Is it fair for us to assume that he, himself, has given the kind of attention to the rules of this House that Senator Molgat has given to the rules of this House? Must we not presume that he is relying on his well-paid staff and that somehow or other his staff, inexperienced in Parliament, have gone wrong, with the result that Senator Murray has gone wrong? In consequence, we find ourselves in this dismal situation.

I am merely intervening, Senator Molgat, to protect Senator Murray from the notion that all this was done quite deliberately by him. Is it not possible that there is an element of misunderstanding and ignorance, as betrayed by the question which Senator Murray addressed to Senator Molgat earlier, behind the plight into which he has plunged this chamber?

I ask Senator Molgat to consider that seriously, because we would not like the record of this House to show that Senator Murray deliberately and with good knowledge conspired in the breaking of the rules of this House.

I ask Senator Molgat to consider the importance of my question and to answer it.

Senator Molgat: Senator Stewart has raised a most interesting question. I note the very gentle tones and the kind approach Senator Stewart has used vis-à-vis Senator Murray. That is the typical approach of a Maritimer. Maritimers are always gentle and pleasant people to deal with. I know that Senator Stewart is treating Senator Murray with a kind touch, and I commend him for that.

Unfortunately, I cannot answer directly Senator Stewart's question. I do not know how Senator Murray could have asked me the question he did regarding our rules, and referring me back to Rule 1, if he had read the rule book and if he had imbued himself with the background of this chamber! If he had understood the real meaning of the Senate and the purpose of the Senate, I suppose he would not have asked me that question. So, when Senator Stewart raises this matter, I hope that he is reminding Senator Murray, in his gentle way, that he ought to be paying more attention to the rule book itself and that he should read through it. Perhaps Senator Murray will give us the benefit of his views on this.

I asked Senator Murray at the outset of my comments, following a request made last evening by Senator Simard, whether he wanted to participate. I repeat that Senator Simard chastised us last evening for not giving his leader a chance to speak.

Senator Lucier: Perhaps he will after he has read the rules.

Senator Molgat: Yes, but it would be of benefit to the Senate to hear what Senator Murray has to say in this regard.

I regret that I cannot give Senator Stewart a more direct answer. Perhaps, as the debate proceeds, he will have an opportunity to pose that question directly to Senator Murray.

Honourable senators, concerning the privileges of Canadians having been abused by the Speaker of this house, aided, abetted and pushed by Mr. Mulroney, the Prime Minister of the country, by Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and by Mr. Wilson, the Minister of Finance, let us look at what has happened in this affair.

This goes back to a statement made by Mr. Wilson to the effect that the government had a way to solve this matter of the GST and the Senate. He said they were going to push this forward and that by the end of last week Canadians would see how the government had this planned.

Following that, Senator Murray had his marching orders. We have to recognize that Senator Murray is under some difficulty. He was the government's chief operator in the matter of the Meech Lake Accord, the individual who was to ensure that the Meech Lake Accord was adopted by Canadians willy-nilly, regardless of what the attitudes might be in other parts of the country. He was the individual charged with accomplishing that agreement.

If honourable senators look at the dismal record of the Meech Lake Accord and the way in which it was handled, they will appreciate the difficult position in which Senator Murray finds himself. His position in the cabinet has been extremely weakened. He was given a task to do and he did not accomplish it. He tried all sorts of tricks, including the last one, which was putting the provincial premiers in a hot box for ten days, using all kinds of techniques to force them into submission; but he was unable to deliver the goods.

Senator Murray now finds himself in a very weakened position in cabinet. He is now in the position—and I put this as a hypothesis—where he has to deliver the goods, because if he does not deliver the goods this time, then it is probably goodbye; he is likely out of the cabinet.

Having an ultimatum from Mr. Wilson from the other place, and an ultimatum from the Prime Minister, and his own ultimatum—because he wishes to recoup his position in cabinet—he decided that come what may his will will be imposed on this chamber. How else can one explain the decision of the Speaker in this chamber to go against the historic position of the Senate, to go against the rules, to go against the proceedings, to go against precedents and push forward by a change—not a change in the rules, but creation of a new rule. How else can one explain that kind of action in this chamber?

I think that honourable senators opposite should reflect on exactly what has happened, because we did not need to get into this situation at all. There is a way out, or there was a way out. It is traditional in this place to resolve our differences by communication. That is why we do not use the Speaker. If there is a problem, we discuss it among ourselves. The leaders of the two parties sit down and discuss any problems that arise. They normally come back to the caucuses and tell us how they have decided to resolve a matter.

Senator Corbin: We usually deal with Senator Doody, an excellent person.

Senator Molgat: That is correct; we normally meet with Senator Doody, and we have arrived at solutions. We have done that time after time after time. That is not an unusual practice. On the contrary, it is the usual practice of communication between the two sides.

Why did the government not do that this time? Why did Senator Doody not talk to Senator Frith? Why did Senator Doody not say to Senator Frith: "We are into this type of situation with the bells ringing, and they may ring for a long time. What is it that you intend to do?" Then some kind of an agreement could have been arrived at. The opposition can then state what it wants and the government can state what it wants.

Was there any attempt to do that in this instance? Not to my knowledge. If there were such an attempt, that was not communicated to me. There was no attempt by the members of the government to arrive at an understanding. What was done was done by decree, by a wrong decree, by pressure on the Speaker to have him do something that he should not have done, instead of following the normal system of communication between the two sides. That is the way in which the Senate has operated in the past and that is the way in which we should conduct our business; but there was no attempt in this case to do that. A decision was taken by the government without consulting this side—though the government did consult the whips, but not the rest of us. By decree the government imposed this decision. It prostituted the Speaker, as I said earlier; it destroyed that individual. That is the wrong way to proceed. There is another way, one which has been used time and time again in this chamber, and that is what should have been done. The question now is what can be done about this.

I believe honourable senators opposite the way are just as interested as I am in having a set of rules in this chamber under which we can function. It is essential that we have rules. This is a civilized chamber and all senators have the interests of Canadians at heart although we may have different ideas as to how to get there. My honourable friends across the way may think the GST is the right answer. I am equally convinced it is not. That is fair; but nevertheless we have to operate under rules.

I submit that it is not in the interests of honourable senators opposite that the precedent that has been established so far on these questions of privilege should remain part of the precedents of this house. I think that in the long run it will be damaging to the Senate as a whole.

I appeal to members across, particularly the new members, to speak to the leadership on that side. They cannot be happy with what is taking place now. They cannot be happy with a situation in which the Speaker makes rules that should not have been made. Honourable senators opposite cannot be happy with a situation in which members on both sides are not the ones who decide what the rules should be. That is not the proper way for this chamber to function. I think we can find a way out of this affair. We can indeed turn the clock back. Let us forget what has gone on. Indeed a precedent was set for that in the last few days. If honourable senators refer to the Debates of the Senate of last Thursday, September 27—and this may seem like a long time ago—they will see there an agreement to have Senator Frith withdraw a motion. Senator Frith had moved the previous Thursday that there were strangers in the house. In the Rules of the Senate—this is the only rule I can find under which there is no debate—Rule 17 says:

> If at any sitting of the Senate, or in Committee of the Whole, any senator shall take notice that strangers are present, the Speaker or the chairman (as the case may be) shall forthwith put the question, "That strangers be ordered to withdraw"— and this is the important part of the rule

> —without permitting any debate or amendment:

I believe that is the only motion that is not debatable. Senator Doody is shaking his head.

Senator Doody: Is the adjournment motion debatable?

Senator Molgat: It is debatable.

Senator Doody: The adjournment?

Senator Molgat: Yes, according to Rule 27, which says:

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate . . .

So an adjournment motion is certainly a question before the Senate.

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate, a question of privilege, or upon a point of order, or upon a motion or an inquiry, or in making a mere interrogation . . .

As I read the rule book, with the exception of the motion that strangers be ordered to withdraw, every other motion is debatable.

Returning to the events of that Thursday, Senator Frith moved the motion that strangers be ordered to withdraw, which was non-debatable, non-amendable and to be put forthwith. The Speaker did so and the bells started to ring. As an aside, the bells did not continue to ring, because Mr. Speaker decided they should stop. It may have been a sensible action in the sense that we did not want to keep the staff present and have someone in the Chair over the whole weekend, but what was wrong was that there was no consultation.

Senator Stewart: Senator Molgat, is it not true that when the bells rang in the other house in 1982, the Speaker of that house—a Speaker who, as you yourself said earlier this day, has vastly greater authority than the Speaker of this house—did not allow the Chair to stand empty, did not slam the doors and did not presume to shut off the bells? Senator Molgat, is it not true that what was done here, not only last Thursday but during the previous week, was a contempt of Parliament? Is it not true that if this had been done in England a few hundred years ago, heads would have rolled—not just figuratively? Is it not true that no Speaker in the House of Lords would ever have presumed to close down the house? Is it not true that no Speaker in the House of Commons at Westminster would ever have dared to close the doors and leave the Chair on his own? Would that not have constituted the offence of treason in those days? Senator Molgat, I ask you to direct your mind to that before you move on from what was done not last Thursday but the week before.

Senator Molgat: Thank you for your question, Senator Stewart. I must say that I am by no means the historian you are. I would not pretend to be able to speak as to what would have happened in the Parliament of England, although there is no question that Parliament was considered to be much more important than it is now, and the privileges of Parliament in particular were viewed as being absolutely critical—and so they were in that particular era, because they were the only protection against an absolute monarch.

By the way, it seems that we have now reached the point in Canada where we need the same kind of protection against an absolute monarch in the other place.

Senator Gigantès: If Senator Molgat will allow a question, are you agreeing with me, sir, that Prime Minister Mulroney is now behaving in a manner similar to that of absolute monarchs, driven only by his personal ambition and with total disregard for what is decent and traditional in this country?

Senator Molgat: Senator Gigantès, I must confess that I am concerned about the way in which the Prime Minister is proceeding. That is why I spoke with the depth and feeling I did the other evening and with which I speak now. I believe that the institution of Parliament is being severely damaged by the actions of this Prime Minister. I believe many other things have been savagely damaged in Canada, but I specifically refer to your question of Parliament. Frankly, I deplore the fact that there is a tendency to trivialize this situation. We do not now have the same concerns for the rights of Parliament as we had in previous years. This is a serious problem in a democratic system. I am not answering your question in a light manner. The matter is most serious.

I realize that some honourable senators will say that the continuation of the debate in this way is trivializing the matter. I do not believe that. I believe that the matter is so serious that we have to proceed in this way, because we have to impress upon the members on the other side that something has to be done to get us back on the right course. This brings me back to what I was saying about the events of last Thursday when Senator Frith moved the motion that strangers be ordered to withdraw. The bells rang over the weekend. The actions of the Speaker in that particular case were wrong. The Speaker does not have the authority in this house to decide that the bells shall stop ringing. He does not have that authority. The rules and procedures are clear. The bells should have continued ringing.

However, from a practical, sensible standpoint—and I think we could have settled the matter in a practical, sensible way—there should have been consultation. Senator Doody, in consultation with the Speaker, could have met with Senator Frith, who normally handles these situations. Together they could have said that the sensible thing to do was not to keep the staff on duty all weekend but allow our pages—who must be getting tired during the course of this debate—the stenographers and everyone else to go home. That would have been arranged by consultation, and I am sure the matter could have been resolved. Senator Doody is a reasonable individual, as is Senator Frith. I think they would have returned from each of their caucuses and asked the other side if they agreed with this proposition. If this had happened on our side, we would have had an understanding and the bells could have stopped for the weekend—but only by consultation and understanding. That is not what happened. The Speaker, on his own, made that decision. The Speaker had no right to make that decision. It was the first step of changing the rules by decree instead of changing the rules by understanding in this chamber. That is what should have happened in that instance.

Let us return to what we did in the next case. Senator Frith's motion was that strangers be ordered to withdraw. What happened then? By decree the bells stopped ringing. I have discussed that. We returned the following Tuesday. The Senate resumed and we went directly into a question of privilege that I raised, which had to do with the eight new senators, who, by that time, had been officially or unofficially sworn in. They had been sworn in in secret in the Speaker's chambers. On the Thursday, when Senator Frith moved his motion, we did not know that that secret operation had occurred, but by Tuesday, of course, it was public. So I raised the question of privilege when we first entered the chamber.

During the course of that day we proceeded to discuss questions of privilege. What happened by late that afternoon? Senator Frith and Senator Doody had a conversation about what was going on. What came out of that agreement? We turned the clock back. We got out of the situation in which we found ourselves by agreement between the two sides—not by the Speaker making any decision. He was not involved in that decision, nor should he have been. The two sides got together and what happened then? That evening at 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Senator Frith rose and said:

• (0900)

> Honourable senators, I have had a short discussion with Senator Doody, and we propose the following: That you grant me unanimous consent to withdraw my motion dealing with the strangers, and that we then adjourn until Wednesday, October 3, at 2 o'clock to give both sides an opportunity to confer with their caucus colleagues; and that we start a new session on Wednesday.

There was then a correction made; it was not a session, it was a sitting.

Senator Doody agreed to that. He said:

> . . . what Senator Frith has said is substantially correct, with the clarification he made about the new session. We at no time agreed to a new session, but we have agreed that we would adjourn this evening to return at 2 o'clock on Wednesday, October 3. I am not sure if Senator Frith has to make a formal withdrawal, but leave is granted.

Honourable senators, let us look at the situation. We were actually in the middle of a division. The division bells had rung, and technically they should still have been ringing at that time. The Whips were walking in. We were just about to proceed with the division, and what happened? By agreement of the two sides there was an understanding that we would not proceed. By agreement of the two sides in the middle of a division—it was not in the middle of a debate; it was in the middle of a division—we withdrew the motion and returned to square one.

