Guay's accomplishments over a long career in public life, I will, for my part, concentrate on one aspect of his political action.

As co-chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, of which Senator Guay was a founding member and a regular member since, I can testify to the profound conviction of Senator Guay to this major component of our institution: official bilingualism and the protection of our linguistic minorities of official languages.

Senator Guay had a great love of Canadian history and the early history of Franco-Manitoba and its contribution to the Canadian development in the west. His knowledge of and dedication to the history of his people can only be exceeded by his love and devotion to them.

Himself a product of the fragile and proud Francophone community of St. Boniface, Senator Guay never forgot his roots. The long historical struggle of his community to preserve its linguistic and cultural identity has obviously shaped his determination and persistence in the defence and promotion of Canada's linguistic duality.

He is a great lover of Canada and its deep traditions, which now, more than ever, must come to the fore. It was upon the Joe Guays of the world that this country was built with room for everyone.

I must thank Senator Guay for inspiring me and assisting me in some of my difficult moments of being on the Official Languages Committee.

He will always have my endearing respect and the committee members and I shall miss him greatly.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honorable senators, Senator Guay's presence contributed to make this place more humane. It often needed to be humanized a little!

We will all miss Senator Guay's spontaneity, his good humour and even his roaring, healthy and fair outbursts, his sense of companionship, his good judgement and his merry loyalty.

Without him, and I beg to use Senator Murray's words, if I may for once, the Senate will never be the same. It will miss a proud representative of the Francophones outside Quebec, and an honest man. I have kept my comments short but they come from the heart.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I know a number of us were hoping for a miracle such as the one that occurred a few years ago. I recall it well. Two days before his official retirement, one of our colleagues discovered by some incredible miracle that he had an incorrect birth certificate. Not only did he have an incorrect birth certificate; fortuitously it listed him as being two years younger than he was supposed to be.

Senator Murray: It was the other way around.

Senator Perrault: That is right. It was the other way around. He thought he was 75, but his birth certificate said he was 73. He brought this joyous news to me, and I acknowledged that that was one of those rare miracles that occur from time to time. He said he still had the nursemaid who looked after him the day he was born, who was around 98. We were hoping that that miracle would occur again; that lightning would strike and Joe would produce a birth certificate listing him as 65 instead of 75. That has not occurred.

However, I want to say that British Columbians will miss Joe Guay. His reputation goes far beyond the boundaries of Manitoba. Joe Guay is a senator who gives politics a good name. Those of us who have been around for a few years agree that in politics there is nothing wrong with having a heated difference of opinion with the party on the other side of the aisle, but one must maintain one's perspective and sense of humour, and have the capacity to forgive any insults, real or imagined, when you walk out of the chamber.

I am sure Senator Flynn misses this day. Joe was something of a speech terminator. With his well-developed baritone voice, he would have done well at the Metropolitan Opera had he chosen another career, but he was able to interject a remark that would stop Senator Flynn in his tracks. He would recognize Senator Guay and then, of course, a discussion would ensue.

Senator Frith: Discussion is one word for it!

Senator Perrault: That is one way to describe it. Senator Guay gave politics a good name because he had a zest and a joy about him that is necessary for survivors. He always put his people first.

In coming to public life, some people immediately want to immerse themselves in the problems of the world. They feel as if they are speaking in a world dimension and that they are all natural diplomats. One's first responsibility is to look after one's people, and that is what Joe has done consistently, as stated so eloquently by Senator Roblin a few moments ago. No matter how heated the battle, he has put passion in this place, and he has always been a good friend to us, regardless of on which side of the chamber we sat.

I have been associated with Senator Guay on many projects designed to help this country, as have members of the other party, and we have invariably found him to be a colleague who always puts the interests of the country first. We will miss him, and I still nurse the remote hope that a birth certificate will show up that will enable him to stay among us. If not, let us create the post of senator emeritus so that he may continue to give us his good, earthy advice on a continuing basis.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I would like to take a few minutes on behalf of my good friend Joe Guay. I met Joe back in 1968 when we were both backbenchers in the Trudeau government. Then we were both promoted to the Cabinet—Senator Guay to National Revenue and I as the Minister of Small Business. I think my softball team even beat yours, Joe. We have always been good friends and worked hard together on some of the committees. We tried to make Parliament as much fun as possible. Joe always tried to make Parliament fun. We can become awfully serious and caught up in our own importance in this place, but Joe had a good way of keeping things down to earth and making serious situations more human. He is a decent, caring person and I know we will all miss him.

In listening to previous comments about his baritone voice, I am reminded of many incidents in the House of Commons. The timing always had to be right, and then Joe would say "What about the heavy water, Bob?" He always knew when to say the right thing for the occasion.

Joe, as your seatmate for the past while, I will miss the conversations we had and the advice you have given me on a number of occasions. Good luck to you and your family, and I hope you have a long and happy retirement.

When I found out a few days ago that Senator Guay was coming so close to retirement, it did not seem right. You do not look like you are reaching 75. I guess the birthdays do come around, unlike Senator Williams who found an extra couple of years before he retired. Among our people birth dates were difficult to record in the early days. That is true. We never knew my mother's real birth date, and the same thing happened in the case of Senator Williams.

It is not commonly known, but Joe told me one day that he is related to Louis Riel. Perhaps that is where he gets his feistiness. We recall the feisty and combative nature of Louis Riel, and Senator Guay may have had some of that passed on to him. Joe, I wish you good luck and good health.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I want to say just a few words, although I realize that after all those speeches, everyone must be feeling very thirsty.

Joe Guay has been my seat mate in the Senate for at least five years. I will not repeat all the words of tribute that have already been said, but I can vouch for his personality and his generosity. He is frank and forthright.

He is a good, pleasant and inventive speaker who knows how to entertain his audience and has the common touch. He served the community of St. Boniface well, before going on to the federal government.

I personally met him in the Town of Mount Royal about 25 years ago when the two towns were twinned. He had come to visit our mayor, Redgie Dawson. We were introduced and we had a great evening. He offered me a Red River cart, which I still have. He reminded me at the time that my Western cousins (Senator Marchand also referred to this) used this means of transportation which could float and be taken apart every night to make shelters when people were moving.

Senator Marchand said Joe was probably related to Louis Riel. Of course, in that part of the world everybody is related, like in our parishes in the Province of Quebec. This is not new.

I went to visit, and as far as I am concerned, Louis Riel is a very distant relative, but we have a common ancestor who stayed in the province of Quebec. So we are the Riels from Quebec, and I suppose that is how I am an even more distant relative of Joe's!

I must mention the day I went to Winnipeg and St. Boniface. Of course I visited the grave of Louis Riel, across from the cathedral that burnt to the ground several years before. I saw that the next gravestone bore the name "Guay". Joe Guay told me the monument marked his grandfather's grave.

We have been neighbours in the Senate but his grandfather will go into eternity next to Louis Riel. I hope we meet in heaven, Joe, where we will have plenty of time to talk about "old times" in the Senate.

[English]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise to speak briefly in tribute to Senator Guay. I am probably the only one in this chamber who has an association with Joe Guay that goes back to the early 1960s in municipal politics in greater Winnipeg, where he served, as Senator Roblin said, with distinction as the Mayor of the City of St. Boniface.

In those days of 13 area municipalities there were many mayors, but not many like Joe Guay. Indeed, he had a reputation for getting things done. There were always complaints about how things got done in the municipalities that comprise Winnipeg and they always referred to doing things the way they were done in St. Boniface. Joe Guay gave that kind of leadership to his community.

Honourable senators, as I have said, I have a long association with Senator Guay. We have spent many hours talking about the old friends we both had in those days—some with us still, some not—and that has been a great joy to me. I know the kind of pride Senator Guay has brought to his family and to his community. He has had a distinguished career as a mayor, as a member of the House of Commons, and then, of course, as a senator here in the Senate.

I say to you, Joe Guay, and to Mrs. Guay, who has had to endure another long, difficult day as the spouse of a politician: I wish you a long, happy and healthy retirement. It has been a pleasure to serve with you, Joe.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, there is an aspect to Joe Guay that you may not know of, and that is Joe Guay the coach.

I arrived here with two handicaps for the life of a senator. One is that I was—and in many ways still am—a journalist, and we believe in the peculiar myth that we must comfort the afflicted and afflict the comfortable. The other is that I was brought up by my father to think that the "comfortable to be afflicted" are Conservatives. He told me that Conservatives have black hearts because their hearts are wallets.

Let me say immediately that, to my great surprise, I have found sitting opposite many Conservatives whom I liked very much. I am surprised, but they are admirable and kind people. However, they are on the other side and I have had occasion to stick-handle past them—not very successfully, but that is not Joe Guay's fault.

Senator Guay took me under his wing at the beginning, when I first arrived here, and told me about the moves of the other people on both sides of the house. He said that this particular person's bark was worse than his bite, that that other person was really a sweet guy, that yet a third one had a very thin skin and I would enjoy getting under it, and these remarks applied to people on both sides of the house.

I think Senator Guay took off some of my rough edges. If he did not take off all of them, it is not his fault. I want to say that when one comes into a new situation, one appreciates having the generous help of someone like Joe Guay. I will always remember him with affection.

[Senator Riel.]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have known Joe Guay since he became an alderman in 1955, when I would appear before the council. Joe and I crossed swords many, many times. Although he was a terribly good attender, I was always happy on the few occasions when he could not be there. Indeed, I would know when he was in attendance because I could hear his voice from out on the parking lot. Senator Guay has always made his points forcibly. You never have to wonder what it is Joe is thinking or what side he is taking; he takes a side and that's all there is to it.

Senator Guay was four times Mayor of St. Boniface.

Senator Roblin: Unbeatable.

Senator Everett: He went into federal politics the hard way. He actually took on a sitting minister, contested the nomination, won that nomination, went on to be re-elected three times, then to be Whip and then to be minister. Honourable senators, there is no one in politics that I have found to be more forthright and tough to deal with, but essentially fair.

Senator Guay dedicated himself to the world of politics. He was five years in the navy and he also, incidentally—and nobody has mentioned this—ran a shoe store in St. Boniface for many, many years. Had he dedicated himself to the navy the way he did to politics, he would have been an admiral, and had he dedicated himself to the shoe business the way he did to politics, we would never have heard of Tom Bata!

• (1720)

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Senators, what a wonderful age we live in: an automated machine can do the work of 50 men, a computer can do the work of 500 men, but the machine has not yet been invented that can do the work of one extraordinary man like Joe Guay. One would think that the accomplishments of his career were achieved by a committee of many men.

As Senator Everett stated, Senator Guay started out as a salesman selling rubber boots. However, whether he was selling rubber boots or selling Canada, he was always just that: a great salesman; perhaps Canada's greatest salesman.

Senator Guay's most redeeming feature, I found, was that he was very quick, as a warm, decent, caring human being, to extend the hand of friendship and fraternalism regardless of party, or even if one were not a member of a party. Joseph, I wish to add my voice. We all appreciate that friendship and wish you success and happiness in a well-deserved retirement.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I do not want to presume on your time, but I do wish to say to the retiring senator that I, too, will miss him, although I have not been associated with him for a couple of years. When I entered the other place, Joe was not far behind me. As has been said here this afternoon, he brought a warm, adaptive feeling and a sincerity that made me feel very welcome in that chamber, although I had been there two years before.

Honourable senators will realize that Joe was a sailor. I rise in part because most of my life I, too, have been one, and my sons are sailors. I have a deep admiration for anyone who not only followed the sea but who served through the sea. To me, it explains the depth that Joe brought to everything. He served selflessly, together with his brother. Indeed, two of his brothers gave their lives in the RCAF during World War II.

Those who served with Joe in the RCN—and there are many still around who remember him, in much the same way as honourable senators have remembered him here today—would want me to say that it was a good job and it was well done.

So also have your years been in municipal politics in Manitoba, in St. Boniface, Joe, and your career in the House of Commons. You were among the first of the multi-cultural ministers in our country, which I believe was a very wise move on the part of government. It speaks well that in his tenure as Minister of State for Multi-Culturalism, Joe Guay so laid down and firmed up the groundwork that indeed that portfolio continues to be very much a part of our structure today.

Honourable senators will permit me to remind them, and perhaps Joe will not be too mad at me if I recall that some of his great contributions were to his family and to his church. He is a Master of one of the orders of the church, has also been decorated by the Holy Father, and is a Knight of St. Gregory. He has been decorated by the Queen. Now Mrs. Guay can have him back home in Manitoba and the family will be the beneficiaries. St. Boniface will welcome you back, Joe. As your colleagues of some years here in this chamber have stated, you will be missed. As one from the other place, I will miss you indeed.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Did you call my name, Your Honour? It is not always easy to hear you from this distance. Anyway, honourable senators, although it is late, I wish to join previous speakers who paid tribute to Senator Guay.

I am doing it, of course, because of the fine relationship that we had ever since I came to the Senate, notwithstanding, if I may add, the rare occasions when his particularly loud and perfectly audible remarks gave me the impression that he did not totally agree with what I was saying in this chamber.

As a francophone senator representing Quebec, here in the Senate, I want first of all to pay tribute to his role on the Joint Committee on Official Languages, which was also mentioned by Senator Wood.

For years, I witnessed his hard work and the excellence of his accomplishments on that committee. His distingins had services had a profound influence on the implementation of the linguistic policies contained in the two successive Official Languages Acts that we had.

His accomplishments had an even more profound meaning for the Franco-Manitoban minority of which he was, for many years, one the most distinguished representatives and leaders. Senator Guay, we could have paid tribute to you for numerous other reasons, many of which were mentioned today. The one I referred to is highly important to me and that is why I wanted to emphasize it on this day. In conclusion, I want very simply to wish you and your family many years of accomplishments in the new career that you are starting today.

Hon. Roméo Leblanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, on the day of his retirement, I can pay tribute to our friend, Senator Guay, on many grounds. Of course, we were colleagues in the House of Commons, we were colleagues in the Cabinet and, most of all, we were brothers, as members of the French-speaking community outside Quebec. I have a vivid memory of the emotion I felt when I visited the Red River Valley and Louis Riel's grave for the first time.

[English]

But for the new senators, contested or otherwise, who perhaps are wondering what is this liturgical ceremony in which we appear to be participating, I would like to say a word about Senator Guay's role as a member of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy. It is not a dramatic committee and it does not put out great controversial reports. Some four or five years ago, that committee proclaimed the very important principle that all senators were appointed equal, and I am not referring to the present situation. The Internal Economy committee, with people such as Senator Guay and all those who served quietly and modestly, has improved the lot of every senator sitting in this institution.

Senator Guay was always faithful at meetings. He participated strongly, especially at the time we studied the Estimates for the subsequent year, and he would not hesitate to lift the corner of any veil if he thought there was information there that the senators of the committee should know about.

Senator Guay, you and Senator McElman will always stand out in my eyes as chairmen of that committee, Senator McElman quietly sitting on the right and Senator Guay not so quietly sitting on the left of the rear seats. Your voice was heard, and not only that, your advice was often followed. Thank you very much for having served our committee so faithfully.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honorables senators, being a comrade, a personal friend and a neighbour of his at the East Block, I would like to salute senator Guay for the last time. Many things have been said of him, and I won't repeat any of it.

I only wish to mention his obsession with the work well done, not tomorrow nor the day after, but right now. For example, there is the question of bilingualism which has been the subject of much discussion. I know of his sense of dedication, it has been said and I won't repeat it. I would like also to mention that he opposed strongly the construction of a dam on the Garrison River in Manitoba, which flows through Manitoba and in the United States. We know that the Americans have proposed the construction of a dam which would flood thousands of square kilometers of Manitoban lands. Joe is categorically opposed to that scheme.

He asked many questions in the Senate on this matter. I remember one day, three or four years ago, when I entered into the Senate. He occupied the same seat as now. I stopped at his seat and said: Joe, I just heard on the radio that the Americans have decided to build a dam. Last night, after sunset, they went and started to build it, with the result that the river has already risen 17 feet.

It takes three or four years to build such a dam. Anyway, Joe thought they had started it the night before and, being so indignant, he left in a great hurry to check if, during the night, the Americans had really built a dam worth $50 million or so on the Garrison River.

I am telling you this to illustrate how he was dedicated and obsessed when he was fighting for a particular cause.

Clearly, we will all miss senator Guay in the Senate. As for me, in particular, I will miss seing him on the second floor of the East block.

I wish him and his wife, who is here in the Hall, and their family a very happy retirement.

● (1730)

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words of tribute to Joe Guay. His military service was alluded to by two or three of my colleagues, but they failed to record some of his work on veterans affairs, with which we were associated over the years.

I entered the House of Commons with Joe in 1968, and we were immediately assigned to the subcommittee on Veterans Affairs. Through all those years there was an impartiality that one should jealously guard in this Parliament, when we see the degree of hostility associated with the debates these days. That was one committee, Joe, where there was no such thing as party affiliation. Everyone was working for a common cause, namely, the veterans of Canada.

That should be recorded, honourable senators. I pay tribute to you, Joe, for that assistance to me and our work together. I wish you well in the future.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I stand before you as a senator and a francophone outside Quebec, who is somewhat troubled, and I intend to take a few minutes to talk about our friend, Senator Joe Guay. I am troubled because I have these feelings of ambivalence.

You all know Joe Guay as a man who is known for his forthright speech. I am sure he would be disappointed if I did not live up to my reputation as someone who is equally forthright. I promise you I will not prolong the sitting until midnight, which might otherwise lead to a motion to clear the Chamber of strangers!

Part, of me is delighted to see a Liberal senator leave this Chamber, allowing the supremacy of the House of Commons to triumph or helping to confirm that supremacy, but on the other hand, I am sad that this senator should be Senator Joe Guay.

It has been said repeatedly that Joe Guay became a valiant member of the Canadian French-speaking community, after he had proved his mettle and made an invaluable contribution to the Franco-Manitoban community.

[Senator Robichaud.]

During my first years in this Chamber, I had a chance to sit with the senator from St. Boniface, and I know he continued to sit on committees and outside committees. I remember some very eloquent images of Senator Joe Guay in the area of official languages. In his own way he brilliantly defended the interests of all Manitobans and those of the minority of Franco-Manitoban community, and we owe him a great deal.

I wish to join my other colleagues in extending our sicnere wishes for good health and a well-deserved retirement. I earnestly hope he will consider another career so that he can continue to serve the community. I am sure he will find a way, because Senator Joe Guay has shown, throughout his life, that the duties of a mayor, a member of the House of Commons or a senator were not a hardship but a real pleasure. I therefore wish him many good years serving the Manitoban and Canadian community.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I, too, want to say bon voyage to Senator Joe.

Senator Olson noted that he had already been on the hill for a while when Senator Guay arrived. So had I. I had the pleasure of knowing Joe and working with him in a different capacity than others in this chamber, because when Joe arrived in 1968 I was a journalist in the Parliamentary Press Gallery with F.P. Publications. The flagship newspaper of that organization was the Winnipeg Free Press. Naturally, the new member of Parliament became, thankfully, one of my sources.

One of the delightful characteristics about Senator Guay, from a reporter's point of view, was that one never had a "no comment" from Senator Guay. He always had a point of view. He always had something to say and he really was a journalist's dream. After that, we continued to be friends and associates in the capacity in which I worked in the former Prime Minister's office, where I worked very closely with the cabinet and the caucus.

Joe served with great effect in Mr. Trudeau's cabinet in the 1970s. But I remember him best as the Chief Government Whip. I listened to Senator Murray, who is absolutely right. I think one of the most difficult jobs of political leadership on Parliament Hill is that of whip. I say that because it is a job that is very personal. The person who holds it, if he is to be a success, has to have the qualities that promote respect, confidence, friendship and, indeed, affection. Joe had all of those in large measure during what were difficult years in the mid-1970s.

He has had a passionate commitment, as other Senators have said, to his country, to his province and to his community of Saint-Boniface. He has shown great devotion to both houses of Parliament. All of this has been accompanied by an unflagging loyalty to the political party with which he has been associated and has supported for so many years.

I will miss Senator Guay. I fondly wish him good health and great happiness with Marguerite and his children during the years ahead in his retirement.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, Joe Guay, Joe Guay, Joe Guay, Joe Guay. What a pleasant musical name to match an even more pleasant and musical personality.

Each senator brings many qualities to this house, but usually one singular quality emerges from his many to separate that senator from his peers. In Joe's case, for me at least, it must be his voice, his magical, wonderful voice.

One can debate, as one should, who has the greatest voice in this house. Was it the hon. senator from Quebec who nagged us with his gnawing voice from time to time, a senator who has since departed? Is it the roaring thunder of Senator Ray Perrault? Is it the decent, quiet, persuasive down-east dialect of Senator Doody? Is it the dulcet tones of Senator Royce Frith? Is it the graceful francophone rhythms of my friend Jacques Hébert? Is it the broad Celtic range of Heath Macquarrie? Is it the Celtic rage of our leader, Senator MacEachen? Is it the elegant depths of Finlay MacDonald? Is it the staccato voice of Senator "Staf" Barootes?

No, senators, it is none of these. The greatest voice in this chamber belongs to Joe Guay.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: Splendid, golden, soft, gentle, sweet, harsh—that great voice and acclaim belongs to our friend, Joe Guay. Honourable senators, we will miss Joe. We will miss his courtesy, his wise counsel, his most pleasant personality and, above all, that golden voice that has spoken up so eloquently for his province of Manitoba and for all Canadians. We will miss you, Joe.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I make no apologies whatsoever for paying tribute to Joe. I know many of you are saying, "not another one", but he deserves every speech made in his honour.

We have heard much in the last few days about prima facie cases. The new senators in the chamber will be amazed to know that you hear your own eulogy when you retire from this place. When you are stretched out in a metal box, you do not hear a thing. It is much better to hear it in this place.

I was in the other place for 11 years when Joe came in 1968. Senator Joe and I fought back and forth, but after putting through estimates at 1.00 a.m. or 2.00 a.m., he would put his hand on your shoulder and say, "You were in great shape tonight."

Honourable senators, Senator Guay was appointed Sir Knight of St. Gregory the Great in 1957. He also has had the highest degree in Tae-Kwon Do specially awarded to him. Senator Frith said that one day Senator Guay had bandages on his face, that he was fooling the members of the House of Commons. Do not try anything with him, because he has that wonderful degree in Tae-Kwon Do.

Senator Guay, you have had your spats with the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker. Mr. Diefenbaker said to me, "Some people come to the Senate or the Commons and some swell and some grow. But Guay, he grows all the time." Honourable senators, I could not pass this moment without saying to Senator Joseph Guay: May you have many more years ahead of you, and may you and your wife enjoy good health. Do not forget to come back often and see us, because we are certainly going to miss you.

[Translation]

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Honorables senators, in spite of the hour, I insist to say a few words about senator Guay's departure.

I mentioned the late hour, but Mrs. Guay, who is here tonight, knows very well that, since I joined the Senate, Joe and I have spent some pleasant evenings in the office we share.

If the senators and the Senate are loosing a colleague, I, for one, am loosing a special friend. Since my arrival here, I have had the chance to be near "Joe" Guay nearly without interruption. I was given an office in the Victoria Building in 1979. I got there and the first colleague I saw in a spacious office, well furnished and very clean was Senator Guay. We have never parted since, even when the senators had to move out of the East block because of the Economic Summit Conference, and even then I moved with him in another building called "La Promenade", I believe.

More over, honorable senators, because of all the good time I have spent with "Joe", we got to know each other well. I came to know his family like he came to know mine, not physically, but because we went through almost the same stages with both large families whose members have lived all sorts of experiences.

I feel like I am "Joe" Guay's brother. Yet I have many brothers! I saw him when he did not feel very well, I have seen him almost constantly for twelve years.

More particularly, "Joe" has taught me many things. He has taught me it is nicer to have a clean desk! It has never been my strong point to have an immaculate desk! Joe would remind me: Norbert, it does not look good to keep your desk in such a mess! I like to walk around in a sweater and if my shoes were not shining, he would tell me from time to time: a senator should not be seen dressed like that!

I have learned more than that from Joe Guay. I have learned that his family and his wife come first. Every night, calling his wife would be one of the last thing he would do. He is the ideal husband, the father every child would like to have, Joe, I salute you!

Honourable Senators, I think that the section of the Constitution was amended in 1966. That is when it was decided that senators should retire at 75. Like many of you who were not here (and who never had contemplated coming here), I thought it was a good thing since I was under the impression that senators were a group of old timers who did nothing and then retired.

We realize now that maybe the Fathers of Confederation knew better when they decided that senators should be appointed for life.

As for me, I find this amendment to the Constitution most regretful, especially when it makes me lose my best friend.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable Senators, I come just in time to say goodbye to my colleague, the Honourable Senator Guay who unfortunately is leaving us and whom we will really miss.

Most of us do not say that the honourable Joseph Guay is leaving. We simply say that Joe is leaving. He is a friendly and jolly man and he will be remembererd as a noisy and bright colleague.

I extend my best wishes to him. If anybody ever deserved a happy retirement, it is my friend Joe. But retirement will not prevent him from helping those people in St. Boniface and in Manitoba whom he loved so much and still loves and in whom he always takes pride.

I wish him a long retirement, but I am sure he will go on working for people around him. Once again, dear Joe, I wish you a happy retirement: heureuse retraite, my best wishes, ad multo anno.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I will not take more than sixty seconds. Even if I had been the first one to take the floor, I would have used no more.

Joe Guay has been described as a French-speaking citizen outside Quebec, as a member of the community of French-speaking Canadians who live outside Quebec.

I am not sure Joe Guay relishes those descriptions. The Joe Guay I know and worked with in public and behind the scenes always considered himself a Canadian. He never defined himself in reference to Quebec.

• (1810)

[English]

First and foremost, that is Joe Guay. Yet, Joe Guay would respect everyone. He would respect other languages, other cultures, the first peoples of this country, and I always liked and respected that about Joe Guay.

[Translation]

Joe, I join others in telling you that I will miss you. You have many friends in the Madawaska area, people who have known you at the Conference of Mayors and Municipalities. I told them that you were retiring. They have asked me to convey their best wishes to you. I join them in wishing you a well deserved rest. Good bye.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would have like to be the first to rise to pay tribute to my good friend, my fellow citizen, my representative in the House of Commons for many years since we live in the same riding.

Since I know I could not be the first, I decided to try and be the last, if possible, to speak about my friend "Joe".

Much has been said today, and I do not want to repeat what has been stated. I will try, nonetheless, to talk about some aspects of our colleague's personality which have not yet been dealt with. Some of you have mentioned Joe's resounding tone of voice. You should have known him when he was a Navy chief instructor in Manitoba. I can assure you that all those who served under him still remember it. Even today, when travelling around the country, Joe sometimes comes across some former students.

But Joe and I did not meet when he was in the Navy. It was a short time after his return to civilian life, after a brilliant career in the Navy. We worked in the same sector; we were in business. He was selling shoes, I was buying.

I must say that I never met a more aggressive salesperson, all the while reliable, convincing and honest. I was working for a rather big company who usually bought only under contract. With Joe, there was no need for a contract. We had his word, and it was enough.

I want to say a few words about Joe Guay in St. Boniface. You would have to walk the streets of St. Boniface with Joe to realize what this man meant to his community. He was really part of the community. Everywhere you go, people refer to him as "Joe".

Today, the big thing in politics is polls. Polls are ordered to find out this and that. I have never met a single politician who had the political instincts of Joe Guay. He knew exactly what was going on. He knew exactly what people were thinking because he was close to the community.

Despite all his political activity as counsellor, mayor, member of Parliament and Minister, Joe's first focus was always his family. He was dedicated to his family. He not only raised his own children but also the nieces and nephews who became part of the Guay family. Today, Joe will go back to St. Boniface, to a region that admires and appreciates him, and thanks him for what he has done.

I am particularly pleased that his wife, Marguerite, is able to be with us in the gallery today. For years when Joe had to be away from home, Marguerite had to run the household and support Joe, which she did with enthusiasm during all that time.

Joe, in concluding I would like to repeat some of what was said by Senator Azéllus Denis. Please note that the majority of those who spoke before did not refer to the honourable Senator Guay. They did not even refer to Senator Guay but to Joe Guay. I think that is the biggest compliment anyone can make, reflecting the warmth and dedication of a dear friend. We are very sorry to see you leave.

We wish both you and Marguerite a healthy and prosperous life.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may we agree to not see the clock for just a few moments? I think it would be a pity to interrupt the well-deserved and fulsome tribute to Senator Guay.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Phillippe Guay: Honorable senators, leader of the government, senator Lowell Murray, listening to all the comments, I really wonder if I deserve them all.

[English]

I have noted the names and comments of those who have said a few words about me, and I was going to respond to almost all of them. I then thought that it would surely take too long, because I am quite sure we all want to go next door. The thought then occurred to me that I should make use of the Hansard of tomorrow so that when we have an elected Senate I can use it to become a member of that new House.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I am proud to have been a Liberal senator. In order to keep my comments today brief, I prepared some notes which I will try to follow. I will then not be inclined to exaggerate, and I will be in a position to keep my comments short and sweet.

[Translation]

It is with some bitterness, but also with great pride that I rise for the last time in this House to speak to you. Unfortunately, I have reached the respectable age that our parliamentary predecessors felt, as far back as 25 years ago, was the retirement age for the members of the Senate, at least for those called from that time on. I must abide by this requirement today and, so to speak, take my leave! If you detect a bit of humour in my words, it is because, having sat in the other House before my appointment to the Senate—as it is the case for several of my colleagues sitting presently in this House—I wonder if the opposite would have been more advantageous for me, since there is no mandatory retirement age in the House of Commons!

It is therefore with deep regret that I leave the Parliament, that bastion of democracy. I always felt respect, admiration and loyalty for this institution during the 22 and a half years that I spent my energies and my talents as a politician to build a great, strong and united country. I largely owe my long political career to the Right Honorable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I have been elected member for Saint-Boniface, Manitoba, in 1968, as you often mentionned tonight, when Trudeaumania was at its height across the country, from east to west, and it is he who appointed me to the Senate, ten years later.

Many great men and women won fame in the Senate and in the House of Commons. I could not forget to mention the admiration and the gratitude I owe to the Right Honorable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. That is why I repeat it. This great Canadian appointed along with me other senators from the ranks of the Progressive-Conservative Party—we dont see that happening too often now a days with Prime Minister Mulroney. I refer to honourable senator George Muir and above all to honourable senator Duff Roblin, colleague and former premier of my province of Manitoba where senator Molgat was sitting at that time. But I would like to give him credit for opening the door to the restoration of the educational and linguistic rights of Franco-Manitobans, and I show him my gratitude for that.

I have had a wonderful career in Parliament paved with interesting and captivating moments and pitted with humour and loyalty to alike friends, partisan and non partisan.

The most important problems and issues for me during all those years of active politics have been the economic development of my province, the precarious social and economic conditions of the native and the Metis people, the status of French and English as official languages of Canada and the cultural and ethnic diversity of our country. As you know, those issues were the object of special and innovative policies in the successive governments of Mr. Trudeau, policies I have supported firmly during all those years because they contributed both socially and economically to our common wealth.

● (1820)

[English]

I have always felt at ease and close to the many people I have had the pleasure to serve through all my years in politics—at the municipal level, where I always had an open door, and in the federal government. I have made myself available to my electors and constituents, regardless of their political opinions or convictions. When I served as representative from the riding of St. Boniface, as an elected member of the House of Commons and as a minister of the Crown, and even since I was called to the Senate, I have always made a point of returning to my constituency on every weekend to meet and listen to my constituents. In all sincerity, this was the promise that I made to my constituents in 1968, because I believe strongly that a people's representative, whether elected or appointed, has important responsibilities and pressing duties toward his or her constituents.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Guay: I think my sedulous presence and dialogue with my constituents have had their worth in gold.

[Translation]

Besides, for all those who know me, it is clear that I am proud of my French origin. In spite of the setbacks and difficulties suffered by the French community in Manitoba, as was mentioned previously, during its history full of epic and courageous struggles to perserve its distinct language and culture. The vitality of that community was evident during the general assembly held in 1988 for the purpose of bringing out the priorities selected by the whole French speaking community for the improvement of the quality of life in the future.

[English]

I have always appreciated your fellowship and the good and hard work done by all of you, whether in this chamber or at the committee level, and I wish you all well and hope that you continue the excellent work in committees and in the Senate as you have done in the past. So many people have yet to understand the work that is being done in this House, in the Senate, which is for their benefit.

In closing, I should like to give thanks and praise to all of the people who have provided me with their support, advice and assistance during all those years, in both the Senate and the House of Commons—to my fellow MPs and senators, and also to my personal secretary, Mrs. Collette Favreau, who happens not to be here but who has been with me since I was elected to the House of Commons in 1968. She was with Mrs. Guay earlier this afternoon but had to leave.

I also want to thank the support staff, the messengers, cleaners, maintenance staff, pages, security staff, and those doing a great job reporting for Hansard. I recall that at one time I criticized them, but I think they are doing an excellent job. May I say that if I have forgotten anyone, I wish them well also. Thank you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

PROCEEDINGS OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: On Tuesday, September 25, 1990, questions of privilege were raised by Senators Ottenheimer, Poitras, Robertson, Simard, David, Barootes and Doody. Many senators took part in the ensuing debates and I want to thank them all. I said I would examine the issues very carefully and that after reading the official report for that day I would make my ruling at the earliest opportunity. I am now ready to make my ruling.

Many of the points raised by honourable senators had to do with the proceedings of September 24, 1990 of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It was alleged that certain members of the committee had been prevented from performing their parliamentary duties. Some senators felt they did not have enough time to examine thoroughly the issues before them and said they had not had access to the committee's draft report on Bill C-62. Some senators found it unacceptable that committee staff were not available for the vice-chairman of the committee and other members. There were protests that a motion had been withdrawn without the unanimous consent of the committee and that no debate had been allowed on a given motion. Some senators were critical of the way the steering committee's sittings had been conducted and also of the manner in which the draft report was distributed more specifically, both versions of the report did not reach the senators' offices at the same time. There were also complaints that a draft report was released to the press before it was tabled in the Senate.

It is the Chair's opinion that these points may be grounds for a grievance, but I do not think they are genuine questions of privilege. Beauchesne defines parliamentary privilege as "the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals." Although certain parliamentary rules may have been broken, and I repeat "may have been", there does not seem to have been a breach of rights or privileges.

Some senators criticized certains actions and decisions by the chairman of the committee.

In this connection, I may refer honourable senators to Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, Citation 607, which reads as follows:

> "607.(1) All decisions of the Chairman may be appealed by the committee.
> (2) There is no appeal to the House from the Chairman's ruling except by way of a report from the committee.

Since these matters were not raised in a report from the Committee, they should not be debated in this House.

In addition, a number of the points that were raised seemed to deal with questions relating to committee rules and procedure. Beauchesne is quite clear in this respect. I have here Citation 608: "Procedural difficulties which arise in committees ought to be settled in the committee and not in the House."

For these reasons, I must conclude that when they raised these points last Tuesday, honourable senators did not raise genuine questions of privilege.

[English]

QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS

MOTION TO DISENTITLE TO VOTE—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are you about to deal with yesterday's point, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, I am.

Senator Frith: Your Honour was good enough to give me a copy of that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yesterday, Honourable Senator Murray raised a point of order when Honourable Senator Frith proposed to move a motion pursuant to Rule 33 to enable the Senate to take action on a matter which Senator Frith asserted was a breach of privilege.

Rule 33 reads as follows:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

In discussing the point of order, some senators felt that any snator, at any time, could propose a motion under Rule 33 which would take priority over all other business of the Senate.

Other Senators argued that the procedure under Rule 33 would require that the Chair, if asked, should first determine that a prima facie case of privilege had been established. If the Chair agrees and there is no appeal to the ruling, the motion should be permitted to proceed. Furthermore, it was contended that the motion proposed by Honourable Senator Frith should not be received inasmuch as the Chair had previously ruled on the same matter, that no such prima facie case existed.

After careful reflection and study, it seems to me that the terms of Rule 33 are rather laconic. Therefore I have first to be conscious of the Senate's Rule 1:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Citation 84, at page 25 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition is particularly enlightening as to the limited function of the Speaker in matters of privilege:

> (1) Once the claim of a breach of privilege has been made, it is the duty of the Speaker to decide if a prima facie case can be established. The Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that privilege appears to be sufficiently involved to justify him in giving such precedence (or as it is sometimes put, that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed); and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.

Secondly, I underline that Rule 15 of the Senate places a duty on the Chair to "preserve order and decorum", which is not presently the case; but more important in this instance, "to decide points of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate." Since there is an appeal residing with the Senate on any decision of the Speaker as to a prima facie case, I feel that the procedure outlined in citation 84 best preserves the orderly conduct of Senate business and the rights of the Senate as a whole.

Otherwise you would have to accept that the moving of a motion under Rule 33 would not be subject to any point of order and remain in the absolute discretion of any member even if the motion is futile and not based on a prima facie case. That discretion would give any honourable member the power to delay the proceedings of the Senate even under any pretence.

Honourable Senators, I believe that this lays out a practice which is directly applicable in the case of Rule 33 and the role of the Speaker under Rule 15. This rule preserves for the Senate itself the final word to determine if a prima facie case of a breach of privilege has been established. The Chair's role, as outlined in citation 84, is the same as established in Rule 15, that is limited to determining whether the facts placed before the Senate meet the conditions necessary for a prima facie case of a breach of privilege, subject again to the decision of the whole Senate.

● (1410)

The interpretation that I submit, and which has been accepted by the Chair on many occasions, is one which provides for the orderly conduct of parliamentary business. In the absence of such a procedure, the Senate might quickly fall into disorder.

Therefore, it is my decision that the procedure outlined in citation 84 shall be followed for any proposed proceeding in the Senate pursuant to Rule 33. Accordingly, the motion proposed by Honourable Senator Frith yesterday is not receivable since it raises the same questions about which I ruled yesterday that they do not constitute a prima facie case of privilege.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, of course I am disappointed with the ruling. I am particularly disappointed because I think it is so clearly an attempt to strain the clear words of Rule 33 and turn to other rules based on the word "laconic". The very clarity of the section is what makes it not necessary to refer to other rules.

However, I think the most important result of His Honour's ruling for the Senate is the consequences of it, and that means that something that is concerning a lot of people, is concerning the provinces, is apparently concerning a former Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, and appears to be concerning the media—and, according to my mail and telephone calls, concerning a lot of people—is not receivable. That is the question that we should clear up, namely, the status of the eight additional senators. I should think they would want this matter cleared up, and it appears that a lot of people do want it cleared up. It is the subject of law suits. It is the subject of a law suit that is in the process of being brought today, as I have said to the press and I am saying here now. That action is being brought by some of our colleagues in the Senate because people are so concerned that the matter should be clarified by the courts before we go any further.

Those are the serious consequences of His Honour's ruling—that, in effect, we are prevented in the Senate from dealing with this.

I believe this matter should be cleared up. We cannot properly do business in this place until the situation is clarified. Everyone is concerned about it. It keeps coming up again and again. We have to give ourselves time to get this matter clarified by reference to the court.

I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): When Your Honour calls the division on this matter, my colleagues and I will be standing and calling for a recorded vote.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Senate resumed at 5:25 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

QUESTION PERIOD

STOPPING OF DIVISION BELL

SPEAKER'S LETTER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, at approximately 5:00 o'clock I was delivered the following letter—

Hon. D. G. Steuart: What a joke!

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: You added to the joke, let me tell you!

Senator Steuart: Any respect I ever had for you I just lost.

Senator Frith: This letter is dated October 4 and is on the letterhead of Senator Guy Charbonneau, the Speaker of the Senate. It is addressed to the Honourable Lowell Murray, P.C., Leader of the Government in the Senate of Canada; the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, P.C., Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Canada; the Honourable William Doody, Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate of Canada; and the Honourable Royce Frith, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Canada. It reads as follows:

> Dear Senator,
> In light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties within the Senate to assemble Senators for a division within a reasonable time, I will be stopping the division bell and will proceed to put the question now before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. this day.
> I have taken this decision after much reflection to protect the rights of individual Senators to perform their duties.
> Sincerely,

It is signed Guy Charbonneau and it has copies to the Honourable Orville H. Phillips, the Honourable William J. Petten, the Honourable Hartland de M. Molson, the Honourable Daniel Lang, the Honourable Edward M. Lawson, the Honourable P.M. Pitfield, P.C., the Honourable Douglas D. Everett and the Honourable Stan Waters.

Honourable senators, I was on the telephone when this letter was handed to me at, as of now, less than half an hour ago. I was in the process of dictating the following letter addressed to the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate.

Senator Charbonneau,

I was handed your letter of October 4th, at 5:00 p.m. about the presently ringing divisional bells, and of your decision to stop the bell and proceed to put the question before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. today.

You have no authority to do so and will be in a direct breech—

And that is misspelled, which indicates just how little time I had to do this.

You have no authority to do so and will be in a direct breech of the procedures established by the Senate as set out on page 70 of the Senate Rule book. "When the division bells are rung and the whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote . . ." the vote is taken.

I tell you now that our Whip is not ready to enter the Chamber and indicate his readiness to proceed to the vote.

I urge you to reconsider your decision because the consequences of such a blatantly illegal attempt to exercise powers which you do not have are very serious."

I will now take the time to sign the letter.

As senators know, there is a listening device in our offices that enables us to hear what is happening in the chamber or in some of the committee rooms. I did not realize that it was tuned in to the Senate chamber, but it was. I was on the telephone consulting about what we were to do, and suddenly, with this letter still in the typewriter, I heard the words, "Let the doors be locked".

I knew our Whip had not gone in. This is the rule book. This is the Senate of Canada I am in, isn't it? I think it is. I must say that it feels more like a Tory caucus room. However, this is the rule book of the Senate, and yet I heard the words—I still have not had a chance to sign the letter, but I assure you I will. My intention was to come in and raise a point of privilege over this letter and Senator Charbonneau's attempt to hijack the Senate of Canada.

I believe this is not the Tory caucus, but is the Senate, and we look at the rules which were not referred to, we notice, in this letter at all. It is not by authority of anything. It does not state "pursuant to the rules". It does not say, "I interpret the Rules of the Senate to allow us to do this". There is not a word about it. What does it say? It says, "In light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties within the Senate to assemble senators for a division within a reasonable time . . ." Says who? We know who says. Senator Charbonneau says, that is who says it, not the rule book.

Senator Simard: That is good enough.

Senator Frith: That is good enough for Senator Simard, but I know it is not good enough for us and I do not think it is good enough for the people of Canada.

[Senator Frith.]

Let us look at this rule which is still the rule of the Senate of Canada.

Senator Steuart: You should hang your heads!

Senator Frith: On page 70 of our rule book in Appendix I, which is a rule in the rule book establishing—

Senator Haidasz: This is a coup against the Senate, an unlawful power grab.

Senator Frith: The heading is "Voting", and it states:

Voting in the Senate is described in Rules 49 and 50.

At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising,

—which happened—

the Speaker calls for a standing vote.

—which he did—

The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked".

Which he did—not after, according to the rules, that the Whips have entered the chamber and indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to vote. No! Not according to the rule book.

What is the Speaker here for? Is he not here to apply the rules. In his ruling today he told us that the Speaker is here to maintain order according to the rules.

Senator Haidasz: He is a servant of Prime Minister Mulroney.

Senator Frith: He should be the bishop. He should be the Pope of this rule book, not somebody that probably must not have even opened the book to look and see what he could do. No. Why should he bother? What is he going to do?

Senator Steuart: It is a disgrace.

Senator Frith: He says he knows what he is going to do. "I am going to come up with something that talks about the mechanisms established by the political parties within the Senate to assemble senators for a division bell within a reasonable time." What is a reasonable time? We did not get out of here until about 3 o'clock.

Let us face it, on the question of what is reasonable, we now know that our present Speaker, the Speaker of the Senate of Canada, says that a vote in this place is taken in accordance with Charbonneau's rule.

Senator Steuart: Right!

Senator Frith: Not the rule book.

Senator Hastings: Mulroney's rule!

Senator Frith: Not the rule book. That is all they think about the rule book: "I will be stopping the division bell and will proceed to put the question . . ."

I say to some individual senators that you will be interested to know that the tearing up of the rule book, having it replaced by decrees—and that is all that it can be—is literally what happens in a coup d'état when someone wants to take over the Reichstag or anything else; they say from now on, you parliamentarians—

Senator Haidasz: Sounds like Hitler, that's what.

Senator Steuart: You should hang your head and get out of here. Leave!

Senator Frith: What I have here, honourable senators, is a decree by one person, one senator.

Senator Olson: We never gave him that authority to make those rules.

Senator Frith: He has never had that authority; it is not in the rules.

Senator Grafstein: What did the Privy Councillors in the house say about this?

Senator Frith: Yes, and there are Privy Councillors here who stood and voted for it.

Senator Grafstein: I did not even have notice of this vote. I want to know what the Privy Councillors of this country have to say about my vote in the Senate. I had no notice of this vote. What about my vote? Senator Buchanan, Senator Hatfield, Senator Roblin, what about my vote? I was not even given notice of this vote. They are Privy Councillors. They are not members of this government, they are Privy Councillors. What about peace, order and good government?

Senator Haidasz: I did not receive any letter either about this vote, no notice whatsoever.

Senator Barootes: Where is your whip?

Senator Steuart: Shut up, for God's sake! You are a disgrace to this country.

Senator Olson: A disgrace to everything this government stands for, you and the Speaker too, now.

Senator Grafstein: Did the new senators read the rules? The first thing I was handed, senators, was the rule book. That is the first thing I was given by the Speaker, by the Clerk. Where was the Clerk?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, you must understand that what you are taking objection to—

Senator Grafstein: Where were the Table Officers?

Senator Frith: You do not get notice of decrees. I at least got the letter. The notice I got was approximately 20 minutes. Now we understand how the present Speaker of the Senate, Senator Charbonneau, believes he should uphold the rules of the place and the rights and privileges of the members of the Senate.

• (1730)

I want you to take note—all of you, and all of you—that this was done after much reflection.

Senator Hastings: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: You must be reassured by that.

Senator Hastings: Instructions?

Senator Frith: None of which, I assume—

Senator Steuart: He should be elected dogcatcher, that thing over there—the Leader of the Government!

Senator Frith: This much reflection, I assume—

Senator Hastings: He got orders!

Senator Grafstein: Do not call on the rules!

Senator Olson: Rules are no good anymore in here!

Senator Grafstein: Rules are not good in here!

Senator Frith: The "much reflection" that preceded this decision obviously did not include reading the rules.

Senator Charbonneau, during his period of reflection and meditation, either read the rules and said, "To hell with them, because they are clear—

Senator Steuart: Shame!

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Frith: —or he did not read them. There is no other possibility. Do you know why he did this? He says that he did this to protect your rights.

Senator Grafstein: Not my rights!

Senator Frith: Yes, he did it to protect your rights!

Senator Hastings: Thank you very much!

Senator Haidasz: He trampled on my rights!

Senator Frith: He did it to protect your rights to perform your duties.

Senator Steuart: A tradition of 120 years is gone! You are a disgrace to that Chair!

An Hon. Senator: You're duty is to be here!

Senator Frith: He did it for our benefit. The "Pope" did it. It was all in our interest.

Senator Steuart: Leave the Chair!

Senator Frith: He took a vote. Let us understand what is being said here. He took a vote on his own decision, directly contrary to the rules. Surely it is a reasonable presumption that a Speaker of the Senate know something about the rules. But he took that vote on his own initiative and he locked the doors in the absence of the people that he thought he was protecting. That is the kind of protection that we can expect now in the future in this chamber.

Let us make it clear. Let us have no misunderstanding about this. There is no limit whatever to the powers of Senator Charbonneau as he sees them. So that no matter what happens in here now, there is no point in raising a point of order. What is to stop them if the rules do not apply? The very rules that are supposed to be here to protect us he totally ignores!

Senator Simard: Your premise is wrong!

Senator Steuart: Listen to him gabbing over there, the great Canadian. He wants to be protected!

Senator Frith: We have the great Cartesian logic of Senator Simard.

Senator Steuart: You are a disgrace!

Senator Frith: Keep talking, Senator Steuart—

Senator Steuart: You are a bloody disgrace!

Senator Hastings: A pipeline!

Senator Frith: The Speaker did not even give me a chance to sign my letter, so keep talking, Senator Steuart, for a minute while I sign my letter.

This is the only opportunity I have had to deliver this letter. The doors were locked while it was being typed. I now ask a Page to take this to the Speaker.

Senator Simard: Too late!

Senator Frith: "Too late," he says. Right! "Too late"—that was the scheme! Ah ha!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Hastings: Too late? It was all a setup!

Senator Frith: What else will we do? He knows! I should like to know with whom the Speaker consulted before he made this decision.

Senator Haidasz: With Lowell Murray!

Senator Frith: We do not know. I hope some day that this Senate, when it investigates this blatant breach of its privileges, will find out what went on at the time the bells started to ring. I can tell you what happened with us. We were in caucus trying to decide—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): How to vote on your own motion?

Senator Steuart: Never mind smirking. You will go down in history as a bloody disgrace to voters!

Senator Frith: —when to respond to the bells.

Senator Hastings: Pipeline!

Senator Frith: What was happening elsewhere? May I have a Page take this, please?

That remark is interesting. "Too late." Just think about what that means: "Too late!" What must have happened? Well, there must have been some consultation. They must have said, "How will we handle this? How are we to get this thing done so that it is done the way only "we" want it?" By "we" I mean the Conservative senators. Remember, Senator Charbonneau is a Conservative senator.

Senator Austin: A partisan senator!

● (1740)

Senator Steuart: He has paid off his appointment!

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Frith: What must have happened? Let us try to figure out what must have taken place. They must have asked, "How are we to handle this?"

Senator Barootes: How are you—

Senator Steuart: Barootes, be quiet! You are a shame! You should hide under the bloody table! I watched you fighting Tommy Douglas on a point of order and now privilege. Now crawl under the table, because you are a despicable little bugger!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: That is what you are.

An Hon. Senator: Withdraw!

Senator Steuart: I will withdraw you!

Senator Hastings: Pipeliners!

Senator Steuart: Do you want to come over and tell me to withdraw? I will throw this table at you! Withdraw, indeed!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I also ask the Table to have a Page make a few copies of my letter? I did not have a chance to even have a copy made.

Senator Steuart: Disgrace!

Senator Frith: What must have happened—

Senator Barootes: Watch your blood pressure,—

Senator Steuart: Shut up!

Senator Barootes: —Senator Steuart!

Senator Steuart: I have no respect for you. I do not want to hear that!

Senator Frith: I want to continue with this question of "Too late." That is an interesting remark.

Senator Hastings: Who said that?

Senator Frith: Senator Simard, or someone over there, said "Too late."

Senator Olson: Senator Murray said it.

Senator Steuart: Look at the smirk on Murray's face!

Senator Haidasz: What a shame!

Senator Stollery: Mr. Meech Lake!

An Hon. Senator: Where is Senator Doody?

An Hon. Senator: Doody is disgraced!

Senator Frith: This letter was sent and received by me. I happened to be in Senator MacEachen's office, so I got the one that was addressed to him and my secretary brought mine up.

Senator Simard: Where is he? Where is Senator MacEachen? He was here last night!

Senator Frith: Does that matter?

Senator Simard: Is he in England, or what?

An Hon. Senator: It is too late!

Senator Olson: It is too late, anyway.

Senator Frith: Were you trying to suggest that you care about anyone's privileges or rights but your own? You care about no one's rights. Do not be silly!

This is literally what happened. It was approximately three or five minutes after five—that is, about 5.05. This letter suddenly comes in. I was on the phone, but I kept talking on the phone while trying to dictate an answer to the letter. By now it is about 5.15. Then, 5.20 comes around. I do a correction of the draft, while still talking on the phone. Perhaps the clock was wrong, but it was not 5.30—5.30 was short enough, but I still did not have a chance to deliver the letter—when I heard the Speaker saying, "Let the doors be locked."

An Hon. Senator: Right!

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Frith: The doors were locked.

Senator Hastings: They let a senator in!

Senator Frith: And I do not know what it must have been. I do not know whether the press was in here and saw this—I certainly did not see it—but what a shameful show. They all stood up—

Senator Barootes: Are you saying—

Senator Frith: —with no one here except themselves. There was no one in here but "us Tories." Ain't it lovely! "We can get whatever we want," they must have thought.

Senator Simard: Wrong again!

There were two other members here.

Senator Frith: Tell me about it, because I was not able to get in; the doors were locked!

Senator Simard: There were two independents in here.

Senator Grafstein: Who else was here? Do you mean that someone else got notice and I did not? Who else was here?

Senator Steuart: What a sad show! What a joke!

Senator Frith: If I am to believe what was said by members opposite—

Senator Petten: You might win the battle, but you have not won the war!

Senator Frith: —there was no one in here but "us Tories and us Independents," I take it.

Senator Austin: How many Independents?

Senator Frith: But that is still pretty delicious for a Tory. There were no Liberal senators, that's for sure.

Senator Hastings: No whip!

Senator Frith: There was no whip from that side!

Senator Steuart: They balked out!

Senator Grafstein: What about Senator Waters?

Senator Hastings: What about the elected senator; where was he?

Senator Grafstein: Where was the elected Senator? Where was Senator Waters?

Senator Frith: I do not know. You will have to ask.

Senator Hastings: Did he get notice?

• (1750)

Senator Grafstein: Did he receive notice?

Senator Frith: We could not get in. I will tell you about the letter.

An Hon. Senator: Did the elected senator get notice?

Senator Frith: Yes he did. I will tell you who got them. Just so that everyone will know who did not get told about what was going to happen, I will tell honourable senators who did.

Senator Grafstein: Did Senator Molson receive a notice?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Steuart: He is now walking out. He bloody should walk out. He sold his rights out. Get out!

Senator Frith: I will tell honourable senators who received it: The Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, P.C., the Hon. William Doody, the Hon. Royce Frith, the Hon. Orville H. Phillips, the Hon. William J. Petten, the Hon. Hartland M. Molson, the Hon. Daniel Lang, the Hon. Edward M. Lawson, the Hon. P.M. Pitfield, P.C., the Hon. Douglas D. Everett, and the Hon. Stan Waters received it. That is a list of the senators who received the notice that the bell was going to be—

Senator Haidasz: What about me? I am a senator, too.

Senator Frith: I do not know if other senators received the notice. I can tell honourable senators that I received one at about 5:05 p.m. today.

Honourables senators, if I have any privileges they are protected by the Constitution and by the rule book. If I do not have the Constitution, the rule book, or the Speaker, I do not know of a more classic case of a breach of privilege. It is staggering.

Senator Grafstein: Ask Senator Ottenheimer if this is a prima facie question of privilege.

Senator Frith: If one were to ask someone in a political science class to come up with the most outrageous breaches of privilege they could think of, a fairly intelligent student would say, "Let's see, what is the greatest privilege that is given? There are a great many privileges, but what is the most important? It is the vote". That is what lead to this adjournment in the first place. We wanted to clarify what the position is with regard to the right to vote of certain additional senators who are the subject of court actions at this time. The vote is a vital privilege. The student would say, "I have it. How about a situation in which you have a legislative chamber in which there are two parties represented, as well as some independents, and when the bells are ringing for a vote you tell a few of them with about 20 minutes' notice that you will be having a vote in spite of the rules?" This is a vote by decree, something which we have here, and not a vote by the rules. I take it that we are not running this place by the rules anymore. We are running it by decree of Senator Charbonneau.

Senator Grafstein: It is lawless!

Senator Frith: That would be the most outrageous breach of privilege you could imagine—at least until today. We know that the truth is stranger than fiction. The very worst imaginable breach of privilege of any parliamentarian took place about half an hour ago.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Frith: Where do we go from here? Perhaps we will go to the Order Paper, providing there is not a decree which states, "In light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties a member of one of the political parties, Senator Charbonneau, has decided that there has been a breakdown". Apparently, that is all that he needs. He can decide that at any time. I do not know what evidence he used for it. However, he can decide it at any time. He does not say that he consulted with anyone. He has simply said, "I have decided I will be stopping the division bell and will proceed to put the question in light of the failure of mechanisms established". Where was the failure of the mechanisms established? The rule book was there. Everything was being done in accordance with the rule book.

Senator Grafstein: When was the letter drafted?

Senator Frith: I have no idea.

Senator Grafstein: Was it drafted yesterday?

Senator Frith: I have no idea.

How do we know where we go from here?

Senator Hastings: There are no rules.

Senator Frith: If it were a matter of there being no rules, then, of course, anyone in this place could do anything. But that is not really how far we have gone. We have not gone to anarchy, although—

Senator Haidasz: It is a dictatorship.

Senator Frith: We have gone to a dictatorship—the rule of one man. He does not even say that he has consulted with anyone.

Where do we go from here? We have an Order Paper. I take it that Senator Charbonneau will call the next order of business. However, he may not. It does not matter.

I guess there is no point in standing up and saying that something is against the rules. After all, what rules? From now on the only chance we have—and there is no reason to believe that it would swing any weight—is that somebody might stand up and say, "Mr. Speaker, in accordance with your decree numbered 1 which you issued on October 4"—and maybe he has issued more decrees, we do not know—"then this is what will happen". If we try to have a vote, and if the division bells ring so that we can make a decision on what we want to do with respect to a motion, Senator Charbonneau will decide when he will have the vote. He will decide when to lock the doors and have the vote.

He must have walked in here and saw the place full of Tories and, apparently, independents and said, "Lock the doors".

Senator Murray: Will you be calling it six o'clock, Senator?

Senator Frith: Let it be noted that it is six o'clock and that I am on my feet. I do not know whether or not that will make any difference, since Senator Charbonneau might come back at eight o'clock and say, "Sit down. I have a new decree for you".

It is six o'clock. I take it that Senator Charbonneau will be back at eight o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: According to the rules, I will now leave the Chair till 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8:00 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable Senators, to begin with I am having some problem with using the term "honourable senators".

Senator Doody: You have a problem all right!

Senator Steuart: I first got involved in politics after World War II. I came back from overseas, and I decided to get involved in politics. Why? I got involved in politics because they had elected a CCF government in Saskatchewan, a socialist government, and I did not like the idea. When Tommy Douglas passed on, I remember saying, "Some of us came to score", such as Dr. Barootes, "but we stayed to play." Tommy Douglas turned out to be a very interesting man. While I did not agree with a great many things he did, he did many great things.

I got involved in politics because I thought one individual could make a difference. I ran a little corner grocery store. I did not even run it very well, but I ran it. I got elected. I got re-elected and we defeated the CCF. We had help from people like Dr. Barootes.

The CCF had brought in Medicare, which turned out to be very popular. However, at that time, the methods they used to bring it in were considered Draconian. Staff Barootes, who is sitting over there right now, fought it. He made a great speech against Tommy Douglas. We were all thrilled, those of us who thought government should not use their power to dragoon people or to force the medical profession to do its will.

Well, some changes were made, but we had defeated the CCF because of that policy. Can you imagine defeating a government because they brought in Medicare? We did, and Senator Barootes helped us. A lot of other people helped. Eric Berntson—one of the ho-ho-ho senators because we do not know where they stand, but a friend of mine—helped. Why did these people help? Because they did not like the way it was done. We held a big rally in Regina. Police were brought in and they ran us off the place. They were like storm troopers. I was there. I was not very big, but I got out in a big hurry. I stayed on and got elected along with all the others who got elected, because I thought that one individual could make a difference. I believed in Canada. I believed in the democratic system.

Eventually we were defeated, and perhaps we deserved it. Then I was invited to come to the Senate. I was proud to be a senator and I still am. I know that the Senate is not considered such a great institution by a great many people. In fact, I am finished at the end of the year, so this is my farewell, my good-bye speech, my last hurrah.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: They're happy over there. Why are they happy?

Senator Murray: We'll miss you.

Senator Steuart: Perhaps you will miss me, but I will miss you people like a hole in the head, the way you have been acting lately!

I am not unhappy to be getting out of politics because in the last few years—I do not know exactly when—politicians and political parties have been looked upon with scorn. That is a tragedy. When I look around this chamber, at all sides, I see some of the most distinguished Canadians that you can find. They have been invited by various Prime Ministers, according to the parliamentary system we live under, to come here to serve, and they have done that. By and large, regardless of their politics, they have done a great job. For my money, the Senate has been a great institution. Maybe it needs to change and maybe it should be an elected body; I do not know. I am leaving; I am on the slippery slope. I am so far down the road that I am not even buying green bananas these days because I do not know how long I will be here. The Senate has done a great job for the people of Canada.

Senator Austin: Up until now!

Senator Steuart: Now what has happened? We are seeing governments being defeated after one or two years or after one term in office. Why? Because the people of Canada are cynical about politicians. They do not believe us any more. We do not tell it like it is. I see a doctor over there who should be off with his skills performing some miracles on sick people. For God's sake, he is sitting here as a senator; we do not need more senators; we need more doctors like him. Someone said that you should not shake hands with those new doctors. I said, "Hell, I wouldn't be here to shake hands with anyone if it wasn't for people like him." He has come to serve. He is not a political animal. In fact, I do not believe that he is even a Tory and that says quite a bit for him. What did he come here for? He was asked by the Prime Minister to come in here and make sure that the goods and services tax was railroaded through the Senate and forced upon the people of Canada even though 80 per cent of them do not like it. That is what he is doing here.

Senator Bosa: 85 per cent.

Senator Steuart: I am sorry, 85 per cent. I was out by 5 per cent. That is why people are cynical about politicians. They say that they will play any kind of a game, do anything to get their way. They do not listen to the people. The government takes polls every week. They are supposed to listen to the public, but they do not care what the public says. I can guarantee that the new senator from Saskatchewan, if he ever gets a proper seat, is against the GST. I know that he is because the government of Saskatchewan is against the GST. Grant Devine is against the GST. Staff Barootes is shaking his head. I hope that it does not rattle too much, because he is against the GST too. Eric Berntson is against the GST. Why? Because the Premier of Saskatchewan is against it. He is saying that he cannot stand the GST because the people of Saskatchewan face real trouble. He is saying that they do not need more taxes, that they need less taxes. Yet here are you people, packed in here to do one thing: get this bill through.

Let me tell you something: there are a lot of people like me who went through World War II. Some of them came out with little bits and pieces missing, but they believed in what they were doing. I believed in what we were doing. Suddenly we have a situation where the rules do not apply anymore. Up until today we had a lot of respect for that chap sitting in the Chair.

Senator Murray: And we still do.

Senator Steuart: Suddenly he has bent the rules.

Senator Thériault: Bent them, he has destroyed them!

Senator Steuart: He has destroyed the rules to get this damned tax through!

Senator Lucier: On the instructions of Mulroney!

Senator Steuart: I was saying the other day that the Liberals do not know how to act in opposition, because every now and then we agree with the government, and that is a disgrace. I also said that the Tories do not know how to act when they are in power. They could have waited. For God's sake, look at us. Do you think that old D.G. Steuart would last very long if a campaign were mounted to get the vote?

• (2010)

A week ago we wanted a vote, and you would not give it to us. You used every trick in the book to stop us from having a vote. Then you kept saying all across Canada, "Have the vote. For God's sake, don't hold this up!". We said we would have a vote and then it was "Oh, don't have a vote, it's a point of privilege, a point of order, a point of whatever-the-hell!" Most of you wouldn't know a point of privilege from the point of a pin.

Then all of a sudden the Prime Minister put in the famous eight - the infamous eight. They are some fine people. I look over there and I see the great grandson of Arthur Meighen, one of the great figures in Canadian history. I see Forrestall. Somebody told me he punched old Joe Guay out. I wish I had seen that; it would have been a great thing. He was a member of Parliament with a great and distinguished record. I see an independent like Senator Molson.

Senator Molson: Don't point your finger at me.

Senator Steuart: I will point five fingers at you, Senator Molson, because you walked in here today.

What happened today? We did not have a chance to vote on this bill. You people have the majority.

Senator Murray: It was the adjournment motion.

Senator Steuart: I do not know why you did this. It is the same kind of little sneaky deal you tried with Meech Lake. The Prime Minister said, "We'll fool these donkeys and we'll push it through." But, unfortunately, you are not dealing with a bunch of donkeys; you are dealing with a bunch of independent people. We have all had good careers. I am not ashamed to be in the Senate. I am not ashamed of my record in public life or in my individual life. I'm proud of it. I don't have to be pushed around or manoeuvered or trampled on.

I was sitting in my office with Senator Denis, who was elected in 1935. He has been here since 1935.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: He is a distinguished senator from Montreal. All of a sudden I said, "The bells have quit ringing." We opened the door and found that we were right. He was not sure whether I was talking about the bells in my head or what. I said, "Let's go down; something is happening." We walked down and we could not get into the chamber. I looked in and I saw Senator Everett, and I'm very disappointed I saw him. I saw that great mass of Tories over there but nobody else. I said, "What the devil is going on? What is happening?" The speaker was there saying, "The bell's have quit ringing and we are going to vote. We are going to change the rules."

It's in the book, for God's sake. What do we go by? It is like the bible. It is what we live by in Parliament. If you don't live by the rules, what, in the name of God, do you live by? The rule of law.

Look at the lawyers sitting over there. Look at Barootes—he is hanging his head today. Look at Nurgitz. Look at these people; they are ashamed of the part they have played in this farce. It is disgraceful. Look at the Privy Councillor. What the hell does "Privy Councillor" mean? It means he is a counsellor privy to the Queen. He is supposed to be a very, very respectable person. Pat Carney is another one. They are supposed to be very respectable people, yet they have allowed themselves - unless they get up after I speak and denounce it - to be part of this charade, because that is what it is. It is a disgrace.

I am ashamed to be a senator, and I was never ashamed before. Then there is Duff Roblin, a man whom I really respect, a former leader of the government in the Senate. Then there is Senator Doody, one of the great senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here!

Senator Steuart: Look at Senator MacQuarrie over there. Honest to God, Senator MacQuarrie, how can you hold your head up after this? You can't; you wont! The new senators can be excused because maybe they are green and they think this is the way; but this is not the way it works. We obey the rules.

[Senator Steuart.]

I make no bones about it. Of course we were stalling this vote, because we know that you are going to win the vote.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: Look at them applauding. They are going to win the vote, so we are doing exactly what the Rules of the Senate allow us to do, and that is to stall for time. Hopefully the people of Canada will get it through to you and say, "For God's sake, don't put this tax in." It is the wrong time and it is the wrong tax. It is going to hurt Saskatchewan, the province I come from, far more than it is going to hurt Ontario and Quebec, because we have to pay freight and pay tax on the freight. It's going to hurt B.C. If you people from Alberta try to win an election on the GST, you will be swamped, and you know it.

Let the Prime Minister go to the people on this great tax. He would not win 15 per cent of the bloody population; he would be lucky if he got 5 per cent.

What are we doing? This is a democracy. Because someone is elected Prime Minister and he has a majority, does that mean he can be a dictator for four or five years? I hope not. We are the last defence—those of us in the Senate—against a tax that people hate. You know they hate it. Everyone of you knows that. I am not telling you anything you don't know. Look at them all sitting there with their heads down, and I don't blame them; I would be hanging my head today if I were a Tory. The great Conservative party of Canada has been reduced—look at him waving his hands— to trampling on the rights of Parliament. We are members of Parliament.

If the Prime Minister didn't like the Senate and he thought we had too much power, he has had a majority for six years and he could have changed it. Why didn't he change it? I do not know why he didn't change it, because we could not have stopped him. Under the Constitution we could only have stopped it for six months. Don't let anyone tell you that the Prime Minister could not have changed the powers of the Senate; of course he could have.

I think we have too much power. Finally we use it. It is in the law. It has been said, "You haven't got the right." Why has it been the law for about 120 years? We are using it, and Mulroney is outraged, and he has ordered you people—and I am ashamed of you, for God's sake—to do this. That man over there, a highly respected man, a great citizen, has been reduced to these kinds of shenanigans.

No wonder the people of Canada are upset and do not have any confidence in our Parliamentary institutions. No wonder that new movement out there lead by young Manning is going to sweep through. You better watch out because he is coming. He is saying that he believes in mother love, low taxes, and decency. Who the hell doesn't? I do, but I cannot get elected on it; but he is going to get elected on it. You may ask why. It is because the people do not believe in us any more. You have a chance over there right now to strike a blow. You were put in the Senate to strike a blow for democracy. Well, strike one! Show your independence! Show what you are made of! Show that you believe in your region! Show me a region in Canada that is not against this tax. You cannot. If you people from Alberta went out and tried to get elected on the GST you would be trampled under so badly you would not even know your own name, and you know it - I am not telling you anything you don't know. Strike a blow! Show the people of Canada that there is some decency left, that there is some feeling left, that democracy can work, that we can listen to the people. Don't let this man, who is taking his orders, unfortunately, from the Prime Minister, trample on the rights of the democratic institution. Thank you very much.

● (2020)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear! Hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Sit down! Sit down!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Sit down! Your privileges have not been violated. It was a gang violation of our privileges. Let people whose privileges have been violated speak before we hear from you. Your privileges were not violated. Senator Waters' privileges were violated; he was not allowed in this chamber. Let the senators speak whose privileges were violated by you and, with due respect, others.

Senator Murray: "With all due respect," yes, Jerry.

Senator Grafstein: Sit down and let the people whose privileges were violated speak.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! Senator Murray has the floor.

Some Hon. Senators: Resign! There new rules!

Senator Olson: You want the rules? I have the rules here. They mean nothing to you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Get back to your seat.

Some Hon. Senators: Resign! Sit down! There is no order!

Senator Perrault: You have no more authority here!

An Hon. Senator: Sit down! You are a disgrace, a goddamned disgrace!

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Murray has the floor.

Senator Frith: Don't refer to the rules of the Senate!

Senator Perrault: Sit down! Get out of here! New speaker!

The Hon. the Speaker: I am in the Chair.

Senator Perrault: You're not fit!

Some Hon. Senators: Go away! You do not have the right to speak.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down! Sit down!

Senator Murray: I yield to Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: I wanted to say at the beginning that I did not want to start an outrage. I rise more in sadness than anything. I was outraged when I heard what the Speaker did to our rules, and I can tell him right from the start, make no mistake about it, we do not have any confidence in you any more.

Now let us get to the question of privilege. I was in my office and I did not get a notice that the Speaker was going to change the rules.

Some Hon. Senators: Nobody did!

Senator Sparrow: Senator Everett did!

Senator Olson: There was a "cc" list of ones that did, but I did not. I came down here nearly as quickly as I could. I could not believe what I heard on my television set, but I came down here nearly as quickly as I could and the door was locked. There was not even enough time even if I had run from the time the Speaker walked in here and announced that he was going to violate the rules, or change the rules, and was going to interrupt what is on page 70 of our rule book and call the vote. My office is close. I am on the third floor in the corridor right near the chamber. Yet I could not get here before the door was locked.

An Hon. Senator: Of course you couldn't!

Senator Olson: No Way. What now? It is the most outrageous action I have ever seen. We hear some saying that they have been here quite a while. I have been in Parliament most of the time since 1957. We now have here a situation in which we did not even know the vote was going to be taken. We had some idea as to what was going to happen, because, whatever else you want to say, there is a reasonable doubt that there are still strangers in here. Why? Because they were notified under a section of the BNA Act, namely section 26. We all know that, but we also know that that section says—I do not think I brought it with me, although I should have—that the Senate shall decide when there is a question involving a vacancy for a senator.

The Senate did, in fact, deal with that in 1877. That is the last time the Senate said anything about Section 26. So it stands. They passed a resolution saying, among other things, that it has to be demonstrated that there is a stalemate. Well, of course, that has not happened yet, although there might have been an apprehension of its happening. It has to be demonstrated that there is no other remedy for resolving the stalemate, and it has to be an emergency. Well, honourable senators, none of those conditions are met, so it is unconstitutional.

The reason I bring that up again now is that it is before the courts in this country. I guess the government has no respect for the courts either, no respect at all for the fact that there is a doubt.

One thing we have done in the Senate when there is a problem, whatever the rules are, is that we respected those rules until a ruling has been handed down, and then go on with the business. However, not here! They do not even give us time to have a caucus so that we can consider all the factors that are involved.

I want to tell you, Honourable Senators, That my privileges have been violated very, very seriously. As I say, they did not notify me. They changed the rules. They locked the doors so I could not get in here to vote. There are several other Senators in the same position.

Senator Murray got up to speak, and I understand that. I suppose he wants to make some comment, but I have a hunch that he is behind all this. However, his privileges were not violated in the same way as mine were, because he at least got a letter.

Some Hon. Senators: He wrote the letter!

Senator Olson: He probably wrote the letter, but I think he had it prepared. Anyway, now we have reached the stage where I wonder if this place can do any business. I am not prepared to accept that this place can do any business when we do not have a rule book, when we have the kind of partisan demonstration that went on here this afternoon with the Speaker changing the rules. I tell you that I believe that we have a very serious obligation to make certain that no business is conducted under these conditions.

So, as I say, we have to change a couple of things. We have to re-establish that everybody in here, including the Speaker, is going to respect the rules. That is first. I am afraid—and I am very sad to have to say this—but I do not believe that you can preside over this chamber any more. I do not believe that there are enough people who have confidence, that you are going to respect the rules in this place that we should carry on any business. I seed the smirk on Senator Murray's face right now and it reminds me of what Diefenbaker used to say. I just reminded Senator Murray a few minutes ago. "I heard the voice of Essau but I saw the hand of Job."

Senator Steuart: Hear, Hear!

Senator Murray: Jacob.

Senator Olson: Well, you would rather be Jacob. I understand he was the crook of the two brothers.

Senator Steuart: He was not a Tory, either!

Senator Olson: I do not know whether he was a Tory or not. In any event, that is the situation. It is the worst violation of the rules and destruction of the right and privileges of members of Parliament—that is the members of Parliament who are in this chamber—and I really do not believe that I can be part of carrying on any more business under this situation. So we had better get to the business of trying to resolve it. I can see faces on the other side there that are just as sad as I feel over the fact that we have seen such a terrible trammelling of the rules by—well, by the Prime Minister in the first instance, but then, more specifically, what happened this afternoon.

● (2030)

I seriously hope that all of us can come up with a resolution so that we can get back to dealing with the business before this

[Senator Olson.]

House. Let me say, though, that I do not ever want to hear any Tory talk about the rules of democracy again.

We know what happened to this bill in the other place. Two members from my province who voted against this bill, Mr. Kilgour and Mr. Kindy, were kicked out of caucus.

Senator Perrault: They were thrown out.

Senator Olson: Yes, they were thrown right out.

What happened next was that closure was invoked to get the bill off to committee. Then the government refused to hear those who wanted to make representations on the bill. Hundreds of people and many groups from Alberta wanted to appear before that committee, but what did the chairman of that committee do? He told them that they did not understand it, that they were like a bunch of grade three school kids, and he continued to insult them. That was Blenkarn's committee.

When they closed all stages of debate over there, the bill was sent to the Senate, and what happened here? We referred it to a committee, because we knew that Canadians across the country had not had their say in what is a democracy—and that is why we have committees of parliament.

At the first meeting, and particularly the meeting of the committee in Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland—I was there—the Tory members moved in and disrupted the meeting and tried to kill that committee. They had a bunch of flunkies from Senator Murray's office and from the office of the Minister of Finance, and they did everything they could conceive of to disrupt the meetings.

After you sit and listen to that sort of thing for a while you get suspicious. They did not want the people to talk about Bill C-62 because they were so ashamed of it. They did not want hearings. They raised points of order and other garbage all the time. I see some of those senators sitting opposite, and I can tell them that I was never so ashamed.

That is the history of Bill C-62. Whether it is going to destroy the Senate or not, I do not know, but I hope we can patch things up and again have some dignity in this institution, but I am not too sure of that. However, I am sure of one thing, which is that I am going to do whatever I can to make sure no more business is conducted in the Senate until we get some honour and respect regarding the rules that apply to all senators. Don't deprive me of my privileges!

I am sorry to say this, but I do not think there are very many senators who have confidence in the Speaker, enough confidence to allow him to carry on, and that is sad. But that is the situation.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I should like to express the feelings I have on this matter. I have been in this chamber for 15 years. I have never risen in this place because somebody said anything about my rights; I have never heard anyone talk about them before.

Quite frankly, I have never been impressed by the rules or understood them very well, but I have always been amazed by people like Senator Doody, Senator Frith and others who have a capacity to understand the rules. I have always had great respect for them because I know that institutions such as this do not work well without rules.

Whatever you do in any aspect of your life, you have to have rules, and if you do not have rules you will not get anywhere. It is sad for me to see a person sitting in the chair, a person appointed by the Prime Minister, who is putting through one of the most unpopular measures ever placed before the country, and feeling he has the right to take instructions to ram this thing through regardless of the rules. He could eventually have done that, I am sure, within the rules, had he been smart enough to sit back and wait; but he was not; he had to take sides. He has experience. He has his name in this great book about the Speakers of the Senate. All of a sudden he has become a disgrace.

It seems to me that something as basic as the rules under which we operate—well, for God's sake, if you do not follow your own rules, who else will follow them? We are the rule-makers. As Canadian senators, we are law-makers. If we do not follow the law, why should anyone else?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: I have heard many nice things said about Senator Keon in the past week. I have never met the gentleman—I hope I will, although I do not know if he will want to speak to me. I hope he does. I have never heard of a person held in such esteem in this country.

I would like to ask him this: If Lyin' Brian had called on him and explained, when he asked him to sit in the Senate, that he could not get this legislation through without his support, and gave him one other small detail—not a big one, just a small one—that being: "By the way, doctor, the people of northern Canada will pay a higher percentage of GST on a pair of shoes than people in Toronto will pay on the same pair of shoes" whether he would have accepted his appointment.

The people of the north have a hard time earning a living. Their cost of living is already so bloody high. A litre of milk in Hall Beach is now $3.86, but there is no GST on milk. However, there is GST on freight. The cost of a litre of milk in Calgary is the same as it is in Hall Beach, but there is GST on freight. If the Prime Minister had told you that, Senator Keon, would you be here explaining to the people of Canada that you are going to jam this down their throats? I do not think so. I think you are too much of a man to do that. I can only say one thing to you, and then I promise I will leave you alone. I have the greatest respect for you, but Canadians, the people of this country, have a right to be wrong. If the GST is wrong and they do not want it, and if it is right for them, and they do not want it, do not give it to them. If they choose to be wrong, and Brian Mulroney and his group over here choose to inflict it on them, so be it; but you, Senator Keon, are above that kind of behavious and always have been. I think you should stay above it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: There are a couple of other senators in whom I am rather disappointed. There are many senators on that side, as there are on this side, who have had to follow the line. That is the way it has always been done; that is the way it always will be done. However, there are senators sitting over there who are really good friends—at least, I thought so, and I hope they will be after this. I am thinking of Senator Muir, Senator Marshall, Senator Rossiter and Senator Spivak. I know where they come from. I know that the people in their areas despise this tax. I know their jobs have always been undertaken with great respect, and that they have always been ready to fight anyone who might say otherwise. If anyone ever stepped between Bob Muir and someone from Cape Breton, he would get his head knocked off, because his people always come first.

• (2040)

Jack Marshall's veterans always came first. For some reason, which I do not understand, these great people—and they were great people before this, and I think they will be after—have been conned into thinking that in this particular instance they should abandon their people and their greatest friends and follow the Prime Minister, who does not even have 15 per cent support in the polls. In fact, in Newfoundland he is probably at 9 per cent. You sure are not doing it on behalf of the people of your area, so you have to be doing it for some other reason. You are not doing it for security. All of you are here and safe. You are going to be here for a long time. If they kick you out of their caucus, you are welcome in ours. So they cannot get you. What the hell is going on?

I want to say to you the same thing I said once before: The people of Canada have the right to be wrong! If they are wrong in rejecting the GST, so be it! But they have the right to be wrong. There is one thing we have to come back to: What has happened in this house? I strenuously support my colleagues who spoke previously. I do not understand how this chamber could do any business from here on until an established set of rules are followed. We have some rules. If you do not like them, you have the majority and can change them. But until you change them they must be followed. Unless they are followed, I do not understand how we, or the people of Canada, can be expected to accept any legislation that passes through this chamber. I do not think it is possible. I will do everything I can to fight it.

I just want to end, honourable senators, by saying to our Speaker—I no longer like calling him the Speaker, because I can hardly look at the man—that I think, sir, you are an absolute disgrace to this chamber. You are a disgrace to the Canadian parliamentary system, and you should hang your head in shame, sir. The day you step out of that chair I may be prepared to retract my words, but, until then, I want to tell you that I think you are a Brian Mulroney flunky and should be ashamed of yourself, because I am ashamed of you. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, what can only be described as grievous damage has been inflicted upon the parliamentary system this day. Historians are going to write about this day, and those who voted for this undemocratic action can only be charged by history with complicity for a deed that I never thought would occur in any parliamentary assembly in this country.

I have served in three parliamentary assemblies in Canada. I was the leader of a beleaguered opposition in the province of British Columbia against wily W.A.C. Bennett, who was always accused of breaching the rules and being unfair to the opposition. In his blackest moments, W.A.C. Bennett never resorted to removing the legitimate rights of the opposition to protest an action by the government. Never! In those nine years I had never seen anything like it.

There are some members here who have had a lot of experience in parliament. Senator Hatfield, in his secret heart, could not support this kind of measure under any circumstances. I ask Senator Hatfield: Can you imagine a situation where you would deny the opposition the right to exercise its responsibility to disagree with the government? Do you realize that legitimately dozens of our members in opposition were denied the opportunity to know that that vote was going to take place, which is why they were not in the chamber? You cannot condone that.

Senator Buchanan, you had a great record in Nova Scotia, and you know better. I too served in a legislature and we would never have attempted this kind of action. Never!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hatfield: You did on the 24th of September.

Senator Perrault: Senator Meighen is over there. Do you think his ancestor would have tolerated this for one minute? He must be rotating in his grave tonight thinking of the way you voted. You should be ashamed of yourself! You know about the British parliamentary tradition. Your family has written about it, and not one essay ever advocated lessening the powers of the opposition, ever!

Senator Simard, who was almost a one-man wrecking squad in attempting to disrupt the hearings across Canada this past summer, should know more about the parliamentary system.

Senator Simard: I was there on September 24!

Senator Perrault: Senator Keon, you really should be back at the hospital again. I am sure you never realized that you were getting involved with a mob that would act like this. Jack Marshall, my friend, do you think John Diefenbaker would ever stand for this kind of nonsense! He would never tolerate it. Senator Molson, you have given us some of the best rules in this Senate. How could you support it?

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Perrault: Senator Forrestall, who is not present, can you imagine tolerating this kind of abuse of the opposition? Never! Senator Everett, what the hell are you defending this for?

Senator Steuart: Hear, hear!

Senator Everett: I will tell you.

Senator Perrault: You are going to have to make a convincing speech.

Senator Everett: I hope I will get the time to make it.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: We will try to leave you a little.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

Senator Perrault: The trouble is that some of the members in this chamber have never seen the cold steel of an election. They do not know what it is to fight to be elected in opposition or in government. With all of the great editorials written in the Globe and Mail by you, senator, the Globe and Mail never supported a violation of human rights on this scale. Never!

There are some people here who have never been in an elected assembly. They really do not know what it is all about. They do not know what our ancestors fought for. They do not know anything about the Magna Carta. They do not know about the struggle that took place in order to put a Speaker in place who would be absolutely and utterly objective according to the principles laid down in the rules of the legislative body — not because he gets a telephone call from the Leader of the Government in the Senate or from the leader of the party.

The words are right here. Let these experts on rules stand up and tell me what is wrong with page 70, which says:

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote. The Speaker puts the question again. All senators in favour of the motion rise, and the Clerk of the Senate records their names on the division sheet. All senators opposed to the motion rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. All senators who wish to abstain then rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. The Clerk announces the official result of the division, giving the number of "yeas", the number of "nays" and the "abstentions". The Speaker then declares the motion carried or lost.

Then instead of the rules of this chamber, we get a tawdry letter from your office, sir, signed personally by you.

Some Hon. Senators: I did not get it!

Senator Perrault: I received my copy of this letter 20 minutes ago. Listen to this letter:

> Dear Senator,
> In light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties within the Senate to assemble Senators for a division within a reasonable time . . .

Who are you to say what is a reasonable time? Do you realize that we are debating the most profound tax change in the history of this nation? And you say, "I have decided it is long enough and I shall decree that they are going to come back in again."

• (2050)

Yesterday, honourable senators, we saw the reunification of Germany. That was a major world event. In 1933 there was a dictator named Adolf Hitler who wanted to enhance his power. He created an incident in order to give himself the extraordinary power which he required to establish absolute dictatorship in Germany. Well, on that occasion they burned the Reichstag and Hitler demanded so-called "Special Powers". Do senators opposite want to set the buildings on fire tonight and ask for extraordinary powers tomorrow?

Is this the Conservative game plan? Is this what they are doing? They have already started a fire. This fire is not going to go out. I want to tell them this: Even Hitler allowed a two-day debate before he got his special powers—two days. And one Conservative member said to me yesterday: "We are going to keep you up until 4:00 a.m. Saturday morning and we are going to have all our bills passed."

Honourable senators, we are going to beat Hitler's record. He had a two-day debate. Senator Simard, that's right—that's what we are going to do. Senator, you ought to be ashamed of yourself! What kind of dictatorship did you serve in New Brunswick? The Speaker has said that he would stop the division bells and would put the question before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. this day. The doors were closed at 5:25 p.m. He said: "I have taken this decision"—Ach tung!—"after much reflection to protect the rights of individual senators to perform their duties."

You had no right to do that, sir, and the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association will be advised off your actions. You had no right to do that. I hope that you are in a position to defend yourself.

The person who calls himself the Speaker should have resigned before yielding to the pressure from the Prime Minister's office and from the office of the government leader in this place. That was the decent thing to do. The Speaker in the other chamber from my province of British Columbia chastised the government for its improper use of public money before the GST had been passed by that chamber. He had the courage to stand up to that great Tory blue horde—the same Tory government which is now accused of false GST advertising by the Canadian Advertising Council. That is the same Conservative party which rammed this bill through the House of Commons, so much so that the chairman of the Finance Committee of the other place, Mr. Blenkarn, in a rare moment of candour, said that he was sorry he had been undemocratic and perhaps a bit abrupt.

There are many Conservatives who are upset with the goods and services tax. One of them kindly lent us your tactical document about how to handle the public on the GST. I hold in my hands a copy of that document. Would senators like to hear the party line? Perhaps some of the newcomers have not seen this document yet. I want to read it for the public.

Senators, the idea is this: The GST is so unpopular from coast to coast, so disliked by the people, that the strategy is to divert attention completely from the GST and its iniquitous nature and instead to attack the Liberal Party and the Liberal senators for trying to fight for the great majority of the people of this country. That is the general tactic. That is the game plan.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question? He has referred to a document. Is he prepared to lay that document on the table of this house?

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senators, I will lay that document on the table, and I thank the honourable senator for his constructive suggestion.

Honourable senators, the general strategy is to vilify the Liberals in the Senate. Don't try to speak about the GST. Do senators realize that from the very moment we bean our hearings across Canada every effort was made by people from the leader's staff to disrupt the proceedings of that committee across the country? I spent many days with the committee and can attest to the fact that there was a concerted effort by Conservatives not to speak about the features of the GST but to defame the chairman of the committee, Senator Buckwold, who is an outstanding chairman and was fully vindicated. I say with absolute candour that they should be ashamed of themselves. But it was part of the Conservative strategy to attack the Liberals in the Senate and to question their right to do anything.

The Tory prompt sheet states as follows: "Our key message: This is a question of democracy—the right of the elected government to carry on business on behalf of the people it represents. Above all, this is not about the GST." Oh—don't talk about the GST. Don't talk about the fact that Newfoundland is going to be chopped by this tax and will have to pay far more than it should per item than cental Canada will. Don't talk about the fact that it is totally unjust to the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories. Don't make reference to that or you might get burnt!

Don't make reference to the fact that every social welfare organization in Canada has condemned the GST, saying that it is impossible to deliver the benefits that are alleged to be provided to the lower income groups. Don't mention the fact that the Roman Catholics and the United Church of Canada and the Anglicans and several other churches are opposed to the GST. Don't mention the fact that the CLC and every trade union organization in Canada is opposed to it. Don't mention the fact that John Bulloch has stated that this is the worst retail sales tax in the world by far and has said that at the very least we ought to postpone it for six months. No, don't mention any of those things.

Tell the people that this is going to help them

I referred a couple of days ago to the Ivory Coast in the 1960s. They have now shoved the GST in the Ivory Coast up to 25 per cent. Everywhere it has been introduced it has been enormously increased. It has become a cash cow, introduced by those governments unable or unwilling to practise restraint and to present a program of sensible expenditures and reasonable economies. It is the lazy government's way to milk more money out of the taxpayer's pocket.

I know that some new senators entered this chamber with rapturous joy the other day. Let me ask you this question: Do you think you could have been elected here? Senator Meighen, do you think you could have been elected here the way Senator Waters was? You would have finished at the bottom of the poll and you know it. Yet you come to the chamber prepared, apparently, to vote for a measure which is bitterly opposed by the people of your area.

Oh, there are other questions in this document. Listen to this: "Why have we stacked the Senate by appointing eight new senators?" Well, even the Conservative Party uses the word "stacked". Why have we stacked the Senate?

Senator Grafstein: Roll the dice and stack the Senate!

Senator Perrault: This is a boldfaced admission. Senator Kelly, did you help prepare this document?

Senator Kelly: I have not seen it, sir.

Senator Perrault: Well, perhaps we can get you a copy. "Why have the Tories stacked the Senate by appointing eight new senators?" This is the answer Tories are advised to give: "That the Liberal senators have consistently obstructed legislative proposals in the Senate after they have been passed by the House of Commons." It is an absolute lie! The word "lie" may be unparliamentary, sir. I will not withdraw that, because that statement is a lie!

The Conservative government has had almost 300 bills passed by this Senate since 1984. Ten bills have been amended, including constructive amendments proposed by Liberals, and only two are awaiting further study.

We used to have a system in this parliamentary democracy—if we still have one—whereby, if we had a deadlock, there was a conference between the two houses.

Your problem is that Mr. Harvey Andre and the members of his gang over there have refused to sit down and confer with the Senate as we have done traditionally for dozens of years. That is the reason why those bills have not been passed as yet.

• (2100)

There is no reason why any outstanding differences could not have been resolved long ago. However, the Tory party line, and again I quote from this official document, is:

> The Liberal Senators have consistently obstructed legislative proposals in the Senate after they have been passed by the House of Commons.

Listen to this pious hypocrisy:

> This is contrary to our system of government in which responsibility rests with elected representatives in the Commons.

And again from this document:

> The government was obliged to overcome the obstructionism of the Liberal Senate majority and defend our system of responsible government.

Well, you did not do a very good job today of defending responsible government. However, that is your party line. Do not talk about anything in the GST; do not talk about the fact that it has been condemned by the single mothers in Canada; do not talk about the fact that it has been condemned by the co-operatives, the grain terminals, and you name it. Make sure that you divert the attention of the media to an assault on the Senate and the Liberals in the Senate. That is the strategy.

There is another question in this great Conservative document which asks:

> The government says opposition to the GST is undemocratic. But aren't the Liberal Senators only acting as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition?

This is what Tories should say, says the document:

> This is not about the GST. It's about Liberal Senators denying the elected Government its right to govern.

Again this is the party line.

Do not talk about the GST, Senator Buchanan. It is going to really hurt your province. You were one of the leading opponents of the GST when you were premier. Sir, I may suggest that you have undergone the greatest conversion since St. Paul went to Damascus. You attacked it. You said the GST was unfair, regressive, and just a way for the federal government to make money. We have your quotation. Tell us when, in the last three weeks, that startling moment of revelation made you change your mind.

Then the Conservative party line states:

> Liberal senators are violating one of the most basic principles of our democracy—responsible government.

You have raped responsible government this afternoon; that is what you have done to it. The Leader of the Government's problem is that he never fought an election.

Senator Murray: Not true.

Senator Perrault: He does not know what the rights of the opposition really are. He has never had to fight for them.

Senator Simard: You are wrong again.

Senator Perrault: Resign your seat and run for the Commons and you will get the experience you need, Mr. Leader.

But back to the Tory prompt sheet. Listen to this, Tories, and use this line. Senators, are you making notes?

> This is how our system works—governments are elected to make decisions on behalf of the Canadian people and are accountable to the Canadian people for their actions.

Many years ago we framed this Constitution. Senator Macquarrie, you are a noted historian and I know there is a great deal of support for the Senate in the Atlantic provinces with their great historical backgrounds When Canada was born, a system of checks and balances was established in this country to make sure the excesses of the Commons could be checked.

Yes, we do not have an elected chamber and I will support resolutions and motions to create an elected Senate. I will be glad to do that. But until that time arrives, this chamber should not be acquiescing in everything the other chamber does, if the public interest is seriously affected. For example, if that other chamber should bring in a measure clearly opposed to the regional interests of any area of Canada, do you think our only responsibility is to say, yes, we are going to vote for it, because those people in the House of Commons, regardless of the fact that they are demonstrably and provably wrong, said this action should be taken? Of course not!

We are really discussing whether or not a measure is sufficently important for the Senate to use its ultimate power of veto. The Canadian people, with a loud "Yes", are saying to the Senate that it must ask the government why it is doing this and the Senate must act in their interest.

The next question on the Tory fact sheet—which is rather thick, isn't it—

Senator Buckwold: Like their heads.

Senator Perrault: —states:

> The constitutional provision to appoint new Senators has never been used before. After 123 years, doesn't this mean it is effectively null and void?

That is stated in this Tory propoganda sheet And now, this is what Tories are supposed to answer—Conservative senators:

> Canada's leading authorities on Parliament and the Constitution have made it clear that the government is within its rights to use Section 26 of the Constitution Act (1967) to appoint new Senators.

There are other leading authorities, and you and I both know them, who challenge that opinion. It is obscene for the Government of Canada to proceed with any bills until we hear from the courts to assure us that the new senators, however they are described—supernumeries, specials, territorials, divisionals, the Mulroney mugwumps—I guess they are not mugwumps, but however they are described—are here legally. Of course it is.

Tory question 4—and it should be on blue paper—is:

> Why not have a referendum on the GST and let the people decide?

That is an appealing idea and I think I would support that. Would you support that? I would think that the people would also support that idea. Is that not a good idea? One would think the answer would be, "Of course; this is a great idea." No, it does not say that. It states:

> The people did decide. In the last election Canadians gave the government a mandate.

What is your mandate today? Senator, you are nodding your head vigorously. What is the percentage of Conservative support in your province right now? No, you are not interested in polls. I can understand. In Canada, it is running at 15 per cent and it is plunging. The only organization in Canada with a half point less support is the Flat Earth Society.

The fact is that your suggestion that a referendum on the GST is unnecessary because the people gave your government a mandate in 1988 to reform the tax system is invalid! It was not a commitment that you were going to introduce a 7 per cent tax or a 9 per cent tax of this type!

Would the Alberta senators please send us clippings of all of the Alberta speeches made by Mr. Mulroney in the last federal election in support of the idea of a goods and services tax for the Province of Alberta? Can we receive all the clippings to reassure us that there was a popular groundswell of support for this idea?

Then this Tory propaganda sheet says:

> The government's intentions have always been clear and up front.

You were not clear and up front this afternoon. You were rather devious. You have not followed your own party line in the private Tory party paper from which I am reading.

At the bottom it states:

> In the televised debate just before the last election, the Prime Minister said clearly that the existing federal sales tax would be changed.

He also said that taxes would be reduced and benefits would be increased.

Question 5 in this basic primer for Conservative activists states:

> The government says it wants to get on with its agenda. So why has it bogged down in a fight about the GST?

This is what you are told to say to them:

> This is not about the GST. It's about un-elected Liberal Senators denying the elected government its right to govern.

It seems to me that is something like one of the previous questions. You seem to be obsessed with this particular theme. This is a theme that you obviously believe should be repeated.

Then it states, to remind them:

> For 19 years, the Liberal majority in the Senate did not contest any measure proposed by the governing Liberals in the House of Commons.

When we were the government there were many occasions when the Senate of Canada conferred with our own people in the other place in order to bring about numerous amendments in legislation, and even your own Conservative members are aware of that fact. The "no contest" claim constitutes an untruthful statement.

Tory question 6 asks:

> How exactly is the Liberal majority in the Senate obstructing government business?
> Apart from the GST, the Liberal Senators are refusing to pass three other financial bills.

Now, you know how dishonest and phoney that is. You realize that your people in the other chamber will not even sit down and confer about the bills. There is an established parliamentary procedure when there is a deadlock and you have not even attempted to invoke the provision calling for a conference. Senator Meighen can you support that? Do you think your great ancestor would have supported that?

• (2110)

A further loaded Tory question is:

> The Liberals say that they are acting in the public interest by opposing the GST. How do Conservatives respond to that?

Answer: The Liberals are being opportunistic and they know it.

There, again, is the suggested Tory theme: namely, just attack the Liberals and their party; do not talk about anything in the GST. That is why the opposition has been so disruptive in its tactics—namely, to prevent the report of the committee from even being tabled.

Tory question number eight—there is more here, but I cannot read all of this tawdry , inaccurate document because there is not time; however I will make it available to the media—states that opposition parties and others claim—I know that the leader is bored because he has a copy of this marked with a big red star on his desk. He has to follow the party line. I know that he has read it before, but do not be bored; some of your other supporters have not heard it yet.

Question eight states:

Opposition parties and others claim that your Senate appointments are unconstitutional.

The suggested Tory answer is:

There is no conflict between Section 26 and Section 51 and the appointment of the eight senators.

The senators appointed under Section 26 have been appointed to represent divisions—-

And so on. As honourable senators know, we are claiming that the courts should determine this. For a government that has been seeking to improve relations with the provinces and the territories, surely it is quite understandable that, as a courtesy to them, in recognition of the vital part they play in Confederation, you should hear from the courts before you provide the new senators with the right to vote on important matters in this chamber.

I do not know what we are to expect from this point on. I do not think the Senate will ever be the same after this evening. I think it is the night of the long knives for the Senate, in which the Conservatives have attempted to slit the throats of the Opposition. It is an ominous portent for the future.

I hope that at least it will hasten Senate reform and people will be so outraged by what has taken place here that we will have a new Senate; a Senate representative of the great regions of this country; a Senate that will be a unifying influence instead of a divisive force; a Senate with equal or near-equal representation for all of the regions; and, above all, an elected chamber that will never tolerate this kind of nonsense.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, my privileges have been violated. I was not given notice of any of the changes that took place this afternoon—

Senator Hastings: Shame!

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Waters: —despite the fact that I took the trouble to phone the Speaker's office. I spoke to the Speaker and was assured that the notice had been placed in my office. I went to the office at 7.30, shortly before this meeting tonight, and I have still not seen that notice.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Waters: I am very upset and very distressed.

An Hon. Senator: Join the crowd!

Senator Waters: My major concern tonight—and I speak to all honourable senators—concerns the performance that occurred here. It was absolutely shameful, and we should be ashamed of ourselves. This is the senior house in Canada. We invited the press, the cameras and the radios into this chamber—

An Hon. Senator: The people!

Senator Waters: —to view the disgraceful, irresponsible, undisciplined conduct of the senior legislators in this land.

Senator Murray: Senator Molgat, listen!

Senator Waters: I found that acutely embarrassing. That is not the way to resolve whatever differences there are on either side of the house. It is the road to anarchy, and it cannot happen again.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Senator: It is the only way left under the circumstances.

Senator Waters: Whatever the circumstances, there is a mature and responsible way of dealing with it. There is the rule of law, and I fully support the use of this rule book. There is no sense in a freshman senator like myself getting a rule book, and reading it, only to find out that it is not followed but ignored.

An Hon. Senator: You are telling that to the Speaker, of course.

Senator Waters: I am telling it to all of us.

An Hon. Senator: And the Speaker!

Senator Waters: We were all responsible for that disgraceful performance. We all stood around waiting for someone else to take action. We are very responsible, mature individuals. On this side of the house they sat deploring it; on that side of the house you could hardly wait to have more cameras and microphones shoved in your faces to take advantage of a very unusual situation, which the people of Canada will see on their television sets tonight. They will be ashamed of the performance in here. Of course things are going badly for the Senate. It should be reformed.

There was a famous old Roman senator called Cato. He was also an old soldier. He finished every speech in the Senate by saying in Latin—and I will not repeat the Latin—"Carthage must be destroyed." I am an old soldier and I am a new senator. I will end all of my speeches with this statement: The Senate must be reformed.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to the presentation by my colleague, Senator Perrault, who confirmed in writing what I learned from experience. Members of this chamber will know, from my previous remarks last week and the week before, the kind of trials and tribulations that were imposed on my committee as we dealt with Bill C-62. Believe me, they followed the instructions of what was presented to the Senate this evening to the letter.

Whoever was the guiding force followed the rules. They were there, and I was the victim of having to spend several weeks travelling the country, listening to evidence and being literally torn apart by those eager senators on the other side following their orders, which were read by Senator Perrault. Although I have never seen it in writing, I think I could have written the paper myself.

We are faced with dealing with Bill C-62. For weeks the committee was urged to bring in the bill as quickly as possible. Senators demanded that we report at once within a few days and lay down a timetable because we had to get this thing through.

We then come to our famous committee meeting on a Monday approximately three weeks ago or two weeks ago—I lose track of the time. All of a sudden they needed another week to fly in the parachuted senators and drop them down here. They then spent several days—at least two days—delaying this chamber in the tabling of my report.

To this day I have not been able to give my speech. I have been denied that right to speak on the report of the committee, which represented the majority view. I have been absolutely stymied by being unable to do this. I am still waiting for the opportunity. Every day I come to the chamber with my remarks in hand. However, I have not yet had the opportunity to present them. I am not sure that I ever will.

Senator Simard: You will.

● (2120)

Senator Buckwold: There he goes again, honourable senators. You are a disgrace to this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: I did not tell honourable senators all the stories about what Senator Simard did. Let me tell the House how senators opposite cajoled and tried to undermine our morale. When we were in Edmonton I walked out of the hearing room into the foyer. Senator Simard was across the way. Feeling that he might get to me, because it was a tough morning, he said, "Senator, the rumour is that you are resigning as chairman of the committee". Do honourable senators think that is a nice thing to send across the way? He said it just to make me feel good! However, I did not rise to the bait. I yelled back across the foyer, "That rumour is not quite right, senator. The real rumour is that I am asking to be appointed chairman for life!"

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators will remember that Senator Simard took part in the character assassinations that were going on, something which is absolutely in line with everything that Senator Perreault has said.

With all the haste, with all the camouflage, with the cloaks and daggers and the fancy footwork, let us not forget what this whole thing is all about. It is about Bill C-62.

My major reason for standing tonight is to remind the Canadian public that what has brought on this whole crisis in the Senate—not to mention the disgraceful performance of the Speaker today—was as a result of the government's determination to push forward against every obstacle, against the views of 85 per cent of Canadians, a very unpopular, unworkable and unfeasible tax.

Honourable senators, I will not go on too long in my remarks. However, I would like to go into some other details. I would like to ask a series of questions, because the government, in presenting its goods and services tax bill, has misled the Canadian public almost from day one. The propaganda has been unbelievable. It has culminated in the kind of action that we have tonight in the Speaker's ruling. He said that he had to call back the Senate, against every precedent, because he had to protect the rights of individual senators to perform their duties.

Without going into too many of the details of our report, I would like to ask a series of questions. Is the government honest in advertising that this tax replaces another tax?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that this tax is fair?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that this tax is not regressive?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says this tax is equitable?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that this tax is regionally even-handed?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that this tax is visible?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that this tax is revenue neutral?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says this tax helps the poor?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that there is no tax on food?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that there is no tax on health?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that there is no tax on education?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest when it says that there is no tax on housing or rent?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest in denying that the real inflation effect of this tax is going to be negligible?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest in saying that this goods and services tax will have no effect on our important tourist industry?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest in using closure in the House of Commons?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: Is the government honest in saying that it has all the answers and that citizens who oppose this tax are absolutely stupid?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Buckwold: I am sure senators opposite would like to join the chorus of no's. I am sure that deep down they feel exactly the same as senators on this side of the House feel.

Honourable senators, this is a bad tax. It is not acceptable to the Canadian people.

I look at my friend Senator Doyle, who was a hero of mine in the days when he was the fighting editor of a great newspaper. I said to him the other day—and I am not giving away any secrets—"Really, Senator Doyle, I was disappointed when we had a representation made protesting the tax on reading materials, on newspapers, in particular The Globe and Mail. I am not sure whether it will be worth another 7 per cent now". I said, "When you were the editor of that paper your editorials would have been roaring, 'How dare a government put a tax on reading, on newspapers, on books, especially school books and education'!" Senator Doyle shook his head and laughed a little bit.

Senator Doyle, I was disappointed in you, because deep down I know that you were a crusader. Yet you stood there, along with Senator Barootes and Senator David—two medical doctors—and listened to the evidence of the Canadian Medical Association in which they made complaints. The implications were there. The representatives of the medical association pleaded with the committee to do something about this tax on health, something which will be borne by doctors and which, eventually, will somehow have to be passed on to patients. There was not a word out of them, except words to defend the government. I was disappointed in these men since they are people for whom I have a great deal of respect.

I was disappointed in Senator Robertson who, in her home Province of New Brunswick, listened to the Minister of Finance for that province, who told us that this tax will cost the Province of New Brunswick, which is a small and not very rich province, $20 million. That is a lot of money in New Brunswick.

Senator Simard: But it is a gain for the citizens.

Senator Buckwold: That is a pile of bunk—absolute bunk!

I was disappointed when I heard senators, who are here to represent their provinces and their regions, senators who took an oath of office which ensures that the interests of citizens in their province are fairly represented in this chamber, endorse the kind of proposals that were made, which will have a deleterious effect on the provinces across the country. This bothered me, because they are decent people across the way.

So I say to honourable senators, were they honest?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I feel that this is probably the saddest day in the history of Parliament as we know it in Canada. Certainly, it is the saddest day since I arrived here some eighteen years ago. My personal privileges were abused and violated this afternoon. I received no notice, no letter, that the practices which have stood the test of time, the practices which are historic in this chamber, were to be changed. What has happened here today is tantamount to a coup d'état.

• (2130)

I was in Paraguay last year shortly after a coup when the long-time dictator, Stroessner, was overthrown by the present President, President Rodriguez. I was also in Namibia last year. I was asked to go there to help that country in its pursuit of freedom and democracy. I was in the Philipines when Marcos was overthrown, and I returned a year later for the first election under a new Constitution. Earlier this year I was asked by the Federation of Protestant Churches in East Germany to visit that country and meet with most of the major parties to help advise them as to the democratic process. Also, earlier this year I was in Hungary when that country and its people achieved democratic government.

One thing the people in those countries had in common was that they were looking for freedom and democracy. They were attempting to strengthen democracy or achieve it. They looked to Canada and its institutions as being the kinds of examples they could adopt for use as models. Sadly, after today they will not be looking to this country and its institutions.

When this process began, and when the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and commerce determined that it was going to travel the country, I asked myself whether or not we had the constitutional right to defeat, amend or delay this piece of legislation. I decided, like most other people in this chamber, that we should listen to the people.

It was decided that the committee would travel from coast to coast. Approximately 80 to 85 per cent of the people of this country have told us to reject this legislation. We have heard testimony free from constitutional experts, and I am sure we will hear from the courts in the not too distant future.

During the committee's hearing in Halifax we heard from many witnesses and interest groups over a two-day period. I asked a question of the President of Co-op Atlantic, Sid Pobihushchy. As a preamble to that question, I said:

> We had quite a discussion this morning about democracy. As a Senate committee, we have several options with respect to this legislation; we can pass it as it is, we can kill it, we can amend it, or we can delay it.

There are more than 160,000 families who own those co-operatives in Atlantic Canada. Those families include over 500,000 people in the region. I said to the President of Co-op Atlantic:

> You represent a large segment of society in Atlantic Canada. You speak for a significant number of people. There has been a lot of discussion as to whether or not it would be legitimate for the Senate to kill this bill. What are your feelings on that?

Mr. Pobihushchy replied:

> I wanted to preface my response with a reminder that the delegates at the last annual general meeting of Co-op Atlantic overwhelmingly mandated the leadership to express the view to the government that they did not want the GST. They do not want this kind of taxation system, so they want it killed. That is what they said, and I agree with them.

I am reading this into the record because the President of Co-op Atlantic represents the ordinary people whom we were sent to represent in this chamber.

With respect to whether or not the death of the GST should come by the action of the Senate, he went on to say:

> . . . there has been a lot of talk in the recent past about Senate reform. Some of that talk has been interesting; most of it has been irrelevant, but at the apex of the Canadian democracy sits Parliament. Parliament is charged with a particular mandate by the Constitution—that is, to provide peace, order and good government. We are talking here about good government. That charge in the Canadian Constitution is not merely a charge to the House of Commons or to the Senate, but to Parliament. The House of Commons, as we know it, is an integral part of Parliament, as is the Senate. The House of Commons has rules under which it operates, as does the Senate. Sometimes it happens that the two houses of Parliament have less than a consensus or an agreement between them and then they have to rely on the rules, which, by the way, define, in large measure, the nature of Canadian democracy.
> We know that in the present case we have a government in place that was elected by something in the order of 43 per cent of the electorate. It is a powerful government. It has a healthy, handsome majority in the House of Commons, a majority that is not a function of the people's choice, but a majority as a function of the rules. Those rules also give the Senate an authority to act on behalf of the pursuit of good government, and it uses those rules, whatever they are, however they are designed, in that pursuit. If the rules permit and it is required to stand opposed to a particular piece of legislation, action or policy, it is duty-bound to do that. That is part and parcel of the Canadian democracy. I do not think we have any real serious difficulty with the Senate doing its job.

He concluded by saying:

> We have a difficulty with a Parliament that does not do its job, whether it is the House of Commons, the Senate or both.

I was asked to come here to represent the people of Nova Scotia. If my privileges were violated this afternoon, the privileges of the Nova Scotians whom I represent were also violated and abused. We have heard much talk about reform of the Senate. More properly it should be reform of Parliament—both houses. We have heard much talk about an elected Senate, which I personally favour. However, if we do not do our duty and live up to the responsibilities given to us by the Constitution of this country, and live up to our responsibilities to the people we represent in our individual provinces or territories, then I believe we should be abolished. One wonders, after seeing what has happened in this Parliament today, whether the guns of Oka can be far behind.

I regret very much that my privileges were abused and violated in the process, and I regret having to say, Senator Charbonneau, you have lost the confidence of the people on this side of the chamber.

• (2140)

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I would like to think that I have some good friends opposite. I would like to think that I have an extremely low boiling point, but I must confess that I am partisan. Free trade has been and is a disaster. Meech Lake could have been a disaster, if not for Clyde Wells, Elijah Harper, and Brian Mulroney's dice. Now an overwhelming majority of Canadians, more than 80 per cent, want to reject the GST. All this explains why the great old Tory party is under 15 per cent in the opinion polls. I used to know something about polls and I used to be active with polls in the Liberal party. I can remember that we had some awful polls, but never as low as 15 per cent. Think about it; the Tories in national numbers are at 15 per cent. The government is at 15 per cent and sinking.

What does this say about the tyranny and abuse of the majority? When it comes to the GST, should this government be allowed to thwart the will of the overwhelming majority of Canadians?

Let me pause to say a word or two about some of my colleagues. This has been a difficult exercise for all of us. First, I want to say how proud I am of, I guess, my oldest friend in this chamber. Senator Stanbury is close, but I am referring to Senator Frith, whom I have known since we were students at the University of Toronto. I have known Senator Frith in some difficult times, and I have known him in triumphant times, but I do not think that I have ever seen him more effective than he has been today. I want to say how proud I am of him.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Davey: I would be remiss if I did not say something about my old friend, David Steuart. Back when I had a butterfly net and was trying to find Liberals in Saskatchewan, one of my greatest and severest critics was David Steuart. However, long before tonight he became one of my dearest friends, and I can tell you, David, that stirring presentation you made tonight touched me. I think it was a triumph, and I am terribly grateful to you.

So much has been said about Sid Buckwold, and I would like to say something more. This man has more guts, more integrity, more determination and a greater commitment to this country than perhaps any of us in this chamber. Sid, we are very proud of you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Davey: Tonight we find ourselves in what can only be described as a tragedy—no, no, it is not a tragedy, it is really an attempt at a sleazy coup d'état. I can say to my friends opposite that in my time in the Senate I have never seen my colleagues so genuinely worked up as they are over this matter. Liberal senators—and I cannot speak for all of them—are genuinely and honestly disenchanted, disillusioned and dreadfully unhappy. I was in my office this afternoon between 4:30 and 5:30. I received no letter of any kind from the Speaker. I did receive a phone call from a colleague saying that there was a vote. I then discovered that I was the victim of a Tory lockout. My personal privileges had been abused.

Honourable senators, it is to weep, but this Speaker simply must go.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, first may I say that I, as a senator, never received notice of the call. How anyone could be so presumptuous as to say that someone else may pass the word on to me that there will be a call of the bells, and yet the Speaker — or the former Speaker, and I hope we can call him the former Speaker — has the guts to send a letter to Doug Everett to Senator Molson and not to Senator Waters or to a great many other senators, is beyond me. If there is no break in my privileges there, I guess I do not know what is going on in this place or in the other place. I believe that my privileges were raped and pillaged, and I can tell you that I feel dirty! I feel dirty about this whole thing.

For 21 years I have gone home at the end of every week here feeling proud of the job I have done. I was proud of the part I played in this parliamentary system, not merely in the Senate, but in the whole structure. I took some abuse from people saying that the Senate should be abolished or that it should be elected, but I was proud. Now I am going home and I do not know what to expect. I am going to go home ashamed of what has happened here! What do I tell my people? In my 21 years here never has such a disgraceful thing happened to me. It has happened to me.

I saw Senator Molson and Senator Everett joining in this rape and pillage of my privileges! I was locked out of this chamber when for 21 years I had walked freely into it. What type of shame am I taking home with me? What do I tell the people, that there was a majority who voted to take that action?

I want to talk just for a minute to my friend—and I guess I have to say former friend now—Duff Roblin, who was my mentor and with whom I worked for so many years on committees. We talked to each other and we negotiated with the government on issues. We came to meetings of minds. Poor Duff Roblin has to sit there and be part of that shame!

Duff—and I want to call you Duff—I feel bad about that.

I worked with Orville Phillips on the agriculture committee, and we did great work. We did a great job. We dealt with the government of the day and we brought forward a great report. We brought it forward for all Canadians, and now that is destroyed. The credibility of what we did has been destroyed. Do we just say that there has been a split in this place, that there are those guys and there are us guys?

• (2150)

It is terrible, because you know who loses? I don't lose, but the Canadian people lose. That is who is losing.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Sparrow: Let me talk for just a minute about the GST because that is the issue involved here. Twenty-five per cent of the people in my province live below the poverty line. They earn less than $10,000 a year. Ten per cent of the children in our province are getting food from food banks and charitable organizations. Fifteen per cent of the families are getting food from food banks, and yet Senator Molson, Senator Everett and the rest of you are prepared to bring in a tax that raises prices for those people. Don't tell me that the poor people will get a rebate. They will get $190 a year. Their total income is spent on necessities and yet you say they will get a rebate. What kind of nonsense is this?

What about our farmers who are suffering so badly? What about the ones whose very survival is at stake? Yet you say that they will get a rebate. They will get a rebate if they can afford to buy farm machinery. There is not a farmer in my province who can afford to buy a piece of machinery to get the rebate, but he or she is going to pay the tax on every other item they buy except food. What kind of nonsense is that?

Why don't we have the right to fight that in this chamber? Why don't we have the right to fight that within the parliamentary context? Why are my privileges being taken away? Under the Constitution I have absolutely every right to do what I am doing. I am here to oppose those things that are not beneficial to my people. I have that right, I have that privilege, and that is being taken away from me. I am ashamed of that, and I am going to go to my people and tell them what a shameful place this is—it just breaks my heart. I know those people back home, and it is going to break theirs.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Peter Stollery: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to rise for a few minutes to explain how my privileges as a senator have been taken from me. I was elected to the House of Commons during a minority government and I quickly learned the importance of rules and procedures. I learned that in parliament, particularly for minority opinions, the rules and procedures are the protection of the minority opinion in parliament.

Senator Murray and his cronies have totally lost the morality of parliament. I have been in the Parliament of Canada for 18 years and I have never seen it brought to the state that it was brought to today by Senator Murray and his cronies. They have totally lost—if they ever knew it—the idea that a parliament operates by the consent of the members of that body and that the rules and the procedures of that body are the protection the members of that body have. The people in a chamber of parliament are here to represent different opinions in the country. The opinions in the country are not just the opinions of Senator Murray and his cronies; there are other opinions in the country, and the place where they are expressed is Parliament. The guarantee that those opinions are expressed is the rules under which parliament operates.

Senator Murray and the Speaker have hijacked the rules today. They have made parliament illegitimate. Enmities have been created today which will last a lifetime. I would never have thought that I would see such a thing. I always had friends on all sides when I was in the House of Commons and here in the Senate. I have never seen parliamentarians so embittered as they were here today, and that bitterness will not easily leave from this chamber. Do not think that this place will operate tomorrow the way it operated yesterday, because we learned that Senator Murray and Senator Charbonneau clearly collaborated on a plan to establish a precedent. They established a way of holding a vote illegally and improperly.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stollery: They have caused disorder in the country. We are talking about a very unpopular tax bill that is being attempted to be passed by a government which has the lowest support in the country—around 15 per cent—of any government in any democracy in this century in the western world. You may say that the government has the right to pass this unpopular and, in my view, bad, regressive tax bill, but we happen to be in the opposition and we have views different from those of the government, and we are entitled to hold those views. That is why we have a parliament; that is why we have a chamber. Senator Murray and Senator Charbonneau hold the view held in countries that do not have the kind of system we have—that the majority rules to the exclusion of the minority opinions. The other opinions don't count. We will have a system where the other opinions are crashed and are not allowed to be expressed. This, of course, leads to disrespect for the law and disrespect for the country's institutions, because today we have seen Canada's Senate brought to a low that I do not think anyone could ever have conceived. Enmities have been created that will last the lifetime of members in this room. It will not end.

Honourable senators, I do not know where this hijacking, this attempt to rig a vote, is going to lead us. Can you imagine if this happened in a constituency during an election campaign? Why, the chief electoral officer would be there in 24 hours and there would be a police investigation. It has happened here and the Parliament of Canada has been brought into terrible disrepute. Members' privileges have been abused in a way which is so outrageous that it almost defies imagination.

• (2200)

It is hard to believe that they can say about the standing orders, or the rules, or whatever we call them, "We don't have them. We will establish a fake, phoney precedent. The rules says that the two whips have to appear. Well, we will corrupt the Speaker and we will get the Speaker to hold a vote illegally and then we will use that illegal vote as a precedent. That way, we can do anything we want, because we do not have to have proper and legitimate votes any more."

Senator Waters spoke today about the performance that took place at eight o'clock, with the cameras and the media, and all of that. Well, honourable senators, why did it happen? It happened because we are only a room with a red rug. We do not have any rules any more. We are not a parliamentary body, because a parliamentary body—

Senator Stewart: Has due process.

Senator Stollery: —has due process, as my friend, Senator Stewart, says. There are rules and procedures, and if we do not have those, then we do not exist. I do not think the people who conspired to give us this disgraceful performance have the imagination or the intelligence—the brutality that we saw here today makes words really fail one, except that we know we are seeing the end of democracy in Canada. Thank you.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable Senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Everett?

Senator Marsden: Senator Charbonneau did not send me this letter, just so that everybody knows.

Senator Frith: Honourable Senators, if I may have a moment, colleagues, if Senator Everett wishes to speak, I do not think we should run things the way they have been run here today. We should give him an opportunity to speak, and we should give Senator Murray an opportunity to speak. We do not do business the way they do business, now that we are deciding on the order. I think we should consider that.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: If I could follow on after Senator Marsden, I would appreciate it.

Senator Frith: Fine.

Senator Marsden: Honourable Senators, I did not receive that letter, as everyone knows from the list of names that are on the letter, and in not sending me this notice Senator Charbonneau has denied me the right to vote, as he has all other Senators who were locked out of the chamber. He was helped in this cause by all our colleagues opposite who participated in this breaking of the rules, in the travesty of what Parliament should be about.

If the decision to do this was a decision made by Senator Charbonneau alone, then, of course, it was very bad judgment, for which one can no longer have any respect. If he accepted the advice of others, then that, too, was perhaps even worse judgment, and that means that one can no longer have no confidence in anything he does or says in this chamber, and I think that is absolutely clear.

Last week, when Senator Martha Bielish was given the "bum's rush" out of this chamber, as she was, it was a sad day for the women of this country and for this chamber.

An Hon. Senator: Pushed out!

An Hon. Senator: Carried out!

Senator Marsden: Martha Bielish, a good friend of most of the people here, invoked the name of the five women from Alberta who brought the "Persons" case that allowed Senator Rossiter, Senator Cochrane, Senator Robertson, and all the other women in this chamber to be here at all. That was a very few years ago. That was in the lifetime of people in this chamber, and certainly in the lifetime of our mothers. I ask the women senators opposite, if no one else thought about it, whether they thought about this aspect of history when they participated this afternoon in denying us our vote, and whether they thought about the struggle of women in this country for the vote in 1916, in 1918, and when the wars that are depicted around here were being fought and women were being given the vote so that we would send more men off to fight? Whatever the reasons for the vote, did they think about that history when we were denied the right to vote this afternoon, and are they prepared so easily to deny the rights and rules of Parliament, which have developed for so many years? Did they think, too, about the reason for which they were prepared to deny us the right to vote, and are apparently prepared to go on doing so? We were denied the right to vote because, eventually, the purpose is to tax the people of this country.

There are many things that one can say, that has been said and will be said, about the effect of this tax—this tax for which there are so many reasonable alternatives as a way of raising revenue. However, I wonder if the women in this chamber, who care about the fate of the largest group of poor people in this country—many of them women on fixed incomes, many of them relatives of theirs and mine, who are not consumers of manufactured goods but who are going to pay this new tax on almost everything they do: on the small packages of food they have to consume, on postage stamps, on their television, on their rent, on their magazines, on their reading subscriptions, and on all of those kinds of things—

[Senator Frith.]

They are prepared to deny the rule of Parliament in order, eventually, to punish the poor.

Now, with some of the Senators opposite, we have been working quite hard to try to come to grips with the problem of the poverty of children in this country, a problem that has been preoccupying a great many Canadians. We have been working hard all summer—Senator Tremblay, Senator Robertson and others—to try to think of ways in which we can get out of this horrible dilemma. Yet those very same people are apparently prepared to break down the Parliamentary traditions that have been spoken of earlier, to introduce a tax that will tax reading materials, which will add $2 per day to the cost of infant child care in this country, which will tax all those things that we think of as services for children. This will tax even their ability to stay clean, because, of course, we all know—or we should know—that laundromats are putting up the cost of doing a load of laundry, not by 7 percent but by 25 percent, because that is the coin that works. In fact, those costs are already up.

Senator Perrault: Good Tory legislation!

Senator Marsden: We were told by a witness who appeared before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee that a family of four, doing the same number of loads of laundry as they do now, will, after this tax is imposed, use up their rebate just paying for their laundry. In other words, very poor people who have to use coin-operated laundromats in their buildings are going to be using up their rebate to stay as clean as they are now.

Honourable Senators, there are other ways of taxing. Nobody is saying, "Do not tax." Nobody is saying, "Do not reform the tax"; and no one is saying, "Do not get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax." What the 85 percent of the people who object to this tax are saying is, "Be fair and listen to us. Listen to our voices."

Apparently the denial that started in the House of Commons is to be continued here by the very people who say they are concerned about these issues. The really disgusting and revolting feature of today is that basically decent people opposite have apparently been hysterically carried away into destroying one of the aspects of our civilization for which we have fought for so long. Last week, the Senators opposite used the rules to thwart our desire to get the report debated. That is fair enough. However, it is going too far when they destroy the basis of civil society, which is so fragile and so easily erroded. Senator Poitras, for one, and others, were with me last year in Eastern Europe, in countries that have suffered intolerably because of the breakdown in civil society, and Senators opposite are participating in exactly the same type of thing.

We are reversing the history of the democratic world, and this is very dangerous. It does not take that much, and to have participated in that is one of the great tragedies of this chamber, and one of the great tragedies in the period in which we live.

This day there are women from 38 countries meeting in Helsinki trying to achieve the rights and privileges we have. It is almost unbelievable that I have to make a phone call in the morning to those women—with whom I have been in touch on a daily basis—and tell them the reason I will not be there, because of what has happened in this country. This is an unbelievable day!

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have been pilloried and insulted this evening by people whom I hold in high regard and whom I like dearly. Why would I put myself in a position to be treated in this manner? Surely I would only do so if I felt extremely strongly about my actions.

It would have been easier to have stayed in my office—

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Everett: —and avoided the vote.

Senator Perrault: At least you got a letter!

Senator Everett: It would have been easier to have stayed in my office and not have pushed my way in, as I did.

Senator Bosa: The doors were closed!

Senator Everett: That is right.

Senator Perrault: That is illegal!

Senator Everett: It would have been easier to have avoided the vote this evening and waited until the vote was called on the GST. Incidentally, I still do not know how I will vote on the GST.

Why did I do that? Because I feel strongly about a principle, a principle that I feel has wrecked friendships. If my actions have caused people I like to be unhappy, it has been worthwhile because of that principle. That principle is that the work of Parliament must go forward. I would attack the Liberal side or the government side if the business of Parliament is unnecessarily delayed.

I spoke against Senator Murray's point of order, as I thought it was a delay of Parliament. I strongly believe that the progress and process of legislation should go forth.

What has happened here is not a delay in the normal course of debate; it is not even a filibuster that I could enjoy, in which we could all take part, and one that might go on all night and all day. That is part of the legislative process.

Senator Cools: It will go all night and day!

Senator Everett: Believe me, when the bells are allowed to ring from Thursday until the following Tuesday, that is not part of the legislative process.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: By whose rules?

Senator Everett: By any rules.

Senator Steuart: For God's sake!

Senator Perrault: What about the rights of the senators!

Senator Steuart: Did you get a notice? I didn't get one.

Senator Everett: Let me deal with that.

Senator Steuart: I hope you will deal with that because you have been dealing with this in a very sanctimonious way, and you are dead wrong!

Senator Everett: You have had an opportunity to speak.

Senator Steuart: And I will have another one when you have finished!

Senator Everett: I received a notice that was sent out by the Speaker. It has been read several times. It was sent to the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition, the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. Copies of it were sent to the government whip and the opposition whip and to six senators who are not part of any caucus and not contacted by any whips, and those are the six independents.

Senator Steuart: Can I ask you a brief question? When I was sworn in I was not sworn in as a Liberal senator; I was sworn in as a senator. You decided some time ago to act as a so-called Independent Liberal. That is your business. I do not argue with that.

Where in the parliamentary rules is there any decree or rule that says a whip must contact me as a senator? I should have been notified.

When the bells stopped I came down here with Senator Denis and we could not get into the chamber.

You should not be standing up here and being so sanctimonious about how you are taking a great stand on both sides. You have taken nothing but a stand on their side from beginning to end. Don't tell me how you have not made up your mind as to how you are going to vote on the GST.

Senator Everett: That is absolutely incorrect. I have taken a stand in favour of the progress of the legislation of this House.

Senator Perrault: And damn the members!

Senator Sparrow: May I ask the honourable senator a question. You have been in this House a couple of years longer than I have. I think you have been here now 23 or 24 years.

In all of those years we have adjourned on Thursday until Tuesday. You made a remark about the bells ringing from Thursday until Tuesday. We have never sat on a Friday, Saturday, Sunday or Monday in all of those years.

Today the bells rang for three hours—that is all, less than three hours—and you are telling me, as a senator, that it is justified to do this devastating thing after the bells rang for only three hours? My God, Douglas—may I call you Douglas? I used to, but I am not sure I can anymore.

Senator Perrault: The bells rang for 17 days in the House of Commons. Do you not remember that?

Senator Austin: Somebody should look at Speaker Mitchener's ruling on such things.

Senator Everett: To answer Senator Sparrow's question, there is a vast difference between leaving this chamber on a Thursday, when the business is concluded and we have properly adjourned, and leaving when there is a vote not dealt with.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: They do that all of the time in the House of Commons.

Senator Everett: Maybe they do that all of the time in the House of Commons, but that is not the process that is followed in this chamber.

Senator Sparrow: Where does it say that in the rules?

Senator Everett: The job of this chamber is to deal with legislation. What has been going on around here—and on both sides of the House, incidentally, depending on who has the advantage—is an attempt not to deal with legislation.

Senator Sparrow: Tell me what rule!

Senator Everett: As far as I am concerned, that is wrong.

Senator Sparrow: What rule!

Senator Everett: It is the rule of a legislature to deal with its business. You cannot frustrate a legislature.

Senator Austin: You are inventing rules!

• (2220)

Senator Everett: I am not inventing rules at all. A legislature is here to sit. The Speaker, in my judgment, has every right to stand up and say that enough time has gone by that it is now a delay —

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Everett: I am serious.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Sparrow: Show me where it says that! Where does it say that? Tell me where!

Senator Thériault: Where does the Speaker get the authority, from you?

Senator Sparrow: Do not stand there and tell me what he ruled. He did not do that.

Senator Everett: He has a perfect right—

Senator Hastings: No!

Senator Corbin: Wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong. You are wrong.

Senator Steuart: Tell me where the rule says that!

Senator Everett: He has a perfect right to see that the business of the house goes forward.

Senator Sparrow: Quote the rules!

Senator Everett: If you are indulging in delay, he has a perfect right to move the business of the house forward.

Senator Steuart: But only tell some senators and not tell others? Why did you get told when I did not?

Senator Everett: Because there is no other way of telling me, my young friend.

Senator Steuart: I am not your young friend. I am not your friend any more. I have every right to be told, just as you have. If I had been told, I would have been down here.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Everett: Are you finished?

Senator Steuart: No, I am not finished. You are finished around here!

Senator Everett: That is fine, and I am prepared to be finished on a matter of principle.

Senator Steuart: It is not principle!

Some Hon. Senators: Some principle!

Senator Everett: It is a serious matter of principle.

Senator Steuart: Yes, and you are making a joke of it because you want to stand up like some big wheel and get applause from the other side.

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, if you do not like those principles, he probably has others to follow.

Senator Steuart: Think of some more!

Senator Everett: It seems to me very droll—

Senator Hébert: Droll, he says!

Senator Grafstein: I did not think this was droll, senator. I did not feel droll when I was not allowed to get into this chamber. I did not feel droll.

Senator Everett: Senator Sparrow was telling a joke.

Senator Sparrow: That was no joke.

Senator Grafstein: Withdraw that comment! That was not droll. Withdraw that! I was not droll. I did not feel droll.

Senator Everett: I do not think you know what droll means.

Senator Grafstein: Yes, I know what droll means. I did not feel droll when I could not get in.

Senator Everett: Are you quite finished?

Senator Roblin: You do not have to like what he says, but you have to listen to him.

Senator Steuart: Why?

Senator Roblin: Because this is a house of parliament.

Senator Stanbury: It is a house without rules.

Senator Hastings: No rules, Duff!

Senator Corbin: Listen to Senator Murray! Keep quiet! Listen to your leader, if you have one.

Senator Everett: I am sorry, honourable senators. I listened to the points of privilege that were brought up on both sides of the house. I have listened to the bells ringing. I have listened to every possible delay in proceeding with the business of this house. I have heard people on this side of the house—

Senator Cools: We are listening.

Senator Everett: You are listening to me?

Senator Hébert: We do not like it, but we are listening.

Senator Everett: I find it strange that the courtesy you are showing me has not yet passed to this end of the house. But I hope, by some process of political osmosis, that it does. In any event I will go ahead—

Senator Hébert: You have insulted their intelligence. I understand their reaction.

Senator Everett: All right. Let me insult your intelligence then. It should not be too difficult.

Senator Hébert: Very droll.

Senator Corbin: Maybe he has a set of principles for every occasion.

Senator Everett: In any event, the business of this house has been delayed, and I have heard people in the Liberal party say that Bill C-62 is never going to come to a vote. That has been said for the record time and again. This is obstruction; this is delay. I would be as harsh on these people over here if—

Senator LeBlanc: Who appointed you as judge?

An Hon. Senator: Who told you?

Senator Olson: You decide, Everett!

Senator Everett: I do not decide—

Senator Olson: You are trying to tell us that!

Senator Everett: —but I have the right to take a position. You may disagree with it. That is not deciding. I have no right of decision here, but I can say what I think.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Everett: Believe me, I have a lot more fortitude than have most of you people in this place by standing up here and taking my lumps.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Everett: If you want to hand them out, hand them out. That is fine by me. I am not being a judge. I am not trying to be a judge. I am trying to say that what is going on in this house is wrong, and it should not be allowed to happen.

Senator Cools: We agree that it is wrong.

Senator Everett: Why do you not let the process go ahead? Let the report come forward, and then if you want to debate it until kingdom come, go ahead.

Senator Buckwold: They will not let us.

Senator Everett: But let us not hide behind a bunch of bells and say "We are not coming in"!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Sparrow: We were locked out!

Senator Everett: Don't tell me you were locked out. You were not locked out.

Senator Hébert: We were locked out.

Senator Everett: When did the bells start ringing?

Senator Murray: At 2:30 p.m.

Senator Everett: At 2:30. The vote took place at 5:30 p.m. That is three hours.

Senator Cools: It is not when they started; the question is: When did they stop ringing?

Senator Olson: That is how much you know about the Rule on page 70.

Senator Everett: I do not know what you mean by that. The fact of the matter is that what has been going on in this house since last Tuesday has been delay by both sides. We are now involved in extreme partisanship. The moment the Mulroney government went in there was a reaction in the Senate, and so there should be. This is a political body. The borrowing bill came up, and the Liberal side of the house asked, as they had been promised by the previous finance minister, that a budget be produced before the borrowing authority was given. The reaction of the government was "What right do these people have to interfere?" They had every right. There is no argument that the Senate has the right to deal with legislation that comes from the other place and to amend it or refuse it.

Senator Stollery: And to delay it.

Senator Everett: And to delay it from time to time. That is quite right. There is no argument about that.

Senator Stollery: That is the whole argument.

Senator Everett: The reaction of the government, in my judgment, especially epitomized by Harvey Andre, was completely wrong and created a climate that caused more partisanship on this side. But, for whatever reason, that has continued to escalate to the point that now we are not doing the job we were sent here to do; we are merely an adjunct of the House of Commons. That is what is wrong with this place today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Everett: We have now made the case that this house should be elective.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Everett: As long as it is appointive, we have the protection and the right to look at legislation on some sort of quasi non-partisan basis. But we became highly partisan, and that is really what this is all about. We began manoeuvring back and forth. The moment that happens, we should submit our right to stay here to the electorate. They should say whether we are going to be here or whether we go.

• (2230)

My argument, honourable senators, is neither for nor against the tax. I personally do not feel impressed one way or the other by the public opinion on the tax. That is not my function as an appointed senator. My function is to look at the tax and to ask: Is it good for Canada or is it not good for Canada?

The job of the House of Commons is to reflect the public will if it chooses to do so, and if it doesn't, then the government goes to the people and can be turfed out. But we have a completely different responsibility and, in my judgment, we are derogating that responsibility. We are derogating that responsibility on both sides of the house. If that comes as bad news to you, if you don't like it, then I will take my lumps over it, but I really believe that a dreadful and terrible mistake is being made. I believe it is one that should be rectified, and now. And this won't stop—we will get over this, but partisanship is now abounding. The fact of the matter is that an appointed body will not function that well under those circumstances.

Honourable senators, I received a letter from an Elizabeth Heinmiller, and I have no idea who she is, but she says: "Dear Canadian Senator" so I assume she has written to many other senators. At any rate, she says:

> I am writing to you, and to all your fellow senators, to express my deep concern about the vote which will soon take place in the Senate on the proposed Goods and Services Tax legislation.
> I understand that the purpose of the Senate is to be the chamber for "sober second thought", with each member taking a careful look at government legislation, and acting on the highest principles to evaluate legislation in the best interests of our country. I feel that partisan politics cannot be allowed to take precedence if this purpose is to be honourably achieved.
> I do not know whether or not the GST is good legislation; I do know that many thoughtful Canadians have expressed grave reservations about its effect on small business and its impact on our already shakey economy. I also realize, however, that our burgeoning deficit must be brought under control. The issue for you to weigh, of course, is whether this legislation is the way to achieve this end, or whether its passage would turn out to be a mistake of monumental proportions.
> Canadians' historic esteem for the Senate will continue only if integrity and commitment to principle is seen in its members. By your actions you can help dispel some of the cynicism prevalent today across our country as Canadians perceive their political figures becoming increasingly distant from the realities of their everyday lives.
> I would encourage you to act and vote according to principle and not according to party affiliation in this most important matter, though to do so may be unpopular.
> Be assured of my prayers for you and your fellow Senators.

Honourable senators, that is my view of what the Senate is about.

Senator Frith: They should not have voted on partisan lines.

Senator Everett: Perhaps that is right. And perhaps you should not have voted on partisan lines—perhaps we should look at this whole thing in another way, Senator Frith, and we should find out whether we can go back to being a Senate which is truly effective in terms of dealing with legislation in its committee hearings on a reasonably non-partisan basis in what is in fact a partisan overall hearing. That is what I would hope we would be trying to achieve.

[Senator Everett.]

What has gone on here as a result of the excessive partisanship, I think, has done severe damage to the Senate as we know it and as I have known it through the many years I have been here.

Honourable senators, I think the time has come to make this place elected.

Hon. Peter Bosa: The Honourable Senator Everett has said that he voted with the government today because he wanted to allow Bill C-62 to come forward, so that we could begin the process of dealing with the bill.

Did Senator Everett feel the same way last week, on Tuesday and Wednesday, when members on the government side were rising one after an other on questions of privilege, delaying the introduction of the bill for two days? Did Senator Everett feel the same way at that time? Would he have made the same intervention then as he has made today?

Senator Everett: Yes, I did feel the same way and I did make the same intervention. I attacked the position of the Government Leader, who was trying to delay the implementation or the presentation of the committee report. You are bloody right I delayed it! I have attacked both sides, so I may have no friends at all in this place. But the fact of the matter is that I was not partisan about it!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, like my colleagues before me and for the same reasons, which I shall not repeat, I srongly protest against the opportunistic and dictatorial decision which violates my privileges as senator.

Senator Frith gave two explanations of Senator Charbonneau's outrageous decision. If I remember correctly, he said that either he read the rules and does not care whether or not he breaks them, or he didn't read them. That, about Senator Charbonneau! That seemed so unbelievable to me that I thought that there might—no, must—be another explanation.

As you know, unfortunately, there are sometimes discrepancies between the Englis hand French rexts of rules and even of certain bills. Senator Frith read us the English text of hte rules. Maybe Senator Charbonneau read the French text, which might be different. Here is that French text:

> À la fin d'un débat, le président met la question aux voix. Si l'accord est douteux, le président demande aux sénateurs de voter en disant oui ou non mais il ajoute qu'à son avis les oui ou les non l'emportent. Si deux sénateurs ou plus expriment leur désaccord en se levant, le président demande un vote par assis ou levé. On fait alors sonner le timbre d'appel, et lorsque les Whips auront gagné la Chambre et informé le président qu'ils sont prêts à procéder au vote, le président doit dire: que les portes de la Chambre soient fermées à clé. Les pages fermeront les portes et le président ordonnera la venue du vote.

So, the doors were locked illegally, because the whips were not there. Senator Charbonneau, therefore, whether he read the English or French text of the rules, he decided to ignore them and to violate the privileges of every one of us. Obviously, and I regret having to say so, Senator Charbonneau decided to follow the orders of his friend and master, Brian Mulroney. At least, one must admit that Senator Charbonneau has a sense of the duties of friendship. To help his friend, he decided to utterly ruin his reputation. In ten years, in a hundred years, his actions will be cited as despicable, as a serious attack on our democratic system, in a nutshell, as a coup d'État. I hope that Brian Mulroney too has a sense of the duties of friendship and that, when Senator Charbonneau grasps the full horror of his actions and has the decency to render his resignation, the Prime Minister will appoint him ambassador to Kuwait.

Just like some of my colleagues who spoke before me, I look at my colleagues opposite—especially senators from Quebec like Senator Chaput-Rolland—and wonder how, though she may approve of the GST, she can allow democracy to be abused as openly as it was this afternoon by Senator Charbonneau.

I look at Thérèse Lavoie-Rioux, whom I'll dignify with the title of senator even though the courts haven't yet ruled on that. I have always admired her greatly. I respect the fact that she is a supporter of the GST, even though I am convinced that it is a disgusting and unjust tax. I cannot believe that such a staunch defender of democracy as Madame Lavoie-Rioux can stand to see it thus abused.

The same applies to Dr. Paul David. He has left the Chamber; perhaps he is filled with remorse and has gone to submit his resignation to the Prime Minister. He is a gentleman, and he is perfectly entitled to be a better doctor than a tax expert, as well as to be in favour of the GST, I'll grant him that. But I ask him as well: how can he allow democracy to be so openly abused not only without reacting but by acting as an accomplice.

● (2240)

Senator Beaudoin, whose constitutional expertise is always highly touted, is entitled not to be a tax expert and to like the GST. But for him to allow democracy to be abused before his very eyes, that pains me. I just cannot believe it.

I see Senator Beaulieu, whom I know well, Senator Castonguay, Senator Lynch-Staunton, three gentlemen; I understand that their training and background would lead them to support the GST. What I do not understand is that they can accept, without an outcry, what went on under their very eyes this afternoon. How can they accept such a blatantly opportunistic decision as the one made by their Conservative colleague, Senator Charbonneau, who still seems to be seated in the Chair and to think that he is the Speaker.

I said to a brand-new senator, a former Liberal, whom I met last night: "You, a former Liberal, support the infamous GST. I disagree, but I respect your point of view. But have you thought of all the other bills you will have to support because you chose to sit with the Conservatives? You are a former Liberal, yet you will vote for a bill that will destroy the unemployment insurance system, under the pretense of reforming it. Liberals were proud of that system, and rightly so. Another bill will abolish university, which Liberals were so proud of, as well as other legislation protecting less fortunate Canadians. How can you accept all that, when you have been a Liberal all your life"? He went away without answering.

I met another Conservative senator who is a former Liberal and exclaimed: "My dear friend, I always thought you were a Liberal." He blushed, lowered his head, and answered: "I had no choice." Wrong. He did have a choice. He could have said to Mulroney: "No. I do not want a Senate appointment so badly that I am willing to reject all I stand for and become a Conservative". That was the choice former Liberals had.

One thing astonishes me, and always will astonish me. The Senate is reviled constantly. Senators are ridiculed, yet they have trouble turning down the title of honourable senator. Vanity is truly a bottomless pit.

Some people will accept any compromise for that title. They are ready turncoats. They will worship what they despised and despise what they worshipped, just for the futile gratification of being called "Honorable Senator So-and-So".

That is why I ask these new senators, well at least those who were not Tories before they accepted Mulroney's "Greek" gift, i.e. former Liberals and those who had no political affiliation, to explain why they are sitting with the Conservatives. If they sat as independents, that would be one thing, but to sit with the Conservatives, that is robbing the poor to help the rich. In this regard, the GST is only one example in a hundred.

I would like these new senators to state whether the are proud to be the accomplices of a party that violates parliamentary democracy, that has just staged a coup d'État to burden Canadians with a tax they have massively rejected. I would like them to tell us if they are happy tonight. Oh, I do not despise them. I am simply somewhat ashamed, because they made possible this day which will go down in history as a day of shame for Parliament and for Canada, and will probably be known as Black Thursday, or the Thursday of Disgrace.

● (2250)

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, let me first start with an apology. I would like to apologize to all members of this house, but in particular to the Table Officers, because of an outburst when I entered the chamber shortly after I was locked out. I made a reference to the Table Officers. I did not mean to make what appears to be an implication that they had been involved with the ruling. It was not my intention to do so.

Between 6 o'clock and 8 o'clock this evening, I attended on the Clerk, Mr. Greene, and the other member of the Table. I personally apologized to them because I felt it was not appropriate or proper to imply, in any way, shape or form that they were involved in what I consider to be this obscene action.

I would also like to apologize to the other senators for my conduct, particularly to Senator Waters, if he found offence in our conduct during the period prior to the commencment of the proceedings this evening. It was due to our rage, certainly my rage, that took the better of me.

Finally, senators, I would like to apologize to the pages. I was not at all proud of in the Senate or its proceedings earlier today or this evening. I apologize to all the Pages, because they represent our future. They will probably, in their generation, do better with our institutions than we have done.

I hope that they will not accept this bad lesson in democracy, this bad lesson in parliamentary practice or this bad lesson in personal behaviour.

It is a sad moment for me, perhaps the saddest moment in my life, because I came to this place primarily because of my respect for individual rights. I came to this place primarily because one of my heros was Senator Croll.

I came from southwestern Ontario. I was born on the wrong side of the tracks. In those days our hero—and my hero—was Senator Croll, or Colonel Croll, because he was a fighter for individual rights and minority rights. After graduating from law school in Toronto, I was privileged to serve as an articling clerk in his law firm. Again my respect for the Senate and my respect for him as an exemplar of individual rights grew greater.

When I look around this chamber, I start with Senator Molson, a great hero to this country and a great Canadian who has fought for rights and liberties and parliamentary democracies.

There is Senator Lang, who is not here now, but he was also one of my great mentors. Senator Lang was a stalwart in terms of fighting for Liberal principles. I also look at Norman Atkins, who was here a few moments ago. He is a great adversary and a fabulous combatant, who certainly is someone who believes in parliamentary democracy.

There sits Senator Marshall, a great spokesman for veterans and truly a hero in many parts of the country. He has always been concerned with the individual rights of the veterans.

I think about Senator Beaudoin. I have read some of what he has written and have heard of his great concern about individual liberties and rights. I have the highest regard for him. There is also Senator Bolduc, a great senator, a great public servant and a great Quebecer who has been concerned with the rights of the Francophones not only in Quebec but also in all of Canada.

I also think about Senator Spivak, who sat with us on the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee when we dealt with minority rights as they apply to immigrants and refugees. In that committee I saw her impassioned concern about those rights, as I did with Senator Nurgitz, also a great friend.

I also think of the great reputation of Senator Castonguay, who has a reputation as a great Canadian, a great francophone and a great Quebecer. His life-long and admirable fight for the rights of Quebec and the rights of francophones is also something to think of.

There sits Senator Kelleher, who has a great reputation in the north. I have spent many years travelling to northern of Ontario and know of his great reputation for fairness as a lawyer, as a solicitor general and now as a Privy Councillor.

[Senator Grafstein.]

There sits Senator Doody, who has spoken out so eloquently and passionately, from time to time with wry and raw wit and humour, about the rights of his region.

There sits Senator Doyle, a great exemplar to many, one of the great writers in this country—a great journalist—but also one of the great editors of the Globe and Mail. I draw to his attention to the masthead of the Globe and Mail that admonishes its readers that no one should bow to arbitrary power. That is the masthead of the Globe and Mail. Senator Doyle, throughout his long respected career, made those words sing for me as I used to read the editorals of the Globe and Mail under his editorship and believed much of what was said.

There sits Senator Chaput-Rolland, a great Quebecer who eloquently stood up for individual rights at times when it was not popular to stand up for individual rights and liberties in Canada.

There sits Senator Tremblay, who has written so well and eloquently about the rights of Quebec and the rights of all Canadians.

There sits also Senator Charbonneau, a great hero who fought in the Second World War to defend our rights and our liberties.

So, honourable senators, I feel that this place is not defined as my friend, Senator Everett, defines it, but it is a place of defenders of individual rights, respect for rights, and, more particularly, respect for each senator's rights.

But today, honourable senators, I must say, with deepest regret, that I feel that my rights as a senator have been grossly violated. I felt anger when I came back into the chamber. I felt as if there had been a rape of my rights and that senators who were in this chamber were witnesses to the rape of my rights. Yet none of them stood up and said, "Where are the other senators? Wait a second. Let them come in. Let us not do this." Yet not one of the senators—

Senator Steuart: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: —whom I respect so much and who have fought so long and so hard for individual rights and the individual liberties of the groups that they represent—not one of them—stood up. Not Senator Everett, not Senator Molson, and not one Conservative senator.

Senator Waters, when I came into this chamber, when I was allowed to enter, and you were not here I said, "What about Senator Waters? Did he get his notice? Why is the elected senator not here?" I asked about his rights. I felt: "Why were the other Independent senators, namely, Senator Pitfield and Senator Lawson, not here?" Where were they? Where were Senator Molson and Senator Everett when it was time to defend their independent rights—never mind mine? Yet there was only silence.

An Hon. Senator: We were taking care of our own.

An Hon. Senator: Of course!

Senator Perrault: Looking after your own, that is all!

Senator Grafstein: The proudest moment of my life—

An Hon. Senator: The hell with the rest!

Senator Grafstein: —was when I received a call from the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau. He asked me if I would like to become a member of the Senate. I said, "Yes." He said, "Do you want to think about it?" I said, "No; I do not want to think about it. But I do have one question. Why are you calling me?" He said, "Because I think you should be in the Senate." I asked him, "Mr. Prime Minister, why do you think I should be in the Senate? Please do not take this improperly—I am not rejecting your offer—but I am curious to know why you think I should be in the Senate." He said to me—and I have never said this to anyone before except my family—"Because, Grafstein, you have been interested in ideas and rights. I think the Senate is a good platform for you to be able to expose your ideas and your concept of rights, not just to me and your friends but to all Canadians."

So, honourable senators, I came to this place and I studied the rule book. The first thing I was given by the Clerk was a rule book. I was told by Senator Godfrey—now retired—"Study the rules. Keep quiet for a while and study the rules. You will then be able to get along and understand how this place operates. Study the rules." So I did.

Each senator, I believe, has his own conscience. Senator Everett talked about his conscience and his principles; it is important that all senators should know what motivates other people's consciences. I studied the rules and then I studied the powers of the Senate. I studied the Constitution yet again. I was taught by Bora Laskin. I talked to Bora Laskin about the Constitution. I talked about rights. I have studied the Constitution yet again since I came here. I carefully followed the parliamentary debates on the Constitution in 1982.

I believe that Parliament can be summed up in one phrase: "Respect for rights." I believe that is what the Charter means. Furthermore, I think that is what Parliament means. That is what the constitution of this house means: namely, respect for rights, respect for individual rights.

So I came to the Senate. When I came here I was told about the role of the Speaker. I thought the Speaker had powerful rights. I was told, "No, no, no, you do not address the Speaker, you address senators". I asked, "Why do you address senators, unlike the other place?" I was told, "It is because every senator has his rights and his privileges. The Speaker is a senator just like all others. All he does is coordinate, at best, but he has no particular rights other than as a senator on his own merits".

● (2300)

Then I asked about the symbols of this place. Elderly senators pointed out to me the eight paintings that surround us. Those paintings were donated to this place to represent the devastation of the First World War, and to act as a constant reminder to senators that lives—not my life but Canadian lives—were sacrificed for one thing only; to defend the rights of all Canadians.

So I took, and I take, my duties as a senator seriously, as I am sure all senators do. Then I read about Parliament. I read Churchill—the greatest of all Parliamentarians. I would like to spend a few moments to quote just a few passages from Winston Churchill. In the break I attended the library because I wanted to know what Winston Churchill would say. These are some of the things that Winston Churchill said about Parliament. This is what he said in 1923 on the houses of Parliament:

> I still hope that, although you see on the Continent of Europe one Parliamentary system after another collapsing, although you see Parliamentary representative institutions which the 19th century so hopefully and so laboriously built up, swept away by revolutionary thrust, or by the Mussolini touch, I still hope that in Great Britain—the home of Parliamentary institutions, the home of government by talking, of government by parley, of government by argument, reason, and fair play—in spite of all the difficulties and troubles of the times in which we live, Parliamentary institutions will be preserved with renewed and revivified strength, and will still hold up above the confusion of the modern world the lamp of constitutional, legitimate, legalized authority, expressed through the medium of rational communication.

There is a footnote, senators, which states:

> (Cheers.) I propose to you the toast of the Houses of Parliament.

I would now like to quote another speech of Winston Churchill's given in 1957 given to the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference held in Geneva. Some members of this place are members of that organization, which still exists. This speech is entitled: Parliament-Spokesman of the People. This is what he had to say:

> Since the Inter-Parliamentary Conference last met in London, twenty-seven years ago, free Parliamentary institutions have confronted, and have triumphantly overcome, the heaviest assault ever made upon them.
> I rejoice that at this meeting the Inter-Parliamentary Union is stronger than ever before, and particularly that it now contains representatives of the Parliaments of many nations which have recently achieved independence, as well as newcomers from older Assemblies which have decided to join the Union.
> Our Parliament has survived because it made itself the spokesman not of government but of the people. In the fiercest clash of debates we have jealously guarded the right of every Member freely to speak for his constituents and for himself. If your Conference will follow this tradition, it can make a significant contribution to toleration between ideologies and understanding between nations. Thus alone can freedom endure and mankind live in peace.

This is what Winston Churchill had to say in 1948, not to his own Parliament, but to the Norwegian Parliament:

> In our parliamentary system we can be assured that the will of the people will always find open and free expression. With us, the government is the servant of the people and not its master. Any violation of this principle would > lead to protests from all sides. I have great faith in the parliamentary system. It is through it that we have won all the freedoms and rights that we have in Great Britain. It has given us great pleasure to experience, as I have experienced in the course of the years, that Norwegians value so highly and have such great respect for their representatives who are chosen by the people, and that they are so convinced that the parliamentary system and constitutional monarchy is so well suited to their disposition.

For all of you senators, here are all the collected speeches of Winston Churchill from the earliest part of this century. There are ten volumes in all. They all say the same thing in so many ways over and over again—the people are supreme, not the government. The government is the servant of the people. That is why we are here. We are here to be the servants of the people. Appointed though we are, we are here to be the servants of the people.

We were forced by debate yesterday and earlier today—and what a shame this is—when certain senators were compelled to take the rights of Parliament to the courts. We implored Senator Beaudoin. We implored the Leader of the Government in the Senate to join with us to have a reference to the courts so that individual senators, individual citizens and provinces would not have to go to the courts to determine the constitution of Parliament. I implored the Leader of the Government to agree to that, as I implored Senator Beaudoin. Honourable senators were forced to go to court today. Why? To preserve the rights of Parliament, to preserve the rights of all Canadians. That is why they were forced to take a reference to the courts. How shameful that was.

I thought that was shameful, but nothing at all compared to the shame of what occurred this afternoon.

What happened this afternoon, and why were my rights so violently, maliciously and with intent breached? This was not an accidental piece of negligence about which all of us could sit back and say, "Look, we all make mistakes". The prima facie intent was to deprive me, and every senator not mentioned in this Speaker's letter, of his rights as a senator. I was angry with Senator Everett, and I apologize for my anger. I was angry because he was in here and he did not stand up to say, "Where are Senators Grafstein, Thériault, Davey and Steuart? Have they been called? Can we not wait another two minutes? Have you asked the Speaker if everyone has been called? Did you check to see if Senator Waters had been called?" Senator Molson, did you check to see if Senator Lang of Senator Pitfield was called? I do not believe you did, which is why I got so angry. Had I been sitting in this chamber I would have asked those questions. I would have said, "What about the other senators?" I would not have come into this chamber without feeling uncomfortable that the whips were not here, and that all members could freely come in. That is why I was angry, and I apologize for my anger.

● (2310)

Senator Everett: Let me answer that.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Grafstein: Let me finish and then you can speak.

Senator Everett: You have asked me what I was doing.

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down!

Senator Corbin: Give him a chance.

Senator Hastings: He will make a speech.

Senator Everett: No, I will not make a speech. I came into the chamber because I assumed, and indeed had been told by a member of your caucus, that you were not coming in to vote.

Senator Frith: How did you come to that conclusion?

Senator Everett: I was told that you were not coming in to vote.

Senator Frith: Who told you that?

Senator Everett: I am not going to tell you that.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Everett, I did not tell you that.

Some Hon. Senators: I did not tell you that.

Senator Frith: Why can you not name who told you that?

Senator Everett: I do not think it is fair.

Senator Frith: Why is it not fair?

Senator Everett: I do not think it is fair.

Senator Frith: To whom? It is very unfair to all of us. That is the unfairness. It is unfair to say that someone told you that, because it is not true, and then to say that you will not say who it was who told you. To whom is it not fair?

Senator Murray: You should see what Senator Kirby said on television this afternoon.

Senator Everett: It was given to me in confidence and I am not going to destroy that confidence. If you ask why I did not think there was anything wrong with all the Liberal senators not being here, I tell you that I thought you were not coming in to vote. That was my understanding.

Senator Forrestall: Where is Senator MacEachen tonight? In London, or in Brussels?

Senator Steuart: Why are you not back in Nova Scotia making an honest living like the rest of us?

Senator Frith: Obviously it would not have done him any good to be here, because he would have been shut out with everyone else.

Senator Grafstein: Today at approximately 5:20 I was walking from the caucus room, where I had had a meeting with two honourable senators—both of them are present here. I walked from the caucus room down the hall to seek out Senator Frith. One newsman said to me, "Are you going to vote?" I said, "About what?" and he giggled. I then walked up the stairs to see Senator Frith. It was now approximately 5:25. I had received no letter from the Speaker. I said to him, "What is going on?" At that point a secretary handed me the Speaker's letter. That was approximately 5:26 or 5:27. As I was reading the Speaker's letter I heard that the house was convened. As I came down the steps I discovered that the doors were locked. I said, "What's going on? Who's in there?" Somebody told me that the doors had been locked, but Senator Everett had pushed his way through the doors and they had allowed him in. He voted. I was not allowed to vote.

Honourable senators, I give you the facts as best I know them. That is why I consider that my rights this day were violated. I had hoped that one honourable senator would have stood up and said, "Where are those senators? Can we not extend for another ten minutes to see if they want to come in or not?" However, that was not the case.

I believe, with all the force that I can bring to bear that my rights as a senator were violated. I asked myself, "Where were the Privy Councillors?" Senator Hatfield is smiling, and I know he is not being disrespectful. I asked myself, "Where are the parliamentary checks and balances?"

Under the traditions and conventions respecting the Privy Councillors, they are obliged to represent not just their narrow interests, but are called to the highest body in the land to deal with the interest of all Canadians. I said to myself, "Is there no decency, no duty felt by Privy Councillors present in this Chamber to at least pause and say, 'Where are those other senators?'" But that did not happen, and I was disappointed.

Where were these senators? Where was Senator Doyle? Where was Senator Finlay MacDonald? Where was Senator Trevor Eyton, who is a great friend of mine? Where was Senator Bolduc or Senator Beaudoin? Where was Senator Kelly, a friend of mine, or Senator Atkins? Where were they? If their rights had been dealt within this way, I would not have done the same thing. I would not have sat silent. I regret they did this, because I have so much respect for the senators I have mentioned.

Where was Senator Muir? Senator Muir spoke so eloquently when I was first appointed to the Senate. Yes, he is a Tory, but when I first came here, he welcomed me proudly to this chamber. That was a great moment in my life.

Where was Senator Spivak? Where was Senator Chaput-Rolland? Where were these people who all their lives have been identified with questions of rights? When the moment came they were silent.

I regret that my rights were violated. I regret that it was a gang violation of my rights. I regret that Seantors stood around and were silent while my rights were being violated.

In 1927 The Right Honourable Lord Hewart of Bury, the Lord Chief Justice of England, wrote a book. It is a benchmark book, and it is called The New Despotism. Senator Beaudoin, have you read The New Despotism? It was a key book in the tradition, history and growth of the checks and balances on executive power. Every law student is familiar with this book because it laid the foundation for modern administrative law. The foundations of administrative law were erected because the executive abused its power. Checks and balances on executive power were created by independent tribunals; it was the very essence of the modern law. Lorder Hewart defined the problem and raised this issue in 1927.

I naively thought that the age of despotism, as enunciated in this book, had evaporated and been replaced with new traditions, new practices, new administrative law and new checks and balances. Today I found that that is not the case. Despotism still lurks in the minds and actions of men in this place.

Last week I saw a wonderful movie. It was the story of Bethune. Bethune, in a very poignant moment in the movie, dealing with the question of fascism, said, "In order to destroy fascism in others, we first must destroy fascism within ourselves." So there was a new, desperate despotism here tonight—an awesome, awful, cancerous despotism.

● (2320)

At page 17 of his book, Lord Hewart quotes Rudyard Kipling's "The Old Issue". Here is what he said:

> All we have of freedom, all we use or know—
> This our fathers bought for us long and long ago.
> Ancient Right unnoticed as the breath we draw —
> Leave to live by no man's leave, underneath the Law.

So, honourable senators, I feel that my privileges have been violated. Not only have my privileges been violated; the privileges of each and every senator in this chamber, including Senator Charbonneau, have been violated. Because my rights as a senator have been violated, as have the rights of every Canadian who believes in parliamentary tradition, who believes in all those speeches that Winston Churchill gave, who believes in all of the principles of administrative law that Lord Hewart inculcated into our law, who believes in the Constitution as it was taught to us by Bora Laskin or as it was articulated to us by Frank Scott—a constitution that has now been violated.

T.S. Eliot wrote a magnificent play called "Murder in the Cathedral". In that play about Thomas à Beckett, the king said, "Would someone rid me of him?" and Beckett is murdered nonchalantly. At the end of the play, we find these words, "The last sin was the greatest treason". Was this the last sine of this government? Was this treason to Parliamentary tradition? So I say to the Speaker and to the government, withdraw, withdraw, withdraw. Pull back from the brink; adjourn, adjourn, adjourn. Give yourselves time and the government an opportunity for sober second thought, an opportunity to reflect on what you so shamefully have done today. Then perhaps we can bring this house together again in an effort of national concilliation.

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: Honourable Senators, I will attempt to speak briefly and in a calm manner, because the person responsible for the fact that I am alive today has just left—I am talking about Dr. Keon, and I remember that he told me after my operation that one of the important things to remember in the future was to stay calm, not to get my blood pressure up too high—I will therefore try to relate calmly to you, dear colleagues, how I feel tonight.

You all know I have always had a lot of respect for the Senate Leadership after 20 years in my province's legislature and 12 years here. I have always felt that the person to whom this privilege was given knew that he was the servant of the assembly over which he presided. It is with great bitterness that I say that, as a Senator, will never again be able to turn to this chair as long as the present Speaker occupies it. In all honesty, I could not.

My privileges were violated in the same way as those of every other Senator but more so because I am French-speaking. I would ask Senators Beaudoin, Bolduc, Simard, David and Tremblay if they received the Speaker's letter in French. I was given a photocopy around nine o'clock, but it was in English only.

Senator Murray: I received both versions simultaneously.

Senator Thériault: Could you please get me a French version?

[English]

Senator Frith: How come you got it! Of course, we would expect that you would get one! That is probably your own file copy!

Senator Lucier: He has the original!

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: Honourable Senators, I would like to put an honest question to the Senate Government Leader. Did he, either directly or indirectly, take part in this infamous decision? Can the Speakership sincerely tell us that the decision was taken after consulting his advisors?

Honourable Senators, I can easily understand the impatience of my colleague Senator Everett whom I greatly respect—as I said a few days ago, my first committee meetings were held under his chairmanship. I do not know if he was ever elected to Parliament to represent a riding somewhere but I do know that he has been here for a long time. I can understand why he has been here for a long time. I can understand why he is impatient. I can even understand his conception of the Senate. I am told that he is a businessman who has had enourmous success. I am convinced that if he has had such success in business it was not because it took him two days, five days, two weeks or two months to arrive at a decision. I can understand his frustration. He must nevertheless accept that we operate in a parliamentary context. We have not only the responsibility but the duty to debate issues to take a stand.

My privilegese were also violated this afternoon. This for me was a first. In my 30 years of parliamentary life, I have never witnessed an instance where the Senate Speaker could add to or amend the Rules of the Senate. Senator Everett told us that he was told the bells would go on ringing. He has not, on the other hand, told us under which Rule the Speaker had taken such a decision.

Honourable Senators, in the other House, before the 1984 election, the bells were kept ringing for 10 or 12 days, I am not sure how long exactly, but not for a mere three or two and a half hours. Do you believe that, had the Speaker thought he had the power or authority, he would not have stopped the bells from ringing at the House of Commons? The problem has been solved at the House of Commons. I said so yesterday: If the great parliamentarians want to change the Senate Orders, when the Supreme Court has rendered its decision on the legitimacy of the eight new Senate appointments, then let them amend them. Nothing in the Rules gives the Speaker the right, the legitimate authority to do what was done this afternoon. I am upset.

When Senator Charbonneau was named to the Speaker's chair, I was happy for him. Even in discussions with colleagues, I gave him my support. I found him extremely amiable, a charming individual. This afternoon, he committed a grave error. As several of my colleagues have said, this error will bear heavily on his career. Someone else said it: think about it.