That, honourable senators, is the way in which the Senate should do its business—by agreement. Our business should not be carried out by decree, certainly not by the Speaker making new rules, certainly not by the Speaker taking upon himself authority which this house has never given to him. It is essential that senators maintain that authority unto themselves.

So there is a precedent over the last few days where, by agreement, we have been able to resolve a problem. I submit that by agreement we can resolve the present problem. I submit that we could agree to revoke the decision that was made by the Speaker here last week, that he could call a vote on his own. My honourable friends know that it was a wrong decision on the part of the Speaker. They know that it was not made according to our rules. It was not done according to our precedents. It was not done according to the way this house has ever conducted its business. I do not believe that senators opposite are any more interested in giving the Speaker authority that he does not have than we are.

Why not go back, as we did in the case of the withdrawal of the division that was then in process? Why not go back? Why not have Senator Doody and Senator Frith sit down to find a way out of this impasse in which we find ourselves? Let us get back to our sensible proceedings of past times, where we did things by consultation.

Let us not try to say that we have now established a precedent whereby the Speaker can decide when votes are going to be taking place in this house.

Let us remember, my honourable friends, that this works both ways. Temporarily you have a majority in this chamber—

Senator MacEachen: A very thin majority.

Senator Molgat: —but you are not always going to have that majority. It will change.

Senator MacEachen: How large is it, senator?

Senator Molgat: I am not quite sure how large it is, but until such time as the status of the eight senators is settled, until the courts determine that, I suppose that no one can give us the answer as to what the majority is. But majorities change in this place and we should not be depending on the whim of a Speaker.

Let us remember, honourable senators, that this is a Speaker appointed by the Prime Minister. Do not ever forget that we have a Speaker appointed by the Prime Minister. Majorities change in this place and Prime Ministers also change in this country. I hope that this change will happen soon in Canada, but a change in Prime Minister will take place. He will appoint the next Speaker. Does this chamber want the next Speaker to have unilateral rights to make rules, to decide by himself how this chamber will conduct its business? Is that really what senators want?

Think about it, honourable senators. There is a valid reason for what goes on in this chamber. There is a valid reason why we do not give the Speaker that kind of authority. I plead with honourable senators to think about what it is they are doing.

[Senator Molgat.]

I am particularly concerned by a comment made by Senator Doody at the adjournment of the last sitting. We have had so many sittings that on occasion I miss keeping track of them, and I cannot find the exact quote—I believe we have not yet received that day's Hansard—but, if I understood Senator Doody correctly, he left the impression that the decision of the Speaker to call a vote established a precedent.

I would hope that that is not really what Senator Doody meant to say. I think it would be terribly wrong to say that the Speaker having done something once it then becomes a precedent for this chamber, even though it had not before been done in 123 years.

I sincerely hope that that is not what Senator Doody meant to say. I think he would agree that one wrong decision by a Speaker should not establish a precedent in this chamber.

My honourable friends, I go back to an appeal to Senator Doody, who essentially is a reasonable man, a man who I think recognizes the need for the independence of this chamber. If we were able last week to turn the clock back in the middle of a division, surely we can turn the clock back now, remove from the record what has happened, go back to our rules and our precedents, have our clerks prepare what the precedents are, and on that basis arrive at an agreement in this chamber.

I appeal to Senator Doody to use the time-honoured practice in this chamber of doing things by agreement, by discussion. I appeal to him not to do things by way of pressure—and shocking pressure—on the Speaker, resulting in the kind of debate in which we have been engaged now for too many hours.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have always been fascinated by the development of parliamentary practice, parliamentary rules, parliamentary precedents, and, indeed, the very establishment of Parliament. As we know, much of that goes back to the very beginnings of written and, indeed, oral history. Much of that goes back to stone engravings as far back as 6,000 or 7,000 years ago. Archaeologists are now finding documents that presumably are even older than that, though dating these finds has always been a problem.

Honourable senators, like everyone else in this house, I was not born a parliamentarian, but my interest in Parliament and the ways of Parliament is something I picked up in grade school, in elementary school and, later on, in college debating societies. Eventually I developed a real interest for parliamentary life, for the electoral process and, indeed, for the ways in which the lawmakers acted and the means by which they developed laws.

When I was a civil servant in New Brunswick, I would rush after work to the gallery of the New Brunswick legislative assembly and look down upon the functioning of one of the oldest assemblies in Canada. And my interest grew. One day I decided to run for Parliament and then I really had to do something about my relative ignorance of the conduct of the work of that house.

The first piece of advice I was given, upon arriving at the House of Commons, with respect to the rules was that I should remain seated in the house, observe what was going on and try to appreciate the finer points of procedure, which are not readily understandable to the lay person and certainly not to most people who come to Parliament, whether it be to this august chamber or to the elected house.

One of the things that has always amazed me in this evolution of my knowledge of parliamentary rules, laws, practices and what have you, was that most of the things that are written, whether in our rule book, Beauchesne, Erskine May, Bourinot, or any of the old authorities, existed in one way or another in primitive society, as we civilized moderns like to call the societies that existed millennia ago. Nothing was invented in this day and age. Most of our practices rest upon ancient usages and practices, some of which go back to the very beginning of history.

Some people may waive such considerations, taking the view that history is history and that what happened 600, 1,000 or 2,000 years ago really does not matter any more. Some people may think that we now have to live by the rules as they are written.

Honourable senators, the copy of the Rules of the Senate of Canada that I hold in my hand is dated March 1990. The book of rules is upgraded from time to time upon the recommendation of the Rules Committee, which currently is presided over by Senator Molgat. With the approval of the full house, and only when the Senate approves any recommendations, can they become part of our inner statutes, governing the way in which we must conduct ourselves in our deliberations.

What is the Senate? A lot has been said about the Senate not being representative of the people. It is not the Senate that is important, it is the people who sit in the Senate. Without the people in the Senate, without the men and women who have been called to this place, the Senate is an empty shell. It has no meaning in itself. It is only when it is peopled that it has meaning.

The Senate is peopled by many individuals who have experience in the professions, in the business community, and many people who were involved in their local communities as mayors, councillors, or aldermen—call them what you wish; the names vary from place to place in Canada. Certainly, there are people here who have had experience similar to that which I have had the pleasure of acquiring over the years in parliamentary practice picked up in the House of Commons.

I am not expert on parliamentary rules. I never pretended to be, and I will not pretend that at seven minutes past nine on this ninth day of October.

Senator Molgat: That is the wrong calendar day.

Senator Corbin: Well, I do not know what that nine stands for. Is that the calendar date Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: That is the date that we started.

Senator Corbin: That is yesterday.

Senator Molgat: Yes, it is yesterday by the calendar.

Senator Corbin: The ninth of October that we see on the Table was yesterday.

I take this opportunity to raise a matter of procedure. I am speaking on privilege, but I am giving notice to honourable senators that at a later date I will raise a serious question of procedure with respect to the manner in which we date and time the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

The practices of not seeing the clock, of not following the calendar or the movement of the clock hands like the rest of Canadians is an acronysm, and we must do something about that. Some will say, "You have no respect for the long-standing practices of Parliament." That is not the point. I am basically a practical person. I would like matters to be run the way they are run in the rest of the world in terms of proper chronometry or chronology—call it what you want. That way of dating our current sitting is wrong. This is not on October 9; this is October 10 right now.

In any case some people will argue, "Never mind. Do not bother with the way the parliamentary system was developed over the century. That does not count." I say that it does count. What counts, especially in the case of Canada, is the Constitution and how that evolved. That in itself is quite a scholarly matter.

My leader, Senator MacEachen, pointed out yesterday that Senator Beaudoin is an eminent academic when it comes to constitutional matters. He has written quite a heavy book. I purchased it for my own betterment and knowledge of what the Constitution is all about.

A constitution basically has to be written in such plain language that the layperson—and I do not use that term in a demeaning way—can understand what the Constitution of this country says. Dean Beaudoin may write an 800 page volume on the Constitution, but the Constitution—and I have the text of it annotated in the two official languages—is not a thick document. The French text alone, if you left out the notes, would not take more than about 50 pages, depending on the size of the print.

A constitution has to be drafted in simple terms so that everyone in the country knows where he or she stands. Otherwise, if the ordinary person could not understand his Constitution, what would be the use of writing one in the first place?

In the current Constitution, under section 34, there is a paragraph that pertains to the Speaker of the Senate. Where does the Speaker of the Senate get his power? Section 34 says:

> The Governor General may from Time to Time, by Instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, appoint a Senator to be Speaker of the Senate, and may remove him and appoint another in his Stead.

There is a footnote to that which I will not read. Most of the footnotes in this book are of historical significance. Section 34 states:

> The Governor General may from Time to Time, by Instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, appoint a > Senator to be Speaker of the Senate, and may remove him and appoint another in his Stead.

That is where the Speaker comes from.

The Governor General does not do this on his own; he is advised by the Prime Minister of the day, the cabinet, the inner cabinet, the outside cabinet—the tight cabinet, the loose cabinet. The Prime Minister is personally responsible for the selection of the person who occupies the Chair in the house of the Senate of Canada.

The following paragraph is interesting. All the powers of the Senate are enunciated in the Constitution of Canada, thank God. Section 36, which is entitled "Voting in Senate," states: > and the Speaker shall in all Cases have a Vote, and when the Voices are equal the Decision shall be deemed to be in the Negative.

> Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a Majority of Voices,

I stress the word "Majority." It goes on to state:

To proceed with a vote and to have a majority under our parliamentary system, which is a system of constituted parties recognized over the years—that is, many years—means that the parties have to be physically present in the Senate. You do not put a question with half the house away. You do not put a question after deciding to lock the doors before the time appointed unilaterally, and I would be inclined to say despotically, by the Speaker of the Senate, has arrived, which is what happened the other day.

I said in my remarks the other night that I had never seen anything like it. Never in my parliamentary life do I remember reading anything similar to that incident. I am still quite shocked by that occurrence. Like Senator Molgat, I feel that a bad precedent cannot remain as a precedent in any way, shape or form. A bad precedent based on partisan judgment is not a precedent.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Corbin will permit a question. I want to ask about the creation of precedents. When I quoted Speaker Sauvé speaking in the House of Commons on March 18, 1982, as recorded in the Commons Debates at page 1556, I failed to quote a part of her reflections—I think that is what you call it—which dealt with this matter of creating precedents. She said, speaking about the proposal that was made in March 1982, that she intervened as our Speaker now has intervened to stop the ringing of the divisional bells:

> What would have been the consequences of an arbitrary decision that did not derive from any of the rules approved by this House nor from a precedent with any relevance to the present situation? It would have meant breaking with an age-old practice that has proved its worth—

Namely, the prolonged ringing of the bells. She goes on to say:

> How can the Speaker make sure that all members available to take part in the division are in the House?

[Senator Corbin.]

That is the same question that Senator MacEachen asked yesterday, namely, "How will the Charbonneau rule work in the real world?" She goes on to say:

> Is it the responsibility of the Chair or the whips? What would prevent the Speaker from setting the time of the division in other circumstances? The Chair would have set a precedent that might create even greater confusion in the case of a minority government.

Speaker Sauvé then went on to say:

> In any event, such action on my part would have been open to allegations of partiality.

• (0930)

> Clearly, the Speaker must at all times be impartial. If, for example, the Chair had sacrificed itself—

—and this is the part to which I particularly want to draw your attention, Senator Corbin—

> —in order to get the House back to work,— that is to say, to work on the government's business—

> —would this have saved the House? And in the circumstances, would the House have agreed with the new precedent that I would have created? It was a question I had to ask myself.

She then goes on to say:

> The authority of the Chair is no greater than the House wants it to be.

The clear implication of what Speaker Sauvé says there is that a Speaker alone, operating as a bolt out of the blue, cannot create a precedent. The implication was—and I put it to you, Senator Corbin, for your consideration—that when a Speaker is said to have created a precedent, what, in fact, has happened is that a Speaker has brought together, has put down, has stated, has articulated the sense of the House. If there is no sense of the House, no sense which would sustain what a Speaker has said in such a case, there is no precedent. It is so obvious that unless the players on a field playing a game have a general acceptance of the rules of the game, rulings on specific points made by the umpire or referee are but hollow words and do not constitute a precedent.

I interrupted you, Senator Corbin, and I know you will not resent this interruption, because I think it is important for us to realize that a Speaker, even a Speaker of the House of Commons of Westminster or a Speaker of the House of Commons in Ottawa, cannot, even with their great authority, of themselves create a precedent. What they can do in the absence of authoritative practice, in the absence of a clear rule, such as we have here with regard to divisions, is to pull together and state the sense and will of the House. To use an analogy: They turn the water of opinion into ice; if there is no water, there can be no ice.

Would Senator Corbin give us his considered opinion on this point, which I derive from what Speaker Sauvé said in 1982?

Senator Corbin: Thank you, Senator Stewart. I am no match for your knowledge of the rules, your knowledge of the historical development of the rules, and I am no match for your wisdom. I will simply say that I subscribe to your views.

Certainly, in my view, the Speaker has no right to claim that he interprets the rules when the rules are written in such a way that they are so plain, so well put, so clear that the person on the street understands them. A Speaker may be called from time to time to clarify points of order or to give some kind of a judgment on questions of privilege, but he certainly has no power to edict new rules or to interpret them in such a way that they clearly express the desires and wishes, indeed the dictates, of the government of the day.

In the case of Speaker Charbonneau we have a clear cut situation of the Speaker who threw aside the precedents, the clearly annunciated rules of the Senate, and, in a pigheaded way, decided he was going to tell the minority—indeed, Her Majesty's Official Opposition in the house—how he thinks they ought to be conducted, managed, call it whatever you want. In other words, he clearly went out of bounds.