Honourable Senators, do you remember the last time a House of Commons Speaker gave the impression that he was on the side of government? It was during the famous pipeline debate. The Senate Speakership should perhaps bear in mind what happened to that Speaker. The government of the day paid the price. That was only fair. According to the newspapers, to MacLean's, either today's or yesterday's, the country is presently going through a crisis. Why? I do not really know if the polls indicate 15 or 20 per cent popular support for the GST of for the Prime Minister. Never in history or in all my experience have I seen what happened in this country this summer when the committee held hearings under the brave chairmanship of Senator Buckwold.

It is true that ordinarily, people do not enjoy paying too many taxes. Day after day we were told this by people, by organziations that they were not necessarily against taxes. Everyone knows they have to pay taxes, but there are other ways, fairer ways to do it.

One of our main problems is that we have a Prime Minister who had no parliamentary experience when he was elected. The importance one attains, and we have all seen this in all political parties, when one becomes Prime Minister of a country with a majority, can easily be imagined. I have had that experience, I have seen it when Senator Hatfield was Premier. His attitude changed when he had a majority of 10 or 12 seats as compared to when he had only a one- or two-seat majority.

This is serious, Senators. What was done today is extremely serious. I would suggest the Speaker do either of two things. First, he should consult, not only here in Ottawa, not only with the Conservative Party, not only the government, but here and there, everywhere in the country before arriving at a decision. He can apologize to the Senate and resume debate where we left off at noon. If the Standing Orders dictate that bells be kept ringing for 15 minutes, half an hour or two hours, this presents no problem. But when the Rules stipulate that a vote will be taken after a certain sequence of events and that this was not the case, then I say to the Speaker: think, think very hard.

I should like to reiterate what my colleague Senator Hébert already said, and I address myself to the same Senators. You all know that in this House, we have Senator Roblin, we have Senator Marshall, we have Senator Muir, we even had Senator Manning who was appointed to the Senate by Pierre Trudeau, God knows the same one whom Quebeckers mostly take pleasure in vilifying. Ask Senator Marshall if he was asked to sit as a Liberal member in order to become a Senator? Was Senator Roblin asked to sit with the Liberal caucus to become a Senator?

Senator Hébert: And what about Senator Asselin?

Senator Thériault: Senator Asselin and how many more. If they had been asked to sit as Liberals, we would still have a majority here. Our numbers would still prevail, and that is important.

I am upset and very much distressed. I repeat to the Speaker: after thinking this out, if he can sleep tonight, let him either reverse his decision or resign.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, although the clock of the Peace Tower struck midnight five minutes ago, I should like to take this opportunity to raise a question of privilege—a privilege which has been denied not only to me in this chamber but to almost 50 per cent of the membership of this chamber.

I was appalled when a vote was called and taken in the absense of so many senators. I think October 4, 1990 is one of the saddest days in the parliamentary history of Canada. We will recall how, in June and July of 1956, one Speaker of the other place was accused of subordinating himself for partisan reasons to the government at that time. We will also recall many other instances where this unpopular tax, the GST, outlined in Bill C-62, was railroaded through the House of Commons where closure was forced upon the members of the other place. From what we heard from one member of the New Democratic Party who visited in this very chamber a few hours ago, the rules and the rights of the members were trampled upon in order to force through an unpopular tax which has been called unfair and immoral and which 85 per cent of the Canadian people oppose. We heard a few hours ago from the chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, who tabled a few days ago the thirteenth report of his committee recommending to us the rejection of Bill C-62. During his earlier speech, he outlined for us a litany of the major flaws of the GST. However, many of us who did not serve on the committee—I only spent three days with the committee in Toronto—perhaps did not read the brief that was presented to the Banking Committee on August 29, a brief submitted by the Episcopal Commission for Social Affairs of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. If I may quote for your information from this brief, the bishops say:

● (2340)

> We also hope that the Senate will respond in a more effective way, to the will of the people on this issue, than the House of Commons Committee did following its hearings on the GST.

They go on in their brief by saying:

> We believe there are some basic ethical and moral issues at stake in the development of economic and social policies.

The bishops also went on to state:

> In a society based on economic justice, the "ability to pay" must be the guiding principle of a fair tax system.

They go on to say further:

> According to the National Council on Welfare, the income tax bill for working poor families has increased by 44.1% between 1984 and 1988.

The bishops also say that another flaw in the bill is that the percentage of income spent on a 7 per cent GST will fall as income rises.

> It is projected that, a four person family living on $30,000 or less would spend 5.2% of their income on the GST while a similar family with $100,000 income would spend 3.9% of their income on the GST.

That is another unfairness in this tax which is being forced upon us all. I would also underline tonight that this brief says that the GST could amount to a four to eight billion dollar tax windfall for corporations, and that businesses, except doctors, will be able to claim 100 per cent credits for all the GST they pay for the "inputs" into the production of their products. On the other hand, many public service institutions, including municipalities, school boards, universities, colleges, hospitals, churches and other religious institutions, as well as other non-profit organizations, will only be eligible for partial tax rebates on their GST payments.

Finally, they go on to list an alternative set of progressive tax measures, based on research by the Ecumenical Coalition on Economic Justice, which shows the Canadian people, and parliamentarians in particular, that restoring the corporate tax rates to what they were in 1984, and closing loopholes that benefit certain corporations and wealthy investors, would be fair things for government to do. They go on to mention other conclusions of this Ecumenical Council, The Coalition on Economic Justice, but I would not want to take up your time with them. You can get a copy of this August 29 brief from the clerk of the Senate Banking Committee.

I now just want to quote their conclusion to the chairman and the members of the committee on that day:

> We maintain that the federal government has a moral responsibility to promote economic justice by reducing the gap that exists between rich and poor in our society. This calls for a progressive tax system based on the ability to pay. From this perspective, we believe that the GST should be rejected as an unfair tax and be replaced by an alternative set of progressive tax measures calling upon profitable corporations and wealthy individuals to pay their fair share.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, what is happening today is the lust for power and the abuse of power by the federal government. We know that power corrupts and power has led to corruption in the Canadian parliament, even in this chamber. Last night, we watched on television the unification of East and West Germany, the final chapter on the disaster that was perpetrated on Germany and the rest of Europe by Adolf Hitler, who assumed power as the Chancellor of the Third Reich on January 28, 1933, which was followed by the burning of the Reichstag a month later, and later by World War II, in which so many of our Canadian men and women took part, as well as many of our colleagues in this chamber. They gave their lives to help to defeat the abuse of power by Adolf Hitler, the man who ordered the genocide of the Jewish people in Europe and the annihilation, the gassing to death, of six million people. One of those gas chambers was at Auschwitz, which I have visited three times. It is in Poland, not far from Krakow, and it is a museum today to the monumental inhumanity to man perpetrated by Adolf Hitler. This was a man obsessed with power.

I hope that is not the case here in Canada, but there is a danger because of what was done this afternoon at 5:25 p.m. when my right and the rights of approximately fifty per cent of the membership of the senate were abrogated.

Honourable Senators, I think that the Speaker at least owes us an apology.

Senator Frith: A resignation!

Senator Haidasz: Otherwise, he has brought disgrace upon himself and on the speakership of the Senate. Before we end this debate, I hope that the truth will be told as to who or what drove Senator Charbonneau to conduct such an improper vote this afternoon at 5:25 p.m. Thank you.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I hope my voice holds up. I am very proud to be a member of this great house, which is part of our Canadian parliamentary system. I am also very proud to be a member of the working class of Canada, a former CNR railway engineer who has been elected in five elections and served in the House of Commons for over sixteen years.

Honourable senators, I have given my lifetime, as a worker for a political party, as an MP and senator to our great parliamentary system. I am very proud of the fact that a working man like myself can be allowed to serve in the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada. This the type of democracy for which our soldiers served overseas in three world wars. Just remember that over 100,000 made the supreme sacrifice so that our Canadian people would continue to live in a democratic country. Each Remembrance Day, we stand in front of cenotaphs across this great land and we say, "We shall remember them." Well, tonight, I believe that we, as members of a parliamentary system, have failed them. We must not say that we are very sorry but the system that they fought for has failed. However, honourable senators, I did not receive any letter to notify me that the Speaker would stop the bells at 5.30 p.m.

● (2350)

Honourable senators, I do not see my name on this list. Why? After having slept in the lobby of the House of Commons for almost 15 days and nights during the bell-ringing crisis on the National Energy Program, I can say that the Speaker does not have the power to stop the bells. During that crisis, the whips, especially the government whip, myself, signalled to the Speaker that he was ready for the vote.

The Senate rule on page 70 reads as follows:

> The division bells are rung, and when the Whips—

That means the government and opposition whips.

> —have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote—

At that point the bells are stopped.

During that crisis the Mace was on the table, and every 24 hours the Chair was occupied by members of the government, all of whom worked on four-hour shifts. Not once did the clerk, the law clerks, the table officers, the House leader or the opposition leader tell me that the Speaker had the power to stop the bells.

On the first Sunday morning the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, paid us a visit at 7 o'clock to see whether or not we were okay. He asked what we needed, and he sent in cookies, cakes, sandwiches and a basket of fruit.

The Speaker paid us a visit at 7.15 that morning and asked my personal opinion. I said: "You instruct me and I will inform the other whips in writing that a vote will take place on Tuesday at 2 p.m. and we will have the members in their seats at 2 o'clock." The Speaker said: "Charlie, I do not—and I have been advised of this—have the power to stop the bells under the rules."

The Speaker said that what would stop the bells was a signal from the whips.

Honourable senators, I believe that the rules, as outlined on page 70 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada applies in the Senate on Thursday, October 4, 1990.

Honourable senators, we must remember that there are 100,000 who lie in Flanders Fields.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have watched this day develop—or perhaps "disintegrate" would be a better word—with great sadness, with anger and an overwhelming sense of despair. Most of my working life, more than 28 years, have been spent on this Hill writing about parliament, advising about Parliament, and, in the last six years, being a participant and an enthusiastic proponent of the worth of this place.

Today I may have seen the beginning of the end of the operation of Parliament as we know it. No one in any political party, under any degree of provocation, has ever contemplated the action that we have seen taken today.

There have been tough and angry times on this Hill, with harsh and destructive clashes of wills and personalities and principles, but never have parliamentarians in Canada been shut out of their own House, their privileges demolished, their right to vote stolen without notice—and, worst of all, this was not even done with courage up front, so we could have had a fair fight, as is the tradition in this chamber.

It was a sneak play to subvert the rules which senators on this side were using to oppose the GST, the goods and services tax, which we believe, with all the conviction we can collectively and individually muster, is wrong for Canada. Because we have been told by the overwhelming majority of Canadians that it is wrong for them.

Our disagreement with the government and its representatives in this chamber is profound—perhaps it is fair to say it is bitter—just as is their disagreement with us. That is why we have oppositions in our democracy, and that is why we have a second chamber with constitutional authority to do exactly what we have been trying to do.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Fairbairn: This kind of clash and controversy is not pleasant, and it hurts—it hurts all of us. But I ask honourable senators opposite—and so many of you on the other side are friends of long standing, and some are friends in more recent times—is any bill worth the cost to our Canadian parliamentary democracy?

I suggest that no legislation, however important to a government's agenda, is worth the destruction of the fundamental rights of our system—not the GST, not the clawback, not the unemployment insurance bill, not the abortion bill. And speaking of the GST, I have spent, as have many in this chamber, the entire summer out in the country. I was not travelling with the committee, although I did join it in Edmonton when it came to my province of Alberta. However, because of the very nature of this legislation I believed it was incredibly important for me to get out into the country, where I come from, and listen to what the people had to say. I did that. Southern Alberta is a place of small communities in the farming area and in the mountain passes. I talked and listened to people in Pincher Creek and Cardston, and to the Bloods and the Peigans on the aboriginal reserves, in Picture Butte, Taber, Coaldale, Fort MacLeod, Lethbridge—which is, of course, my home town—Calgary, Edmonton and farther afield during speaking engagements in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Fredericton, Ottawa and Toronto.

● (0000)

No matter what I was talking about—and very often I was talking about illiteracy in our country—people expressed their views and convictions on the GST with passion, anger and fear. They wanted to talk about unfairness in the different regions of our country where transportation costs amount to a food tax and a tax on many other things, particularly in northern Canada. They wanted to talk to me as poor people who visit food banks, to whom the small rebate they will receive under this tax will not pay for their daily expenses as they try to put food on their table, clothing on their children, and a roof over their heads. Small businessmen want to know why a government that says a tax is neutral will not then commit itself to use every penny above that neutrality to pay down the deficit that is scaring the hell out of people all across this country.

Honourable senators, I do not believe it is good enough, under these circumstances, for a prime minister to use the tyranny of his majority to have his will regardless of what the people of this country think. If Canadians are angered and disturbed—as they are — by some of these measures, it is not good enough for the Senate of Canada simply to look the other way.

What has happened today follows what has been a clear and, I must say, sordid pattern of this government to force its bills on parliament and on this country, no matter what the people who put it in office think. Senators, in six short years the government has outstripped a combination of every other government in our nation's history, taken all together, in its use of time allocation to bulldoze its legislation through the House of Commons.

When we talk about Senate reform—and I think we all sincerely talk about Senate reform—we talk about it as though only one chamber needs to be changed. I suggest that what we should be talking about is parliamentary reform, because there is a similar job to be done in the other chamber. I would like to share with you some comments made on September 26 in a newspaper for which I used to write, the Winnipeg Free Press, by one of the finest columnists in Canada. Her name is Frances Russell. In the 1960s she reported on Parliament Hill. She is a distinguished journalist in Manitoba because she calls it as she sees it and is no friend to any particular political party.

In her column of last week, Ms. Russell said:

> The standoff between the Mulroney government and the Liberal-dominated Senate reflects a paradox in modern Canadian parliamentary democracy.
> Because the nation's highest democratic institution, the House of Commons, has itself ceased to be democratic, it falls, by default, to an appointed chamber to express the popular will and attempt to hold the government accountable to it.
> The fact the Senate is only fulfilling that role now because of partisanship and may cease to if the Mulroney government swamps it with eight extra Tory senators is more evidence of the serious malaise in Canada's democratic process.
> Put simply, there are no longer any sustainable constitutional checks on a majority government. It is a four-year dictatorship. Not even the prospect of defeat in the next election is a deterrent given the growing confidence a wealthy governing party can place in the modern technology of public opinion research and manipulation.
> Reform of the Senate is a red herring. The real issue before Canadians is reform of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: Ms. Russell concludes her column with comments from our former colleague, Senator Eugene Forsey, who says:

> Now, of course, the government imposes closure routinely. So it is now quite reasonable to make the argument that the Senate is the only protection the public has against a majority government bent on imposing a major new issue of public policy on an unwilling and enraged populace.

Senator Forsey dismisses a government argument that the GST was a visible part of their platform in the last election, and in his own salty quote he said, "In a pig's eye it was".

Ms. Russell concludes:

> The government of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is qualitatively and quantitatively different from all its predecessors in its disregard for public opinion, its open contempt for the electorate and its determination to impose a revolutionary agenda on the nation.
> But by being all these things, it may have done Canadians a favor: it has made them realize the fragility of their democratic institutions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I think today Canadians will be even more conscious of the fragility of this democratic institution.

• (0010)

Some of those comments indicate why Canadians have been looking more and more to the Senate as a forum which may listen to them and respond to their concerns as bill after bill, through stage after stage, is rammed through the House of Commons. But, honourable senators, there is no closure in the Senate. There is no time allocation.

Senator Frith: Not according to our rules.

Senator Fairbairn: No, not according to our rules.

There are rules for discussion; there are rules for debate, and there are rules for negotiation between the two houses. But it has been made very clear by the Prime Minister, and particularly by the Government Leader in the House of Commons, Harvie Andre, that they will not deal with this place. "It is our way or no way."

Now the long arm of Brian Mulroney has reached into the Senate to force his will on this chamber through an executive closure, which has never been attempted before. First, he has appointed eight senators under a constitutional rule never used since Confederation. Senator Beaudoin said yesterday that it was crystal clear that the Prime Minister had every right to appoint extra senators to pass his goods and services tax. Well, honourable senators, it was not and is not crystal clear. The challenges are mounting in courts across this land, and they are challenges by individuals, by provinces and by political parties. Senators opposite cannot now decree what is right and what is wrong on this issue. That is now for the judges of our country to decide.

The Prime Minister had an option to test section 26 of the Constitution in the Supreme Court of Canada so as to check the legitimacy of his possible appointments. He chose not to take that route—perhaps he feared to do so—and there is nothing wrong with taking that route.

I remember very well the early 1980s, when we had what could hardly have been a more major debate in this country about the patriation of the Constitution. The government of the day, led by Mr. Trudeau, was highly motivated and determined to bring our Constitution back from Britain. A lot of the provinces wanted to attach some of their own concerns and conditions to this process and there was quite a row. So the former Prime Minister took the issue to the Supreme Court, not on a question, really, of whether it was legal, because most people indicated that it was legal to go ahead the way it was proceeding, and he had a minority of provinces supporting him. He took the issue to the Supreme Court to find out whether it was right. The court returned a ruling that it was legal, but not right.

An Hon. Senator: Come on!

Senator Fairbairn: And from that ruling Mr. Trudeau was then forced to seek the agreement of a majority of the provinces of Canada to go ahead with his proposals.

This Prime Minister has chosen not to go near the Supreme Court of Canada. Mr. Mulroney has left the validity of these eight appointments—and perhaps even the future validity of the work we do in this house—in deep dispute. He does not seem to care and he did not want to wait.

We found out today that he has also placed a heavy hand on the shoulder of his old friend, Senator Charbonneau. He has asked him for the ultimate favour—to single-handedly override the rights and privileges of this house of Parliament and to force through a goods and services tax detested by an overwhelming majority of Canadians. The first casualty has been the rules on which our rights and privileges rest.

Honourable senators, this has been done by a government which has dropped to 15 per cent popularity in the esteem of the people of Canada who elected it. This has been done by a Prime Minister whose personal popularity, we are told, has gone into a freefall and dropped to single digits. Quite simply, I don't think Brian Mulroney gives a hoot about our parliamentary rights or the rights of Canadians—and if we judge from the polls, the Canadian people don't give a hoot about him.

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, Your Honour, our Constitution has been violated. The rights and privileges of each one of us, I believe, have also been violated today. Damage has been done to our system that may be irreparable. I believe, Senator Charbonneau, that you have destroyed your own privileges along with ours in an act of extreme loyalty to your Prime Minister. He has led you down a very dark and dangerous path. I do not know what future there is for this place.

Listening to speeches tonight, one can feel that the atmosphere has been severely poisoned. Perhaps the destruction of today will finally force Senate reform on the nation, and the sooner this place is elected the better. That is the one good thing that can come from what can only be, in my mind, the saddest moment in Canadian parliamentary history.

As someone noted earlier today, we have not often in this country experienced guns, tanks, bombs or tear gas, but today you, sir, under what must have been overwhelming pressure, have helped to tarnish the value of an integral part of our legislative system. As freedom comes to other nations—as the Iron Curtain has crumbled across Europe and as the two Germanies only this week have been reunited—our Canadian democracy, which we take for granted, has been diminished. Today's events, sir, will be part of your legacy. I have known you as a fine gentleman and I would implore you to give us back our rules if you intend to continue to sit in the Chair. After all, the strength and the power of these rules belongs not to us but to Canadians, whom we are here to serve. Let us at least protect their rights in this institution.

● (0020)

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, today my rights and privileges as a senator have been trod upon. Can you imagine my surprise when suddenly the television in my office spewed out the words: "Let the doors be closed". I walked to the translation booth, because my office is nearby, and what did I see? I looked down and saw Tories voting all by themselves!

Some senators received notices and some did not. What qualifications did I need that were missing? In Section 23 of the British North America Act, 1867 it states:

> 23. The Qualifications of a Senator shall be as follows:
> (1) He shall be of the full age of Thirty Years.
> (2) He shall be either a natural-born Subject of the Queen, or a subject of the queen naturalized by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of One of the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, before the Union, or of the Parliament of Canada, after the Union:
> (4) His Real and Personal Property shall be together worth Four Thousand Dollars over and above his Debts and Liabilities:
> (5) He shall be resident in the Province for which he is appointed;
> (6) the Case of Quebec, he shall have his Real Property Qualification in the Electoral Division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that Division.

If I qualified, where did I go wrong? Nowhere does it say that notices are to be sent to a whip. Article 14A of the Rules of the Senate of Canada states:

> (1) If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting by sending a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate, informing the senator of the time of the meeting.

Fine. I did not receive one today. I have rights as an individual senator, and I have the right to receive a notice, whether or not the notice was valid.

The Senate of the Canadian Parliament bears a name which goes back to the days of ancient Rome and today the Parliament of Canada has been desecrated as if Martians had invaded us. What did they say? "We don't need to respect your time-honoured traditions. They don't mean anything to us".

I am particularly shattered that Senator Charbonneau, a man of such personal stature, could, for some reason or another, be persuaded, in a clandestine manner, to have whipped up a pseudo-legality by registering some underground GST senators.

Whatever the judgment on our Liberal summertime involvement in holding an inquiry across the country—and our attempt to table this inquiry may have been a little rough on the edges—that does not compare with the ultimate desecration from authorities, whoever they may be, that had you induct the "Group of Eight".

Furthermore, as though that was not enough, subsequently you were persuaded to set aside the legality, courtesy, dignity and authority of the parliamentary system which has a reflection on both houses and individuals who are called upon to sit in this place.

There are ashes building within this institution. Perhaps a phoenix will rise from them. Let us hope so, because the separatist forces in our country, in their wildest dreams, could never have shattered the Parliament of Canada as your office has done at this time. It is with deep regret and a great sense of empathy that I realize the terrible position your personal stature has had to submit to.

Where do we go from here? We have a wonderful country, and I can only hope that wisdom and honour will prevail on the Senate of Canada.

I would like to read some words of Sir John Bourinot from 1895:

> No system of government or of laws can of itself make a people virtuous and happy unless their rulers recognize in the fullest sense their obligations to the state and exercise their powers with prudence and unselfishness, and endeavour to elevate public opinion. A constitution may be as perfect as human agencies can make it and yet be relatively worthless, while the large responsibilities and powers entrusted to the governing body—responsibilities and powers not set forth in acts of parliament—are forgotten in view of party triumph, personal ambition . . ."The laws,". . . "reach but a very little way. Constitute government how you please, infinitely the greater part of it must depend upon the exercise of powers which are left at large to the prudence and uprightness of ministers of state.

I also wish to quote a favourite poem of mine, which I would like to leave with you:

"As yet the waxen mould is soft, the opening page is fair;
It's left for those who rule us now to leave their impress there—
The stamp of true nobility, high honour, stainless truth;
The earnest quest of noble ends; the generous heart of youth;
The love of country, soaring far above dull party strife;
The love of learning, art, and song—the crowning grace of life;
The love of science, soaring far through nature's hidden ways;
The love and fear of nature's God—a nation's highest praise."

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I rise to join in the complaint of the abuse of my rights as a senator, an abuse which has been well argued and presented this evening.

I wish to put on the record that I received no notice from the Speaker, Senator Charbonneau, that these proceedings would resume at any set time. I was in my office and learned that these proceedings had resumed by looking at Newswatch, a CBC news program. By the time I was able to be here, those outrageous proceedings—a vote by only one side without notice to a substantial number of senators—had been concluded.

That is the basis of a complaint which I think cannot be answered by Senator Charbonneau and senators on the other side.

I say with great sadness that we are seeing tonight the end of civility in Parliament, not only in this chamber but, I predict, in the other place. We are seeing a process in which the comity which has made the parliamentary system we know work, and work well, undermined by an arbitrary form of behaviour in which the basic philosophy can only be described as "the end justifies the means."

Yes, we have unpopular legislation before the country and we know that the country understands that legislation. We have heard our colleagues speak eloquently tonight on this side, and none more eloquently than Senator Fairbairn, of the issues that are outstanding in the minds of this Parliament and in the minds of Canadians.

I regret very deeply, as Senator Everett said, that today this is a chamber of such hostility and partisanship. Senator Everett has been here a long time, and I have been here for over 15 years. In most of that time the business proceeded by means of co-operation. The business proceeded because honorable senators understood and respected one another personally.

● (0030)

The business proceeded because honourable senators understood their responsibilities to the nation and were able to rein in their partisanship because of that high sense of responsibility.

[Senator Wood.]

Many difficult issues have been before this chamber in the past years. When Liberal governments were in power, I believe senators in the Conservative Party and independent senators were given no cause to complain of the way in which the business of government and the business of Parliament was done. Yes, there were many complaints. I enjoyed the humour of Senator Flynn. I remember the cut and thrust of the argument, but there was no attempt, in my experience—and I believe for many decades in this chamber—to overrun, dismiss, or completely destroy the privileges of honourable senators and the entitlements of an opposition.

I served on a joint Senate and house committee that dealt with the Constitution in 1981. This joint committee sat for six months. Some other honourable senators who served with me are here. Nothing was more carefully drawn than the rights of the Conservative Opposition and the NDP Opposition. Every effort was made to ensure that their participation was at the full, and six months passed to accommodate their entitlement as an Opposition to make their arguments and put their questions before the country.

This is a government in a bloody hurry. This is a government that apparently cares very little for the strains that are caused in Parliament as a result of their forms of parliamentary behaviour, their closures, the timetable and the agenda driven by an election that stares them in the face two years from now. The need to adjourn this session, I am sure, is in order to create a period of time in which the government can reconstruct itself and construct a new Throne Speech with the hope of bringing a softer and gentler message to the Canadian people. I think they have no hope.

Tonight has energized the opposition parties. You saw members of the NDP without the bar. You have done a great deal to bring yourselves down by the abuse that you visited in Parliament tonight and on the rights of Canadians.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Austin: This was a gentler place. Let me read to you a few lines from academics who describe the Senate, the role of the Speaker and the nature of the Speaker's function in the Senate. I want to quote for a moment from an article published in 1969 entitled The Speaker of the Senate of Canada, by Professor W.F. Dawson, who says—and I am sure there will be some wry and ironic reactions to some of these lines:

> There is no doubt that the Senate has a tradition of orderly debate and gentlemanly conduct. There is also no doubt that a chamber that prides itself on its non-partisan approach to legislation will never arouse the strong feelings that occasionally disturb the House of Commons. It is impossible to imagine, for instance, the Senate ever becoming sufficiently aroused that a sitting would have to be suspended for disorder. The few cases of disorder that have occurred have been largely the result of the activities of a very small number of Senators with exceptionally strong opinions.

He goes on to say:

> On the whole, the Speakership of the Senate presents few of the problems that confront the office in the House of Commons. The Speaker still presides over a House noted for its short sittings, leisurely procedure and docile manners. The reform of 1906 . . . gave the Speaker the reserve power he needs to control any unexpected outbreaks of bad temper in the House.

That is the interpretation of rule 15. It goes on to state:

> The one feature—political partisanship—that has traditionally plagued the House of Commons Speaker in Canada should be present in the Senate in an even greater degree, but it has never become important. It is natural that this should be so, for the Chair of the Senate does not carry with it the same responsibility or the necessity for a strict application of the rules which mark the Chair of the Commons. Debate is never as heated and awkward political situations simply do not arise in the Senate. On the whole, Senators have been satisfied with those who have been placed in the Chair, and the proceedings of the Senate have never suffered from any partisan political suspicions.

Oh, my, the times have changed.

Senator Frith: Haven't they!

Senator Austin: The article goes on to state:

> Indeed, it would seem that few features of the Senate Speakership could profitably be improved.

I will move now to a further point in this article—and I am reading from pages 30 and 31.

Senator Barootes: What is the date on that article?

Senator Austin: Yes. I gave it, but I will give it again. It is 1969, and I think it is reasonably contemporary. It goes on to state:

> . . . the Speaker himself has been giving up many of the outward appearances of partisanship by not speaking and voting in the Senate. It is, therefore, much easier for the Speaker to appear today in the guise of an impartial arbiter, free from overt party allegiance.
> The reasons for this change are impossible to assess with certainty, but there is no reason to believe that it is not connected with the background of the incumbents combined with the normal composition of the Senate itself.

He goes on to state:

> In all of these bodies—

And here he is referring to the House of Commons or provincial legislatures—

> —the tradition of an impartial Speaker is strong and it is not impossible that this tradition has been carried over from one to the other. Whatever the reason it seems certain that the Senate has gradually moved from the idea of a partisan Speaker to a position where he presides, as do his counterparts in other parliamentary legislatures, with firmness, dignity and obvious impartiality over the proceedings of the House.

Clearly, we have seen a total revocation of those standards in the behaviour of the Speaker this day.

I wish to refer also to an additional report entitled "The Powers of the Speaker of the Senate", presented by Norman B. Williams in December 1975. He says, as follows, on page 10:

> It is firmly established that the Speaker of the House of Commons is "responsible for the due enforcement of the rules, rights and privileges of the House". By contrast, the Speaker of the Senate, according to the Rules of the Senate, is only allowed to "preserve order and decorum".

And he cites rule 15. He then goes on to state:

> When a Member of the House of Commons moves that a matter affecting the privileges of Members be referred to the Standing Commitee on Privileges and Elections, the Speaker must first decide whether there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege.

Here he refers to Beauchesne. He then goes on to state:

> The Speaker of the Senate is not called upon to make such a ruling. The Senators by majority vote would decide whether the Senate would study a matter pertaining to its privileges.

I submit to honourable senators that the ruling of the Speaker yesterday is unprecedented and unwarranted.

Senator Frith: In retrospect, it is not surprising at all.

Senator Austin: I have spoken in this place before on the powers of this chamber.

I want to go back to a few lines of a previous address on December 14, 1978. I said at that time as follows:

> Today the Senate is not primarily a check on the will of the people as expressed in the other place, nor should it be if that will be expressed in a responsible, tolerant, fair and democratic way. Where both chambers are acting reasonably, the will of the lower chamber should prevail. We have long recognized that principle in our practice.

● (0040)

> I submit that our primary function today is to act as a check on a lower house dominated by the executive. In other words, our legislative role and purpose is to defend the nation against an arbitrary executive which, through party discipline, has captured the free will of the government's supporters. All who think about governmental process know it could happen, so, in fact, we exist to protect one of Stanley Knowles' most strongly held principles—the protection of the people against the will of an arbitrary executive . . .

In 1917, when the power of the executive was not so well developed as it has become today, Sir Clifford Sifton wrote:

> It must also be remembered that, under our system, the power of the Cabinet tends to grow at the expense of the House of Copmmons . . . The Senate is not so much a check on the House of Commons as it is upon the Cabinet, and there can be no doubt that its influence in this respect is salutary.

I presume that rule has been shot out the window as well.

I want to address a few remarks to Senator Waters. I understand that he is saying to both sides in this House, "A pox on both your Houses". I want to say to Senator Waters that there is a lot to criticize in the chamber, but there is a lot to maintain as well. I wish I had heard you, Senator Waters, maintain more of the principles which a second chamber in a bi-cameral system should contain in this Parliament. The smaller provinces—Alberta, your province, and British Columbia, my province—have long suffered under a dominant population which is based in the two central Canadian provinces—Ontario and Quebec. Complaints are well-known.

For a time the Conservative Party was able to capture and advance those complaints. It is a total failure in so doing. My party, too, I admit to this Chamber, has not been a success since the 1940s in capturing the spirit of western Canada. Your party, the Reform Party, is having some success in that respect. Whether it will turn into a parliamentary success remains to be seen. I urge you, as I urge all honourable senators, to understand that this Parliament and its method of workikng depends essentially on compromise amongst people who hold opinions strongly. It depends on those quiet discussions that edge our interests forward slowly but surely, and not on a winner take all mentality, not on a "take no prisoners" mentality. That is what we are seeing today.

Look at the strains that this government has brought into this country. If you pick up the current issue of Maclean's magazine you will see that on the front cover it states: "How Much Can Canada Take? Ottawa is obsessed with stacking an unpopular Senate. At stake: The role of Parliament and the fate of an even more unpopular tax. The country murmurs revolt. The seams of the nation are stretched."

Is this a partisan periodical?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Austin: I do not know which partisanship it maintains; but I will tell you that this magazine is in hundres of thousands of homes in Canada tonight, and Canadians agree with this assessment of the performance of this government. No government has brought more strain to the national fabric of this country than this government. No government deserves to be rejected more than this government deserves rejection.

Governance is a subtle art. Governance requires a subtle hand. Governance requires integrity with the people. Governanace requires an open process. This government is famous for rejecting all those principles.

This government had no open process with respect to Meech Lake. When I spoke on the Meech Lake debate I said the process itself called for the failure of Meech Lake. The people of Canada knew not what was being written by 11 men in a private room. This is not the way to govern Canada.

Forcing a tax of this kind on Canadians against their will is not the way to govern Canada. It is axiomatic that no law should be passed by any Parliament that the people will not obey. This government is in danger of pushing the people of this country to a revolt against our democratic institutions. This government is in danger of pushing the Canadian people into a lower standard of morality than we have enjoyed in this country, and a much lower level of civility than we have enjoyed in this country.

[Senator Austin.]

I say to you that this is an unfortunate point in our history. I hope that this long debate—it is now after one o'clock—at least puts on the record of this chamber substantively, realistically and fairly the rights of Parliament and the abuses that the government is visiting on us. I sincerely hope that somehow that this abuse by the government will be seen and understood by the people of Canada.

Finally, I have to say that I deeply regret, after so many years of building civility and comity in this parliamentary process and in this chamber, that in one day, with one small letter which is inexplicable and unjustifiable, we have destroyed over 100 years of building the Canadian parliamentary system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I rise to add my few words to those of us who feel somewhat violated. Before proceeding I would like to say that traditionally an appointment to the Senate was a thing that people garnered, and, traditionally, when senators arrived we all congratulated them. But we have seen some changes recently. We have seen changes where people come and are smuggled off to rooms to be sworn in in secrecy. That is a far cry from anything any of us ever dreamed of.

Just recently I was reading of the efforts that Samuel Bronfman made to become a member of this chamber. I have often wondered why he never made it and so many of us did. I concluded in those thoughts that we made it to here because whoever chose to put us here thought that we were a little bit better than the others, and that we had something to offer.

I want senators on both sides of the House to know, especially those on the other side, that there are a great many of us here who feel deep passion about these matters. I know that there are many on the other side who are smirking, scoffing and are somewhat amused when they see a man like Senator Sparrow demonstrate the kind of emotion that he demonstrated tonight. I tell you that he is not alone. I say to you, Senator Charbonneau, that this act today is a vile act.

• (0050)

I am a social worker by training and predisposition. I would like to compare this situation to a situation that I mediated so often in my career. It is the situation where a couple is in conflict and a husband and wife are having problems. As that conflict develops, one night one of them comes home to find that he or she has been locked out of the house in a cruel and inhuman way.

Some people shrug these things off. As Senator Simard knows, I am still youthful enough that I do not shrug these things off. It was an awful and terrible feeling for a lot of people today when they got to those doors and they were closed, or they heard in their offices that this terrible thing called a vote had occurred.

I have a sense of humour, and in my search for levity today I found it difficult and trying. Instead of raising fine constitutional or technical points, I should like to read a poem that I picked up during my career. It is a poem written for children. It is called "Wisdom." In the interest of calming and healing some of the hurt and anguish on this side, I would like to offer this to the other side. This poem says:

> Most of what I really need to know about how to live and what to do and how to be, I learned in kindergarten.
> Wisdom was not at the top of the graduate school mountain but there in the sandbox at nursery school.

This poem lists all the things that good people do and do not do that we are taught as children. It says:

> Don't hit people.
> Put things back where you found them.

The most important line that I want to leave with everyone is this:

> Say you're sorry when you hurt someone.

As I said before, in this atmosphere this begins to sound infantile. However, the fact remains that a lot of people are hurting tonight.

All of us come to this chamber with our own collective experiences. Quite often we do not know much about each other. It will take the new senators some time to know a little bit about a lot of us. As these events unfolded today, I found myself quite puzzled, disturbed and unsettled, and I found myself asking the question of whether or not this was Canada.

Everyone knows I am passionate. Canada is a very special country. It is a country that embraced the model of Westminster. This country of ours, Canada, is one that did not slaughter Indians mercilessly like our friends south of the border. When the west was settled, we did it in a different way than the people south of the border. This country of ours is a country that never lynched a negro. There is no such memory in the collective unconsciousness or in the psyche of the people. This country never tarred and feathered or lynched anybody. When our country had problems with provincial rights and would-be secessionists, we did not have a civil war; we did not kill our problem. We did not have a war that slaughtered three-quarters of a million people.

To some of the new senators, this may sound dramatic. I am frequently told I am dramatic, but I am married to a man whose great grandfather marched in General Sherman's march to the sea. I am sure that many senators know what went on in those wars. The people of our country did not do any of those kinds of things. Until recenly we have not been doing these kinds of things.

There has been talk about partisanship. Senator Austin read that some academics say we are non-partisan. Well, we are partisans. Quite frankly, I am glad to be a partisan. I come from a family of three or four generations of politicians. Some of you would know what this means: We were free coloured people. We took part in a system. The vehicles that we used are the same vehicles that are being used in this country. We are partisans. Many people fought and died for this thing that we call a party. Yet I hear much about the negativity of partisanship. It reminds me of an earlier stage in history many years ago when I was convinced that some people believed that you could have children without sex.

I remember the time when we would say, "Let us bring these matters out into the open; let us talk a little bit about them." We were partisans. My background is such that a Tory was someone to be against. I share that with you. Today I was reminded of the origins of the word "Tory." The word originally meant "bandit." At times today I felt just like Senator Sparrow, pillaged a little bit.

We all subscribe to the system because, somehow or other, a part of us believes that as partisans we must fight as hard as we can for our side. I respect those on the other side who fight hard for their side. However, we must always come back to the basic principle of how to play the game. What happened here today is just not cricket; it is not proper. It has violated our privileges. Not only has this action diminished Liberal senators, it has diminished all senators. Today I felt much embarrassment, especially for people like Dr. Keon. That is my compassion and those are my feelings.

I would like to conclude by saying that what has gone on transcends party lines. As I said, we partisans fight as hard as we can for our side, but what has gone on here does not fall along party lines. What has gone on here smacks of despotism. It is serious, it is frightening, and it is real. It is not about party lines.

I would like to close by expressing my deep regret that this Prime Minister and his cabinet seem to be so successful at manipulating large numbers of people. They have manipulated the Governor General and the Speaker of the House of Commons. We have been following the debates there for quite some time. He has been successful in manipulating the Queen and our own Speaker, Senator Charbonneau. I would like to leave one quotation on the record. As this debate continues over the next several days—and I am confident that it will—I am sure that I will have ample opportunity to put many more such quotations on the record. I would like to read into the record a statement by the Honourable Harvie Andre that is recorded in the House of Commons Debates of March 12, 1990, page 9093. He said:

> The Senate claims that since it is a part of Parliament, that gives it the legal authority to reject. I would say again, as I said earlier, the Governor General is a part of our Parliament as well. The Governor General has that same legal authority but, of course, would never exercise it.

This Prime Minister seems to command the various parties, and Mr. Andre seems so confident as to what the Governor General will and will not do. I can only conclude that he has the same confidence as to what our Speaker will and will not do. So, yes, there are privileges. You have not only violated my privileges, but you have jolted my sensibilities and you have offended my humanity.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to tell you a little story that occurred in a small town called Baie Comeau. When the present holder of the job of Prime Minister was chosen at a convention to lead his party, I was watching the proceedings on television with a good friend of mine. At the end of the evening, I asked my friend to tell me what kind of a man Brian Mulroney was. I asked that question of my friend because he had been a schoolteacher in Baie Comeau. He said, "I will put it to you in a nutshell and tell you of an incident that I experienced with the current leader of the Tory party in Canada when I was a teacher in Baie Comeau. It so happens that I taught Brian Mulroney's younger brother a number of subjects. The young man was so disorderly, so unmanageable and so disobedient that, losing all my patience one day, I sent him home. Within the hour his older brother, who eventually became a truck driver in Baie Comeau, had brought him back to the school and he told my friend, "Buddy, if you send him home again, you're out of this town and out of a job tomorrow." The person who said that at that time is now the Prime Minister of Canada. The person who told me the story sits in the House of Commons and faces that Prime Minister every day. I do not believe he has ever told that story publicly, but I think it merits being told here tonight because we are going back to some basic roots.

Let me tell you another story while Senator Murray continues to sign his letters. This story is about him. When I was a member of the House of Commons, I accepted the offer to become co-chairman, along with Senator Murray, of the first committee on official languages. We were the first two incumbents. There had been much negotiation. I had resisted the invitation to become co-chairman. First of all, I did not know any senators and, in particular, I did not know Senator Murray. I was told that he was a New Brunswicker and had spent some time there working for Richard Hatfield and company. The pressure for me to become co-chairman continued to mount. Finally, the Prime Minister came to me after Question Period one day. Who can refuse anything from a Prime Minister? So I gave in and became co-chairman along with Senator Murray, after being duly elected by the committee members.

● (0110)

Over the years we had a famous bell-ringing incident in the House of Commons. As far as I am concerned, under the rules of the House of Commons, when a bell rings members leave their committee assignments and make themselves available to their Whips. That is the unwritten law and that is the sound basic practice: You are in the hands of your party Whips. It had been decided that no one on our side of the House would call a committee meeting or indeed attend a committee meeting during that time. But what did Senator Murray do? He did not consult me, he went ahead and held a joint sitting of the Senate and House of Commons committee on Official Languages. That is another example of, shall I call them "roots"—the way some people think they can try their luck.

[Senator Cools.]

I will leave that aside for now. I find it distasteful to bring some of these topics up, but I have the memory of an elephant when it comes to certain—as Senator Everett calls them—"principles". I am all for fair play. I am all for following the rules of the game. I want to give due respect where respect is earned, merited and owed. I believe I have always treated the Chair in the other place and the Chair in this place with great courtesy, but today I lost all patience and that is why I rise on the question of privilege here tonight. I say "ditto" to all of the other questions of privilege. I did not receive the letter. I did not receive it in my mother tongue which is French. I believe Senator Thériault also complained about that.

[Translation]

What is called the Debates of the Senate. The first hansard on the pile happens to be dated September 25th 1990. Under the date the months and the year you can see the name of the Speaker: The Honourable Guy Charbonneau. It is something to have one's name on the first page of the Debates of the Senate. It is the same thing in English. The words: "Speaker: The Honourable Guy Charbonneau" are written on all copies of the Debates of the Senate. It is an honour. It is a great honour to have your name there because you sit in the chair of the Higher House of the Canadian Parliament. It is certainly a very great honour!

I sat in the chair of the House of Commons, not at the highest level, but at the lowest or second lowest when I became Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons until the elections were called and I was appointed to the Senate. My friends, my family and my colleagues on my side and even on the opposite side in the House of Commons considered that I was given a great honour and I have been accepted unanimously. I always tried to be perfectly impartial.

Impartiality in the exercise of the duties and responsibilities of the Chair is a basic requirement. If you do not have that quality, you should not stay in the chair. If you stick to it, others will make sure to get rid of you.

[English]

Just for the heck of it I looked in Erskine May. I used to do a lot of reading of that text. Out of curiosity I looked at what they had to say about the officers and departments of the two Houses of Parliament of Westminster. On page 173 under "Officers and Departments of the two Houses" we see a paragraph on the Lord Chancellor. Our Speaker, to put it briefly, is the equivalent of the Lord Chancellor. What is the Lord Chancellor? This text states:

> The Lord Chancellor for the time being is Speaker of the House of Lords ex officio. As Speaker he sits on the Woolsack and presides over the deliberations of the House, except when it is in Committee. He puts the question on all motions which are submitted to the House, but he is not invested by virtue of his position as Speaker with powers either to maintain order or to act as the representative or mouthpiece of the House, unless the House confers the necessary authority upon him.

The Lord Chancellor of Westminster is a pretty important position.

In Canada, what is expected of a Speaker of one of our Houses?

[Translation]

First, I shall quote from page 36 of Beauchesne, citation 111. The qualities required from the Speaker of the House should also apply to the Speaker of the Senate. There is no doubt in my mind that a Speaker is a Speaker.

What is a Speaker? I quote from citation 111:

> The Speaker of the House of Commons is the representative of the House itself in its powers, proceedings and dignity.

Dignity! And now I quote from citation 117:

> The chief characteristics attached to the office of Speaker in the House of Commons are authority and impartiality.

Can you understand that, Mr. Charbonneau? Today, all members on this side of the House have been personally offended, except Senator Everett. He does not feel insulted. He is entitled to his opinion. I respect it. We must respect the opinion of all the parliamentarians, but we must demand that the customs, the traditions and the rules of this House be also respected. It was not done today.

[English]

Today, the Speaker of the Senate committed the most grievous sin, a parliamentary sin of unprecedented enormity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: I have never seen anything like it in my life. I heard of what happened to a former Speaker of the House of Commons.

Senator Steuart: He was a bartender in Las Vegas.

Senator Corbin: He was; he passed away some years ago.

When you look at books on parliamentary jurisprudence you do not see the name of that certain Speaker in the index. It was wiped out. He was a smart Speaker. He had talent, but he fell into the trap of the government of the day.

Is Senator Charbonneau, in his naivety, solely responsible for the incident which occurred here today? I believe not; I don't believe it for one second. I believe Senator Murray had something to do with it.

● (0120)

Senator Steuart: The evil genius!

Senator Corbin: I believe Brian Mulroney, the Prime Minister of Canada, had something to do with it. Other members may have had something to do with it.

Senator Grafstein: What about Michael Wilson? He said it would be finished today.

Senator Corbin: Sure. Persons anonymous and unknown to me did this. Probably Professor Beaudoin—

[Translation]

These are not accusations. How could a speaker let himself be used to flout parliamentar y practice and precedent as well as the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, which are quite clear. It's all here in writing. Do I have to read it to you again, Senator David? Are you deaf? Are you blind? Are the scales still on your eyes? Are your ears full of cotton wool? What is going on here?

Senator David: Do you have any respect for your colleagues?

Senator Corbin: I respect my colleagues, but you failed to respect me as your colleague today, by proceeding with this division. You prostituted yourself in the parliamentary sense, my friend. This is parliamentary prostitution!

[English]

Where is Senator Phillips?

Senator Steuart: He had gone to confession.

Senator Corbin: I am extremely appalled. I am so sorry my good friend Senator Phillips was drawn into the stratagem at the orders of the Leaders of Government in the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Corbin: Senator Phillips knows the rule. He sits on the Rules Committee. He helped us write that rule—

Senator Steuart: Here he comes, hanging his head.

Senator Corbin: —under the chairmanship of Senator Molgat.

Senator Phillips, how could you do such a thing? My great friend the Maritimer, I would spend my holidays on your dear island, P.E.I. How could you do such a thing to us today? How could you walk in here alone when you knew darn well what the rule said.

Senator Steuart: Never go again. Think of the island!

Senator Corbin: I hope to keep you as a friend, Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: I hope so.

Senator Corbin: I will do what Senator Flynn told me. He told me many times after he had insulted me in this place: "I hope, Corbin, when we walk out of here we can be friends again." I was always friends with him.

However, this is a place for debate. It is not a place for eunuchs or castrati, and I say that for the new senator who thinks he is coming here with pure grace, with wings, and that he will flutter around this place and that no feathers will fall nor dust be raised. If he thinks that this is that type of a debating place, he should stay home or go back to the navy, as far as I am concerned. I have no use for him here, and I do not think he will make any contribution. Let him go back to his demogogues. I have had enough. I am so flabbergasted, I have been thinking of resigning from this place.

I will tell you, I was not bought to come to this place. I asked the Prime Minister to send me here. He said, "Wouldn't you want something else?" I said that I wanted to go to the Senate. I have nothing to go back to. I left everything behind me when I entered politics sixteen years ago, but I think I have developed a love for parliamentary life. I believe I have developed an understanding of the rules, the procedures and the work of the committees of the Parliament of Canada. I believe I can make a valid contribution. He insisted. He said, "I have something else for you. Think it over on the weekend." [Translation]

It was on the Saint-Jean-Baptiste weekend.

[English]

I came back. I said, "I want to go to the senate. I have nothing else to do. I am a little too old to start another career and too rusted to go back to the other one, and I do not intend to kick anybody out of the other job I held." So I have been here and I have dedicated myself to this place. No one can accuse me of not attending and of not participating.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: I do get off my coffers once in a while. After all, I have inherited all the genes of my ancestors, and there are a few Normans in there, and let the English know that. We crossed the strait once. We can do it again. However, never mind my personal problems.

There are naive persons in here, such Senator Paul David, whom I respect. I respect him as a person. I have travelled with him. I want him to know that I respect him as a person, but, Senator David, this is a place for debate, tough debate, and telling the truth as you see it. I would be doing you and everybody else a disservice if I did not tell you what I felt and what I had on my mind and in my heart.

Dr. Keon, I did my twenty miles of cycling this morning. That will perhaps make me fitter. I hope I never fall into your hands. But by golly, it is not too late to reconsider. My brother is a medical doctor, and while I could say a lot of things, I will just say I was shocked, I really mean that. I cannot understand why you wanted to come to the Senate. It is not a resting place. This is not a "Geritol" club, in spite of what the press says. You saw it tonight. I do not see any senators sipping Geritol around here, on either side of the house. Even the oldest people are just as active as the young ones.

The press has made a campaign against this institution for many years. Is it any wonder the public has a distorted view of the real role, duties and responsibilities of the Senate? Now this had to happen today. That is really the last nail in the coffin.

Senator Charbonneau, I regret to say that I will no longer eat your pretzels and your potato chips. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, now for a change of pace.

Senator Stewart: Give it to them, Dan!

Senator Hays: Okay, Davie. I rise on this question of privilege, and the way I would like to put it is a little different from the way some others have, but inevitably I will cover some of the same ground.

There has been much acrimony and bitterness in the debate this evening. I guess, in the course of my remarks, I would like to try to explain why I think that has occurred, and I will start with that. In June of this year I first started to look at Bill C-62 and the goods and services tax, and, quite frankly, I saw the fall approaching with a report from the Banking committee containing some amendments that might improve the legislation. However, over the course of the summer, and as a result of my participation in committee hearings in Edmonton, I changed my mind, as obviously did many others. Something has happened.

The Senate is not an elected body, but it is still an instrument of the people and a conduit through which the people generally are entitled to speak. That is what is happening here, and we have a joinder of issues. We have engaged both sides. The government's intent is to complete its legislative program, for whatever reasons, I am not sure why, but its agenda says that this must go through, and, it appears to me, at almost any cost. On this side we have an opposition which, I believe, heard people and was impressed by them. Sure, it is partisian. Sure, we would like to gain some political ground with it. Nonetheless, there is deep feeling among those on this side who participated in the hearings on Bill C-62, who heard the people and saw their letters, telegrams and the, literally, millions of pieces of mail that came in. So that, it seems to me, is the explanation of why such strong feelings exist here today.

On the other side, this process has brought many new faces to the chamber. It has, as I said earlier, resulted in quite a bit of rancour here and hard feelings. I regret that, because it is something that I personally try to avoid. However, there it is.

As to my privilege, we must bear in mind the background from which I would like to base my remarks on privilege.

• (0130)

The Senate rang the bells, actually or notionally, for a three or four-day period last week. It seems to me that that is some sort of precedent, and it seems to me that that is what people on this side had in mind when, on a motion to adjourn the Senate, they did not return to the chamber. I believe that this situation has been mismanaged somehow by the Speaker and by the government.

Somewhere something has fallen through the cracks, and the haste with which this chamber was called to a vote does present an actual breach of privilege. I am thinking of the timeframe, having regard, first of all, to the timeframe on the motion put by Senator Frith with respect to strangers, and, secondly, to the precedent set in the House of Commons—which I think one could reasonably expect would apply in this place, in light of the fact that the voting procedures are identical to those in effect in the House at that time. At that time the bells rang for some two weeks, and, interestingly enough—and I say this, I hope, objectively—on an issue not unlike this one.

At that time the bell-ringing incident was prompted by unpopular legislation in my part of the country. That prompted extreme reaction on the part of those in Parliament. I wish the government of the day had listened to those people, as this government should listen to the people today. However, assuming that the government is insisting on not listening, and that the agenda is the agenda at all costs, then what is the breach of privilege?

The breach of privilege is in relation to last weekend and the precedent in the House of Commons some years ago, and then a vote taking place and the Senate proceeding, without notice to anyone, with the Orders of the Day.

One of the only tools we have here, in light of the close vote, likely not in our favour, are procedural tools.

I wanted to present petitions today, but I could not do so.

There were other orders of business that might have afforded opportunities for us to delay procedurally, delays that would be within our rights. The only method we have to disagree in this House is during Question Period, through delay, and through various procedural delaying tactics.

Many senators have commented upon what appears to be a missing set of rules. I will not repeat what was said in that regard.

In any event, I have gone on for some time. I simply leave this with you: I believe our privileges were breached; I believe the timeframe was too short. I believe that a letter sent only to the leadership, copied to some others, is insufficient. In light of past precedents, a day or longer should have been provided for the Opposition to meet and devise a strategy to stay out—in which case much of what has happened would, perhaps, be legitimate—or to come in.

But there was not time to do that, and I believe that could have been reasonably foreseen or known by the government.

In summary, honourable senators, there is a principle that motivates us. There is an undercurrent of partisanship, as there always has been in this place—and I do not apologize for that, nor do I have any regrets.

Clearly the work of Parliament must go forward, but what is the work of Parliament? What is the purpose of Parliament? The purpose of Parliament is to use speech, persuasion, time, and so forth, to the end you wish to serve, whether you are sitting on the government side or on the opposition side. That has not been permitted to happen the way it should have.

Somebody asked what is wrong with this place. Many things are wrong. I could give a speech on Senate reform, but I will not. Some excellent speeches have been given on that topic. Clearly that is something to which we should direct our minds, and perhaps during the course of this lengthy debate—which will end God knows when—there will be an opportunity to do that; so I will save my thoughts on Senate reform for that opportunity.

Honourable senators, we wanted to delay the legislation. Delay is a legitimate tool. We are using it now. I put it to you that our privileges on this side have been breached, and mine in particular.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, the new senators in this chamber will soon learn of various parliamentary organizations in which they can take part, and I know they will find them challenging and interesting. One of those organizations is the Interparliamentary Union, a venerable institution which celebrated its centenary a year ago. It is the parliamentary equivalent to the United Nations and now comprises 106 different countries, as I recall. We have just lost Kuwait, but we hope that will change.

I say this because in 1965 I had the honour of making a motion at a conference of the Interparliamentary Union respecting the setting up of a committee to examine violations of human rights. We had a great fight during several meetings, and a very distinguished former colleague of many here, Gordon Fairweather, led our fight for quite some time. It was a lengthy fight because there were several countries that did not want their actions examined.

Eventually we got that motion through. I was a substitute member on the committee set up for some 13 years, and I have been what they call a titular member, or a permanent member, for the past two years.

During that time we have examined the cases of well over 500 parliamentarians who said their rights had been violated for one reason or another. We are concerned with any government that tries to circumscribe the privileges of parliamentarians and their rights to carry out their duties.

Most of the cases we dealt with were far more heinous than anything I would have expected could occur in Canada, and they included everything from preventing parliamentarians from carrying out their duties to detention for long periods of time—sometimes for years without trial on a flimsy pretext—torture, maltreatment, killing and extrajudicial execution.

The litany of those cases is sad.

Those incidents occurred in countries around the world, and in most cases they started because certain people in power will not brook any kind of opposition or dissent.

In the long run they turn to violence and force.

What is happening in Canada today? I am not suggesting for a moment that the people in power here would ever descend to the inhumane depths that have been recounted in the cases I have studied, but I worry that the impatience of this government with due process, even though it no longer has the confidence of the vast majority of Canadians, and its insistence that every member of Parliament on its side or in opposition fall into line without too much questioning and little dissent has led it into serious and damaging breaches of the rights of parliamentarians.

• (0140)

Two years ago, the government recalled parliament from its summer recess because there was a crisis in this country. About 50 desperate refugees had landed illegally in Newfoundland. The government decided that the actions of those poor people posed such a threat to the peace, order and good governance of Canada that our immigration laws had to be tightened immediately to ensure that no other refugees would slip through our bureaucratic nets.

I am proud to say that the Senate did not rubber-stamp the two bills it was presented with, which had been pushed through the other place. With the cooperation of all members on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, we held hearings across Canada, in addition to those in Ottawa, for the same reasons that hearings were held on Bill C-62—because people felt strongly about this bill, they wanted to be heard, and the government had refused to hear them in the other place. After the hearings were completed, we managed to persuade the government to amend some of the more iniquitous clauses of the proposed legislation, which clearly violated the Charter of Rights and other international protocols Canada had signed regarding human and civil rights.

The government is still complaining and accusing the Liberal senators of obstructionism, even though some of its own members wanted those changes as fervently as we did. Incidentally, many of the provisions that the committee felt were wrong in principle or in practice but which the government refused to consider changing have now been shown to have been as bad as or even worse than we had feared. The even larger backlog of refugees that exists today proves that. The government has still not learned.

With the same intransigence the government has refused to consider the amendments to Bill C-62 that were recommended and implored by various organizations and individuals. We know what its attitude is with respect to the abortion bill, which is now before the Senate and its Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. Spokespeople for the government have stated that we take Bill C-43 as it is or else they are going to refuse to deal with the problem any further. So the government has spoken and we must not defy it. Each week it has become more autocratic and remote for the people and their concerns.

Today we have witnessed the culmination of a series of contempts of parliament, perpetrated by Prime Minister Mulroney and his cohorts, that is unprecedented in the history of Canada. I do not have to remind you of what has happened in the last two months. A crisis had been building in Oka for months; and the government, whose primary responsibility it was, refused to deal with it. The Prime Minister hid from the public and refused to answer the questions of the media, while the frustrations of our native people, who believed, with ample justification, that their human rights had been and were still being violated, grew almost to the point of explosion.

Then the P.M. ceded his authority—the authority which he himself would not exercise—to the Premier of Quebec who called in our army. We can be very grateful and proud of those troops who exercised so much patience and forebearance under extremely trying and dangerous circumstances. But I can tell honourable senators that the reputation of Canada for humanity and for the peaceful resolution of differences has suffered badly in the international community.

● (0150)

I am not proud to have seen those scenes of violence, of the army being used to intimidate and control the native people, who had finally resorted to civil disobedience in order to get some action. This I have seen on TV screens in other countries. I feel sad that it will take such a scene as we have had in the chamber tonight, which will be shown on television screens across Canada and undoubtedly elsewhere, to make people realize that we are in the midst of a democratic crisis, in which the government has used an extraordinary and quite degrading trick to deprive parliamentarians of their privileges.

[Senator Neiman.]

Senators will remember that the Prime Minister again used a transparent subterfuge to avoid complying with the very clear law of this land, which required him to recall Parliament and obtain its consent before sending Canadian forces into an area which could become a war zone. He did not recall the House of Commons because he did not want to explain to opposition members why he made such a decision so suddenly without proper consultation with the responsible people of Canada. He obviously felt that he did not have to explain anything to members of his own caucus, because they just do what they are told.

At the moment, honourable senators, I am the Chairperson of the Interparliamentary Union Committee on the Violation of Human Rights of Parliamentarians, of which I have spoken earlier. Senator Nathan Nurgitz is the Chairman of the Canadian group of the Interparliamentary Union. Our fall conference, at which probably over 100 countries will be represented, will open in ten days' time. Just before it begins there will be a meeting of what we call "The Big Twelve"—all of the countries of Western Europe, Australia, New Zealand, the United States and Canada. They meet to discuss various subjects of common interest before the conference actually begins. Those are the countries I was elected to represent on the Human Rights Committee. Many of their delegates have been active in human rights matters and helpful to our committee in trying to solve some of our cases.

I have not been looking forward to explaining to them, much less justifying, what happened at Oka. I think I shall let Senator Nurgitz have at least the first go at explaining what happened in the Senate today. It has occurred to me that perhaps I should lodge a complaint at our committee on behalf of the Liberal senators on this side. I feel that I might have a conflict of interest in that case and I am not quite sure how to resolve it; but I am certain that I will be asked about it in great detail.

Honourable senators, this Parliament has been debased. The government has caused it, and every Canadian delegate at that conference will be diminished in the eyes of the more than 1,000 other parliamentarians who will be there. I can only hope that those responsible for this debacle will recover their integrity and re-establish our democratic institutions so that we can face fellow parliamentarians with pride in the future.

I also have to mention that I have with me the same article from which Senator Fairbairn read earlier. I had marked exactly the same paragraphs and fully concur with and support her comments regarding the imperative need for the reform of Parliament, not just the Senate. If the incidents of the past few days will in any way precipitate that process, they will have served at least one useful purpose.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising on this question of privilege, I do so in contrast to some speakers in the chamber, in that I feel more sorrow than anger. It seems to me appropriate that this be a sorrowful rather than an angry occasion.

What we have witnessed in the last few hours is close to the death of an institution. It seems to me that we cannot help but be sorrowful, not for ourselves but for the people of Canada at the incredible misuse of power on the part of the Speaker, encouraged and egged on, I have no doubt, by a planned design devised by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and, indeed, by Brian Mulroney himself.

When I read the Speaker's letter—sent, as it was, to the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen—I confess, at the beginning of my remarks, that I have neither the advantage nor, indeed, the liability of being a lawyer. So, as a fairly simple mathematician, I have a tendency to look at simple English words and to interpret them in the way I think the average person would.

I read the letter from Senator Charbonneau and I notice that it mentions, among other things, "the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties . . .". There is no attempt to tell us what those mechanisms are, of course. There is no attempt to indicate that mechanisms between political parties are not the key to the operations of this or any other parliamentary chamber. The key to the operation of any parliamentary chamber is the set of rules which governs it, not backroom deals made between political parties, as this letter would suggest. The key to the operations of any legislative body must be its set of rules.

To begin with, up front the Speaker's letter says that the reason he took the action he did today was because of the failure of political parties to make backroom deals. Clearly that is the Tory proposition, that everything here ought to be fixed up outside the glare of the media, outside anybody's understanding of what we are doing.

He then goes on to say that he will take action because of the failure to assemble senators for a division within a reasonable period of time. As a simple mathematician who only understands numbers, I would like the Speaker to tell us what he thinks is a reasonable time. From what has taken place here today, a reasonable time is whatever Senator Charbonneau decides is reasonable. Honourable senators, I have gone through the Rules of the Senate and I cannot find anything there that says that the Speaker is entitled to do anything within a reasonable time. It seems to me that the purpose of rules is, first, that they be set out in a clear fashion so that we can all understand them.

We now seem to be in a situation in which, in essence, there is to be one rule in this chamber, which is to be whatever Senator Charbonneau decides is reasonable, and there is to be no appeal from that proposition. Indeed, none of us on this side is ever to know what is reasonable until after the fact.

The fact is that under this proposition there was absolutely no way in which anyone on this side could have known, until the letter was received, that the Speaker was going to act as he did. He then went on to say, in perhaps the most preposterous paragraph ever written by any Speaker to anyone in a legislative chamber, and it certainly reads somewhat sanctimoniously:

> I have taken this decision after much reflection to protect the rights of individual Senators to perform their duties.

Let me emphasize that Senator Charbonneau claims that he is protecting the rights of individual senators to perform their duties. What a preposterous statement, when the reality is that what Senator Charbonneau has actually done is trample on the rights of individual senators to deal with the business of the house in the way they think it ought to be dealt with.

It seems to me that we are now in a situation in this chamber in which it doesn't matter what is in the little red book. It doesn't matter at all what the rules say. It doesn't matter at all, for example, that there is a rule which states very clearly at page 70 the following—and again I don't pretend to understand all of the fancy nuances, but it seems, to a simple mathematician like myself, that the following has only one possible interpretation:

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result.

● (0200)

That certainly happened earlier today.

> If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote.

That he also did today; so thus far he appears to be following the rules. Our rules go on to state:

> The division bells are rung, and when the Whips . . .

"Whips" is plural, not singular, and that is not a typographical error. These rules were rewritten recently and agreed to by both sides of the house. It states very clearly "and when the Whips"—not a single Whip, not just the Government Whip, but the Whips of both sides:

> . . . have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked".

The point I am making is that the Rules of the Senate are not in agreement, in any way, shape, or form with the letter the Speaker wrote today. Thus we are now in a position in which the Rules of the Senate are going to be determined unilaterally by the Speaker. The effect is that there are now no Senate rules at all.

What we are now seeing is simply one more step in the government's plan to ensure that anyone who disagrees with it, under any circumstances, that anyone who ever disagrees with the Prime Minister, as we have seen, in any circumstance, is simply going to be steam-rollered.

I must admit that we on this side were somewhat naive. We thought rules mattered. We made the horrendous mistake of believing that the Speaker would at least abide by the rules that are set down for this chamber. How wrong we were!

Of course, we should have seen that this was going to happen. In fact, about 10 days ago the Minister of Finance made the following statement in an interview on a CTV television program with Mike Duffy called Sunday Edition. On that program the Minister of Finance stated:

> I'm not going to talk about it at this point in time, but we will get that legislation through, and that's not bravado.

He then went on to say:

> We will see certain things happening in the Senate this week, more than that I cannot say.

The article appeared in the September 28th edition of the Ottawa Citizen.

Honourable senators, I raise that statement because I suspect that the truth is that what we are seeing today was planned some time ago. I suspect that sometime next week there will be another interview where the Prime Minister will talk about having decided a month ago on what day he was going "to roll the dice". I suspect that what we are seeing here tonight is one more example of the way this Prime Minister has manipulated the entire democratic process in this country.

If this was not planned by the Prime Minister, by the Government Leader in the Senate, with the full co-operation in advance of the Speaker, how else could Mr. Wilson have totally and accurately predicted the future? That is not a fluke quote. God knows, every other prediction the Minister of Finance makes is inaccurate. One only needs to look at everything he says about the economy to know that he is incapable of making an accurate prediction. Therefore, it is very clear that there must have been some plan, hatched a long time in advance, in which the Prime Minister, the Government Leader in the Senate and the Speaker arranged for the events that have taken place today.

I confess that those of us on this side, myself included, were incredibly naive in assuming that the rules mattered. We were incredibly naive because we thought that the Prime Minister would be prepared to tolerate some degree of opposition to his policies, and would understand, in a democracy, that preserving the right to criticize and oppose by legitimate means within the rules—I repeat, within the rules—is important.

There is absolutely nothing that members on this side have done that are inconsistent with those rules. We were naive in believing that one could do that and that the rules would still continue to exist. We did not understand that we were in a game in which the rules would change because the referee was prepared to adjust the rules to suit the wishes of the government and Brian Mulroney.

There have been a number of points made tonight, honourable senators, which bear repeating. I think Senator Fairbairn was the first person who talked about the newspaper article in which an interview was conducted with Senator Forsey on the nature of the opposition which the Senate was taking to the GST.

There was another long interview with Senator Forsey earlier today on the CBC program Morningside. In that interview, Senator Forsey essentially made two key points. I quote

Senator Forsey, by the way, because members opposite have quoted him repeatedly in the past couple of weeks on the issue of whether or not the "British" senators were legitimate. Members opposite obviously believe that Senator Forsey is an authority on the Constitution. Therefore, it seems to me they ought to be willing to listen to what he had to say on the tactics Liberal senators have employed thus far to express their opposition to the GST.

In his interview today Senator Forsey made two key points, the first being that effectively the ability of public opinion to constrain actions in the House of Commons has disappeared. That has disappeared, as he pointed out, for a number of reasons. One was the nature of election campaigns. However, the primary reason it has disappeared is because the government now uses closure with such regularity in the House of Commons that it is not even mentioned in the newspapers.

Many of us can recall as recently as 10 years ago when the issue of using closure in the other place would have prompted headlines, editorials, and a huge outcry. We are now at the point where the use of closure in the other place is so routine, so commonplace and such an everyday action that a majority in the other house absolutely guarantees that government legislation gets through. Legislation is never significantly delayed and gets through all the time essentially unscathed.

The second point Senator Forsey made in his interview today was that the only institution left capable of providing effective opposition, and capable of trying to inject public opinion into the policies of the government, was the Senate. He thought it was absolutely legitimate for the Senate to use every technique and tactic the rule book allowed, including bell ringing, filibustering, and a wide variety of other things. He also stated that it was absolutely legitimate to do so, because that was the role of the Senate. The role of the Senate was to operate within the rules; but as long as it did that it was entitled to try to force on government the views of the Canadian people, the views of the Liberal Party, or the views of any other group. It was a legitimate use of power.

What we have seen today is that any attempt to constrain the nature of what the Prime Minister wants to do is now apparently to be completely railroaded and ignored by the Speaker of the Senate and by others.

The question that has been raised several times by members opposite is, "Why are you doing this?" Let me tell you why we are doing it. A lot of people opposite, including 24 who have appeared in this place since the GST committee finished its hearings, including the "British" eight, have no idea what those of us who travelled across this country this summer heard. They have no idea how we reached the conclusion we did on the basis of the evidence we received. I wish to give a couple of examples. These are direct quotes. I am not making these things up. These are things that real, honest, ordinary, everyday Canadians told our committee as we travelled across the country this summer.

• (0210)

One example came from Jeff Brett of the South Shore Labour Council, who said that "we are in a situation in this country where we have a government that is completely out of sync with the wishes of the vast majority of the people. He went on to say to those of us on the committee:

> I think you have a moral responsibility as the only recourse left. You are the only recourse to preventing what we see will be the disastrous effect of a government that appears not to be listening to certain regions of this country.

I will give you another example from my own part of the country. This again is a statement from what we called, during our committee hearings, the "walk-ons". Since almost 50 per cent of the senators opposite were not there when we had these hearings—and since you claim that you are going to stand up and rubber stamp this, you at least should have some understanding of what took place. At least we might as well educate you before you act like a robot.

At the end of these hearings we allowed individual, ordinary, citizens who wanted to comment to come up and speak for five minutes. There were no fancy briefs, no fancy lawyers or organizations behind them; they were just ordinary, concerned Canadians who wanted to give us their views.

An example of that is this next statement from Ms Shirley Marryat of Halifax, who came to us as a private Canadian citizen. She said:

> . . . the Senate has a moral right to stand up for the people of Canada and to be counted . . . You have to stop and think about the small people in Canada. We are not rich . . . I think you have a legal and moral right to protect the people against the GST..if you are honourable people of the level I think you are, you should go along with what the people not only want and expect but what they need to live as real equal Canadians.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Kirby: That was a simple statement by an ordinary, average citizen from my part of the country.

Lest you think that those kinds of comments occur only in Atlantic Canada, I will also give you two from the western provinces. In Edmonton another private citizen, Mr. Randy Stoddard, came up at the end of the Edmonton hearings, which had been, to put it mildly, extremely emotional. These hearings almost ended in a fist fight out in the corridor because several members of the audience were sufficiently irate with the performance of the Conservatives.

Mr. Randy Stoddard said, in his five minute period, that he helped to elect an MP. Since this was in Alberta, one could guess that the MP this person helped elect was a Conservative. Even a mathematician like myself understands that when everyone in a province is from one place, then, clearly, this person was someone who supported a Conservative. Mr. Stoddert said:

> I asked my MP, whom I helped elect, what he thought of the GST. He was against it. The majority of his constituents were against it. However, he went to Ottawa and voted for it because the Progressive Conservative Party demanded that he vote yes or else get booted out of the caucus.

Mr. Stoddard went on to say that that scared the hell out of him. He further added:

> Democracy is dying in Canada. Our only hope at this point is that the honourable members of the Senate will listen to the people of Canada and reject this regressive tax.

I give you those examples, honourable senators, to point out that if you want to know why the people on this side of the house—and, more specifically, the Liberals who were on the GST committee—reached the conclusion they did, it was because for 20 days this summer, in 12 cities, from one end of this country to the other, and in the two territories, we heard that kind of testimony.

We did not conclude in advance, before we heard any evidence, that the ultimate answer to this problem would have to be that the bill be killed. We came to that conclusion after listening to the evidence. I repeat, "We heard that evidence, from one end of the country to the other." We heard it from business organizations, labour organizations, special interest groups of all kinds, people concerned about the poor, and people concerned about literacy issues. We heard it all across the country.

Since Senator Buchanan is here—and I am delighted that he came back—we even heard it from representatives of Senator Buchanan's own government, and Senator Buchanan himself. I apologize, senator, for not having your precise quote here—I will have it later. Senator Buchanan himself, not before the committee but at least to the Nova Scotia press, urged that the GST be defeated because he recognized, as do all of us from Atlantic Canada, exactly how regressive and punitive that tax will be on the people of our region. If senators look at the impact of that tax and the way in which the tax credits will be applied—the impact on a region of the country in which incomes are far lower than most; in which Canadians in our part of the country are stretched to the limit in an effort to make ends meet—it is very clear that the GST will do irreparable damage to that part of the country.

I supported Senator Buchanan when he made his statement as premier. I thought it was an accurate reflection of the problems the GST would create in Nova Scotia. I have always assumed, as I have said to the press on several occasions since he was named to this chamber, that that view will be reflected when the time ultimately comes to vote on this issue.

Let me set the issue of the GST specifically aside for the moment. Let me go back to where I began my remarks, when I said that I was rising today more in a mode of sorrow than anger. I think we should ask ourselves what are the long run consequences of the performance of the Speaker today. The long run consequences for the Senate are quite clear.

The first consequence is that the rule book does not matter. We no longer have any rules. The rulings are whatever the Speaker decides they should be. Furthermore, the Speaker will decide on the basis of having been told by the Prime Minister and the government leader in the Senate what they should be.

Essentially we are now in a situation in which those of us on this side of the house can no longer rely on living in a civilized society and in a civilized organization where there are rules, because we know, in effect, that what will happen is that the rules will be changed by the Speaker to suit the events of the day.

Senator Haidasz: That is terrible!

Senator Kirby: That is a terrible message to send to the people of Canada. Presumably we are here to make laws. Making laws means setting down the rules by which society is governed. How can we possibly say to the people of Canada, "You have to obey our rules. You have to obey the laws that we set. You have to impose on yourselves the constraints contained in the laws that we pass in this place," and simultaneously say to them, "But, by the way, our Speaker will not impose any rules on us; he will change the rules as we go along."?

How do you say to your kids that there are rules they have to obey, because you are trying to bring them up according to the set of values you believe are right, and you then go back to them and say, "By the way, we had a set of rules in place that were important for everyone to follow, but those rules do not matter at all."? When those rules do not suit the government, the Speaker will simply arbitrarily change them to suit the people of the day. It seems to me that is precisely the position in which the Senate is now in.

When I began my remarks I said that I thought we were at a point where what we were seeing was the death of an institution. I believe that. I believe it because I think we are now in a situation in which the tyranny of the majority is absolutely and utterly unconstrained. There is absolutely no democratic society in the world in which there are not some checks and balances on the tyranny of the majority.

That is why I think that what we have witnessed in the last little while is ultimately the death of an institution. Whether it goes slowly, or whether it goes with a bang rather than a whimper is unclear. But it seems to me almost inevitable that is where we are headed.

However, something almost worse than that is what has happened today to the Canadian people. What is the message the Canadian people are going to take out of here this evening? I believe that the message is very simple. We are now living in a situation in which there are, as Eugene Forsey and others have pointed out, no real constraints on the Prime Minister in the House of Commons. We are also now living in a situation in which there are obviously no further constraints on the Prime Minister in the Senate. It is crystal-clear that public opinion is no longer a constraint on the Prime Minister. One need only look at what public opinion is in terms of the GST.

[Senator Kirby.]

Therefore, if we are in a situation in which there are no longer any constraints on the Prime Minister of any kind, then we are essentially living under the dictatorship of Brian Mulroney–a dictatorship which will last from now until the Prime Minister decides to call the next election.

It is very clear that no matter how bad a public policy is, no matter how people respond to a piece of legislation when the Senate holds public hearings, and no matter what public opinion says about a particular piece of legislation, the Prime Minister is going to get his way. He has indicated time and time again the position that everything which happened in the Senate or in the other place must be his way or no way. One need only think of Meech Lake to see that, but there are many other examples. Therefore, we are left in a situation in which we are now under the total and complete dominance of one man from now until the next election.

That will be one message Canadians take out of today's events. The other message they will take is this: What is the sense of ever bothering to appear before a Senate committee, or bothering to make your views known to senators, when it is crystal-clear that no matter what you say to us, no matter how faithfully the Senate writes a report which reflects the views that senators hear at those meetings, the majority view will prevail and the government and the Prime Minister's wishes will continue? That is the message the Canadian public will take out of today.

I ask all honourable senators to consider that point. It seems to me that the Speaker, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, should have reflected on those consequences, those very long-term crucial consequences, before they took the actions they did today.

I would now like to make one comment of a very personal nature. There are several other ex-academics here, Senator Beaudoin and others, who like myself, although we taught different subjects, nevertheless enjoyed teaching and intellectual debate. We also shared the common belief that what you do in life is important if it can have an impact on life in Canada. We entered politics because we really believed in public policy. We believed that what governments do truly matters. We believed that doing some little bit to help our fellow citizens was important.

What we have really learned tonight, thanks to the ruling of the Speaker and the actions of government members, is that all these things we believed in are false. In fact, we learned tonight that it does not matter what any of us think or do. It particularly does not matter what any of the members opposite think. If any of them think they can stand up and defy the Prime Minister, I challenge them to try it. At least they will not be left in the position of the Conservative members in the other place, who immediately get booted out of caucus and are left to worry about running for election. Members opposite do not have to run for election. Many of them could, in fact, be independent, but they do not have the courage to be.

Many of us entered public life because we strongly believed in the importance of some public policies. People like myself entered public live because we believed that it was important to do what we could for those people living on low incomes, and those living below the poverty line across Nova Scotia and indeed across the Atlantic provinces. We entered public life because we believed that there were battles to be fought, great issues to be debated, and that what we would say and do in those battles and those debates truly mattered. We believed, obviously incorrectly, that what we did could have an impact.

If there is a sad message from tonight to all of us in this Chamber, it is that the only thing that truly matters is doing what Brian Mulroney wants, that Mulroney will do whatever he has to do, however undemocratic it is, however extreme it is, to ensure that he gets his way.

I hope that the Speaker is proud of what he did tonight. But I can assure him that there is not another single living, breathing Canadian who is. I hope he is proud of having helped to destroy a truly venerable and important institution. I hope that he is proud of having helped to destroy an institution which, to regions such as the Atlantic provinces and western Canada, matters as a way of ensuring that we are not subjected to the tyranny of the majority by Members of Parliament from Ontario and Quebec alone. That is why many of us are here. That is why many of us entered politics.

The message that we have received tonight, and the message that the people of our region and, indeed, the people of Canada have received tonight, is that nobody's views matter anymore except Brian Mulroney's. In my view that is a tragedy.

That is why I say, in closing, that my mood tonight is far more one of sorrow than of anger, because I think that what we have seen tonight is an extraordinary misuse of democracy, an extraordinary misuse of power, in an extreme way, which goes beyond anything anyone had ever anticipated even this Prime Minister would try. We and the people of this country had better brace ourselves, because we are now in a situation in which there will be absolutely no constraining Brian Mulroney for the next two and a half to three years. For that I think we should all say: God help the country.

[Translation]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at length, but I must say, as so many others said earlier, that I am deeply hurt by the abuse of my privileges as a member of this Chamber, and especially by the fact that these privileges were abused by the Speaker of this Chamber who did not have the elementary courtesy to notify us although he claims he gave the matter a great deal of reflection.

The Speaker mentioned a breakdown of the mechanisms established by our political parties. What are these so-called mechanisms? What is this new notion that we are governed by mechanisms? I certainly can't find it anywhere in the rules of the Senate which I was given on the day I was sworn in.

In any case, the rules of the Senate are quite clear, both in English and in French, where it says . . . and I quote on page 70:

> . . . when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker . . .

It says: Whips, not Whip.

> . . . and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, . . .

And so on, and so forth.

I always thought that the rules of the Senate were there to protect our rights, even the rights of independents who, since they are not part of a group, must rely on themselves and the rules of the Senate to defend their rights.

[English]

As a former journalist, I have witnessed a fair number of dark moments of political turmoil. In 1965 I travelled to Algeria to report, I thought, on the glorious first three years of self-government for a people who so valiantly had achieved their own liberation. However, one morning during that period of time I was awakened by a colleague who told me that the tanks had moved into the streets. In fact, at the seat of government we found more tanks and soldiers. General Boumédienne was determined to conclude the experience of freedom for the Algerian people.

The journalist in me, of course, was somewhat stimulated by having a major story to cover. However, when I came to write that story I remembered the faces of the waiters in the café where I had lunch and the faces of former soldiers, with tears streaming down their faces, looking at the tanks and soldiers who were supposed to guarantee their freedom, not oppress their liberty. On that day I experienced a feeling of distress and sadness that I have not felt for a long time since.

When I realized that the doors of this place had been closed and the vote had taken place, I felt exactly as I had felt while travelling the streets of Algiers. However, what saddened me the most was that I realized our colleagues on the other side had either said nothing when the Speaker locked the doors or, worse—much worse—they had organized and connived with the Leader of the Government to deprive us of the basic privilege of the right to vote.

Honourable senators, it will take a long time for us to recover from this black Thursday, if we ever do. It will take a much longer time for trust to be restored in this institution.

Senator Frith: We recognize Senator Molson.

Senator Molson: You are very gracious. Thank you.

Senator Frith: You are welcome.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, this debate does not deal at all with the government's proposed Goods and Services Tax.

Senator Frith: You bet it doesn't.

Senator Grafstein: You are absolutely right. You are right on the first point.

Senator Molson: You are all still in good voice. I always like to hear trained seals, so keep on barking.

The GST is not the issue any longer. What I see going on in the Senate—in the Senate I cherish—is an unseemly struggle for crass political power. In this particular instance, the excuse being used for the brawl is a broad and sweeping tax measure; more specifically, our banking committee's report on Bill C-62.

Senator Frith: Why did you vote to support this crass political power grab?

Senator Molson: Why don't you stand up and speak again?

Senator Frith: I will.

Senator Molson: What upsets me most about the debate is the tone it has taken and some of the excesses to which it has given rise.

Senator Grafstein: What about the actions?

Senator Molson: When a person of charm and grace such as Senator Martha Bielish makes a farewell speech on the occasion of her retirement and the leaders of the opposition party refuse to stand with every other senator in the chamber to applaud, I think this demonstrates a singular lack of civility and courtesy.

Senator Corbin: She was pushed out.

Senator Molson: It was not always thus. For the benefit of many who are relatively new to the Senate, I shall dwell upon what the Senate once was and what some of us think it has unfortunately ceased to be.

Senator Haidasz: You can thank Senator Charbonneau for that.

Senator Molson: Again?

Senator Haidasz: Yes, again.

Senator Molson: This is becoming a habit. Prior to 1984, and perhaps because the opposition was not sufficient in numbers, this house was in fact, as well as in theory, a chamber of sober second thought. We looked upon our role as one of review and recommendation. It was our responsibility to scrutinize carefully, to analyze, to clarify, to draw attention to weaknesses and recommend amendments—to make legislation more effective and equitable.

Senator Haidasz: That is what it has been doing all the time.

Senator Molson: It was never perceived as being our responsibility to block legislation we did not agree with. We have never seen it as our duty to obstruct the carrying out of the government's legislative will. If we were against something, we said so and gave the reasons why, usually with suggested amendments.

Especially is there no tradition in the Senate for interference with the government's agenda in the area of money bills. When it comes to matters of this sort, we have always taken the view that our responsibility ends with giving the elected Members of Parliament criticism, advice and recommendations. Whether they acted upon it or not was up to them. Whether they should have or not was up to the electorate.

[Senator Molson.]

The view of what powers were proper for the Senate to use was changed dramatically in 1984. For reasons Lord Acton cited many generations ago, the opposition decided it was time for the Senate to exercise all of its powers. It is referred to as the Senate becoming "more active".

Possibly because of their party's leadership problems in the other place, the opposition have taken upon themselves the responsibility of fighting the government here in the Senate. Naturally, the government side has responded in a corresponding partisan way. Whatever the reason, the result has been detrimental to the Senate. Those opposite will argue that that is not so. They will make a big to-do about how we have not been given this much attention by the media or public in years. That, to those who feel that way, will be the measure of our success.

No one who has any respect for what the Senate is capable of doing has any use for this attempt to convert it into a battle zone for partisan wars. The public is tired of this. The opposition has gone from delay to obstruction, to confrontation. They are fighting the next election on the Senate floor, and I say that is enough.

I should like to remind you of the Hayden formula. For the benefit of newcomers and the press, the Hayden formula was a practice set up at the time when Salter Hayden, a Liberal, was Chairman of our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. The Haden formula involved our looking at controversial or complex legislation long before it ever reached us formally. We started studying it from the time it was introduced in the other place. We submitted recommendations to the Commons unofficially at or before report stage, and many of them were accepted. The bill that eventually reached us was much improved and legislation progressed much better through Parliament.

There was desire then on both sides of this house to do the job. There was a genuine will to do what we were hired to do; bring the benefit of our special knowledge and experience to the task of reviewing and improving legislation. The crises were kept to a minimum. That is not to say there was not lively debate; there was, but much more of it was on matters of principle and much less of it was inspired by the desire for partisan gain.

However, the opposition, led by Senator MacEachen, decided to set aside the policy of pre-studying bills. Nothing is done now to hasten the work of Parliament. I remember a maritime bill that we pre-studied before Senator MacEachen became leader. We made some 90 amendments to that bill. We happened to have in the Senate authorities on that subject. The Commons accepted the help, and the legislation that came from the exercise was enormously improved. That is what this place is all about.

The bill before us is as complex as it is controversial, and few of us totally understand all of its ramifications. I am equally sure that many of those outside of this House are no more conversant with it. The apparent purpose of the bill is to simplify our tax structure and to distribute the burden of taxation more equally. I am sure the bill has some faults. I am sure that amendments will be required, but finding ways of improving legislation is this chamber's principal function. However, we have done with Bill C-62 what we did with the drug legislation, Bill C-22, in 1987. It was made the occasion for confrontation. The opposition insisted on touring the country to ask people if they wanted the price of prescription drugs to rise. Of course, no one wanted that.

The opposition assured everyone that the drug producers were out to gouge the public—

Senator Thériault: And they were!

Senator Molson: —that they could not be trusted to spend what they promised on capital projects and research and development. Well, as it turns out, the price of prescription drugs has not risen dramatically.

Senator Steuart: Where do you live, on another planet?

Senator Haidasz: Shame on you! They're not expensive for you; you get them free!

Senator Molson: You have a lovely voice, please keep it to yourself!

Senator Haidasz: What a statement to make!

Senator Perrault: Totally incorrect!

Senator Molson: Drug manufacturers are doing what they promised to do.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, gouge the public, the poor sick people! I know from my own experience!

Senator Molson: If you have so much experience, why don't you shut up for a minute and let me finish giving mine!

Senator Haidasz: I am trying to put things straight!

Senator Molson: Thanks a heap!

Senator Haidasz: Come to Toronto and I will show you poor sick people who cannot afford to buy drugs!

Senator Molson: Aren't you ashamed of interjecting all of the time?

Senator Haidasz: Not when you are talking that way.

Senator Molson: Let me talk my way, and then you can have your say. You have been talking about parliamentary rules; why don't you think about them yourself?

Senator Haidasz: What, in the way you broke them at 5:30?

Senator Molson: Oh, shut up ! Do shut up!

Senator Frith: Is that all you can say? Is that your answer?

Senator Perrault: A brilliant, intellectual answer!

Senator Molson: The drug manufacturers are doing what they promised to do. They have made at least the investments they promised and provided a lot of employment, and they have spent immeasurably on research and development.

Senator Haidasz: And patients are paying more for their medicines!

Senator Forrestall: I suppose you wrote some prescriptions.

Senator Haidasz: That's right.

Senator Forrestall: Did you write a generic or did you write a brand name prescription?

Senator Haidasz: If the generic was available, I wrote a generic prescription.

Senator Molson: Perhaps I had better sit down until the honourable senator is finished. Would he like to take the floor?

Senator Haidasz: I have spoken already.

Senator Molson: I know that, but you are still at it.

Senator Haidasz: According to the rules, I can only speak once.

Senator Cools: There are no rules!

An Hon. Senator: Those rules are gone!

Senator Molson: If the house wants to listen to the senator, I will give him a chance to speak. I am not terribly anxious to go on with that kind of racket.

With Bill C-62, the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee toured Canada like a travelling circus—

Senator Perrault: Come on now!

Senator Steuart: You were never there!

Senator Molson: —asking Canadians if they wanted to see their taxes raised. Of course, they did not, and I could have told the committee that. They spent three months travelling when they should have been studying the bill carefully and analyzing it with a view to making the necessary amendments.

Senator Frith: That's right, don't listen to the people!

Senator Molson: That is how we have dealt successfully with complex legislation in the past.

The committee has not done its duty. It has not studied the bill itself. It has not struggled and sweated with the weaknesses it claims are there and come up with its own alternatives. It merely reports to us that there are people with deep concerns who feel the bill should be amended in various ways. That is not what was required of them. The opposition, if it is to enjoy any credibility, has to tell us precisely how they would deal with the matter.

The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate will remember, I am sure, that he once had misgivings about the federal sales tax. He felt it was unfair and promised an alternative. That was in 1980, ten years ago. Surely he has enough time to produce something worthy of imparting to this house and to the rest of the country as an alternative.

I do not yet know how I shall vote on the bill if it comes to us amended. I am not defending the legislation, but I am defending the right of the government to rule and I am defending the right of the elected house to have the last say in one respect — that being with matters pertaining to the public purse. In 1984 and again in 1988, this government was given a mandate to rule, and rule they should. What the Leader of the Opposition says about this legislation will be taken for what it is worth. It will be remembered that when he had budget-making responsibilities, he predicted a deficit of $10.9 billion which turned out to be one of $23.6 billion, less than a year later.

Senator Frith: Continue on with your non-partisan style!

Senator Murray: He is just putting a statistic on the record.

Senator Molson: That, however, was not his finest hour. Nor, I would say, was it when I once suggested, as many notable members had before me, that the Senate should consider the value of more of us sitting as independents. Senator MacEachen dismissed the idea as patronizing by "one unencumbered by any political convictions." I am not devoid of political convictions. That is not why I have always insisted upon sitting as an independent. My political convictions run very deep. They have strong moral and philosophical underpinnings. They have been influenced by tradition and tested by history.

Some do not understand that one can have political convictions that are not partisan. There are some of us who consider it more important to stand and defend principles than to defend mere political parties. Lord knows, political parties can change direction with the next public opinion poll.

The bill before us is secondary in this battle for power. It is an opportunity to further the ends of the party, to press further toward the ultimate objective. Let the party be served, but let us pretend to be concerned about the people — after all they are the ultimate vehicle to power in a democracy.

Senator Frith: Where were your principles when the rules were broken?

Senator Molson: I maintain my view about the value of cross-benchers; that is, independents.

• (0250)

I was smugly lectured by Senator MacEachen to the effect that true cross-benches in the House of Lords would find my views quaintly outdated, so I checked with a few. I have a grandson, a cousin and a few friends in the Lords and they found my views not outdated, and my friends know they do not have to agree with me to remain friends.

The Senate, honourable senators, should not be used as a forum in which to wage the initial battle of the next general election. That is not what we were created to do, and we should not allow it.

I continue to believe that it is our role to improve legislation; that we used to be wise to start looking at important bills the moment they were introduced in the Commons; that we should bring the fruit of our efforts to the other place as soon as we can; that we should suggest amendments that are as constructive as possible; and that we should not aim for confrontation. Delay and obstruction are not beneficial to parliament nor to the people of this country, and they are not justified.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Molson.]

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have listened to Senator Molson with great respect because Senator Molson is entitled to great respect in this House, but I could not agree with him less on most of what he said.

One of the elements of his speech that I agree with was that we used to have a civilized relationship between this House and the Government. That was when governments and ministers were willing to sit down with committees of this House and discuss the legislation and, indeed, adopt amendments which were suggested by the committees of this House and go back to the House of Commons and have them passed. Indeed, many times they accepted the credit for those amendments themselves. That is perhaps one of the criticisms that might be made of the Senate at that time—that it did not get credit for the things that it did. I agree with Senator Molson; we accomplished a great many things at that stage of our existence.

But what happened—and someone else has already alluded to it tonight—was that as soon as the Mulroney government got into power it immediately created a confrontational relationship with this House. When we simply asked that a budget be laid down before we approved the estimates, they said no. We knew, and every one of the conservative members knew, that that was the first in the history of Canada that any government had ever taken that position.

Senator Grafstein: Who stood up on principle, then?

Senator Stanbury: Exactly, and that is when the confrontation began with this House.

Senator Neiman has laid out for you the relationship which developed in the committee that she and I happened to sit on, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, when we dealt with one piece of legislation after another with the cooperation of the conservative members of the committee; when Jacques Flynn made a great many—probably the preponderant number of suggestions for amendments of those pieces of legislation; and when the conservative members—and some of them are here now and some are out having coffee—agreed on suggested amendments. We would bring the minister in and suggest that these would be helpful amendments and the minister would say, "No, I am under instruction from Mr. Mulroney that I am to make no change. We will accept no change in our legislation" and they never have in all this time. Of the 300 pieces of legislation we have passed, almost every one of them was without amendment because they would not accept any amendments, even though they were lousy bills in many cases.

Senator Olson: New Murray law.

Senator Stanbury: That is where the problem was, Senator Molson. It was not with this group. It was with the change of relationship between the government and the Senate when the conservatives took power and had to have it their way, and that is exactly where we are today.

I want to go on to say that my privileges were offended, broken by the actions of the Speaker today. I received no letter from anyone saying that the House was about to sit again.

What happened last week was that the bells began ringing and at 6:30 that evening, the Speaker took it upon himself to cut off the bells. If anyone sitting here tonight had been conscious of the bells being cut off, they would have assumed that the Speaker had taken the same position he did last week and that he was intending to leave the bells off until the Senate was ready to come back. But, instead of that, there was a Tricky Dick kind of deal: Here come the Conservatives, having conspired in this, with the Speaker under instruction as to what he is to do, and the vote is taken with the doors locked with no chance for Liberals to come into the place.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Stanbury: The Speaker's action was despicable and I see no way in which he can be recognized.

Senator Frith: But according to Senator Molson, it was very principled.

Senator Stanbury: It is a principle, but a vile principle.

I wanted to point out to Senator Molson that surely there was a purpose for doing what was done. Senator Molson said that did not have anything to do with the GST. I tell you that that was the whole purpose—it was so that they could jam the GST down Canadian throats.

Senator Frith: Do you think they did it for some non-partisan reason?

Senator Stanbury: What a mess it would be if it were allowed to happen. The GST was supposedly mentioned by the government in its election campaign in 1988.

Senator Frith: It was not.

Senator Stanbury: As Senator Forsey would say, "In a pig's eye it was!" The fact is that after the election was over and they decided to get on with the second stage of tax reform—of course, they had done the easy part of the tax reform before the election and saved the hard part until after—they got on with the first paper on tax reform. They laid down certain principles that were to be observed and that were necessary to this piece of legislation. First of all, it had to be visible: second, it had to be fiscally neutral; third, it had to be fair and equitable; and fourth, it had to be simple to administer. In the next paper they said, "Of course, it must be integrated with the provincial tax system". Not one of those principles has been observed in this piece of legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: That is not what the committee said.

Senator Stanbury: There is no place in the world where a federal system has piled a sales tax on top of a sales tax. That is why the Federation of Independent Businessmen say that it is the worst sales tax system in the world.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Stanbury: We are not going against this bill just because of the popular rejection of the bill; we are going against it because of what the committee discovered was terrible about the bill. It is a lousy bill. Not only that, it is a dangerous bill and it is unamendable because it is so bad. We have had lots of examples of what the individual problems are with that bill, and I will not go into them because they are all on record. However, the committee of this house found that bill to be completely unacceptable. Thank goodness the people who spoke to the committee led them to that conclusion.

• (0300)

Yet now, here is the government trying to ram down the throats of the people of Canada a piece of legislation which is opposed by nine provincial premiers, by some 300 before the committee, by some 5 million people who have signed petitions, by the churches of Canada and, I think, by everybody who is organized in Canada such as the Co-ops, which represent millions of Canadians. Again, it is opposed by everyone who has applied their mind to it, except — and I just realized where the 7 percent who support Mr. Mulroney are! They have all been put into those benches, that whole 7 percent of the population.

I just cannot tell you how upset I am about the suggestion that this is purely a political matter. As far as I am concerned, it is not. I have studied the bill, I have studied the committee report, and I am satisfied that it would be a disaster if it were imposed upon the Canadian people. I am not the only one who has decided that. Everybody has decided that — everybody except the government, and here you are trying to jam it down our throats. You are trying to give votes to eight illegitimate people. I sympathize with them because I have never heard of anybody getting suckered into a situation like this before, but that is what is happening. These are eight people who —

Senator Perrault: Snuck in up the back steps.

Senator Stanbury: — if you have your way, be given a vote, which will be contradicted by the courts almost immediately, and there you are sitting with a piece of legislation of which nobody will know the effectiveness.

We know perfectly well that, as we get into the abortion issue, if there is any doubt about the competence of those eight members of the Senate, then the questions will be life and death rather than just dollars and cents.

I do not want to go on very much longer. I have not got the strength at this time of night. I would love to say a lot about these things. However, I do want to speak briefly to Senator Waters' concern. Senator Waters, I think if you had been here a little longer and had appreciated the depth of degradation to which the people on that side went tonight and the depth of degradation to which the Speaker went tonight, you would have been out there demonstrating with everybody else on the floor of this house. There is no other way. If you are to be swamped by illegal members of the Senate, and if you are to be dictated to by a captive Speaker, then there is no other way than to demonstrate your anxiety, your disgust and your unhappiness with what is going on.

As to Senator Everett, he says —

Senator Perrault: The genius, you mean.

Senator Stanbury: I should tell you that Senator Everett is a good friend of mine. I expect he always will be a good friend of mine. I am sad that he takes the position that he does because it is an arrogant position. It is a position that says there must be progress of business in the House, regardless of the rules — and that is not a position that I can imagine Senator Everett accepting.

Senator Frith: I agree, exactly.

Senator Austin: It is astonishing.

Senator Stanbury: It is just an astonishing position. He says we should not be so partisan, and then he says he wants an elected Senate. Can you image how partisan an elected Senate will be? I am in favour of the elected Senate. Both the Liberal and the Conservative parties have said they are in favour of an elected Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Would you run?

Senator Stanbury: I am within about two years of retirement so I probably will not run, but I am just telling you that I believe in the elected Senate, as Senator Everett does, but I would not want to pretend to him that it will be a non-partisan Senate.

I intended to address a few more remarks to Senator Molson, but I think I will not. I just want to record my outrage at what the Speaker and these Conservative senators have done tonight. I certainly claim that my privileges have been breached.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable Senators, I rise to express my disappointment and sadness at what has happened here this afternoon and tonight. I have been a member of this chamber for 13 and a half years, and I have never seen anything like it. I think that the entire responsibility of what has happened here today lies on the shoulders of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Frith: Exactly.

Senator Steuart: Hear, Hear!

Senator Bosa: I had a premonition very early this afternoon that something sinister was about to happen, and I will tell you why. Let me share with you why I had that premonition. When the Deputy Leader of the Opposition got up and moved the adjournment of the house, the Rules of the Senate are usually followed this way: the Speaker gets up and says, "I have a motion for the adjournment of the house. All those in favour, please say 'yea', all those against please say 'nay'," and then he uses his judgement to say who won. He then says, "In my opinion, the 'nays' or the 'yeas' have it." At that moment the members who disagree with the opinion of the Speaker stand up and, in that way, they force a recorded vote.

What I observed this morning — this afternoon, I should say—

Senator Haidasz: Yesterday!

Senator Bosa: —yesterday, when the Speaker got up and said, "All those in favour of the motion say 'yea'," the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Government in the Senate got up and said, "We want a recorded vote." I asked myself how they could have possibly been so trigger happy as to promote a recorded vote before the Speaker had the opportunity to complete his question. We went out of the chamber and I kept on wondering why these two gentlemen, who are masters of the rules, who know the Rules of the Senate like the backs of their hands, would do that, which leads me to believe that this matter was plotted in the office of the Leader of the government in the morning at the latest, and not at 4:30 or five o'clock this afternoon by the Speaker.

Senator Perrault: It was done last week!

Senator Bosa: I got the proof that that had happened when Senator Thériault was speaking this afternoon when he said that not only did he not receive a copy of the letter, but when it was finally handed to him, it was handed to him in English only, whereupon the Leader of the Government in the Senate immediately rushed to the defence of the Official Languages Act. He got the file that was handed over to him by Senator Doody and he then pulled out the letter and said, "See, it is in French." I looked at that letter, and I have a copy of the letter that I received. This is a copy of the letter that everybody received.

An Hon. Senator: I didn't receive it! Nobody received it!

Senator Bosa: I mean the one that was handed out later.

Senator Corbin: The one that was distributed by our Whip after the fact.

Senator Bosa: Yes. The copy of the letter that the Leader of the Government in the Senate had in his hand had the red emblem of the Canadian Senate.

Senator Perrault: It was the original!

Senator Bosa: It was the original. Why would this letter be in the hands of the Leader of the Government in the Senate and not in the hands of the Speaker?

An Hon. Senator: Because he wrote it!

• (0310)

Senator Bosa: That leads me to the following point. I partly blame the Speaker, but I think the Speaker is more the victim in these circumstances. However, I do blame the Speaker for one thing: being so terribly loyal to his party, when the party does not deserve his loyalty. The Leader of the Government in the Senate used the Speaker as cannon fodder. A man who has had a distinguished military career, a distinguished business career and a man who has enjoyed a great deal of prestige as a parliamentarian—until today–has been used by the Leader of the Government. I believe the Leader of the Government in the Senate should not have inflicted this humiliation on a gentleman who has served his country, his business community and this Parliament so well.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bosa: What the Leader of the Government in the Senate made the Speaker of the Senate do today makes Speaker Louis-René Beaudoin look like a saint, look like a pillar, a custodian of the rules of Parliament.

Senator Haidasz: And he ended up being a bartender in Las Vegas.

Senator Bosa: In a book entitled: Speakers of the House of Commons by Gary Levy, the following appears respecting Speaker Beaudoin:

> René Beaudoin's career stands as a tragic reminder of what can happen to the presiding officer who loses his reputation for impartiality. To some extent Beaudoin was a victim of circumstances but he also contributed to his own downfall by making mistakes and by allowing partisan considerations to influence the way he interpreted the rules. He not only brought discredit to the institution of Parliament but ruined his own promising career. Every subsequent Speaker lives with the knowledge that what happened to Beaudoin could happen again, but this very knowledge makes it less likely such a disaster will recur.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate was aware of the reputation of Speaker Beaudoin. Why did he put Speaker Charbonneau in the same situation?

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Bosa: Let me read the last sentence in Mr. Beaudoin's biography. It says that he had many jobs, was divorced a couple of times, and "even spent some time serving beer in a roadside tavern in Arizona before eventually returning to Montreal where he died of a heart attack at age 57."

Senator Haidasz: A tragedy!

Senator Bosa: I ask the Leader of the Government to restore our confidence in the Speaker. I ask him to do the decent thing and restore the Rules of the Senate so that we can continue our debate, as we were before the rules were distorted.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable Senators, it is with great sadness that I rise to take part in this debate.

The Senate, where next Monday I will celebrate my 20th anniversary as a senator, has been done irreparable harm today.

It is a sad day for our parliamentary system and a sad day for you, Guy.

[English]

Today you have been had. You have been taken to the cleaner's.

Senator Kirby: He went there voluntarily!

Senator Molgat: You have been prostituted by two men: Lowell Murray sitting there, and Brian Mulroney. You, Guy, who have had a distinguished military career, a distinguished business career, have been destroyed in this House by those two individuals.

Senator Steuart: Shame!

Senator Molgat: This is a sad commentary, and, frankly, you have my sympathy.

What happened today? I will start, first of all, with my own question of privilege. This afternoon I was in my office at about 5.20 and I received a telephone call from a staff person in the building who said to me that Senator Everett had received—well, I see he is not present. I was told that Senator Everett had received a letter from the Speaker, stating that he would hold the vote at 5.30 p.m. I said that that was preposterous; that that was totally inconceivable. I told that staff person there was no provision for such action in the rules, and certainly no precedent, and that that was obviously a rumour.

Two or three minutes later, I received a telephone call from another senator, a colleague, who said to me, "Have you heard anything about a letter on the vote?" I said: "I certainly have not received any letter, but I did receive a phone call to the effect that there is such a rumour going about." I then said: "But surely this is one of those rumours that goes around. The government could not possibly do that. There is no way the government could do something like that." So I went back to my business. Then, when I turned on the television set, I heard the Speaker calling the House to order.

I happen to come from Manitoba. Senator Everett comes from Manitoba. I would like to know why Senator Everett got a letter and I didn't. What possible explanation can there be?

Don't shake your head, Barootes!

Senator Barootes: Everett does not have a Whip.

Senator Molgat: What does that have to do with it? I am not here because of a Whip; I am here because I am a senator.

Senator Grafstein: Who called you?

Senator Barootes: Nobody.

Senator Grafstein: How did you know about the vote?

Senator Molgat: I received no letter or any communication.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, may I have a word. Let me say that I heard there was something taking place in the chamber. I thought I had better go down to the chamber to see what was going on. When I did I ran into my colleague, Senator Phillips. Oh, I am not going to say anything about him, Senator Murray—we just chatted for a moment. I asked what was going on. He asked me if I was going in and I said: "No, I am not going in now."

Senator Phillips and I have been Whips together for some six years. Many times he said to me: "No, I am not going in now." So I said the same to him. While I was talking to him I was handed a copy of a letter. It was then 20 minutes past 5.

Senator Perrault: Unbelievable!

Senator Petten: The Speaker must think I am a wonderful fellow if I can inform 50 people in five minutes that there is to be a vote!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grafstein: Stand up and tell us when you were called, Barootes.

Senator Petten: You shut up!

Senator Cools: He has some imagination!

● (0320)

Senator Petten: If anyone's privileges have been trampled upon, mine have.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Are you defending that kind of thing? Do you defend that?

Senator Frith: Where is Phillips?

Senator Petten: Perhaps I should apologize for my outburst of temper.

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Petten: Barootes, you keep your big mouth shut!

Senator Frith: Can you imagine what Phillips would have done if you had pulled this on him?

Senator Petten: Come on, Barootes, say something. Go ahead.

Senator Barootes: I will ask a question, if I may.

Senator Petten: Go ahead.

Senator Barootes: I defer my question.

Senator Corbin: Ask permission from your boss, Murray. He told you to keep quiet. Ask Murray.

Senator Steuart: He has nothing to say!

Senator Molgat: I want to clearly establish my personal point of privilege. Honourable senators, we are involved in a political system. The basis of the democratic system is the individual vote. Today in this house I was denied my vote, and I have come here, like you, as a properly nominated senator, and I have my rights, and you have denied me my rights.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: That is exactly the same as if in any election, be it federal or provincial, the returning officer of the polls decided at 3:30 in the afternoon that he would close the polls. What would you say about that kind of a democratic system?

An Hon. Senator: Lock the door!

Senator Molgat: That is what we would expect in a totalitarian country.

Senator Stanbury: That is what it is.

Senator Perrault: Fascist state!

Senator Molgat: Think about it, ladies and gentlemen. This is not a figment of our imagination. There is a deep, fundamental question here. You people—you, Mr. Speaker, you, Lowell Murray, and your boss Brian Mulroney, who is behind it all—today deliberately denied the people on this side of the house their fundamental, democratic right. Think about it, honourable senators, particularly you new senators who have come here. Did you come here to be involved in that kind of a charade?

[Senator Petten.]

Senator Cools: They do not even know about it.

Senator Molgat: Think about it. Your action affected the basic democratic system.

Senator Frith: And what you did is forever history.

Senator Molgat: Let us go one step further to the privileges of the Senate. Guy Charbonneau, you had absolutely no right to send that letter.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: There is not one single precedent in this House, which has been in existence for 123 years, and there is no line in the rule book that gives you, Guy Charbonneau, the right to send that kind of letter. You do not have that right. You have given yourself rights that you do not possess. This Senate has never given you, or any previous Speaker, that type of authority. Never!

So, honourable senators across the way, think about it. Bill Doody, you sat in a provincial legislature. Have you ever heard of a legislature in which the Speaker makes the rules?

Senator Stanbury: Obstruction!

Senator Molgat: Where, out of the blue, he can make a rule? Finlay MacDonald, you are an honourable man.

Senator Cools: Yes, he is.

Senator Grafstein: Absolutely.

Senator Molgat: You cannot believe that we run a system whereby the Speaker, of his own volition, with no background, with nothing in the rule book, without precedent, can decide on his own when the vote will be held. Do not tell me about order and management of the Senate. Come on! You are striking at a fundamental component of our democratic system, which is the right to vote. Our ancestors fought for that right. Think of what has happened in eastern Europe in the last few years. People have been fighting for that right to vote. Do you mean to tell me that you support what went on today?

Guy, you were wrong, but you had to be advised by Lowell Murray and Brian Mulroney. I would like to give my friends opposite some advice. I think it is high time you had a revolution in your party before Mulroney ruins the whole country.

Senator Steuart: And your whole party.

Senator Molgat: You have a serious problem. What occurred today is an example of a terrible sickness. We are not playing games. You are playing with the fundamentals of our system. What you did today was not right. Claude Castonguay, I am sure you did not come here to trample on democratic rights. I would not have thought, with your background and career, that you could be involved in something like that. I am sure none of you want to be involved in something like that.

It is disheartening. I do not know what to do. How do we get out of this mess? Can we turn the clock back? Frankly, we should, because you are establishing a devastating precedent.

Guy, with regret I must say that we cannot have confidence in you as Speaker.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I rise this morning to record my sadness and repugnance at what has transpired in this chamber this afternoon—

Senator Haidasz: Yesterday.

Senator Hastings: This afternoon. We are still considered to be sitting on Thursday. In any event, I record my repugnance at the actions of the Speaker of this institution who, after a great deal of reflection to protect my individual rights, broke the rules of this institution, locked the doors and took a vote, all in the interest of my individual rights. I was denied entrance to the chamber.

But, honourable senators, what has transpired here today should not come as any surprise to us. As the Honourable Senator Kirby indicated, we received notice of it from the Minister of Finance last Sunday when he said "We have tricks and we are going to take charge of that Senate".

Senator Perrault: Harvey Andre said the same thing.

Senator Hastings: But the sad part is that the Speaker of this institution joined in that conspiracy and denied those in the minority their rights in this institution with his actions this afternoon.

• (0330)

Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that Speaker Sauvé in the other place did not see the mechanisms established by the political parties there falling apart. She did not for one moment consider breaking the rules in the interests of the Liberal majority. She protected the Tory opposition in that assembly. It was 17 days—

Senator Perrault: The Tory bells rang for 17 days!

Senator Hastings: That was the act of a Speaker who respected a minority.

Honourable senators, we should not be surprised at what is transpiring here. We were warned of it in 1988 by the Prime Minister, when he said, "We are going to sell the GST in the same way as we sold free trade and Meech Lake." Of course he made that statement. He bragged about Meech Lake before it went to its untimely end. And what was the way to sell it? The end justifies the means! Use any method! Tell any lie! Get to the end! Break any rules! Break any laws!

That is the essence of what has transpired in the discussion of the GST since it was introduced in the other place. We have had the instructions read to us tonight: No discussion, like Meech Lake; no public discussions. Prevent any dissent being discussed! Ram it through secretly, any old way!

Honourable senators, there is a great deal of secrecy around here these days, sneaking people up back stairs, secretly being sworn in. What an act! What acts of this great Parliament, to fulfil the Prime Minister's narrow objectives for this country. I have said that in 1988 he said, "Sell this the same way," and they started in the House of Commons: Choke off dissent; choke off discussion, debate, use closure every step of the way. When two members of his party from my province dared to dissent—out they went! "Nobody is going to dissent from me, and when it gets to the Senate we will take on the Liberal senators!"

When we suggested holding public meetings, senators opposite opposed that on instructions. Senator Molson is not here, but he would oppose it, too. He said we were a circus. If we were a circus, you were the clown, Senator Simard, as we travelled across this country.

Senator Simard told the people of the Maritimes, whenever he could get a microphone in front of his face, that this was an exercise in futility. He said that we were spending $500,000 and that the Liberals would pass the GST when they got back to Ottawa. Then, when we got to western Canada, it got up to $1 million, but he changed his tune. He said that the Liberals were not going to pass it as quickly as possible.

Senator Simard was following instructions: Discredit the committee; discredit the chairman—those were his instructions. He rose on points of privilege every morning. The spin-doctors were there every morning to give him his points of order so as to get the noon hour telecasts. It didn't do him any good—all of the spin-doctoring that he did at public expense didn't do him any good. The people of Canada didn't change.

I can tell Senator Molson that the people of Canada said to us, "We know we have to pay taxes, but all we are asking is fairness." As strange as it may seem to Senator Molson, they asked that the corporations pay their fair share, too. That is strange to Senator Molson and all of the other senators opposite, because they pay your way and keep you over there. As the return of the electoral officer has shown, they are the ones who keep you there through the contributions they make to you.

Senators opposite have followed their instructions carefully. They never wanted to discuss the bill. They did not want to discuss the fallacy of its being revenue-neutral, except for one moment of frankness on the part of Senator MacDonald, who, in Whitehorse, said it was a farce for the minister ever to have said that. He was being frank that morning.

What about medical expenses? Tell the people they don't have to worry about their medical programs. Tell them that their medical programs will not be hurt. Why did the Canadian Medical Association come before us and say that it will cost the doctors of Canada $100 million the first year? Where do you think the $100 million will come from?

Take the price of beer—tell them the price of beer is going down. The Brewers' Association came before us and told us that the price of beer is going up.

Take housing—tell the people of Canada that housing will not cost any more, that housing will be stable—don't worry. But the housing people came before us and told us that it would cost $10,000 more per house in Toronto.

Don't talk about inflation! Don't talk about unfairness! Attack the committee—attack the Liberals! You followed your instructions carefully.

Well, honourable senators, we have come to today and they continue on this journey of using any method or means to jam this damnable bill through Parliament and to hell with the public, to hell with Parliament. But what did they do to this institution? What did they do to the rights of the minority? Don't worry about the minority—trample on it! September 24th was completely vilified by the Speaker today! The Speaker said today that everything that was done within that meeting on September 24 was within the rules of the committee. So what are you talking about? Does Senator Simard want to bellyache about that?

Senator Simard: Yes, I will. You will hear from me next week!

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, where do we go from here? I don't know what the future of this institution will be, but I tell you that you have poisoned the atmosphere of this institution beyond repair. I have been here for nearly 25 years. I don't think I have ever had occasion to be saddened or to regret anything that has transpired here through all those years, in this Chamber or in the other Chamber. I am saddened, honourable senators—some senators can laugh. I know that what senators opposite have done here today is a joke to them—it is a destruction of this institution and of this Parliament.

I deeply regret that my privileges as a senator were trampled on and extinguished by you, Mr. Speaker, today.

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I would like to say that at approximately 5:45 this afternoon, if we consider the parliamentary language, I was furious. Now it may be too late for me to be furious, but I am still wounded and I am bleeding. I was furious at 5:45 because at that time there was a knock at my office door that I answered, and I was told by Senator Graham's secretary to rush to the Senate because there would be a vote. I rushed at 5:45. I came here and the vote had taken place. I was furious, and for good reasons, because my privilege as a member of the Senate had been violated. I don't know that I am still furious, but I am still bleeding, as was stated, and all because the members on the government side are endeavouring to force upon the people of this country a tax that the people of Canada reject, and reject not only by a majority, but they reject it massively.

● (0340)

I have good reasons to oppose that tax. That is why I am still here at 4 o'clock in the morning. I oppose that tax because it will affect my constituents, and they are not the wealthiest of people. I can understand certain senators supporting this tax because big corporations support it and big people support it, but small people do not support it because they will have to pay.

In the United States recently there was one girl, a very wealthy girl, who said, "Only little people pay taxes. I don't pay taxes". She is now in jail, or should be, or at least is on her way.

It is the small people who will pay this tax and that is why I am dedicated to opposing it. I will do whatever I can in this institution to oppose this tax imposed upon us by a man who claimed that he was the saviour of Canada; he was responsible for national reconciliation. His name is Brian Mulroney. National reconciliation—what did he accomplish?

I have never seen Canada in such a chaotic situation. I have never seen in Canada Anglos against Francos as we see them today, and Francos against Anglos; not only that, the Inuit against both Anglos and Francos. I have never seen such a situation in Canada.

In this institution, I have never seen members on this side losing respect for members on the other side, and members on the other side losing respect for members on this side. It is unheard of and it is something that I deplore very much. I think the author of all of this is a man from Baie Comeau, Brian Mulroney. It is most unfortunate. I truly believe in this.

I would like the eight newcomers to this place—I will not call them senators yet. Maybe I will sometime in the future, I do not know, but I cannot call them senators yet. I would like to tell them that I have absolutely nothing against them personally, but I think that they are intruders in this institution because they are the instruments of Brian Mulroney who is trying to impose a tax on the Canadian people that the Canadian people at one point in time, and I hope very shortly, will reject.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to put on the record, because this will be an important record, a few details of what happened today. First, let us get the setting and realize that the report that Senator Buckwold brought forward from his committee was tabled on September 26, 1990. The 26th of September was last Wednesday.

We were unable to deal with that report, and we know why we were unable to deal with the report, so that the first couple of days that went by were the responsibility of our friends opposite. Then we came to the weekend.

In the meantime, there had been added to the Senate a number of senators under Section 26 of the Constitution. Then everything changed and the government wanted to deal with the GST, but of course still only a couple of days had passed. This is the long obstruction that we have been hearing about.

The question then arose in the country, and here, about whether these senators should be permitted to vote on this legislation, because there were serious questions being raised as to whether their appointments were authentic. That is very important, because everything is still linked to the GST. Nobody is about to suggest, or has even thought of suggesting, that those eight senators were put here for any other reason than to support the GST. Not even they would quarrel with that. We were told that that is what they were brought here for, and it was the GST. They would not have been brought here for Bill C-21. They were brought here for the GST.

Now we are at October 5, still really only October 4th. We sat this week for two days. This is the obstruction—two days. Wanting to get this straightened out—still it was the GST that was the objective of the government—we were told by the Speaker that we could not raise that question here in the Senate.

In order to have the opportunity to straighten that out, on Wednesday, giving that as the reason, we moved the adjournment of the Senate. The bells started ringing at 2.40 p.m. We went into caucus. No messages were received.

● (0350)

It is not unusual, if I want to talk to Senator Doody and he is in caucus—or if he wants to talk to me and I am in caucus—for him to send a note to me. He did it today on another subject. We received no communication from the Speaker, no communication from the Whips, no communication from anyone on the other side. I came out of that caucus at about 4.30.—and I was not keeping notes, because I had no idea that this would happen. I was immediately 'scrummed', if that is the right word. The reporters said, "How long are you going to stay?"

I now want to recall something to you. When the Speaker decided to turn the bells off last weekend, he did so because he said that we had taken the public position that we would be coming back on Tuesday and, therefore, he had decided to do that. He said that in a letter. But not this time. He did not bother to check about the public statement or communicate in any way.

The press said, "When are you going back?" I said, "I do not know; we are in caucus." They then asked, "When could it be? How soon could it be? Could it be this afternoon?" I said, "Yes, it could be. I am not trying to escape you; I am telling you that I want to go and phone Mr. Chrétien to bring him up to date and make some other phone calls to consult." They said, "Could it be tonight?" I said, "Yes, it could be tonight." No checking was done on that. If any checking was done on that, it did not suit the purposes of this conspiracy because that was not referred to in this letter. It was only referred to in last week's letter when it was used to justify the action taken.

Senator Grafstein: Does the leader's office have a little tape recorder taping what you have said? Does he have a message of what you said? Does the Leader of the Government have that information in his office on a tape recorder?

Senator Frith: I do not know. Anyway, there was no communication at all until this letter was shown to me. I was in Senator MacEachen's office. My secretary then came up with my copy of the letter. Senator Fairbairn was with me. I said, "What time is it?" I was making these phone calls when I was handed this letter. It was approximately 5:04 or 5:05, something like that. The letter said—well, you heard what the letter said. We have been through it—and when I say ad nauseam I do not mean too often, but I mean that it is nauseating to receive a thing like that and be told that the vote was to be at 5:30.

So I started dictating an answer with the intention of bringing the answer down to the Speaker or bringing it into the house, depending on the circumstances. But my intention was to give it to the Speaker. You know what happened then. I heard on the electronic speaker that the doors were being locked. So I said to whoever I was on the phone with, "It is done. They have locked the doors. They are taking the vote."

I also checked the time. I looked at the clock in the office. I find that Senator Phillips, having been told, as we now know, by Senator Petten that he was not ready to go in; and remembering the number of times that Senator Phillips had said to him that he was not ready to go in—and neither Senator Petten nor any other Whip in the history of this place has ever gone in when the other Whip said that he was not ready—at 5:25, Senator Phillips entered the chamber and the doors were locked immediately.

Senator Cools: That is right.

Senator Frith: And then the dirty deed was done!

Senator Perrault: At 5:25!

Senator Frith: And what was the plan? Of course we heard, "Oh, well, this is just on an adjournment motion." I heard that being said, namely, "This was just on an adjournment motion. That is all that was involved." That is all that they wanted to accomplish. They just wanted to do this dirty deed to defeat an adjournment motion. But I was asked to appear on the Newsworld program. They said, "If you do not come here, only the Tory side will be heard," because Senator Beaudoin had just been on that program. So, over I went. This was at approximately 7:30.

I saw Senator Beaudoin on the tape that they had done. He had just left, I take it. After some very limp excuses—especially for a professor—about why the rules were not being used instead of this so-called precedent of Michener, Senator Beaudoin said, "Yes, there is some sort of custom about the Whips going in. There is something about that. Oh, yes, it is some custom or tradition, I understand".

Senator Perrault: Tradition!

Senator Frith: He went on to say, "It has been done. There is no doubt that it has been done." And the interviewer said to him, "But isn't it in the Rules of the Senate as to how it should be done?"

Senator Forrestall: No it is not.

Senator Frith: And, yes—no it is not, is it not?

Senator Forrestall: Read sections 49 and 50.

Senator Frith: Yes, I will read sections 49 and 50, senator. You have been wanting to get that read, haven't you? I will read sections 49 and 50.

An Hon. Senator: You have put your foot into it this time.

Senator Frith: This instant expert from the other place wants us to read sections 49 and 50. I take it this instant expert has read it himself. I will read them now. Section 49(1) states:

> When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for the "yeas" and the "nays" and shall thereupon decide whether the question has carried.
> (2) In the absence of a request for a standing vote, the decision of the Speaker is final.

(3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.

Next is "Pecuniary interest" and reads:

A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which the senator has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

I do not know whether that applies. Is that the one? Did something happen? Was someone voting here without the—

Senator Forrestall: Where is the first—

Senator Frith: All right, let us go. Section 49(5) states:

Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices. The Speaker shall in all cases have a vote. When the voices are equalled the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

50(1) A senator shall not vote on any question unless the senator is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.

(2) Without leave of the Senate a senator shall not speak to a question after the order has been given to call in the members to vote thereon.

(3) With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reasons assigned by the senator be withdrawn or changed by the senator immediately after the announcement of the division.

I will tell you what happened, Senator Forrestall.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Frith: You asked for this. You said read sections 49 and 50.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Perrault: Sit down!

Senator Lucier: Sit down!

Senator Frith: I will tell you exactly what happened.

Senator Perrault: You asked for it!

Senator Frith: Since you want information on this, what happened was that we ran into some problems with people coming into the chamber, because there is nothing in sections 49 and 50—

Senator Forrestall: Well, come on—

Senator Hastings: Listen!

An Hon. Senator: You just got here!

Senator Frith: This is exactly what happened, sir. You may not like it—I do not know where you were when it was happening, but you were not here. If you want to get the information, I will tell you.

The problem was that people were coming in after the vote had started. The Rules Committee was asked to look into this question and clarify the procedure. The Rules Committee did so, and in explanation, they gave a report, which was worked through by members on both sides. You will find it on page 70. It says that voting in the Senate is described in rules 49 and 50. It then proceeds to give the details as to how that is done. At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question.

Senator Forrestall: That is the title page!

Senator Frith: If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for a vote. Your Whip was there when we did this.

• (0400)

Senator Forrestall: Answer my question!

Senator Frith: I am quoting from the appendices in the book which were adopted by the Senate, sir, before you got here.

Senator Hastings: Before you even got into the tunnel!

Senator Forrestall: Read the rules!

Senator Frith: You should read them, and read them all.

To get back to Senator Beaudoin, and to remind honourable senators what we were talking about before the genius expert raised his question, we were talking about what the plan was. I watched Senator Beaudoin. The interviewer said to him, "Is it not in the rules in this case?" Senator Beaudoin replied, "Yes". He asked, "Are you not establishing a precedent? Is the Speaker not deciding that he just does not like the system provided in the rules, so he is going to send a letter to create a new precedent on this adjournment motion which he could then use on the GST?" Beaudoin said, "Yes, he could use it". The interviewer was wondering if there was a difference between adjournment motions and legislation. When the interviewer said that, the reply was, "That procedure is used on legislation". So the interviewer said, "So that means you create a precedent and then use it and say, 'I ignored the rules then, so I can ignore them again'".

The next question went more or less like this: "Will it be used on the GST?" The answer was, "Oh, yes, we will bring on the GST and it will be used on the report and at third reading". "What procedure will he use?" asked the interviewer. "He will use the new precedent that he has created for this purpose," was the reply.

The whole thing is a detailed scheme with every detail worked out. Of course, the hit man in the whole scheme was Senator Charbonneau. It will be interesting some day to find out just what happened. Would it have been like this: "Okay, in you go, this is it. Send the letter and get in there. Lock the doors and get the deed done"?

That is the obstruction. That was justified by the fact that for two days the government filibustered its own legislation. We then raised the question regarding the authority of these senators and were told there is a good reason, because the whole system has broken down. That is what Senator Charbonneau said. Thus, he had to go in to force a vote on the adjournment motion. He laid down a few little hints in his ruling in which he referred to rule 15.

Is he using rule 15, which states that he must maintain order, to do such a disorderly thing? What was happening was that the bells were ringing. Is that disorder? If that is disorder, we have been doing a lot of disorderly things, as someone said, in the last 123 years in this place.

That is the obstruction that Senator Molson and Senator Everett talk about. When members opposite were obstructing their own bill, did he think perhaps that was disorderly and that he should force a vote on Senator Buckwold's report?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: No, that was not disorderly enough. The system had not broken down enough at that point. It only got disorderly when the bells were ringing. He was the one who said, "Call in the members". The bells rang and he used this as a reason.

I would now like to talk about partisanship. Have honourable senators noticed that the term "partisan politics" has become a negative thing? What is the source of partisan politics? It is based on the fact that we have a multi-party system in this country. That is where the term comes from. People sneer at the fact that you may be doing something for the interests of your party, a thing that until very recently in most of eastern Europe Senators Molson and Everett would have had no problem with, because there was only one party. There was no partisanship. They could have had their lofty principles and said, "We have only one party here, the Communist Party. There is no partisanship around here".

As Senator Molson says, "There happens to be a few of us in here," something which, incidentally, does not include members opposite. He says, "There are a few of us in here who have principles". Apparently, if you are a member of a political party, that means you do not have principles. Do not forget that when Senator Molson talks about partisanship and the fact that he has principles, it is because he is an independent. He does not think senators opposite have principles either—remember that he just talks about a "few".

Yet the same highly principled, independent man, for many years chairman of our rules committee, came in here and voted with the government members who, I am bound to say you ought to know, Senator Molson, are also members of a political party, and have been known occasionally to engage in partisan activity. The most recent time that they have been known to engage in partisan activity was today. You came in and supported them. I would like to hear more about these principles. I do not even know what they are. I do know that they do not relate to what you are talking about when you talk about partisan activity in the Senate, because you came in and participated in the most highly and infamously partisan, from your terms, device imaginable.

It is unprecedented, and do not try to tell us that the same thing has happened here before. I would never have dreamed, when I was sitting where Senator Doody is now and when Senators Flynn, and sometimes Roblin and Murray were where I am now, of going to Senator Deschatelets and saying, "Speaker, I want you to have a vote without Senator Flynn's party". Can you imagine what Senator Flynn would have done? What do you think Senator Deschatelets would have done? If Deschatelets had even dreamt of anything close to that, you can imagine what would have been going on in here tonight with Senator Flynn.

Would anyone have dreamt of going to Senator Lapointe and saying, "Senator, here is what you have to do. I have a letter which I want you to send out and we will have a vote in 30 minutes"? She would have said: "What do you mean?" "Don't ask questions. Just send the letter. Don't worry. We have the Whip ready. Our Whip, who is Senator Petten, will go in there, and if he runs into Phillips, don't worry about it. Phillips will say he is not ready to go in, but Petten will go in anyway. You get into the chamber and just listen to Petten."

• (0410)

Think of the complaints we would have heard. We were talking about how Flynn would have reacted. Can you imagine how Senator Phillips would have reacted had Senator Petten tried to pull something like this on him? Would we have gone to Senator Marchand or Senator Riel and asked them to do this? Can you imagine any of these people even thinking about it?

Senator Grafstein: Paul Martin.

Senator Frith: Yes, even Paul Martin.

Senator Hastings: He was partisan.

Senator Frith: He was sort of partisan. Honourable senators, the proposition I put to my colleagues and ask them to support is that until Senator Charbonneau resigns and is replaced by a Speaker who is prepared to reinstate the rule book and respect it, we will do everything to stop business being done in this place. When he has resigned and been replaced by a Speaker who will reinstate the rule book and undertake to respect it, we will get back to business. Until then, we will do everything to stop any business being done under his regime.

Senator Simard: That is a decision you announced last week. That is nothing new.

Senator Cools: Get your facts right.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Orders of the Day.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, you are not calling any Orders of the Day.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: You have to leave the Chair. Go back to Montreal. You have no authority.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am calling for the Orders of the Day.

On Order No. 1 being called:

A Clerk at the Table: First Order. Resuming—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No orders until that Chair is vacated. Unless the Speaker is replaced, we are not going on with any business.

• (1740)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ORDERS 1, 2, 3 AND 4 POSTPONED

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule 46(c) I move:

> That the Orders of the Day 1, 2, 3 and 4 be postponed until the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have had a meeting with the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to discuss how we can proceed with the business of the Senate. I have had an opportunity to consult with my colleagues regarding that meeting with Senators Murray and Doody.

I should like to tell you exactly what we think should happen today and Tuesday, which is as far as we have gone. We propose to accept Senator Cogger's motion, which has the effect of allowing debate to start today on Bill C-62, the Goods and Services Tax. On our Order Paper at the present time it takes the form of consideration of the report of the committee. Honourable senators will recall that the committee's report is that the bill be not proceeded with. We propose simply to start that at this time. It has been taken into consideration. Senator Buckwold will simply move the adoption of the report, and will perhaps say a word about why he would prefer to continue next week. We will then adjourn the debate until Tuesday, October 16.

On Tuesday we will be starting with a fresh sitting and at the top of the Order Paper. Order No. 1 deals with Bill C-28, which is known as the clawback bill. Order No. 2 deals with Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance legislation. Order No. 3 deals with third reading of Bill C-39, which is an act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas. As far as I know—and the Speaker is the Chairman of that committee—that bill is quite uncontroversial. I am sure Senator Marsden would like us to proceed with Bill S-8, and I may have a short speech to make with regard to it. We will then deal with Bill C-62.

We have not come to an agreement about the extent of debate on Bill C-28, although we have discussed it. We believe there will not be a long debate on that bill. We will have to reopen and continue our negotiations with regard to Bill C-21. Bill C-39 will probably pass because it is a third reading and there is no controversy that I know of. Bill S-8 I have just mentioned. We would then be back at Bill C-62.

Senator Nurgitz will put the question. As far as we are concerned, we can adopt it, because that will enable us to implement the short introduction of the goods and services bill by Senator Buckwold. On Tuesday we will revert to the Order Paper that we have before us.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Because of the way things were left on the record after the points of privilege that were raised, everyone's position will remain the same. Our position is that the vote on Wednesday should not be a precedent, and that such votes should be held in accordance with Rules 49 and 50. Proceedings for a vote are outlined on page 70 of the rules. As I say, our positions remain the same on that. Our position with respect to Speaker Charbonneau remains the same. I think that covers everything that we discussed.

• (1750)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I should explain to our caucus that we did indeed have those discussions with Senator Frith, and the report that he has given is correct in every detail.

The last two items mentioned, the vote on Wednesday and the position on Senator Charbonneau, are just as diametrically opposed on this side now as they were yesterday and Wednesday. Our friends opposite feel very differently than we do about that, and that has not changed.

I would ask that the Speaker not see the clock and that we proceed with the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, pursuant to rule 46(c),

> That the Orders of the Day 1, 2, 3, and 4 be postponed until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, Honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT
CRIMINAL CODE
CUSTOMS ACT
CUSTOMS TARIFF EXCISE ACT
INCOME TAX ACT
STATISTICS ACT
TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND-REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commmerce (Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act), presented in the Senate on 26th September 1990.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, Honourable Senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable Senators, this very important piece of legislation, of great interest to Canadians across the country, has been very thoroughly reviewed by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and its views have been expressed in our report. I think it is a very important report that requires the concentration and energy of every Senator as we move into debate on this question.

With that in mind, and drawing to our attention the fact that most of us are quite tired having had a long few days and nights, and that I would like to have all the energy I can muster to state the case that I think is correct, I move adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to notices of motions:

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable Senators, before the question is put, may I take 30 seconds of your time to wish all Honourable senators and their families a very happy Thanksgiving weekend, and to have a particular thought for the staff of this place who, over the last few days in extremely trying circumstances have once again proven their tremendous devotion to duty.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, politics is a miraculous and wonderful thing, because who would have thought an hour ago that I would stand and enthusiastically support remarks made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate; but I do.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and nothwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 9, 1990, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 9, 1990, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 9, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE SENATE

STOPPING OF DIVISION BELL—SPEAKER'S LETTER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. I hold in my hand the official report of Senate debates from October 4, 1990, in which is recorded the division of this house reported to have taken place at 5:25 p.m. that day.

It is my right, my privilege is to be present and to vote in this house, not for my own glorification but for the benefit of the people whom I was summoned to represent. I am rising to defend my privileges, because my privileges are their privileges.

Last Thursday, Senator Charbonneau wrote a letter to four senators. Copies of that letter were sent to eight other senators. Therein, he stated:

> Dear Senator,
> In light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties within the Senate to assemble Senators for a division within a reasonable time, I will be stopping the division bell and will proceed to put the question now before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. this day.
> I have taken this decision after much reflection to protect the rights of individual Senators to perform their duties.
> Sincerely,
> Guy Charbonneau.

Honourable senators, that was the first act in a violent, tyrannical attack on the rights of honourable senators. Later that day, Senator Charbonneau ordered that the doors of the Senate chamber be locked, and he called a vote contrary to the rules of the Senate.

The other evening, questions were raised on very point. It was stated that the part of our rules entitled "Appendix I, Forms and Proceedings" is not a rule, but, for the benefit of those who are new here, let me draw the attention of honourable senators, first, to rule 1. That rule says:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Then we turn to Appendix I, "Forms and Proceedings". There we find the head note:

> This appendix is a general description of Senate practice and is included in this volume as a source of information on the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate referred to in Rule 1.

Later in that Appendix we have a description of how formal votes are taken in the Senate, and I read, in part, from what is found on page 70 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada:

> If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote.

Then the Speaker again puts the question.

Thus we see that there can be no doubt about the authority of the description of a vote as set forth on page 70 of the rules.

What happened here last Thursday was that Senator Charbonneau ordered that the doors be locked, contrary to the rules by which this house is governed.

Did Senator Charbonneau regard his action as being in conformity with the rules? No, he did not. He found it necessary to write a letter to four senators notifying them of his intention. He found it necessary to give four senators special notice and, thereby, he showed that he knew full well that he was innovating in contravention of the rules of the Senate.

He did not write to me. He did not write to many senators. He led me and many senators to believe that the procedures of the Senate, as established by long-respected precedent and confirmed by our rules, would be followed last Thursday.

Honourable senators, cast your minds back to what happened at the sitting of Thursday, September 27, 1990, as recorded in the official report of the Debates of the Senate. A motion "To Order Withdrawal" of strangers was moved. A formal division was called; the bells rang. I was in my office—which is over in the Victoria Building—and suddenly the bells stopped ringing. I did not know what was going on. Had the vote actually started? After making inquiries I found that the vote had not started. All on his own Senator Charbonneau had instructed that the bells be turned off. He left the Chair. He locked the doors. How was I to know, when the bells stopped ringing on Thursday, October 4, that the same arbitrary action was not being repeated?

• (1410)

It may be said that the Liberal Whip should have contacted me. For all I know, he may have tried to reach me; but he never did. That is not a material point. My ability to exercise my rights as a senator—my right to be present when a vote is taken and to vote—is not conditional on receiving messages from a party whip. My right to participate in the business of this chamber is my right as a senator, not as a Liberal.

Do honourable senators remember what happened in August 1987? My native province, we were told by the government, was being invaded by Tamils. The two houses of Parliament were recalled to deal with that great emergency. At that time, Senator Charbonneau did not send a telegram to Senator Petten asking him to "give Stewart a call". He sent me a telegram in my own right. He did not follow that pattern last Thursday. He left my right as a senator to depend on someone else—someone who is not an officer of this house.

The responsibility for my being excluded from the chamber when the vote was taken last Thursday rests squarely on the shoulders of one person: Senator Guy Charbonneau. It was Senator Guy Charbonneau who decided to break the rules; it was Senator Guy Charbonneau who wrote to some and not to others; it was Senator Guy Charbonneau who left some of us in the dark and outside the door. He did this deliberately—to use his own words, "after much reflection". This was not mere inadvertence. This was not the act of a man moving hastily under the pressure of rapidly changing circumstance. This was an act done after much deliberation.

Then, as the official report of the Debates of the Senate shows, on Thursday last he locked the doors, not at 5:30 p.m. but at 5:25 p.m. Thus he protected, and again I quote, "the rights of individual senators to perform their duties."

Let me tell senators what happened in my own case last Thursday. Some senators know that as long as I have been a senator I have occupied the same office on the eighth floor of the Victoria Building. I heard a rumour—and that rumour took the form of a phone call from Senator Grafstein, who happens to have an office next to mine, but who, at that time, was over here in the Centre Block—that Senator Charbonneau had decided, notwithstanding the rules, to bring on a vote at 5:30 p.m.

Well, honourable senators, I scrambled. I rushed over here. When I came into the lobby the doors had been locked.

Those of us who travel across time zones when we come to Ottawa are, perhaps, more attentive to the accuracy of our watches than those who stay here in Ottawa, because we have to adjust them a couple of times a week. I had thought that my watch was running about a minute fast. My watch said 5:27.My immediate conclusion, honourable senators, when the bells stopped, was that my watch, which is about at the point where it needs a new battery, had either stopped or slowed down.

But now we have the official report of what actually happened. In that report we see, at page 2343: "The Senate resumed at 5:25 p.m." The Speaker said: "Let the doors to the chamber be locked."

The motion was put and was negatived on the division shown there.

Present at that division were two independents and 53 Progressive Conservatives. Senator John M. Macdonald was here but did not vote, because he was paired as is reported.

Honourable senators, what does this show? It shows that 53 Progressive Conservatives had been told in ample time what was planned.

• (1420)

They did not straggle in, in the way we normally do for a vote, coming in at perhaps 5:26, 5:27, 5:28 or, like some of us, just making it through the door. No. They were all nicely in the chamber before the doors were locked.

Senator Simard: You were outside the chamber refusing to come in.

Senator Stewart: That is not correct. That is not true, Senator Simard, and you know that it is not true.

Senator Simard: Pushing Liberal senators to go away.

Senator Stewart: No, no, I was not. You only help me make my point, Senator Simard. I was not outside.

Senator Simard: You were not outside, but a number of you were.

Senator Stewart: I am talking about my own case. Other people can talk about theirs. I am rising on my question of privilege, not on someone else's.

The official report also shows that two independents were here. For all I know, they may have come in at 10 minutes after 5. All I know is that everyone who voted on that day was in here before the doors were locked at 5:25.

Even if Senator Charbonneau had had the authority to rewrite the rules of the Senate, an argument can be made that he should, at least, have informed all the senators of his decree. Moreover, having issued the decree, consistency required that he adhere to that decree. But, of course, he had no authority to rewrite the rules, he had no authority to make the decree, and he showed the invalidity of the whole proceeding by sending the decree to some and not to others and by locking the doors at 5:25 p.m.

Honourable senators, the role of the Speaker of the Senate is very different from that of the Speaker of the House of Commons. Over the years the Speaker of the House of Commons has been given great authority and, over the years, steps have been taken to assure his impartiality. His authority and his impartiality travel hand in hand.

The Speaker of the Senate is not in that position at all. Two historical factors shaped the Speakership of the Senate. First, there was the tradition of the British House of Lords where the presiding officer, the Lord Chancellor, technically sits outside the House of Lords and may even be a commoner. That is one reason why our Speaker of the Senate does not have authority to rule conclusively on points of order.

The second factor is that this house represents the people in the provinces. If we were to do with our Speaker in the Senate what has been done with the Speaker in the House of Commons, one of the divisions would be deprived of the vote of one of its senators. That is why the Speaker of the Senate is expected, from time to time, when he or she wishes, to leave the Chair and to participate in debate, even in highly partisan debate. That is why the Speaker of the Senate is expected to vote—not to break a tie but as a representative of the people in the province that he represents.

There is a passage in T*he Unreformed Senate of Canada*, by R.A. McKay, which is revealing on this point. It is found at page 65. There McKay writes:

> Following the precedents of the House of Lords and of the nominated councils in the provinces prior to federation, the British North America Act provides that the Speaker of the Senate shall be appointed by the Crown. The Speaker of the Commons, on the other hand, is theoretically elected by the House.

That was prior to the recent change in their procedure. He goes on to state:

> In practice both Speakers are appointed by the Prime Minister; and both offices are patronage reserved for eminent party supporters. But in both Houses, despite the partisan nature of the appointments, tradition requires that the duties connected with the office shall be performed in an impartial manner.

Mr. McKay then goes on to say:

> Unlike the Speaker of the Commons, the Speaker of the Senate is, however, an active supporter of the party when he is out of the Chair. He may still attend the party caucus; he has a vote on any question like any other member of the Senate; he uses his personal influence in support of party measures; and may even descend from the Chair and take part in the debate.

One Speaker was actually a member of the cabinet at the same time. That was Speaker Macpherson, from 1880 to 1883. McKay then states:

> But while the Speaker is in the Chair he assumes a correct attitude.

McKay explains how our Speakership comes down from the office of the Lord Chancellor, the presiding officer of the House of Lords. He concludes:

> . . . the Speaker of the Senate is in reality but a chairman or presiding senator, not the spokesman of the House in dealing with the Crown as the Speaker of the Commons is historically, nor yet a president who sits above the party struggle.

All that is important, because it clearly shows that by the Constitution, and by the practice of this House, the Speaker of the Senate does not have the authority vested, in increasing degree, in the Speaker of the House of Commons. Out of the Chair he is one of the players like the rest of us. But we need an umpire or a referee. One of our players is put in the Chair. Because he is recruited from among ourselves and may become a player again, we expect him to act with manifest impartiality. Because he is one of the players, one given a special role, it is incumbent upon him to make a greater effort to be impartial than is required of the Speaker of the House of Commons, who is protected in various ways from party influence. Honourable senators, in this instance that requirement has been ignored.

This is not the first controversy in recent times over the way votes are taken in the Parliament of Canada. There was a famous example in the House of Commons in 1982. It has been described as the longest bell. I wish to read now from an article in a book entitled: The Canadian House of Commons: Essays in Honour of Norman Ward. It was published by the University of Calgary Press, 1985. I quote:

> By far the most dramatic episode of the thirty-second Parliament—and one of the most notable in Canadian parliamentary history—was the famous "bellabuster" of 1982. The sitting that began on Tuesday, March 2 did not terminate until Wednesday, March 17. The episode had farcical aspects, but it also had serious constitutional implications.

It is important to remind ourselves of how that famous, not filibuster, but "bellabuster", took place.

What had happened was that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Hon. Marc Lalonde, had given notice of a motion for leave to introduce the Energy Security Act, a bill that was called an omnibus bill.

A member of the House of Commons, one Harvie Andre, argued that the bill was out of order on the grounds that it was an omnibus bill. He invited the Speaker, Madame Jeanne Sauvé, to rule that such bills were out of order. She refused to rule that they were out of order.

Keenly disappointed, Mr. Andre retorted:

> If the Speaker cannot do anything because there is no precedent, the Speaker can never do anything. Precedents are only established by Speakers. Having ruled that you cannot act because there is no precedent, Madam Speaker, you have in essence ruled that no Speaker can ever act.

There was then a lively exchange between Mr. Andre, Mr. Nielsen, and others, and the Speaker. Eventually, Mr. Andre moved, "That this House do now adjourn".

The Progressive Conservatives went out and the bells rang for over two weeks.

Senator MacEachen: How long?

Senator Stewart: For over two weeks.

Senator Frith: Weeks?

Senator Stewart: Weeks. The article continues:

> The impasse was finally broken when the Government agreed to break Bill C-94 into eight distinct bills.

Senator Cools: A sensible government.

Senator Stewart: Whether the government was sensible or not is not really the question now.

At that time, honourable senators, I thought that Madame Jeanne Sauvé should have intervened. I was asked by The Toronto Star to write a piece making that argument. I wrote that piece, making the argument that she ought to have intervened. But she did not intervene. Advised by the officers of the House of Commons, and relying on her own judgment, she refused to intervene. She refused to yield to the entreaties, to the pleas with which she was bombarded by members of the House of Commons, by ministers and by members of the public. She refused to yield.

On March 18, 1982, at the end of that episode, Madame Sauvé delivered to the House of Commons what is called "Reflections on Recent Events". These appear in the House of Commons Debates of March 18, 1982, at pages 15555 and 15556, and comprise a carefully-reasoned explanation of the stand she had taken.

I should like to share with honourable senators a few sentences from Madame Sauve's statement:

> I admit that I was often tempted to respond to appeals, first by some hon. members, then by the press and even by the public, that I should write history and create the precedent that would resolve the situation. However, it seemed to me that any action on my part would be incompatible with my concept of the responsibility of the Speaker to the House. In support of this view I would like to quote Josef Redlich, an expert on parliamentary procedure, who said:
> > The modern president of the House of Commons, . . . is a judge who has to apply the rules of procedure to the best of his ability and with perfect impartiality, maintaining with a firm yet sensitive hand the proper relations between the two parties to the proceedings before him, the majority and the minority; he must do so by maintaining the rules and the usage of centuries, and by taking care that both majority and minority are unimpeded in their use of the forces and the weapons which the order of business provides for strong and weak.
> I was therefore faced with duties and responsibilities that seemed to be at odds in most respects. References have been made here and there, and mostly in the press, to precedents that had no bearing on the present situation. First the situation in 1961, when one of my predecessors, Mr. Michener, did not let the bells ring for even as long as an hour before he sent a message to the whips ordering them to enter the House for a division. There was no parliamentary crisis, it would seem. There is no reference in Hansard that sheds any light on the circumstances of the incident, and no one, not even Mr. Michener, can remember why the whips were late. Upon receiving the Speaker's message, they entered the House, and no questions were raised by any one. Who can tell whether this precedent, if it is one, is valid? What would my predecessor have done if the whips had refused to come and vote?
> Another important precedent has been cited this time, from the British House of Commons. It relates to the occasion when Mr. Speaker Brand terminated a debate on his own initiative after it had continued for 41 1/2 hours. It took place at a time when the Irish Nationalists had some 60 members. There were then no time limits on debate and the use of closure was unknown. The Irish Nationalists had employed obstructive tactics over a long period designed to bring the process of government to a standstill. The Speaker put the question, but only after consultation with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition and with their joint support. I could not see that similar circumstances existed in Canada in 1982 and, therefore, felt the intervention of the Speaker could not be justified.

● (1440)

She goes on to deal with what would have been the consequences of an "arbitrary decision" that did not derive from any of the rules approved by the House of Commons nor from a precedent with any relevance to the present situation. Her conclusion was that if she had taken that course, she would not have created a valid precedent. She spoke the following words, and I submit that they are wise words:

> The authority of the Chair is no greater than the House wants it to be. When the rules are clear and offer precise guidance to the Speaker, the authority of the Chair is absolute and unquestioned, for this is the will of the House. On the other hand, when there are no rules to fall back on, the Speaker must proceed very cautiously indeed. The most the Chair can do is to lay the matter before the House which can then itself create a new precedent.

She then quotes Josef Redlich, who said:

> It is no part of (the Speaker's) office to consider how he may use his power to devise new reins or bridle for the House. The guiding principle is that the Speaker is not the master of the House, but its representative . . .

Those are the words of Speaker Sauvé, a Speaker whose authority, by reason of the nature of her office and by reason of the powers conferred upon her by the House of Commons, was far greater than the authority of the Speaker of this house. Madam Sauvé, with all the power and authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons, said, in effect, that she would obey the will of the House as set forth in its rules. She said that it was not for her to rewrite the rules, that, regardless of what she might think about the rules and practices, she was only the servant of the house, not its master.

Honourable senators, my reaction last Thursday was one of hot anger. Over the weekend that hot anger has burned down to cold fury and revulsion. I do not say that Senator Charbonneau is a tyrant—I do not think that he has the stuff of tyrants in him—but I do say that what was done here last Thursday was an act of tyranny.

Tyranny is not a genuine form of government. I remind honourable senators that the difference between a tyranny and a democracy is not that tyrants' decrees by definition are unreasonable or immoral; the difference is that in tyranny there is no rule of law. In a tyranny the only rule is: whatever the tyrant decides and orders is law.

It may be said that what Senator Charbonneau did was necessary to ensure that the government could carry out its mandate to bring in the GST. I believe that about 43 per cent of the Canadian electorate voted for the present government in 1988. Forget the others—ask the 43 per cent who voted Progressive Conservative if, in 1988, they gave a mandate to the present government to introduce the GST. Did they understand that they were voting for the GST?

Honourable senators, it may be said that our rule concerning divisions is unreasonable. That certainly is the implication of Senator Charbonneau's letter. Let us remember that whenever tyranny undertakes to justify itself, it always claims that what it did was necessary for the good of the people. That was the cry a few decades ago: "It is necessary for the good of the people!" Again, tyranny will always claim that it acts reasonably to rectify an unreasonable situation. That is the claim of Saddam Hussein: "It is unreasonable that millions of people in my country should be poor when next door a few people are deluged by richer."

Not only do tyrants always claim the necessity and reasonableness of their decrees; the truth of the matter is that they generally believe their own claims.

Honourable senators, a rape is never pretty. On the one hand we have the rapist, driven by his necessity; on the other hand we have the victim crying out and struggling to prevent the rapist from having his way. Last Thursday we saw a parliamentary rape.

I want now to speak chiefly to some of the new senators. Eight of you have taken the Prime Minister's shilling. You now have no choice; you will carry out the deal you made. The Prime Minister has even said that thereafter you may resign. I speak not to you but to the other new senators who are not so committed, and to the many senators who have been here a long time. It is to those particularly to whom I speak.

I have searched the records of our Canadian House of Commons—not now over the weekend, but over the years—and I have found nothing comparable to this incident. In 1956 Mr. Speaker Beaudoin was only a bungler who made mistakes. However bad any particular incident was, it was not comparable to this.

● (1450)

When I looked in the records of the British Parliament, the House of Lords and the House of Commons, I found that once upon a time there were provisions which enabled members to put down motions of censure against the Speaker, but that those provisions have since been dropped. Why? Because the impartiality of the Speaker of the British House of Commons is now so great that occasion to use such a motion never arises.

I think it was Mr. Balfour who referred to a possible motion in 1902. He said that the only precedent before that was 70 years back, and that one was based on one in 1777. Speakers do not do this sort of thing.

What we have seen here, honourable senators, is absolutely unprecedented in the history of the Parliament of Canada. What we have seen here will be recorded in the history of our parliamentary institutions. It will be noted and remarked upon by parliamentarians wherever parliamentary government is practiced around the world. It will be recognized that these have been days of infamy in Canada.

I ask you, as honourable senators, are you prepared to live with that?

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on an issue of privilege that was brought before all of us us last Thursday night. I am sure that I am not the only senator who, over the weekend, has reflected deeply on the terrible events that took place here last Thursday night and Friday.

I was elected to the House of Commons in four Parliaments: two minority Parliaments and two majority Parliaments. I have served here in the Senate, both as a government supporter and as a member of the Opposition. In my 18 years in Parliament I have always been taught that the first rule is respect for the Chair. I have never conceived that I would see a situation in which the chair would conspire to rig a vote in the Senate; but that is what took place last Thursday night.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stollery: There are two issues; and I do not think that has yet quite sunk in. The rig that took place was not a single rig; there were two elements to it. The first is of primary importance and is the whole reason why we have rules and procedures, including the right of the minority to have its opinions heard in Parliament.

The rights of the majority are guaranteed by their majority. They do not need the rules in Parliament. There is no need for rules and procedures if you are the majority, because you guarantee your own rules and procedures. The traditions and the history of parliamentary democracy exist so that the minority has rights, and among those rights is the right to delay. It is a legitimate right to delay an issue. That is legitimate parliamentary practice, and that was hoisted on Thursday. It was hoisted illegitimately; it was hoisted in a manner that will be never be forgotten in Canada.

Let us look at what happened. First, we have, in our rules, a rule that says that both whips must be present when a vote takes place.

Senator Barootes: It is not a rule.

Senator Stollery: In all of my years in Parliament and in committee it is a primary rule that both parties be represented when any serious business is discussed. In our rules it says that the two whips must appear. Why? Because if one party does not agree to hold the vote at a particular time, it has the option of having the whip not appear; and that is a legitimate parliamentary practice that has been practiced for over 100 years.

However, that is not the only violation. For Senator Charbonneau to involve himself in hoisting a parliamentary practice that dates from at least early in the nineteenth century is unbelievable, but it was worse than that. It was much worse than that, because he then tried to rig it by sending notices out, being assured that the members could not possibly get the notices in time to show up. It is unbelievable. They first sent a selected number of notices to a selected number of senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Stollery: —ensuring that they could not possibly get there, and then they shut the doors five minutes before the notice said they would be shut.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Stollery: It is beyond anything one could conceive. Senator Stewart said that the outrage on Thursday and Friday, on reflection, becomes a burning fury. It becomes a realization that this Parliament cannot work. We cannot possibly operate so long as Senator Charbonneau is in the Chair. It is impossible to accept that rule. It is impossible to accept a rigged vote.

In the Watergate scandal the whole issue, as we remember, was the conspiracy of President Nixon to conspire for his own re-election, to try to rig the election, even though he probably would have won it anyway. The incredible thing about last week was that the governing party may well have won the issue anyway, but the leadership of the governing party decided it was not enough to win the issue; they had to rig it. They had to hold an illegal vote.

Senator Petten: The fix was in!

Senator Stollery: The fix was in—a state of corruption unprecedented in Canadian history.

Honourable senators, it leaves one speechless. Things have been said that I would not have believed could ever have been said in a chamber of the Parliament of Canada. I am sure that all of us were shocked and revolted by that performance. We were obliged to take steps that none of us had ever thought would occur to us. I join with Senator Stewart on his question of privilege. However, it is more than a question of privilege; it a question of whether Canada has a Parliament.

● (1500)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I speak as the dean of this House, and also as the dean of the other place, having recently replaced Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the longest-serving parliamentarian. I realize some will say that that and $1.25 will buy me a cup of coffee, and they would be right; but one who has watched this Parliament for as many years as I have has some responsibility.

I originally intended to participate in the debate, but the debate has lost its significance. No one is paying attention to the debate. What has happened under the guise of a debate is almost unbelievable. The Prime Minister took it upon himself to appoint eight extra senators. I am not questioning whether he was right or wrong, but they are here and they are estimable people. However, the appointment of eight extra senators is only intended when the two Houses are in deadlock, when Parliament cannot move ahead. The idea was that the eight extra senators would come to the assistance of their fellow members. That is justified.

Following that, there was a public statement made by the Minister of Finance, who said: "We will pass the bill even before the eight are appointed." He also said: "I have something up my sleeve and I can get the legislation passed."

What shocks me, as a senator who has spent many years here, more years than any other member of this chamber, is that the Minister of Finance admits that he visited the Speaker, or had someone visit the Speaker on his behalf. What is this all about? In Britain this would be a hanging offence, even if the person involved were a member of Parliament. If this occurred in the United States, there would be riots in the Senate and the House of Representatives. This is unheard of!

I cannot understand the Speaker allowing the vote to be taken with one party absent. Although I have been around here for a long time, I cannot understand that. What are you people doing to Parliament? Never mind the bill!

Parliament is a place where we can express our views, where there are rules, and where people live by rules. All of a sudden new rules have been made up by appointed officials.

It really does not matter what happens to the bill; the bill has lost all of its significance. When the country wakes up and realizes what we have done to Parliament, there will be a furor that will last for years and years.

Senator Austin: Right!

Senator Croll: They will ask: "How could they have done that? We trusted them with a democratic institution for years and years, but look what they have brought to us."

I am not going to talk about tyranny; that is not what I have in mind. What revolts me and astonishes me is the fact that my fellow parliamentarians, whom I have known for years and years— colleagues from both sides of the House—have put Parliament in this impossible position in order to win a point.

There comes a time when Parliament is more important than any of us or any of our parties. Parliament is an institution.

I remember when Parliament burned. I came down here afterwards to see if it was still standing; it was! That is my concept of Parliament. All my rights are here, as are all of your rights. We cannot give those rights away. That is why we are here representing the people.

Unless we do something quickly, and something that will appeal to the people, we are putting a blemish on this parliament, a blemish it does not deserve. It has been a good Parliament. To walk away from it as though we were in a tyrant's den leaves me very dissatisfied.

● (1510)

Parliament has been my life. In the beginning I was a practising lawyer, and Parliament stood for its ability to serve the people. Have you any idea of what we have in this country? I lived through the Depression, and during that time I looked after an important city in an important province. I know what it is all about. I know how other countries govern themselves, and the idea of losing one portion of what we fought for all our lives astounds me. I do not know what I can say that will put you on the right path—but what we are doing is wrong. We are sacrificing something that we do not have the right to sacrifice. The rights that we have in Parliament are not yours or mine; they came from hundreds of people who fought hard and made sacrifices for them, thinking that those rights would be preserved forever and a day.

This comes at a bad time for me. I had thought that we had reached a better understanding of ourselves as a nation, regardless of what we call ourselves, that little by little we had built a better country—one that would make a difference to the provinces. We now find that the principles upon which we all depended are starting to crumble. That is not a nice thing for me to say. I think I am somewhat responsible for what has happened, but I am telling you what is on my mind, honourable senators, because it should be on your mind and you should see that the situation is corrected as soon as possible.

Our traditions came from Britain. Do you think that this would be tolerated for one minute in the British House of Commons? We have taken other practices from the United States. Do you think that the United States Senate or House of Representatives would tolerate this sort of thing? Not in a thousand years. Neither should we. Often there is a price we have to pay for legislation, but this one is much too high. It is not worth it. Our democracy has been admired by the rest of the world, but I do not know what the world is going to think now. We cannot get along with our native peoples and we cannot get along with ourselves. What is happening to us? Is it not about time that we gave this a second thought? I am sorry I took up so much time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I would like to take a moment to review what has happened and recall how we ended up in this unhappy situation. None of us was sworn in as a Liberal, Conservative or Independent. We were sworn in to take our place and act as senators. It was said that by notifying our whip we would be notified; but those of you who have been here for any length of time, along with the Speaker, know that is not true. Our whip was not in his office. I heard the bells quit, as did Senator Denis, who has been here for over 50 years. When we came down, the door was locked. When I looked through the little window, I saw what looked like a full house of Conservatives and one so-called Independent Liberal.

When we finally got in, there was bedlam. That is to be regretted. I played a part in it, and I regret it. However, I do not regret how the situation ended. I thought we had made a compromise to return to the business of the Senate. But the Leader of the Government in the Senate knew there was one unacceptable situation, namely, that we would not have sitting in the Chair a gentleman I now see sitting there. I also thought he said that until negotiations, or sober second thought, occurred, he would not be in the Chair. Perhaps I was wrong. He is in the Chair.

[Senator Croll.]

When we adjourn—and I say this to the new members—and we are called back, the Speaker does not notify our whip to call back the members; we are notified by registered mail. Each senator is notified to return and take his or her place in this house and deal with its business, otherwise who knows who would show up. The Constitution of this country never did and still does not recognize political parties. With every vote we decide which political party we will support and which side of the house we will sit on. Having sat in this place, I have seen those of the Conservative persuasion and those of the Liberal persuasion vote against their government. They have not been thrown out of the caucus, but in the case of Senator Everett, after doing it too often, he decided on his own initiative that he no longer wished to sit in the Liberal caucus. That was his decision. We are not recognized as members of political parties.

To say that by notifying our whip we had been notified is so patently wrong as to be unbelievable.

• (1520)

There is no question but that Speaker Charbonneau took the rules into his own hands. I do not think he did so on his own volition. I think the decision was plotted and planned somewhere else.

Honourable senators, I twice saw the Honourable Michael Wilson of the other place smirking on television over the weekend, saying that they had something up their sleeves that would bring the Liberal senators to heel. I did not know what that would be. I thought they would send in forces day in and day out until we were worn out, after which the vote would be held. It would not have been very pleasant, but at least it would have been legal and proper. As it is, we have no rules; so we can sit here day in and day out until the majority gets its way.

Honourable senators, it has been said here before, and I will repeat it: The rules of Parliament and the rules of the Senate are constituted for the protection of the minority. We may not know how to act too well in Opposition. I find that every now and then we agree with the government, which I do not think the Opposition should do too often. Every time we have agreed with the government, be it on Meech Lake, Free Trade, or anything else, it has been to our regret. But I can say this, honourable senators: If we don't know how to act in Opposition, senators opposite don't know how to act in power!

The senators opposite have the power. They did not even need to do this. They did not need to have the Speaker held in disrespect. They did not need to threaten his position as it is now threatened. They simply had to wait for a little while. They could have won their vote. They would still have had the respect of this chamber, and the respect of Canadians, and they would have had their own way.

I do not know why the honourable senators were in such a hurry. I do not know why they had to do this. They never gave us, on this side, a chance, just as they did not give a chance to the millions of Canadians who have pinned their hopes on us.

Honourable senators, I sat in the Saskatchewan Legislature for 16 or 17 years. It was a wild place compared to this chamber up until last week. We used to say that the Speaker of the Saskatchewan Legislature had his chair nailed down so that he only faced the Premier. Well, whether that was true or not, I will tell senators that we did not get too many good rulings from that Speaker.

Times have now changed and the Saskatchewan Legislature is a much more civilized place. The rules are obeyed by both sides. But even in the most undisciplined days of that legislature, I never saw, nor did anybody else, a trick pulled like the one pulled on this institution last week—and that is what it was, honourable senators, a despicable, low trick; a the Canadian people are the losers in the long run.

Honourable senators, the more I thought about this over the weekend, the more I thought about Speaker Charbonneau. I thought about some of the people I know who are also friends of his. I thought about his background. He is a respected man of business and a respected man in this chamber. I thought of how, by a single act, perpetrated, in my view, by the Leader of the Government in this place, egged on by the Prime Minister in the other place, they not only took steps to destroy this institution and put it into disrespect, but they ruined His Honour's reputation. I think they should be totally ashamed of themselves. I do not think that His Honour thought of this little trick—he is not that kind of man. But I can tell honourable senators right now what they have done to him. Look at him—he is embarrassed, he is ashamed, and he is destroyed as the Speaker of the Senate.

Senator Murray can smirk—he was put in this chamber without any background of an election. If he has been elected anywhere, I would ask him to stand up and tell me so. Was he elected to city council or town council? No! He obviously has little or no respect for the institution of Parliament, and he has shown that.

The odd thing, honourable senators, is that he was going to get his way at any rate. He has the majority. There are far more senators on the other side than there are on this side. When the courts find, if they do, that the eight new senators were legally appointed, senators opposite will have the majority. They had better learn how to use it.

You don't think you have the majority? Just count the numbers. You had the votes—I can tell you that—even before you put the eight in. But you didn't know it.

Obviously, honourable senators, the tragedy lies in what has happened to this place and what has happened to His Honour the Speaker. I would suggest that we recess for an hour or two, or three, to give senators opposite and His Honour a chance to reflect on what has happened. If he does not leave, we are going to be in for a long, unhappy battle that will bring to this institution even less respect than it now has.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I believe it was last Thursday that I rose to say that it was sadness and sorrow that I was adressing my colleagues in the Senate. Over the weekend, I discussed with several people what happened in the Senate Thursday and Friday of last week.

It is an open secret that our Rules are not a major concern for a great many Canadians who, for that matter, do not hold politicians in general, those in the House of Commons in particular, in very high esteem.

It is an unfortunate situation, because I feel that this Parliementary institution has performed well for our country.