As an occupant of the Chair in the other place, I was very impressed at our daily meetings with the Speaker of the House of Commons. Whether the Speaker was a he or a she, the Speaker in every instance, before bringing down a ruling, before deciding on points of order or questions of privilege, would ask the officers at the Table and the research branch to pull out all of the precedents, decisions of former Speakers. He would study them with the Table advisers, the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the assistant clerks, and once he had reviewed the material he would call his assistants into his chambers and tell them that he had looked at the precedents, that he had studied them carefully and he would state what advice he would be giving. He would then ask, "What is your view?" We would discuss and debate the matter sometimes for days before he would feel comfortable enough to rise at his place—or her place in the case of Madame Sauvé—at the head of the chamber, at the foot of the Chair; and when the Speaker did feel comfortable, when the Speaker had a feeling of the "sense of the House" as you put it Senator Stewart, especially with difficult situations, he would bring down the ruling.

In my day and age, because of that very sage, wise way of conducting themselves, Speakers of the House of Commons had never been challenged with partisanship. They have never been voted out of office. In recent years some Speakers apparently did not do too good a job and they were replaced, but that is another thing and that is for that House to decide. However, here in the Senate we have a different situation. We have a Speaker who holds his mandate from the government of the day. As I understand it, he can only be replaced by the government of the day. We have a Speaker who says, "Why should I bother with the sense of the House? Why should I bother with the rules? Why should I bother with the customs, the practices and the precedents? I hold my mandate from the government of the day and "the heck" with you boys and girls. I will call the shots when I feel like calling the shots." Honourable senators, he called a number of bad shots. We had to redress him a few times for bad rulings. I am not necessarily referring to this Speaker but to a former occupant of that Chair who has since left us for a higher calling.

Speakers are human; we all recognize that. We do not expect their intelligence to be clad in chrome. They are human. They have brains and they have blood running through their arteries like everyone else, and they will make mistakes.

Honourable senators, to make an honest mistake and to have the common sense to say, "I have made a mistake" is to be human and it is something that we must all respect. However, it is another thing to act out of pigheadedness and to say, "I have had enough and I will conduct myself the way prefective disciplines used to conduct themselves 30 or so years ago in colleges." They would call the shots and there was not much democracy. Obviously, the Speaker knows not the terms of democracy.

You could ask him what was printed in the Quorum twenty days ago, five years ago or two years ago and he could answer you because during the proceedings of the Senate he reads Quorum. He reads it from page one to the last page. He does that every day. He does not know procedure because he never follows the proceedings of the Senate. His conduct has been an insult to this House and to every senator in this House. He does not know the rules, because he never bothered learning the rules. He is like Senator Chaput-Rolland reading papers—the mumbling senator from Montreal: Mumble, mumble, jumble. That is all she has done since she has been here.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Thank you, sir.

Senator Corbin: A friend of Senator Simard, the other mumbler. What is wrong with this place is that the Speaker has not shown respect for the Senate. We have all been insulted, we have all been hurt, and the house has been done great damage.

• (0945)

Those senators who come here without previous parliamentary experience—and I will forgive their ignorance; I was ignorant when I came to the Commons—should be very careful in the coming days and weeks. I do not want to lecture them, but they should be careful when the time to vote comes, because although they may never say a word in the debate, the fact that they are voting expresses their views. The simple fact of standing up is the same as having given a speech: You have expressed your views though you have not made a speech. Voting in this place is an expression of one's views. If they do not vote according to their hearts and conscience, but according to the dictates of their political bosses, they will have that on their hearts and souls for as long as they live, and I think they will regret that.

It is nice to have power. It is a great thing for the Prime Minister of Canada to say, "I have a majority. I can run the House of Commons the way I want; I can run the Senate the way I want. If I do not have enough senators, I will pack it, I will swamp it with my friends, with friends of the party."

It is nice to be in that position, but it is also damn dangerous for the country. It is dangerous for the Senate, it is dangerous for the House of Commons.

The rules of the Senate were developed by evolution, accretion, adding, layer upon layer, stratum after stratum. The rules of the Senate evolved as civilization evolved. When we had the death penalty Parliament decided that it was no longer a humane penalty. I think that decision made Parliament and Canada more humane. It is part of the evolution of this country that we passed that law. What Speaker Charbonneau wants to do is turn the clock back. He wants to go back to the age of despots, tyrants, dictators. He had no right to make the ruling he made. The bells ring until the whips come in. Speaker Charbonneau decided that he would send a letter to some privileged few. That is his sense of fairness and justice. He sent letters to indicate that the bells would stop at a certain time. A Speaker has no right in this chamber to turn the bells on or turn the bells off unless the Senate tells him to do so, unless the senior members of the parties agree and tell him to do so.

Those bells are not his domain; those bells belong to the Senate, not to the Speaker. He can only order the bells rung when senators have expressed a wish to proceed to a division. He has no power to stop them except if the rules say he has the power to stop them, and the rules just do not say that. The rules are clear.

The whips give the signal. The whips trigger the shutting down of the bells, no one else. That is a basic practice in all Parliaments. But, of course, that is not something one reads about in Quorum; one has to read the rule book.

I just happened to be reading a book by Johannes Brondsted entitled The Vikings.

Senator Sparrow: Read it to us.

Senator Corbin: I intend, Senator Sparrow, to quote a few extracts from it because I think they are pertinent to my question of privilege, inasmuch as some of the practices and privileges we enjoy in this house, indeed in this Parliament, go back to that period when Parliament began to evolve in terms of a gathering of people who made laws and who interpreted laws.

I will quote the following paragraph from that book:

> The Scandinavians—

I think today or tomorrow we are hosting a visit by the Prime Minister of Norway, or it may be the Head of State.

Senator Bosa: The President of Newfoundland!

Senator Corbin: That will be the day!

Senator Cools: Is that Senator Doody?

Senator Corbin: In any event, I will proceed to the quote:

> The Scandinavians introduced into Anglo-Saxon England their own territorial divisions, and the names of these, too, survive in places. For instance in many northern areas hundreds (as they are elsewhere called) are known as "wapentakes", which derives from Old Norse vapnatak, a word used at the sessions of the ancient Thing or assembly.

[Senator Corbin.]

As a parliamentary institution, they had the Thing, and also the Althing. The Althing was the Commoners' Parliament and the Thing was the higher assembly, more or less. I cannot make an exact parallel or draw an exact analogy to our institutions, but the roots were there.

The paragraph goes on to state:

> The assembled people showed their agreement with a decision taken or a sentence passed, by striking their shields or rattling their spears, and this was called vapnatak "grasping of weapons".

Last week there was a vapnatak in this place. We did not have shields, we did not have spears, but we did make noise, not because we agreed with the Speaker's decision to proceed to a vote in the absence of Her Majesty's Official Opposition, but because we wanted to express our deeply-felt indignation.

The paragraph goes on to state:

> Later this word was applied to the place where the Thing was held, and then to the whole of the region from which the Thingmen were gathered. Both Thingoe (Old Norse pinghaugr "assembly mound")—

Parliament is very much an assembly mound. Very little has changed over the years. We refer to the place of the Parliament of Canada as "Parliament Hill". What is described in this book existed 900 years ago. They had their assembly mound then, and we have Parliament Hill today.

I continue:

> —and Thingwall (Old Norse Pingvollr "assembly field")–

There was the assembly mound and the assembly field. I continue:

> —are to be found among placenames in the north and east of England. Yorkshire to this day is divided into three Ridings, East, West, and North; Riding derives from Old Norse pridiungr "a third part".

Where does the term "Speaker" come from? Did they have a Speaker in the old days? Did the government of the day appoint the Speaker of the Thing? Did the people appoint the Speaker? What kind of creature was the Speaker? I refer to page 84 of the book and quote:

> Some of the more important early settlers—

The author is referring to Iceland:

> —set up their own law courts, but it soon became necessary to organize justice on a wider scale, and it is said that a man called Ulfljot—

For the benefit of the reporters, I will pass them this book after I have completed.

Senator Gigantès: How is that spelled?

Senator Corbin: U-l-f-l-j-o-t. May I ask Senator Gigantès if he can pronounce it?

Senator Gigantès: No, I cannot.

Senator Cools: What is the pronunciation?

Senator Corbin: In any event, I continue:

> —was sent home to western Norway to study methods of law and justice. Three years later he returned to Iceland, and in 930 the Althing was set up, and Ulfljot became Iceland's first logsogumaor (law speaker).

Senator Molgat: Would you permit me to interrupt? Perhaps Senator Johnson from Manitoba could assist us in the proper pronunciation of these Icelandic names. Given her Icelandic background, I am sure she would be of assistance in this regard.

Senator Corbin: I stand corrected by Senator Johnson as far as the pronunciation of these words is concerned. I would be pleased if she put her expertise to this task.

Senator Gigantès: This chamber needs that kind of expertise.

Senator Sparrow: If you have any questions on chickens, just ask me.

● (1000)

Senator Corbin: I know of a lot of chickens—people whom we have not seen in a number of days around this place. I do not know where they are hiding. I continue:

> The annual session of the Althing was held in the summer in a place called Thingvellir in the south-western part of the island.

The "island" meaning Iceland.

> Here the people gathered to hear the laws proclaimed, to lodge their suits—

I suppose they had petitions in those days. They presented petitions. That was a standard practice. You went to the Thingvellir and presented your petitions.

> —to worship their gods, to display their skills, and to buy and sell. Several local Things were established over the island.

Then there is an interesting paragraph about how Iceland became Christian, which is intimately linked with the evolution of their parliamentary practices. I quote:

> The story of how Iceland became Christian is as dramatic as everything else in the history of the saga island. It began with several unsuccessful endeavours at the end of the tenth century. First, in 981, the Icelander Thorvald returned to the island accompanied by a Saxon priest called Fridrek. Their ardent missionary efforts, however, ended in killing, outlawry, and their banishment from Iceland.

That happened with the missionaries in Canada. In fact, they ate the missionaries.

> The zealous, fanatical Olaf Tryggvason sent missionaries to Iceland on two occasions. First he dispatched Stefni in 987; but Stefni seems to have been a man of Olaf's vehement temper, for he too was chased off the island. Olaf's next missionaries, in 997, were an Icelander and a German (Thangbrand) who, after some initial progress, found themselves involved in killing and banishment.

That is a heck of a way to establish a religion.

> At last came success. Two Icelanders, Hjalti Skeggjason, and Gizur the White, arrived from Norway. They began boldly by pulling down a shrine to the gods, and then with a crowd of followers went to the Thing—

their Parliament

> —and proclaimed Olaf Tryggvason's message, calling upon the islanders to accept Christianity. At that moment a volcanic eruption occurred, and was promptly interpreted as a sign of the wrath of the ancient gods.

Remember the headline Friday "Senate Erupts"? The wrath of the gods. It happened in Iceland a little less than a thousand years ago.

> At that moment a volcanic eruption occurred, and was promptly interpreted as a sign of the wrath of the ancient gods.

What are our ancient gods? They are the customs, usages and practices upon which our rules of conduct are based as parliamentarians. Those are our modern ancient gods.

> A skirmish developed, but the law speaker, Thorgeir, in whose hands the case was placed, proved himself master of a difficult situation. On the third day he called the people together and warned them sternly of the division that would destroy them, if they could not reach agreement. The people understood the issues involved and, says the Icelandic source, > it was then agreed by law that all should become Christians, and that all who were baptized must become so; but certain ancient laws were retained—

They did not begin tabula rasa. They did not sweep the table clean. They built their customs, practices and ancient uses layer by layer, sediment upon sediment. In my opinion, some of them should not have been retained, but that was for them to decide in that day and age. I quote:

> . . . but certain ancient laws were retained, such as the practice of exposing children and eating of horseflesh. Sacrifice in secret to the old gods was also permitted, but if witnessed by others incurred the sentence of banishment from the island for a period of three years. A few years later this relic of heathen practice was abolished.
> The decision to retain secret sacrifices for a time may seem naive, but it no doubt served as a safety valve. Thorgeir, himself a heathen, knew exactly what he was doing. This remarkable occasion, probably unique, on which an entire people, although a small one, decided to change its religion, suggests that the situation was ripe for such a radical change of faith, and that the traditional religion had lost its power. In this simple yet dramatic manner Iceland adopted Christianity in the year 1000.

I suppose one could compare the adoption of the Christian faith by the Icelanders and the need to reform the Canadian Senate. All of us on this side of the Senate favour reform. What shape should that reform take? I do not know, but I believe that in spite of the fact that we already have had many consultations with Canadians at large on this topic, there would be no harm in proceeding with a national referendum to let the people speak out, give them an opportunity to indicate whether this place ought to be abolished, whether the method of appointment should be modified or changed, whether it should be elected, and elected by whom, under what circumstances and for what term of office. We should let the people decide. That is the Canadian way. I do not think it is good enough for a party leader to say, "If elected, we are going to do this or we are going to do that." When it comes to changing the fundamental institutions that exist under the current Constitution, everyone in Canada ought to be given the opportunity to express a view for better or for worse and then live with the consequences.

Senator Gigantès: Will the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Corbin: Certainly, my friend.

Senator Gigantès: You have given us an instructive reading from the Scandinavian law on the birth of democracy. In their part of the world, as I was listening to you . . .

[Translation]

This reminds me of what happened in Athens in the sixth century B.C., as I mentioned yesterday.