As my colleague Senator Steuart has just said, what was the hurry? You have a majority. You have the body count in our favour, at least for the time being, and if ever the status of the eight additional senators is confirmed, you may be able to pass your legislation. For that matter, some 300 pieces of legislation have been passed by the Senate since 1984. At the present time, three are being held by the Senate.

Over the weekend, I had the opportunity to discuss this issue with people from all walks of life. A great many of them were unaware of our Rules. As I said earlier in my remarks, and a few who had been especialy impressed by the fact that the Speaker had been reported as having used Part I, entitled "Interpretation", where Rule 1 of Part I, under the title of "Interpretation", reads:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs—

The Customs which were quoted by my revered colleague Senator Croll and by Senator Stewart, our parliementary expert.

> —the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed by the Senate or in any committee thereof.

The Rules of the Senate of Canada are there to protect the rights and privileges of the minority in the Senate. As a matter of fact, these rules had protected our own rights for several years; I have been a senator for the past twelve years, twelve years during which Liberal senators were the majority, and the Rules of the Senate have preserved your rights.

I reiterate what my colleague Senator Steuart said, i.e. that Senator Charbonneau did not act on his own decision. I would not believe that even for a moment. That decison was made by the Government leader in the Senate, the same person who made decisions concerning the Meech Lake Accord. He has no parliamentary experience and has no respect for Parliament. He does not know the rules either. He found a way because, as we saw in this House and as Mr. Wilson told the other place: "We'll find a way to have laws passed".

My privileges were totally ignored. I am sad when I see someone like the honourable Senator Beaudoin, who claims to be a constitutional expert—and I believe he is, while I am not—set himself up as a parliamentary expert to defend certain actions. I must say, Senator Beaudoin, that I would have expected you, as a constitutional expert and based on the impression I had of you when you first arrived at the Senate, to defend the rights and the privileges of the minorities. But, for a seat in the Senate, you set all that aside. That hurts.

For a respected parliamentarian like Mr. Lavoie-Roux to come from the Quebec National Assembly, where she has seen the Rules of that Parliament protect minorities, and to totally ignore the Rules of this House and vote to deprive me of the right to vote, I find that hard to accept.

Is Senator Castonguay, a former member of the Quebec National Assembly and a respected citizen, who must be well versed in parliamentary procedure, going to tell me he agreed to sit in this Parliament with the intent of preventing minorities from having the right to vote?

This is a serious matter. Granted, the Senate as an institution is not exactly popular. However, the individuals I just named, and many others, accepted their appointments, including the person who literally gave me my second lease on life, Dr. Keon. Dr. Keon, as a benefactor of society, did you accept your appointment to the Senate to snatch away my right to vote, after saving my life?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator Thériault, you are not the government's conscience.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, the decision made by Senator Charbonneau and by the Leader of the Government has, I am sure, done great harm and caused great damage to the Senate as an institution. Honourable senators, in a case like this, we should close the doors of the Senate and go home. That is what we ought to do. Close the doors. Honourable senators, I look at Thursday's Debates of the Senate and at a letter I received at nine o'clock that evening, saying that the Senate:

> . . . put the question now before the Senate at 5:30.

In the Debates of the Senate, it says:

> The Senate resumed at 5:25.

Could you not have waited five minutes more? Honourable senators, how do you expect people to respect the institution where we work? How do you expect people to respect those who work in Canada's parliamentary institutions, if whenever a government has a majority in Parliament, it doesn't bother to follow the rules, nor wait and see if eight newly appointed senators have legal standing or not? We saw a radical change in the whole conduct of the Speaker, as Senator Stewart pointed out. There was a complete change in behaviour, at the behest of the Leader of the Government. Instead of abiding by the rules as is customary when one has a majority in Parliament and one wants to have legislation passed, they completely ignored them. How would you have felt, honourable senators, you who were in the minority until last week, if before 1984, the Speaker of the Senate had decided to ask the Senate to sit at midnight or Saturday night or Sunday morning? There is nothing in the rules that says this cannot be done, and if the Speaker has discretionary powers and the Leader of the Government in the Senate has discretionary powers, it could have been done, according to you. Today, we your colleagues are in the minority, and what is to prevent the Speaker from entering the Senate five minutes from now and saying: "time is up. Time to vote". What assurance do we have that will not happen? We cannot count on the people who just betrayed us. They failed to protect our rights when we were entitled to a vote.

Honourable senators, if there is to be any respect for Canada's parliamentary institutions, at the very least, Senator Charbonneau should become leader of the government and and Senator Murray, Speaker of the Senate.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I did not live through the experiences of Thursday and Friday last, although I lived through them vicariously by way of the reports which I received from time to time about the unexpected developments in the Senate.

When I left the chamber on Wednesday afternoon, the Senate was on the threshold of paying well-deserved tributes to Senator Guay, and it was my expectation that the next two days would be taken up with government business.

What a shock it was to discover that, on Thursday afternoon, the Speaker of the Senate made an unprecedented decision that brought about the reaction Senator Stewart described, which could only follow from parliamentary rape.

"Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad." It would appear that "godly" intervention has been evident in the sequence of events over the past short period of time. One would have thought that the Government of Canada would have been satisfied for the moment, having increased its membership to the Senate by 15 in a very short time. That was quite an addition. But, not satisfied, the government then resorted to an illegitimate technique, through section 26 of the Constitution, of adding eight additional senators to this body. Thus they achieved their majority. They increased their numbers to 46 by the addition of 15, and then they added 8 more. Consequently, they had their majority.

• (1540)

Why did they not feel confident that they could manage the Senate and achieve their objectives with a majority, even though illegitimately attained? But, not satisfied, they needed further incursions and further demands upon the principles of probity and proper conduct.

We do not accept, honourable senators, that the eight members who are sitting here today, and who proceeded to vote, are entitled to sit in this chamber. We do not accept that. We do not think that any of the conditions that should surround the appointment of eight additional under section 26 of the Constitution Act senators have been fulfilled.

Senator Stewart and others have pointed out the historical circumstances under which those individuals involved in the formation or the development of section 26 have described the conditions that surrounded any possible use of that section. We know that one of our premiers—later a senator—reported that the use of section 26 was "akin to the Reform Act," and would require an election before the Crown would act to meet the wishes of the government. So serious a crisis would have to exist that an election would intervene before the Crown would act.

We know that the third draft of the British North America Act cited clearly the conditions under which section 26 would apply, namely, a money bill would have to be defeated once in the Senate, and any other bill three times. That was what the Canadian ministers and the British thought was a reasonable condition.

Well, nothing has been defeated in this Senate. But, nevertheless, section 26 has been grounded only in the false allegations made by the Prime Minister in his press conference. If he told those senators on the telephone—as described by Senator Keon—the same alleged facts that he gave on that nationally televised press conference, then he misled those senators.

Senator Graham: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: He told them inaccuracies and falsities.

An Hon. Senator: Lies!

Senator MacEachen: None of the conditions that he asserted existed.

We know that the colonial secretary who was asked to move ahead by Alexanader Mackenzie laid down his firm conditions before section 26 could be used. He said that "a paralysis would have to take place so that government would be incapacitated." That is what he said. Every contemporary observer outlining the "grounding of facts" denied the validity of the Prime Minister's actions.

In his speech at the press conference the Prime Minister said that there was "obstruction." His main line was that there was "obstructionism" around three bills. He then moved to create eight additional senators. How ashamed he was, as were the rest of you about your new colleagues when you had them sworn in in secrecy in the Speaker's chamber. Not one of us was told that this was happening. You intended to bring them in surreptitiously to the Senate—not standing before the Table to take the Oath; not being walked up as proud recruits—

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Like all of us!

Senator MacEachen: —as Senator Buchanan was; they were put in at two corners because all of you were ashamed of what had happened.

The courts will determine the results and the validity of these senators. The Ottawa Citizen said that "the new senators follow a grimy tunnel to clandestine ceremony." What a wonderful way to reach the red chamber!

What has happened to the principle of independence of senators and parliamentarians? Is it now possible that the Prime Minister can call up individuals and say, "I will make you a senator if you will vote for Bill C-21"— which is hated in the Atlantic provinces; or "if you will vote for Bill C-62"— which is loathed throughout Canada; or "if you will vote for Bill C-28"—which denies the historical privileges of the senior citizens of Canada.

Did all you new senators say, "Yes?" Were you asked? Where is your independence? Or was there no discussion about these bills? I should like a clarification on that, because it is plainly stated in the Ottawa Citizen that the commitment was asked for and delivered by the new senators.

I am sure that they can clarify that, and they will do so. It would relieve our anxiety if they are still free agents. Please tell me that you are free agents and that when it comes time, honourable divisionals, to debate these bills, your minds will be free and you will listen to the arguments that we can make on this side of the house—arguments that we will make on behalf of all the citizens who have appeared before the committee of the Senate.

So there you have it. We thought that it was improper. In other words, the circumstances did not exist to summon eight new senators under section 26. The Leader of the Liberal Party, the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and I, as Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, wrote to the Governor General asking him to hold off. We said that there is eminent authority that a constitutional convention requires the Governor General to accept advice from the Prime Minister to appoint such senators only when certain extraordinary circumstances exist. Such circumstances do not exist today.

Senator Beaudoin, who, as far as I am concerned, is a giant in constitutional matters but an infant in parliamentary matters, had the nerve to say, "It is crystal-clear that a deadlock exists". That is nonsense. There is no deadlock. There has been no vote and no deadlock according to the definition of those who put Article 26 together. But perhaps there is, according to a modern University of Ottawa definition that is totally unrelated to parliamentary reality. I am not convinced at all by that.

We said to the Governor General that we do not believe that those circumstances exist. We asked him to hold off. We said, "We can argue it. We have a powerful case". Yet the Governor General gave us the brush-off. He failed to do his duty to listen to the minority of those in Parliament who had a view. He said, "I have talked to government lawyers and to outside experts, but you Liberal senators have no place in my lexicon of Canada". He gave us the brush-off. He had a responsibility. Somebody had a responsibility. An essential quality of the exercise of Article 26 is an arbitral quality.

It was British ministers who imposed Article 26 on colonial ministers in London. The Canadian ministers did not want it. They turned it down three times. But the British ministers said, "No, gentlemen, we want this instrument, this deadlock breaking instrument." Finally, the Canadian ministers agreed on condition that there would be an independent arbitral finding outside Canada, that the Governor General or the Prime Minister would not be permitted to act, but that the advice would have to go to British ministers and then be acted upon by the Queen. In this way, an independent outside arbitral opinion would be found as to whether indeed a deadlock existed.

The situation here is that the Prime Minister has declared a disagreement, and only he is entitled to have his views known as to whether indeed the disagreement did exist. Surely, the Governor General ought to have probed and said, "Well, tell us what your plans are on these bills. Is there a deadlock or not?" But he acted as a rubber stamp for the Prime Minister, a puppet, and denied to those of us who have some rights any opportunity to express our views. Politically it was a disgrace, because the word of the Prime Minister, one of the parties to the dispute, was listened to, and the other party was ignored, contrary to the inherent arbitral quality of the original Article 26.

So we feel pretty disappointed that no effort was made. However, we swallowed that. We said, "Yes, all right, we will do the best we can," and various court actions have been taken. In the meantime, the government had its majority. It had gone to the Queen. It had gone to the Governor General. It has had its way. That was September 27.

Even though the government has its majority, this is a very finely balanced house. There are 54 Progressive Conservative senators, some recently created. The magic of the Prime Minister's word was able to transform life-long Liberals into instant Tories. Now they sit in the Tory caucus, and there are 54 of them.

We have 51 Liberals on this side. That makes for a rather finely balanced house in any man's language, and anyone who throws his weight around as a government leader in the House of Commons with a majority of three is heading for disaster. I say that because those 51 other senators here, whose actions and words will influence every event that takes place, despite your majority of three, have to be taken into consideration. That is your situation.

I cannot believe that having gone through that process, which we regard as improper constitutionally, but which can only be decided ultimately in the courts, the government has now decided to take advantage of the Speaker of the Senate in order to rebalance further the political situation in its favour.

"Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad". Do you understand, honourable senators, the implications of this ruling? Do you understand why there is a custom and a rule in our Parliament that a vote does not take place until the whips of both parties come in and say that the vote should take place? It is a simple fact. As we know, we are in an adversarial position, and on a key vote the responsibility of bringing in the members—all the members, every last member—can only be exercised by a loyal adherent of the party. He is the only person who can say, "I have brought in the last possible follower for this vote". It is not a function of the Speaker to say, "Well, now, the vote can take place at 5.30. All the Liberals are here and all the Tories are here". Or was there collusion? It is not a function of the Speaker.

Let us consider, for example, that we are debating a government bill, a bill of substance, and that the debate terminates perhaps unexpectedly and the bells ring, as I have found it to be in my case when leading the government. Let us say that we start to tally up the members and we find that 11 are in Montreal, many others are in Toronto, while others are in their homes in various parts of Ottawa. The whip will get on the phone, as will the deputy whip. This is something that occurs on both the opposition side and the government side. They never stop; they have their lists. They say, "A member is in the hospital and is unable to be here." They consult, and after many hours they say, "These are all the members who will be here for the vote. We are ready." The government whip then goes to the opposition whip, Mr. Kempling, in the House of Commons and says, "Mr. Kempling, I am ready"; but Mr. Kempling says, "I am not ready. I have five members motoring here from a meeting that is taking place in Pembroke. They were there for a Tory fundraiser and you cannot have the vote until we are ready to come in." That is the political dynamic of this rule.

To say now that the Speaker can decide when the vote is held is parliamentary injustice. It is blasphemy. It is an outrage, and it cannot be maintained. It was a glorious mistake. That is the reasoning for it, of course. The rule says that the bells are rung and when the whips enter the vote is put, or words to that effect.

What are we going to do about this? How many divisions are we facing? How many divisions or amendments will there be on Bill C-21, Bill C-28 or Bill C-62? How many times will the bells ring, and how many times will members have to be called in? I would say that the whip on the other side would want to know that he has everyone in place, unless he has a private arrangement with the Speaker that the Speaker will send out the letter only when all his members are in place. That is the only way it could work. Unless there is consultation between the two, it is likely that the government whip would not have his members in the chamber at the crucial time, as would the opposition whip.

Honourable senators, why is it that we are confronted with this situation? I find it regretful that we are plunged into this situation. I was involved in the pipeline debate. The process destroyed the government of Mr. St. Laurent and destroyed the Speaker of the day. The debris of political miscalculations was strewn behind for years.

I asked our whip, Senator Petten, about the practice in the Senate because I have been here only six years. Senator Petten said, "I have been here 20 years, and it is a firm practice that the vote is held when the whips come in." The chairman of the Rules committee, Senator Molgat, said that that is what it says on page 70 of our Senate rule book. We reviewed it recently. We added a provision which permitted the Speaker to lock the doors. Am I right, Senator Molgat?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Yes.

Senator MacEachen: It is ironic that the lock-in provisions were used because the doors were locked, yet the other provisions were ignored. It was a parliamentary lock-out. There should be no lock-out, because that is not a prerogative of any person, except the whips of each party, in a parliamentary system. That is as strong and as solid as any parliamentary principle.

When the bells rang the weekend of September 27, the Speaker shut off the bells by his own decision, which caused a number of my colleagues to telephone me and say, "What is going on? What right does the Speaker have to shut off the bells?" The bells rang for 15 days in the House of Commons. Madame Sauvé reduced the sound of the bells, but they continued to ring. I did not make an issue about that because I had received an explanation that it was for practical reasons and that it had no reference whatsoever to the key provision of the section, namely, that the vote starts when the whips come into the chamber.

On Friday, September 28, I wanted to find out what was going on, so I went to the Clerk of the Senate. I thought the Mace was on the Table and tour groups were coming into the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: They were.

Senator MacEachen: The Mace was on the Table as if this were a public washroom. I went to see the Clerk of the Senate, accompanied by Senator Frith and Senator Molgat. We sat down with him in his office and asked, "What is going on?" He tried to explain, and, in the course of that conversation, we referred to page 70 of the red book. I said, "My understanding, Mr. Barnhart, is that a division cannot take place until the whips enter the chamber. What is your interpretation?" He said, "That is my interpretation also." Senator Molgat and Senator Frith were there to hear it. So I was confident that the rule was to be carried out as stated in the rule book and according to our custom, but that was not to be.

• (1610)

The dean of the Senate, Senator Croll, has mentioned the remarks of Mr. Wilson, who had said last week something to the effect that the bill would go through this week because he had a method. The press came to me and asked what Mr. Wilson had in mind. I said, "I have no idea," and I did not have any idea. I never had in mind that his method would be to find a new interpretation of the rules through the Speaker. We object to this action. It is outrageous and unworkable, and, if the rules of the game are not followed, it will make most difficult the operation of this chamber in circumstances that are finely balanced.

We cannot remove the Speaker from office. He is appointed by the Prime Minister. In fact, he is the only person in the chamber who is accountable to anyone. He is accountable to the Prime Minister because he is always eligible for reappointment, and he was reappointed after the last election. We cannot remove him from office. However, I can assure honourable senators that the 51 members on this side of the house have lost confidence in the Speaker's ability to discharge his duties fairly. I say that with great sadness and with no pleasure, although it is a fact.

I ask Senator Murray—you, sir—and all of us in the Senate: What are we going to do about it? We saw the reaction to this initiative on Thursday and Friday. Do you think, if such an effort were undertaken again, that there would not be an equally explosive reaction? Do you think that we are going to accept peacefully, in a submissive manner, this trampling of our individual right, our rights as a party, the rights of our whip, our rights to vote, the dangers to us if these rights are to be administered, not by the whips but by the Speaker? That is the situation. I did not create this problem. However, it is a major problem and it will have to be resolved before we can debate in an orderly way the bills—

Senator Simard: You made a deal last week; you are going back on your word again!

An. Hon. Senator: Quiet!

Senator Simard: You are going back on your word! Never trust a Grit, and this is the proof!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, do you think if, on third reading of Bill C-21 or Bill C-28 or Bill C-62 the Speaker, without the consent of our whip, stops ringing the bells and calls a division, that we will stand with our hands folded and not do everything we possibly can to observe the rules? If the Speaker is not prepared to observe the rules, we shall do our level best to have them observed as they are written in the rule book and as they have been established by many years of custom in the Parliament of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I rise on the same question of privilege. I would like to begin by putting on record the response of the press to this sordid affair over this past weekend. I would like to begin with an editorial that appeared in the Toronto Star of October 6, 1990, entitled "An abuse of power." It reads:

> Without rules, there is chaos. By throwing away the Senate rulebook and all sense of fair play, Senate Speaker Buy Charbonneau has plunged the upper house into a state of anarchy and done it further damage.
> By rule and tradition, the Senate does not hold recorded votes until both parties agree.
> So it was unacceptable late Thursday for the Speaker to order a procedural vote and then hold it 25 minutes later without the Opposition Liberals in their seats.
> Clearly, this was a partisan move by Charbonneau to establish a precedent for the ultimate vote in the Senate on the 7 per cent GST.
> But by shattering parliamentary rules and practices, the Speaker has run roughshod over the rights of all senators—not just Liberals.
> With this tactic, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is, in effect, trying to impose the GST by dictatorial decree.
> If Parliament is to be the cornerstone of our democracy, its rules and procedures must be honoured by all members of both houses.
> That's why, last June, the Manitoba Legislature permitted Elijah Harper, an eagle's feather in hand, to raise the lone voice that stopped the Meech Lake accord. To have trampled Harper's rights would have made a sham of democracy.

Maybe Canadians should not be surprised by this latest turn of events in the Senate. Conservative Senate leader Lowell Murray had expressed dismay when the Manitoba house insisted that its rules had to be obeyed and Harper's rights respected.

The parliamentary rulebook allows ample room for skilful manoeuvres by all members. They can be frustrating at times. But take away the rules, and laws will have no moral authority at all.

Another article appeared in the Toronto Star of October 7, 1990. It was written by David Vienneau. The heading is, "Senate chaos hurt Tories, experts say", and it reads:

OTTAWA—Chaos in the Senate may have cost the Progessive Conservatives the high moral ground in the battle for public opinion, experts say.

The Tories would have been better off biding their time rather than forcing a confrontation that produced pandemonium last week, say constitutional and political observers.

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney was "caught between a rock and a hard place" over the goods and services tax, said John Trent.

Forcing a vote may win Mulroney his tax, but it won't increase his standing in the public opinion polls, said Trent, of the University of Ottawa's political science department.

On Friday, Liberal senators ended their 24-hour filibuster over the tax—it requires Senate approval—and agreed to start debating it this week.

But agreement came only after a raucous attack of desk-pounding, horn-blowing and whistling.

A major Liberal grievance was Senate Speaker Guy Charbonneau's decision to break the rules and force a vote in the absence of the Liberal opposition.

Did Charbonneau, a Tory, act alone?

Probably not, experts agree.

● (1620)

In the Commons on Friday, Liberals said Charbonneau's instructions came from the government.

Finance Minister Michael Wilson did not deny that someone had spoken to Charbonneau but said there had been no "directive" to the Senate Speaker.

The experts say, however, the Tories should have taken it slower.

If they'd wanted to force the issue, they should have had Charbonneau wait a couple of weeks and then announce he was stepping in to break the impasse on the Senate floor.

Instead, they were so preoccupied with defeating and humiliating the much-despised Liberal senators appointed by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau they missed an opportunity to use them to their advantage, the experts say.

[Senator Davey.]

The experts' rationale is that the GST is so unpopular the only way the Tories could score points with the public was by continuing to hammer home that it was the policy of an elected—albeit unpopular—government.

At least the voters could boot the Tories out if they didn't like it.

Instead, the Tories chose to force a vote in the Senate, breaking the rules to do so.

Charbonneau's decision to force a vote will only contribute to the rapidly growing public cynicism about the political process, the experts say.

"Mulroney had the high moral ground when he said the process had been hijacked by the unelected Senate, thereby forcing him to appoint the eight additional senators," said John Whyte, dean of law at Queen's University.

"But he seems to squander the high ground to win. He builds no sense of public acceptance of the conflict in the Senate."

"This is a very dangerous thing," said Bill Dawson, a University of Western Ontario political scientist, of the latest Senate chaos.

"The Speaker is saying, 'I know better than the rules,' simply because it will help the government."

Now, honourable senators, I should like to quote from the Toronto Sun Sunday edition, an article by Mike Duffy which is entitled "Falling on his sword." The article states:

In every war there are victims. And in the Senate war over the GST, the most prominent victim appears likely to be Guy Charbonneau.

Until he decided to allow the Senate to vote without the Liberals being present in the chamber, Charbonneau was slated to join that long list of forgetibles who have been honored by being named Speaker of the Upper House.

Now, however, Charbonneau joins Erik Neilsen on a short-list: the Liberal list of 'most-hated' Tories.

Neilsen is there because it is Liberal doctrine that Neilsen was an anti-French bigot who set out to destroy Guy Favreau and others on trumped up charges of unethical conduct during the Pearson governments of the mid-sixties.

Neilsen wasn't a bigot, but he was tough, he played politics for keeps, and only an idiot wouldn't think the people Neilsen nailed weren't out of line.

That's not the case with Charbonneau, a Montreal businessman, to whom politics was a hobby, a game never intended to be played the way they're playing now in the Senate.

But while they say they support him, privately, many Progressive Conservatives are shedding few tears for Charbonneau.

There are two reasons for their indifference: Brian and Joe.

Charbonneau was appointed to the Senate in 1979 by Joe Clark. But Charbonneau was never a Clark supporter. He was, and still is, a Mulroney man.

Charbonneau helped Mulroney work his way up through the Montreal business community. There were few Tories in Quebec in those days, and they often could be found in the bar of the Ritz Carleton Hotel, huddled together for warmth.

When Mulroney's pals in the Tory caucus decided to force Clark out, Charbonneau and former Newfoundland Premier Frank Moores raised the money to keep the anti-Clark campaign going.

Clark fell, and when Mulroney became prime minister, Charbonneau got his reward: he was named Speaker of the Senate.

For a man who made millions in insurance and vending machines, Charbonneau has shown little skill in the chair.

His Conservative colleagues complain, 'he'd just sit there like a pillar of . . . ' as Allan MacEachen and the Liberals walked all over the Senate Tories.

When Charbonneau did complain about the Liberals breaking the rules, they used their majority to 'regularize' whatever it was they wanted to do.

That all changed when the prime minister stacked the Senate, and Charbonneau, former 98-pound weakling, suddenly had the Liberals outgunned.

Thursday Charbonneau flexed his muscles, decided he'd taken enough, and sent his historic two-line letter to the Liberals.

He told them 123 years of precedents didn't matter. The Liberals could not ring the bells and hold up the Senate indefinitely. He announced he would stop the bells and call a vote, even if the Liberals weren't in their seats.

The Liberals didn't believe he'd do it. But he did.

It was the first vote the Liberals had lost in the Senate in 42 years.

In the process, the Senate, and Charbonneau lost their innocence.

Now the Liberals are howling for Charbonneau's head the way the Tories demanded the resignation of Commons Speaker Rene Beaudoin after he caved in and did the bidding of the Liberal government during the pipeline debate of 1956.

Beaudoin didn't return after the 1957 election and died a broken man, working as a bartender in the U.S. West.

After enduring a brutal assault Thursday evening, Charbonneau hid out Friday. The Liberals want him to quit. But even though the Tories think he's been ineffective, they don't want him to resign.

The rules don't allow him to be replaced immediately, and his vote is essential if the GST is to make it into law.

Charbonneau has one more tough job to do for Brian. He'll do it, but it won't be easy. He knows the Clark Tories will be silently cheering on the Liberals—silently enjoying their moment of revenge.

Honourable senators, another article which I think is worthwhile drawing to the attention of all honourable senators is an article again in the Toronto Sun with the headline, "Senate Bedlam." The article is written by Tim Naumetz in Ottawa and in the box preceding the article it is stated:

> Bitter resentment over the GST has been building up for a year and Liberal senators claim that gives them the mandate to do whatever they can to kill it. As an unelected body, they may be wrong about that. But they are right in their belief their war could get Grits more votes in the next election.

This article reads as follows:

> Ottawa—Sen. Herbert Orval Sparrow was in the thick of the shouting and pushing and the clutching hands.
> Quiet Herbert Orval Sparrow, 60, son of Abiah Andrew Sparrow of Saskatoon.
> Herbert Sparrow, once honored with the Vanier Young Man of the Year Award, the UN Environmental Leadership Award, the America Honor Award for Conservation. A Mason, a Shriner, a life member of the Kinsmen Club, for gosh sakes.
> There he was, nearly screaming on the red carpet floor of the stately old Senate of Canada: 'This is a frontline for democracy, there has got to be a frontline for democracy in this country.'
> Bedlam erupted in the Red Chamber when the Liberals broke 123 years of precedent last Thursday night and invited a horde of scruffy journalists into the hallowed sanctum to protest a Tory vote.
>
> This was before they staged an all-night filibuster. This was before they brought out their bells and whistles.
> This was when Herbert Orval Sparrow found his destiny.
> He confronted Senate guards to stand between them and the interloping journalists. He defied authority to form his frontline for democracy.
> At first, he was anonymous. The reporters, none of whom ever cover the Senate on a regular basis, didn't know him.
> 'Which one is he?' they whispered, lost, until one finally asked him his name.
> 'Senator Sparrow,' he replied, turning a moment from the struggle.
> And from then on the irony was great, because Herbert Sparrow represents both the good and the bad of the Canadian Senate. He could stroll unrecognized through any crowded shopping centre in the country. A man ordinarily of quiet distinction, he is everyman's senator.
> He failed twice to win a seat in the Saskatchewan Legislature and so was named to the Senate, by Lester Pearson, at the ripe old age of 38.

And here he was, fighting for democracy on the floor of the most powerful unelected House of Parliament in the world.

It's the only appointed House in a democracy, in fact, that still has real power with no trace of accountability, not a smidgen, to the people of the land.

• (1630)

There was Herbert Sparrow, a man of honor and accomplishment, losing it.

You can't really blame the Liberals for throwing the Senate into chaos. After all, it's been their domain for the last 39 years.

You might do the same thing, if you were spoiled and stood to lose the game you'd been winning for so long, just because some new kid moved in and took all the marbles. Like the Liberals, you might not even really know why you were rebelling.

You'd have an explanation, which would sound plausible. You'd be fighting not for yourself, but for the neighborhood, upholding its rights. But deep down, if you looked really hard, you might find a burning, red ember of resentment, a childlike anger at losing control, losing the game.

The Liberals honked bicycle horns, read from the Bible, slammed desktops, blew whistles. They did everything they could to keep the Tories from finally wresting control of the Red Chamber out of their hands.

It was inevitable they'd lose, of course. Brian Mulroney had named his eight extra senators to ram the hated goods and service tax through. The Liberals were outgunned.

But the Tories weren't being gentlemen. They BROKE THE RULES. Sure, there are no rules to get into the Senate, except maybe for piling up IOUs in the party or lifelong service in the lobbies. Once you're in, you PLAY BY THE RULES.

And maybe there is a kernel of truth to what the Liberals said. Once you start breaking the small rules, the big ones may come tumbling down.

Membership in the Senate is undemocratic but once you've got one of those soft, red velvet seats, you run on the rules of democracy. You vote.

In Parliament, the vote is the reason for being, as Grit Sen. Royce Frith said. And the Tories did hold a vote without the Liberals, though they could have been there even if they were protesting. But this is getting dangerously close to the head of the timeworn pin.

It's certainly no reason to call the Tory Senate Speaker Guy Charbonneau another Adolf Hitler, as one of the Grits did. Charbonneau fought Hitler with the Mount Royal Fusiliers in World War II.

What's clear is that we knew the showdown was coming.

[Senator Davey.]

The GST is easily the most unpopular tax of recent memory. Perhaps in the country's history. Bitter resentment over it has been building up for a year.

The Grits argue that gives them the mandate to do whatever they can in the Senate to stop it. They may be wrong about that, but they are right in their belief their war could get them more votes in the next election.

Mulroney didn't help things by dusting the cobwebs off the old 1867 British North America Act, now called the Constitution Act, and naming those eight extra Tories to the Senate. He did it just as much to show he's decisive and in charge as he did it to get the GST through.

Most independent observers agree it was a major blow to his credibility as a self-described champion of Senate reform.

It also gave Liberal MP Mary Clancy the opportunity to call Mulroney the "Caligula of Baie Comeau" in reference to another long-ago emperor who named his horse to the Roman Senate.

As humiliating as the Senate spectacle was this week, as sad and pathetic as Royce Frith and the Liberals looked, it may have taken the country to an important milestone.

For the last 123 years, we've been sleeping under an unelected Senate that has the power to kill most laws passed by the elected House of Commons.

It's a cushy haven for old political warhorses, rich men who've filled Tory and Grit coffers, even doctors, teachers and writers who got their plums out of friendship instead of partisanship.

The Liberals, most likely on purpose, just set off the alarm clock.

Now I would like to quote in part from the Edmonton Journal from Saturday, October 6:

The Speaker of the Senate has lost the confidence and respect of his colleagues to the degree that the upper house can no longer function. He should resign, and his ruling on the vote should be referred to a higher authority.

As it stands, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney has stuffed the Senate with enough marionettes to do the government's bidding on the goods and services tax. He'd be wiser to reconsider the legislation than to win the skirmish with such despicable tactics.

Canada's political institutions will emerge from this fight in dismal condition. A democratic government can't function properly when citizens and elected leaders hold its institutions in contempt. Is the GST really worth this heavy price?

Honourable senators, I should next like to quote from the Globe and Mail from October 6, where, under the headline "Senate anarchy more than an act", Susan Delacourt writes:

The Senate is lying cracked open in anarchy, with sleep-deprived Liberal senators banging their desks and shouting accusations of tyranny and dictatorship.

It is good television and historic intrigue, but for the senators and the people close to the drama it is more than a mere passing act in the play of Parliament.

The Liberal senators, and even some of their unlikely allies, fervently believe this is a crisis of legitimacy for Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's government—that this is what happens when public opinion and the leadership of a country have drifted so apart.

"I guess for us Mulroney doesn't have a lot of legitimacy. No one believes he is acting in anyone's interest but his own," says Bert Brown, an Alberta farmer who has helped lead the Senate-reform crusade in the West.

"Maybe it would be different if anyone believed that the Mulroney government actually cared about the Canadian people and their opinions."

Jeffrey Rose, head of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, is in favor of abolishing the Senate, yet he too sees this as an issue of respect—for the Canadian public, for the history of accommodation in Canada, and for the tradition of compromise in Parliament.

"Our institutions are set up for people who can exercise power with self-control. We've had 125 years of cautious progress out of respect for the public," Mr. Rose said.

"What we're seeing now is the collapse of our institutions because a government failed to exercise that self-control and that respect for the public."

This is the second time in less than five months that Mr. Mulroney and his policies have come under attack in a strange, round-the-clock, televised siege in Ottawa. Four months ago the Meech Lake constitutional accord set off the fireworks. This time it's the Liberal senators and the government's proposed goods and services tax.

But in both cases the fight came down to Mr. Mulroney versus the Canadian public. The issue in both has gone beyond substance, to whether Mr. Mulroney's government was ever willing to bend to meet the concerns of the electorate. And both times the angst exploded on the national stage in strange fashion.

The Liberal senators, like Meech opponent Clyde Wells, have established themselves as champions of the public antagonism toward Mr. Mulroney, brandishing their bags of letters and telegrams as marching orders for their fight.

Yesterday, for example, while the desk-banging, book-pounding Liberal senators continued their war of anarchy in the Senate, their offices continued to log their phone calls of support, while encouraging mail was being delivered by the sackful to the office of Liberal Senate Leader Allan MacEachen.

Public opinion, whether expressed in those letters or phone calls or recorded by the multitude of pollsters, is becoming the No. 1 enemy of Mr. Mulroney and the invitation for no-holds-barred demonstrations of protest.

The federal Progressive Conservatives may hold a majority of seats in the House of Commons, but opponents of the government seem to no longer see the Commons as a mirror of the nation—or the place to register their opposition.

As Government House Leader Harvie Andre noted yesterday, a simple vote of 'no' is not enough in Canada these days. "It's a very significant problem," Mr. Andre told reporters. "There seems to be this feeling that real opposition cannot be expressed by a negative vote. It has to be expressed by all manner of tools and exhibitions."

There are other marks too, of a diminishing respect for the simple expression of protest within the chambers of Parliament. Closure, a procedural device for forcing an end to debate in the Commons, has been used more times since 1984 than it was in the entire history of Canada to that point. Once it was a scandal, a weighty risk, for a government to use closure. Now it is hardly noted.

The defection of several Quebec MPs to the new Bloc Québécois earlier was seen as another sign of the demise of representative government in Canada. Should an MP truly interested in representing constituents simply bolt across the floor, without consulting the voters in an election or by-election?

All of these, worried observers say, are signs of trouble for the notion of representative and responsible government—no light terms in the history of Canadian government.

But clearly and above all, the Prime Minister himself is bearing much of the blame for this degeneration in the public administration. If Mr. Mulroney respected the institutions of government, his adversaries say, then the institutions would continue to function as they always have.

"This is a radical reformer who is confronting our national institutions to the breaking point," Mr. Rose says. "The man is not a democrat . . . He deserves to be judged by history as a very, very destructive force in democracy."

● (1640)

Mr. Mulroney's defence in all of this is to stress the importance of leadership and the challenge of steering unpopular policies through difficult times. "You can't run a country the way you run a hotline show," the Prime Minister said in a recent speech.

But this is the politician who has come to be linked with poll-driven policies. Linda Dyer, head of the Maritimes-based Baseline Research polling firm, said she has witnessed a fundamental shift in the way politicians and the public view the influence of polls during Mr. Mulroney's tenure. Pollsters such as Ms Dyer have come to be regarded as intermediaries in the whole political process.

"You hear a lot more politicians mentioning polls now, which I think is just preposterous. They're supposed to be relating to their constituents, not the polls."

What makes Ms Dyer sad, however, is the fact that the public regards the polls with equal significance. "They tell us, 'We hope you send a message,' or 'We hope you make sure they notice this.' I don't feel uncomfortable with that; I feel sad. The public should be talking to the politicians directly, not to the pollsters."

Mr. Brown said it is difficult for Canadians to respect the current system for political debate, when the MPs are expected to act like "trained lapdogs for their parties."

This is how the senators have gained the support, for now, of people such as Mr. Brown, Mr. Rose, and other opponents of the GST.

We then have William Johnson's column of October 6, 1990, in The Gazette, which states:

Ottawa—What a mess.

The insurrection in the Senate of Canada would be a coast to coast joke were the implications for the entire country not so serious.

There is clearly something comical about white-haired men staying up all night and, quivering with indignation, calling each other "despicable little bugger" or "little Hitler."

These are not usually considered parliamentary terms. They even suggest a certain lack of decorum—and in the Senate, decorum is next to godliness.

To have the sedate upper chamber become the scene of jostling and pushing, of a day-and-night occupation, of banging on desks like riotous prisoners banging on their cell bars is indeed a spectacle to strike the populace open-mouthed with amazement.

Our senators?

To think that reporters and cameramen were invited into the sacrosanct chamber, with senators running interference, interposing their bodies to keep the security staff from ejecting the intruders manu militari.

Seeing the battleground, who could keep from making a parallel with the recent scenes of Warriors at Oka and Kahnawake, disporting themselves riotously under the eye of television cameras? What will we see next—Senator Jacques Hébert or Senator Royce Frith eyballing Senator Murray, nose to nose, knee to knee, and mouthing intimidating imprecations? Will the senators don masks and raise a feather?

It's all as funny as a funeral. But there is a serious dimension.

In government, proper procedure is an essential condition of legitimacy. Laws passed with improper procedure become of questionable legitimacy. Ultimately, a law passed contrary to proper procedure could be found invalid, non-existent.

So let us look at the rules for voting procedure in the Senate, since it is at the heart of the dispute.

"At the conclusion of a debate the speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the speaker asks for the 'yeas' and the 'nays' and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the speaker calls for a standing vote."

Now, here is the critical rule which was either applied or violated in the Senate on Thursday.

"The division bells are rung, and when the whips have entered the chamber and have indicated to the speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the speaker should say, 'Let the doors of the chamber be locked.' The doors will then be locked by the pages and the speaker will call for the vote."

On Thursday, the speaker called for the doors to be locked and for the senators to vote without having waited for both whips to enter the chamber, and without the Liberal whip telling the speaker that the Liberals were ready to proceed to the vote.

In other words, on the face of it, it seems to me that Speaker Guy Charbonneau violated the rules for holding a vote in the Senate.

What are the implications? They are beyond my competence to establish. But it seems to me that, at a minimum, no further contested votes should be held in the Senate until the government has put a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to establish whether the vote as conducted Thursday night is valid. That will establish whether the precedent which occurred then is valid, and can be used in future.

The Conservative government is counting on the fact that public opinion cannot be aroused over a technical question of procedure in the Senate. The real issue, the Tories are saying, is who will govern, the elected Commons or the appointed Liberals in the Senate.

The government is pretending that the issue is merely one of bad losers among the Liberal senators. This was the line taken in the Commons yesterday by Finance Minister Michael Wilson.

"The arrogance of the Liberal senators is—if we can't win a vote, we will take our marbles and go home."

That sounds good, but it is demagogic. The real issue is that of the legitimacy of rules and of procedure. The Senate, whose legitimacy to do its constitutionally mandated duty is already questioned by the Conservative government, is now operating in apparent violation of its own rules.

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney ran the risk of illegitimacy when he appointed eight extraordinary senators last week. Former Supreme Court Justice Willard Estey has said that the appointment was of doubtful constitutionality, and that the prime minister should have referred the question to the Supreme Court before making the appointments.

The government has now compounded the possible illegitimacies. The court might some day rule that the eight senators, the vote Thursday and, eventually, the goods and services tax and other legislation passed by the new Senate are, in fact, invalid.

Poor Canada. Not only the federation but its central institutions of government seem to be disintegrating.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, last Thursday afternoon I reacted with shocked disbelief when I was told over the telephone that the Tories had begun their own vote in the Senate.

Last weekend the people in my province with whom I met also reacted with shocked disbelief that one of the people who is supposed to represent them in the Senate of Canada was denied the right to vote.

When this exercise first began, I asked myself whether or not the Senate had a constitutional right to defeat, to amend or to delay this legislation. This piece of legislation is so important to the fundamental nature of our country that I said to myself I would listen to the people and then let my conscience be my guide.

We, as a Senate, determined that we should send the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce across Canada to listen to the people, and the people told us, in very convincing terms—indeed, overwhelming terms—that they were opposed to this tax.

• (1650)

Listen to the people. Either that exercise was a charade or we are a bunch of hypocrites—or both. We have heard a preponderance of evidence against the GST in Halifax. Gerald Yetman, who is a distinguished Nova Scotian well-known to all senators from my province and a former president of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour, had this to say on the constitutional point, and I quote:

> Every democratic system in the world has in place a set of checks and balances which constrain the actions of its elected government, preventing it from abusing its majority... In Canada the primary check on the majority power of the government is the Senate... the Senate has a constitutional responsibility to ensure that the elected government of this country acts in a democratic manner. That is why the Senate must reject the government's goods and service tax.

As long as the Senate operates under the present Constitution, we have the legal authority to amend, defeat or delay legislation. We are all in favour of reform, and I am on the record as favouring an elected Senate. Unless we are allowed to respond and to represent the people of our province, I believe we should be abolished.

On the weekend I listened carefully to the Nova Scotians I represent. I listened to my children who asked me "What is happening to Parliament and to our country?" This afternoon we were moved by Senator Croll who asked the question "What are you doing to Parliament?" The right to vote is the cornerstone of our democracy. Many of you have gone to war to serve your country. Many of your comrades gave up their lives for democracy and to preserve the right to vote. People all over the world are giving up their lives in order to enjoy the privileges that we enjoy in our country. Last Thursday the privileges that were given to me to represent the people of my province were denied. Again I am sad to say, Senator Charbonneau, you have indeed lost the confidence of the senators on this side of the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I rise on this question of privilege to put a few comments on the record. As you go through the Debates of the Senate for Thursday, October 4, 1990, you read words, referring to the Speaker, such as "repugnance", "shame", "pity", "disgrace" and "sadness". I do not know which is worse, "sadness" or "repugnance". I would like to read a couple of paragraphs from page 2400. The author does not know that I am reading his words and I hope he does not object. I am quoting the words of Senator Molgat:

> I want to clearly establish my personal point of privilege. Honourable senators, we are involved in a political system. The basis of the democratic system is the individual vote. Today in this house I was denied my vote, and I have come here, like you, as a properly nominated senator, and I have my rights, and you have denied me my rights.

Carrying on a few paragraphs below:

> Think about it, ladies and gentlemen. This is not a figment of our imagination. There is a deep, fundamental question here. You people—you, Mr. Speaker, you, Lowell Murray, and your boss Brian Mulroney, who is behind it all—today deliberately denied the people on this side of the house their fundamental, democratic right. Think about it, honourable senators, particularly you new senators who have come here. Did you come here to be involved in that kind of a charade?

Then in the next column:

> There is not one single precedent in this House, which has been in existence for 123 years, and there is no line in the rule book that gives you, Guy Charbonneau, the right to send that kind of letter. You do not have that right. You have given yourself rights that you do not possess. This Senate has never given you, or any previous Speaker, that type of authority. Never!

Continuing on down the page:

> You cannot believe that we run a system whereby the Speaker, of his own volition, with no background, with nothing in the rule book, without precedent, can decide on his own when the vote will be held. Do not tell me about order and management of the Senate. Come on! You are striking at a fundamental component of our democratic system, which is the right to vote. Our ancestors fought for that right. Think of what has happened in eastern Europe in the last few years. People have been fighting for that right to vote. Do you mean to tell me that you support what went on today?

> Guy, you were wrong, but you had to be advised by Lowell Murray and Brian Mulroney. I would like to give my friends opposite some advice. I think it is high time you had a revolution in your party before Mulroney ruins the whole country.

That is the end of my quotes of Senator Molgat.

Honourable senators, if those quotes had been made by anyone else, they would not mean as much to me—I do not know about the rest of you. Coming from a gentleman with the stature of Senator Molgat, those words take on an additional meaning. Senator Molgat was elected to the legislature in his province. He was the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Liberal Party. He believes in the political system, regardless of what party you belong to. The political system operates on a set of rules, as must the Senate. When a person of the stature of Senator Molgat makes that kind of statement, honourable senators on both sides should reread what he said last Thursday, because I think it is important. He made some profound statements.

We now have a situation that must be resolved. We can speak about it, but sooner or later it must be resolved. The Speaker is appointed by the Prime Minister and serves at the pleasure of the Prime Minister, which means that he can be fired at any time.

• (1700)

I think it would be a pity if the Prime Minister were to fire the Speaker. I would like to think that the Speaker would try to recoup some of his honour and resign on his own. I have a problem accepting that a person of his stature would allow himself to be subjected to what he has taken in this chamber and what he will continue to take until this issue is resolved—and that is not going to be easy. It has not been easy, and it will not get any easier.

Honourable senators, I would like to touch briefly on a number of items. I have noted, through this debate, that Senator Murray on several occasions has found a lot of humour in what has taken place here. But I would like to tell him that when Senators such as John Stewart and David Croll say that he is taking away their right to vote, he had better stand back and look at what he is doing. Senator Murray is a minister of the Crown. I repeat that he had better take a look at what he is doing. Those senators are making a fairly serious accusation.

I notice, Senator Murray, that you are laughing again. You think this is funny. I think that falls right in line with what Senator Steuart has said about you: You have never been elected to anything and you never would be. You couldn't be elected as a dogcatcher. Your behaviour fits right in with what he has said, if you can laugh at people of this stature when they make these comments.

Senator Simard: Be serious!

Senator Frith: I don't agree—he could be elected to something.

Senator Buckwold: He might be elected to dogcatcher.

Senator Lucier: The poor dogs!

[Senator Lucier.]

I understand that Senator Murray has a fairly serious problem. He is being led by, and subjected to, a man who just wanted to be loved by everybody and who has become the most despised citizen in this country. The Prime Minister has 15 per cent popularity in the most favourable polls and about 9 per cent in others.

Senator Simard: Get some order in this house!

Senator Lucier: Senator Simard might consider putting his brain in gear since his mouth is running.

Honourable senators, I just want to say—and I am speaking to senators on both sides of this chamber—that, as Senator MacEachen has said, we have a serious problem here and it must be dealt with. Senators opposite have a lot of work they want done. They have a lot of legislation to pass and they now have the numbers. They can pass some of that legislation, but they will not pass it with the situation as it presently stands unless they want a continuous fight on every issue. If a fight is what they want—and I think that is what they have signalled—then they can just keep going, because we are prepared to give it to them.

Senator Simard: Empty tricks!

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: Honourable senators, I cannot match the eloquence of Senator Croll, Senator Stewart and Senator Stollery, but I do wish to associate myself with their remarks on the question of privilege that has been raised.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Pitfield: After Senator Frith moved the adjournment of the Senate on Thursday last, when the Opposition members left the chamber, I discussed with a distinguished senator on this side what was going to happen. I was told not to go far away because the Speaker was going to call the senators back.

Senator Frith: Did you hear that?

Senator Hastings: The deal was already made.

Senator Pitfield: I simply did not believe it.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Pitfield: I said that I could not understand how that could happen. It would be an inaccurate view of the jurisprudence of the House of Commons that would permit it, and, in any event, the Speaker of the Senate is not the Speaker of the House of Commons. But I was told that this obstruction could not be allowed to go on.

I now feel that the situation was born in an atmosphere of collusion between the Chair and the government. That is confirmed on the perfect voting record which the government was able to come up with after one hour and 40 minutes. It is virtually impossible to think that a group of people could be kept together like that, have a vote sprung on them suddenly and maintain such perfect attendance.

My feeling was confirmed by a second incident, the arrival of the letter from the Speaker at my office at 5:20. It was being opened just as the television broadcast that the doors to the chamber were to be locked. Not only was there a question of collusion, in my view, but there was also a question, with my being deprived of my vote, of a biased, prejudiced act by the Speaker.

Honourable senators, I am an independent senator. I depend, to a degree that most honourable senators do not, entirely on the Speaker. I depend on him to protect me and my rights from the majority and I depend upon him for those services which most senators get from the whip.

Consequently, it is for me a matter of the gravest possible concern that the Speaker should act in a collusive manner with the government. How can I, as an independent senator, have the protection that I need if the Speaker is to be used in that manner? It seems to me, honourable senators, that a strong prima facie case has been made. I hear no evidence being offered from the government side that this is not so. Within this chamber I have read Hansard and I have not heard any such evidence.

I urge senators on the government side to provide the evidence. If there is no such evidence, then one must conclude that we are possessed of a Speaker who is prepared to act in collusion with the government, that we are possessed of a Speaker who is prepared to act according to his own biases against a private senator and an independent senator. In that case, Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, there is no alternative but to ask that the Speaker resign.

Senator Hastings: The deal was made! The dice were rolled!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we returned here on September 25 full of resolve to engage in a battle on the goods and services tax. On the government side it was a battle to pass this tax into Canadian law, and on the Opposition side it was a resolve to fight a bill that is possibly the most widely unpopular, perhaps most despised, piece of legislation that has ever been placed before the Canadian Parliament. We came back to wage this battle, using the tools that were available to us in a Canadian House of Parliament. In all the battles that rage in either house of this Parliament there are used the parliamentary tools, namely, the rules and procedures. No matter how tough the battle gets, the use of those procedures and rules over the years has brought about, one way or another, a solution.

● (1710)

What happened here in the last few days has shown that without those tools we have had to resort to extraordinary and, I must say, highly distasteful measures to register our outrage at the disregard which this government has exhibited toward the rules of this house and the democratic process. To use the Office of the Speaker of the Senate to deliberately abandon the rules of this place in order to force the GST through the Senate is truly beyond belief.

We now had some inkling that some tricks were in the air.

Senator MacEachen: Dirty tricks.

Senator Fairbairn: Michael Wilson told us so. In an interview on CTV's Sunday Edition a week ago Sunday, he told Mike Duffy, and I quote:

> We will get that legislation through. I am not going to talk about it at this point in time, Mike, but we will get that legislation through. We will see certain things happening in the Senate this week, more than that I cannot say.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, there were a number of questions. The Prime Minister, strangely enough, was not in the chamber, or, if he was, he let his Minister of Finance carry the ball. There were several questions from around that chamber asking what exactly did Mr. Wilson mean in the light of what occurred behind closed doors in this chamber last Thursday. He was asked repeatedly whether, at any time, he or any member of the government, or anybody representing the government, had been in touch with the Speaker of the Senate to advise on the strategy regarding what happened here on Thursday. He said at one point that no directives were issued. Then, as reported in the House of Commons Debates, October 5, 1990, at page 13863: "Mr. Speaker," said Mr. Wilson, "I am advised by my colleague that the advice was given . . . on the floor of the Senate."

Honourable senators, I suppose, after what has gone on here in the last few days, that does not come as much of a shock to us or even a mild surprise. It does not come as a surprise, particularly when we consider that back in June, at a moment of great tension within this country, as the Meech Lake process was grinding inexorably to a halt, the Leader of the Government in this chamber was urging the Premier of Manitoba to go against the rules of a province—not even the rules of our Parliament, but against the rules of his legislature—to prevent one member, Elijah Harper, from using his right to say no.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Fairbairn: Therefore it comes as little surprise to us to know that we, all of us, had our rules cast aside—what used to be an inalienable right to vote, cast aside—as we were locked out of this chamber last Thursday.

Senator Simard: Why did you not come in?

Senator Fairbairn: That is a very good question, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: Senator MacEachen was in Brussels, but you were in Ottawa.

Senator Fairbairn: I happened to be with Senator Frith when Senator Frith received his letter, and that was after 5 o'clock.

Senator MacEachen: Mine was not delivered.

Senator Fairbairn: Out of courtesy, Senator Frith prepared a response to the letter from the Speaker indicating that the rules were to be suspended and that he was calling a vote at 5:30 p.m. Just before 5:25 p.m., Senator Frith, almost with pen in hand, was about to sign this letter, to come down to this chamber, and to give the letter to Senator Charbonneau and say, "For God's sake reconsider."

I came down with Senator Frith and the door was locked. There was absolutely no way that we could respond to the communication we had received from Senator Charbonneau.

Senator Frith: We were not intended to. He did not want us to.

Senator Fairbairn: So it was bad enough for the Speaker to succumb to pressure to do the bidding of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but the method whereby those doors were locked so that there was no communication possible not only did dishonour to everyone in this house, but certainly did dishonour to the Office of the Speaker.

The message is out across the country that by denying the rights of senators on this side, members of the Opposition, the government pulled a fast one on the Liberals. However, honourable senators, the message is also out that the government pulled a fast one on the Canadian people. It has denied their rights by destroying the rules which constitute parliamentary law.

What do the people think? Those who have watched the spectacle over the last few days have communicated some of their thoughts to us directly through their telephone calls and their messages. Senator Davey has set out some of the comments, and I should like briefly to touch on a few of them myself, because the reality of what happened in this chamber, much as we would wish otherwise, cannot remain hidden behind those locked doors. Through communications it travels across this country.

One of our friends in Alberta, Bert Brown, a farmer, has spent the best part of the last several years speaking to anyone who would listen on the question of Senate reform and a Triple-E Senate. He is a Conservative, honourable senators. He ran in the Senate selection process in Alberta, which was won by my friend Senator Waters. Mr. Brown came third. He said:

> I guess for us Mulroney doesn't have a lot of legitimacy. No one believes he is acting in anyone's interest but his own.
> Maybe it would be different if anyone believed that the Mulroney government actually cared about the Canadian people and their opinions.

Another comment was from Jeffrey Rose, head of the Canadian Union of Public Employees—a large union—who said:

> Our institutions are set up for people who can exercise power with self-control. We've had 125 years of cautious progress out of resepct for the public.
> What we're seeing now is the collapse of our institutions because a government failed to exercise that self-control and that respect for the public.

In direct reference to the Prime Minister, Mr. Rose says—and I quote:

> This is a radical reformer who is confronting our national institutions to the breaking point . . . The man is not a democrat . . . He deserves to be judged by history as a very, very destructive force in democracy.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

All summer, honourable senators, this Prime Minister and his government have been loftily taking the moral high ground in relation to events—particularly events occurring at Kanesatake and Kahnawake. They have impressed upon all of us the necessity of respecting the primacy of law and, indeed, sent in the Canadian army to enforce that law. Yet, honourable senators, when it comes time to apply the rule of law in the highest offices of the land, this government exempts itself. The Prime Minister rolls ahead relentlessly. Being unable to take a seat himself in this place, he uses the Speaker of the Senate to do his work for him.

An Hon. Senator: Dirty work!

Senator Fairbairn: What conclusion can we, or Canadians, draw from such actions? If a government does not respect the rules as they apply in this country's Parliament, how can it expect the citizens of this nation to respect either this Parliament or the laws made by it? If the people do not respect their own Parliament and the laws that it makes, they are unlikely to respect or accept a bill that they find as abhorrent as Bill C-62.

By its actions—taken in this place only last week—the government is tacitly giving permission for forms of civil disobedience never before seen in this country. Anyone who travelled to a single hearing of the Senate committee that went across the country this summer on Bill C-62 heard witness after witness, including senior citizens—sometimes quietly, sometimes defiantly—talking about civil disobedience. It was an unnerving experience, particularly the hearings that we went through in Edmonton, Alberta.

So we examine the record. The recent actions taken here and in the other place are unprecedented in Canadian parliamentary history. Even when the bells rang for two weeks in 1982, the rules were followed scrupulously by the government and the Speaker of the day.

I should like to read again what Madam Sauvé had to say when that very difficult episode in House of Commons history came to an end, because she was under pressure from outside and around this building to find a way to put an end to it. She refused. She said:

> What would have been the consequences of an arbitrary decision that did not derive from any of the rules approved by this House nor from a precedent with any relevance to the present situation? It would have meant breaking with an age-old practice that has proved its worth. How can the Speaker make sure that all members available to take part in the division are in the House? Is it the responsibility of the Chair or the whips? What would prevent the Speaker from setting the time of the division in other circumstances? The Chair would have set a precedent that might create even greater confusion in the case of a minority government.
> In any event, such action on my part would have been open to allegations of partiality. Clearly, the Speaker must at all times be impartial.

I submit, honourable senators, that these events are only the latest of such actions by those who form the Government of Canada—actions that demonstrate the basic contempt in which this group of people holds the function of governing and the people of this nation.

One of these actions, as I said in the course of my remarks the other night, has been the unprecedented use of closure—one of this government's most visible and frequent tactics in its disrespect for the system. Since 1984 closure has been invoked more times in the House of Commons than at any time in the history of our country, all governments put together. As noted in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, October 6—and I quote an article by Susan Delacourt:

> Once it was a scandal, a weighty risk . . . Now it is hardly noted.

Honourable senators, over the years those kinds of methods, such as closure and time allocation, were used only after great care and consideration and after lengthy debate in which a case was made. In this house we have not even reached the stage of debate on the GST.

The same kind of thing has happened to many other aspects of democratic procedure in this country in the past six years. I suppose the most memorable, and perhaps offensive until now, was the closed-door process of negotiating the Meech Lake Accord. At that time ten premiers were locked up with the Prime Minister, this time in a room—and he might have been here last week, but he could not get in either. They were locked up without public consultation to negotiate a "cast-in-stone" accord under artificial and ridiculously short deadlines, leaving outside that locked room all the people represented by my friends, Senator Lucier of the Yukon, and Senator Adams of the Northwest Territories. In those circumstances there were public hearings, where no amendments of any kind were even considered. It was a process that completely antagonized a Canadian population that had become accustomed to expecting due process from its political leaders and its system of law.

● (1730)

The cynical way in which this government has treated the claims of native peoples came home to roost finally and decisively with the death of the Meech Lake Accord in the presence of Elijah Harper who, with his sacred eagle feather, said "No." Now they are at it again by trying to hide away the court challenges that are being introduced to establish whether or not our eight new GST-buster divisionals are legitimate under an old section of the Constitution which has never before in our history been used.

On October 6, the Toronto Star reported:

> The government has failed in a bid to have a court challenge to the validity of nine senate appointments handled in private.
> Mr. Justice Joseph O'Brien of the Ontario Court, general division, yesterday refused to consider the justice department's request to handle the matter in private, and adjourned the hearing to an open courtroom on Tuesday, which is today. They are not only locking the doors in Parliament, but they are trying to close the courts to the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator Fairbairn: If I were to sum up what has gone missing in these last few years, I would have to say that it is a basic respect for the process of governing and for the people of Canada. It took a while, honourable senators, but Canadians are onto this. The country learned of it, as I said, through the process of the Meech Lake Accord. The volume of mail and commentary objecting strenuously to the GST tells me that the people of Canada are on to the government once again.

In a representative democracy I believe that disrespect for the system is tantamount to disrespect for the people. The business of government is not like the business of running a corporation or labour union. It is not us, (the government), against you, (the people), a situation where government generally wins because it has the power and the tools to use that power.

As I listened today to Senator Croll, I realized again that there is much wisdom in that gentleman. He reminded us that in governing this country, ultimately we are all in it together. The tradition of representative democracy demands that we work together for the best possible solutions and that we use every legitimate tool at our disposal to fashion those solutions. When we do that, the solutions generally are not perfect for either side, but are almost always acceptable to the Canadian people. Ultimately, leadership is about guiding that process intelligently and sensitively. It is not about bluffing and tricks and, in the end, force.

The democratic process is there to form the best way for the majority of our citizens. It works because to a great extent people respect that process and respect our institutions. The way to gain and hold that respect is for each of us in this chamber to respect ourselves. Indeed, it is our basic and collective duty to do so. This is a time when nations around the world are attempting to create their own form of democracy and are looking to us as a model. In the past few days we have taken actions under which our form of democracy runs the risk of disintegrating into—and this is a term that I heard all weekend—a representative anarchy.

Senator Charbonneau, I am disheartened to see you here today. I had hoped that over the weekend you might have reflected on the depth to which your actions—actions which I am sure were taken under extreme pressure—have driven this house. It is not dishonourable to say "no" when a Prime Minister or leader asks too much of his friends and associates, no matter how loyal. There is still time to undo the damage which is haunting all of us. I would urge you to look into your conscience and accept your responsibilities.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, for the reasons senators MacEachen, Stewart and the others expressed with eloquence and conviction, I rise too on a question of privilege to denounce once more the contempt senator Charbonneau showed for the Rules of the Senate and for my rights as a senator.

The dictatorial decision he made, at someone else's instigation of course, to blatantly disregard a basic rule of the Senate, to make up one when he had no right to do so and to prevent all senators from the opposition from voting is ignominious and absolutely unique in the history of British parliamentarism. Incidentally, this is what senator Charbonneau will be remembered for in history. A hundred years from now, the Gérald Beaudoins and Eugene Forseys of the day will study the Charbonneau affair.

They will wonder, as we do today, why a speaker who had managed until then to retain the respect and trust of the senators from all parties and even the esteem of several of them suddenly decided to repudiate his past and to turn into a docile Mulroney slave.

All of a sudden, he lost all credibility and dignity. The only honorable thing he can do now is to resign and maybe to go into exile, as the speaker of the other place, Mr. Beaudoin, a Liberal, did for a sin infinitely more benign. Personnally, I believe he is going to resign.

The alternative would be for Mr. Mulroney, who designated him, to dismiss him. But that would surprise me on the part of a prime minister who has long lost all sense of decency by imposing on the House of Commons the dictatorial rule of the majority. Everyone knows the regard he has for the rights of the opposition, applying closure to muzzle the House of Commons more often in the past six years than all of his predecessors since Confederation put together.

Before Mulroney came to power, a government who would dare use closure was criticized and blamed for days and weeks by all the newspaper editors and commentators in this country; it became an indelible stain on the leader and his party. Nowadays, the newspapers are so blasé that they hardly mentioned that the government had just imposed closure for the umpteen time in order to limit debate on some legislation. As to the finer minds of newspaper editors, they have much more important things to do than blame these blatant abuse which are undermining our democratic system. They are much too busy denouncing the Senate.

Therefore, you can rest easy, for Mr. Mulroney will not repudiate his friend Charbonneau and the Senate lacks the power to do so. One thing is clear: for nearly half the members of the Senate, Mr. Charbonneau is no longer morally its Speaker. When he opens his mouth, we will not hear what he says. When he decides something, we will not want to know about it. When he enters the Senate, we will not see him. If he sits again on the Chair, we will see only an empty chair. I am sorry to say that, but Speaker Charbonneau has ceased to exist. He is a ghost.

That is what I think, personally, as a senator in the Opposition, now in a minority situation in the Senate. Yet, when I look at the men and women across the floor I recognize some famous men and women I used to admire, some of them former members of my own party. How can they accept to become blind instruments of Mulroney, a man which is being repudiated by 85 per cent of Canadians. How can they allow the Rules of the Senate and democracy itself being trampled upon without having the courage to stand up and say: Mr. Mulroney, I know that you appointed me to the Senate on the understanding that I would vote for the GST and some other reactionary legislation such as Bill C-21, which will mark the beginning of the end for our unemployment insurance scheme, a scheme which, in spite of its shortcomings, remains one of the best in the world. I understand that, Mr. Prime Minister, but I will not be a senator at any price. When you called me on the phone to tell me of my appointment, you forgot to mention that, in addition to voting blindly in favour of all your legislation, you wanted me to be an accomplice in the rape of democracy together with Senators Murray and Charbonneau. You forgot to mention this detail the other day on the phone when you told me the good news, Mr. Prime Minister. Enough is enough; therefore, I have the honour to offer you my resignation. This is what I hope to hear in the near future.

I am not being facetious. I am absolutely convinced that one senator or another, on the other side, especially among the new ones and most of all among those eight appointed in the circumstances we all know, I am sure, honourable senators, that there must be some people with a conscience on the other side of the House and that through Murray and Charbonneau, they will finally say no to Mulroney's tricks. Even if they do not all resign, the so-called eight senators of the Queen could at least withdraw from the Senate until the Court has ruled on their case. About the Court, it might be useful here to quote, partially at least, the words of the request filed by ten Liberal senators with the Court of Ontario in the form of an affidavit from the Honourable Royce Frith. I believe this should interest not only the eight senators but also all others, and especially the so-called experts.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN IN RIGHT OF CANADA THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA and HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

AFFIDAVIT OF THE HONOURABLE ROYCE FRITH

I, Royce Frith, of the City of Ottawa, in the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Canada representing the Division and the Province of Ontario since 1977, MAKE OATH AND SAY:

(1) PART A: Violation of s. 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Applicant, The Honourable George van Roggen, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Western Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of British Columbia.

2. The Applicant, The Honourable H.A. (Bud) Olson, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Western Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of Alberta.

3. The Applicant, The Honourable D.G. Steuart, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Western Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of Saskatchewan.

4. The Applicant, The Honourable Richard J, Stanbury, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Ontario.

5. The Applicant, The Honourable Jacques Hébert, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Quebec.

6. The Applicant, The Honourable Philippe D. Gigantès, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Quebec.

7. The Applicant, The Honourable Charlie Watt, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Quebec.

8. The Applicant, The Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Maritime Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of New Brunswick.

9. The Applicant, The Honourable Paul Lucier, is a member of the Senate from the Yukon Territory.

10. The Applicant, The Honourable Michael Kirby, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Maritime Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of Nova Scotia.

11. On or about September 26, 1990, the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, issued a "Minute of Council". This Minute of Council, attached as Exhibit "1" requested the Governor General to recommend that Her Majesty the Queen issue Letters Patent directing that eight members be added to the Senate pursuant to Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

12. Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides as follows:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may be Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

13. Immediately prior to September 27, 1990 the Governor General of Canada, Ramon John Hnatyshyn, recommended to Her Majesty the Queen by letter that additional Senators be appointed pursuant to Section 26.

14. On September 27, 1990 Her Majesty the Queen approved the Governor General's recommendation and issued the Letters Patent. The Letters Patent issued by Her Majesty the Queen have been published in the Canada Gazette. A copy of the relevant excerpt from the Canada Gazette dated Monday October 1, 1990 is attached as Exhibit "2". The Letters Patent directed the Governor General, pursuant to Section 26, to add eight members to the Senate.

15. Upon receipt of the Letters Patent the Governor General issued eight Summonses purporting to appoint eight individuals to sit in the Senate. The Summonses also specify the place of residence of the purported appointees. The purported appointees are as follows:

(a) Michael Arthur Meighen, a resident of the Province of Ontario;

(b) Wilbert Joseph Keon, a resident of the Province of Ontario;

(c) Janis Johnson, a resident of the Province of Manitoba;

(d) Eric Arthur Berntson, a resident of the Province of Saskatchewan;

(e) Norman Grimard, a resident of the Province of Quebec;

(f) Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, resident of the Province of Quebec;

(g) John Michael Forrestall, a resident of the Province of Nova Scotia; and

(h) James W. Ross, a resident of the Province of New Brunswick.

16. Pursuant to Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867, before taking his or her seat in the Senate a person must "take and subscribe before the Governor General or some person authorized by him" the Declaration of Qualification contained in the Fifth Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1867. Attached as Exhibit "11" is a copy of the Declaration as required by the Fifth Schedule. Attached as Exhibits "12" to "19" are the eight Declarations of the purported appointees.

17. Exhibit "12", the Declaration of James W. Ross, affirms that James W. Ross "of the Maritimes" is "seized as of Freehold . . . in the Division of the Maritimes". Although the Commission for James Ross (Exhibit "3") lists his residence as Fredericton, New Brunswick, his Declaration does not specify his Province, as is required by Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Fifth Schedule. John Michael Forrestall, Janis Johnson and Eric Arthur Berntson similarly fail to specify their Provinces in their Declarations.

18. Under Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provision is made for adding either four or eight members to the Senate. Such additions must represent equally the Four Divisions of Canada which for this purpose Section 22 deems to be:

1. Ontario;

2. Quebec;

3. The Maritime Provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island;

4. The Western Provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta

Therefore, there must be either two additions for each of the four Divisions or one addition for each of the four Divisions.

19. Section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867 states that a Province shall always be entitled to at least as many members in the House of Commons as there are Senators representing such Province:

I shall read Section 51A:

51A. Notwithstanding anything in this Act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

That, Senator Beaudoin, seems clear to me, crystal clear, wouldn't you say?

20. Immediately prior to the eight purported appointments in question, the Maritime Provinces were represented as follows by a total of 24 Senators and 25 Members of the House of Commons:

	Senate Members	House of Commons Members
Nova Scotia	10	11
New Brunswick	10	10
Prince Edward Island	4	4
(TOTAL)	24	25

21. Therefore, by reason of Section 51A, it would not have been possible, without first increasing the Maritime Provinces' representation in the House of Commons, to increase Nova Scotia's Senate representation by more than one member, nor to make any increases at all in the Senate representation of either New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island.

That is crystal clear.

22. It follows that the Government could not lawfully use Section 26 to add eight members to the Senate unless it was also prepared to increase the number of members of the House of Commons pursuant to Section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1867 which reads as follows:

and I quote:

52. The Number of Members of the House of Commons may be from Time to Time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate Representation of the Provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

• (1750)

23. The said Letters Patent purported to direct and authorize the appointment of eight additional members to the Senate of Canadian circumstances where it was not possible to appoint more than four additional members without violating Section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Applicants' position herein is, therefore, that the said Letters Patent and the eight appointments purportedly made under the authority thereof, were inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada and of no force or effect.

24. Among the eight purported appointees is James W. Ross who, as explained above, is a resident of the Province of New Brunswick. The result of Mr. Ross' appointment, if it were valid, would be to give New Brunswick 11 representatives in the Senate and only 10 representatives in the House of Commons, contrary to Section 51A, an overriding provision that by its terms is declared to apply "Notwithstanding anything in this Act . . .".

(2) PART B: Improper Use of Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867

25. The Government of Canada's reasons for making these appointments pursuant to section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 were given by the Prime minister in a speech to the Progressive Conservative Canada Fund in Ottawa on September 25, 1990. An excerpt of the speech, as published by the Toronto Globe and Mail on September 28, 1990, is attached as Exhibit "20". The Prime Minister is concerned that certain Bills including the Goods and Services Tax ("G.S.T.") will not be passed by the Senate and, in order to assure the passage of those Bills, has used section 26 in order to obtain the support of eight additional Senators.

Eight additional docile senators. The word "docile" is not in the text.

The Prime Minister alleges that there is "deadlock between the two Houses of Parliament', and that there is no other way "to break the deadlock caused by the Opposition" other than through the use of section 26.

26. Attached as Exhibit "21" is a press report from the Toronto Globe and Mail dated October 2, 1990. According to the press report the government intends to press for a quick vote on Bill C-62 (the Bill proposing the G.S.T.). The Finance Minister, Michael Wilson, is quoted as telling reporters on October 1, 1990 outside of the House of Commons that "the legislation will get through".

27. No such "deadlock" between the two Houses of Parliament, as mentioned by the Prime minister, existed on September 27, 1990 and no such "deadlock" exists now. The reasons for this are as follows.

28. There are a number of Bills currently before the Senate. These are as follows:

(a) Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multi-Culturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto;

(b) Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment in Immigration Department and Commission Act;

(c) Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and other Acts;

(d) Bill C-34, an Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof;

(e) Bill C-39, an Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof;

(f) Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion;

(g) Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and other Acts ("the G.S.T. Bill");

(h) Bill C-69, an Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures.

With respect to Bills C-21, C-28 and C-62:

(a) Bill C-21 and Bill C-28 were passed by the Senate on March 3, 1990 and June 15, 1990, albeit with amendments;

(b) Bill C-62 is still at the Report stage and no debate or vote on the Committee Report has taken place; and

(c) there is a motion presently before the Senate that the difference between the two Houses on certain amendments to Bill C-21 be referred to a Conference between the two Houses but to date the Prime Minister and his government have refused such a Conference . . .

As we all know.

None of these Bills has been defeated in a vote of the Senate.

I'll repeat that, even though it is not repeated in the text, because I want to be sure that Senator Beaudoin has heard it.

None of these Bills has been defeated in a vote of the Senate.

29. Most Bills sent up from the House of Comons are accepted and passed without amendment, but this has not always been the case in the past. Under the Constitution Act, 1867 the Senate has the same powers as the House of Commons, except with respect to money bills which under section 53 must originate in the House of Commons.

Thus, the Senate has the power and the right to accept, reject or amend Bills sent up from the Commons.

30. In my experience,

This is still Senator Frith speaking.

it is accepted practice that the Senate will on occasion amend or reject a Bill sent up from the Commons. According to F. A. Kunz, The Modern Senate of Canada 1925-1963: A Re-Appraisal (1965), Appendix 1, which is attached as Exhibit "22", of 2,136 Bills passed by the House of Commons between the 1925 and 1962-63 Sessions—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, pursuant to rule 12 of the Senate, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock p.m.

The Senate took recess until 8.00 p.m.

At 8:00 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

[English]

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I will continue where I left off. I was at point 30.

[Translation]

it is accepted practice that the Senate will on occasion amend or reject a Bill sent up from the Commons. According to F. A. Kunz, The Modern Senate of Canada 1925—1963: A Re-Appraial (1965), Appendix 1, which is attached as Exhibit "22", of 2,136 Bills passed by the House of Commons between the 1925 and 1962-63 Sessions, 324 (15.2%) were amended, 32 (1.5%) rejected, 1,772 (83.0%) passed without amendment and 8 (0.4%) withdrawn. Since the current government took office in 1984, out of 318 Bills, 300 (94.3%) have been passed unchanged by the Senate . . .

That was not always easy, as they were not always good bills. This, by the way, was not in the text.

—18 (5.7%) have been passed with amendments and none have been rejected.

No bill has been rejected since Mr. Mulroney took power.

31. With respect to the holding of Joint Conferences with the House of Commons, this mechanism has often been used since Confederation in order to resolve disputes between the two Houses concerning amendments to legislation. Attached as Exhibits "23', and "24" are two papers prepared by Habib Massoud of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament which outline the instances in which a Joint Conference has been held.

32. The use of the appointment power in section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 in the circumstances of this case seriously undermines the position of the Senate in the legislative process and impairs the functioning of the Senate as a body to provide "sober second thought" concerning proposed law.

33. I have reviewed a research paper prepared by Mollie Dunsmuir entitled "Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867: The Power to Appoint Additional Senators". Ms Dunsmuir is a Research officer with the Law and Government Division of the Library of Parliament. This research paper is attached as Exhibit "25".

34. I have also reviewed a 1946 article by Eugene Forsey entitled "Appointment of Extra Senators Under Section 26 of the British North America Act". A copy of this article is attached as Exhibit "26".

35. From these sources and from the statistical evidence in paragraph 14, above, I conclude that even though the Senate has frequently amended or rejected legislation, section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 has been invoked only once before, in 1873-1874. In 1874, Her Majesty the Queen refused to accept the recommendation of the Governor General in circumstances where no "deadlock" was present.

36. Exhibit "25" extensively canvasses evidence which is of assistance in determining the meaning of section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and makes the following conclusions:

(a) section 26 arose as a result of a Resolution at the London Conference immediately prior to Confederation;

(b) it was the intention of the British Government and the colonial Delegates to the London Conference that section 26 was to be used only on extraordinary occasions when a situation of serious and irreconcilable deadlock existed;

(c) previous drafts of section 26 clearly demonstrated this intention; and

(d) numerous experts on Canadian constitutional law confirm that it was intended that section 26 be used only on extraordinary occasions when a situation of serious and irreconcilable deadlock existed.

Ms. Duinsmuir herself concludes that:

. . . [S]ection 26 was to be used only when there was a collision of opinion between the two Houses of so serious and permanent a character that the government was incapacitated. Additionally, it had to be at least possible, and perhaps probable, that the extra appointments would resolve the problem.

37. I have reviewed Chapter V of G. Ross, The Senate of Canada: Its Constitutional Powers and Duties Historically Considered (1914), which is attached as Exhibit "27". This source explains that cases of considerable public importance have arisen in which the action of the Senate was regarded at the time as "a wanton interference with the prerogatives of the popular Chamber". Five such cases are listed on pp. 74 and 75, but in none of these did the government of the day resort to the use of section 26. In the fifth listed case, the controversy surrounding the Naval Aid Bill, Excellent idea!

the delaying of the Bill resulted in the calling of a general election so the verdict of the electors could be obtained on the measure.

38. I attended the Senate on October 2, 1990 and observed that the eight purported appointees were present. From the debate that took place in the Senate it appears to me that they intend to participate in Senate proceedings, debate and vote as soon as possible.

39. If the eight purported appointees take part in Senate proceedings and vote on Bills pending this Honourable Court's determination of these issues and this Honourable Court ultimately holds that the appointments were improperly made, then all legislation passed by the Senate, including the eight purported appointees, from September 27, 1990 may be ruled invalid. If the Senate passes the Bills pending the final resolution of this matter by this Honourable Court, persons who suffer damage as a result of relying upon and acting in accordance with legislation subsequently found to be invalid may not legally recover compensation for that damage. Finally, unless the eight purported appointees are prevented from acting as Senators until such time as their rights and qualifications to do so is resolved, considerable uncertainty and confusion will be caused by the uncertain status of any legislation passed with the assistance of the eight purported appointees.

End of quote.

You probably noticed, as I did, honourable senators, that the Mulroney government is now trying everything to delay the court actions to invalidate the appointment of the new senators. That is strange, to say the least.

It is interesting to note that merely ten days ago Mr. Mulroney was saying that all such actions were futile and ridiculous. Now, all of a sudden, his lawyers are trying to get a two week extension to prepare a case which has suddenly become important.

There is no doubt that the Conservatives will try everything they can think of, including violating the Rules of the Senate, to force a vote on the GST before the courts stop them from doing it.

In the light of the events of the past few days, the only question I have now is this: Which man or woman from the other side will be the first to stand up and tell the prime minister "Thanks, but not thanks; I will no longer pay with my dignity the honour of being called "honourable senator"."

[English]

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, while listening to the many speeches over the past few days, I have experienced many emotions, the most consistent one being sadness. I feel sad in many ways about what is happening here.

Just last week we were saying goodbye to our colleagues, Senator Guay and Senator Bielish. Many nice things were said about them, and they deserved all that was said of them.

When Senator Charbonneau decided that he would, in effect, usurp the rules of the House, things changed for the worse in here. I was sitting in my office—I had gone back there for a few minutes to do some work—when, all of a sudden, the bells stopped ringing. I asked my secretary what was going on, and we tried to make a few telephone calls to determine that. Finally I rushed up here, and, by the time I arrived, Senator Frith was already debating the question of privilege with respect to the illegality of the action taken by Senator Charbonneau.

• (2020)

I deliberately began my remarks this evening with some nice comments about the Senate. At my earliest opportunity I wanted to welcome my friend Walter Twinn to the Senate. I welcome him for a number of reasons. Our people did not have the right to vote in this country until 1960. I make reference to Senator Twinn because he is the second senator of native heritage to be appointed from Alberta. The first was the late James Gladstone, who was appointed in 1958 by John Diefenbaker.

The first experience I had of talking about human and democratic rights was when I was at university. I do not know how many in this chamber may have voted in an election illegally—illegally because you did not have the right to vote. I was remembering those things during this debate. During the election of 1958 my landlady put me on the voters' list. I was in my last year of university at the time. I said that I could not vote because I am an Indian. She said that it was fundamentally wrong that my people were not allowed to vote, and she told me to vote anyway. So I did. I voted illegally. I believe this is the first time I have ever admitted that in this chamber. At the time, I was extremely worried about voting illegally; but I did. I worried so much about it that I decided I would never do it again. The only thing I could think of was, if there was a controverted election, someone would come to me and say "Hey, Indian, you voted wrongly. You did not have the right to vote, Indian". Those things hurt me and they still hurt me when I think about them today.

Anyway, I wanted to welcome Walter. I guess I could be called an unofficial dean. I was elected in 1968, won three following elections, and was appointed to the Senate in 1984. Senator Williams was here before me, along with our Inuit friends Senator Watt and Senator Adams. These things are fundamental. 1960 was not that many years ago. We often hear of what a great country we have. I often wonder how great we are. We have to remind ourselves about the things we have done wrong. How long was it before women got to vote in this country? We have had some bad moments in our history. We are not that great when we look at ourselves and think about the things we have done wrong.

Thank God a few more of us have been elected to the other place—Willy Littlechild from Wetaskiwin, Ethel Blondin and Jack Anawak. It is sad that we even have to talk about them. These are new events for us. It is new for our people to participate in the political process of this land. It is new for us to be able to say that we have members of Parliament, and it is good. I do not think I need to tell anyone here about the plight of our people. Max Yalden called it a national disgrace. I have always felt that one of the ways we will make progress over the long haul is by participating in the political process. I thought of these things while thinking about what Senator Charbonneau did last Thursday. He took away the fundamental rights of this place. He took away our right to vote. I did not have the opportunity to vote.

Other senators previously referred to the rules. The rules are clear. Page 70 says that a vote cannot be taken in this place until the two whips come in that door and say, "Mr. Speaker, we are ready to vote". That was not done.

I do not know what we are going to do from here on in. I hope we will work out an arrangement so as not to destroy this institution. If we see more actions like those of Senator Charbonneau's last Thursday, we may see the destruction of this institution. That would be sad; it would be wrong. In spite of the fact that our people were not present here until 1958, the Senate has played a meaningful role in the parliamentary life and democratic process of this country.

I think we should think seriously about what was done last Thursday and do everything we can to rectify the situation and reinstate the good reputation of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I too rise on the point of privilege. As senators will recall, last Thursday, or perhaps Friday—the days seem to merge—when I spoke, I expressed embarrassment for some of the new members across the way. In addition, I believe I said that wisdom in life is really founded in the sandbox of the kindergarten.

• (2030)

When saying that, I thought that Senator Charbonneau would perhaps heed those words. I thought we might get out our childhood memory spades and dig in our individual mental sandboxes to see what we would find. It seems that to date Senator Charbonneau has not done that.

I also concluded on the weekend that perhaps I personally should get out my little spade and dig in my own psychological sandbox to see what I could find. As I set aboug doint that, I found myself in my library. I found myself musing and meditating on the books of John Buchan—now, I did not say "John Buchanan"; I said "John Buchan". Senators will recall that John Buchan wrote several books which, I am sure, many of us enjoyed. They included Mr. Steadfast, Freemantle and, his most famous of all, The Thirty-Nine Steps.

I mention the name John Buchan not so much because of his skill as a novelist but because of the fact that he was a Governor General of Canada. He was known as Lord Tweedsmuir. Since the matter of section 26 of the BNA Act and the Governor General are very much on our minds, I thought that we should take a look at what Lord Tweedsmuir had to say on the subject of the Governor General.

As I played around with my spade in my mental sandbox, I came across the following statement by Lord Tweedsmuir in which he talks about the powers of the King and of the Crown. He said:

> ... (The King's) importance is not so much in what he does as what he is. We are a democracy in which the will of the people prevails by means of their elected representatives. But the King represents the people in a deeper sense—the abiding continuity of the nation behind all the mutations and vicissitudes of parties.

I know that that is not a popular thought today, but many have agreed that within our system the Prime Minister speaks for the government but the Sovereign speaks for the people.

As I continued to do more research, and as I mused on the last few years of our service in this place, I realized that we have watched the current Prime Minister constantly circumvent Parliament. He did so in the adjournment and proroguing of Parliament in 1988 and 1989, with the intention of using Governor General's special warrants to obtain money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund rather than go through Parliament.

He did so in the famous episode at Quebec City, where the Governor General was side-stepped. We all know that incident. I think it has remained in our memory through the embodiment of the particular piece of music, "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling".

Whether we think of those or other incidents, we are a little shocked that the Governor General and Parliament are consistently side-stepped and circumvented in this place by this government.

I would like to put on the record a few of the things that other Prime Ministers have had to say about the Office of the Governor General and about Governor Generals themselves. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that:

> The Canadian Governor-General long ago ceased to determine policy, but he is by no means, or need not be, the mere figure-head the public imagine. He has the privilege of advising his advisers, and if he is a man of sense and experience, his advice is often taken.

Sir Robert Borden said, at the Imperial Conference of 1926:

> It would be an absolute mistake to regard the Governor-General (as the office was altered by the 1926 Conference) as a mere figure-head, a mere rubber stamp. During nine years of Premiership I had the opportunity of realizing how helpful may be the advice and counsel of a Governor-General in matters of delicacy and difficulty; in no case was consultation with regard to such matters ever withheld; and in many instances I obtained no little advantage and assistance therefrom.

Honourable senators, I found all of this fascinating, because concerning the use of section 26 the media and large numbers of people have just assumed a fait accompli. The Prime Minister and many of his ministers constantly inoculated the public to the eventual occurrence of this incident so that the issue of concern to many was not if it would happen or how right or legal or proper it would be, but just when it would happen.

That, honourable senators, is a sad thing, indeed. In the hearts and minds of large numbers of us there is a sincere belief in the office and personage of the Governor General.

I would like to put on the record some thoughts of a famous Canadian scholar whom we all know so well, namely, Robert MacGregor Dawson. I shall quote from his book, the Government of Canada, page 180 and give his perceptions of the role of the Governor General:

● (2040)

> A second duty of the Governor-General is to offer his services as a mediator and conciliator between the political party leaders when the occasion warrants.

Perhaps I should read that again:

> A second duty of the Governor-General is to offer his services as a mediator and conciliator between the political party leaders when the occasion warrants. Intervention of this kind is usually of an emergency nature and will occur only in time of crisis.

MacGregor Dawson then proceeds to cite occasions when such consultations have occurred.

I must tell you, honourable senators, that in my heart of hearts—and I know that I am indeed naive in my heart of hearts when I heard that all these events had been unfolding in the last several weeks and months—I had half hoped that the Leaders of the Opposition would have been summoned to Government House. For the sake of this same record I will cite some of MacGregor Dawson's precedents on this very same issue. He cites the occasion when King George V in 1916 called a conference of Mr. Asquith, Lloyd George, Bonar Law, Balfour, and Henderson to aid him in choosing a successor to Mr. Asquith who would be reasonably sure of support in the Commons.

The Lloyd George-Asquith episode is very important because, contrary to what many have been saying in the last few days, and what many journalists have been reporting about the events, in England around 1910 it was not Lloyd George who was then Prime Minister but Lord Asquith.

As we look at this phenomenon of the use of Section 26 and the invocation and the call upon His Excellency the Governor General, I thought it would be interesting to find out how we got here. So I continued to do a little more spade-work in my library. I came upon the events of 1926, in particular the Imperial Conference of 1926. That particular conference was especially important, because it was after that that the Governors General of the Dominions became the representatives of His or Her Majesty and ceased to be the representatives of the British Government and so too in the Dominion of Canada.

For the sake of recollection, memory, and love of institutions, I thought that I should put some of that on the record. I should like to read from the Balfour Report, so named for Lord Balfour, on the positon of Governors General, because, after all, we are talking about the former Dominions of the Empire, now the Commonwealth. I quote as follows:

> We proceeded to consider whether it was desirable formally to place on record a definition of the position held by the Governor General as His Majesty's representative in the Dominions. That position, though now generally well recognized, undoubtedly represents a development from an earlier stage when the Governor General was appointed solely on the advice of His Majesty's Ministers in London and acted also as their representative.
> In our opinion it is an essential consequence of the equality of status existing among the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations that the Governor General of a Dominion is the representative of the Crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the Dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any Department of that Government.
> It seemed to us to follow that the practice whereby the Governor General of a Dominion is the formal official channel of communication between His Majesty's Government in Great Britain and His Governments in the Dominions might be regarded as no longer wholly in accordance with the constitutional position of the Governor General. It was thought that the recognised official channel of communication should be, in future, between Government and Government direct. The representatives of Great Britain readily recognized that the existing procedure might be open to criticism and accepted the proposed change in principle in relation to any of the Dominions which desired it. Details were left for settlement as soon as possible after the Conference had completed its work, but it was recognized by the Committee, as an essential feature of any change or development in the channels of communication, that a Governor General should be supplied with copies of all documents of importance and in general should be kept as fully informed as is His Majesty the King in Great Britain of Cabinet business and public affairs.

Essentially, the Balfour Report was the conclusion of the Imperial Conference of 1926. Historically, I shall move along a little to the Imperial Conference of 1930, the result of which was, later on, in 1931, the Statute of Westminster. I thought that we should also put some of this on the record.

I should like to quote from the Report of the Imperial Conference, 1930 (Summary of Proceedings) which states:

> The Report of the Inter-Imperial Relations Committee of the Imperial Conference of 1926 declared that the Governor-General of a Dominion is now the 'representative of the Crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the Dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any Department of that Government.'
> The Report did not, however, contain any recommendation as to the procedure to be adopted henceforward in the appointment of a Governor-General, and the Conference felt it is necessary to give some consideration to this question.

● (2050)

> Having considered the question of the procedure to be observed in the appointment of a Governor General of a Dominion in the light of the alteration in his position resulting from the Resolutions of the Imperial Conference of 1926 . . . thereto would seem to flow naturally from the new position of the Governor General as represenative of His Majesty only.
> 1. The parties interested in the appointment of a Governor General of a Dominion are His Majesty the King, whose representative he is, and the Dominion concerned.
> 2. The constitutional practice that His Majesty acts on the advice of responsible Ministers applies also in this instance.
> 3. The Ministers who tender and are responsible for such advice are His Majesty's Ministers in the Dominion concerned.
> 4. The Ministers concerned tender their formal advice after informal consultation with His Majesty.
> 5. The channel of communication between His Majesty and the Government of any Dominion is a matter solely concerning His Majesty and such Government. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have expressed their willingness to continue . . . in any manner in which that Government may desire.

This account continues quite extensively. What I am driving at comes through a bit more clearly as I continue. I quote further:

> Being three thousand miles away,—

And here we are talking about the King—

> —he has appointed a gentleman who ought now to be known as a Governor but as a Viceroy—as a person acting, in the King's absence, as the King himself would act . . . Whenever the Viceroy deems it necessary to obtain further instructions from the King, he will, in future, write direct to His Majesty and not, under any circumstances, to any member of the British Government.

It may seem self-evident to some of us, but in point of fact the position of Governor General, as you can see from those documents, the discussions, the debates and the conclusions over several years, was such that the Viceroy, or the Governor General, was to act as the King himself in the King's absence.

Some of us have many concerns that the Queen—not the King—has perhaps been embarrassed, as Senator Charbonneau has been embarrassed. If I continue in time, I thought that I would continue to the letters patent of 1949, and then continue again to arrive at the appointment of the first Canadian Governor General, Charles Vincent Massey.

I might remind some members on the opposite side how they felt about that. As a matter of fact, a few days ago I read that Charlotte Whitton was not the least bit shy about expressing her wrath over the fact that a Canadian, Charles Vincent Massey, had been appointed Governor General of this country.

The book that I have in front of me is entitled: "Confederation on the March." It was written by the Right Honourable Vincent Massey. The subject matter, given in a speech before the Canadian Club, or one of the Canadian clubs—is "The Crown in Canada". He is obviously speaking from the experience of having been a Viceroy. Some people have held various thoughts on Charles Vincent Massey, but he had a public reputation and a public record of tremendous importance and esteem.

In presenting his views on the Crown, the Monarch, the Sovereign, the King, Vincent massey makes four points, which he has borrowed from another famous writer, Walter Bagehot. Charles Vincent Massey says, of the Crown and these four major pillars or dimensions of the Crown, that:

> In the first place . . . there is the Crown at the head of the political system, making it more understandable for ordinary people who take an interest in the doings of their Sovereign.
> Then, there is the Crown as the head of the intangible thing we call 'the nation', strengthening the community and its government with the bonds of a personal loyalty much more powerful than respect for a piece of bunting or a constitutional document.
> Thirdly, there is the Sovereign as Head of State, keeping certain important institutions free from partisanship and political recriminations.

I think that perhaps I should read that again.

Senator Hébert: Take your time. We like it!

Senator Stewart: Read it more slowly.

Senator Bosa: There is no one in the Chair.

Senator Cools: He doesn't listen, anyway.

Senator Hébert: There is no one, anyway, when Senator Charbonneau is there.

Senator Gigantès: Wait until he sits down again.

Senator Phillips: Senator Kenny, you are interrupting the speaker. Some people get no respect!

Senator Hébert: Start from page one!

Senator Cools: Senator Hébert has asked me to start those four points again, so I shall start at number one.

Essentially, Charles Vincent Massey is saying here that the Governor General is the social and cultural leader in the country and that, in addition to being the supreme warrior, the supreme soldier of the nation, the Governor General is also the supreme moral leader of the nation.

● (2100)

As Vincent Massey states:

[Senator Cools.]

> In the first place . . . there is the Crown at the head of the political system, making it more understandable for ordinary people who take an interest in the doings of their Sovereign.
> Then, there is the Crown as the head of the intangible thing we call the 'nation', strengthening the community and its government with the bonds of a personal loyalty much more powerful than respect for a piece of bunting or a constitutional document.
> Thirdly, there is the Sovereign as Head of State, keeping certain important institutions free from partisanship and political recriminations.
> Finally, as with us today, there is the Queen with her husband and children—the first family of her realms, showing us the essential unit of human society at its best.

We have heard a lot of nonsense and a lot of rubbish recently. There is so much of it around that it is difficult to keep fighting it back, to keep oneself protected from it. Generally in our system there is a sense that the government should be duly sensitive so as not to involve Her Majesty or Her Majesty's Viceroy in controversial matters. There are many references and precedents in this regard. I could go on at length reading them.

However, there is the sense that in our system of Parliament-which is the system modelled after Westminster, following several hundred years of toil, suffering and fighting, and a lot of bloodshed—we have arrived at peace with the monarchy, with the sovereign, the Crown, and that at this point in time Her Majesty and her loyal Viceroy are deemed to rule in consent of the people.

I should like to return for a moment to Lord Tweedsmuir's assertion, and the feeling so many of us have, that something very precious, very vital has been violated, that something awful has happened. In all sincerity I say to honourable senators that I feel very sorry for many of them. I am fascinated by everything that has gone on, and that, Senator Charbonneau says that it has been in the name of decorum. The government's message to the public is that it has been in the name of democracy. I tell you that you do not have my sympathetic ear.

I wish now to offer my last bit of information for honourable senators, because we have gone through a great deal recently. I should like to refer again to Minister Andre's statement which I referred to in the Debates of the Senate on October 4, 1990. He made this statement in the House of Commons on March 12, 1990, and I should again like to read it into the record.

● (2110)

> The Senate claims that since it is a part of Parliament, that gives it the legal authority to reject. I would say again, as I said earlier, the Governor General is a part of our Parliament as well. The Governor General has that same legal authority but, of course, would never exercise it.

This government seems to be able to speak with confidence and certainty as to what the Governor General will and will not do, what the Speaker of the Senate will and will not do, and what the Speaker of the House of Commons will and will not do. There are many more, but I place those three before you.

It is a sad day for democracy in this country. Senators on the other side can smirk. Senator Marchand asked if anyone in here understood what it meant to be unable to vote, and he talked of what it meant to him.

The experience in the West Indies is a little different. I know about voting because my family, being property owners, always voted. These experiences are very close to my person, because I grew up in a family hearing that it was our duty to bring universal male suffrage to the rest of the population of that particular colony. Last Thursday I said that a Tory was someone to be against. My own father was a candidate in 1938. There were only about 400 eligible voters on the voting list because one had to be a certain kind of property owner. My father was defeated, but my uncles won. Many of us in this place feel very intimate about this place that we call Parliament. I tell you, it is close to my person.

An ex-justice has said that the appointment of the eight new senators may be unconstitutional. I am pleased for all of us that to this date and at this time the one institution which the Prime Minister has been unable to manipulate seems to be the courts of Canada. I hope and pray that it remains so.

I should like again to put a statement on the record that has been placed on the record many times in this chamber, particularly in the last year. The following is an excerpt from a book entitled The Government of Canada by Robert MacGregor Dawson. Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> There would be no use of an Upper House if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing or amending or postponing the legislation of the Lower House. It would be of no value whatever were it a mere chamber for registering the decrees of the Lower House. It must be an independent House, having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that body . . .

The next part of that statement is often omitted, and I should like to read it to you:

> . . . but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people.

Honourable senators, I spent the weekend reading and studying, which is not unusual. Time and time again, throughout the speeches of Sir John A. Macdonald and of George Brown during the Confederation Debates, the issue is raised that the danger in constituting the Upper House would be that the Upper House, more readily than the Lower House, would respond to the masses of people.

I thank you, honourable senators. I hope I have not talked too many people out of the chamber. I understand that it is an occupational hazard. I must tell you, honourable senators, that I love my job, as many of us do.

It is a sad state of affairs that this current Prime Minister has successfully embarrassed the Queen, the Governor General, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Speaker of the Senate and all of us. I thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. Last Thursday I was denied the right to vote. I was not outside the chamber waiting to come in. I had left.

The bells were ringing. However, in the Rules of the Senate of Canada under the heading "Interpretation", it says:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Then I go back to what these customs, usages, forms and proceedings are. At page 70, under "Voting", it says:

• (2120)

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote. The Speaker puts the question again.

And it goes on. In other words, according to the rule book I as a senator have certain expectations based on precedent, the precedent being that if the bells are ringing we are not going to come to a vote until the whips enter the chamber.

I was not notified. No one told me that there would be a vote at 5.30, which, in fact, took place at 5.25 in breach of the statement by the Speaker. Therefore, I was deprived of many privileges. Under rules 49 and 50, I have—

Senator Cogger: Would the Honourable Senator Gigantès entertain a question?

Senator Gigantès: No. Under rule 49—

Senator Cogger: Under which rule does it say that you are allowed to read a Bible into another senator's microphone?

Senator Gigantès: Rule 50(3) says:

> With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reasons assigned by the senator be withdrawn or changed . . .

That is a privilege that I have; I could have voted one way and then changed that vote. That privilege was withdrawn. We were told, very speciously, that the Speaker would apply rule 15 to restore "order and decorum." There had been no breach of decorum whatsoever until then. The procedure for the ringing of the bells can be found in the rules, and that is not a breach of decorum. It is part of the practices and procedures of the Senate.

If it is not decorum, then it must be order. On page eight of the rules we are given a description of the various types of order that the Speaker must preserve. Rule 16 says:

> When the Senate is sitting,
> (a) senators shall not pass between the Chair and the Table;

The Speaker should remand any senator who does that—when there is a Speaker. We have not had one since Thursday. The rule goes on:

> (b) when entering, leaving or crossing the Senate Chamber, senators shall bow to the Chair;

That is if the Chair is occupied by someone who has our trust and can be called an honourable senator. The rule goes on:

> (c) if senators have occasion to speak together . . .

And it goes on. "Order" is described there, and until the vote at 5.25 p.m. last Thursday, order had in no way been disturbed. There was a trick, and it was put in place by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Mr. Wilson of the other place, and especially Brian Mulroney.

I was deprived of my right to vote. Our friends in the press do not understand the importance of this situation. The Constitution of 1867 says that we will have a Senate and that there can be changes to the Senate. One change occurred when a new rule was instituted saying that senators should retire at age 75 and not stay on for life. So amendments could be made. Another amendment in 1982 limited the Senate's ability to delay a constitutional amendment to six months and no more. Also in 1982 the Constitution affirmed the existence of the Senate and made it difficult to introduce further amendments. It outlined essential roles, as, for instance, that in article 4 of the Charter, which says that unless there is opposition by more than one-third of the votes in the House of Commons, Parliament may prolong a house beyond five years. Clearly that gives the Senate the right to veto a two-thirds decision by the House of Commons. Prime Minister Mulroney had that kind of majority in the last Parliament. He could have put off an election, but the Senate would have stopped him.

There is another myth in the press, which does not do its homework, that being that we on the Liberal side have never blocked legislation passed by a Liberal Government in the House of Commons. There are many members in this chamber who know, for instance, that during Prime Minister Trudeau's leadership we did that very thing. I was not here at the time, but one of the bills closest to Prime Minister Trudeau's heart was the then Bill C-60 which proposed constitutional reform without consulting the provinces. He was told by the Liberal majority in this chamber that if he tried to pass this bill it would not pass the Senate. There were numerous other bills over which the Liberal majority in the Senate would tell a Liberal minister that "what has been proposed is to your credit, but if you make the following amendments it would be to your honour," and it was indicated that if the amendments were not made the bill might not pass. Liberal ministers, often angry, made the changes that Senate committees were suggesting.

In came the Tories with their intransigence and arrogance, and they accuse us of that very thing. This cabinet and its predecessor from 1984 did not want to listen to any suggestions whatsoever. They tried to break the rules that they themselves had upheld, fighting furiously. The first time there was a skirmish between the Mulroney Government and the Senate it was over the Estimates. In effect, the Tories were maintaining something akin to one going to one's bank manager and saying, "Give me the rest of that loan we negotiated last year, plus another $7 billion, but I cannot tell you what it is for." One would not get very far with that bank manager, I am sure! We said, "Show us the Estimates, and once we have seen the Estimates we will pass them, as has always been the case." No, they had to get stubborn. The "God-like" Mr. Mulroney felt that he had the right to do anything he wanted. What is worse—and this is part of the duplicity of these amateur apprentice sorcerers, one of whom is entering the Chamber right now, the Leader of the Government in the Senate; he is the junior sorcerer, the apprentice to the apprentice, the apprentice being Mr. Mulroney, and I shall come to his destructive bungling later. So what does he do? He says, "No, we will not table these Estimates; they are not ready." Some weeks later the Honourable Flora Macdonald, speaking in the House of Commons, lets the cat out of the bag by saying that a change could not have been made to the Estimates because they were already printed. The dates she gave indicated very clearly that before this huge fuss was started about the Liberals arresting the business of the nation, and all this hypocritical cant, the Estimates were already printed, packaged and waiting at the Queen's printer. They could have been distributed, but, of course, that would have spoiled the chance for Mr. Mulroney to go strutting about and pretending that he was God Almighty and that no one could interfere with whatever he was doing. Unlike my colleagues, I hope the Speaker does not resign but stays in this House and faces our resentment, our anger and our hurt every time he comes in. I hope that will happen, because by his act he represents in this House Mr. Mulroney; and Mr. Mulroney has destroyed this country.In two years Quebec will separate and it will be Mr. Mulroney's doing. I will explain why.

• (2130)

I have nothing against separatists in Quebec. It is their perfect right to want to take their province out of a Canadian federation and have an independent state. There is no reason why there should not be people in a democracy who think that way and who want to achieve this result by democratic means. Most of the separatists in the province of Quebec want only to use democratic means. There is also a precedent, for people who want independence for their section of a multi-ethnic country, to work from within the institutions of that country to disrupt, if necessary, in order to achieve their end of developing an independent state. The Irish did it very successfully in the Parliament of Great Britain, but they are not the only example. The Hungarians in the Austro-Hungarian Empire were systematically playing that game and so were the Slovakians, and they are doing it again in Czechoslovakia. In my country of origin, Greece, a whole intellectual elite was stimulating separatist sentiment, and because they were in the public service of the Turkish Empire they were sabotaging it from the inside.

Separatists want to separate, and it is their right to do so by using democratic means; but then in comes the apprentice sorcerer and he says to himself, "I can win Quebec if I start using the separatist idiom and they will help me." They did not need much encouragement. They disliked Mr. Trudeau and it was their perfect right to do that. They all helped Mr. Mulroney, and many of them were elected into his caucus; and there is nothing illegal about a Quebec separatist becoming a member of the Tory caucus. One of them was sitting there the other day along with Marcel Prud'homme, and Mr. Prud'homme presented his Tory colleague to me by saying "He is a separatist," upon which the fellow smiled his assent. Mr. Prud'homme then turned around and said, "Philippe here knows them well because all of the members of the family into which he has married, with the possible exception of one, are all separatists.

Honourable senators, my own daughter is a separatist and I love her dearly. I have some nieces and nephews who are separatists and I love them dearly, but once you let separatists into your caucus you are, to some extent, their prisoner and you start seeing the phenomenon we saw many times, for instance, with the drug bill, where Mr. Benoit Bouchard was saying in Quebec—and it appeared in many newspaper headlines—that Liberal senators were opposing the drug legislation because they wanted to help the Ontario drug industry and hurt the Quebec drug industry. There is a mythology to separatism to the effect that Ontario wants to hurt Quebec and Quebec is always victimized. That game was played by ministers of the Crown and by Prime Minister Mulroney.

Senator Simard: Are you still on the question of privilege?

Senator Gigantès: I am on the question of privilege, yes.

Honourable senators, the same preachment was made so effectively with the Free Trade Agreement that we had an editorial in La Presse in which Alain Dubuc, the editor-in-chief wrote that if it is bad for Ontario, it is good for Quebec. Members of the Tory caucus were going around Quebec saying the same thing. In other words, for the first time in the history of Canada the federalist option was not put by the federal government. We now have a Quebec, after nine years of Parti Quebecois rule and six years of a federal government, that does not defend the federalist option.

Mr. Mulroney has a perfect right to run as a separatist in Quebec. This is a democracy and he can go and battle Mr. Parizeau for the presidency of the PQ; but a federal prime minister does not have the right, in my view, not to defend the federalist option. He has not done so. He has not done so because he will sacrifice anything—the country included—to his own electoral interests as he perceives them. He bungled that issue. It has misfired on him.

Mr. Mulroney is the one whom Speaker Charbonneau represents here, and Speaker Charbonneau took away my voting rights in order to ram the GST down the country's throat. I will read you some evidence of how the country feels about the GST. Because of that inept apprentice sorcerer Brian Mulroney and his minions I am going to have my nationality changed. I will no longer be a citizen of Canada, I will be a citizen of Quebec and I will be a good citizen of Quebec. The Prime Minister is supposed to fight against such a thing happening. This federal Prime Minister has, from the beginning, sacrificed the country and neglected his role as a defender of federalism in order to gain an electoral advantage.

Honourable senators, what you gain on the swings you lose on the roundabouts. Out west the Right Honourable Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is now the albatross around the neck of his party. Do I mind? Yes, I do. In two years' time, when the country will be facing a crisis—and even right now when the country is facing a crisis over its continued existence—this Prime Minister, who Speaker Charbonneau represented and whose tactics he used to ram through a tax the country does not want, has so destabilized the country that Parliament does not have enough authority; his own voice does not have enough conviction; the members of his cabinet, if they are francophones, support the separatists; and the country is being destroyed.

He does not have a leg to stand on anywhere else in the country, but, of course, they love him in Quebec. The media in Quebec are all separatists with some few honourable exceptions. Mr. Mulroney does what he likes, what they like, and therefore they support him.

No matter what he did, they would support him. However, it is not enough for him just to have the support of the separatist media in Quebec. It may be enough to do damage to other parties in Quebec, although we do not know what effect the Bloc Québecois may have.

• (2140)

He has lost all support in the west. His support in Ontario is very meagre. It is even more meagre in the Atlantic provinces, and he is thrashing about blindly doing all kinds of things the country does not want, insensitive to the people, so that his party, one of the two major parties in the country, is in disarray. We may have a future Parliament, the next one, without the possibility of forming a viable majority at a time when Canada will have to be negotiating with Quebec a new form of confederation or separation.

It is difficult when you have unstable situations such as the one created by Mr. Mulroney, and when you have a party that has participated with him in twisting the rules of Parliament, in abolishing the basic privileges of the minority. As Senator Stewart said, the important difference between tyranny and a democracy is that in a democracy the minority is protected by the rules. The majority does not need the rules; the minority does.

He has destabilized the country and is now on a kind of ego trip, a finishing ego trip, like a man who knows his life is going out of him and he gets into dreadful passions to satisfy his appetites for the last time before he expires.

I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Star on October 6:

> A western Tory who supports the goods and services tax sees his loyal riding executive ousted and replaced with an anti-GST slate.

Now, there are more examples I shall read to you presently, but if you are the Prime Minister of Canada and you know that you and the country are facing a major crisis two years down the road, and that there are serious, senior-level negotiations on the future structure of the country, then you should be careful about not destabilizing your party by following a policy that a large section of the country rejects. In fact, a majority of the country rejects it, and for good reason.

I will eventually speak on the GST, but there are numerous examples in this law which make it appear ridiculous, such as not taxing stock exchange transactions or caviar, which are generally purchased with the profits of those who are engaged in stock exchange transactions, but taxing a four ounce jar of yogurt that a pregnant mother might need to get her calcium supply. A similar tax applied in the same way in Britain has produced forty times more administrative costs for small businesses, and that is what this government is doing to the country. It is paying a price. It says in this article:

> Another Progressive Conservative backbencher attends a Reform party rally and sees several of his best workers in the crowd.
> Several MPs consider whether to leave the Tory caucus in Parliament and wonder aloud whether Prime Minister Brian Mulroney might step down before the next election, giving them at least a chance for survival.

To be succeeded by whom? By Mr. Wilson? By Mr. Wilson who has followed a policy to control inflation that enriches those who have money to lend, and breaks small business, reduces our exports, and deliberately drives the country into recession? In another context I will show you how, if he had followed reasonable policies, the national debt as at December, 1989 would have been $85 billion less than it is. But that is for another speech.

> It's tough being a Tory out West these days.
> The government's western power base is on extremely shaky ground.
> Of 24 Alberta Tory MPs, insiders say 20 could be wiped out in the next election.

● (2150)

> It seems the anti-Tory tide could sweep through British Columbia and rattle strongholds in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, as well.
> A group of Brian O'Kurley's constituents outside Edmonton asked him to vote against the GST. He voted for it.
> So in a raucous coup—

[Senator Gigantès.]

This is what is happening in one of the major pillars of the Canadian political system, the Tory party.

The article continues:

> So in a raucous coup, a group of Tories opposed to the tax packed a riding association meeting to overthrow O'Kurley's loyal riding executive.
>
> "We contacted him and told him if he wasn't going to change his position, we were going to run an executive slate that was anti-GST," says Dean Bell, the new association president. "That happened and the slate was elected."
> That means O'Kurley might not be able to win back his nomination to run in the next election, Bell says. Riding executives usually control who is nominated.
> "A lot of people are very, very disappointed that he would not support the demands and wishes of his constituency. He swallowed the party line on it. That's going to create a problem for him."
> The same fate nearly befell Red Deer Tory MP Doug Fee, but rather than see his riding executive overthrown, a meeting was cut short at the last minute. Constituents also tried to put pressure on Tory MP Louise Feltham (Wild Rose).

This is the result of the trickery, pressure tactics, hypocrisy and strutting of the Prime Minister. This is what the people of the country think about him. He is dishonouring his office; he is therefore dishonouring the whole concept of the Government of Canada at a time when we need a strong government, because we are facing within two years, if not earlier, a challenge to the institution that is Canada. This, just for the sake of a bad, bad bill.

This Prime Minister tells his appointee, Senator Charbonneau, "Break the rules." That is quite clear. The Speaker deprived some senators of the right to vote, something that was never done before, something that Speaker Sauvé did not do in the House of Commons—though the Liberals had the votes to do it—something that has never been done in a Parliament descended from the British House of Commons and House of Lords.

That was done just so Mr. Mulroney could have his way. Why? The GST, it is said, is revenue neutral. That was said on one occasion. On another occasion it was said that the GST was needed to fight the deficit. Which is it!

Not only do we have an apprentice sorcerer, but we have a prevaricating apprentice sorcerer. He says and unsays himself on every possible occasion. On how many occasions has he said one thing to the French CBC and turned around and said the opposite to the English CBC?

They presented the Meech Lake Accord in Quebec as a great instrument for increasing the powers of Quebec; to the rest of the country the said Meech Lake was nothing. This was Mr. Trudeau's basic objection. Mr. Trudeau objected to the Meech Lake Accord because it was bad law, because it was being interpreted in two different ways, and because it made the unsupportable assumption that one can deal with this basic issue with the most grievous wound to the body politic of Canada by pretense and by speaking with a forked tongue.

Mr. Trudeau has said there is only one solution, and that Quebecers have to choose whether they want to stay within Confederation, with all that it implies, or choose to leave. One cannot pretend one and the other, and Mr. Mulroney has gone around doing it.

It is a nice joke when Yvon Deschamps, the Quebec comedian, says that what Quebecers want is an independent Quebec within a strong united Canada. That is a nice joke, but it cannot be done. That is what Mr. Trudeau said in this place.

Of course, members opposite would not listen—at least, some of them.

To get the GST passed, Mr. Mulroney, because he is in his last throes and is on an ego trip, steps all over the liberties of the Senate. He destroys us. He takes away my right to vote. The country is on to him, though. They know what kind of a person he is. That is why we are told that the Reform Party is blossoming out west.

The article continues:

"(The party)—-

That is, the Tory Party:

> —is completely out of touch with what's happening. They're in a dream world. I've asked them what strategy they've got in Alberta to take on this Reform party because we're going to need one. They don't have one. I don't think they think it's serious."

That is a quote from Mr. Bell, a Tory party strategist.

The article continues:

> He says Reform leader Preston Manning appeals to westerners because he's not a "made in Ontario" leader, or one of "the great plastic type of individuals we get from central Canada . . . .Preston is a legitimate guy, a legitimate force."

I had not thought of Mr. Mulroney as being the "plastic type", but I daresay he is.

Prime Minister Mulroney is not a legitimate guy, and he proved that by this tactic of invoking Rule 15, which states that it is the duty of the Speaker "to preserve order and decorum." That was invoked when order and decorum were not being breached. The trap was set. We were told to come and vote at 5.30 p.m. Most of us were not here. I was up in Aylmer walking my dog in the woods. I had a cellular phone with me. The phone number is known. Nobody from the Speaker's office took the trouble to notify me. But when we were being invaded by a handful of Tamils, boy did I get telegrams and telephone calls! I was told "Come here and stop 114 people from taking over the country. This is a major crisis. We are getting an infusion of 114 brown-skinned people, only half of them male. They are going to dilute the purity of the Canadian breed." That is what we were told. That merited bringing us back, and we came back. Terrific!

There was a crisis at Oka this summer and Parliament was not recalled. The Prime Minister entered a war, in effect, in the Persian Gulf and did not recall Parliament. He uses cheap little tricks such as, "Let's stop the ships short of where they have to go, so that I can pretend that nothing happened before Parliament was recalled," which is the same sort of base mentality he exhibits when invoking Rule 15 and arguing, one way or another, Rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

That is why I feel degraded. Honourable senators, quite honestly, in the depths of my heart, I believe in my country. I love my country. I am sure honourable senators love their country. I am sure they are as patriotic as I am; but it is going down the tubes.

On Friday, when I was acting up and making a noise and doing all of the things I did, I was doing all of that because I felt desperate. I was doing that because I felt then and feel now that what is happening to us, and what Mulroney is doing to the institutions of the country and the trust that the country should have in its Prime Minister and does not—and rightly does not—is fatal to Canada. It is dreadful, dangerous and awful. We are about to lose one of the best political creations on earth. I was a foreign correspondent in 59 countries, and I do not know of a better country than Canada; but we are losing it because Mulroney has adopted the lexicon of the separatists. The separatists were in their right. It is their right; it is not the federal Prime Minister's right to talk like a separatist just to get his way. He is using the same tactic here in the Senate.

• (2200)

When Mr. Mulroney arrives home at 2, 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, he expects his servants to be lined up to tug at their forelock and say "Welcome, Master". This man has no pretence behind which to hide. The country knows what he is. That is why I hope that Senator Charbonneau stays in that Chair. Every time he sits in the Chair, one of us will express sadness, bitterness and despair—in my case it is despair—in some point of privilege. I wanted to settle in Canada, but I will settle in another country called Quebec. It will not be a choice of mine; it will be something Mulroney will have done to a country he took over and about which, in my view, he does not care at all. Most of the members opposite do care, but I do not think Mr. Mulroney does. I do not think he cares about anything except his cheap successes.

There have been others. When Mr. Chamberlain realized that his policies had failed the country and was asked to resign, he resigned, although he had the votes. I do not expect Mr. Mulroney or Speaker Charbonneau, who is his instrument, to have the decency to resign. I do not expect decency from this Prime Minister or from his instruments. I expected decency from many of the members opposite, but not if they are Mulroney's tools.

Does the GST justify trampling over the rights of the minority in Parliament? The Wilson legislation has nearly doubled the national debt and has not reduced unemployment. We are going to begin this recession with a higher level of unemployment than we had when we started the last one. The government thinks it is good to have areas of the country with unemployment above 10 per cent. It keeps the peasants docile and provides cheap pools of labour for the government's friends. This government is prepared to go to any length to pass any kind of legislation, even bad legislation like the GST. If it had the courage of its convictions and wanted to have a consumption tax of the value-added type, it could have designed a tax with no exceptions, complications or favours to stockbrokers from taxing their fees, if that is what it wanted. I still think it is a regressive tax, but the government prefers to do everything it can for its little friends. Everyone pays taxes except its friends.

When there was tax reform in the United States we were told that we had to have tax reform here too. What did the tax reform in the United States do? It reduced the number of taxation levels, but it also increased corporate taxation. Corporate taxation in the United States is several points higher than here, but one of the myths perpetrated by this government is that it is not myths prevarication. So taxation on corporate profits in the United States is higher than here. If we had taxed our corporate profits as high as they are taxed in the United States, and if we had interest rates as low as those in the United States, the national debt in December 1989 would have been $85 billion smaller. In another speech on another subject I will give you all the calculations in detail so that you can have them checked.

Could we do that without the money fleeing the country? According to Mr. Wilson, yes. He told the Wall Street Journal what a wonderful country this is to invest in. Of course it is. Compared to other countries we are one of the good places in which to park your money if you are rich. But do we have to have interest rates triple those of Japan and double those of Germany to help the government's rich friends and to afflict the poor with an indirect tax that will hit the necessities? That is illogical.

One wonders what kind of forbidden substances they were smoking when they composed this tax. If I grow raspberries and sell them, I am not taxed; but if someone wants to buy the bush on which I grew them, it will be taxed. So it goes on. It does not end. Why? Because the government started something from which it is impossible to retreat; because the pride and ego of this Prime Minister cannot stand being reasonable and will not even save his party from the wrath of the people. I would not mind except that we are in a circumstance where the future of the country will be decided in the next two years, and the head of the affairs in Ottawa is a man who only cares about his ego. That is why he will not make amendments to the GST. He will not improve the tax. He wants to ram it down the throat of the country and, in doing so, he breaks the rules of the Senate and turns the Speaker of the Senate into a shadow of what the Speaker should be—an instrument of prevarication, deception and trickery that are characteristic of this Prime Minister.

As I told you earlier, I feel despair and difficulty in understanding what is happening to this sweet country of mine and yours. I am sure that senators opposite, who see themselves as being patriotic, also worry about what he is saying. Don't shake your head, Senator Barootes. If you want, I will say "Let the record show that Senator Barootes shook his head in negation when I said that he was patriotic".

Senator Simard: Get back to your question of privilege!

Senator Gigantès: You heard Senator Pitfield yesterday. He said that if a vote had been taken, he might have voted on the Tory side. But you had to go and take his privilege away. You did not notify him. You played tricks on a man who was not involved in this debate, on a man who was going to vote with you.

• (2210)

Trickery comes before decency in anything Mulroney touches, in anything his instruments touch. My privilege was breached, as was that of other senators who were not here and who did not know that a vote was going to take place, because the mere ringing of the bells, according to the practices and procedures of the Senate, and according to the precedents, does not mean that a vote will take place immediately.

If the Speaker wants to change the rules to say that the vote will take place at such and such a time, then he should make sure that we all know that. He deliberately made sure that we did not know that.

Honourable senators, this is serious. Moreover, there are members of the Tory party who lie to the press about it, who try to hide it. People such as Mr. Andre and Mr. Wilson have in the past participated in the ringing of bells. At one time they made them ring for 15 days and they got what they wanted. The Liberal government split the national energy policy bill into eight parts. It realized that the minority had a case, that it was making it and that it was determined. The government decided that perhaps it should give a little, and it did.

They called the Liberals arrogant, but we had the vote then. We could simply have steamrollered the Tories, but we did not. Senators opposite did. The Speaker did not care one whit about anything other than his boss' ego. For the ego of one man, Mr. Mulroney, this country is going down the tubes.

Honourable senators, my privilege has been affected twice: once by denying me my vote, and again by endangering my country and by making me ashamed when I am abroad to discuss its affairs. I shut up. I daren't speak because I cannot talk in praise of my government. I have to keep my mouth shut.

Honourable senators, there are fine Tories. I though that Mr. Clark was a fine Tory and I still think so. I do not think Mr. Mulroney is. I do not think his instruments in this chamber are. But there are fine Tories on the other side.

Senator Simard: Name a few!

Senator Gigantès: Senator Balfour, for one. I think Senator Beaudoin is a fine gentleman.

Senator Simard: Who else?

Senator Gigantès: I like Senator Marshall and the lady in green over there—she is a very fine person.

Senator Cools: She is smiling.

Senator Cogger: You are better with the Bible!

Senator Gigantès: Well, you are going to get some of the Bible in a minute, because there are things I have to say about my privilege that are best expressed in the words of the Good Book. It would be a good idea if you people read it; and when I start reading, it will be a good idea if you listen. As you know, I have a voice that carries. You can cut off my microphone—as you would be ready to do—but my voice will still carry.

Senator Barootes: Cut it off!

Senator Gigantès: I am surprised. You know, Staff, I think you are a good man—

Senator Cools: Greek to Greek—the Greeks are at it again.

Senator Gigantès: Despite your posturing, I think deep in your heart you are a good guy.

Senator Cools: Very deep!

Senator Gigantès: I like Senator Finlay MacDonald. He is a good guy.

Senator MacDonald: Sometimes you have to die before you are thought to be a good guy!

Senator Gigantès: Never mind, I still like him, despite what he did to my sister-in-law.

Senator Cools: We want to hear this!

Senator Gigantès: There was no breach to my privilege in what he did to my sister-in-law, because I did not have any privilege— he did.

Honourable senators, here I am—I laugh for fear of weeping, in the words of Beaumarchais. This country is in mortal danger. If its central institution, which is Parliament, is attacked, then the danger is increased. Senators opposite make fighting against this danger difficult.

Oh, Doctor Keon, you are fine, too.

Honourable senators, absolutely none of this was necessary; but we came to a point where we knew that time after time the government was going to refuse reasonable proposals.

Take the refugee bill, for example. There were Tory senators on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs who were appalled by some of the provisions of that bill. Would the government listen? No, because Mr. Mulroney's ego is more important than the country; and there are some senators opposite who have subjected themselves to that ego when the country's existence and interests are more important. Those who have done that do not care. They do not care any more than does Mr. Mulroney. He will leave this country, will go to work somewhere for some foreign corporation and will be called "The Right Honourable" around boardrooms, while we are left to pick up the pieces.

When there is a crisis, such as separation, unfortunately it is the hotheads who will rule on both sides. Civility will have disappeared, and Mulroney will have done that. There will be putative Robespierres, St-Justes, Dumoulins and Maras on the Quebec side and there will be the beheaders of kings on the English side. The two parts of Canada will tear one another apart and the mean-minded ones will hold sway.

Honourable senators, my country is going to be taken away from me by this man Mulroney because of his ego. He could have been a good Prime Minister. He could have run the country well. He could have, for God's sake, defended federalism at least once in Quebec. Not one member of the Mulroney cabinets has defended the concept of federalism in Quebec. Those senators opposite who believe in Canadian federalism must ask themselves whether they can find one occasion when Benoit Bouchard or Lucien Bouchard or any of the separatist ministers defended federalism.

It is a defensible concept. It works. I say to my separatist friends and relatives that, yes, I came here in 1956, and, sure, Quebec was backward compared with, say, Ontario. But from observing things I have to conclude that it was not anyone's fault except that of the elite of Quebec. Once Quebecers decided to improve their estate, they did so. Nobody stopped them.

Quebecers nationalized anglophone power companies and nobody stopped them. They created the Caisse de Dépot, which is the biggest player on the stock markets of Canada and one of the biggest in the world, and nobody stopped them. They educated themselves and transformed themselves into powerful, energetic business people. They have done things which Quebec had not done before—good things—and nobody stopped them. And they did those things under this federal system of ours.

Is this not worth the support of a Prime Minister of Canada, the federal Prime Minister? Would that not have been the attitude to take, instead of bleating that if the rest of Canada rejected Meech Lake it meant that it feels contempt for Quebec? Saying that to people who wanted to hear it, to the separatists, created a self-fulfilling prophesy by pushing the negotiations over Meech Lake in such a way that they became intolerable.

Worse still, here comes the apprentice sorcerer.

● (2220)

When you go into battle, you are supposed to have fall-back positions, you are supposed to have reserves, you are supposed to know from where you retreat, where you can regroup, and where your ammunition dumps are. When he was going into a battle over Meech Lake, did he not realize that Mr. Trudeau would oppose it, that others would oppose it, and that there were academics on record against such things who would speak out, who would be published, and who might arouse a segment of public opinion to side with them against Mr. Mulroney? As a good field commander, should he not have foreseen this, and, for the sake of the country, have had a fall-back position? He did not.

When I was a young journalist I used to ask people about Chiang Kai-Shek. They described to me how his wife's family had stolen $6 billion. I used to ask if he were a fool or a knave—there is no other choice. Either he knew about it and participated and therefore he was a knave, or he did not know about it, and he was a fool. Now, you make your choice.

In so many instances, especially Meech Lake, was Mr. Mulroney a fool or a knave? You answer that for yourselves. Would you have run the operation in the same way? Would you not have foreseen the problems, so that you would not find yourself in such a mess that your ego would not allow you to retreat on anything else; and would you have tried to push this absurd and badly constructed tax through, even though it meant that your party was being decimated out west, in the Maritimes, and in Ontario, and that you had the support only of Quebec, because naturally the Nationalists, the Separatists, thought you were a precious asset?

They love what you are doing, Mr. Mulroney, because you are destroying the country for them. You brought in a Trojan horse filled with their people, and it is their right to be in the Trojan horse; but you should not have made the mistake of Priam, of Troy, and brought in the horse. You should have had the foresight, Mr. Prime Minister, not to get yourself into that hole, into that trap, so that a man with your ego—and all people who go that high have egos—would not have to satisfy this ego, staunch the blood that is flowing from it, by going ahead with a suicidal policy that the majority of the country does not want. And to do it, he resorts—through Senator Charbonneau, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and with the Honourable Harvie Andre and the Honourable Michael Wilson pulling the strings for Mulroney—to this cheap little trick, a trick that would have made the Tories and the press howl, had we pulled it.

An. Hon. Senator: Who is the puppet master?

Senator Gigantès: Mulroney is the puppet master. Harvie Andre is the sub-puppet master; he is one of the strings. The fellow who pulls them ultimately is Mulroney himself. Like all the other things he has done, he did it like an inept, duplicitous apprentice sorcerer. Senators have seen Fantasia. There is Mickey. His boss is out and he musters the brooms and the buckets and then he does not know how to stop them. The music is gorgeous, the scene is a lesson, and Mickey is the Prime Minister. Alas, for my poor country, I have him as your Prime Minister. He does not know his elbow from his wallet. Perhaps that is wrong, he knows his wallet, that's for sure—he is a Tory. But he does not know his elbow from his ear. No, I was not going to use bad words. I will leave those to you, senator.

We have to salvage the self-image of the Prime Minister. In the morning he looks at himself in the mirror, at this enormous expanse of chin with a cleft that must be a problem to shave, and he says, "Mirror, mirror on the wall, who is the greatest in the land? Am I not better than Pierre Elliott Trudeau?" And the mirror blows a raspberry! So the great Prime Minister has to get some satisfaction by beating up on the Senate—an easy target, because the press does not like the Senate.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The press is anti-establishment, especially the English-speaking press. They are all descendants intellectually of people who left Britain to come to the colonies because they could not stand the repression of their natural talents by a class structure. The good Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George-Etienne Cartier produced the Senate. They actually said that it was a Canadian version of the House of Lords. All these people who came over here blew up. They had run away from Britain to escape the House of Lords and here suddenly they took a bunch of beaten-down Tories, and some Liberals of the George Brown variety—which is today's Tory—and produced a Canadian Senate. They had to, of course. I have written this somewhere, but I had better repeat it.

They were learned men, Sir George-Etienne Cartier, and Sir John A. Macdonald, who is my hero in Canadian history, and they knew about Athenian democracy on which this country's Constitution is based, as I will show you shortly. In Athens there was an institution called a "scapegoat". It was a real goat, and when things went badly they actually lapidated the goat and it fled. In fleeing, it was thought that it took the evil spirits along with it and liberated the city from the anger of the gods.

So Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George-Etienne Cartier said that we should have a scapegoat as a kind of national animal, and put a snappy little uniform on it with a coat of arms. Then they thought that Queen Victoria was the head of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and they said, "Well, let's have a Senate instead," only we cannot be stoned because we have to stay sober for our second thoughts. That is why we were created.

We were created, allegedly, to protect the interests of the rich. That is the biggest joke of all, because the rich can hire lawyers, lobbyists and buy newspapers—look at the Tory side—and they defend themselves very well, thank you.

Occasionally the Senate has dared oppose a Prime Minister or two. The Liberal Senate opposed Trudeau on Bill C-60. How many bills did we question? With how many bills did we make any trouble for them?

Senator Hébert: Eighteen were amended.

Senator Gigantès: Eighteen were amended and they accepted the amendments. Therefore the Senate has some use, even in their eyes. How many are we stopping, allegedly, or delaying unconscionably?

Senator Hébert: Three.

Senator Gigantès: Three out of a total of how many?

Senator Hébert: Three hundred and eighteen.

Senator Gigantès: Three out of a total of 318, this is total obstruction of government business? Poor Mr. Mulroney. One cannot even pull one whisker out of that gigantic chin of his without making him bleed. This ego that walks like a man, this unconscionable destroyer of my country, abuses my privilege by getting Senator Charbonneau and Senator Murray to deny me the vote.

• (2230)

Senator Forrestall: What are you talking about?

Senator Gigantès: That is to deny me the vote that I have according to—

Senator Forrestall: That is Senator Charbonneau!

Senator Gigantès:—the rules of this house. He even denies my privilege by appointing Senator Forrestall here. That is a denial to everyone's privilege!

Senator Cogger: Let us get back to the battle!

Senator Gigantès: He came and said to me that I was inaccurate—a liar, actually—in saying that I was prevented from voting. I was prevented from voting, because to vote I have to know there will be a vote; I have to know that there is a change in the rules. I was not notified of the change in the rules.

Senator Forrestall: You were told before you left!

Senator Gigantès: You did not notify me.

Senator Forrestall: I watched you—

Senator Gigantès: Senator Charbonneau knows that he did not notify me. Senator Forrestall does not know a thing.

Senator Cools: He is a new boy.

Senator Lucier: He is a new boy from through the tunnel!

Senator Gigantès: Never mind. Come on, let us not get to the new boy, because we will get to the "new boy" statement from Senator Walker, who approached me in the foyer when I was a new boy here myself. He was berating me. He said, "Why don't you shut up, new boy?" I said, "Senator, how very wonderful! To be called "new" anything at 61 is a benediction from the Gods. But to be called a "boy" is even better. It reminds me of that aura of testosterone which once enveloped me, and must have enveloped you, too, before the First World War."

Senator Cogger: Let us get to the New Testament!

Senator Gigantès: That was Senator Walker, of beloved memory.

Of course, I miss Senator Flynn genuinely, because Senator Flynn is a genuine man, a gentleman, a patriot, and a heckler whom you will never equal.

Senator Simard: He is coming back!

Senator Gigantès: You will never equal him. You are not fit, as a heckler, to tie his shoe laces! You are an infinite speck of dust compared to thet major planet he was in the heckling department. You are a nothing in that department, because you do not have the vocabulary, you do not have the thought, you do not have the culture, you do not have the enormous memory; and you do not have the legal talents. All you can do is gesture. Yes, I am a Greek and I use my hands. If I did not use them, your ladies would be less happy!

An Hon. Senator: Whom are you talking about?

Senator Gigantès: I am talking about my dear Senator Simard over there, the fellow who used to victimize the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Cools: You mean derailed him!

Senator Gigantès: This Prime Minister, for reasons that are—

Senator Simard: Defective!

Senator Gigantès: —too despicable to consider, is on his last legs. Therefore he cannot bear any reverse. He is a small man.

Senator Simard: You figured that out, did you?

Senator Gigantès: Anyone who contradicts him and causes him any need to retreat at all is affecting his sense of self. When he looks at himself in the mirror every morning it must be a long session because there is a lot of chin to shave. This man suffers. He adores adulation. He does not have it anymore. He is hated around the country. That is a burden he cannot bear. So what does he do? He picks on the Senate. Why does he pick on the Senate? Because we have the press, who think that an elected body should not exist. Fine, abolish the damn thing! If you do not want it, abolish it! There are provisions for abolishing it.

Senator Lucier: Or elect it!

Senator Gigantès: There was an opportunity to negotiate an abolition or the election of senators during the Meech Lake Accord. There was not even a serious attempt to do that—none at all. So the Senate was kept and its functions were reaffirmed. In the discussions on Meech Lake, in the 1982 Constitution it is there; it has a role. Honourable senators opposite and we here have been appointed to play this role. If the press does not like it, too bloody bad! They can go on campaigning for the abolition of this chamber.

Senator Simard: We know why you were appointed.

Senator Gigantès: I personally have often printed the opinion that we should be elected or abolished; but until we are abolished or turned into an elected chamber we have a job to do and we are doing it.

You cannot have democracy without two parties. A one-party democracy is not democracy; it is an African dictatorship.

Senator Cools: You mean a banana republic!

Senator Gigantès: If you have two parties, you have an Opposition party. The duty of an Opposition party is to oppose a self-satisfying, deceptive, apprentice sorcerer who is destroying the country. That is what we are doing.

Senator Simard: That man is crazy! He is.

Senator Gigantès: He has breached my privilege by using Senator Lowell Murray and Senator Charbonneau to abridge my right to vote to change the rules, customs and procedures of the Senate, which have been described; and then Article I, which states that the procedures that are in the appendix should be observed, is quoted by them to mean the opposite of what it says. They forget page 70 of our rules. They do something that the Liberals had the decency not to do in 1982 during the ringing of the bells, which was orchestrated at the time by Lowell Murray, who was one of the backroom boys of the Tory party.

Senator Cools: He never told me!

Senator Simard: Did he do that?

Senator Gigantès: It was that kind of thing. He is the kind of person who thinks along those lines, except perhaps he is a little less devious than Mr. Mulroney. He is more linear, more the plodding type.

Senator Simard: How generous of you!

Senator Gigantès: He sets his head down and charges toward an absolutely runious objective—Senator Lowell Murray.

Senator Stewart: Surely it was Harvie Andre who moved the motion.

Senator Gigantès: But Lowell Murray he probably advised him. Look at the way that he handled Meech Lake. Dirty little tricks were being pulled in order to have people go out of their heads with fury at being manipulated. But there their best laid plans went awry. They were unable to manage even their own policy. They were unable to design a value-added consumption tax that makes any sense. To get that opprobrium, that obsenity of legislation, through, they abridged our right to vote.

Even if they wanted to do that, they should have said, "We will hold the vote when we have notified all the senators, willy-nilly" Senator Charbonneau could have done that. But, of course he did not. That would not have been a despicable enough trick—at least not as despicable as the one he pulled. That would not have been a Lowell Murray trick; that would not have been a Harvie Andre trick;and that would not have been a Michael Wilson trick.

Senator Simard: Can I ask a question?

Senator Gigantès: Especially that would not have been the trick of their mentor, their master, their puppeteer, Brian Mulroney, the uncontrollable ego that is ruining this country.

No; you may not ask a question—

Senator Simard: How many times were you elected?

Senator Gigantès: —because it will be a question that truly reflects your lack of feeling—

Senator Simard: If Senator Murray were not elected, how many times were you elected?

Senator Gigantès: —and understanding about what is happening in our country—

Senator Simard: Were you ever elected dogcatcher?

Senator Gigantès: That would demonstrate that your Prime Minister, the Honourable Mr. Hatfield, made one of his greatest mistakes in appointing you. That is why New Brunswick's economy did not take off while you were Minister of Finance.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Simard: How many times were you elected anywhere?

Senator Cools: He is a man of the future!

Senator Gigantès: At least my dog loves me. I have that certitude.

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: I consider the love of my dog more important than your esteem of me. That does not mean that I could bury him with you. I would not do that to the dog.

• (2240)

My privileges were breached. I was denied my right to vote. The rules were changed on me. I was not notified. My cellular phone was in my pocket, and it was on. I could have been called. I would have been here in 20 minutes. A telegram was not sent to me. Yet I was sent a telegram about the Tamils. Senator Pitfield, who was going to vote with you, was not notified. After all, that would have been the straight thing to do. It would not have been the crooked type of thing that Prime Minister Mulroney loves to do. It is something that he wallows in. He is seditious. His role is that of federal Prime Minister, and he does not defend federalism when it is being attacked within one of the provinces of the country. The attackers have the right. They are doing what is their democratic right. By his oath of office the Prime Minister of Canada has, as his duty, to defend Canada, and he does not do so.

Senator Simard: You said that 45 minutes ago.

Senator Gigantès: It is so heavy on my heart that I am going to say it again, again and again. You sit there, trying to interrupt, and you laugh while the country is going down the tubes. It is all because of people like you, people who allow themselves to be manipulated by a man who is destroying the country.

Senator Cogger: Why should we take you seriously now?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Cogger, people are known by the enemies they keep. If you and Senator Simard are my enemies, then I can't be all bad.

I was told that Mr. Mulroney once said to someone that he was going to abolish the Senate and get rid of that goddamn Greek—I didn't know that he disliked Senator Barootes that much! I hope that Mr. Mulroney does dislike me. It makes me feel better about myself to know that a man who has such a lack of qualities and such an ego dislikes me. That is the most flattering thing that could be said to me.

I have been in a rage ever since you started the dismantling of this country. What you did in depriving me of my vote was the culmination of a process which could only lead, because of the ineptitude of your Prime Minister and his principal ministers, to the disaster of Meech Lake, and therefore to a situation in which a man of uncontrollable ego could do nothing else but sacrifice the country. You would not listen.

As a result of the free trade agreement we have lost 165,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector alone. There was a promise that there would be relocation and retraining programs, that people who lost jobs would be taken care of.

Senator Barootes: Then pass Bill C-21.

Senator Gigantès: Staff, please. Do I attack you when you speak?

Senator Barootes: Frequently!

Senator Gigantès: Not I. Others do. I always look upon you with affection and some sympathy, no matter what you say. I have met your wife. She is a long-suffering but great lady. I admire your taste in marrying her, and I admire her tolerance in her having stayed married to you. She is an absolutely wonderful lady. I applaud you for your taste, but, beyond that, do not talk about my privileges which your party has infringed. I had a right to vote and you took it away from me. Senator Forrestall, your voters—your electors—took your vote away from you in the House of Commons. They did not re-elect you.

• (2250)

Senator Forrestall: When I hear the truth coming from you, then I will listen to you, but not until.

Senator Gigantès: This is another person whose antipathy towards me makes me feel good.

Senator Forrestall: Do not talk to me about experience, sir.

Senator Gigantès: I do not want to talk to you about anything, sir. In fact, the less I hear from you and the less chances I have to address you, the better I shall feel. Who wants to know you? I do not, and most people do not.

Senator Forrestall: Get elected to the House of Commons and see how long you last there.

Senator Gigantès: I could last as long as you, sir, if I wanted to. One reason why I would not want to go to the House of Commons is because I would not want to be with you and some of the Tories there. I have been with some of them on trips and was shamed because of their drunkenness.

Senator Forrestall: You are an abomination.

Senator Gigantès: We have privileges. This house is to make observations, revise, amend, and block. The Constitution gives us this right, except in constitutional matters, where we can delay for only six months. We cannot increase a money bill. We can amend it or decrease it to save money for the government. We can attempt to protect the afflicted—the poor and the unemployed. It is our duty. Those who say we are unelected should also say that the Supreme Court is unelected. That is what they said in California; so now they elect the Supreme Court. When they did not like the Chief Justice—a very distinguished and handsome Chief Justice of the opposite sex—they voted her out, because she was not following Tory policies sufficiently. In this country we are more civilized than in California and we have an appointed Supreme Court. It wields much power. They have the right to wield that power. Who gives them the right? The laws of the land. The Constitution is part of the laws of the land. The Constitution gives us the right to do what we are doing.

Senator Charbonneau wanted to take that right away from us. Is it any wonder that we are enraged? Is it any wonder that our anger has overflowed? Is it any wonder that we will continue to feel bitter and in a cold furry every time we lay our eyes on Senator Charbonneau or Senator Murray, who pulled the strings third removed: The Prime Minister, Harvie Andre or Michael Wilson.

Senator Stewart: That is getting pretty low down, is it not?

Senator Gigantès: Charbonneau is pretty low down.

Senator Stewart: I mean Murray.

Senator Gigantès: Murray is pretty low down too, but not quite as low down as Charbonneau.

Senator Charbonneau had a duty as Speaker to protect the rules or, if he tried to break them, to do it decently, and not to play dirty little tricks à la Mulroney. The position of Speaker corresponds, in sport terms, to a referee of sorts. A Speaker of the Senate has less power than a hockey referee. Nevertheless, if the person charged with a role that approaches that of a referee breaks the rules and shows enormous partiality, the very institution that he represents is diminished.

Senator Ottenheimer is sitting in the Speaker's Chair. I like Senator Ottenheimer, and I often tell him that. However, that very Chair he is sitting in has been dishonoured and diminished by Senator Charbonneau. Therefore, Senator Ottenheimer is diminished by sitting in that Chair, as he is diminished by the way he used the arguments in the book. He is too intelligent not to know that he used those arguments in a specious manner in order to help set up this trick that was perpetrated on the rights and privileges of this great institution, the Senate of Canada. Why? It was not to save the country or prevent defeat in a war; it was not to put a stop to some great injustice. It was to preserve the ego of Brian Mulroney. Is it worth the honour of the Speakership, and worth the possibility of this institution to give good advice, to put all that at peril because of one man's uncontrollable ego, because of one man's ineptitude and the ineptitude of his team? Two privileges of mine were abrogated. The first is my right to vote, which, Lord knows, we may need. The second is the destruction of my country. Those of you who have been associated with this dirty trick are associated with the destruction of the country because you are supporting someone—perhaps out of loyalty—who does not deserve support. You are doing it in a manner that is unworthy of this institution, that is especially unworthy of the title and role of Speaker.

The Leader of the Government has a partisan position, so he is more tricky than most. However, the Speaker cannot be tricky. He does not have the right to be tricky. It is the Speaker's trick that is the most despicable aspect of what happened in the last few days. That is what sent this side of the house into a rage of sorrow and indignation. I did not enjoy it, as I am sure you did not. It was not a pleasant experience. Friday was a day I would like to forget, but you had left us no other weapon. You forced us to behave like fourth graders in order to stop an indignity that you were perpetrating shamelessly on the Parliament of Canada. You did not care. You had to support Mr. Mulroney. I think you are wrong. You made me behave in a way that I am ashamed to remember. You left me no choice. There was no other way of forcing you, as we did at the end of the day, to make some small concession. You were prepared to give Mr. Mulroney his victory to repair his damaged ego. That kind of ego feeds upon itself. It wants ever new victories. It will end up destroying the country.

● (2300)

All of you who did not stand up in your caucus and say to Prime Minister Mulroney, "No, we can't do things like that", bear a major responsibility for what has happened here, for what has happened to the country, and for the disrespect this institution has now incurred as a result of your denying us our legitimate weapons and forcing us into using whatever was at hand to try to regain some hold on those weapons. Some of you, I am sure, are ashamed; others probably are not. For those of you who are ashamed and who regret what has happened, I feel sympathy and respect. For the others, I feel pity, and for the Speaker and the Leader of the Government in this house I feel cold fury and an inability to forgive that is almost equal to the inability I have to ever forgive Mulroney for what he has done here and what he has done successively. He has used the drug bill to exacerbate feelings in Quebec; he has bumbled the negotiations on the Free Trade Agreement, and he did not tell the truth. If he had come up and said, "Look, the Americans are on a rampage; they are going to screw us unless we try to find some accommodation. We are in danger of our lives with them commercially speaking," that would have been different; but, no, this agreement was the perfect thing, Mulroney said.

There was Senator Murray saying that we have binding arbitration. Article 2011 of the Free Trade Agreement says that if one of the two parties feels some privilege it had expected has not been realized, then that party can ask for arbitration. When the arbitrators give the result, if the party against whom they have found refuses to apply what the arbiters say, the disobeying party can be fined by the other party an amount equivalent to the injury. Here we have an elephant and a mouse. If the arbitrator finds in the mouse's favour—that is us—and the elephant does not comply, the mouse may kick the elephant. In the reverse case the elephant may kick the mouse. We were told that we nad binding arbitration. However, the government knew that it wasn't true. They knew, as we all knew, that when they went down to negotiate there was already an agreement—albeit unpublished—that we would keep our dollar at a level that would damage our exports. The conversation was quite simple. Mr. Baker probably took Mr. Wilson aside and said, "Look, this thing won't fly, if you lower your dollar and let it fall sufficiently so that our manufacturers will find that your products are damaging them."

Was the government candid? Did they explain things? No, it lied, and it has been like that all along—a lack of candor, a lack of sincerity and a disregard for everything except the ego of the Prime Minister. The chickens are coming home to roost. Mark me, he will pay for it. He is already paying for it out in the west.

[Senator Gigantès.]

However, at this time when, Lord help us, we need even Mulroney, he is destroying himself. For the next two years we will have a Prime Minister who has no consideration in the eyes of any Canadians except the small, unregenerate 15 per cent who support the Tories, who are so unreconstructed that they cannot appreciate the catastrophe, who vote out of habit or who dislike us Liberals and cannot possibly consider doing anything but vote Tory, although the Reform Party will probably absorb many of them. When we need in this country a federal government that is strong enough to manage the transition that Quebec will demand, we have a government that has destroyed itself through trickery, through lack of candor, and through trying to play this nasty cheap little manoeuvre involving the Speaker of one of the Houses of Parliament in a cheap, dirty little transaction. How cheap can one get? How low, to take the Chair in which you are sitting, Senator Ottenheimer, and make it an instrument of political manipulation? Is this what the Parliament of Canada has been brought down to by Prime Minister Mulroney?

The press will not listen to us. It does not care. It has this fixation that we are unelected and that, therefore, it does not matter what we say. However, that does not stop us from saying it. We have a need to say it, and we have a need to make sure that those of you who stay here—even those of you who are falling asleep—hear it. I have a voice that can wake the dead if I have to, and we will all be dead as a nation because of your Prime Minister, because of his cavalier attitude toward my privileges and the privileges of other Canadians.

I find what is happening distressing and unbelievable. I have travelled the world as a foreign correspondent and I have seen many other countries. I knew I had fallen in love with Canadians during World War II. To me, Canadians were the finest people I had ever met, anglophone and francophone alike. I had read about Canadian society and it seemed to me that it represented one of the best efforts of mankind to reach an accommodation not based on narrow ethnicity, not based on impossible factional fights, a nation that was moving toward a generous system that protected the poor, a nation in which each part of the country cared for other parts of the country. I admired that. I thought this was a wonderful country.

I just cannot believe the behaviour of Mr. Mulroney, this man who gave his hand to Joe Clark in 1983 and said in front of the cameras, "I swear eternal allegiance to my leader and I am behind him all the way." Yes, with a knife in his hand he was behind him all the way. He then declared in 1983, during the leadership campaign, that a Free Trade Agreement with the United States would be fatal for this country. What does he do when he gets into power? He sticks us with one. Why? Because it was good for his American friends who wanted unlimited access to our natural resources, and unrestricted rights for American investors in Canada to be able to buy anything without any conditions whatsoever, so that all the research would move south of the border. This man said that there was a need for this country to increase its spending on research, and then he has turned around and reduced it. Prevarication, misleading, lies, dirty tricks, empty posturing, the cheap trick of having the Estimates printed and saying that they were not printed, and on and on it goes. In 1982 we had an example of the House of Commons being restricted in its voting. The Liberals had the vote but they respected the existing rules. They could have done exactly what Speaker Charbonneau did, but they did not. Instead they negotiated and reached an agreement to change the rules; but there was discussion, negotiation and agreement. There was not the arrogant, stubborn, blind strutting of the Prime Minister which has tainted this chamber and which has tainted the country.

• (2310)

That is why 90 per cent of the people in British Columbia have rejected him. In Alberta he comes after "others" in the polls. In the Maritimes he is sinking into the sea. In Ontario he is not doing much better. He is only doing well with the separatists, because he has cultivated them for six years and neglected to defend this country, and that is a breach of my privilege. I will never be able to say it enough. I will never be able to get rid of my anger. It is not right for a prime mininster to show so much dishonesty.

A democracy has to be based on some civility. You must not drive the opposition to despair; you must at least allow them some face-saving. There was an occasion when King Victor Emmanuel, the little King of Italy who was in power during Mussolini's time, brought out his handkerchief and dropped it by mistake. Mussolini picked it up and said, "Your Majesty, may I keep it as a keepsake?" The King said, "Please, I need it to hide my face." Mussolini gave him the handkerchief. Mr. Mulroney would not have that generosity; he would not understand. It is a shame that you have followed his instincts, his cheap little victories, preferably with nasty little tricks, preferably by trying to get around a situation and using anything at all to win.

I do not think he knows the difference between truth and untruth. If he did he would not have told so many untruths, or perhaps he does know the difference, and that is worse because he lies to us deliberately or he lies to us because he has no sense of truth. I come back to the question: Is he a fool, is he a knave, is he amoral or immoral?

He is a deeply dangerous man, because he has some talents but they are all the wrong talents. He can organize a conspiracy in his own party. He can find temporary allies and he grabs at them; but when it comes to a long-term plan, and when it comes to knowing what is a good fall-back position, he does not know a damn thing, and that is why the country is in trouble.

There is a monument to my father in Greece. He commanded the Greek commands who liberated the Greek islands. Those islands were occupied by 10,000 Germans and 10,000 Italians. My father's unit had 1,000 men. They inflicted casualties on the Germans which left 5,000 of them dead. On the back of the monument are the names of my father's subordinates who were killed—only 19 died. He knew how to plan and he knew how to prepare withdrawal positions. He cared about his fighters and he did not want to lose them. They were his friends; they were his people. With Mr. Mulroney, history will say that this was a man whose ego blinded him so much that he cared about nothing; a man who would trick; a man who would get good people as well as bad people to do his bidding and to do wrong—to do the wrong thing for the country.

The immorality of it all grabs at my innards. I keep saying to myself that he took something sacred away from me as a parliamentarian—he took away my vote. He tricked me into going away. According to the procedures and practices of the Senate, I believed that I could go away to my house and, if there were to be a change in those practices, that I would be notified; but no, I was not.

Senator Simard: Sit down!

Senator Gigantès: If you will accompany me, sir, I will have my dog bite you.

[Translation]

Honourable senator, just follow me, and my dog will bite that part of your body where your brain seems to be. I would like to read something. I will translate as I go along, this is an English text . . .

Hon. G. Eymard Corbin: In Greek!

Senator Gigantès: Unfortunately, I don't think Greek is allowed in this Chamber. I have to speak either English or French. I know French better than you do. My accent is better, and my grammar and spelling as well.

Senator Simard: In French!

• (2320)

[English]

Senator Gigantès: Any exercise in policy making—

Senator Simard: En français!

Senator Gigantès: You are not going to dictate to me what I am going to do. If you wish to speak Patagonian I will be quite happy, but I am speaking in any language I choose.

Senator Simard: En français!

Senator Gigantès: I will get to French in just a moment. Any exercise in policy-making benefits from an understanding of how we have been doing things, of preachments that have been pounded into our heads.

[Translation]

Theories that were held up as being literally gospel truth, a trick egotists use to justify their actions, but as they say, if you want a tree to grow, it helps to know where the roots are.

Therefore, with your leave or without it, Senator Simard, I would like to look at democracy at its inception, six centuries before the birth of Christ.

Democracy sets the power of numbers against the power of the purse. That is true today and it was true in 594 B.C., in Athens, where democracy began.

At the time, Athens was the capital of Attica, a small rocky peninsula which is about 60 per cent of the area of Prince Edward Island.

Senator Simard: Not worth talking about.

Senator Gigantès: And almost half the east coast of Greece. All the good farmland was owned by the rich who called themselves the well-born. Poor farmers had land that was less productive. The landless peasants worked as sharecroppers on the lands of the rich. I am translating in case your knowledge of English is not too good. If the harvest failed because of a lack of rain or a plague of insects or some kind of blight, the poor farmers did not have enough food and borrowed money from the rich by mortgaging their land. If the next harvest failed as well, the poor farmers lost their land. The landless peasants employed by the rich also had to borrow money. They did so with themselves and their family as collateral. If the crops failed twice in succession, they became slaves.

It was not a good system. The slaves didn't like it, obviously. They could be sold, and their wives and children could be sold separately. It was not a very good arrangement for the rich either, something they do not often realize. Before the slave became a slave, he had money to buy from the rich. However, when he lost his freedom and became a slave, he did not earn wages and could no longer buy from the rich, which means the rich lost their customers.

There was a large number of slaves who remembered how wonderful freedom was. So they rebelled. Their masters had shields, swords, lances, and horses, and considered they were superior in the military sense to their slaves. However, they could be ambushed and killed with stones or from a distance with sling shots and arrows. And then suddenly, both rich and poor had a brainstorm.

[English]

Suddenly, all of them, the rich and the poor alike, suffered a strange attack of common sense and decided it was better to stop shedding blood and to agree on someone to find a peaceful solution. By common consent they chose Solon, one of the beautiful and the well-born, a man respected by rich and poor alike for his knowledge, intelligence, honesty and reason. They offered to make him dictator, but he refused. He would consider being an arbitrator, he said, only if the Oracle of Delphi told him so. The Oracle said, "Pilot the ship, Solon. Steer the middle way. Athenians hope it is you who will hold sway." If you want the Greek, I can recite it to you.

We do not know why the warring factions showed sense and decided that continued fighting was pointless. Maybe the rich realized they needed their labour force alive rather than dead. This is related to the protection of the minority, as you will see, and to my privilege that has been infringed. Maybe the poor realized, too, that too many of them might be killed before they managed to kill all the rich in the land. At any rate, Solon could not have been appointed had the leaders of the poor not seen that some rich men were reasonable and wanted agreement, not strife.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (2330)

Solon cancelled all debts, including huge debts owed to him personally. The poor peasants who had lost their land to the rich creditors recovered their fields. The even poorer sharecroppers, who had become slaves of the rich, recovered their freedom. Never again, Solon decreed, would a man be enslaved for non-payment of debt.

He gave the poor a vote equal to that of the rich in the Assembly of All of the People, in which the poor were the majority. This was in 594 B.C. There are still, to this day, people who think that one's voting qualifications should have something to do with the amount of money one has in the bank.

Solon gave the Assembly supreme authority on all political decisions and made it the Supreme Court of the land, in which the verdict was decided by a majority vote of citizens. To deal with the day-to-day detail of matters that the Assembly could consider, Solon established the Boulé, the precursor to today's House of Commons. It consisted of 400 members, 100 representatives from each of the old tribes. Retired politicians and notables sat as members of the Athenian Senate, indulging in sober second thought.

That is where the expression comes from.

But Solon did not confiscate the lands of the rich, as the poor demanded. He left to the rich all the prestigious, unpaid and essentially powerless titles. He further decreed—-and this is important—that a bystander seeing a man wronged could sue the wrongdoer. This is a third party, seeing a man wronged. That is an important principle, that being that we all have a duty to all citizens.

Solon wanted the citizens to feel responsible for one another's well-being. That is essential to democracy. He said that the best state is one in which even those who have not themselves been wronged defend those who have.

He had his laws, his Charter of Rights and Freedoms, carved upon tablets that were displayed near the National Assembly. Until Solon's reforms, no one had been quite sure what the law was, and it had often been bent to suit the rich, who were also the judges.

In what Solon did we can find the principal, indispensable components of our western democracy as follows: Citizens make the laws and decide all matters by voting; each citizen has one vote; the votes of the poor and the rich count equally; citizens are equal before the law and equally protected by the law, even if they are not members of the majority; citizens submit to the rule of the laws and not to the rule of an individual; to make laws, citizens need and have the right to assemble, speak, debate and vote; laws pass if they satisfy or do not repel the majority of factions. Thus, laws, in general, are compromised.

Since its laws are compromises, democracies are compromises. It rejects, perforce, the dogmas advanced as perfect solutions by zealots of the left or the right. Thus, Solon's reforms would not have been democratic had he given to either the rich or poor, the capitalist or proletarian, the perfect solution each wanted—the right claimed by the rich to make money with no restraint versus the right claimed by the poor to confiscate the money of the rich.

Hence, from its Solonian beginnings, democracy became an exercise in compromise between the power of government responding to the voting power of the many and the power of wealth controlled by the few rich.

When he was asked if he had passed the best laws possible, Solon replied that he had passed the best that Athenians would accept. A law, he said, must take prevailing circumstances into account if the legislator wants to punish a few for some purpose rather than many for no purpose. Again, he said that he adapted his laws to the situation rather than the situation to his laws. Moreover, when something worked, he felt it should not be changed.

These are important lessons we draw from Solon, the founder of our democratic system. If you look at it, it is amazing to see how very much it resembles the details of the Canadian Constitution, including the Senate as a chamber of sober second thought, which has, as the press loves to say, been filled with "party bagmen."

Solon said that each vote counts, even if the voter is a member of the minority. He insisted on the rights of the minority. He wanted to protect the rights of the minority, and without protection of the rights of the minority, direct democracy, or its successor, indirect democracy, the one we live in today, cannot survive. You cannot have the tyranny of the majority. You must, perforce, if you want democracy, allow the minority to vote, allow the minority to obstruct, fight and to put up a last-ditch effort against the powers of the majority.

There are some of you here who were in the House of Commons when Mr. Trudeau was Prime Minister and who disagreed totally with him, yet he was elected by a majority. I am sure those senators then felt that the majority was wrong in voting for him and that the minority that voted for them was right.

Senator Forrestall: That is your opinion, not mine.

Senator Gigantès: And you did not think you were right when Mr. Trudeau was Prime Minister, and that he was wrong? That is what I said. I understand if you do not see this clearly.

Senator Forrestall: Of course I do.

Senator Gigantès: Then I will repeat this.

Senator Forrestall: My memory is fine. You do not have to repeat.

Senator Gigantès: When Mr. Trudeau represented a clear majority, there were people in opposition, Senator Forrestall included, who collectively represented a minority of the population, and those representatives of the minority obviously thought, since they disagreed with Mr. Trudeau, that the majority had been wrong in electing him. This seems to me to be a simple enough proposition in terms of human nature and mathematics. I did not think it was complex in the way I explained it.

It turns out at times that the minority becomes the majority and says, as we have been told endlessly for six years, "We were right all along. We have finally convinced the public. We finally arrived at a situation in which we got the public to understand that the old majority was wrong and that we were always right, although we were in the minority."

But that transformation in public opinion could not happen if the minority did not have the right, as it did in 1982, to raise hell, to ring the bells, to get the press on its side, to howl in defence of its privileges and against the abuses it alleged were being committed by the majority. It was because the government was allowed to do this that it was eventually able to gain power. If the kind of dirty tricks that were played on us last Thursday had been played on the Parliament, in the House of Commons, in 1982, the Tories would not have had as much latitude in expressing their outrage and opposition to Mr. Trudeau's policies as they did. The Liberals, although they had the votes, had the decency to understand that this was an essential and vital part of the democratic process. Although the Liberals were convinced that what they were doing was right, they restrained themselves and did not attack that very essence of democratic government, which allows the minority to express itself. The principal expression is the vote. That is what was taken from me last Thursday, my vote.

Senator Haidasz: A sacred privilege!

Senator Gigantès: I am astonished that some of you—not all of you, but there are some who do not surprise me by their actions—have been able to stomach this and go along with something this important. It is perfectly all right for journalists not to read the Constitution and realize how dangerous it is for a democracy to infringe upon the rights of a minority, but it is not pardonable when this is done by the members of this august chamber.

It is not difficult to obtain a Constitution. Any of you can get it. Here it is in English, and I have it also in French. Supply and Services will give it to you free. It is your duty to read it. The basic tenet of the Constitution of Canada, as written in 1867 and last amended in 1982, is the right of the minority and the protection of the right of the minority. The whole purpose of the Charter itself is to protect an individual who goes against the majority. You do not have to protect a member of the ruling majority. He has the power, the votes and the troops. You have to protect the weak, the afflicted, and those who do not have power. This is a sacred principle, without which a democracy cannot exist.

This principle was abridged last Thursday. You abrogated my privilege, the privileges of Canada and the privileges of democracy, for the vilest motives—to satisfy the pride of a small man. How could you? Does it not bother your conscience to stand for this kind of thing? You should go and talk to yourself in the mirror and say "I am sorry this happened". Write it on a little piece of paper and burn it afterward. Confessing the truth to yourselves about the unholiness of what you did will do your soul good.

Some of you have had distinguished pasts—until last Thursday. It is your duty to yourselves, to your past and to your present, to question yourself about what happened and how you serve people like the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who was prepared to perpetrate such knavery on this institution. You have him as a leader. You did not choose him. He was appointed by Mr. Mulroney; but all of you on the other side allowed yourselves to be used in debasing the essence of the whole of Parliament, with its two chambers, Canadian democracy, the invisible, ethereal, web of civility, mutual tolerance and trust, even among enemies, which made this one of the most civilized models for democratic government in the world. You should be ashamed to have defiled that. It was power. It was wonderful.

Regardless of its defects until that point, there had not been a successful attempt in the Parliament of Canada to attack the root of democracy, which is the right of a minority. That is the sort of thing Senator Murray might enjoy doing; but he will go down in infamy—as will Mr. Mulroney—in the history books written about this country which men like him and his puppet master are destroying. Quebec will be independent and other parts of Canada will be absorbed by the United States. Ontario, Alberta and B.C. may be independent, but Manitoba and Saskatchewan will have to join the United States, as will the poor Maritimes. They will resist, because they will not want to do without their medicare. If they keep their medicare, they will be flooded by the destitute Americans who will come north to get the kind of medical help they cannot get in their own country, which is a brutal, Tory country in its system.

You are destroying this country because you are attacking its strength, which is democracy. You are destroying this country because your Prime Minister has not defended its essence. He has not gone to Quebec to say "One of the glories of Canada is that it has given separatists like you the freedom to express yourselves without restrictions when you are a minority." That is worth saying. Look at what France did to the Bretons. A Breton cannot start a publication in France suggesting that Brittany should separate from France. He would be in jail. The Bungundians went to jail, as did the Basques. But here in Canada we have had this perfect freedom. That was worth saying. I did not hear the Prime Minister say that. On the contrary, he adopted the language, the mythology, of the separatists, which, like all generalizations that are false, including this one, says that anything that ever went wrong in Quebec is due to les anglais. This is the Bourgault view. There is this great Satan, this demon, les anglais.

My little nephews, when they speak of the anglophone, say "les têtes carrées". And they smile when they play a record about "le grand six pieds"—the Quebecer who was six foot tall, who took a four-by-four and broke the head of the English foreman. They believe that it was like that. When I say to them that this English foreman was just as brutal to English workers as he was to francophones and that the francophone proprietors were just as brutal to francophone workers as the anglophone proprietors were, they don't want to hear it. They are much more comfortable inventing a great Satan.

But it is the duty of the Prime Minister to tell the truth and to point out that it is Canada's respect for the minority that allowed the flourishing of Quebec literature on independence themes. In other countries, people like that great poet, Gilles Vigneault, would have been put in jail for writing his poetry. The songs of such people would have been pushed underground. But no, Canada respected the minority until last Thursday.

Obviously, since Mr. Mulroney did not defend in Quebec the fact that Canada's essence, the essence of Canadian democracy, lies in the respect of the minority, this is a meaningless concept here. He does not care at all about respecting the minority. He only cares about Brian Mulroney, just as the Leader of the Government only cares about his own ego. He, like Mr. Mulroney, is trying to find a great Satan, some demon on which to blame his own shortcomings—the shortcomings of his Prime Minister—for the mess they made of this country over Meech Lake.

Honourable senators, if they have no respect for the minority, how can they respect the country that embodied respect for the minority? If they do not care for the rights of the minority, they cannot possibly care for Canada, which is built on this concept. When they infringed upon this right of mine, they infringed upon the rights of all Canadians. That is the ultimate arrogance.

They dare accuse us of arrogance. I have not seen any greater arrogance than this conviction that somehow Holy Writ issues from the small, circular, sphincter-like mouth of their Prime Minister—that mouth above that enormous chin. He has the same sort of mouth as Mrs. Thatcher. They both enunciate as if they were ovulating.

Honourable senators, they did something last Thursday which is absolutely unforgivable. They drove an opposition to desperate means. I will not forgive myself for last Friday and I will not forgive them for driving me there. I did not enjoy what I was doing, but I had no other way of squeezing a small concession out of them. They were not prepared, as the Liberals were in 1982, to make concessions—absolutely not. They would have lost whatever sense of macho manhood or womanhood that was in them. Trampling on peoples' faces is something that they find difficult to do without.

People generally climb the hierarchies in political parties by stepping on other peoples' faces. Mr. Mulroney is a prime example of that. He stepped on Joe Clark's face to get where he is. He stabbed him in the back simultaneously. That is, perhaps, a difficult feat, but with a little practice it can be done. Mr. Mulroney has had a lot of practice in his life, I am sure.