Would you agree, Senator, that the fact that two ethnic groups, thousands of kilometres apart, should have come up with such similar procedures, proves that it is something peculiar to human nature, and that inevitably, societies that want to be democratic, that want to be stable, must act with a certain common accord, with a certain degree of civility and a certain degree of respect for minorities if they are to produce the kind of stable society we see among the Scandinavians and the Greeks and in Herodotus, for instance? The Ethiopians were doing the same thing during the fifth century B.C.

Senator Corbin: I certainly do. It is one of those strange phenomena in the history of civilization and the development of parliamentary institutions in various part of the globe that, either simultaneously or at different times, people felt a deep-seated need to associate in order to have a better life.

You are probably the expert in this Chamber on the democratic process as it evolved in Ancient Greece. I concede that, first of all, and I may add that I listened with a great deal of interest to what you said yesterday.

That is not to say the Greeks had a monopoly on truth. They never claimed they did, in any case.

What you just pointed out certainly indicates that some strange things happened. Even today, when anthropologists discover forgotten tribes in the heart of the Amazonian jungle or elsewhere, they find customs and practices that are related to our own parliamentary practice. They may not be as elaborate, but in many cases they are a damned sight more democratic, fairer and a lot simpler.

Senator Gigantès: Than Tory practices?

Senator Corbin: Tory practices—oh, well, if you want to call them that.

[Senator Corbin.]

I think it is natural for men and women to have this need to band together, to associate for the benefit of their particular society, also in order to be able to defend that society against foreign invaders.

[English]

I found another interesting chapter in this book called "The Viking Way of Life". I sometimes smile within myself at the saying that Westminster is the mother of Parliament. In a sense it may be the mother of modern Parliament, but before Westminster other institutions existed which evolved into the British parliamentary system. I quote from page 241 of that chapter:

> In this vivid language the three classes of the Viking community are described. In the highest class, the king, chosen by the chiefs, is primus inter pares, the first among his equals.

• (1015)

> We know this situation from Tacitus's description of the Germanic peoples about A.D. 100. There we learned that the power of the king was limited by the assembly of the people, that is to say, of the free men.

That was before Westminster, honourable senators. At about the year 100 we learned that the power of the king was limited by the assembly of the people; that is to say, of the free men.

> It was difficult, virtually impossible, for the king to take a decision in opposition to the assembly of chieftains, who were his equals in all but name.

Senator Charbonneau may think that he is the king of the rules, but if he had bothered researching how our rules evolved over the years he would have found out that he is simply primus inter pares—he is first in name only and nothing else. He does not make the rules. He has no right to walk on the rules, to destroy the rules or to decapitate the rules. That is not for him to do. That is for free men.

> In early Viking times, when the North was divided into many loosely associated clans, a chief became king simply by the nomination of a group of other chiefs. In later Viking times, when the monarchy had become a more powerful instrument, inheritance rather than nomination became the rule. Significant of the way of thought of the early Viking period is the answer given by Danish Vikings in the late tenth century to a messenger from the Franks. The messenger, standing on the bank of the River Eure in France, hailed the Viking ships and demanded, "What is the name of your master?" "None," was the reply, "we are all equals."
> After the king, but close to him in rank, were the jarlar (earls), owners sufficiently wealthy in land and goods to have a company of housecarls—and housecarls were a type of private bodyguard,

> —to own ships and to assert their importance. Of their aristocratic way of life we have heard in the Rigspula. For them, the family and the hereditary estates, which > passed to the eldest son, were the centre of this existence, as the significant names of Earl's sons in Rigspula show.

That concept still exists today in the House of Lords at Westminster.

> The solid backbone of the Viking people was the peasant class—smallholders but free men. In Rigspula the first of the peasant's sons is called "Freeman", the next "Warrior", and only farther down the list come such names as "Smith" or "Settler". In the two superior social classes, earls and peasants, women enjoyed high esteem and full freedom, as Norse literature abundantly testifies.
> Lastly the thralls, the bondmen, necessary to the community but little heeded by it. Of the thrall's condition of life, degree of dependence, rights, or rather lack of them, we know little, but it is clear that he was little more than a slave. Killing a thrall was not a major crime.
> Our knowledge of the legal systems of Viking society is scanty: for the contemporary primary sources are almost entirely missing. Something may be inferred from the legal texts and literature of the early (post-Viking) Middle Ages, but such inferences must be regarded with caution. We have extensive knowledge only of the position in Iceland. What can be positively asserted about all the Nordic countries, however, is that Viking law was based upon the proceedings of the institution called the Thing—the assembly of free men.
> In Viking times Denmark was divided into a couple of hundred districts (Old Norse Herud) each with its own Thing. The Thing was a gathering of free men of age and quality to bear arms who met to put the law into effect, pronounce judgments, and discuss matters of interest within the community. The law was a customary one, handed down orally from one generation to the next; and it was therefore the responsibility of the older members of the Thing to remember and uphold it, their memory supported by the alliterative formulae in which it was couched.

The oldest member of our Thing, Senator David Croll, rose yesterday to tell us about the customary law of this place, our precedents and our practices.

Honourable senators, can you imagine this? What Senator Croll did yesterday is the same darn thing that was done in Denmark a thousand or more years ago. That is the basis for tradition, practice and observance. I am sure that senators on the other side listened attentively to Senator Croll and were touched. What Senator Croll did here men of experience in other parliaments also did in their own good time. And, honourable senators, we ought to pay attention to the voice of experience. I am sure that if Senator McElman, for example, had been here, he would have said much the same thing.

These are men of experience and they are giving us a serious warning. If we do not pay attention to this warning, if we do not pay attention to the voice of experience, we will all fall into dust.

Honourable senators, I want to suspend my question of privilege at this time. I have much more material to put on the record, but I will yield to my colleague, Senator Thompson, so that he may make his remarks.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I rise with a very deep sense of sadness and, frankly, shock. I never thought that a day like this would take place, when my vote and the vote of other honourable senators would be so imperiled. I would hope that all senators would think seriously about the state of our country. God knows, we need civility today, as can be seen when we look over past events and past efforts to hold this country together. Valiant efforts, I may say, were made. I look across the floor and I know of the tireless energy that was expended in trying to develop a working arrangement to unite this country.

Honourable senators, frankly, I deplore, as I think a lot of us do, the fact that a deadline was imposed upon those discussions. In fact, I think one of the tragedies we are facing is that we are imposing deadlines upon ourselves in connection with a number of negotiations that take place. No matter what government—and particularly a majority government—is in power, there always creeps in the tendency to argue expediency. I want to say to honourable senators across the floor that there was a time when I stood up as a member of the government, when I deplored the approach that was being taken to argue expediency as a reason for the patriation of the Constitution. In my own conscience I could not accept that argument, and as I look across at honourable senators here, very tired, I hope that, like Edmund Burke, they have come here, even if it takes some courage on their part, to protest this. If they really feel there has been an abuse of the privileges of this house of Parliament, which reflects back upon the privileges of Canadians, I hope and pray that they will, like I did, stand on their feet and protest. I hope they will not act—and I hate to suggest this—like a herd; and I hope that we will not act like a herd, either. I hope we are here to respect the fact that our vote is made with thought, deliberation and integrity.

Honourable senators, because I think our vote represents our very roots, I would like for a moment to go back into my own history. I have not often spoken about myself, but I think that, in order to know why I am saddened and shocked, this is necessary.

I am from Ireland. I was born in Ireland, as honourable senators probably recognize. When I was born, Ireland was a sad country. That was due to a situation in which there had been articles of agreement, and in those articles there was one clause which caused brother to fight brother because it was not accepted. There was a civil war, which caused all kinds of agony and distress throughout the whole of Ireland. That was all for one cause.

As the Irish people look back, I think they realize that if they had formed together a government and a Parliament, they could have achieved the same purpose with deliberation and negotiation instead of being in such haste as not to form a Parliament.

Honourable senators, I remember as a very small boy in Ireland that when I went to school I was accompanied by a policeman because of the tense atmosphere. There were men who wanted to usurp the use of a Parliament and go to other means to achieve their ends.

I came to Canada as a war evacuee. The last day before I left England, to which we had subsequently moved, I was out with my father and we were riding in the hills outside Bristol. It was 1941. Dunkirk had occurred, as had the collapse of France. At that time, England, where there was a free Parliament, was facing enormous threats.

To show how defenseless they were, my father, with a group of others from the City of Bristol, hunted parachuting Germans in the hills outside Bristol. They organized themselves into a cavalry. I am referring here to the last war, the 1939 to 1945 war. They could not get rifles because there were not enough, but the War Office said, "We do have Indian lances that we will send to you." I was a young boy in my early teens. I was orderly to my father, who did not have a title, but he would have been the colonel of the regiment.

We were up in the hills on my last day there before I left. I asked my father, "Why are you sending me to Canada?" I was the youngest. He said, "Because I want you to go and live where there is a free Parliament. I dread to think that with the mass of Nazi thunder a free Parliament will be still standing for long in England."

It is too bad that Senator Molson is not here, because as we were riding I saw the offensive might of the Nazis. Goering had boasted that he would get us on our knees and we would be weeping for mercy. His planes were going to bomb the cities of London, Bristol, and so on. I saw this great wave of German planes coming over like a swarm of bees. I then saw about ten Mosquito planes. The reason why I mention Senator Molson's name is because I have always felt that he could have been in one of those planes, because he was a Mosquito fighter.

I saw our flyers heading up into the sky against this massive hord of planes. I shall never forget watching that. We were praying that somehow our small planes would survive. We then saw some of the German planes swirl and start falling to the ground, and then we saw some planes, known as mosquitoes, falling. It looked like an absolutely hopeless fight. Our planes were completely outnumbered. But I remember the words that my father said: "I am sending you to a land with a free Parliament."

I never saw our Parliament Buildings for over seven or eight years. But then I visited these buildings, and I had the privilege of sitting in the gallery. The person I heard speaking was John Diefenbaker. He stood up and pointed his finger at the Honourable Jack Pickersgill. He railed about an immigrant person away out in B.C. and the mistreatment he was receiving from the government. I thrilled to think that in this building there could be raised the hopes and aspirations of some small person; that someone would defend that person and bring his situation before the whole of the nation; and that the business of the nation would stop to permit that protestation. That is the greatness of Parliament. You do not get that in a dictatorship, senators.

When I was brought up in England we heard of the Winslow boy. This was a little boy who attended one of the naval colleges as a midshipman. He was accused of stealing half a crown, or 50 cents, and was sent home. His father said to him, "You have never lied to me, you have never been a thief. Did you take that half crown?" The boy said, "No. I did not. I am wrongly accused." The father said, "Well, then, we will fight about this."

This situation of a little boy and a half crown went through the House of Commons. The Naval department got into it. They thought, "We have to stick up for this academy. The whole reputation of the navy is at stake." The business of Parliament ground to a halt because of a little boy who was alleged to have taken half a crown. He was vindicated. That is the greatness of our Parliament and our parliamentary system.

It is not like General Motors or some of these board meetings that some attend—and I am not in that position, unfortunately. You do not have enough time on these boards. You have important fiscal matters to take care of; so it is the personnel department that can look after those problems. But Parliament, by its rules—and there is a former attorney general here—provides that there can be legitimate protest. That is the greatness of this system. It is the frustration of the system. It drives us all slightly crazy. We all get so frustrated at the delays that take place. But think back, honourable senators. Those rules are the protection for all our people.

I think back—and I am sure that all of you are aware of this—of Elizabeth I of England. She had enormous impatience with Parliament. Elizabeth, as you well know, said to Sir Edward Coke: "All I want out of you is 'yea' or 'nay,' no more. Yea or nay. None of the deliberations that you have." Peter Wentworth stood up right after Sir Edward Coke had brought this declaration to Parliament. He started to talk about the succession—a touchy matter to Elizabeth. It took courage to stand up on his feet and talk. He went to jail for it.

I think of you, sir, sitting in this Speaker's role—and I think of other Speakers, and the reason why we have that hallowed seat there. I respect that it may have come from the Vikings and their past, but to me it comes from the evolution of the British parliamentary system. I think about the resistance that took place throughout centuries by brave men to resist the encroachment of the monarchy.

Through doors such as ours, walking up to the Speaker's Chair, was Charles I. He was fed up with Parliament, wanted money from it and was damned if, with his divine right, he would have a Speaker who would cover up protesting members. He walked right up to the Speaker—I am paraphrasing here—and said, "Get out. I will take the Chair for a minute." The Speaker looked at him and then replied. His words should be seared in all our hearts. In fact, I should like to see them printed above the Speaker's Chair. He said, "I have eyes for no one and ears for no one except in this assembly." No encroachment by the executive or by the monarchy would force the Speaker to deny respect for the house.

Over a number of years—and I have been here a large number of years—I have seen where a government with a majority would sometimes tend to think, "We will push things through. The heck with all the discussion, debate, and niceties—get the Speaker on the job!" I do not know all the facts of the case, but I suspect that in the pipeline debate that took place a large number of years ago the Speaker caved in.

Honourable senators, I was in this house at 5.30. I was then going to the hospital. To be quite honest, not that long ago I was not sure that I would be coming back here, but I know now that this was not the time to resign and I will hang in longer if I can. As an aside, I also enjoy seeing a number of the senators, even though we do not agree completely with everything; and I am hanging on because I feel deeply about what is taking place.

I know that a number of honourable senators across the floor must feel as deeply as I do. They know, as I do, the necessity for a Speaker to be impartial. They know the tradition from which that was developed. There were Speakers who cried and shivered with fear and were held on their seats. Finch was one who in the history of the British parliamentary system, was held down. Holles and Eliot, among other members, demanded that he be impartial. There are some who ring out like a clarion call because of their stand for impartiality, which represents and protects freedom for all Canadians.

When I first stood on my feet I referred to those small planes, known as mosquitoes, flying overhead. Do you think that the little boy who had stolen the half crown, under the system of a Hitler or Mussolini, or a Stalin, would have had the nation stop to hear his story? Do you think that type of protestation could have been permitted if there were not men like Jack Marshall and many others who had not felt, "By God, we will fight to preserve the freedom." By "freedom" I mean the words that my father said to me: "You are going to a land where there is a free Parliament."

Honourable senators, I was shocked and deeply dismayed when, while heading back to Toronto, I heard the news that the Speaker called together one side only. I was in my office until 5.30 p.m.; I could have been informed. But only one side was called.

I look now at honourable senators across the way. How could you have permitted that? How could you have done it? You are men and women who believe in fair play. You know the traditions of our parliamentary system. I stood up and read a speech in this chamber when I felt that Speaker Marchand might be veering towards moving with the government. I was with the government side but I had the courage to stand on my feet when I felt there was a whiff of abuse. I cannot for the life of me think that among this government group of honourable senators some of you do not question, to some extent, the action of the Speaker.

You may feel that we are going through all kinds of procedural delay because of the GST bill, but I am focusing now on the process of Parliament, the rules of Parliament, and the impartiality of the Speaker. If the Speaker is not fair, and if the Speaker is to say that one side alone can have a vote when the others are outside and do not know of it, and when the whips have not entered the chamber, how can you expect us to believe in the impartiality of the Speaker? Put yourselves in our position. I can think of many of you who would rise with righteous indignation and passion at the injustice and unfairness not just to this House but to all Canadians.

I will go further. In my opinion, this action is unfair to me, to Senator Marshall, to Senator Molson, and to many others, because we wonder what we fought for. We fought for a free Parliament. My father sent me out here that I could live in the land of a free Parliament. I was privileged to stand in a free Parliament and it is on that basis that I plead with you to think of what you are doing. I would hope that among this group of senators I am facing at least one or two of you will be appalled by this action, this horrendous backward step and will say that you want a free, impartial Parliament, that that is what you believe in, and that you will stand with all free men on that ground.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege touching on a matter which I discussed somewhat on a previous occasion. I feel that my privileges were abridged and trampled on in this chamber last week. May I quote from an unknown source a statement that says, "A nation may lose its liberties in a day and not recognize that loss for years." What we have done perhaps does not appear that grave to some members in this chamber and to some of the people in the nation, but a few days ago we lost some of our privileges, and there is a danger of losing more unless we discuss this issue widely and attempt to ensure that such a thing will not happen again.

I am concerned about the Speaker of this chamber aiding and abetting the trampling of the rights of Canadians and trying to govern this country against the wishes of the majority. The Speaker of this chamber sided with the Mulroneys of this country and we are faced with the degradation of all Canadians in this chamber with the process of trying to impose upon Canadians an unfair tax that will hurt, basically, most Canadians. Very few, in fact, will benefit from this GST tax. We have not been able to have a fair and just discussion of the issues with all Canadians.

We are talking about instituting a tax—ramming it down the throats of Canadians—when there are so many issues in this country that we should be discussing. Such a tax will bestow unfairness and injustice on Canadians. We should be discussing poverty and its devastating effect in this country. Twenty to twenty-five per cent of our people live below the poverty line. Unemployment is much too high, and that in itself devastates many families. We should be discussing the abortion issue and the high interest rates that, in turn, are destroying many families and many people. Bankruptcies are on the rise throughout this country, and I am speaking not only of business bankruptcies but farm and personal bankruptcies. We should be discussing illiteracy in this country. We should be discussing environmental issues. Instead of that, we are bogged down in a proposal for a tax on Canadian people that will perpetuate all of those issues.

I am certain that interest rates will go higher because of the inflation that will result from this new tax. We have before us "a big lie." That lie is in telling the Canadian people certain things that, in fact, are untruths. The government is telling us that the tax will be beneficial to people earning less than $30,000 a year. They say that those earning less than $30,000 a year will, in fact, not pay this tax and that they will get a rebate. Honourable senators, the maximum rebate is $190 per year. That $190 is only for those who earn $24,350 or less. The person who earns $28,050 will get a rebate of $5. What kind of a lie is it to tell the people that those earning $30,000 or less will not be affected by the GST?

If we are going to tell the people about the benefits, let us not tell them that people earning under $30,000 a year will not pay any tax, because that is not true. Many people in this country earning a minimum wage and living on the poverty line will receive only $190. How can the government have the nerve to tell the Canadian people that their taxes will be rebated?

How can we tell farmers that they will be better off with this tax because they will get a rebate? How can you get a rebate on farm machinery if you cannot afford to buy farm machinery? Every dollar spent by the agricultural community on every item except food and medicine will be subject to that tax, and certainly no rebate will be coming to them.

Honourable senators, when the tax was proposed, the government said that at 9 per cent the tax would be revenue neutral. Then, when the majority Conservative committee brought in a proposal and the tax was reduced to 7 per cent, they said it would be revenue neutral. Now, in an effort to sell this tax to the Canadian people, they are saying that this is a method of reducing the deficit. How can it be revenue neutral at 9 per cent and revenue neutral at 7 per cent, and now, to grab at any straw, how can they tell us to go for it because it will reduce the deficit? Is it possible to believe what they are telling us? It is also correct that the tax will probably be increased.

I recently received in my mail a pamphlet which is receiving a great deal of criticism. The Minister of Finance has sent this pamphlet out to all Canadians at a cost of well over $1 million. In it he states that Canada needs the GST. He says that it is the same system used by 48 other countries around the world. From my studies I have found that there is no country in the world that has the same system. Other countries may have some type of similar value-added tax, but there is nothing that I am aware of in any of those countries that is the same as our proposed GST.

[Senator Sparrow.]

Hon. Paul Lucier: Would the honourable senator entertain a question at this time?

Senator Sparrow: You betcha!

Senator Lucier: I have not had an opportunity to look at this new $1-million pamphlet that the government is putting out to tell us, as Canadians, what a wonderful deal we are getting. I wonder if anywhere in that pamphlet it points out that Canadians who live in northern Canada, western Canada, Newfoundland and other regions will pay a higher rate of GST on exactly the same product, such as shoes, as people in central Canada. I am speaking of articles which everyone must have. The rate of GST paid in areas where those items are manufactured will be lower than in other parts of Canada. Surely, since this is a government document, it should be a factual document and it should tell the people of Canada how the GST will affect them. Does it tell people in certain parts of Canada that they will be saddled with an unfair tax because of GST charges on freight?

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Sparrow: This expensive pamphlet is somewhat at odds with the statement the honourable senator has just made about the unfairness of the tax on western Canada, the Atlantic provinces and the north, because it says that the goods and services tax will be fair, visible and modern. Based on the facts the honourable senator has just given me, which square with mine, I would come to the conclusion that the tax is not fair.

Senator Lucier: Is the pamphlet not accurate?

Senator Sparrow: In many cases it is not accurate, because certainly the tax is not fair. I object to taxpayers' money being paid for propaganda that does not tell the facts as they are. However, I suppose I should not be totally negative about the pamphlet, but I have not had a chance to read it in its entirety. However, there is one true statement that I did see in it, because it says, "Why is the government proposing unpopular sales tax reform?" I think that is true, that they are beginning to get the message that it is unpopular. However, I must admit that no taxes are popular. No one is expected to agree with the imposition of higher taxes; sometimes we are faced with them. If people do not agree with high taxes, they at least agree that taxes should be fair. That is what we have to look for, a fair tax.

It is not true that 48 countries in the world have the same system of taxation or a tax similar to the proposed GST. I have heard many people say that other countries have this kind of tax; but those countries do not have the same system of taxation.

If we require additional funds, why not bring in what is considered to be a fair tax? When 85 per cent of Canadians believe this is an unfair tax, surely they cannot all be wrong. Surely it is not those sitting across the chamber or those sitting in the House of Commons and the Prime Minister who are right. If it is "What is good for General Mulroney is good for the country," then that is not necessarily the case. We have to look at what is good for all Canadians. We have to look at what will get us out of the terrible situation we are in in this country, with poverty and high unemployment, high interest rates and high inflation. Those are the problems we should be attacking.

Is there anyone here who believes that the imposition of this tax will not mean greater inflation? Is there anyone? Even the pamphlets the government is putting out say that this will not increase inflation by more than 1.8 per cent. The government is agreeing that it will increase inflation. In my opinion it will increase inflation much greater than that. We have had unions negotiating for salaries with protection against the GST. They have said they have to have an increase to compensate for the rise in the cost of living due to the GST. Of course, those unions expect that protection, and, of course, they will get that protection.

In Saskatchewan the media is saying that by next week we will be paying 70 cents for a litre of gasoline. They are saying this at a time when we are faced with this problem of inflation and high interest rates. How can we survive in western Canada and how can our industries compete if they are faced with such high costs? To add another 7 per cent to those increased costs at the beginning of next year will devastate western Canada.

I do not argue that it is necessary to raise taxes, as long as the system is fair. Let us raise taxes to the limit the economy can stand.

We have been told that in western Canada we are going to lose another 30 per cent of our farmers. I am sure that is also true in other parts of the country. We are also being told that we are going to lose another 30 per cent of the small businesses in this country. Conservatives, Liberals and the NDP built this country on the backs of small business people. That is our pride and our joy. We cannot destroy any more small businesses.

We have talked in western Canada, and all across Canada, about getting rid of inefficient farmers. We were told that 10 per cent of farmers were inefficient, and we got rid of them. We were told that we had to have an efficient agricultural community. We then decided to get rid of another 10 per cent, another 10 per cent and another 10 per cent because we were told they were not good farmers; but they were good farmers: They have given us the greatest agricultural industry in the world. They have given us the cheapest food in the world. As Canadians, we pay out only 17 per cent of our earned income for food, yet we have been told to get rid of our inefficient farmers.

Let me tell honourable senators that at the rate we are going we will only have one farmer left, and we will still be saying that he is not efficient.

In my part of the country we do have efficient farmers, as I am sure there are efficient farmers all across the country, but they are not getting a fair shake. Canadians must realize that they will have to pay higher prices for their food products, either higher prices for food products at the farm gate or through transfer payments, because we cannot afford to lose our agricultural industry, and we cannot afford to lose any more small businesses.

Small business people in this country are the ones who employ the greatest majority of the people. They are the ones struggling and trying to raise the minimum wage in this country to get people above the poverty level.

The federal minimum wage in this country—and I have talked to the Minister of Labour about this—is $4.00 an hour. That comes to less than $9,000 a year. Every province now has a minimum wage close to $5 an hour, yet the federal government will not budge.

There are not that many people working in federal institutions for that hourly rate, but it is the principle. The federal government is saying, "We have people in this country who are worth only $4 an hour. Let us pay them $4 an hour."

Senator Beaulieu: It is $5.30 in Quebec.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, but the federal government will not recognize that there are people who work for federal institutions at $4 an hour. What a shame! Please ask the Minister of Labour to bring that minimum wage up, to tell Canadians that they are worth more than that. We do not need to have people working as slave labourers, for a rate that puts them below the poverty line.

A maid in a hotel or motel—probably the most important job—earns the minimum wage. The desk clerks, the managers and the bartenders do not earn the minimum wage, the maids do. The maids work eight hours a day at the minimum wage level and then they have to go home and work another eight hours to look after their families.

The federal government has said that these people are only worth $4 an hour. We have been told that those earning the minimum wage will benefit by the GST. Please tell me how they will benefit if they only receive $190 a year when they have to spend their total income on necessities of life? It is not hard to figure out what this tax will take from them.

Why we cannot look at the fairness in this system is beyond me. Why is it necessary in this country to have food banks? I am not advocating doing away with food banks, as some are, because there will always be such a need; but there is no justification for people to have to line up at the food banks and school-feeding programs, which is now increasing at the rate of 20 per cent a year. That is not fair. Those are the same people who will have to find additional money to pay the GST.

That is what we are talking about; we are talking about the fairness of the system. Let us have fairness in the system.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada has just received a 28 per cent increase in his salary, yet the rest of the people in this country are told to tighten their belts.

The President of the Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan has just had his salary raised to $750,000 a year, and there are some people making more than that. In the same week that was announced, the Government of Saskatchewan announced a poverty program to feed the hungry with a budget of the same amount, $750,000. One man earns $750,000 a year and the government announces a program to feed the hungry with a budget of $750,000. How can we justify that in this nation? I do not think we can.

How can we expect small business people to survive in this climate? Small business people are being asked to collect 7 per cent the first of the year. Did the government ask that the ultimate be the only user to pay 7 per cent? No. It asked that at every step along the line the 7 per cent rate be applied so that the tax is collected in many areas seven times, and the rebate is six times. What a terrible burden to place on our business people.

Those who bring the iron ore out of the ground will charge 7 per cent; the fabricator will collect 7 per cent and receive a rebate on what he paid; and then it goes to the distributor, the wholesaler, the retailer and then to the ultimate consumer.

If we are going to have a value-added tax in Canada, let us have one that is fair to western Canada, fair to the north, fair to the Atlantic provinces and fair to those people who are expected to collect it.

I rise today on a question of privilege because the Speaker has taken away our right to discuss this issue. Why do we, in this nation, have to be so stubborn? Why can we not say that there is some unfairness in this system? Why not delay this for six months or a year and try to iron out some of the problems? Why do we have to be so stubborn and say, "It must proceed now. I do not care what it takes. Trample on the rights of Parliament, if you will; trample on the rights of Canadians, if you will, but the hell with it, put it in place now."

What difference will six months make? What difference will it make if we wait another year until we are out of the terrible economic situation we are in? Is it really fair—and I will repeat myself—that we will lose another 30 per cent of our small business people in western Canada and another 30 per cent of our agricultural industry?