Honourable senators, I have a feeling that those who are the prime actors in this obscenity that occurred last Thursday are people who actually enjoy infringing on the privileges of others and crushing the minority. Being the minority, I had to cry out and scream. There is a saying that when rape is unavoidable, relax and enjoy it. I say no, you scream. And I screamed. And I whistled and I rang bells and I banged desks, because senators opposite were raping freedom. That was what you were doing last Thursday. You seem to have no shame about it, those of you who were the principal actors.

I know that some senators opposite feel shame. They are restrained and loyal gentlemen and they will not admit publicly that they did not like what was happening. I know who they are. Everybody in this chamber knows who they are. It would be perhaps too much to ask that they abandon their seat mates and companions. But I hope that at least in their hearts they are distancing themselves from the impurity of what happened last Thursday.

Senator Hébert: That is not enough!

Senator Gigantès: Because, honourable senators, it was impure. If you want democracy, you have to have freedom for the minority, freedom to vote. My right to vote was stolen from me last Thursday. Rule 50 gives me the right to vote and to change my vote. That didn't seem to bother senators opposite. They can fool around with the rules, change them to make it harder for the opposition to oppose them, but surely they cannot play around with the right to vote.

If you want to play around with the right to vote, why bother to have a Parliament? Why have a democracy? Why let the people vote? Why not have Mulroney serve as President for life—God help us, another Bokassa, a Bokassa of the North. He will be eating children next. He will be giving diamonds to the President of France. Do we have diamonds? Uranium, maybe.

If you attack the right to vote, you are betraying yourselves. Say that to yourselves—say it. You betray yourselves. You betray what is decent in you by participating in the stripping of my vote from me. To repeat, it says quite clearly in the rules exactly what happens when there is a vote.

[Translation]

I will say it in French. Where is Senator Simard who likes to hear me speak French?

Senator Hébert: Sleeping.

Senator Gigantès: So he is sleeping. I quote:

> Voting in the Senate is described in Rules 49 and 50.

Rule 50 gives me the right to vote and the right to change my vote. I quote:

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the chamber be locked".

When the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote. That is the written rule, it is the custom, it is the practice. As long as the bells are ringing and the Whips have not entered the Chamber there can be no vote. I knew that. I gave my phone number to my Whip. Senator Charbonneau has a list of telephone numbers, mine included. I went home. According to the practice, if there was a change, if there was an emercency, if it was absolutely necessary to have a vote I should have been told about it.

They had me come back from Europe for the Tamils. Jeez they could at least have called me back from Aylmer to change the Rules of the Senate. No, it had to be a hidden move and skip... Good thing you are here, Senator Simard, I was wondering if I was wasting my time speaking French because the other French-speaking senators here are fully bilingual.

Senator Simard: I came to listen to you in French.

Senator Gigantès: How nice. We did something which was not in keeping with our practice. Should we have followed the practice? Yes, because Rule 1 of the interpretation in Part I states that in all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof. I have just mentioned the customs as they relate to voting. According to the customs, when there is a vote I have the right to vote and as long as my Whip has not entered the Chamber I can reasonably believe there will be no vote because my Whip has not come into the Chamber.

If it had been the wish of my Whip had planned to enter the Senate, he would have notified me to come. Such was the custom. To overlook this custom is to deny me my right to vote. Changing the rules without giving us enough advance notice is something totally unacceptable. It is a denial. It is a sign of the dreadful narrow mindedness which characterizes the Prime Minister of this country and the instruments of his dastardly deeds.

Because they took away my right to vote, they have abused my privilege and that of all Canadians because they attack the heart and soul of democracy which gives this fine country its main significance. Without minority rights, there is no democracy, only a dictatorship.

Before you came in, Senator Simard (I am going to repeat it just in case you might think I am neglecting you), I was wondering how it was possible for senators opposite not to be ashamed.

Are you yourself ashamed? Because you refuse to answer, there must be hope! Because you are not answering, there is a trace of hope that, deep down, you might be a little ashamed of the loathsome action in which you were involved. I congragulate you. I am delighted that you should have enough character to be embarrassed—

Senator Simard: Talk to the wall over there, for it is the only one which can stand you!

Senator Gigantès: —by what your leaders have done.

I am supposed to address you, as honourable senators. So that is what I am doing.

According to the Rules, I am supposed to address "honourable senators". Of course, some honourable senators may be as hard, insensitive and lacking in understanding as walls. Since you want to belong to this category, I am talking to the wall. But the other senators are not like that, they are human beings with ears, souls, sensitivity and culture.

• (2350)

I know something essential was destroyed as a result of your base tactics.

Senator Simard: How long are we going to have to listen to this!

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Rise, if you wish to speak.

Senator Simard: Oh, go to bed!

Senator Lefebvre: Rise!

Senator Simard: Go take your pill!

Senator Gigantès: So we had this minor interruption by Senator Simard, who just told me to talk to the wall, but in any case I shall continue. Perhaps he was afraid I would make him show he was, in his heart of hearts, somewhat embarrassed, and that he had the humanity and the humility to say to himself in his heart of hearts, not to us, we are sensitive enough to feel those vibes—that what happened Thursday night was infamous. It was Canadian democracy's darkest hour. It will be written in the annals of this country, not with ink but with poisonous, foul smelling effluvia, entirely worthy of what you have done.

Some of you have claimed that no major privileges were breached. You went on television. You went on radio, and you dared to say that what you did was not a serious violation of the basic principles of Canadian democracy.

Don't you understand what you did or is it just a lot of hypocrisy? I am reminded of the question I asked myself at the time with respect to Chiang Kai-shek. Was he an idiot or a criminal?

You go on television, in front of the media, and claim that taking away the rights of the minority is nothing serious. You are legislators in a parliament! There is no democratic parliament where protecting the rights of the minority is not one of the basic principles. Do you understand that or don't you?

If you do, then why do you go before the media and say this is not a serious violation. You are committing an act of fraud. If you don't understand this, what are you doing in this Chamber?

Why don't you read a few books on the subject? Why don't you read what a couple of philosophers had to say about democracy? I realize that certain journalists have a favourable bias towards Mulroney because he is a separatist or talks like a separatist. I realize they couldn't care less about the rules of democracy in Canada because as far as they are concerned, the sooner Canada disappears, the better.

Other journalists just don't understand. It is obvious from their articles they haven't a clue. They never really thought about these things. I don't know where they got their education and what kind of books they read, but maybe I can send them some. As for the journalists who have separatist leanings, they are entitled to defend their opinion. The Irish did it in Great Britain. The Greeks did it under the Turks. The Hungarians did it under the Austrians. The Slovaks are doing it under the Czechs. All is fair in love and war!

As for those who don't understand at all, I consider them professional failures when they fail to stand up to defend my privilege, the privilege of Canadians across this country and the privilege of the minority in our democracy.

When these journalists report such inanities, they don't know what they are talking about. Poor Canada!

I can't blame the journalists entirely, because we have had this swarm of Tories who spread the "good lie". You have a lot of propaganda flacks. You used them during the debate on free trade. I remember those four pages in the Globe and Mail, where the worthy Mr. Thomas Aquino had prepared a series of questions and answers. There was a question that said: Is it true that we members of the Business Council on National Issues will use the Free Trade Agreement as an excuse to cut social services in Canada?

Come now, that is absolutely false! But this is what they were saying a couple of weeks after the deal was made: cut, cut. Naturally, it is like the sale of aspirin, or should I say salicylic acid, under whatever brand it is sold.

However, for a pharmaceuticals tycoon it is alright to spend inordinate amounts to convince buyers that 333 mg of salicylic acid is a better product, the sovereign remedy, than 333 mg of the competitor's product, because that sort of people live in untruthfulness and will say anything to make money.

So, you have a lot of those in your agencies who are capable of lying—that is what they are trained for, that is their job—and deceiving people. Unfortunately—I say unfortunately because I am referring to what used to be my trade—there are journalists who do not dig very hard, who do not raise questions and who let themselves be lead astray by the fact that we are not elected.

Why, does this mean that someone who is not elected cannot be right? The correctness of generalizations must always be questioned. One that was made is that a non-elected member has no rights. He has no say and cannot take a position or vote against what the elected members have decided.

What if the elected members were wrong? I demonstrated earlier to Senator Forestall that, when he was part of the minority in the House of Commons, he was bound to believe that he was right. He believed that the elected majority supporting Trudeau was wrong. That is to say that, according to Mr. Forestall, elected members, an elected majority was wrong and the minority was right.

I was also talking for Senator Simard, who wants me to address him in French. We are of course bilingual, so I indulge him. I can give you a brief translation or adaptation of what I said preceedingly, if you wish. There are judges who are not elected. In Canada, all judges are appointed by the premiers, like us, until their 75th birthday, like us as well. They make decisions that are vital, extremely serious and possibly more vital and serious than ours in spite of the fact that they are not elected.

And they are often right in spite of the fact that they are not elected. If being elected were a guaranty of . . .

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Would you allow me to intervene, Senator Gigantès?

Senator Gigantès: Of course, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: I noticed earlier that Senator Simard insisted that you speak French. I would like to point out that he is now reading an English newspaper while you are speaking French!

Senator Simard: I raised questions . . .

Senator Gigantès: He must improve his «franglais». How else other than in reading English from time to time.

Cheers! It is only water, not gin. Churchill was said to have gin in his glass, but he never had gin, just water. He took delight in spreading the rumour he drank gin.

Finally, not only did you infringe upon the minority's privilege which is the keystone of democracy, but you have massively corrupted the media's way of thinking with lies about the matter, with sometimes tearful and excessively emotional preaching, bleeding hearts—some of you will reap sorrow. You wax indignant, you spread rumours.

You are telling lies that will hurt the political health of Canada for years and years to come. You have been totally indifferent to the political health of this country.

You are carrying a heavy burden of culpability. That burden will eventually break you.

I was saying earlier that there is evidence everywhere that the people are deserting you, even where you were the safest. Even in your western strongholds, people are turning their backs on you with repulsion and disgust because you showed you have no respect for the key democratic principle, the right to vote. And you defended your Prime minister's arrogant and self-centered behaviour by spreading lies and deceiving the media. Some of you may be sincere, although your sincerity is misplaced. But the rest of you who know what they are doing will have to take a generous share of the blame for the terrible state in which this country will be during the next two years, with a government that has become a lame duck, thanks to the underhandedness of its Prime Minister and the ensuing lack of respect throughout this country for the Prime Minister when he will have to discuss the future of this country with Quebec, when he will have to negotiate a new constitutional accord with the provincial premiers of this country.

The federalist option will be defended by a person for whom this country and the provincial premiers have no respect, someone who cannot be trusted because he has violated the privileges of so many people, so many times. The latest example of an infamous series of deplorable actions is what happened last Thursday.

I think I will give you a short reading from the Gospel, so that you can listen to words that are more eloquent and moving than my own. I will use the King James version, which as a translation is not as good as the more modern translation, because at the time, when the King James version was made by translating the Bible of Ptolemy III from the ancient Greek, it did not include certain papyrus rolls that were found subsequently and which have been used to correct certain passages, mostly in the Old Testament. Nevertheless, the text has beauty and rhythm. So now I will read you Elijah's message to Ahab.

[English]

> Now it came to pass after many days that the word of the Lord came to Elijah, in the third year, saying, "Go, present yourself to Ahab, and I will send rain on the earth."
> So Elijah went to present himself to Ahab; and there was a severe famine in Samaria.
> And Ahab had called Obadiah, who was in charge of his house. (Now Obadiah feared the Lord greatly.
> For so it was, while Jezebel massacred the prophets of the Lord, that Obadiah had taken one hundred prophets and hidden them, fifty to a cave, and had fed them with bread and water.)
> And Ahab had said to Obadiah, "Go into the land to all the springs of water and to all the brooks; perhaps we may find grass to keep the horses and mules alive, so that we will not have to kill any livestock."
> So they divided the land between them to explore it; Ahab went one way by himself, and Obadiah went another way by himself.
> Now as Obadiah was on his way, suddenly Elijah met him; and he recognized him, and fell on his face, and said, "Is that you, my lord Elijah?"
> And he answered him, "It is I. Go, tell your master, 'Elijah is here.'"
> Then he said, "How have I sinned, that you are delivering your servant into the hand of Ahab, to kill me?
> "As the Lord your God lives, there is no nation or kingdom where my master has not sent someone to hunt for you; and when they said, 'He is not here,' he took an oath from the kingdom or nation that they could not find you.
> "And now you say, 'Go, tell your master, "Elijah is here"'!
> "And it shall come to pass, as soon as I am gone from you, that the Spirit of the Lord will carry you to a place I do not know; so when I go and tell Ahab, and he cannot find you, he will kill me. But I your servant have feared the Lord from my youth.
> "Was it not reported to my lord what I did when Jezebel killed the prophets of the Lord, how I hid one hundred men of the Lord's prophets, fifty to a cave, and fed them with bread and water?
> "And now you say, 'Go, tell your master, "Elijah is here,"' and he will kill me!"

> Then Elijah said, "As the Lord of hosts lives, before whom I stand, I will surely present myself to him today."
> So Obadiah went to meet Ahab, and told him; and Ahab went to meet Elijah.
> Then it happened, when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said to him, "Is that you, O troubler of Israel?"
>
> And he answered, "I have not troubled Israel, but you and your father's house have, in that you have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and you have followed the Baals.
> "Now therefore, send and gather all Israel to me on Mount Carmel, the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and the four hundred prophets of Asherah, who eat at Jezebel's table."
> So Ahab sent for all the children of Israel, and gathered the prophets together on Mount Carmel.
> And Elijah came to all the people, and said, "How long will you falter between two opinions? If the Lord is God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him."

In other words, you cannot catch fish and cut bait at the same time, which was one of the basic defects of the Meech Lake flummery.

> Then Elijah said to the people, "I alone am left a prophet of the Lord; but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men.
> "Therefore let them give us two bulls; and let them choose one bull for themselves, cut it in pieces, and lay it on the wood, but put no fire under it; and I will prepare the other bull, and lay it on the wood, but put not fire under it.
> "Then you call on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord; and the God who answers by fire, He is God." So all the people answered and said, "It is well spoken."

The Lord God brought the fire to prove that the true God was telling the truth, and that the false prophets who lied, who mislead the public, those who go to lie to the press and create confusion and doubt, have sinned, as truly as any of the sinners described in the Bible. You have sinned against your oath of office. You have sinned against the Constitution. You have sinned against democracy. You are taking away from the people of Canada the privileges of the minority, privileges without which a democracy cannot function. That is what was done last Thursday by the government. It was a heinous and symbolic act. You have created damage from which this country will have great difficulty recovering. Frankly, I do not think it will recover. I believe you have killed it. Within two years this country will have split, because it will have at its head for the next two years—God help us—people who have shown themselves to be "indignes" of their charge, their office, the honour to represent the people of Canada, whether through election or appointment, in a chamber such as this or in the House of Commons, people who basically have proven themselves unfit for the jobs they perform because they have no respect for the basic essence of the rules by which we govern ourselves.

October 10, 1990

Last Friday you forced me to shame myself. I said to myself, "Can I forgive them, because they are only puppets?" But Pinocchio cut his strings. What are you waiting for? Thank you.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to say to all honourable senators, particularly to the stenographers, the pages, Mr. O'Brien and the staff generally, that we will support a motion to adjourn at any time. If we are staying here now, it is because the government is keeping us here. If you think that is a joke, move your motion for adjournment. Let that be clear. I hope the stenographers will understand that we are prepared to support a motion to adjourn at any time in these proceedings, which would bring us back here tomorrow at 2 p.m. The cruelty here is being imposed by the government—just so that is perfectly clear. Incidentally, that offer will not be withdrawn. You are scoffing and snickering at it now, but we will be quite glad to support that motion when the government sees fit to allow the staff to have a break.

Senator Barootes: Not one of us has spoken throughout this whole day.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, a good deal of the controversy that is now before us is caused by the question of the rules. Despite the bickering that is going on now, I believe there are some very big people—men and women—on the opposite side. I will ask them again whether they are prepared to be big enough to admit that they were wrong to go to such iniquitous lengths to try to ram through this iniquitous legislation. I do not expect them to think it is iniquitous. Their opinion, of course, is that it is not. Whether it is or not, are they prepared to admit that they are wrong to do that? I believe there are some who are prepared to accept the fact, or at least are thinking about accepting the fact, that they are wrong. People make mistakes. I have made plenty of mistakes.

Senator Simard: Classic or unclassic?

Senator Frith: I have made all kinds of mistakes, classic and unclassic. What is an unclassic mistake? That is an interesting thought.

Senator Simard: Work on it.

Senator Frith: Please feel free to interrupt and ask questions.

Senator Simard: The filibustering is on your side. Go ahead! We can wait all week.

Senator Frith: Tell us about it. Go ahead!

Senator Simard: No, you have the floor.

Senator Frith: Thank you. They were wrong to go to the length of plotting to corrupt the Speaker—to ignore the rules, break the rules, encourage the Speaker to do so, and participate in the whole thing. Unless something is done about it, and unless they are prepared to admit they are wrong, including Senator Charbonneau, then there is no way to avoid the fact that every one of their names is recorded in Canadian history and will be turning up forever in stories, studies, Masters theses, and papers. You will be able to tell your children, and they will tell their children and grandchildren that they were members of the gang or group of 54. We will call them a gang, but if they changed their minds they would not be so called. They could change their black place in history to a shining place in history by not only admitting that they were wrong, and therefore correcting their mistake, but they would be entitled to the celebrity and congratulations of being big enough to change their mind. I ask them that and I will ask again, because I cannot believe that every single one of the 54—was it 54? I have the official vote here—participated in such an act and will be judged by history as having done so. It is never too late to admit that you were wrong.

Honourable senators, a good deal of the proceedings in which we have been engaged in the last few days has been as a result of a brazen breach of the rules. It would be a good idea for us to turn our attention to those rules, because obviously they have been ignored by the Speaker and members opposite who participated in that infamous vote.

Senator Simard: What about the deal you struck last week?

Senator Frith: What deal?

Senator Simard: That orders 1, 2, 3 and 4 be postponed.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Simard: That does not count. That was just a lie. Another broken promise. That is fine; we understand that.

Senator Frith: The understanding was very clear.

Senator Lefebvre: Stand up and speak up.

Senator Frith: No, we will let him stay seated and talk if he wants to.

Senator Hastings: Blather, blather, blather.

Senator Simard: We know it, and more people know it now. The problem with you Grits is that you are manipulating.

Senator Lefebvre: Stand up.

Senator Simard: You cannot trust a Grit. If you were man enough, you would sit down and let Senator Murray speak. You have not allowed him to say one word since last Wednesday.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard is consistent—consistently wrong. If he paid any attention, he would know that before I stood up—you will not like to hear this, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: We heard that.

Senator Frith: Will you listen?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Frith: Before I stood up I looked at Senator Murray and said, "Do you want to speak?" He said, "No, you go ahead." You are wrong again.

Senator Simard: Not according to him.

Senator Frith: Ask your leader. Did I not offer to let him speak? He will have to agree, because that is what happened.

If you want to talk about that deal, the understanding was very clear. The understanding was that we would have the motion put on Bill C-62. We would the commence a fresh sitting starting at the beginning of the Order Paper, and Order No. 5 would return to its position as No. 5 after the other four orders. That is precisely what happened.

Senator Barootes: Where are we on the Order Paper? Where are we? Do you want me to do a Gigantès and stand up?

Senator Frith: Senator Barootes, you have asked that question twice. Do you want to continue to ask it, or do you want me to deal with it? Please ask it as often as you like.

Senator Simard: Just speak on Order No. 1.

Senator Barootes: Are we on Presentation of Petitions?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Barootes: Are we on Reading of Petitions?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Barootes: Are we on Reports of Committees?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Barootes: Are we on Notices of Inquiries?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Barootes: Are we on Notices of Motions?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Barootes: We are nowhere.

Senator Frith: You have got it, and you are nowhere. Senator Barootes is the best official spokesman you have ever had.

Senator Lefebvre: Any more questions?

Senator Frith: For the record, we are at the beginning of a fresh sitting on a point of privilege.

Senator Barootes: That is it. Is it the same one as last week?

Senator Hastings: Yes, the ones you initiated last week. They were good.

Senator Frith: Let us look at the rules.

Senator Hastings: We put up with you for three days.

Senator Barootes: Excuse me, I apologize for interrupting.

Senator Frith: I have here the Rules of the Senate of Canada, Règlement du Sénat du Canada, March, 1990. The explanatory note says:

> The changes in the Rules of the Senate of Canada since the printing of the 1983 edition are as follows:

• (0015)

These are from the first full edition since the reprinting of the 1983 edition. It points out on page one, for example, that Rule 5(b) was changed February 13, 1990, and so on. So anyone who wants to know the history of these changes will find them there.

Then we come to the table of contents which organizes the rules under the headings of Parts: PartI: Interpretation, Part II: Routine of Business, Part III: Notice, Part IV: Voting, Part V: Petitions and Bills, Part VI: Committees, Part VII: Private Bills, Part VIII, General.

Then there is—and these are important, as we found out—Appendix I: Forms and Proceedings, and they start at page 46 and finish at page 74, so they include the very important and significant page 70, but we will come to that in due course.

Then they have Appendix II: Provincial Representations to Senate Committees, Appendix III: Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees and Appendix IV: Cabinet Ministers Being Members of Senate Committees. They are also organized on the basis of English on the left and French on the right and are bound in loose leaf form.

Part I, Interpretation, brings us to Rule 1, a rule that has played a very important role in our proceedings these last few days. The margin note reads, "Procedure in unprovided cases." Rule 1 reads:

In all cases—

Senator Forrestall: Is that the first time you have read it?

Senator Frith: No. I have not read every rule 20 times, but I would say that I have read most of them.

Senator Forrestall: I notice that you have never read 49 or 50, or page 70.

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Stanbury: Look who is talking.

Senator Frith: I never read them? The new expert read it before he came over. He had read page 70, and yet he came in here and voted. Is that what Senator Forrestall is saying?

Senator Forrestall: What is more, I understood it before you did, and you have been here for years.

Senator Frith: Oh, you did, did you? You understood it well enough to come in here and vote in breach of it!

Senator Forrestall: It has been quoted ad nauseam.

Senator Frith: You look a bit nauseous, I must say!

Senator Forrestall: I am not.

Senator Frith: That is good news, because you look it.

Senator Forrestall: You are!

Senator Frith: Anything more, Senator Forrestall?

Senator Forrestall: No, I'll listen to you all night; go ahead, sir.

Senator Frith: Rule 1 reads:

> In all cases not provided for—and we are starting at Rule 1.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Forrestall: Good, you might be able to make some improvements on these abominable rules—

Senator Frith: You will remember that in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" Alice said something—

Senator Forrestall: —rules that you fellows have allowed over the years.

Senator Frith: You have an interesting way of listening, senator. Alice said something like, "I don't know where to begin", and I think it was the Queen of Hearts who said, "Start at the beginning and when you come to the end, stop." Rule 1 reads:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

So are votes unprovided for? No. As Senator Forrestall has said, that is dealt with in Rules 49 and 50 and on page 70. I agree with you. Let us look at the connection between the two.

Before we go to page 70, let us look at what it says at the beginning of the Appendix. This Appendix was approved by the Senate before some of those opposite were here. It is headed, "Forms and Proceedings" and it begins with these words:

> (This appendix is a general description of Senate practice and is included in this volume as a source of information on the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate referred to in Rule 1.)

So the direct connection is made. It says in Rule 1:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Then if you turn over to the Appendix—and it says that this is exactly to where you should turn—it does not say that you should go to any other House but that if you are looking for the answer to a question arising under Rule 1, you are in the right place if you turn to page 48 and read through; and if you are looking for an answer to a question on votes, then you go to page 70. So the whole system is clearly interlocked, and no matter where you start and no matter where Senator Charbonneau would have started or where Senator Murray or Senator Forrestall or anyone else might have started, they had to end up on page 70. All rules in the question of votes, starting at Rule 1 or any place else, lead to page 70. If you are looking at votes, it leads you to rule 49 and rule 50, as Senator Forrestall has said, and then it leads you directly to page 70, as he has also said, because he has apparently read these excerpts before he came in here, and deliberately ignored them.

The marginal note on rule 2 reads "No implied restrictions."

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: May I ask a question?

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: I noticed you are quoting the rules one after another. Would it not be useful to do the same thing in French to make things clearer still? You have read Rule 1 in English. It seems to me you could read it in French.

Senator Lefebvre: Absolutely.

Senator Frith: We can make a comparison and try to find out whether both versions say exactly the same thing. So, in Part I under Interpretation, the English text reads "procedure in unprovided cases" while the French version reads "procédure dans les cas non prévus". I think that is acceptable.

Here is how the provisions of Rule 1 read, in English this time:

[English]

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

[Translation]

In French it goes like this:

> Dans tous les cas non prévus par le présent Règlement, les coutumes, usages, formules et procédures de l'une ou l'autre Chambre du Parlement du Canada doivent, dans la mesure du possible, être observés par le Sénat et ses comités.

That is good, I think it is concordant.

Because appendix 1 was referred to in English we must keep in mind the beginning of appendix 1, in English.

[English]

> (This appendix is a general description of Senate practice and is included in this volume as a source of information on the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate referred to in Rule 1.)

[Translation]

Senator Frith: In French now:

> (Cette Annexe décrit, dans ses grandes lignes, la pratique du Sénat et est insérée dans ce volume en tant que source de renseignements sur les us, coutumes, formules et procédures du Sénat mentionnés à l'article 1 du Règlement.)

Again it says exactly the same thing.

[English]

Let us now go back to Rule 2 and the margin note, which reads, "No implied restrictions." The rule reads:

> Except so far as is expressly provided, these rules shall in no way restrict the mode in which the Senate may exercise and uphold its powers, privileges and immunities.

Let us then check the French.

[Translation]

It reads as follows:

> Sauf prescription expresse, le présent Règlement ne restreint aucunement la façon dont le Sénat peut exercer et maintenir ses pouvoirs, privilèges et immunités.

Same thing again.

[English]

What does that mean and what is important in that rule for our present consideration? It starts off by saying, "Except so far as expressly provided . . ." On the specific question of the infamous vote, the rules and the appendix that is there for our assistance provide. Then the rule goes on to say, ". . . these rules shall in no way restrict the mode in which the Senate . . ."; notice that it is not the Speaker,". . . may exercise and uphold its powers, privileges . . . , and we are now talking about a privileged matter before the Senate, ". . . and immunities." So that rule is of importance to our deliberations.

I should underline that there is no restriction on the motion and the Senate may exercise and uphold its powers, and no provision under which the Speaker may try to exercise and uphold his own imagined powers.

The margin note beside Rule 3 reads "Suspension of rule." Rule 3 reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in these rules, any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

[Translation]

In French it goes like this:

> Nonobstant toutes dispositions du présent Règlement, avec la permission du Sénat, toute règle peut être, sans préavis, suspendue en tout ou en partie, à condition que soient bien précisées la règle ou partie de règle de même que les raisons de la suspension ainsi visée.

Is that any better, Senator Lefebvre?

● (0030)

[English]

So let us have a look at how that might be relevant to the infamous vote. Again, it is "Suspension of rule". Let us take it part by part.

> Notwithstanding anything in these rules, any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice—

So far, you might think that the Speaker had suspended a rule. Was that what he thought he was doing?

Senator Lefebvre: He might have.

Senator Frith: He might have thought he was suspending a rule, or any part of it, and that he was doing it without notice. There is some evidence to support that because he did not give notice. He certainly did not give proper notice, but he might say, "I did not have to give notice because it says, 'Notwithstanding anything in these rules, any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice' . . ." So if I am taking a case for him, so far I am making a pretty good argument that the infamous vote was foisted upon us, upon the nation, and upon Parliament because he was exercising what he thought were rights under Rule 3. Unfortunately, he then runs smack into the next words:

by leave of the Senate . . .

So was he thinking that the leave of the 54 was the only leave that he needed? Would he not have been well advised to turn over to the interpretation rule, which is Rule 5, and see what "leave of the Senate" means? It means:

. . . leave granted without a dissenting voice;

He never asked for that leave. He knows very well that if he had asked for that leave, he would have had plenty of dissenting voices. He could, if he had had the Senate in session, have asked for leave to suspend that rule—or someone could have—but the Senate would have had to have given unanimous consent.

Now, I am trying to make out a case for him, and he has no case because you will remember that in his letter, he never referred to anything as any authority for what he did. You remember what his letter said. It simply said it was because of some breakdown or other, not because of any rule. He never cited Rules 49 and 50, as Mr. Forrestall loves to do. He made no reference to the rules at all. So it was clear that he was not relying on Rule 3, and even if he had, of course, it was a hopeless cause.

Senator Barootes: What about Rule 15?

Senator Frith: Yes, I will come to 15.

Senator Hastings: After 14.

Senator Frith: We are taking them one by one to try to find out if there is any single rule in this rule book which, even though he did not know about it, could possibly justify what it was that he did.

Senator Lefebvre: Could I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator Barootes: A soft lob! A slow pitch!

Senator Lefebvre: While we are going through this exercise, not only to find out if the honourable Speaker made a mistake and forgot about a certain rule, I think, Senator Frith, you are doing an excellent thing by taking all the senators through the rules, because some of us may have forgotten some of them along the way.

Senator Simard: You never knew the rules.

Senator Lefebvre: It is an excellent exercise and I wish to congratulate you, sir, for doing it.

Senator Barootes: We are eternally grateful to you!

Senator Simard: You would not know a rule if you met it on the street.

Senator Hastings: Quiet, children!

Senator Lefebvre: It is obvious from the shouting from the other side that they do not understand the basic rules of parliamentary procedure.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Senator Lefebvre.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Hastings: Listen, Staff, listen!

Senator Frith: I want to thank Senator Barootes for saying that he would be eternally grateful. Actually, he does not need to be grateful for all eternity; just until December 31 will do quite well, thank you.

Senator Simard: May I ask a question?

Senator Frith: Yes, of course.

Senator Lefebvre: Stand up, please.

Senator Simard: Why will you not honour the deal that was struck last Friday night? Answer that one. Secondly, why did you wait until 12:00 o'clock tonight, you and your crowd, your gang, to invite Senator Murray to speak? Is this the new gentleman's way of doing things over there?

Senator Hastings: We learned it from you, after listening to you all July. Poor Senator Murray could not speak!

Senator Frith: The first question was why I will not honour the deal? The answer to that is simple: I am.

The second question was why did I wait until midnight to ask what?

Senator Simard: To ask Senator Murray if he would like to speak.

Senator Frith: Because I was about to speak at that time and I asked him if he wanted to go first. That was my opportunity.

Senator Simard: May I ask another question?

Senator Frith: You can ask them through all eternity, but December 31 will be long enough.

Senator Simard: You said you could not do anything about it until 12:00 o'clock because Senator Gigantes was speaking, and then your turn came up. Who is the leader over there? Surely you must have agreed to filibuster all day and make sure that, every time Senator Murray wanted to get up, he was shouted at and not allowed to speak. Who is the leader? Did you agree? Do you agree with this strategy, this Liberal filibustering? Since you are so good at talking about denying people the right to speak or to vote, why did you allow that? Why did you not permit Senator Murray to speak last Thursday, last Friday morning, last Friday afternoon, or, since the deal was struck, all day today, from 2:00 o'clock until quarter to 12? Why did you do that? Who is the leader? If there is no leader, then tell us and tell the press over there.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since we returned after the adjournment, we have had no intention of preventing Senator Murray from speaking, and at no time has anyone denied him the right to speak.

Senator Barootes: Yes, you did!

Senator Simard: You have been barking and shouting.

Senator Frith: No, that is not true. He has not stood up. If he wants to come in here and suggest he was stopped, I will say he was never stopped from speaking since we came back after the adjournments; never! In fact, we had discussions as to when Senator Murray intended to speak? Does Senator Murray intend to speak? He is perfectly entitled, and he can come along any time and speak.

Senator Barootes: He rose in his place three times today, and each time, one of your people was up! Three times!

Senator Frith: They may have risen to speak, but we have been perfectly happy to have Senator Murray speak since the adjournment.

Senator Simard: Not true!

Senator Frith: That is a decision that was taken by the leader. You are asking about the leadership? He is entitled to speak. I offered to let him speak before I spoke—

Senator Simard: At 12:00 o'clock tonight!

Senator Frith: —and there was nothing to stop him speaking.

Senator Simard: You are playing games again!

Senator Frith: No. You would like to think so, but we were not. It is just a fact. I know that answer does not suit you, and, therefore, you are ignoring it.

Senator Simard: It is in the record. We know.

Senator Frith: It is the truth that we have not been attempting, since we came back from the adjournment, to prevent Senator Murray from speaking. He is quite welcome to speak whenever he is ready.

Senator Simard: Of course, you were away for three hours.

Senator Frith: We are now up to Rule 4, "Former rules repealed":

> All rules of the Senate in force up to the day on which the present rules come into force are repealed.

In french:

[Translation]

> 4. Sont abrogés toutes règles du Sénat qui étaient en pratique jusqu'à l'entrée en vigueur du présent règlement.

[English]

I cannot find anything in there that would support the infamous vote. So let us go on to the definitions. These will be important to us when we examine the other rules to try to discover whether there is anything, one single thing, in this rule book to support the Speaker, or whether it is true, as we contend, that the rule book was thrown out the window by the Speaker, the very man who is there to uphold it. However, even though the Speaker is not aware of it, let us see if we can find anything in the rule book, any single rule or part of a rule that might help him. Certainly, the fact that "All rules of the Senate in force up to the day on which the present rules come into force are repealed" is not any help to him.

Let us move on now to Rule 5, "Definitions":

> In these rules, unless the context otherwise requires,

and in French:

[Translation]

> 5. Dans le présent Règlement, à moins que le contexte n'en dispose autrement:

[English]

The translation seems to me to be good. That rule continues:

> (a) "bill" means a draft Act of Parliament and includes both a private and a public bill;

In French:

[Translation]

> a) «projet de loi» signifie un projet de loi du Parlement et comprend tant un projet de loi privé qu'un projet de loi public;

[English]

Good. I think that concords very well and is of no help to support the infamous vote or the infamous lockout. Continuing:

> (b) "committee" means a committee of the whole, a select committee, whether standing, special or legislative, or a joint committee;

In French:

[Translation]

> b) «comité» signifie un comité plénier, un comité particulier (soit permanent, soit spécial ou législatif) et un comité mixte;

[English]

The only difference there is that some of the words are enclosed in a bracket in the French, but not in the English. However, that is of no help to support the lockout of the opposition.

> (c) "Committee of the Whole" means a committee composed of the whole body of the senators;

In French

[Translation]

> c) «comité plénier» signifie un comité composé de l'ensemble des sénateurs;

[English]

I hope that Senator Simard—

Senator Simard: Is this a new type of leadership? You have to read French and English?

Senator Frith: You will have to make that decision, sir.

Senator Simard: I am just asking the question. I know what leadership you guys are providing. I just want you to reflect on it for a minute. Just reflect on it.

Senator Frith: You want me to reflect for a few minutes?

Senator Simard: On this type of leadership.

Senator Frith: You want me to reflect?

Senator Simard: Take a pause.

Senator Frith: I am reflecting.

Senator Simard: Okay. Now you can go. If you have not found the missing link there, you had better.

Senator Barootes: That was the best 30 seconds of your speech so far!

Senator Frith: A golden silence, was it not? A golden silence. I want to tell you that, just as we are prepared to support a motion for adjournment at any time, and we are prepared to listen to any of those of you opposite who are prepared to repent, I am also prepared at any time to have a pause of whatever length you like for another golden silence.

Senator Simard: Take another one!

Senator Frith: Please just ask.

Senator Simard: Take another one!

Senator Frith: It could be like that from now until 2:00 o'clock, if you would simply move a motion of adjournment.

Senator Phillips: Tell us about the fashion show, Madame Pompadour.

Senator Frith: What was that?

Senator Phillips: Tell us about the fashion show.

Senator Frith: What fashion show?

Senator Phillips: I thought you were modelling tonight.

Senator Frith: No, I never was, and I never intended to. Is there anything else you would like to know?

Senator Phillips: No.

Senator Simard: Be quiet. He is reflecting.

Senator Frith: Isn't this nice?

Senator Hastings: You could do this until December 31.

Senator Frith: This is what they call killing time. It gives the reporters a bit of a rest, too.

• (0045)

Just so the next silence will be equally golden, I will punctuate it with some continuation of trying to help the Speaker find a possible rule that might help him. We were dealing with Paragraph (c) "Committee of the Whole". Now we come to Senator Doody, Paragraph (d) which states:

> "Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate" and "Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate"...

That is interesting, senators. I meant to make an offer to Senator Simard, while I am making comparisons of concordance between the French and English. Since his French is much, much better than mine, he would be of some help to us. However, I see that he is decamping.

Paragraph (d) states:

> "Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate" and "Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate" mean the senators occupying, respectively, the recognized positions of Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate...

I was just thinking what a great compliment Senator Phillips paid me by describing me, with the amount of hair I have, as Madame Pompadour. He is either blind or crazy.

> "Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate" and "Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate" mean the senators occupying, respectively, the recognized positions of Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate and Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate;

[Translation]

> d) «Le Leader du Gouvernement au Sénat» et «le Chef adjoint de l'Opposition au Sénat» s'entend des sénateurs occupant, respectivement, les postes reconnus de Leader reconnus de Leader adjoint du Gouvernement au Sénat et de Chef adjoint de l'Opposition au Sénat;

[English]

There is nothing there of any help to support—

Senator Lefebvre: What about Leader of the Opposition?

Senator Frith: Did I miss something? I have not come to that yet. I have just dealt with Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate and Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate means the senators. Therefore, the concordance is acceptable and there is nothing there to support the infamous lock-out vote. Paragraph (e) states:

> "Government Leader in the Senate" means the senator occupying the recognized position of Leader of the Government in the Senate or a senator acting for that senator;

Senator Lefebvre: That is my question. What about the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate?

Senator Frith: I believe that is referred to in the Parliament of Canada Act. We will have to check that. That is of no help.

Since it is quite evident that the Government Leader in the Senate was very actively engaged in the whole arrangement and the rigging of the lock-out vote, one might think there might be some help here; he might be able to blame it on the Government Leader. Paragraph (e) simply states:

> "Government Leader in the Senate" means the senator occupying the recognized position of Leader of the Government in the Senate or a senator acting for that senator;

[Translation]

> e) «Leader du Gouvernement au Sénat» signifie le sénateur qui occupe le poste reconnu de Leader du Gouvernement au Sénat, ou un sénateur qui agit en son nom;

[English]

Concordance is good, but there is no help to support the lock-out vote.

Paragraph (f) states:

> "inquiry" means the procedure whereby a senator, after giving notice in accordance with Rules 43 and 44, calls the attention of the Senate to a particular matter for the purpose of informing the Senate of that matter or having it considered or examined by the Senate;

[Translation]

> f) «interpellation» signifie la procédure par laquelle un sénateur, après avoir donné avis conformément aux règles 43 et 44, appelle l'attention du Sénat sur un sujet particulier dans le but d'informer le Sénat sur ce sujet ou de faire étudier ou examiner par le Sénat le sujet en question;

[English]

Although the words are in quite different order, Senator Lefebvre, I think that concords very well and there is nothing there to help in the infamous lock-out vote.

I do not intend to turn over to Rules 43 and 44, but they are referred to as "after giving notice in accordance with Rules 43 and 44". When we come to Rules 43 and 44, they will deal with the whole question of notice and we will be able to see them in their context, having by then dealt with a number of matters that are referred to in those sections.

In fact, as I mentioned at the beginning, Rule 43 is the first rule in Part III, Notices, so we will come to that. We might find something there to help Senator Charbonneau. I doubt it, but we might. At least we will know that we have combed all of the rules and we have tried to find any single possible authority for the outrageous acts of Thursday.

Part I, Paragraph (g) states:

> "joint committee" means a committee composed of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons;

[Translation]

> g) «comité mixte» signifie un comité mixte du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes;

[English]

There is nothing there of any help.

Paragraph (h) states:

> "leave of the Senate" means leave granted without a dissenting voice;

He certainly did not have leave of the Senate, because that means leave granted without a dissenting voice. It was never even asked for, and would certainly not have been granted if it had been asked for. It is unimaginable that anyone, except the 54 who participated in the vote, would give leave to have a vote held in their absence.

We know there was no intention to ask for leave, because we know the whole thing was planned, as we found out from Senator Pitfield today. In law, if someone were charged with murder, which is close to what was done in the parliamentary metaphor, the words used would be "premeditated, cold-blooded, planned". Is there any justification for using those words: "Cold-blooded, premeditated and planned?" Yes, there is. Senator Pitfield, we notice, was sitting when the bells started to ring and spoke to one of the 54 and one of the 54 spoke to him. At that stage when the bells had just started ringing, and before he had even risen, he was told that he had better stay pretty close because the Speaker was about to call them back. So everybody over there knew about it. There was no question at all of asking what was happening. There is no possibility for a plea of innocence or an absence of evil intent.

Sometimes when people are charged with such heinous offences in court, one argues that there must be what is called mens rea which means a guilty mind, an evil intent, a deliberate intent to break the law. We now know that not one of the 54 can plead as a defence that they knew not what they did, because it was all planned.

Senator Simard: Senator Frith, would you allow questions?

Senator Frith: Not until I am through with this point, sir.

Senator Simard: I will take your word now.

Senator Frith: I will entertain a question, even from someone with such a clear attempt to break the rules as Senator Simard and every one of his 53 cohorts. I will allow that question but not right now.

I want to make it clear, senator, that there is not one single possibility. We can now fit all the pieces together. However, there was one little gap. If you remember, what we knew was that Mr. Wilson, General Wilson, had a plan, "And that's not just bravado, Mike", he said to Mr. Duffy. "Michael, buddy, don't worry, that's not bravado, a humble man like me, Mr. Wilson." I suppose Mike Duffy said, "That's okay, Mike, I understand, Mike, a nice, quiet, unaggressive person like you, Mike, you wouldn't say it as a result of bravado. No one would accuse Mike of bravado, would you, Mike? No, I wouldn't, Mike."

So they were "Miking" away at each other and he said, "I have a plan and I'll get that bill through that place by next week." He probably did not say it that strongly, because that sounds like a little bravado. He probably said it very meekly, to be sure that no one thought it was bravado. If one can picture Mike Wilson saying to Mike Duffy, "I'm a very humble man, but I will have it through there by the end of next week, but that's not bravado, Mike".

Senator Simard: You are a poor actor.

Senator Frith: You are a very accomplished, bad actor which is a different thing. You understand that? That means bad actions; that is what a "bad actor" is.

Senator Simard: Would you allow my question now?

Senator Frith: Not yet, sir; be patient.

Senator Simard: Another broken Liberal promise!

Senator Frith: The first sign we have of the plot was Mike, without bravado, saying that he was going to get it through this place. That is the bill, the legislation, you understand. It was not a matter of saying that he knew how to handle the opposition. The implication was that he could do that; that he could overrun the opposition and get the bill through.

Some of us were asked how he could do that. We said that he could not do that under the rules; there was no doubt about that. However, if one was prepared to break the rules, which is in fact what I said, what could be done about that? There is no defence against someone simply trampling the rules and actually corrupting the Speaker into doing that. But what a wild thought, and it did not seem very possible. That is the first sign we got.

The next sign was when we started to deal with the business and I thought that Senator Murray and Senator Doody jumped up rather quickly. In fact, they jumped the gun, if one reads the Debates of the Senate. I will find that part. It is quite interesting, because it was another twitch.

Incidentally, as a companion piece to all of this, we have the entity sneaking through the tunnel and the attempt to swear them in secretly and not in the house. There was all of that business and the motions.

Here is what happened, as reported at page 2342 of the Debates of the Senate. I said:

> "I move that the Senate do now adjourn."

Without waiting, Senator Murray then said:

> "When Your Honour calls the division on this matter, my colleagues and I will be standing and calling for a recorded vote."

● (0100)

He could not wait. It was clear that the plot was then in motion.

The rest has been referred to; that is, receiving the letter and there being no time. I came down with my letter, trying to give it to the Speaker to say that he had no right to do what he had done, but the doors were locked. It was deliberate. Not only was a half hour given, no one else was notified of the clearly premeditated crime which was about to be committed. It was a parliamentary crime; I could not put it any better.

Senator Barootes: That was about the time that Senator Petten came in and cleared all the Liberal senators out of their seats and told them to get out.

Senator Frith: There is no doubt at all that Senator Petten was not ready to come in, in the same way as Senator Phillips has often said in the time I have been here, "No, I am not ready to come in," and has refused to come in. He probably came in and cleared people out, too.

Senator Barootes: Senator Petten cleared them out. He did not want to have them called found-ins.

Senator Frith: Yes, your whip has done the same thing. He has told the found-ins to get out. That is what he is entitled to do.

Senator Simard: You all received notice. Senator Fairbairn was on the telephone with you. You had received notice.

Senator Frith: What does that have to do with it? I will tell you what it has to do with it. I notice that you conveniently ignored the fact that the rule is that the whips have to be ready to come in, including your whip. Can anyone who has been here for the last few years imagine what Senator Phillips would have felt like if Senator Petten had come in and participated in a vote? I do not know how Senator Phillips could have participated in that vote when, as a party whip, he has said that there will be no vote until he comes in. Senator Phillips has said that, and no one has ever quarrelled with him.

I very clearly remember a time when there was a vote forced, during the time when Senator Flynn was leader. Senator John Macdonald was the whip and Senator Flynn made it quite clear, and so that I could hear him he said, "John, you go up and have a nice night's sleep". I knew what that meant. Quite obviously, that comment meant that there would be no vote until Senator John Macdonald came back. I never had any doubt about that. Does anyone think that I would go to the Speaker or have the Minister of Finance go to the Speaker to say, "Look, John Macdonald is up having a sleep, so, obviously the system has broken down and we will have a vote when Petten comes in by himself".

The significant thing is that they just want to talk about the notice. The notice is irrelevant as to whether the vote can be taken or not. However, it is very relevant to the fact that this was something premeditated by every one of you. So did you all, each one of you, participate in it. Not one of you wandered in here by mistake and got caught innocently in this crime. You are all guilty—not just guilty by association in the crime but guilty because you all knew about it, as we now know from Senator Pitfield that he was told, "Stick close by. That is what we are about to do".

There is not one inch of room for anything except repentance because every one of you was involved in the crime.

Senator Davey: Would you say that the die was cast?

Senator Frith: I would say that it was cast. It was spilt all over the rug like blood.

We will therefore not consider the paragraph on "leave of the Senate" because it is clear that there was no leave of the Senate. No one wanted to ask leave of the Senate that, in order to be absolutely sure that the final evidence of the smoking gun or the dripping hands like Macbeth were concealed, the doors had better be shut five minutes earlier. After all, we might have come in. It is just like a planned bank robbery. Every step was planned. However, at the last minute in order to be absolutely sure, they slammed the doors five minutes early, even though their own bank robber's plan called for—

Senator Simard: Would you allow a question?

Senator Frith: No. Don't call me, I'll call you.

Let us quit kidding ourselves. You are not looking for information. Look at the way you are wagging your hand. You will get your question, and I will let you know when.

Senator Simard: Will it be before 7 or after 7?

Senator Frith: Certainly between now and December 31.

I will now deal with the meaning of "motion". Perhaps there was a motion. It states under "motion":

> —means a proposal made by a senator that the Senate or a committee thereof do something, order something to be done, or express an opinion concerning some matter;

[Translation]

> i) «motion» signifie une proposition que fait un sénateur à l'effet d'obtenir que le Sénat, ou un de ses comités, agisse en tel sens, ordonne l'accomplissement de telle chose, ou exprime une opinion sur tel sujet;

● (0115)

[English]

That read well as a translation. It means a proposal made by a senator that the Senate or a committee thereof do something, order something to be done, or express an opinion concerning some matter. It is clear there was no motion. There is nothing in that whole rule which would help the Speaker to justify his actions, or the actions of his co-conspirators.

Thus far, in the parliamentary sense, it is still an outright plain and simple crime.

> "ordered by the Senate" or any expression of like import means ordered by majority decision;

There was no suggestion that it had been ordered by the Senate. No order was made by the Senate.

[Translation]

> k) «ordonné par le Sénat», ou toute expression voisine de ces termes, signifie ordonné par décision majoritaire;

[English]

> "person" or any word or expression descriptive of a person, includes any body corporate or politic, and the heirs, executors, administrators or legal representative of such person, and words importing male include female persons;

[Translation]

> l) «personne», ou tout mot désignant une personne, comprend toute personne juridique et tout corps politique, de même que les héritiers, exécuteurs, administrateurs, ou mandataires de cette personne; et les mots désignant des personnes du sexe masculin s'appliquent aussi à celles du sexe féminin;

[English]

There is certainly no help there. There were both men and women involved in this particular crime. There is nothing in that rule which would authorize the action being taken.

> "petition" means a written prayer presented to the Senate, and includes all petitions whether relating to public or private matters, matters of general policy, or to redress of local or personal grievances;

[Translation]

> m) «pétition» signifie une prière présentée par écrit au Sénat et comprend toutes pétitions, qu'elles aient trait à des questions d'intérêt public . . .

[English]

Senator Simard: Will you allow a question?

Senator Frith: Sure.

Senator Simard: I have two questions to ask of Senator Frith. First, have you found the rule that applied on September 24 at the Banking committee which was dealing with Bill C-62? Will you continue your search if you do not find one?

My second question has several parts. It has to do with the September 24 meeting where you advised, bulldozed and gave authorization to your chairman, Senator Buckwold. Was the procedure and scenario at that meeting a cold-blooded plan? Was it as a result of evil intent? Was it a premeditated crime? Was it a bank robbery? My answer to the last series of questions is that it was.

Senator Frith: You are now answering your own question.

Senator Simard: Yes. Do you want to confirm, deny or explain? You can elaborate at length if you so wish. I have asked two questions.

Senator Frith: We will certainly go through and look for a rule in terms of that. Of course, we do not need one because of the fact that the Speaker ruled that it was in order. You can read his ruling. Do you want me to read his ruling?

Senator Simard: I am asking you. You were there. You tell us which rule applies.

Senator Frith: I have the Speaker's ruling here. We want to talk about the decision of September 24 and what led up to it. You have asked if there is a rule on that? My answer to your question is this:—

Senator Simard: What rules apply?

Senator Frith: We will look for specific rules. In the meantime, let me tell you that your question was answered by the Speaker. He stated, as reported at page 2341 of Debates of the Senate:

> On Tuesday, September 25, 1990, questions of privilege were raised by Senators Ottenheimer, Poitras, Robertson, Simard, David, Barootes and Doody. Many senators took part in the ensuing debates and I want to thank them all. I said I would examine the issues very carefully and that after reading the official report for that day I would make my ruling at the earliest opportunity. I am now ready to make my ruling.
> Many of the points raised by honourable senators had to do with the proceedings of September 24, 1990 of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It was alleged that certain members of the committee had been prevented from performing their parliamentary duties. Some senators felt they did not have enough time to examine thoroughly the issues before them and said they had not had access to the committee's draft report on Bill C-62.
> Some senators found it unacceptable that committee staff were not available for the vice-chairman of the committee and other members. There were protests that a motion had been withdrawn without the unanimous consent of the committee and that no debate had been allowed on a given motion. Some senators were critical of the way the steering committee's sittings had been conducted and also of the manner in which the draft report was distributed more specifically, both versions of the report did not reach the senators' offices at the same time. There were also complaints that a draft report was released to the press before it was tabled in the Senate.
> It is the Chair's opinion that these points may be grounds for a grievance, but I do not think they are genuine questions of privilege. Beauchesne defines parliamentary privilege as "the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals." Although certain parliamentary rules may have been broken, and I repeat "may have been", there does not seem to have been a breach of rights or privileges.
> Some senators criticized certain actions and decisions by the chairman of the committee.
> In this connection, I may refer honourable senators to Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, Citation 607, which reads as follows:
> > "607.(1) All decisions of the Chairman may be appealed by the committee.
> > (2) There is no appeal to the House from the Chairman's ruling except by way of a report from the committee."
>
> Since these matters were not raised in a report from the Committee, they should not be debated in this House.
> In addition, a number of the points that were raised seemed to deal with questions relating to committee rules and procedure. Beauchesne is quite clear in this respect. I have here Citation 608: "Procedural difficulties which arise in committees ought to be settled in the committee and not in the House."
> For these reasons, I must conclude that when they raised these points last Tuesday, honourable senators did not raise genuine questions of privilege.

That is the answer to question one, but as we go through the rules—

Senator Simard: That is Senator Charbonneau's answer. I want your answer.

Senator Frith: We will keep looking, but it seems to me that that is a good answer.

Senator Kenny: Not bad.

Senator Simard: Which rules applied on September 24? What rules did you use to run and railroad the meeting of September 24? You were there. The Speaker was not there. There were no transcripts kept. You kicked out the press. What rules did you apply and what rules did you ensure the Chairman applied on that day? Was that not cold-blooded planning? Was that not bank robbery? Was that not the result of evil intent? I think it was.

Senator Frith: We understand each other on that point.

Senator Simard: We will get back to that.

Senator Frith: I was using the same parliamentary authority that received the imprimatur of the Speaker.

Senator Simard: As you said so many times on that day, the will of the majority must prevail at all times. That was the only rule that you applied on that day. That is why we are in the mess we are in now.

Senator Frith: You next question was this: Was the September 24 meeting a cold-blooded, planned, premeditated crime? It was cold-blooded; it was planned; it was premeditated.

Senator Simard: But by you, sir?

Senator Frith: Quite right, sir. Do you not intend to wait for the answers to your questions?

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Frith: Can your bladder not handle it? Why would you ask me questions and then walk out when I am giving you an answer? In case Senator Simard asks me a question again, I want it noted that he walks out when I am giving the answer.

Senator Simard: I will stay, but speak up.

Senator Frith: Is that a problem? That is new. The question was this: Was that meeting and what took place at that meeting—to quote Senator Simard—cold-blooded? I do not know whether it was cold-blooded or warm-blooded. Was it planned? Yes, it was planned. Was it premeditated in the sense of being planned? Yes, it was. Was it a crime? No, because, as we found from the ruling, it was an authorized procedure. Those are the answers to your questions. If you would like to ask more questions, we will give you more answers.

We were at—

Senator Barootes: Has your memory gone?

Senator Frith: I cannot remember where we were. Can you help me, senator?

We were at "petition" and we found nothing of help to anyone defending themselves against the charge of the parliamentary crime.

> (n) "previous question" means a motion "that the original question be now put";

[Translation]

> n) «question préalable» signifie une motion posée en ces termes: que la question initiale soit maintenant . . .

[English]

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I call a quorum. Pursuant to section 8 of the rules, it is the duty of the Speaker to adjourn the house.

Senator Frith: Adjourn the house, please. Adjourn the house, please. That is what this says.

Senator Hastings: There is no quorum present.

Senator Simard: I have a point of order.

Senator Frith: Now we will see whether this Speaker will apply the rules.

Senator Simard: I rise on a point of order.

Senator Hastings: He is not up on a point of order.

Senator Oliver: He is up on a point of order. Let him speak.

Senator Frith: You cannot do that when a quorum has been called. Listen to the Speaker. The Speaker will do what is right.

Senator Oliver: There is no rule.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please. I should like to read Rule number 8:

> When it appears, on notice being taken at the commencement of or during a sitting of the Senate, that fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned, the Speaker shall adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day, without question put.

I should like to ask for a moment to consult with the Officers at the Table.

Senator Frith: It is so clear, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It may well be, honourable senators. I am not arguing that point.

Senator Frith: We understand, but you are going to take long enough—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Hastings: There are 14 senators present now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Frith: We are quiet.

Senator Oliver: Let the record show that they sent out Senator Stollery.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I realize that it is late. I do not have a great deal of experience with this matter of quorum. I am asking for order, and I wish to take a moment to ask the advice of the Officers at the Table. Rule 8 says:

> ". . . the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned . . ." I should like to ask the Table Officers what that means.

Senator Frith: Whatever advice you get is based on the fact that there is presently not a quorum?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Yes.

Senator Frith: Thank you, that is fair.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would ask honourable senators to give me a moment.

Senator Simard: You asked one of your members to leave the room.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: With great respect, may I suggest to the Chair that I believe our rules call for the whips to have an opportunity to call in the senators.

Senator Frith: Look who is asking about the whips! I am satisfied that the Speaker will rule on this matter on the basis that there was not a quorum, and do what is required in that case. That is what he said.

Senator Hastings: There was no quorum.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to have a short period of time to ask the Officers at the Table specifically the application of the rule in the circumstances, because I do not know, to be perfectly frank.

Senator Frith: But on the basis that there was not a quorum. That is what I asked you, and you said yes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Yes, on the basis of the situation in this place.

Senator Oliver: He sent his people out of the chamber. There was a quorum before he tried to cheat.

Senator Phillips: There were 18 senators present when the quorum was called.

Senator Frith: There is another Speaker gone.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I have read Rule 8 again. I have had no opportunity to do any research. I will inform honourable senators of my decision based upon the information and advice I have received from the Officers at the Table.

Rule 8 says:

> When it appears, on notice being taken at the commencement of or during a sitting of the Senate, that fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned, the Speaker shall adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day, without question put.

I required a short period of time in which to rule on this matter because I did not know what the phrase "the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned" implied. I am informed that that means the Speaker directs the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod or an Officer of the Senate to go immediately to the adjoining rooms, which means the common room, and summon them, and if they do not come in in a short period of time—and that is relatively subjective—then that condition is met. The Speaker shall then adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day without question put.

I will now direct the appropriate Officer of the Senate to go to the adjoining room, which I understand to be the common room, and summon senators. If such senators do not turn up, then I shall do as the rule directs.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, it does not say anything about turning up or not turning up. It says that they be summoned. I take it that you intend to summon them. When you summon them in, then you adjourn the Senate. It says: ". . . having been previously summoned . . ." It does not say having been summoned and come in and established a quorum. You are summoning them to come in to explain why you are adjourning the Senate, because there was no quorum.

• (0130)

Senator Simard: You had better check with Senator MacEachen.

Senator Frith: It does not say anything about after they have come in. It simply says that after you have summoned them, you adjourn without question put.

Senator Balfour: In your opinion.

Senator Frith: That is what it says.

Senator Balfour: In your opinion.

Senator Frith: It is not my opinion, it is what the words say. You always say that. When the words say something, you say, "Oh, it is just a matter of opinion."

Senator Balfour: That is your opinion.

Senator Frith: You are not even looking at the book. It does not say anything about that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I agree.

Senator Balfour: Why don't you appeal the Speaker's ruling? That is what you have always done.

Senator Frith: I want him to make the right ruling. So far, he is all right in that he can summon the senators, but then the rules say that he must adjourn without putting the question.

Senator Simard: Now, make sure that you don't leave the house!

Senator Hastings: You have previously summoned them!

Senator Frith: You have previously summoned them and then adjourned.

Senator Hastings: There was no quorum.

Senator Frith: I notice that everyone who is talking about opinions is not looking at the book.

Your Honour, the words are very clear, and I hope that you will carry on by implementing the words that are there.

Senator Simard: Was this vanishing act premeditated?

Senator Barootes: Where were the delinquents from your side who are now showing up?

An Hon. Senator: Get Senator Croll back here!

Senator Barootes: They were certainly not very interested in your speech!

Senator Hastings: They were being summoned to adjourn.

Senator Frith: They were being summoned for the adjournment. That is what it says.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Then I will read it again:

> When it appears, on notice being taken at the commencement of or during a sitting of the Senate, that fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned, the Speaker shall adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day, without question put.

[English]

Honourable senators, not having had an opportunity to do any research or to quote precedent, I must be guided by the advice I am given by the Officers at the Table. The advice that I am given, which I accept and make as my ruling, is that our precedents require a summonsing and if the summonsing results within a short period of time—however one may define that—in a quorum, then the house does not adjourn without question. That is my ruling.

Senator Frith: So what have you done?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Briefly, I said that I had not had an opportunity to personally examine the precedents. I have asked two Officers at the Table for their understanding of the precedents in this regard. They inform me that their understanding is to the effect that when notice is taken that there is not a quorum present, an officer of the house may be sent to summon senators in the adjoining room—and I understand that to mean the common room—and after a short period of time following the summons, if a quorum is not then present, the Speaker may adjourn the House without question put.

However, if after a short period of time a quorum is present, the Speaker does not adjourn the House. Although the rule in both official languages is equally official and equally operative, it appears to be clearer in the French version. Perhaps I will read it, as that is all I can do. It reads:

[Translation]

Then I will read it again:

> When it appears, on notice being taken at the commencement of or during a sitting of the Senate, that fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previoulsy summoned, the Speaker shall adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day, without question put.

[English]

It seems to me that there is a condition there, and that is the advice I get from the Officers at the Table. That condition has been met. If there is a quorum here now after that so-called summoning, the Senate then continues. I do not adjourn under those circumstances. That, to the best of my ability, is the ruling.

Senator Frith: Of course, I am disappointed but not surprised. Now, we were at the subrule dealing with the previous question.

Senator Kenny: Would you like to start over at the beginning?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Kenny: Some of the senators missed it, though.

Senator Frith: Some of them were in the adjoining room.

Senator Kenny: That's right and they missed the good part.

Senator Hastings: Senator Doody didn't get it.

Senator Frith: Senator Doody did not get it as he was in an adjoining room, lounging around.

Senator Kenny: Could we have a recapitulation for them perhaps?

Senator Frith: Snoozing in his opulent office.

Senator Doody: You have got it.

Senator Kenny: Anything to bring them into context.

Senator Doody: Until I was rudely interrupted.

Senator Frith: I should say, for the "lounge lizards" who were brought in from the adjoining rooms that we were talking about—

Senator Kenny: "Lounge lizards" should not be confused with the "swamp senators."

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Kenny: They are separate.

Senator Frith: Anyway, we examined in French and English rules 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. We were dealing with Rule 5 and were trying to find some authority—and we maintain that there is none—for Thursday's Parliamentary crime, because, of course, if there is such authority, it was not a crime. However, we were not able to find anything up to the point that we had reached. We were at Rule 5(0), which reads:

> "question", except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege, means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner;

[Translation]

> o) «question», sauf en ce qui concerne la période de questions et les questions de privilège, signifie une proposition que le Président du Sénat, ou de l'un de ses comités, soumet au Sénat ou au comité pour étude et décision;

[English]

So that rule in French and English is of no help and offers no defense to the accused at all. There is no basis for a defence. Rule 5(p) reads:

> "rule" means any standing rule or standing order of the Senate;

[Translation]

> p) «règle» signifie tout article du présent Règlement ou ordre permanent du Sénat;

[English]

There is no help there. There is no question because no rule was cited by the Speaker when he performed the final act in the crime.

Rule 5(q) reads:

> "select committee" means a committee composed of less than the whole body of senators and includes both a standing committee and a special committee;

[Translation]

> q) «comité particulier» signifie un comité comprenant moins que l'ensemble des sénateurs et comprend tant un comité permanent qu'un comité spécial;

[English]

There is no help there. A select committee was not involved in this crime at all.

Rule 5(r) reads:

> "shall" is to be construed as imperative, and "may" as permissive;

[Translation]

> r) «doit» ou «devra» devant un infinitif, exprime une obligation; «peut» ou «pourra», devant un infinitif, exprime une faculté;

[English]

The French is worded quite differently but I think that Senator Lefebvre has arrived at the same result; namely, that there is no help there because there is no reference to any «shall» or «may» as in the context of a rule. Rule 5(s) reads:

> «special committee» means a select committee other than a standing committee appointed to consider certain matters and to report thereon to the Senate;

[Translation]

> s) «comité spécial» signifie un comité particulier autre qu'un comité permanent nommé aux fins d'étudier certains sujets et d'en faire rapport au Sénat;

[English]

No concern here, as a special committee was not involved in any way. Rule 5(t) reads:

> "standing committee" means a select committee appointed to consider and to report thereon to the Senate matters falling within the duties specifically assigned to it by these rules, and on other matters that may from time to time be referred to it by the Senate;

[Translation]

> t) «comité permanent» signifie un comité particulier chargé d'examiner, pour ensuite en faire rapport au Sénat, des sujets relevant des fonctions qui lui sont spécifiquement attribuées par le présent Règlement et autres sujets qui peuvent de temps à autre lui être soumis par le Sénat;

[English]

I think the concordance applies again, that there is nothing in that rule that could possible be stretched, bent or twisted to support the stretched, bent, and twisted actions of last Thursday in holding the lockout vote.

Rule 5(u) reads:

> "substantive motion" means an independent motion neither incidental to nor relating to a proceeding or order of the day already before the Senate;

[Translation]

> u) «motion de fond» signifie une motion distincte, indépendante, qui n'est accessoire ni relative à une affaire en cours d'étude ou prévue à l'ordre du jour dont le Sénat est déjà saisi;

[English]

An acceptable concordance. The motion that was before the Senate at the time was a motion to adjourn. There is nothing in there. There was no reference or no attempt to relate any of the action to that rule. Although there was a motion before the house, there is nothing in that rule that would make the lockout crime justifiable.

Rule 5(v) reads:

> "two days' notice" means a notice where a sitting day intervenes between the day on which the notice is given and the day on which the motion or inquiry is made;

[Translation]

v) «avis de deux jours» signifie un avis permettant que s'écoule un jour de séance entre le jour de l'avis et celui où la motion ou l'interpellation est présentée;

[English]

There was no problem there. The motion that was before the Senate at that time was a motion for adjournment, which can be made without notice. Again, I invite the government to make a motion for adjournment now so that the staff and everyone else can get some rest between now and 2:00 O'Clock, and I guarantee that we will support such a motion just so that it is clear that the people who are staying here are staying because the government insists on not adjourning, and not because we would not support an adjournment.

As for that two days' notice section, as I mentioned we will be getting into the rules around Rule 44. I think it starts at 44, dealing with notices, but there was nothing involving that rule in the actions that were taken by the speaker and the infamous 54 last Thursday. Continuing:

(w) "writing", "written" or any term of like import includes words printed, typewritten, painted, engraved, lithographed, photographed, or represented or reproduced by any mode of representing or reproducing words in a visible form.

In French:

[Translation]

w) «écrit», ou tout terme ayant le même sens, comprend les mots imprimés, dactylographiés, peints, gravés, lithographiés, photographiés, ou représentés ou reproduits par tout mode de représentation ou reproduction de mots sous une forme visible.

• (0145)

[English]

There was a writing. There was a letter. There was a letter dropped off to start the whole scheme that ended up with the infamous vote, but there was never any suggestion that the question of whether a letter was written or not written had anything whatever to do with the rules of the Senate which deal with the whole taking of a vote, very specifically and very clearly, and to use the words of this rule, in a very visible form, namely on page 70.

Next is Rule 6:

These rules shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Senate.

[Translation]

6. Le présent Règlement doit entrer en vigueur le jour fixé par le Sénat au moyen d'un ordre à cet effet.

[English]

Honourable senators will be pleased to know that I mean, on another occasion, to continue what I am finding, and what I hope they are finding, to be a most edifying review of the rules in an attempt to find some justification, although it looks quite hopeless, or some defence for the accused against the charges that have been made of the Parliamentary crime committed last Thursday.

Senator Doody: Good speech!

Senator Frith: In other words, more later.

Senator Doody: Keep tuned!

Senator Frith: Yes, stay tuned. Don't give up.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable Senators, it is clear to me that some on the other side are not fully aware of our position, so I think I will review it, if I may.

Senator Barootes: Is "Silent Colin" going to speak now?

Senator Kenny: "Silent Colin" is speaking. I will review, if I may, the material that was filed at the court today, and I will start with this document I have here. It refers to an action between the Honourable Romeo Leblanc, the Honourable George Van Roggen, the Honourable H. A. Bud Olsen, the Honourable Richard J. Stanbury, the Honourable D. G. Steuart, the Honourable Philippe D. Gigantes, the Honourable Jacques Hébert, the Honourable Charlie Watt, the Honourable Michael Kirby, the Honourable Paul Lucier, Applicants, and Her Majesty the Queen in the Right of Canada, the Attorney General for Canada, and His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, Respondents.

APPLICATION

1. THE APPLICANTS MAY MAKE APPLICATION FOR:

(a) an order declaring that the Letters Patent issued by Her Majesty on September 27, 1990 directing that eight members be added to the Senate of Canada are of no force or effect;

(b) an order declaring that the Summonses by the Governor General of Canada dated September 27, 1990 purportedly appointing the eight individuals to the Senate of Canada are of no force or effect;

(c) an order declaring that the purported appointments of the eight individuals are of no force or effect;

(d) in the alternative, if these Senate appointments are valid, an oOrder declaring that the Province of New Brunswick is entitled to have its representation in the House of Commons increased to at least eleven members and further declaring that until such increase in New Brunswick's representation is effected, the House of Commons is not properly constituted and cannot lawfully enact legislation or otherwise transact business except to the extent necessary to give effect to New Brunswick's entitlement to increased representation;

(e) an order for trial of the issue concerning the circumstances in which Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 can be employed on the grounds as set out in paragraphs 2(c) to 2(e) (PART B) in this application and the evidence admitted under PART B of the Affidavit of The Honourable Royce Frith, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Canada;

(f) an order abridging the time for service of this Notice of Application;

(g) their costs of this application; and

(h) such further and other relief as to this Honourable Court seems just.

2. THE GROUNDS FOR THE APPLICATION ARE:

PART A: SECTION 51A

(a) Section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867 entitles a province to at least as many members in the House of Commons as Senators who represent such province;

(b) The Province of New Brunswick is entitled to be represented by ten members in the House of Commons. With the appointment by the Governor General of Canada of the eight individuals to the Senate on September 27, 1990, the number of senators representing the Province of New Brunswick was purportedly increased by one so that they would now number eleven, contrary to Section 51A. Accordingly, the appointments are of no force or effect;

PART B: SECTION 26

(c) The purpose underlying Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is that it is only to be invoked to remedy a deadlock between the two Houses of Parliament of so serious and permanent a character that the government otherwise could not be carried on.

• (0200)

(d) There is no such deadlock at present between the two Houses. Accordingly, the purported appointment of the eight individuals to the Senate of Canada under Section 26 is ultra vires this section and of no force or effect.

(e) Rule 38.11(1)(b) and 38.11(3) of the rules of the court;

ADDITIONAL GROUNDS FOR PARTS A AND B

(f) Section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

(g) Rules 3.02, 14.05(3)(d) and (h) of the rules of court;

(h) Section 110 of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984; and

(i) Such further and other grounds as the applicants may raise and his Honourable Court permit.

3. THE FOLLOWING DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE will be used at the hearing of the application:

(a) The Affidavit of The Honourable Royce Frith, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Canada, sworn October 4, 1990 and the exhibits thereto;

(b) Such further and other material as counsel may advise and this Honourable Court permit.

October 4, 1990.

AFFIDAVIT OF THE HONOURABLE ROYCE FRITH

I, Royce Frith, of the City of Ottawa, in the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Canada representing the Division and the Province of Ontario since 1977, MAKE OATH AND SAY:

(1) PART A: Violation of s. 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Applicant, The Honourable George Van Roggen, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Western Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of British Columbia.

2. The Applicant, The Honourable H.A. (Bud) Olson, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Western Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of Alberta.

3. The Applicant, The Honourable D.G. Steuart, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Western Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of Saskatchewan.

4. The Applicant, The Honourable Richard J. Stanbury, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Ontario.

5. The Applicant, The Honourable Jacques Hébert, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Quebec.

6. The Applicant, The Honourable Philippe D. Gigantès, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Quebec.

7. The Applicant, The Honourable Charlie Watt, is a member of the Senate from the Division and Province of Quebec.

8. The Applicant, The Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Maritime Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of New Brunswick.

9. The Applicant, The Honourable Paul Lucier, is a member of the Senate from the Yukon Territory.

10. The Applicant, The Honourable Michael Kirby, is a member of the Senate from the Division of the Maritime Provinces and he further represents within that Division the Province of Nova Scotia.

11. On or about September 26, 1990, the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, issued a "Minute of Council". This Minute of Council, attached as Exhibit "1" requested the Governor General to recommend that Her Majesty the Queen issue Letters Patent directing that eight members be added to the Senate pursuant to Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

12. Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides as follows:

If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

13. Immediately prior to September 27, 1990 the Governor General of Canada, Ramon John Hnatyshyn, recommended to Her Majesty the Queen by letter that additional Senators be appointed pursuant to Section 26.

14. On September 27, 1990 Her Majesty the Queen approved the Governor General's recommendation and issued the Letters Patent. The Letters Patent issued by Her Majesty the Queen have been published in the Canada Gazette. A copy of the relevant excerpt from the Canada Gazette dated Monday October 1, 1990 is attached as Exhibit "2". The Letters Patent directed the Governor General, pursuant to Section 26, to add eight members to the Senate.

15. Upon receipt of the Letters Patent the Governor General issued eight Summonses purporting to appoint eight individuals to sit in the Senate. The Summonses also specify the place of residence of the purported appointees. The purported appointees are as follows:

(a) Michael Arthur Meighen, a resident of the Province of Ontario;

(b) Wilbert Jospeh Keon, a resident of the Province of Ontario;

(c) Janis Johnson, a resident of the Province of Manitoba;

(d) Eric Arthur Berntson, a resident of the Province of Saskatchewan;

(e) Norman Grimard, a resident of the Province of Quebec;

(f) Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, resident of the Province of Quebec;

(g) John Michael Forrestall, a resident of the Province of Nova Scotia; and

(h) James W. Ross, a resident of the Province of New Brunswick.

Copies of the eight Summonses are attached as Exhibits "3" to "10".

16. Pursuant to Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867, before taking his or her seat in the Senate a person must "take and subscribe before the Governor General or some person authorized by him" the Declaration of Qualification contained in the Fifth Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1867. Attached as Exhibit "11" is a copy of the Declaration as required by the Fifth Schedule. Attached as Exhibits "12" to "19" are the eight Declarations of the purported appointees.

• (0215)

17. Exhibit "12", the Declaration of James W. Ross, affirms that James W. Ross "of the Maritimes" is "seized as of Freehold . . . in the Division of the Maritimes". Although the Commission for James Ross (Exhibit "3") lists his residence as Fredericton, New Brunswick, his Declaration does not specify his Province, as is required by Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Fifth Schedule. John Michael Forrestall, Janis Johnson and Eric Arthur Berntson similarly fail to specify their Provinces in their Declarations.

18. Under Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provision is made for adding either four or eight members to the Senate. Such additions must represent equally the Four Divisions of Canada which for this purpose Section 22 deems to be:

1. Ontario;

2. Quebec;

3. The Maritime Provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island;

4. The Western Provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta

Therefore, there must be either two additions for each of the four Divisions or one addition for each of the four Divisions.

19. Section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867 states that a Province shall always be entitled to at least as many members in the House of Commons as there are Senators representing such Province:

51A. Notwithstanding anything in this Act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

20. Immediately prior to the eight purported appointments in question, the Maritime Provinces were represented as follows by a total of 24 Senators and 25 Members of the House of Commons:

	Senate Members	House of Commons Members
Nova Scotia	10	11
New Brunswick	10	10
Prince Edward Island	4	4
(TOTAL)	24	25

21. Therefore, by reason of Section 51A, it would not have been possible, without first increasing the Maritime Provinces' representation in the House of Commons, to increase Nova Scotia's Senate representation by more than one member, nor to make any increases at all in the Senate representation of either New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island.

22. It follows that the Government could not lawfully use Section 26 to add eight members to the Senate unless it was also prepared to increase the number of members of the House of Commons pursuant to section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1867 which reads as follows:

> 52. The number of Members of the House of Commons may be from Time to Time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate Representation of the Provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

23. The said Letters Patent purported to direct and authorize the appointment of eight additional members to the Senate of Canada in circumstances where it was not possible to appoint more that four additional members without violating Section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Applicants' position herein is, therefore, that the said Letters Patent and the eight appointments purportedly made under the authority thereof, were inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada and of no force or effect.

24. Among the eight purported appointees is James W. Ross who, as explained above, is a resident of the Province of New Brunswick. The result of Mr. Ross' appointment, if it were valid, would be to give New Brunswick 11 representatives in the Senate and only 10 representatives in the House of Commons, contrary to Section 51A, an overriding provision that by its terms is declared to apply "Notwithstanding anything in the Act . . . ".

(2) PART B: Improper Use of Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867

25. The Government of Canada's reasons for making these appointments pursuant to Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 were given by the Prime Minister in a speech to the Progressive Conservative Canada Fund in Ottawa on September 25, 1990. An excerpt of the speech, as published by the Toronto Globe and Mail on September 28, 1990, is attached as Exhibit "20". The Prime Minister is concerned that certain Bills including the Goods and Services Tax ("G.S.T.") will not be passed by the Senate and, in order to assure the passage of those Bills, has used section 26 in order to obtain the support of eight additional Senators. The Prime Minister alleges that there is "deadlock between the two Houses of Parliament" and that there is no other way "to break the deadlock caused by the Opposition" other than through the use of section 26.

26. Attached as Exhibit "21" is a press report from the Toronto Globe and Mail dated October 2, 1990. According to the press report the government intends to press for a quick vote on Bill C-62 (the Bill proposing the G.S.T.). The finance Minister, Michael Wilson, is quoted as telling reporters on October 1, 1990 outside the House of Commons that "the legislation will get through".

27. No such "deadlock" between the two Houses of Parliament, as mentioned by the Prime Minister, existed on September 27, 1990 and no such "deadlock" exists now. The reasons for this are as follows.

28. There are a number of Bills currently before the Senate. These are as follows:

> (a) Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multi-Culturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto;
> (b) Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act;
> (c) Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and other Acts;
> (d) Bill C-34, an Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof;

Senator Davey: Senator Kenny, Excuse me. I wonder if you would repeat (b) again, please.

Senator Kenny: Yes, senator, I would be glad to. This is for you, Senator Davey, or for Senator Doody.

Senator Doody: I am interested too,

Senator Kenny: I will go back to (a), Senator Doody.

Senator Doody: Go back as far as you like.

Senator Kenny:

> (a) Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multi-Culturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto;
> (b) Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act;
> (c) Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and other Acts;
> (d) Bill C-34, an Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof;

• (0230)

> (e) Bill C-39, an Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof;
> (f) Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion;
> (g) Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and other Acts ("the G.S.T. Bill");
> (h) Bill C-69, an Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures.

With respect to Bills C-21, C-28 and C-62:

(a) Bill C-21 and Bill C-28 were passed by the Senate on March 3, 1990 and June 15, 1990, albeit with amendments;

(b) Bill C-62 is still at the Report stage and no debate or vote on the Committee Report has taken place; and

(c) there is a motion presently before the Senate that the difference between the two Houses on certain amendments to Bill C-21 be referred to a Conference between the two Houses but to date the Prime Minister and his government have refused such a Conference.

None of these bills has been defeated in a vote in the Senate.

29. Most bills sent up from the House of Commons are accepted and passed without amendment, but this has not always been the case in the past. Under the Constitution Act, 1867 the Senate has the same powers as the House of Commons, except with respect to money bills which under section 53 must originate in the House of Commons. Thus, the Senate has the power and the right to accept, reject or amend Bills sent up from the Commons.

30. In my experience, it is accepted practice that the Senate will on occasion amend or reject a Bill sent up from the Commons. According to F.A. Kunz, The Modern Senate of Canada 1925-1963: A Re-Appraisal (1965), Appendix 1, which is attached as Exhibit "22", of 2,136 Bills passed by the House of Commons between the 1925 and 1962-63 Sessions, 324 (15.2%) were amended, 32 (1.5%) rejected, 1,772 (83.0%) passed without amendment and 8 (0.4%) withdrawn. Since the current government took office in 1984, out of 318 Bills, 300 (94.3%) have been passed unchanged by the Senate, 18 (5.7%) have been passed with amendments and none have been rejected.

31. With respect to the holding of Joint Conferences with the House of Commons, this mechanism has often been used since Confederation in order to resolve disputes between the two Houses concerning amendments to legislation. Attached as Exhibits "23" and "24" are two papers prepared by Habib Massoud of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament which outline the instances in which a Joint Conference has been held.

32. The use of the appointment power in section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 in the circumstances of this case seriously undermines the position of the Senate in the legislative process and impairs the functioning of the Senate as a body to provide "sober second thought" concerning proposed law.

33. I have reviewed a research paper prepared by Mollie Dunsmuir entitled "Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867: The Power to Appoint Additional Senators". Ms. Dunsmuir is a Research officer with the Law and Government Division of the Library of Parliament. This research paper is attached as Exhibit "25".

34. I have also reviewed a 1946 article by Eugene Forsey entitled "Appointment of Extra Senators Under Section 26 of the British North America Act". A copy of this article is attached as Exhibit "26".

35. From these sources and from the statistical evidence in paragraph 14, above, I conclude that even though the Senate has frequently amended or rejected legislation, section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 has been invoked only once before, in 1873-1874. In 1874, Her Majesty the Queen refused to accept the recommendation of the Governor General in circumstances where no "deadlock" was present.

36. Exhibit "25" extensively canvasses evidence which is of assistance in determining the meaning of section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and makes the following conclusions:

(a) section 26 arose as a result of a Resolution at the London Conference immediately prior to Confederation;

(b) it was the intention of the British Government and the colonial Delegates to the London Conference that section 26 was to be used only onextraordinary occasions when a situation of serious and irreconcilable deadlock existed;

(c) previous drafts of section 26 clearly demonstrated this intention; and

(d) numerous experts on Canadian constitutional law confirm that it was intended that section 26 be used only on extraordinary occasions when a situation of serious and irreconcilable deadlock existed.

Ms. Dunsmuir herself concludes that:

> . . . [S]ection 26 was to be used only when there was a collision of opinion between the two Houses of so serious and permanent a character that the government was incapacitated. Additionally, it had to be at least possible, and perhaps probable, that the extra appointments would resolve the problem.

● (0245)

37. I have reviewed Chapter V of G. Ross, The Senate of Canada: Its Constitutional Powers and Duties Historically Considered (1914), which is attached as Exhibit "27". This source explains that cases of considerable public importance have arisen in which the action of the Senate was regarded at the time as "a wanton interference with the prerogatives of the popular Chamber". Five such cases are listed on pp. 74 and 75, but in none of these did the government of the day resort to the use of section 26. In the fifth listed case, the controversy surrounding the Naval Aid Bill, the delaying of the bill resulted in the calling of a general election so the verdict of the electors could be obtained on the measure.

38. I attended the Senate on October 2, 1990 and observed that the eight purported appointees were present. From the debate that took place in the Senate it appears to me that they intend to participate in Senate proceedings, debate and vote as soon as possible.