I have just taken off my greatest crop ever. I took off No. 1 high protein wheat. Because of international markets, I could sell only a few bushels of that wheat. I received only $3.17 a bushel for it.

Senator Lucier: What did it cost to grow it?

Senator Sparrow: It cost $4.50 a bushel to grow it, and even then I downgraded my costs by not fertilizing this year. Still my cost was $4.50.

I do not know about other parts of the country, but in my part of the country the elevators are offering 76 cents for a bushel of oats.

I phoned a fellow who produces oats because I wanted to buy some. When I asked him what he wanted for his oats, he said he would like to get a dollar a bushel but did not know if he would be able to. I told him I would never have the guts to offer him less than a dollar a bushel when it costs as high as $2 a bushel to produce it. I know it is a problem that is not easily solved by the federal government. I know the federal government has poured billions of dollars into the industry. We are thankful that Canadians shared part of that load in the past. We need a greater sharing now, and, in the same breath, we cannot place an additional burden on those people.

I appeal to the government to look at the situation, to acknowledge that there is a problem, and to delay the GST until July 1. Let us have a new session of Parliament. Perhaps there are amendments that could be made. Why do we fight with the Senate, the House of Commons or with the government? We are all in this together and we will either fall or grow as a nation. We are not growing now. We are not growing in this chamber and we are not growing in this country.

I have not had the opportunity for some time to talk about our agricultural industry and the soil degradation that is taking place. We are talking about environmental issues, and there are many problems; but the greatest crisis facing the agricultural industry today is soil degradation. You may say that the economic situation is the most serious issue at this time, and it is—the economics in the agricultural industry. If we do not solve that economic problem in the agricultural industry within the next two years, we will lose our agricultural industry entirely. We cannot afford that. We are a nation of agriculture and small business people, and we cannot afford to lose that.

Let me talk to you about soil degradation. If we do not solve the problem of soil degradation, we will lose our agricultural industry forever. Economics will not bring it back. We must acknowledge the fact that it is an environmental as well as an agricultural problem. It is the problem of every Canadian in every part of the nation—not only in western Canada or Quebec, but in every agricultural area of this nation.

What do I mean when I talk about "soil degradation"? I talk about erosion by water, about erosion by wind, about compaction of the soil, and the loss of organic matter in those soils; I talk about the devastating effects of roads, highways, gas lines, pipelines and power lines; I talk about the devastating effects of the residential, commercial and industrial complexes moving out across the nation's future, destroying our most precious natural resource, our topsoil. We talk about our most precious natural resource being our young people or our old people, but they are not our most precious natural resource. Our topsoils are, and they are being degraded at a high rate in this country primarily because of the industrial complexes moving across the soils and the economic situation in the agricultural industry whereby the farmer cannot afford to be a conservationist.

I outlined earlier the prices that are being paid for agricultural products. I talked about the erosion of prices. If we put a further burden on the Canadian agriculture industry we will have no money left to protect our soils. We are talking about the erosion of the agricultural farmlands, which leads to the erosion of what the Speaker has done to us: the erosion of the rules of this Parliament and of this chamber. That is what we are talking about. That is why we have to tie this together.

Senators from the Atlantic provinces know that the area possesses a fantastic agricultural industry. We know it is smaller than other areas, but it is important. That part of the country feeds a lot of Canadians and exports its products into the United States. Do honourable senators know what happened in that part of the country? When they started the agriculture industry in that region they had 15 to 18 inches of topsoil. Now they have an average of 6 inches of topsoil left. Did they lose that in 150 years of agriculture? No. They lost it in the last 30 or 40 years because of the type of agriculture they entertained. They found that to give Canadians a cheap food policy they had to rob from the soil. They had to go into the monoculture base of a single crop year after year, leaving the land black in the fall, winter and spring. When the heavy rains, snow and melts came, what did it do to those fragile soils? It washed them into the low-lying areas, into the lakes, rivers and streams, and it is gone forever. If they started out with 15 inches of top soil and have lost 8 or 9 inches in the last 50 years, how many more years will they have a viable agricultural industry? They will not have it for long. We have to ensure that we maintain a healthy agricultural industry in this country so that those who want to be good stewards of the soil can afford to be good stewards of the soil. We cannot have additional costs imposed upon them at this time.

Those of us from the prairies talk about the dirty 30s and wind storms and dust storms. I was in the Atlantic region almost two years ago, during the month of January, on a speaking tour from Charlottetown to Montreal. They had 36 inches of dry snowfall with heavy winds, which is unusual for that part of the country. When I looked out of the car window I saw black land with no cover crop or residue. The tops of the hills were bare. The windshield wipers on the car were taking topsoil off the windows. I thought that those things happened only in Saskatchewan, but no, sir, we are facing that situation today in Atlantic Canada. The topsoils are eroding all across this country.

Do honourable senators realize that 200 miles out in the Pacific Ocean and 300 miles in the Atlantic Ocean they are finding dust on ships? What is that dust? That is topsoil and organic matter that is coming from Canada—primarily western Canada—and the western United States. Can you imagine how much of that land is lost in those lakes, rivers and streams as it crosses the mountains to the west and ends up 200 miles out in the Pacific? It is lost forever. In the west, when we have a windy day, we will say that Fred's land moved over to Charlie's land today or that Manitoba got a lot of Saskatchewan topsoil; but it is not a joking matter, because it is moving into the lakes, oceans and streams. We have to solve this terrible crisis with economics. We have to ensure that the agricultural industry is healthy.

In my opinion, the beautiful province of Quebec has the greatest agricultural industry in the world. They have an efficient agricultural industry that is second to none. Are we critical of that industry in other parts of the country? Sometimes we are. We say that they have subsidized their industry to the detriment of the rest of us. Perhaps they do, but that is not the issue. In that province they decided that if they wanted to be self-sufficient in food they would have to have a good agricultural industry, and, by golly, they do. But they robbed the soils. They used the monoculture basis, the same as the Atlantic provinces, year after year, leaving the land black in the fall, winter and spring. When the heavy rains and snow melts came, that fragile soil was washed into the low lying areas and into the lakes, rivers and streams.

Most of Quebec's soil is organic soil, not the heavy mineral soil we have in Ontario and in the western provinces. Mineral soils are not heavy either when there is nothing to bind the particles together and the wind blows them away. But the organic soils are much more fragile. In many areas of the province of Quebec, unless something is done to make the agricultural industry healthy and make it possible for farmers to be good stewards of the soil, in 20 years there will be thousands and thousands of acres of unproductive soil in that province. Can we as a nation lose that agricultural industry in the province of Quebec or in the Atlantic provinces? The answer is no, but we are faced with that unhealthy situation of not being able to afford to be conservationists.

Ontario has all of the forms of degradation I talked about. They have the wind and water erosion; they have the compaction of the soil, the loss of organic matter in those soils, the devastating effects of the mining and oil development, roads, highways, gas lines and pipelines; and they have the terrible encroachment of the urban communities that are growing across healthy topsoils in this country for residential, commercial and industrial development. Millions of acres are being destroyed. If honourable senators look out from the top of the CN Tower in Toronto on a clear day they can see a third of the number 1 topsoil in all of Canada? Another third of the number 1 topsoil is in the Montreal area where Mirabel Airport sits. The other third of the number 1 soil in this country is divided among the rest of us. In western Canada we farm number 3, 4 and 5 soils.

There are seven types of soils. Number 1 is the best and number 7 is so marginal that it is not even good for grazing. A third of the number 1 topsoil is outside the city of Toronto. The other is in the province of Quebec. We allowed the federal government and the Government of Quebec to use 75,000 acres of the best farmland outside of Montreal for an airport or a great industrial complex. There seems to be a better use for farmland than agriculture. Let me tell you that is not true. Residential housing and commercial and industrial development should not be a higher priority.

Senator Stewart: Senator Sparrow, may I ask a question?

Senator Sparrow: Yes. I need to stop for a break.

Senator Stewart: You mentioned the way urban sprawl is being allowed to eat up the areas of superb farmland—areas that are relatively limited in extent in Canada. But given the policy of the present government with regard to Canadian agriculture, particularly as embodied in the Free Trade Agreement with the United States, is it not consistent that these areas of good farmland should be abandoned to airports, for example; airports from which people can depart on their flights to Florida; from which they can take off to West Palm Beach, a place which I understand is popular with certain members of the government? Is it not consistent with that kind of scorn for the long tradition of Canadian self-sufficiency in basic foodstuffs that these prime agricultural lands should be abandoned?

Senator Sparrow: Land throughout the world is being abused, senator. We believe in this country that there is an unlimited amount of land. Take it and use it!

I am glad that Senator Stewart asked that question. I was speaking in Shawville, Quebec, not long ago to a conservation group. At that meeting were two mayors, one from the city of Shawville and another representing the surrounding areas.

After the meeting was over we were sitting around having coffee. Seven or eight of us were at one table. The local people, the conservationists there, were talking to the mayors, criticizing them for what they were doing to their communities, infringing upon the topsoil and thus the future of this country. They were talking about the movement of residential, commercial and industrial enterprises in ribbon development on those soils. They were talking about building a large garbage dump in the Shawville area to handle the garbage of the entire region; it would be trucked in from Ottawa and elsewhere. It would be a great development there and it would provide employment. They were talking about building a huge sewage lagoon system there that would employ a number of people in construction, and so on.

Honourable senators, they were saying that a higher use of farmland would be a garbage dump—that would be a higher use for agricultural land. Well, let me tell you that it is not.

In frustration, one of the mayors at that meeting said, "Well, tell me, then: How much agricultural land are you going to need for the next 100 years?" Well, you can ask me how much agricultural land we are going to need for commercial, industrial and residential development over the next 100 years and I can guess at that, but nobody could ask me how much agricultural land we will need for the next 100 years, because we will need it forever.

Who can we, as Canadians, say that we can dispense with that land over the next 30 or 100 years? That land was given to us to protect. We must feed ourselves and we have to protect it and enhance it for the future.

What right do we have, as Canadians, as parliamentarians, as farmers or whatever, to say that we will destroy that land? And we will destroy that land in 20 or 30 years through poor farming practices or in 100 years through the development of the industrial complexes of this nation.

Do senators know what we do as governments, municipal, provincial and federal? We decide that we want a new road or a new pipeline or a new gasline and we take the shortest distance between two points. In a stretch of 100 miles we will take the best farmland in this country; and if a farmer doesn't want to sell it, we will expropriate it. For whom? For whom are governments doing that? Are they doing it for the agricultural industry or for future generations? No! They are making that road ten miles shorter in a stretch of 100 miles and for whom? It is for the people with the big cars and boats, so that they can go as quickly and as cheaply as possible on their holidays. For whom? That is for industrial complexes to move their products as quickly and as cheaply as they can.

No consideration has been given to the precious resource that is there, the soil, which is the very future of this country.

Is there a higher use for farmland than agriculture? Well, there isn't. Let's face it. We are saying that we don't need this land because we can import our food for the future. Let me tell you about a meeting I had in Richmond, British Columbia, which is the island just outside of Vancouver. It is a great agricultural area.

There I spoke to a group who showed me the great land they had there. They showed me the urban expansion into that area. I asked them how long they thought they would still have an agricultural industry there at that rate of urban expansion and they said that at the rate it was being encroached upon, they would not have any agricultural industry in the Richmond Island in fewer than 18 years. I asked the same question about the Fraser Valley. They said that not many studies have been done—and that is true—but they believe that with soil degradation and encroachment by urban communities there will be no agricultural industry there in 50 years. I asked them what they planned on doing to feed themselves. They were talking about further diverting the Columbia River into the United States, irrigating the land, growing the crops and bringing them back to Canada. What kind of nonsense is that? How can anyone say, "I don't want to talk about free trade today but I want to talk freedom"? How can Canada expect to remain free as a country if we cannot feed ourselves?

Honourable senators, if we are going to tax the agricultural industry further and drag them down so that they cannot be good stewards of the soil, in 20, 30 or 40 years from now we will not be able to feed ourselves. And now we are saying that we will bring in our food from somewhere else? Where? Where are we going to get it? Where will it come from? Is it going to come from Ethiopia? Will it come from Chad or the Sudan?

Honourable senators, that area of Africa was the bread basket of the world for centuries. It took them 1,000 years to destroy their land, but they have done it, and the deserts are slapping their rear ends year after year, moving forward. We are so efficient in this country in our agricultural industry that it will not take us 1,000 years to destroy our land. We are doing it in 30, 40 or 50 years. That is how efficient we are.

Government policy—and I am not talking only of the federal government; I am talking about municipal, provincial and federal government—is abetting this process. The government policy is that we do not need that agricultural land. How can we talk about British Columbia not having a viable agricultural industry?

We talk about Vancouver being built on rock, and the people there brag about that. They say, "Look at the British properties. The lights are shining up there on the roads. It's beautiful. It's built on rock"; and they claim in their brochures that you can build in Vancouver as cheaply as any place in the country, and it is built on rock.

In the Fraser Valley and the Okanagan Valley, do we insist that they do the same thing? No. We let them encroach onto the great topsoil in those valleys. We are destroying that land throughout British Columbia, and British Columbia will no longer have a viable agricultural industry, certainly in less than 40 years.

We cannot afford to lose British Columbia, the Atlantic Provinces, Quebec or Ontario. We talk about western Canada being the breadbasket of the world. Well, look, we are not the breadbasket of the world. We produce only 5 per cent of the wheat that is grown in the world. But let me tell you that it is an important industry. It is important for western Canada and it is important for the country because of the dollars that can be earned—not this year, not last year but historically and, I hope, in the future. It is a crucially important industry, but western Canada does not feed Canadians. Sure, it helps feed Canadians, but Canadians are fed from the fruits and vegetables of British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

We export from those provinces, too, but we cannot afford to lose an acre of land in any of them. We cannot afford to lose an acre of land anywhere in this country. We have to see that agricultural land is protected.

Do senators realize that the number one and number two topsoils in Ontario are disappearing due to urban encroachment at the rate of 50 acres an hour? You people who live in agricultural country ought to step out your back doors and just see your best land disappearing at the rate of 50 acres an hour. Do you realize that in the last ten years we have lost 3.5 million acres of our best farmland due to urban encroachment? That is an area larger than the province of Prince Edward Island. We are losing it in physical quantities, and we are losing those topsoils in terms of quality.

We are taking out everything we can get from it and we are putting nothing back. We have to do it to survive. We are talking now about imposing additional problems on that industry, and we cannot afford to do that.

Honourable senators, I am telling you that we have to look at this whole situation. We have to stop talking about unimportant issues when we have so many important ones in this country; and let me tell you that unless we change our attitude, unless we develop a conservation ethic that says the land comes first, we will be non-viable in the agricultural industry in this nation in less than 40 years.

Let me tell you that that is not just a figure pulled out of a hat. In this country and in the whole world we are doing this.

Do honourable senators know that in the province of Saskatchewan there are 60 acres of agricultural land for each citizen? In Canada there are only five acres of agricultural land for each citizen. Do you know that in the whole world there are six people for every acre of agricultural land? Do you know that there is only 9 per cent of the total land base in all of Canada that will grow anything? Only 9 per cent of the land base of this beautiful country will grow anything. Half of that, or only 4.5 per cent of the total land in all of Canada, is suitable for agriculture—and that includes the number one best soils to the number seven poorest soils.

Can anyone tell me that we have a lot of land? Can you say that we have new frontiers? The answer is no. It is great for the urban communities to say that they are only encroaching on ten acres. It is fine for Toronto to say that it needs only two sections, or for an industry to go out and take 50 acres when it could get by with three. The Mirabel airport took 75,000 acres of land and is now using only 5,000 acres of it. It destroyed the quality and quantity of that topsoil. We thought there was a higher use for that agricultural land, but let me tell you there is no higher use.

We are doing this across the country. If every small community were to take ten acres of land, with the thousands and thousands of small communities in this country we would find that soon we would not have much agricultural land left. That is what I am talking about. I am talking about the idea that we are going to impose additional burdens upon the agricultural industry.

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question? He stated that thousands of tons of topsoil are spilled into the sea due to erosion from the prairies, from the Atlantic provinces and from British Columbia.

Is there any technology or research and development under way right now to retrieve that topsoil? Is there any way to conserve the soil?

Senator Sparrow: Certainly there are things being done; but once that soil is lost, you can never get it back. Once it is at the bottom of the lake or the sewage lagoon or the water system or the ocean, it is non-retrievable. It is gone. They tell me that in 300 years nature, under ideal conditions, might produce one inch of topsoil. But if we are losing one inch or one-quarter of an inch a year, we are on a terrible downward slide.

Let me quote those figures—and thank you for asking, because I almost ran out of steam. Let me talk to you about agricultural land with under six inches of topsoil. On the average, across the world it is less than that now. Remember that I told you that there are five people in the world for every acre of agricultural land. That is pretty shocking when you realize that fact—five people.

If you have six inches of topsoil on an acre on any land and you lose one-eighth of an inch of topsoil every year—and if you read any periodical it will tell you that that is what is happening—you only have 48 years of topsoil left. Can you farm to the last eighth of an inch? The answer is "no." If we are losing one eighth of an inch of topsoil per year and we can only farm down to half of that amount, then in theory we only have left 24 or 30 years of agricultural land. That is factual.

If you lost only one sixteenth of an inch per year, you have only 96 years until it is all gone, but you cannot farm down to the last sixteenth of it. Similarly, if you have six inches of topsoil on an acre of land you have 1,000 tonnes of topsoil.

You will read in the Globe and Mail, in periodicals and in farm magazines across the country that we are losing 20 tonnes of topsoil per year. That is true in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, western Canada and B.C. If you lose 20 tonnes of topsoil a year, how many years do you have left? I do not need to be some genius up here—you have 50 years left. If you use 20 tonnes of topsoil a year, there are only 50 years of topsoil remaining. Can you farm down to the last tonne? The answer is "No, you can't." As a nation, we look at this problem and say, "What do we do about it?" We must stop the terrible urban encroachment and allow that encroachment only on the 95 per cent of the land that is non-productive for agriculture. It must not be allowed to swallow up that other precious 4.5 per cent. Without exception, every community in this country has submarginal lands right beside it. The City of Toronto is the exception; they have beautiful, number one topsoil around that area.

I do not know what the answer is. We cannot slow expansion because we need it—and we are not talking about stopping it—but we are talking about letting that expansion go into the air, if necessary. The industries that move into urban development areas should take one and a half or two acres of land, not 50 acres of land. Why would we allow the Ford Motor Company to build a plant close to St. Thomas and take 1,500 acres of land?

Senator Gigantès: Shame!

Senator Sparrow: Why do we allow them to do that? It is because that land is dirt cheap. I asked them why they located there when they could have gone ten miles further out on submarginal lands. They are self-sufficient on water and sewers and power anyway—they do not need the urban community. Do you know what they said to me? They said, "We want to be close to the transportation corridor and the labour market in St. Thomas."

What are we talking about? In this country we bring in 50 per cent of our cars from Korea, Germany, Japan, and so on. Those manufacturers are not anywhere near the transportation corridor of St. Thomas. The Ford Motor Company only had to go ten miles out to reach submarginal land.

Similarly, when they decided to build a GM-Suzuki plant—and we talked about this a year and a half or two years ago—we got on the bandwagon in soil conservation in Canada. We told the province of Ontario and the rural municipalities to take that industry into their communities, but to see that it went on submarginal land—not on the most precious natural resource that we have. Do you know what they did? They think that they listened to us. When GM went into Ontario to build the plant, they only took 750 acres of land, not 1,500 acres. Do you know how much land they could have managed with for that plant? Easily 100 acres of land. Why do they buy the extra land? Because it is dirt cheap.

I went to view that site. They had large equipment there-caterpillars and buggies—to make the test tracks, and so on.

They did that at that site because the land was so cheap. The land is the cheapest component of that plant, but it will be the most expensive component if we have to start importing our food to this country—that is, if we can find a place to bring it from—and if we have to start paying 30 per cent or 40 per cent of our earned income on food.

Earlier in my speech I told you that Canadians are paying 17 per cent of their earned dollar on food. That compares with the rest of the world, which pays anywhere from 30 per cent to 90 per cent of their earned income on food. If Canadians in the future cannot feed themselves, then we will be faced with that same problem.

We have to realize that the agricultural community must be paid a higher price at the farmgate. If they are not paid a higher price—for whatever reasons or policies have—then those transfer payments must keep on coming through the municipal, provincial and federal government to make that a healthy industry. It is the most crucial industry in this country, yet we forget that.

Today we are attempting to impose a further cost factor, an umbrella of a 7 per cent GST tax that will further degrade and downgrade that income. Thus the failure of farmers to be soil conservationists will be perpetuated, because they cannot afford to be otherwise.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we have just heard a lengthy and interesting disquisition by Senator Sparrow on the question of soils. The one thing that I am sure is clear to all honourable senators, and to all who know anything about parliamentary practice, is that the speech, while interesting, had virtually nothing to do with anyone's question of privilege. It is the essence of the argument that honourable senators have been making here for some days that a parliamentary body should be helpless in the face of this kind of filibuster, time wasting and obstruction. That is really the essence of the argument that we have been listening to now for so long—

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Are you imposing closure upon us, senator?

Senator Murray: —namely, that there should be no way in which—

Senator Haidasz: Is this the beginning of closure, senator?

Senator Murray: —parliamentarians should be able to get on with the business that is before—

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I was on my feet to make a speech on the question of privilege that was raised earlier today by Senator Stewart. We now see the Leader of the Government in the Senate beginning what I suspect is a request for closure on this debate—that is, a closure on our complaints about our privileges being destroyed by the Speaker of the Senate last October 4 by his precipitous and unwarranted, unneeded decree in calling a vote—

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, do I have the floor?

Senator Haidasz: —a vote that was taken without our presence in the house.

Senator Murray: Do I have the floor, honourable senators? Do I have permission to speak?

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling.

Senator Murray: There is nothing to rule on, Your Honour; I have the floor.

An Hon. Senator: No rules!

Senator Murray: I have the floor.

Senator Frith: What do you mean? You are on your feet.

Senator Haidasz: He is not speaking in the Speaker's Chair!

Senator Gigantès: I do not see anyone in the Speaker's Chair!

An Hon. Senator: Will you promise to do your ballet?

Senator Murray: I certainly may. My honourable friends can dig into their desks and get out their noisemakers, kazoos and bells and start to ring them, and I suppose it will be as difficult, or as impossible as it was last week for me to make myself heard.

Senator Haidasz: I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate to kindly answer my question.

Senator Murray: I think the question—what was the question?

Senator Haidasz: Do you intend to propose closure of this debate on the question of our privileges being struck down by the Speaker? Please answer my question!

Senator Murray: Surely the honourable senator can contain his curiosity for a moment while I try to make some arguments that will lead, I hope, to quite a logical conclusion.

An Hon. Senator: To nothing!

Senator Murray: It may even commend itself to Senator Haidasz.

Just two weeks ago honourable senators opposite were on the warpath in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. During the preparation of the report of that committee the chairman, Senator Buckwold, completely denied access to the staff of the committee to the Conservative vice-chairman and other Conservative members of that committee.

Senator Hastings: And the Liberal members of the committee also!

Senator Murray: He denied access and took it as his personal prerogative as chairman to tell the staff what should go into the report.

The report—over 300 pages long—was then presented to honourable senators who, in the case of the Anglophone senators, were given three and one half hours in which to digest it. It was rather less than that in the case of the Francophone senators, because the two versions were not available at the same time. Senators were then told that they must pass the report. They were told "ass the report today." It was over 300 pages; they were given three and a half hours to consider it; a few hours to discuss it, but they were told "ass the report now."

In the process, the Rules of the Senate, which we acknowledge are rules, were brushed aside by the chairman who simply declared that those Rules of the Senate did not apply to the committee. In other words, there were no rules in the committee; no protection by the chairman for the rights of the minority.

Senator Haidasz: Is that true?

Senator Murray: There was no recognition—

Senator Haidasz: —on the part of the members of the Banking Committee?

Senator Frith: The chairman is not here.

Senator Haidasz: The chairman is not here to reply to these accusations.

Senator Frith: But he will be here shortly, if you would like to—

Senator Murray: Fine. I am glad to know that.

Senator Frith: We certainly would not deny you an opportunity to speak again when he arrives, or even to attempt to deny you the opportunity of speaking if you wait until he comes. Of course, he can always read the blues, I suppose—if you will share them with him.

Senator Murray: I am sure that my honourable friend can convey to Senator Buckwold the gist of my remarks. He has heard them before.

Senator Frith: That is true; many times.

Senator Murray: But I think I should, by way of background, summarize what has been going on here in the past few weeks.

The conduct of that committee was a disgrace to parliamentary practice.

Senator Frith: Oh, oh! In spite of the fact—

Senator Hastings: It stands right there.

Senator Murray: There was no recognition of an abuse of privilege; no recognition of points of order. Every time the Conservative senators objected, they were met with the same reply by Senator Frith, who was there in his capacity as ringleader, manipulating the chairman.

• (1200)

Conservative members heard the same reply from Senator Frith time and time again. The answer was the same: "It is the will of the majority. It is the will of the majority. It is the will of the majority." That was Senator Frith's reply in justifying every abuse of the rights of the Conservative minority in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I am glad to see that the honourable senator who chairs that committee has returned to the chamber. Honourable senators, that was the week before last.

What was established in this place last week when all the sound and fury settled down and the rhetoric evaporated were two precedents that I contend are eminently sensible.

The first precedent relates to questions of privilege. What we established here last week from a ruling by the Chair is that there is some limit on the pursuit of questions of privilege; that there is a rule; and that that rule as to how you go about a question of privilege is the same here as it is in the House of Commons—

Senator Frith: Wrong!

Senator Murray: —and in most of the legislative assemblies that any of us have ever heard of.

Senator Frith: Wrong!

Senator Murray: What was established was that that rule is what Senator Frith, Senator MacEachen and Senator Olson stated it was a few days before when it suited their purpose to do so.

Senator Frith: We were as wrong as you are now.

Senator Murray: They said, "Mr. Speaker, you have a duty to rule on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege."

Senator Frith: I was wrong.

Senator Murray: They said, "You have a duty to intervene when you have heard enough of this argument and take under advisement, or rule right away, whether there is a case of prima facie privilege."

Senator Frith: I was wrong.

Senator Murray: Of course, in the alternative, it is open to senators to do what they have been doing over the last 20 hours or so which is, under the guise of a question of privilege—questions of privilege are, under parliamentary practice, very important things—make lengthy, time-wasting speeches, however interesting, about soil and soil policy. That was an interesting speech but I did not hear it in the chamber; I listened to it in my office.

In the alternative, it means that question of privilege can be used for filibuster. We established, through a ruling of the Speaker, that the practice here is what the practice is in the House of Commons and other chambers; that the practice here is what Senator Frith, Senator MacEachen and Senator Olson insisted that it must be; that is, that the honourable senator raising a question of privilege should have to satisfy the Speaker that there is a prima facie case, always remembering that in this chamber, unlike the chamber down the hall, there is an appeal from the Speaker's ruling and all other matters.