39. If the eight purported appointees take part in Senate proceedings and vote on Bills pending this Honourable Court's determination of these issues and this Honourable Court ultimately holds that the appointments were improperly made, then all legislation passed by the Senate, including the eight purported appointees, from September 27, 1990 may be ruled invalid. If the Senate passes the Bills pending the final resolution of this matter by this Honourable Court, persons who suffer damage as a result of relying upon and acting in accordance with legislation subsequently found to be invalid may not legally recover compensation for that damage. Finally, unless the eight purported appointees are prevented from acting as Senators until such time as their rights and qualifications to do so is resolved, considerable uncertainty and confusion will be caused by the uncertain status of any legislation passed with the assistance of the eight purported appointees.

SWORN before me at the City of Ottawa, in the Regional Municipality of Ottawa
Carleton, this 4th day of October, 1990. Royce Frith

David Wilson
Commissioner for taking Affidavits

Honourable senators, I am torn; I am not sure which would be most productive, whether I should go through this again, as there seems to be a fair amount of interest on the other side—

Senator Simard: Do it in French.

Senator Kenny: —or I could go on to major issues raised during the hearings on Bill C-62. I am in your hands.

Senator Doody: Don't do it.

Senator Kenny: I will deal with the hearings on Bill C-62 first.

Senator Frith: More, more.

[Senator Kenny.]

Senator Kenny: Allow me to deal with the major interests raised during the hearings on Bill C-62.

I. THE GST CREDIT SYTEM

A. Indexation

The system of GST credits is subject to the same indexation provisions that apply to the income tax system in general; that is, the credits and the threshold are indexed to the rate of inflation, measured by changes in the CPI, in excess of three per cent. Thus the real value of these credits will generally decline by 3 per cent per year.

Virtually all opponents of the tax cited this feature as a major flaw in Bill C-62. Some proponents of the bill also commented critically on this feature.

The credits, in addition to other elements of the tax reform package, are designed to make the GST package progressive at the lower to middle income levels. As the real value of these credits declines with inflation, this progressivity will diminish.

The government has responded to this point by stating that the FST credit has been increased at more than the rate of inflation. At issue is whether the increases were to offset higher tax rates or declines in the real value of the credit due to inflation.

B. The Single Person's Credit.

A unique feature of the GST credit regime is the additional credit made available to single adults. This credit is not available to those with incomes below about $6000 and the maximum value of the credit is available only to those with incomes in excess of about $11,000. Many witnesses decried the fact that the credit is not available to those who most need it. The House of Commons Finance Committee recommended that the single person's credit be abolished and any savings used to enhance the credit for the first adult in each family.

C. The Take Up Rate.

Some witnesses argued that the GST is particularly onerous for the most disadvantaged of canadians who will not file for a GST refundable credit because they have no taxable income.

● (0300)

One suggestion was for the Government to undertake a major outreach program to ensure that all Canadians eligible for the credit do in fact receive it.

The take-up rate for the refundable child tax credit is very high, about 96 per cent of those registered to receive family allowance payments. This high take-up rate can be explained by the personal characteristics of those who are responsible for children and the fact that the credit is relatively generous. It is possible that some transient individuals will not apply for the tax credit; however, with a relatively generous credit such individuals have a strong incentive to inform themselves about the credit and apply for it.

The Committee also heard from native and social policy groups that illiteracy poses a serious problem for the take-up rate of the GST credit.

D. Social assistance and the GST credit

Some witnesses expressed a fear that provincial governments will treat the refundable GST credit as income and reduce social assistance payments accordingly. This fear was expressed in several provinces although no evidence was presented that such would be the case.

Social assistance is usually determined by calculating a family's financial needs and comparing this with the financial resources of the applicant for assistance. In no province or territory is the existing refundable child tax credit or sales tax credit considered as income for the purpose of determining social assistance benefits. In Saskatchewan, family allowance receipts are treated as income, but this is the exception, not the rule.

II. FST INVENTORY REBATE

When the GST comes in to force on 1 January 1991, a very broad range of goods and services will be subject to this new tax. Some goods sold in that year will come from inventory acquired earlier, upon which the FST applied. To avoid a double taxation of sales from this inventory, the federal government is offering a rebate of the FST on existing inventory at the end of the year.

These inventory rebate rates are not included in Bill C-62 — they are determined by regulation.

These rebates do not vary according to trade level. The average FST content in a retailer's inventory would generally be lower than the FST content of the inventory of, say, a wholesaler or importer. The general rebate rate is 8.1 per cent of the value of inventory. An exception is made for automobile dealers who get an inventory rebate of 11.9 per cent (calculated as 13.5/113.5) because the FST for automobiles is applied at the wholesale level.

The nature of the FST makes it difficult to determine exactly how much tax is imbedded in inventories. Rebate formula, while arbitrary, are likely to be an acceptable compromise for practical reasons. The committee has heard some evidence of apparent inequities in the effects of these rules. Automobile dealers are not the only taxpayers whose inventories contain a tax far higher than the 8.1 per cent level, nor are they the only ones who can easily calculate and identify the amount of tax in inventories.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear. Good stuff!

Senator Kenny: To continue:

The committee has heard from associations of cosmetics and toiletries firms, pleasure craft dealers, and importers, all of whom claim that the rebate percentage penalizes them significantly and who also believe that they can identify accurately the amount of tax in their inventory.

Broadly based rebate rules will penalize some while overly compensating others. If the government provides the higher rebate to the groups listed above, there is still an equity problem, although not as easily identified among the remaining taxpayers.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Kenny: To continue:

The Minister of National Revenue has responded, in a letter to the chairman, to the comments of importers. He offered no additional relief, stating that importers have the opportunity to manage their affairs in light of the announced rebate so as to minimize any adverse effect.

III. THE GST AND THE TAXATION OF FOOD

The government has decided not to tax basic groceries. It is, however, taxing a wide range of food products, those that are consumed outside of the home and those that do not meet the basic definition of groceries.

The Committee has been informed that approximately 40% of the food dollar is spent in restaurants or take-out establishments. Statistics Canada gives such spending a weight of only 29 per cent for purposes of calculating Consumer Price Index.

● (0315)

Drawing the line between basic groceries and other taxable forms of food is bound to be arbitrary to some degree and can lead to tax inequities among competing products. The committee heard evidence of just such effects.

The Bill was originally to tax all cookies. It was amended in the House of Commons to treat as basic groceries all cookies sold in packages of six or more. Chocolate bars are sold increasingly in family-sized packages which compete directly with chocolate-covered baked goods: they have the same ingredients and appeal to the same market. The tax treatment of the two differs in Bill C-62.

Soft drinks also compete with tax-free beverages such as mineral water, coffee and tea. Again these competiting products are treated differently. Several suggested amendments to the bill were submitted to the committee, amending Part III of Schedule VI which defines basic groceries.

IV. AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND TAX FREE STATUS

A. Agriculture and Fisheries

Under the GST, food is zero-rated throughout the production chain. For fishermen and farmers this means that they are entitled to claim input tax credits for a refund of tax paid on their production inputs. At the same time there is no tax assessed on their output, so that farm and fishery production remains tax free.

The special issue that arises for such tax free production stems from cash flow considerations. Farmers and fishermen must pay out an extra 7 per cent on their purchases and then file with the Department of Revenue to claim a refund of the input tax credit. Although registrants selling taxable goods are in a similar position with respect to having to wait for a refund of their input tax credits, they nevertheless have the cash flow benefit of using the GST which they collect on their sales. This is a benefit that farmers and fishermen do not enjoy since their own sales are non-taxable.

The amount of time which farmers and fishermen must carry the extra 7 per cent on their input costs before obtaining a refund will depend on how often they file a return. GST registrants making taxable and zero-rated supplies of $500,000 or less may file annually, quarterly or monthly. Registrants making taxable and zero-rated supplies of $500,001 to $6 million may file quarterly or monthly, while those with sales over $6 million are required to file monthly. Thus, if farmers and fishermen choose the quarterly filing option, they could wait up to three months between the time they purchase an item and the time they file for a refund. Further, the government will not begin paying interest on the refund amount until 21 days after the registrant's return is received by Revenue Canada.

The Government proposes to deal with this cash flow problem by zero-rating at the point of sale a number of types of purchases made exclusively by farmers and fishermen. The items that would be non-taxable at the time of purchase will include combines, large tractors, fishing boats and commercial fishing nets. Representatives of fishermen and farmers that appeared before the committee argued that the list of tax free items designated by the government was inadequate and would not relieve their cash flow problems. In Newfoundland, representatives of the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers told the Committee that the best solution to the problem would be a system of GST-exempt identification cards for fishermen that would apply to a whole range of fishing-related purchases made by fishermen. In Regina, the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association suggested that the problem be dealt with either by not collecting tax on any business related purchases by farmers or, at a minimum, extending the list of items designated as non-taxable at the point of sale. Both farmers and fishermen also pointed out that the GST system of paying tax on inputs and claiming these back later placed a significant compliance burden on them.

• (0330)

It should be noted that the list of items non-taxable at the point of sale is made by regulation and does not require legislative amendment to be extended.

B. Horses

The GST treats the sale of horses as a taxable supply. In Toronto, the Ontario Racing and Breeding Council argued that including horses in the GST was discriminatory since it is the only form of livestock that is taxed. They noted that horsemeat is Canada's second largest red meat export to Europe. The Council also argued that the extra paperwork burden would end export sales to the U.S. and would lure breeders to the U.S. in order to avoid the "hassle of GST registrations, credits and waits for reimbursements". Horse breeders are asking that sales of horses be zero-rated along with sales of other forms of livestock. This could be achieved either by amending Part IV of Schedule VI of Bill C-62, or by including it in regulation since number 10 of the same section provides for zero-rating of prescribed property.

Although there is obviously some benefit to horse breeders of having domestic horse sales zero-rated, it is uncertain what the proposed changes would do for export sales of horses since under the GST all exports are zero-rated anyway.

C. Plant and Tree Nurseries

The Canadian Nursery Association argued that plants and trees should be zero-rated under the GST since they help to control pollution. The witness claimed that planting of trees is one of the surest and least expensive ways of halting or even reversing the build-up of carbon dioxide in the air.

Whether or not plants and trees are worthy of special treatment is open to debate; a number of merit goods are taxed under the GST. The provisions for zero-rating are designed not for agricultural products perse but for the production of basic groceries. Zero-rating of trees and shrubs could be accomplished through amendment of Bill C-62 to include trees and shrubs in the list of zero-rated agriculture and fishing items or by including it in regulation as a supply of prescribed property as provided for under Schedule VI, Part IV, Number 10.

V. GST AND HOUSE

Under the provisions of Bill C-62, the GST is to apply to the sale of all new or substantially renovated housing. The sale of existing housing units is not subject to tax. Residential rents are exempt from the GST.

● (0345)

A. Housing Rebates

Purchasers of new residential units will be eligible for a rebate under most circumstances. Those purchasing a unit valued at $350,000 or less will enjoy a rebate of 36 per cent of the GST paid, reducing the effective GST to 4.5 per cent. Those purchasing a home valued above $450,000 will receive no rebate, and for homes valued between $350,000 and $450,000 the rebate declines from $8,750 to zero as the price of the house increases. These rebates are also available to purchasers of condominium units.

No equivalent rebate is made available for newly-constructed rental units. Witnesses have suggested that the GST makes home ownership relatively more attractive than rental accommodation.

B. Taxing Land

Several witnesses have suggested that land should not be taxed. Some, who support the concept of the GST, argued that land should not be taxed because it is not consumed. Others have argued that taxing land discriminates against those who face high housing costs in southern Ontario and Vancouver.

Markets with high housing costs are associated with high land prices. Applying the GST consistently across all markets will cause homebuyers in Toronto to pay more GST, but it will not distort relative prices compared to other markets—they will all rise in price by the same percentage. A distortion does arise because the thresholds for the rebate are applied universally across Canada. A $400,000 home in Toronto might resemble a $300,000 home in Ottawa in all respects except location. The Ottawa home would receive the full GST rebate while the Toronto home receives only a partial rebate.

Current economic conditions have severely depressed the housing market in southern Ontario. Removing the GST from the land component of house prices could offset some of the negative effects of high interest rates.

Land is a long-lived asset—it rarely depreciates. It has been suggested therefore that land not be taxed because it is not "consumed". Land does produce a stream of benefits which are consumed, and the taxation of land could be seen as a simple and convenient way of taxing this stream of benefits.

To remove the tax on land requires more than zero rating of land. It would require that the GST be applied to the price of a house, excluding land. This raises questions about administrative complexity and enforcement since land prices vary by a large amount, even within the same communities.

C. GST and Soft Costs

All services associated with the sale of a home will be subject to the tax. Real estate brokers have suggested that their services should be exempt since they are equivalent to the services of a stock broker—i.e. selling an investment good to homeowners.

● (0400)

D. Transitional Rules

An FST inventory rebate is offered for all goods purchased prior to 1991 but sold in the new year. This is to prevent the double taxation of such goods. For new homes, the FST rebate is limited to homes sold before 1 April 1991. No equivalent restriction applies to other goods which receive the FST rebate. The committee heard evidence that a slow housing market might result in double taxation of homes built in 1990 and sold in the spring of 1991.

VI. GST AND REMOTE REGIONS

Goods and services in the more remote regions of Canada cost more than they do in central Canada, largely due to the added transportation costs involved in shipping materials to these regions but also due to the lesser degree of competition and higher markups. The FST is imposed at a trade level prior to these transportation charges and local markups. The GST is imposed on the retail value of sales.

Tax reform means that residents of remote regions will pay more tax than residents of central Canada for the same goods and services. It also means that these residents will pay more tax under the GST than under the FST. These points were made to the committee by numerous witnesses in Atlantic Canada and the northern territories.

A. GST Credits

The GST credits are a part of a package designed to ensure that families with incomes below $30,000 benefit from tax reform. But a $25,000 income in Yellowknife or Iqaluit does not imply the same standard of living as in Edmonton or Ottawa. Thus a family in central Canada with this income is entitled to full GST credits, but a family in the north with the same standard of living would not receive full benefits. This violates the principle of horizontal equity.

Honourable senators, I look forward to continuing this—

Senator Fairbairn: And we look forward to hearing you.

Senator Kenny: I suspected that you would—at some occasion in the near future. I apologize for rushing through it, but I look forward to the next time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, over the past few days we have listened and watched, astounded by the degree to which the rules and procedures of this chamber have been stood on their heads, as it were. We have been astounded by the degree to which the moral authority of our government, as seen also in this house, seems to have descended into perilous depths. It calls into question, in most of our minds, the future of this chamber and the role it should play in the Canadian Parliament. On this particular theme I would like to speak about senate reform, which seems apropos at this point in our proceedings. I have chosen to look to an expert who served here in this chamber with distinction for many years, namely, the Honourable Eugene Forsey.

● (0415)

As honourable senators will know, Eugene Forsey was summoned to the Senate of Canada in 1970 and served until 1979. To many, he is Canada's foremost authority on constitutional affairs. In recent months he has appeared before committees of the House of Commons and the Senate as an expert witness on Meech Lake, and has appeared before other legislative bodies across this country. Dr. Forsey studied the Senate for many years and has travelled the length and breadth of Canada as a speaker and commentator on the Senate as an institution. The views expressed in the article I will read represent a distillation of his thoughts on Senate reform. They are contained in an interesting volume which I recommend to senators, called Canadian Legislatures by Robert J. Fleming, who is the general editor of this book.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Forsey writes:

Nearly everyone agrees that our present Senate is unsatisfactory. The New Democratic Party wants to abolish it. Most people in the other parties want to reform it. Most of the reformers want to elect it, though they differ about how it should be elected, its size and its powers.

Abolition is not really on the cards. For one thing, it would require the consent of every provincial Legislature, which is unlikely. The smaller provinces have always been afraid that Ontario and Quebec, with their huge majority in the House of Commons, might ride rough-shod over the Atlantic provinces and the West; and Quebec has wanted extra protection against the English-speaking majority. So the Maritimes, Quebec and in due course the West, insisted on equal representation by region in the Senate: twenty-four seats for Ontario, twenty-four for Quebec, twenty-four for the Maritimes, twenty-four for the West. Six Senators for Newfoundland and two for the Territories throw this equality a little out of whack. But the fact remains that the two central provinces, with nearly two-thirds of the population, have slightly fewer than half the Senators. As long as the Senate has the legal power to throw out — and keep on throwing out — any Bill passed by the House of Commons, the other provinces can, theoretically, protect themselves against central Canadian domination. As the Senate is appointed, not elected, it has very little political clout: it has not thrown out a Bill from the Commons for almost fifty years. So the protection, in fact, may not amount to much. But, such as it is, the smaller provinces are not likely to give it up. They want more protection, not less; and if just one refuses to consent to abolition, the proposal is dead.

Reform, giving the smaller provinces more seats, and the Senate more real power, is another matter. But any change in the number of Senators from any province, or in the method of selecting Senators (for example, to election, or to appointment by provincial governments), or in the powers of the Senate (up or down), now requires the consent of the Legislatures of at least seven provinces with at least half the population of the ten. This means that it must have the consent of either Ontario or Quebec and of at least six other provinces. Under the Meech Lake Accord, it would have to have the consent of all ten. Any single Legislature could kill it.

Most of the reform proposals would give the West more seats, and nearly everyone agrees that this is necessary. But how many more? Neither Quebec nor the Atlantic provinces will consent to any significant reduction in their proportion of the total number of seats.

For example, the Alberta "Triple E" proposal would give every province six seats. The four Western provinces and Newfoundland have six now.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Robertson: What are you speaking on?

Senator Fairbairn: I am speaking on the question of privilege.

Senator Robertson: You are speaking on Senate reform.

Senator Fairbairn: I am speaking on Senate reform as one of the areas this Senate should be considering—

Senator Robertson: That is not related to privilege.

Senator Fairbairn: It certainly is related to my privileges, honourable senators.

Senator Perrault: It is totally relevant.

Senator Fairbairn: It is totally relevant to the question of privilege.

Senator Robertson: Privilege is from the past, not the future. Stick to the topic!

Senator Fairbairn: I am certainly sticking to the topic.

Senator Perrault: It is a sensitive point with you people because you are so unparliamentary. We do not need a lecture about procedure. You don't know the first thing about it.

Senator Fairbairn: As I was saying:

> The four Western provinces and Newfoundland have six now. No objection there. Prince Edward Island would go up from four to six. Delight there. But Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would each go down from ten to six; Quebec and Ontario each from 24 to six. All four of these provinces would balk. Four from ten leaves six. To pass the amendment needs seven.
>
> Changing the number from six each to ten might win the consent of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick (though their proportion of the total would still go down). But to carry the amendment still requires either Ontario or Quebec. Their number of seats would go down by more than half, and their proportion of the total by almost two-thirds. To consent to this would call for heroic self-abnegation.
> Changing the number to 24 each would produce a gargantuan Senate, in which Ontario and Quebec together would have only about one-fifth of the total, and Quebec only about one-tenth. Neither province would accept that.
> The Meech Lake Accord would compound the problem. For one thing, any single province could block any change. For another, the Accord gives the nomination of Senators from every province to the provincial governments. No provincial government, having once got its hands on this delicious piece of fail-safe patronage, will be eager to give it up; and if just one refuses, the thing is dead.
> The reformers will insist on some changes in numbers. But most of them will insist even more strongly that the Senate must be elected.

The question is how it should be elected.

> By single member constituencies, with the first-past-the-post system, like the House of Commons? But that would give us simply a facsimile of the House of Commons. Many of the reformers would object that this would mean the same under-representation of minorities (for example, the Liberals in the West, the Conservatives formerly in Quebec, and the New Democrats all round) as in the Commons. For many reformers, getting rid of this under-representation has been one of the main objectives. The answer would be proportional representation. But neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives have ever shown any enthusiasm for that.

Although I believe both parties show enthusiasm now.

> With the present system, they can, and usually do, win only a minority of the popular vote, but this may, and usually does, win them a majority of the seats. Under proportional representation, neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives might ever get a majority of the seats. The nearer the New Democrats get to power, the less they are likely to be ready to forfeit the chance that they too, with a minority of the popular vote, might win a majority of the seats (which is precisely what happened in British Columbia the only time they ever won an election there).

It comes to a question of power.

> Even if enough provincial Legislatures were . . . to agree on the numbers, on election rather than provincial appointment, and on the method of election, there would remain the crucial question of the powers of an elected Senate.
>
> All the reformers want the Senate to have more real power. But how much?
> The Meech Lake Accord's "transitional" Senate, nominated by the provincial governments, would have all the present Senate's legal powers, notably the absolute veto on every Bill. It could stop Supply. It could throw out the Budget.

It would, of course, take some time to produce a Senate all of whose members had been nominated by provincial Governments. But eventually, as the present Senators died, or reached the age limit, or resigned, or became aliens or bankrupts, or were convicted of some felony or infamous crime, or lost their residence qualification, or took jobs which made them ineligible for the Senate; that is what we would have. And that Senate would be no paper tiger. It would have substantial political clout, and no hesitation about using it. Its members would not be beholden to any national political party, but only to the respective provincial governments. They would not have to face elections. If they objected to a Bill passed by the House of Commons, but disliked by the provincial Governments, they would have no qualms about throwing it out. They would argue, with truth, that the Senate was originally set up partly to protect provincial interests; that the provincial Governments, or several, or most, of them, objected to this Bill. Very well, let the Senate do the job it was set up to do, and if the federal Government, or the Leader of the Opposition or the whole House of Commons did not like it, let them eat cake.

One prominent reformer has said publicly, on television, that he wants an elected Senate with "teeth, muscle and claws", and that this meant an absolute veto on all legislation. An elected Senate with that power would most certainly use it. If the House of Commons remonstrated that it represented the people, the elected Senators would reply, "So do we". If they had been elected more recently, or by proportional representation, they might add, "and better than you do. No noise from the cheap seats!"

The House of Commons, whose consent is necessary for any constitutional amendment, will "brook, like the Turk, no brother near the throne". Nor will any federal Government. Neither will accept an elected Senate with an absolute veto on all legislation, or on Supply, or the Budget or anything more than a short-term suspensive veto on Supply or the Budget, and a rather longer one on other legislation.

Probably a formula could be hammered out that would be strong enough to give the smaller provinces, notably the West, a reasonable degree of satisfaction, and weak enough to pass the House of Commons, provided the numbers and the method of selection could also be agreed on. But getting "the time, the place and the loved one all together," would be far from easy.

The acute problem is Western alienation. To allay or mitigate that would require an elected Senate with enough Western members and enough power to stop, or at least seriously delay, legislation the West considered oppressive or injurious.

• (0430)

Senator Steuart: Like the GST.

Senator Fairbairn:

Even the present seven-province formula for constitutional amendment is a formidable obstacle. The Meech Lake unanimity formula might prove insuperable. The Accord guarantees an annual discussion of Senate reform by the First Ministers' Conference. But that is all it guarantees.

This is discouraging. But it need not be as discouraging as it looks. There is a tendency in some quarters to think that Senate reform would solve all our problems, especially Western problems. It would not. For example, some Manitobans seem to think a reformed Senate could have prevented the CF-18 contract from going to Montreal instead of Winnipeg. It could not have. A reformed Senate could have done nothing whatever about the CF-18 contract, except denounce it (and any private citizen can do that, and with precisely the same effect: none), unless a constitutional amendment had explicitly conferred that power; and no Government will ever accept that. Furthermore, no Senate, reformed or unreformed, will ever be empowered to throw out a Government with a majority in the House of Commons. The most a reformed Senate could do would be to force a Government to a fresh election by vetoing or delaying a Bill the Government considered essential or urgent. The notion that if anything happens in the body politic which the West, or any other region, dislikes, a reformed Senate could kiss the place and make it well is nonsense.

What are the changes the Senate could make?

Does all this mean that we are stuck with what we have?

No. Much can be done to improve the Senate without any constitutional amendments at all, and the Senate's Lamontagne Committee of 1980 set it down in black and white. Some of it would require only ordinary legislation. Some of it the Senate could do itself.

One of the problems with the present Senate is dead wood: members who do not turn up regularly, let alone work. This is often exaggerated. My own experience is that at least two-thirds of the members do attend pretty regularly, and at least half do work hard and conscientiously when the Senate is sitting and in committees, which often sit when the Senate itself is in recess. Many are also active in their home communities, involved in various public activities, often doing constitutency work which would ordinarily be done by a member of the House of Commons. But some dead wood there undoubtedly is.

The Lamontagne Report proposed three measures to get rid of it, all of them requiring only a simple Act of Parliament. First, a fixed term of ten years, renewable for further terms of five years on the recommendation, by secret ballot, of a bi-partisan Senate Committee.

Second, provision to enable Senators who had reached the age of 65, with fifteen years' service (or 70, with ten years'), to retire, like judges, on full pension.

Third, provison to vacate the seat of any Senator who failed, for two consecutive years, to attend at least one-third of the sittings in each year. The Constitution already stipulates that any Senator who fails to turn up at least once in two consecutive sessions loses his seat; and a fair number have lost their seats accordingly. But others have been literally wheeled in once in two sessions and so retained their seats. Moreover, a single session may now last for years (a recent one lasted for three), so that a resolute valetudinarian or scrimshanker could retain his or her seat by a single appearance in seven or eight years—"A lovely apparition sent to be a moment's ornament".

New Standing Committees. The Report also proposed four things the Senate itself could do.

First, establish a Standing Committee on Regional Affairs; second, a Standing Committee on Official Languages, with half the members French-speaking, half English-speaking; third, a Standing Committee on Human Rights; fourth, regional all-party caucuses.

The Fathers of Confederation intended the Senate not only to revise Bills sent to it by the House of Commons (a job the present Senate does thoroughly on the often wretchedly drafted legislation the Lower House hands it), but also to protect the interests of the provinces in matters under federal jurisdiction, and to protect minorities. It has not done much to protect the provinces; partly because the courts have so much narrowed federal jurisdiction; partly because the task has been performed by the provinces' representatives in the Cabinet. It has not done much to protect minorities, partly because in some cases (the Manitoba school question, for example), the House of Commons has taken over the job. But it could, and should, do more in both fields.

The Report recommended the new Standing Committees because the Senate does most of its work in committees. The new Standing Committee on Human Rights might be of special importance if the House of Commons passed a Bill curtailing those rights, by virtue of section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the "notwithstanding" section), which enables Parliament to override, for a renewable period of five years, section 2 and 7 to 15 of the Charter.

One question the Lamontagne Committee ought to have dealt with, and did not, is that of vacant seats. No Senate seat should be left vacant for more than a specified short period, perhaps six months. There have been cases of seats left unfilled for years (in one instance, eight years). This should be forbidden by law, if need be by a constitutional amendment, which, for once, should not be hard to carry.

The Lamontagne Report proposed also that half the Senators should be appointed by the federal Government from lists submitted by the provincial Governments. The Meech Lake Accord provides that all Senators should be so appointed.

There is something to be said for either proposal. Both could give parties unrepresented in the House of Commons representation in Parliament, and parties underrepresented in the Commons fuller representation in Parliament. Both could mean a more varied membership in the Senate, politically, economically and socially, and less danger of huge, long-lasting one-party majorities. The federal Government's power to refuse a provincial nominee would enable it to weed out dead-beats, has-beens and dedicated enemies of effective national government.

The present method of appointment has obvious defects. It gives us too few women in the Senate, too few Native people, too few from ethnic groups, too few from Labour, and too many party faithful (some of whom, however, turn out to be first-rate Senators: hardworking, independent, productive). Provincial nomination and federal appointment might help to redress the balance; but they might not.

It is sometimes suggested that the Government should appoint more "eminent persons"—scholars, poets, scientists, philosophers. Perhaps it might, but pretty certainly it will not; and not without reason. The Senate is primarily a legislative body. It is not a supernumerary Royal Society of Canada or Authors's Association, or a permanent Conference of Learned Societies (though it does, in fact, include Fellows of the Royal Society, authors, learned men, and at least one poet). A few more scholars, poets, scientists, philosophers, might help to leaven the legislative lump, and bring valuable expert knowledge to Parliament. But the bulk of the Senators should be, as in fact most of them are now, people capable of helping to make good laws.

Most Senate reformers will say that the Lamontagne Report is totally inadequate. They want much more. But what they want and what they have any reasonable chance of getting are very different things. If this were 1864, or if we were drafting a Constitution with a blank sheet, what they want might have some chance. But it is not 1864, and we have not a blank sheet. It is 1988, and we have the Constitution Act, 1982, which has given us a very rigid Constitution, very hard to amend, notably in regard to the Senate. We have the Meech Lake Accord, which, if it is approved by all the provincial Legislatures, will give us an even more rigid Constitution, even harder to amend and, again, notably in regard to the Senate. That being so, it is hardly too much to say that those who draw up or promote Senate reform proposals that would require constitutional amendments are merely playing games; and not quite harmless games either, since they distract attention from changes that would be easy to make and that would make the Senate more representative and more effective. They set people chasing wandering fires, will-o'-the-wisps, rainbows; blowing bubbles. To change the metaphor: I am sorry to be the boy who points out that the Emperor has no clothes on. But it has to be done.

Senator Forsey's article concludes with an Editor's Note.

> When asked what internal changes, in his view, could take place in the Senate, regardless of constitutional considerations or the Meech Lake Accord, Dr. Forsey provided the following check list.
> 1. Abolition of the property qualifications for Senators.
> 2. Fixed term of office: ten years, renewable for a further term of five years, on recommendation, by secret ballot, of a bi-partisan Senate Committee.
> 3. Loss of seat for failure to attend at least one-third of the sittings of the Senate in each of two consecutive years—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it appears that the fire alarm is sounding in the building and security people have advised us that we must vacate. I have had a chance to talke to only a couple of colleagues and to receive some advice from the Table. We will not adjourn, but will recess. We will return at the call of the bell. When I resume the Chair Senator Fairbairn will be on her feet and we will proceed from the position we are in at this very moment. We will now adjourn for an unspecified period of time.

The Senate recessed at 4:33 a.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 9, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Number 97A.]

At 6:30 a.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Senator Nurgitz, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable Senators, when the fire alarm started, Senator Fairbairn was in the midst of her address on a matter concerning privilege. At this point she will continue her remarks.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable Senators, I was discussing as part of my concerns on privilege one conclusion that may come from the disturbing events of the last several days which might finally be a move toward meaningful parliamentary and senate reform. Prior to the sounding of the fire alarm, I was sharing with honourable senators the benefit of some remarks made by the Hon. Eugene Forsey. I was nearing the end of those remarks when I was interrupted.

At this point I would like to review his suggestion with regard to reform of this place, reform which could take place without constitutional consideration. Briefly, his check list included abolition of the property qualifications for senators; a fixed term of office, ten years, renewable for a further term of five years on recommendation by secret ballot of a bi-partisan Senate committee; loss of seat for failure to attend at least one-third of the sittings of the Senate in each of two consecutive years; full pension at age 65 after 15 years of service, or at 70 years of age with 10 years of service; establishment of standing committees on regional affairs, official languages with half the members French speaking, and on human rights; and the establishment of regional all-party caucuses.

In recent days I have tried to find words to express my personal unhappiness—nay, my despair—with what has occurred since the lockout and the vote of last Thursday. I would like to conclude my remarks by borrowing the words, words much more eloquent than my own, from the writing of a renowned poet, philosopher and artist whose words have been like a Bible to millions of people in the Arabic speaking world. I speak of Kahlil Gibran who wrote a slim volume entitled: The Prophet back in 1926. In it he refers to laws, something which concerns us. He wrote:

> You delight in laying down laws,
> Yet you delight more in breaking them.
> Like children playing by the ocean who build sand-towers with constancy and then destroy them with laughter.
> But while you build your sand-towers the ocean brings more sand to the shore, And when you destroy them the ocean laughs with you.
> Verily the ocean laughs always with the innocent.
> But what of those to whom life is not an ocean, and man-made laws are not sand-towers,
> But to whom life is a rock, and the law a chisel with which they would carve it in their own likeness?
> What of the cripple who hates dancers?
> What of the ox who loves his yoke and deems the elk and deer of the forest stray and vagrant things?
> What of the old serpent who cannot shed his skin, and calls all others naked and shameless?
> And of him who comes early to the wedding-feast, and when over-fed and tired goes his way saying that all feasts are violation and all feasters law-breakers?
> What shall I say of these save that they too stand in the sunlight, but with their backs to the sun?
> They see only their shadows, and their shadows are their laws.
> And what is the sun to them but a caster of shadows?
> And what is it to acknowledge the laws but to stoop down and trace their shadows upon the earth?
> But you who walk facing the sun, what images drawn on the earth can hold you?
> You who travel with the wind, what weather-vane shall direct your course?
> What man's law shall bind you if you break your yoke but upon no man's prison door?
> What laws shall you fear if you dance but stumble against no man's iron chains?
> And who is he that shall bring you to judgment if you tear off your garment yet leave it in no man's path?
> People of Orphalese, you can muffle the drum, and you can loosen the strings of the lyre, but who shall command the skylark not to sing?

He wrote on freedom:

> At the city gate and by your fireside I have seen you prostrate yourself and worship your own freedom,
> Even as slaves humble themselves before a tyrant and praise him though he slays them.
> Ay, in the grove of the temple and in the shadow of the citadel I have seen the freest among you wear their freedom as a yoke and a handcuff.

And my heart bled within me; for you can only be free when even the desire of seeking freedom becomes a harness to you, and when you cease to speak of freedom as a goal and a fulfilment.

You shall be free indeed when your days are not without a care nor your nights without a want and a grief,

But rather when these things girdle your life and yet you rise above them naked and unbound.

And how shall you rise beyond your days and nights unless you break the chains which you at the dawn of your understanding have fastened around your noon hour?

● (0640)

In truth that which you call freedom is the strongest of these chains, though its links glitter in the sun and dazzle your eyes.

And what is it but fragments of your own self you would discard that you may become free?

If it is unjust law you would abolish, that law was written with your own hand upon your own forehead.

You cannot erase it by burning your law books nor by washing the foreheads of your judges, though you pour the sea upon them.

And if it is a despot you would dethrone, see first that his throne erected within you is destroyed.

For how can a tyrant rule the free and the proud, but for a tyranny in their own freedom and a shame in their own pride?

And if it is a care you would cast off, that care has been chosen by you rather than imposed upon you.

And if it is a fear you would dispel, the seat of that fear is in your heart and not in the hand of the feared.

Verily all things move within your being in constant half embrace, the desired and the dreaded, the repugnant and the cherished, the pursued and that which you would escape.

These things move within you as lights and shadows in pairs that cling.

And when the shadow fades and is no more, the light that lingers becomes a shadow to another light.

And thus your freedom when it loses its fetters becomes itself the fetter of a greater freedom.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise on this point of privilege related, among other things, to the decision by the Speaker last week to call the vote at 5.25 p.m. rather than 5.30 p.m. as indicated in his letter. I should like to make the observation that, for those of us across the street in the Victoria Building, unless there are clear rules in relation to bells, and the notification which we are to be given prior to the bells being stopped and the doors being closed, we will inevitably wind up in a situation where we will miss a number of votes.

In the cold rain of last Thursday it took me 22 minutes to get from my office in the Victoria Building to this chamber. It was somewhat unusual for me to wait for the grey shuttle bus which goes from the Victoria Building to the Senate door. There simply was not enough time for me to get here, because notice was not adequately given.

I raise this for the concern of all honourable senators. We cannot have a system where votes are going to be held without adequate notice and without a reasonable time period being allowed. The words "reasonable time" were used in Senator Charbonneau's letter of October 4. Whenever a vote is to be taken, whatever the rules are going to be, it has to be taken into account that a number of us have offices across the street. In bad weather, in particular, it will take a considerable amount of notice before we are in a position to be able actually to vote.

I should like to comment on some of the points raised by Senator Fairbairn when she spoke about the nature of opposition in a democratic society. Following on that, I should like to give some of the reasons why those of us on this side of the chamber are opposed to the GST. I raise that issue in the context that the current problems, if I may so describe them, in this institution have stemmed from the attempt by some of us to use the rules of this place to express our opposition to Bill C-62 and the attempt by the government through the Speaker to prevent us from using those rules.

As part of this point of privilege, it is legitimate to comment on two things; First is the role of opposition in a democracy, and the second is the substance of the issue to which we are opposed.

One of the best ways to begin this subject is to quote from a speech given 30 years ago by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson who, at the time, was Leader of the Opposition in Canada. He was not yet Prime Minister, but was the holder of the Nobel Peace Prize. He spoke in the United States on April 22, 1960, along with leaders of the opposition from several other western democracies, including Britain, Germany. Mr. Adlai Stevenson was also present. He was a twice-defeated presidential candidate in the United States and was regarded within the Democratic Party as the titular Leader of the Opposition.

This was an academic event. It is interesting that we now have a fellow academic in this chamber. I say "a fellow academic" in the sense that although I have long since stopped teaching I have continued to think of myself as an academic in peer. At this academic conference, Mr. Pearson made the following comments on the subject of opposition and the plight of democracy in general:

> The plight of democracy has been the subject of concern and alarm ever since there has been democratic government—a relatively short time—just as before that the plight of whatever kind of government was in force was also the cause of concern and alarm. Politically, things are always better in earlier days (especially to those of us who are now in opposition).

That seems to be echoing the comments that some members opposite have made from time to time. To put this into perspective, not so long ago someone dug up an ancient inscription which included these lines:

● (0650)

> We are fallen upon evil times
> And the world has waxed very old and wicked.
> Politics are very corrupt.
> The sons of the people are not so righteous
> As their parents were.

Perhaps this will help us to keep a sense of proportion and of history. Some of you may have seen the "Quote of the Day" in the Globe and Mail of last Friday. I do not have the exact quote, but it was a comment on what was taking place in the Senate. The quote read as if it had been given by the Prime Minister of today. In fact, when you looked at the date the quote was given by the Prime Minister of 1898. One wonders if we are not in a situation where history is repeating itself. Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> Of course we have special worries in our own times. We always have had. Ours are worse than formerly because they are now concerned—or should be—with the grim fact of physical survival on a planet on which we can now make life impossible.

Mr. Pearson was referring to the threat of nuclear war. Here we are in 1990, some 30 years after Mr. Pearson spoke, and many people in public life, and those interested in public issues, would make exactly the same comment; but the grim fact of today is that physical survival is potentially impossible. In this day and age, of course, they would not be referring to nuclear war, but to environmental issues. Concern over the environment has made it the issue of the 1990s in much the same way that concern over nuclear war and nuclear survival was the issue of the 1960s, when this speech was uttered. Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> Fortunately we are doing this at a time when we are about to discover other planets. I hope that the immigration regulations on these other planets will turn out to be liberal and generous to underdeveloped earth people who may seek admission. Better still, if we could only discover one habitable, but uninhabited planet for each suspicious, agnostic grouping now on earth, I'm sure this kind of interplanetary segregation would meet with general approval.

Again, if one looks at the growing nature of regionalism in this country one must wonder whether those comments about interplanetary segregation would not also apply today. Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> So far as our own democracy is concerned, perhaps its most noticeable characteristic today is doubt. This is, in part at least, due to the fact that its processes, its requirements and its demands are so complicated and so insistent that the political leader finds it increasingly difficult to deal with all of them to his own satisfaction. He is therefore bound to transfer some of his own doubts to those who chose him to exercise responsibility.
> Inevitably doubts have led to an increased reliance on the collective-making policy through those committees which were recently and cynically described in a New York newspaper as consisting of the 'unwilling, picked from the unfit to do the unnecessary.' This is too severe.
> Henry Kissinger was close to the truth when he said, 'The committee approach to decision-making is often less an organizational device than a spiritual necessity.'

[Senator Kirby.]

That comment was made by Mr. Kissinger prior to his appointment to Secretary of State of the United States, a position from which, I think it fair to say, once he assumed office, decision-making as a concept of management style rapidly disappeared. I suppose that simply shows what happens when an academic is put in charge of an institution. Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> It is tempting for the democratic leader to take the decision of his committee as his own policy, just as it is tempting for committees to ensure themselves against error by associating as many opinions as possible in their decisions.

I assume that sentence was written before the word "co-opt" became part of the lexicon of the political decision-making process in Canada. Today we would describe that process as one of committees, the purpose of which is to co-opt others to support your points of view. There are a number of academics in the chamber. I may say that one of the difficulties that I personally found with academic committees was that it was difficult to keep people co-opted. Academic decision-making was once described to me as a series of single parties of shifting coalitions. Obviously, under those circumstances, it is much more difficult to apply the kind of advice that Mr. Pearson was giving in 1960 in the academic world than it is in the world of real politics. Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> To add to our concern, policies developed in this way—

Through the co-opting process or through the committee system

> —with so much inward doubt, tend to become settled and sacrosanct once the verdict has been given.

We all have ability to recognize that perhaps it is possible that we were wrong, perhaps it is possible that a different policy for a different decision should have been made, that perhaps it is necessary for us to change the position we took. All of these kinds of decisions seem to become increasingly difficult for us to make in light of the glare of publicity, the nature of television and indeed, the role that the media has come to play.

It seems to me that one of the problems of adopting the position that our policies are sacrosanct once they have been established has been one of the great downfalls of the development of our democratic institutions over the past little while. Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> All this leads to the rigidity which is becoming one of the greatest threats to the democratic policy-making process.

> Decisions once made after long travail are hard to change. Indeed, any change becomes worrisome and adds to our doubts.

It seems that we all have a fear of admitting that we made a mistake or that perhaps we were wrong and that maybe some change is needed. Mr. Pearson then said:

> This is natural. An elephant is likely to be more anxious about its offspring than a rabbit. It took so much longer to form and produce it.

I am not sure that I would subscribe to that, although the reference to the elephant reminds me of the oft-quoted line of Prime Minister Trudeau who said that if you are a mouse sleeping next to an elephant, then, when the elephant rolls over, you are inclined to be in deep trouble. Nevertheless, it does seem that there is a tendency in public life in Canada today, just as there was in 1960 when Prime Minister Pearson was speaking, not to want to change your mind, to get locked into a position and to fail to recognize that some change in position is required. Indeed, one can make the observation that the biggest single failing of the current Prime Minister is his belief that under no circumstances has he ever made a mistake and that no matter the situation his view must prevail. It is that attitude that is at the root of many of our problems, both in this chamber and in the country. Mr. Pearson then goes on to say:

● (0700)

> My main qualification to speak about politics and the role of the opposition in democracy is that I have watched opposition in action from both sides of a Parliament. My views, incidentally, may have changed slightly with my change of location.

We made the observation the other day in this chamber—at least,I did when referring to some comments which that then Premier John Buchanan, now Senator Buchanan, made with respect to the GST. As Premier of Nova Scotia, he indicated how bad he thought the GST was for that province, and the very negative impact it would have on the economy, just as Mr. Pearson said his views may have changed slightly with the location of his position. It seems fairly clear that on that issue, for example, Senator Buchanan's position is such that it reminds me of the old line, "Where you stand depends on where you sit."

Mr. Pearson then goes on to make the following observation:

> The opposition in a democracy consists of politicians who are applying for a new job and conducting themselves, they hope, so as to acquire it and, more important, so as to be worthy of it.

I must say that when one looks at the public opinion polls these days it makes one wonder whether it is possible for anyone in public life to be genuinely, and I use Mr. Pearson's word "worthy" of taking on the job of governing, because it does seem that no matter what position you take in opposition, or indeed what position you take in government, increasingly in this country there is a sense of a plague on all your houses. I must say that in this chamber that seems to be something we all should be concerned about regardless of which side of the aisle we happen to be sitting on.

Mr. Pearson then goes on to say:

> Its first duty—

—referring to the opposition—

> —of course, is to oppose; to criticize; to try to change. It customarily 'views with alarm' in order to protect the people from the complacency and over-confidence that comes from a government which is continually and exuberantly 'pointing with pride.' It—

—meaning the opposition—

> —demands information and it excoriates any abuse of power by governments—indeed that is almost its major function. As such it is an indispensable part of any healthy democracy.

The significance of that paragraph is that it basically stresses the major point which members opposite, and particularly the Government Leader and the Speaker, seem to have failed entirely to understand, which is that the role of opposition is, in fact, to oppose, to criticize and to try to change—and, using Mr. Pearson's words, "opposing the policies of the government, criticizing and trying to change them—" is, in fact, an indispensable part of any healthy democracy. One has the impression, from listening to the debate in the last little while and, more importantly, watching the Speaker's actions of last week, that the attitude in this place has increasingly become one that says it is wrong to oppose, it is wrong to criticize, it is wrong to use rules to your advantage; and when those rules are used to your advantage and to the detriment of the government, then the Speaker will step in and arbitrarily, by fiat, change the rules.

Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> As Disraeli once put it, perhaps when he was in opposition, 'no government can be long secure without a formidable opposition,' . . .

I should point out that the security of this government is so tenuous, in any event, because of public opinion—let alone because of opposition in the House—that it would be a government insecure even if it did not have a formidable opposition.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> a view confirmed earlier by Burke's words, 'He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper.'

The notion that the members on this side of the house, in opposing government legislation, in amending government legislation and in playing any role which suggests to the government that it might be wrong, have a role to play in that regard and that, in fact, this can help the government, and that to quote Burke, "Our antagonist is our helper", seems to be a concept which is totally foreign to the thinking of members opposite.

Mr. Pearson continued:

> I can agree with that in general without accepting a specific commitment, as an opposition leader, to keep a > government either secure or even comfortable. On the contrary, the insecurity of the government becomes the opportunity of the opposition; to replace it with new and, of course, better government. So we oppose, correct and criticize. In doing so we cleanse and purify those in office. We are, in fact, the detergents of democracy!

Honourable senators, that reminds me of an anecdote which is one that Senator Buchanan would find somewhat amusing. In 1967, when I first moved back to Nova Scotia from the United States, Mr. Stanfield was the premier of Nova Scotia and had been since 1956. He was in his eleventh year. While I was in the United States both studying and ultimately working, I worked for a while for the U.S. defence department in the Pentagon. As a result, I had a U.S. security clearance. When I came back to teach at Dalhousie University, one of the things I intended to do, at the same time, was consulting work for the Canadian defence department, specifically as scientific adviser to the Commander of Maritime Command. This was in the fall of 1966. I would point out that subsequently there was a provincial election in Nova Scotia in May of 1967. In the course of getting my security clearance, which was required for the work I was going to do for Maritime Command, one of the things the RCMP had to was go around and ask a series of questions about one's moral character, what one believed in and a variety of other questions. One of the questions they asked a colleague of mine on the faculty of Dalhousie University—an individual who is now vice-president there and who, in fact, had been my roommate all the years I was at Dalhousie as a student—was: "Does he ever talk about the overthrow of the government?" to which my friend replied, "He talks about it all the time."

Unfortunately the RCMP totally and utterly misunderstood the reply, and the net result, which I found out only years after the fact, was that it took an extra three months for me to get my security clearance since the RCMP classified me in their first categorization as someone who clearly believes in the overthrow of the government. It just goes to show that the way one answer questions in a democracy and the role one can play in opposition can obviously have a significant impact in the way events ultimately unfold.

Mr. Pearson, in his speech in Washington, then on to say:

> A distinguished Canadian political scientist once wrote of the opposition in the Parliament of his own country as follows:—

—I do not want to get into the question of whether or not the phrase "distinguished Canadian political scientist" is an oxymoron, and I merely read it on the basis that that is what Mr. Pearson said. The quote is as follows:

> The House meets, and in march the Opposition, and sit there ready to attack Ministers and their measures; never, if possible, to make a concession, by word or vote, to official shrewdness or skill. For the time being they are Her Majesty's loyal sappers and miners, not to be very particular if only they can hack and hew their way to the treasury benches. They are waiters upon Providence—all animated with the most exalted, never-say-die patriotism. If they only had a bandage on their brow inscribed 'organized fault-finders,'

[Senator Kirby.]

Certainly, that is not much of a problem on this side of the house and I do not think we need to be very organized in order to find fault with a number of things, and particularly the GST bill which I will come to in a few moments.

Mr. Pearson then went on as follows:

> If they only had a bandage on their brow inscribed 'organized fault-finders,' and a symbolic gridiron, to be transferable, like the seals of office, the equipment would be complete. Broiling is part of their special functions; and woe to the Minister when a chief with the spirit of an untamed Indian is at the head of his foes. For party aims, he is understood to be clothed with forked-lightning invectives; and in debate, wonder not, if he substitutes epithets for arguments, and deals more with the motives than with the logic of Ministers. In brief, he and his lieutenants must be quick to detect the joints in the armor of those in power; and above everything they are bound to cultivate the most wakeful and morbid suspiciousness.
> I do not admit that in opposition 'we three'—

He said "three" because there were three people on the panel, Mr. Gaitskell, Mr. Stevenson and himself. He goes on:

> I do not admit that in opposition 'we three' are or have been 'untamed Indians.' It is true, however, that we are 'waiters upon Providence' and the electorate.

● (0715)

> It is our duty so to improve the waiting period that it will end at the next election.
> While vigor in opposition is desirable—and also that eternal viligance which is the price of political success for the opposition, as well as of political freedom for people, criticism should always be tempered with responsibility. A purely negative, obstructive opposition would be condemned to remain in opposition for a long time.

Honourable senators, I point out that the key thrust of that particular paragraph in Mr. Pearson's speech is the importance of opposition being constructive based on fact and not merely based on invective. It is for that reason, it seems to me, that we should, in due course, have a lengthy debate in this chamber with respect to the criticism of the GST described in the 192 pages of the committee's report, which documents in a fairly detailed and fairly objective way what we heard as we travelled across the country this past summer from St. John's, Newfoundland to Vancouver and north to Yellowknife and Whitehorse. What we have, in fact, are very detailed comments on what is wrong with Bill C-62, and it is precisely those detailed comments which underlie our basic opposition to the bill.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> There is also a difference to be observed between vigor and violence. The good opposition leader in a good democracy doesn't go around looking for belts so he may hit below them or, on the other hand, looking for parades so that he may head them. He will certainly fail if he insists on no bread because he does not like half a loaf.

Again, I think there is an important message for us there, that being the importance in both government and the opposition of a willingness to reach compromises and to recognize that you cannot, in the world of politics, or indeed in life in general, be very successful if your only position is going to be "It is my way or no way," or it is going to be "This document, this bill, this agreement—"even if it happens to have a fancy name such as the Meech Lake Accord—"is such that not one word, not one comma, absolutely nothing, can be changed. "Success in political life, success in governing, as indeed success in everyday life, depends very much on the willingness to make compromises, or, as Mr. Pearson says:

> You are certain to fail if you insist on no bread because you are unprepared to accept half a loaf.

Mr. Pearson goes on to state:

> Those in opposition are politicians who have confronted electoral misfortune with fortitude and are upheld by that optimism which comes from a knowledge of the fickleness of public opinion and the infinite capacity of those in power for getting into trouble.

Some of us have been absolutely startled by the infinite capacity of those opposite to get into political trouble. This is one of those rare occasions in my life when, as a mathematician, I think I understand the meaning of infinity.

Mr. Pearson goes on to state:

> They know how to convert the disaster of one year into the success of the next.
> The wise politician—and I admit this is easier in opposition—knows also that in the operation of the democratic process nothing is fixed or final; nothing is all black or all white. This may work to his benefit. In any event, it must work, or democracy could hardly survive.

Again, I repeat that the underlying theme of much of Mr. Pearson's speech was the importance of the democratic process, recognizing that nothing is perfect, recognizing that nothing is all black or all white, recognizing that the art of compromise and the art of compromising with the other side is extremely important. It seems to me that if there is one notion the members opposite have failed to exhibit entirely—specifically the Leader of the Government in the Senate—it has been the notion that compromise and reconciliation are an important part of the democratic process.

Mr. Pearson goes on to state:

> As a political reporter for the New York Times, W. S. White—

Honourable senators may recall that W. S. White is the author of the book The Making of the President, which goes back to the days of John F. Kennedy. He followed that with two other books following subsequent federal elections in the United States. Mr. Pearson goes on to state:

> As a political reporter for the New York Times, W. S. White, put it some years ago:
> Politics, in this or any other free society, settles nothing finally, nothing arbitrarily, and nothing on the first and most capital totalitarian principle of either-or. At its infrequent very best, politics makes a sensible and a tolerable amalgam of the wishes and desires and prejudices of a great many people. At its very worst politics still distinguishes men from ciphers, men from cogs in a managerial machine.
> The situation in a Presidential and Congressional form of government is very different, of course, from that of a parliamentary democracy. For one thing there is in London or Ottawa a recognized and recognizable Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition who sits in Parliament as an elected member. Therefore he can castigate the government to its face, on every day Parliament sits. Not for him the impressive ex-cathedra statement of the elder statesman from Olympus. There is nothing Olympian about the daily cut and thrust of parliamentary questions and debate. But his position, if not as awe-inspiring as his American opposite number, is more clear-cut. He knows where he is—at least while he is there. His party accepts him as the formal leader—until they decide they want a change and take formal action to that end. Even the government of the day acknowledges his position as a leader.
> Indeed it is a minor glory, and some evidence of the maturity of our parliamentary democratic processes, that the government of Canada each year asks Parliament to appropriate a sum of money to pay a salary to the Leader of the Opposition so that he will have a more abundant opportunity, with greater resources, to pursue his efforts to deprive the members of the government of their salaries by defeating them at the next election.

It seems to me that that paragraph underlies a very important principle, the notion that there is a legitimate and meaningful role in the parliamentary system for an opposition; and indeed that role is recognized not only morally in parliamentary procedures, but, in fact, is recognized by the fact that the government of the day includes in its budget funds to support opposition parties, funds to support research for opposition parties, in the belief, presumably, that statements from the opposition, research done by the opposition, work done by the opposition, will, in fact, significantly improve the legislative process and help to ensure that democracy exists in the country. Given that philosophy—which clearly underlines our system of government—and our objection to the removal of that principle, or the elimination of that principle by the Speaker—which led many of us to get as upset as we did—by his cancelling of the bells and the arbitrary calling of a vote last Thursday, and indeed the locking out of members of the opposition in this place, it is clear that the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Speaker do not believe in any element of opposition and will resort to whatever lengths necessary in order to ensure that the opposition does not have a role to play which can cause the slightest bit of inconvenience, in spite of what the rules of the Senate may state.

Mr. Pearson then went on to state:

> Mr. Gaitskell is also the beneficiary of this practice.

Mr. Gaitskell was the Leader of the Opposition in the United Kingdom. Mr. Pearson went on to state:

> Mr. Stevenson is not.

He is referring to Adelai Stevenson, who was at that time regarded in the United States as the titular Leader of the Opposition, having lost two elections, one in 1952 and one in 1956, to Dwight Eisenhower.

Because this speech was given before the 1960 election in the United States—which, as honourable senators will recall, in late November resulted in the election of John F. Kennedy and the return of the Democrats to the White House—and since Adelai Stevenson was not to be the Democratic candidate in the 1960 election, he did not seek the nomination and had become regarded as being, de facto throughout the western world and particularly in the United States, the Leader of the Opposition in that form of government.

Mr. Pearson went on to state:

> The manner of acceptance of an opposition by government, and the manner of acceptance of its responsibility by an opposition provides one of the best tests of the nature of democratic government;

One begins to wonder, therefore, the extent to which this government, and particularly the Leader of the Government in this place, passed that test of the nature of a democratic government when one finds the lack of acceptance and, indeed, the virtual outright rejection by the Leader of the Government and the Speaker of an opposition in this place. I think it is that issue more than any other single issue which is seriously troubling members on this side of the House.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> —whether it is based on a strong and solid foundation of popular acceptance and by support, or whether it is merely a word taken over by those who have no understanding of its reality. The word "democracy" has become debased by the nature and amount of trafficking done in it. So today we have "controlled" democracy where the control is despotic;

● (0730)

In case any of you think that Mr. Pearson was referring to Canada in 1990, he was not. That speech was given in 1960. I chose it for my remarks today because it has a great deal of relevance to our situation today. Mr. Pearson said, and I repeat:

> . . . we have "controlled" democracy where the control is despotic; "guided" democracy where the guidance is one way;

That would certainly seem to be an appropriate and relevant comment on the government of today.

> "popular" democracy which functions without any regard to the expression of the peoples' will.

[Senator Kirby.]

That is perhaps the truest nature of the kind of democracy we have in the country today. When I get around to my comments on the GST bill itself, we will discover that if one listens to the evidence heard by our committee heard during the summer, it is clear that what we have in this country at the moment is a popular democracy that functions without any regard for the expression of the people's will. Indeed it is precisely that failure to take into account the people's will that has led to the current impasse and continuing strong show of support for the role that members on this side of the chamber have played with respect to our continued opposition to Bill C-62.

Mr. Pearson then goes on to say the following:

> This particular test of political democracy—in the confrontation of authority and opposition—fails when the former—

that is to say, the authority side > —degenerates into tyranny and intolerance, and the latter—

the opposition side

> —into friction and fury. The first decline—

the decline of authority into tyranny and intolerance

> —becomes apparent and dangerous when a majority rides roughshod over the strong views, sincerely held, of a minority;

It is amazing how prophetic this speech, given some 30 years ago, was. He also said that the latter—that is to say, the failure of the opposition—occurs when a minority, by purely obstructive tactics, tries to frustrate the will of the majority when that will clearly has the support of the people being governed. It seems to me that that test has not been met in this particular case. As I said a few moments ago, it is that test, and the dismal failure of that test in the current context, that is causing not only the problems in this chamber, and in court cases from one end of this land to the other, but a great deal of opposition across the breadth of the country.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> Opposition and authority can best function in their relations with each other when there are two parties, one of which emphasizes reform, with responsibility, and the other conservatism without stagnation. In one party—that is to say, the party that emphasizes reform with responsibility,

> —there should be a place for the liberally minded; in the other, for the conservatively minded.

That is to say, in the other party, which emphasizes conservatism without stagnation, there should clearly be a place for conservatively minded people. They tell me Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> They tell me that this neat and tidy division of political parties is not too obvious in the United States. Is it, in fact, in any democracy today?

If we look at the nature of the membership of both the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party in Canada today, one begins to recognize that you cannot take either of our parties and divide them neatly into two little boxes so that there is a fixed ideology and a fixed set of views among all of the members of one party, because, as Mr. Pearson says:

> There are too many pressures and influences and complicating factors in modern democracy to make this classic political and party division among the electorate easy or perhaps even possible. But the nearer we can approach it, the stronger and more stable a democracy should be. Parties organized along these lines of basic division—

Essentially Mr. Pearson is speaking of parties organized along ideological lines or lines of a clear political philosophy.

> —can be an effective device for containing and modifying extremes on either end of the political spectrum, without preventing that steady change which is the best protection against violent and destructive courses.

In 1960 Mr. Pearson was arguing that to the extent that one can contain a consistent pattern of ideological or political thought among members of a party, and to the extent that they can be centrist parties, one had a better opportunity for a stable and long-term democracy than if the spectrum of a party were too broad or, in particular, if it moved to the extreme right or to the extreme left.

Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> While there are differences, there is an important and binding similarity between oppositions in any form of democracy. We all work to throw out the government of the day; to replace it by a more economic and more general, a more progressive and more cautious, a more responsible and a more imaginative one . . .

In short, Mr. Pearson said that those of us in opposition spend our time trying to replace the incumbent government with a better government—the word "better" meaning more consistent with the political philosophy and ideology of the government of the day. Mr. Pearson went on:

> . . . we are willing to go to great lengths to strengthen democracy in our respective countries. To this end we plan and produce policies. We tailor personalities and create images of leadership to fit those policies or, if necessary, vice versa.
> Without the daily and crushing pressure of official duties, oppositions, and particularly their leaders, are supposed to have time to produce ideas which will be as sound as they are captivating. Indeed, opposition leaders constitute, with editors and professors, the thinking element in democratic society. Government leaders, I am told, have no time for anything except decisions, with the space "sign here" already thoughtfully and carefully indicated by those who have behind the scenes, or in front of them, decided what the decision is to be.

As these comments were made by Mr. Pearson while he was still Leader of the Opposition, it would be interesting to know whether or not he had exactly the same views after three or four years as Prime Minister.

Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> Mr. Dean Acheson once wrote, after he ceased to be Secretary of State, that policy "bubbles up", and does not "trickle down". It was popular and not bureaucratic bubbling that he had in mind.

It was "popular" in the sense of doing what the public wanted, and developing policies that had grass roots support as opposed to developing policies that were there simply because the bureaucracy said they ought to be there. It is exactly the belief of those of us on this side of the chamber that major public policies need to have at least rudimentary public support which has led to much of our opposition to Bill C-62. I think it is clear that of all the things one might want to say about the GST bill, the one thing one could not say about it is that it has any base of popular public support.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say that it is one of the dangers of our time that this bureaucratic bubbling up is developed by the public policy of the bureaucracy. This development of major public policies by the elite is becoming the dominant element in the democratic process. In fact, he was saying as long ago as 1960—some 30 years ago, at a time when the government of Canada was significantly smaller; 25 per cent of the size it is today—that the bureaucracy had too big a role, had become too powerful and too strong in the policy development process, and that government was in serious danger of becoming increasingly captured by the bureaucracy as opposed to being captured by the public that it is supposed to serve.

Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> Here an opposition can play an important and corrective role by supplying a continuous, spontaneous and occasionally hissing contribution to this bubbling-up. In this way it can disturb and impress, and even assist, those responsible for government.

The one thing I must say for leaders opposite, the government leader opposite certainly does not believe that there is any role that those of us on this side of the chamber, to use Mr. Pearson's words, can in any way, shape or form assist those responsible for government other than by rolling over and blindly passing any legislation that this government wants to impose on the Canadian people.

Mr. Pearson then says that the opposition can also irritate and often exhaust the government and that perhaps this is beneficial. That is certainly one thing that we are attempting to do today.

> Governments, it has been said, more and more tend to secure agreement by exhaustion; inside in the procedures of officialdom, and outside in those of legislation.

This is an amazingly prophetic speech given by someone 30 years ago, at a time when the government of the day was not any more inclined to negotiate with the opposition and to seek reasonable compromises than is the current government, yet we have Mr. Pearson saying that governments more and more tend to secure agreement by exhaustion, particularly with respect to legislation.

> Oppositions can make their own effective contribution to this exhaustion and hence to agreement. Lest in saying this I seem to contradict what I said a few moments ago . . .

He also said that there were a large variety of ways that this can be done.

> Members of the opposition and the government, in democratic states, have at least one strong bond which normally transcends party differences—they are all members of the one Big Union of Elected Politicians. The fact that this union has had about as much abuse as the Teamsters—

This speech was given in 1960 when Mr. Pearson said the union of politicians received as much abuse as the Teamsters. In 1990 it is fair to say that we have passed the Teamsters with respect to the amount of abuse we have endured.

> —from more people and over a far longer period of time, tends to draw all its members together.
> Politicians have always been the victims of undeserved criticism and condemnation. Shakespeare called them "scurvy" and Adam Smith, "insidious and crafty."

● (0745)

> This has gone on for a long time—long before politicians were democratic. Both the criticism, when it is unfair, and the politicians, when the criticism is justified, may constitute a greater threat to democracy than those more direct attacks which are made on it and which seem a greater menace to us. If politics are ignoble, so is democracy, which operates through politics and politicians.
> Some part of the disdain and disapproval of the politician is due to the bad conscience of those who desert their own civic duties. It is easier to be a critic than a county councilor and it helps to remove one's sense of guilt at evading a tax or avoiding a vote.
> The politician, without being corrupt or even shady, can also evoke the disapproval of the fastidious through his aggressive zeal and his vivid imagination in applying those devices and pursuing those courses which are considered necessary to woo voters who are more impressed by singing commercials than monetary policy. These voters, we are told, are in the majority, and it is essential for the politician to secure most of them for himself, if he desires to save his country, or even humanity. So if too often he wraps himself up in slogans and sales-talk, remember he has to get elected. The executive-assistant has to play up to the Vice-President, and later to the President if he is ever to end up as Chairman of the Board, or so I am told.

In short, Mr. Pearson was making the observation that the art of selling yourself in politics, the art of talking to the public about your public policies, the art of explaining yourself to the public, is an art which must be demonstrated to voters, whom he describes as being more impressed by singing commercials than by monetary policy. It must be demonstrated in a form which voters will understand.

[Senator Kirby.]

It seems to me that the events in this chamber over the last several days have become something which the voters do understand. The message that is going out across the country, it seems to me, is two-fold: First, it is that there is very strong opposition to the GST on this side of the house and that we will do whatever we can to debate Bill C-62; and, second, that the Prime Minister will do whatever he can—however undemocratic, however much it violates the rules, no matter how illegal it is with respect to the standing of the Senate—to try to get the bill through.

Those are the two messages going out across the country these days. It is regrettable that their net effect will not only lead to a belief that it is a good thing that the GST is being fought, but it will also lead to a decline in public support for politicians and the political process. The net result will be a significant decline in public support for all of us, not only in this chamber but in the other place, and for the entire political process in general.

It seems to me that that is not good, either for us or, indeed, for the country.

Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> If the politician yields to unworthy pressures, some of which he may honestly mistake for the compulsions of a public opinion which cannot be denied, he is to be condemned. But equally, or even more to be condemned, are those who apply the pressures and those who create the climate of indifference and complaisant morality which makes the application easy.

I simply make the observation that one thing which is true of members of both sides of this house, whether in the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party, is that most of us have one important thing in common: We are inclined to think that public policies really do matter, that government has a major role to play in Canadian society. We are inclined not to be familiar with, or have, many friends who are agnostics or are completely against the political process. We are people inclined to be committed to the public, to the debate of public ideas and to the pursuit of major public policies.

Mr. Pearson then went on to explain his position on this issue by stating the following:

> I call to witness in my defense of the politician as the pillar—if at times the tarnished pillar—of democracy a professor from Duke University, Dr. Mayo . . .

Again we see academics being quoted on this subject. It seems to me that some of the best writings on the role of democracy and on the nature of democratic institutions have, in fact, come from political science professors. Mr. Pearson quoted a Dr. Mayo of Duke University, who wrote the following words:

> The politician is the broker, the adjustor, the reconciler, the arbiter—subject always to the sanction of the next election. He pours oil on the troubled waters of dispute. He is the peace-maker, transforming bitter social struggles into a game with rules. Among the clash of abstract principles he injects the saving doses of sweet expediency. He is the indispensable instrument of democratic politics, > through whom grievances are ventilated and tolerable justice done. To every problem there are too many solutions—usually incompatible and often contradictory. The politician thus rightly ignores many of the high-minded but impracticable schemes for the moral reform of humanity. He knows they could not be put into practice except by force and the destruction of liberty. He aims not at ideal justice, but at the right which is attainable, at the feasible and the tolerably good. The conscience of society is not sensitive enough to accept the highest ideal. Politics, like salvation, is for sinners not saints.

I do not think there is any particular appropriateness in Senator Steuart's having entered the chamber just as I mentioned that politics is for sinners, not saints; but some people enter on cue.

Dr. Mayo went on to say:

> Saints would probably not get elected in the first place, and would certainly never be reelected.

Mr. Pearson then said that Professor Mayo was right. Mr. Pearson basically said that he recognized that politicians must be brokers, adjusters, reconcilers and arbiters, that their challenge is not to do what is absolutely perfect but what is tolerable, that their target is to do what can be achieved realistically, not to set unreasonable goals that, however perfect or idealistic, are unattainable.

The role of the politician is to seek not 100 per cent perfection, not what my discipline of mathematics would call the "optimum solution" to any problem, but a practical solution, to muddle through, if you like.

I use the phrase "to muddle through" because it has become a standard phrase in the way political scientists describe government decision-making processes. A muddling through is about the best one can reasonably hope for and is, in fact, the target of most politicians. That is really what Dr. Mayo was saying and that is really the point Mr. Pearson was making when he said that Professor Mayo was right.

Mr. Pearson then continued by stating:

> There is no greater proportion of rascals or hypocrites among politicians than among lawyers, or farmers, or dentists, or ballplayers, or the repairers of television sets.

In short, the makeup of this house and, indeed, of the other place is very much a reflection of Canadian society in a wide variety of ways. It is wrong for the public to subscribe to politicians the notion that we have a greater proportion, as Mr. Pearson said, of rascals or hypocrites than any other segment of society. In fact, we truly reflect the nature of Canadian society and, indeed, one would hope, the views of Canadian society.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> It is well to keep these editorial spotlights, that TV camera, and the radio microphone, squarely on the politician.

Honourable senators can tell that this speech was given in the 1960s. Reference was made to the relevance of editorials and, to a lesser extent, the radio, whereas if one were writing that sentence today one would focus almost exclusively on television.

Mr. Pearson says that the politician asks that these spotlights be focused on him.

> He asks for it—at times he cries for it. And it is good for him if not always to him.

It may not always be very good for the political process. It may not necessarily always be good for the politician himself. Mr. Pearson states:

> If the result is bad for the politician, it should be good for politics, especially if the agency of exposure is honest and objective.

● (0800)

Mr. Pearson said:

> Nevertheless, it is wrong, and can damage democracy, if we despise or even ignore the politician; if we wrap ourselves up in a white sheet of superior if phony virtue, because the political servant at times permits his principles to be adjusted to circumstances without being abandoned; because he realizes the best can be the enemy of the good in the management of human affairs; that a too intense and intolerant concentration on perfection—a not too common political weakness, I admit—can encourage imperfection.
> Above all I hope that the professional and editorial critic will not sneer at the politician because normally he is not an intellectual (there are, of course, a few brilliant exceptions), or even one whose mental processes are always as rational as his instinctive reactions.

Dr. Mayo was the political scientist I mentioned a few minutes ago, because Mr. Pearson quoted him in the speech he gave in Washington. Mr. Pearson said:

> Dr. Mayo, whom I have quoted, observing from the vantage point of his ivory tower, believes that 'aspiring politicians who are unusually original, brilliant or witty, should try to conceal it, to appear as the plain, blunt man of the people.' This is good advice though it may lead one into strange places and unusual situations and unnatural expressions.

Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> Whatever he may do or say, the politician is the reflection of those who choose him. So if the reflection is one that invites concern about the plight of democracy, we should blame it on ourselves.

That comment is worth noting for all of us. Mr. Pearson made the observation—again, 30 years ago; some 24 years before the election of the current Prime Minister—that the politician is the reflection of those who choose him. So if the reflection is one that invites concern about the plight of democracy, we should blame it on ourselves.

Honourable senators, if one looks at what is happening in the Canadian electorate today, one finds a great many Canadians, from one end of this country to the other, are, in fact,

"blaming themselves", to use Mr. Pearson's words, for the nature of our current problems and, in particular, for the decision they made back in November 1988—at least with respect to the GST issue.

Mr. Pearson then went on to say:

> If our values—

By that he means the values of society—

> —are being lowered, if we do not cling with the assurance of earlier and simpler times to the things that are righteous, if we are not even sure what they are, because we increasingly mistake the package for the contents, then it is our fault and not that of some Congressional Committee.

Or, I might add, some committee in this place or some committee in the House of Commons. He goes on to say:

> It is not our politics and our politicians that have deteriorated. If there is such deterioration, it is in ourselves.

In that comment Mr. Pearson was referring to the deterioration of society as a whole and the growing belief, even 30 years ago, that governments could solve all problems and that all problems were solvable.

One of the difficulties facing Canadian society today is the belief that we can, through the power of the state, through government, solve all of the problems in our society. That is why Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> Or perhaps I should put it this way. Politics and politicians have always been deteriorating in the eyes of contemporary observers,—

Honourable senators will recall that at the beginning of my remarks I quoted the decline of politicians in the political process dating back to pre-Christian days—that is, dating back to the Roman Empire. Therefore, Mr. Pearson said:

> Politics and politicians have always been deteriorating in the eyes of contemporary observers, a fate which they share with every other kind of human activity. It was always better in grandpa's time.

In commenting to my own children—although I hope I am still a long way from being a grandfather—I find that we do have a tendency to look back and wish for easier and more peaceful times. The decline in support for politicians in the political process has been going on for generations.

Mr. Pearson concluded his remarks by saying the following:

> It should encourage us in this day of confused and worrying democracy, where we are—

Let us remember that this speech was given in 1960—

> —behind in missiles but well ahead in color TV and new models, to recall that politics were never so corrupt and inefficient in England as from 1732 to 1832, when the politicians were the most aristocratic and privileged. It was not in 1960, but in 1830 that Tocqueville commented on the talent among the people and the lack of it among the governors:—

[Senator Kirby.]

If one were to talk to the average Canadian across the country today, he would certainly echo the view that there is far more talent among the people than there are among those running the Government of Canada today.

It was back in 1830 that Tocqueville commented:

> "The most able men in the United States are very rarely placed at the head of affairs."

That statement is extremely true in Canada today. It would be harder to imagine a truer statement than that the most able men in Canada are very rarely placed, and are certainly not placed at the present moment, at the head of our national affairs.

Mr. Pearson concluded by stating how extremely strange it was that 130 years later—now 160 years in our case—it is still so demonstrably true in Canada that the most able people—and, indeed, one might say some the least able people—are actually running the government. It is because of that lack of ability among members of the government that many of our current, national problems, and the problems which we now face in this chamber, exist. If only greater ability existed in the government. If only there were greater ability on the other side to recognize that autocratic and dictatorial methods will not work and that elements of compromise are required if problems are to be solved. That is the kind of attitude that must prevail if many of the problems facing us at the present moment in this chamber are to be solved.

In concluding my remarks on this point of privilege, I wish to return to the point that I made at the beginning, namely, that in the absence of recognition by the Leader of the Government and the Speaker there is a role for the opposition to play. That role must be consistent with the rules of this place. It is now nearly impossible for us not only to do our job but also for democracy, as we know it in this country, to continue to exist. It is in defence of those democratic principles, in defence of the right of all members of this place to understand what the rules are, and in defence of the belief that the rules of this place should not be changed, and cannot be changed, unilaterally by the Speaker acting in collusion with the government leader in the Senate and the Prime Minister, that I speak. It is precisely in defence of those principles and in defence of the role of the opposition in democracy, about which Mr. Pearson talked so eloquently 30 years ago, that I decided to intervene on this issue of privilege. In so doing I had hoped to have the opportunity to comment in detail on Bill C-62, the GST, as a member of the committee and as a member of the steering committee, to explain in some detail why I am opposed to that bill. However, I will save those remarks for another time and will yield the floor at this time.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas Molgat: Honourable senators, if I remember correctly, when I was here last night, Senator Simard remarked that Senator Murray had not had a chance to take part in this debate. I wonder whether Senator Murray intends to do so, since one of his colleagues said we had not given him an opportunity. I am certainly prepared to accommodate him if he wishes to speak. However, since he is leaving the Chamber, I must conclude Senator Simard has not been in touch with his leader. There must be a lack of communication somewhere. There must have been a mix-up. I was certainly very interested to hear what Senator Murray would have to say about this question, since as the Leader of the Government, he would seem to owe us an explanation for the present state of affairs. Unfortunately, he has decided not to participate.

[English]

If my memory serves me correctly, it was somewhere between three o'clock and four o'clock in the morning, or thereabouts, when I spoke on the question of privilege. I was speaking first with regard to my personal objections as to what had happened to me, namely, that Senator Everett, from my own province, a colleague of mine for many years, had received a letter and I had not, and that my rights had thereby been abridged.

I spoke about the rights of the Senate; but I will not go over that same territory as I understand that one of my colleagues, Senator Lucier of the Yukon, quoted extensively yesterday from my speech of that day. I was not in the chamber at the time, but I understand that he said some kind things about me, and I thank him very much for that.

If the other day I was speaking directly to Senator Charbonneau and then to the Senate as a whole, my comments today are really addressed more to the new senators who have recently arrived in this chamber.

• (0815)

I think it is extremely important that they understand how this chamber works, what is the background of the Senate and why it is the way it is, because we now find ourselves in a situation which I think we can reverse and which I think we should reverse. However, before we can do that we have to understand why the Senate operates the way it does. To do that we have to go back to the origins of this chamber and understand the way it is structured. Frankly, I find that outside the chamber very few people understand what goes on here, and I do not blame them for that because I think it is perfectly understandable. As a rule the media coverage concentrates on the House of Commons, and not on the Senate, and for people not to understand that this is a very different chamber is neither surprising nor, I suppose, disappointing.

The facts are that this is an entirely different chamber from the House of Commons. It is entirely different in its structure and in its functions.

The first difference is that the Speaker in this chamber has no relationship to the Speaker in the other chamber with respect to authority. The Speaker in this chamber has no authority. That was determined at the very outset when way back in 1867 the government—the Fathers of Confederation, the provincial leaders of the day—insisted that there be a Senate as one way in which the diverse provinces could get together. They also decided that the Speaker would be appointed by the Prime Minister.

That is not the case in the House of Commons. It is true that the situation in the House of Commons has changed, since there is now a secret ballot for the election of the Speaker, which I think is a wise course. That is a fairly recent step. Nevertheless, over the years, the Speaker of the House of Commons has been selected by the members of the House of Commons. Previously an open vote was held which, admittedly, was done on the basis of an understanding between the parties and there was an election within the House of Commons.

That has never been the case here in the Senate. From the very beginning the Speaker has always been appointed by the Prime Minister. It is perfectly understandable that honourable senators were never prepared to give the Speaker in this chamber the authority that the Speaker has in the other chamber. When we, in the course of debate, trot out Beauchesne or Bourinot, or any other authority, and that authority refers to the Speaker, the responsibilities of the Speaker, the duties of the Speaker and anything to do with the Speaker that has nothing to do with this chamber. There is no point, and we should never get ourselves involved, in using those outside authorities, particularly Beauchesne, to determine what the Speaker in the Senate can or cannot do, because when Beauchesne speaks of "the Speaker" he is speaking of the Speaker of the House of Commons and not of the Senate. We should not quote what Beauchesne says about what the Speaker can do.

Senator Murray: Why do we have Rule 1 in our book?

Senator Molgat: Rule 1 in our rule book is a very simple rule. It states:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

The operative part of that rule is "In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House . . ." If we are to interpret what we should do we should first go to our own rules. Step one is to go to our own rules. If our rules do not specify what we have to do, we go to the "customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House", but first of our own house. In response to Senator Murray's question, I urge you to refer to the back of the rule book, where we have the "Forms and Proceedings" which are very clear. They are found at page 48 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada. There we see the following:

> (This appendix is a general description of Senate practice and is included in this volume as a source of information on the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate referred to in Rule 1.)

It is clear that if there is a question about our rules, we first go to our rule book. Secondly, we go to this appendix, which is the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate. If we do not find an answer after following both of those steps, we then go to our precedents. We go to the precedents of this house before we go to those of any other house. In that regard, I will be quite happy to have the clerks of the Senate produce the precedents of this house specifically with regard to the question now before us as to the role the Speaker has taken upon himself, or has had pushed on him by Senator Murray and Mr. Mulroney.

Let us go back to the precedents of this house. Let us ask the clerks to produce what has happened in the past. I do not want to get them involved in any political discussion, because that is not their function, but they are certainly capable of producing for us the precedents.

This is what I submit we should be doing: Only as a very last resort, if we do not find in our rule book and in our forms, practices and proceedings, and in the precedents of this chamber, do we go to other authorities. We do not, in any case, go to other authorities concerning the role of the Speaker because—and I come back to the point I was trying to make at the outset—the role of the Speaker in this chamber, from the very beginning of the Senate, has never been the same as that of the Speaker in the House of Commons. That has to be clearly established in everyone's mind. There is no comparison between the two.

If, then, the Speaker does not have the same kind of authority, let us deal with what has happened here in the past. To my knowledge never, never, never in the history of this chamber has the Speaker taken upon himself the authority to call a vote. I would ask my honourable friends to show us the precedents—show us where it has ever happened. If they can show me such a precedent I will be surprised. I would have to bow to the fact that there was a precedent, but I do not believe there is. Let us dismiss completely from our minds the relationship of the Speakers in the two chambers.

I hope that the media, if it is reporting the proceedings of this chamber, will clearly report in that regard, because it is an important fact of which Canadians should be aware.

As I have said, the other day I spoke about my own privileges and the privileges of the Senate as a whole, but really what we should be talking about are the privileges of Canadians, because that, in essence, is what this is all about. I see my honourable friend, Senator Roblin, with whom I have had debates of this type before, shaking his head, which reminds me of previous debates.

Senator Roblin: I was not shaking my head at you.

Senator Molgat: Ah, you are agreeing with me.

Senator Roblin: I am afraid I was not even listening to you.

Senator Molgat: I am delighted you are agreeing with me. In any case, the fundamental question here is the privilege of Canadians, because while it is true that we are not an elected chamber, we are nevertheless a representative chamber: We represent Canadians. Each of us has taken a name of an area. In the province of Quebec senators represent a constituency much more directly, because not only do they carry the name of the constituency but they must actually be representative of that constituency in that they must own property in it. There is a more direct representation. However, the rest of us have a representative role as well. We represent provinces at large.

[Senator Molgat.]

We must be residents in that province; we must own property in that province; and we must establish a name. In the case of many of us, such as Senator Roblin and myself who come from provincial legislatures, I think we probably feel a much closer representative role. Having been in a provincial house representing specific areas, I think we remain closer to the people in our region. Certainly, in my case, having taken the name of my old provincial constituency of St. Rose, I still feel a very definite attachment to that region. I visit there frequently; I participate in the activities of that region; and I still feel that I have that kind of representative role. But we all have, in any case, a very clear provincial representative role. We are here representing the people of our province.

When our rights are abridged, when I am prevented from voting, as I was the other day, when the Speaker of this chamber takes upon himself authority that he does not have and thereby reduces my participation, my rights, the rights of all of us, it is indeed the rights of Canadians that are affected. We are preventing all honourable senators from properly representing the regions from which they come. In that lies the danger in what has happened here. By a unilateral decision, the Speaker, pushed by Senator Murray, pushed by Mr. Mulroney, and pushed by Mr. Wilson, has changed the rules of this chamber.

Senator Stewart: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Molgat: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: A moment ago Senator Murray intervened to put forward a certain interpretation of our rules. I wonder if perhaps you are too harsh on him. You imply that he actually has studied our rules, but his question reveals that he has not studied our rules; that, perhaps, he is relying upon the advice of some well-paid but ill-informed young persons; and that he, distracted by his other duties of state, has never looked at the rules of the Senate. We all know that by reason of his devotion to Meech Lake he has spent very little time here, so it would be unreasonable for us to expect him to be acquainted with the rules of this house as the result of experience; and I suppose it is also reasonable to assume that, given a large staff, he relies on what his staff tells him. He is a very important member of the Mulroney cabinet. I was going to say that he is a very important man in this government; but I heard cries from across the way that that is nonsense. I insist that he is at least an important man in this government.

I have read in the newspapers—indeed I believe this—that he is the most intelligent man in this government, a man who gives the kind of legitimacy that comes with intelligence to this government. So he is very busy in the council chamber. Many, many matters of state demand his attention.