The second matter on which we established a sensible precedent concerns the holding of a vote. I say that we established that the Speaker has authority, after a reasonable time has elapsed, to give notice to Whips in order that the vote can be taken. I will come back to this in a few minutes. For the moment, let me say that honourable senators who do not agree with those precedents, or do not accept them as such, have a number of recourses open to them. Let me mention two. First, they could have appealed the ruling of the Chair and sought to overturn it in both of those cases. Goodness knows, they have not been hesitant to do that over the past six years, time and again.

Senator MacEachen: How can you appeal a letter? The ruling was in a letter.

Senator Frith: How do you appeal a letter?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators could have appealed the decision of the Speaker to call that vote and have it overturned. They could have overturned the decision. They have never hesitated in the past.

Senator Gigantès: You say we should appeal, but you have taken our privilege away.

Senator Cogger: He listened to you; listen to him.

Senator Murray: They have never hesitated in the past to appeal and to overturn the ruling of the Speaker. They could have done it in these two cases. They could have taken their chances in this "finely balanced House" as Senator MacEachen calls it, where neither of our parties has a majority and where we depend on independent senators who hold the balance of power. But they chose not to do so. That is behind us.

They could have, and I suppose they still could, draft a new rule.

Senator Buckwold: That is what you did.

Senator Murray: They could have drafted a new rule and tried to get support for it in the rules committee and in this House—this finely balanced House where neither of our parties has a majority and where we must depend on the independents who hold the balance of power. But they did neither of those things. They caused turmoil last week and created chaos. They behaved in a way that some journalists have described as behaving like animals in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I will not take nearly as much of the time of the Senate today as Senator Davey did earlier in this sitting to place press quotations on the record, but I think at this point there are a couple that I would like to read in part. Ron Corbett, a columnist in the Ottawa Sun wrote:

> So in the battle to kill the GST the Liberal Senators have resorted to banging their desks and clucking like a bunch of stringy-necked chickens every time a Conservative Senator tries to speak. What's next? Chop blocks in the hallway? Full-nelsons on the carpet?

Then we have Marjorie Nichols in the Ottawa Citizen.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Cools: What a choice!

Senator Murray: I will give honourable senators an opportunity to make their venomous remarks. If Senator Cools, Senator Haidasz, and Senator Hastings wish to make some personal remarks about Miss Nichols, they can take this opportunity.

Senator Carney: It is her birthday today.

Senator Haidasz: Wish her happy birthday.

Senator Murray: I am sure she will receive no good wishes from honourable senators opposite, especially if they have taken note of this comment of October 6. It states:

> The Liberal members of the Senate of Canada are, collectively, a disgrace to this nation. To witness these underworked and overpaid—

Senator Haidasz: Slander!

Senator Murray:

> —foul talking deskbanging, senatorial anarchists acting like animals within the Parliament Buildings is to experience revulsion. They make the masked Mohawk Warriors look and sound like diplomats.
> Senator Stan Haidasz stood on his chair and shouted.

Miss Nichols did not say what the honourable senator shouted, but perhaps I will come to that later. She goes on to say:

> Senator Jacques Hébert challenged a Tory to a fistfight. Senator Davey Steuart started ranting and shouting obscenities. Parliamentary guards had to be called in to establish order.

Senator Cools: She wasn't even here.

Senator Murray: She goes on as follows:

> In a democracy, public opinion is supposed to provide the check on such anarchy.
> The warning to Canadians is now writ large: Reform the Senate or abolish it before it destroys parliamentary democracy in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Gigantès: Have a vote in the House of Commons to do it.

Senator Murray: My friend knows well that we do not have the votes in the House of Commons to abolish the Senate.

[Translation]

Reporter Michel Roy in Le Droit, October 6:

> The Liberal senators, after losing the majority from which they drew their position of power, opted for sabotage and disorder, like a spoilt child that is asked to share its toys and breaks them instead.

To kill the GST, they are prepared tp create total anarchy in this institution, to set up a three-ring circus, to condemn the Speaker and organize a happening with the help of the media and members of the House of Commons. Since they are unable to kill the bill through the democratic process, the Liberal senators, with the blessing of their leader, Jean Chrétien, have decided to delay the proceedings on the bill for as long as it takes to prevent its being implemented by January 1.

[English]

Finally, honourable senators, I should like to quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen. I will read only one sentence, just so that Senator MacEachen can get the flavour of what it was like here last week. It says:

> The spectacle of Liberal senators blowing kazoos, ringing cow bells, shouting obscenities and obstructing the business of Parliament has taken the Canadian democratic system to an all time low.

That is what Liberal senators did last week when there were recourses open to them under the rules; and they knew there were recourses open to them under the rules. They chose to operate outside the rules and to create anarchy in this place.

I was not aware of who the ringleaders were in opening the doors and bringing the media with camera men and so forth and members of Parliament on to the floor of the Senate in this free-for-all the other night until I saw it on television on the weekend. There, before my very eyes, was the Speaker pro tempore of the Senate, Senator Molgat, and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, inviting this disorder, this disgraceful behaviour.

Senator Frith: You bet!

Senator Murray: They were both inviting anarchy upon this place.

Senator Frith: It was a disgraceful crime the Speaker committed.

Senator Murray: Altogether, that was a shameful performance, as everyone who watched it agreed.

Senator Buckwold: That happens when there are no rules.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I want to open a parenthesis here because the Leader of the Opposition, in his speech earlier in this sitting, referred to the appointment of the eight new senators under section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867. I want to briefly comment on what he had to say about that.

Senator MacEachen said that the conditions did not exist to enable the Prime Minister, to invoke section 26. He said there was no deadlock at all.

I do not know what the Leader of the Opposition considers to be a deadlock in parliamentary terms, but let me remind him and the members of this place that Bill C-21 has been before the Senate for ten months, since its introduction in the Senate on November 7, 1989; Bill C-28 has been here for nine months, since its introduction in the Senate on December 21, 1989; and Bill C-62 has been in the Senate for five months, since its introduction in the Senate on April 1, 1990. All of us who are here have not the slightest doubt that, as long as the Liberal opposition had the numbers in this place, those bills were going nowhere.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: Those bills were blocked. Never mind that they were money bills and, therefore, in a very special category in our parliamentary system, a very special category in terms of the prerogatives of the House of Commons, as the elected representatives of the people; never mind that two of the bills come from the 1989 budget and one from the 1990 budget. In respect of both budgets, there have been votes of confidence, carried by the government in the House of Commons. So in blocking these budget bills, these financial bills indefinitely, honourable senators opposite not only interfered with certain prerogatives of the House of Commons with regard to money bills, but interfered with the role of the House of Commons in voting confidence in the government of the day.

Senator MacEachen has said there was no deadlock. What a very strange definition he must have of "deadlock". They had no intention of passing those bills and, indeed, in respect of the GST, we have heard over and over again—most recently within the past 24 hours from Senator MacEachen himself—that they intended to do everything in their power to defeat it.

The argument Senator MacEachen has made is essentially an argument of political judgment on the basis of which, in due course, the people who made the judgment call, the Prime Minister and his elected colleagues in the other place, will face the judgment of the Canadian people in a general election. That is the way our system works. They made the political judgment on invoking section 26, and they are not required to satisfy honourable senators opposite or the opposition in the House of Commons; they are required to make their case in the first instance to the Governor General and to the Queen.

Senator Stanbury: Have you read the Constitution?

Senator Murray: There is nothing in the Constitution Act of 1867 about deadlocks. The provision is very clear, and in respect of its application in this case, the government not only took advice from its own legal advisors but went outside for independent legal advice, and so I am advised did His Excellency, the Governor General.

As I said, these are political arguments the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues are making. He is now saying that the Governor General should have consulted him and his colleagues on this matter.

Surely there is a limit to what the honourable senator is trying to peddle here. In this constitutional monarchy the Governor General and the Queen act on the advice of their ministers, and the idea that the Governor General should come down here and intervene in the legislative process is absolutely ludicrous. The suggestion is that he should consult an arbitrator. To see whether the Prime Minister was justified in invoking section 26, the Governor General, we are told, should have come down here or invited the Leader of the Opposition out to Rideau Hall and said: "Allan, are you blocking those bills?"

Senator MacEachen: That might have been a useful exercise.

Senator Murray: And Senator MacEachen would have responded: "Me? Not me. Block a bill? No."

Senator MacEachen: It would have been useful for him to be told the Prime Minister had misled him on a number of these questions of fact. That is the point.

Senator Frith: Exactly!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator talks about questions of fact. I have just placed the facts on the record with regard to those bills. One of those bills has been before the Senate for almost a year, Bill C-21; another has been before the Senate for nine months; and another has been before the Senate for five months.

As I said, no sensible person in this country who follows matters believes for one minute that honourable senators opposite had the slightest intention of unblocking those bills. Nor did you! Come on! Don't kid the troops. Honourable senators opposite had no intention of unblocking those bills.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Wrong!

Senator MacEachen: Absolutely wrong! You have just demonstrated that you do not have a factual basis for the appointment of the eight new senators.

Senator Murray: They have taken their political argument to the courts now in the guise of a legal argument. All I can say is that I am confident the courts will know what to do about a political argument brought in under the guise of a legal argument.

Senator Frith: You will not be able to tell the courts what to do as you have told the Speaker what to do.

Senator Murray: Then the Leader of the Opposition, after he had expressed his indignation about the appointment of the eight new senators under section 26 said: "We were ready to swallow that." But no, they were not ready to swallow that, honourable senators. The first thing they did was move a silly motion to clear the House of strangers.

Senator Stollery: Who says it was a silly motion?

Senator Murray: Because we sympathized with the embarrassment of Senator Frith, we allowed unanimous consent to withdraw that motion a few days later.

Then we had a day of so-called questions of privilege regarding the eight new senators. When the Speaker ruled on the prima facie case, he ruled on the basis that Speakers in the other place have ruled year after year, day in and day out, including one most recent case against the Conservative party. The Speaker ruled that it was not for him to decide on constitutional and legal matters and, therefore, ruled there was no prima facie case of privilege and that he would not receive the motion. When that happened they were unwilling to appeal the Speaker's ruling, they were unwilling to accept the Speaker's ruling, so we had a motion to adjourn, and two and a half hours later, Liberal senators had still not shown up for the vote.

That is the chronology of events. They were unable to turn up after two and a half hours to vote on their own adjournment motion.

Senator Barootes: Shame on you!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, whenever a vote is held in this place, it is the Speaker who orders that the bells be rung and it is the Speaker who orders that the bells be stopped.

Senator Turner: After hearing from the whips.

Senator Murray: I was waiting for that. Yes, the Speaker does so on the advice of the whips. That is our custom.

Senator Frith: That is in the rules.

Senator Murray: That is our custom.

Senator Frith: And it is also in the rules.

Senator Murray: Our custom is described in the Appendices to the Rules of the Senate of Canada, which, as Senator Frith himself pointed out at his celebrated press conference with Senator MacEachen and their Quebec Lieutenant, Senator Hébert a couple of weeks ago, the appendices—and Senator Frith was speaking in French, so I was listening carefully—are not themselves the rules. They describe custom and practice and, of course, they are all subject to Rule 1.

Senator Frith: They are referred to in Rule 1 as customs and practices.

Senator Murray: These are customs and practices in the Senate, in the House of Commons and in other parliamentary bodies.

The basis of the custom that Mr. Speaker should take his advice from the whips is that there be agreement among the whips. What happens when there is no agreement?

Senator Gigantès: The Liberals waited five days when there was no agreement. They sought out an agreement but waited 144 times longer than you waited.

Senator Simard: Stop bugging us!

Senator Gigantès: You waited two and a half hours; they waited 360 hours.

Senator Murray: What is the alternative, if there is no agreement?

Senator Gigantès: Wait and work out an agreement.

Senator Murray: We would have waited forever.

Senator Stollery: He does not know how to do that because he is not a parliamentarian.

Senator Murray: Wait while a couple of senators stop parliamentary proceedings indefinitely?

Senator Gigantès: Your party did that for 15 days until an agreement was reached.

Senator Murray: Nobody said this better than Senator Stewart in an article to which he drew our attention yesterday in the Toronto Star of March 18, 1982. Let me read a couple of paragraphs from that article by Professor John Stewart of the Political Science Department of St. Francis Xavier University:

● (1230)

> The purpose of the bells is to call the members to the chamber to vote; it is not to permit either side to stop the work of Parliament. My view is that once it has become obvious—a few hours should be more than sufficient—that the practice is being used, not to round up members, but to stop the House, the Speaker has the power to complete the interrupted vote.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Later we have this paragraph of Professor Stewart:

> The Speaker had said that there is no standing order that would have authorized her to complete the vote.

Senator Stewart was referring to Madam Sauvé.

> There is no standing order because what we are dealing with is a practice.

Senator Frith: In the house!

Senator Murray:

> If there were a rule, the rule would state both a minimum and a maximum time for the bells. She had said that there is no precedent bearing directly on the present situation.

Senator Frith: In the House of Commons!

Senator Murray:

> If Speakers never dealt with procedural situations except on the basis of exact precedents, there would be no precedents.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: All in the House of Commons!

Senator Murray:

> Sometimes impartiality requires no action, and sometimes it requires action. Every day the bells rang tended to confirm the propriety of the tactic being used. As long as we enjoy the constitutional system known as responsible government, the House of Commons—

and I would say the Senate

> —should be protected from those who would disable it by procedural arrest. The Governor-General, of course, may prorogue a session or dissolve a Parliament, but neither the government nor the opposition should be permitted to arrest the House of Commons by a walkout.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Or by a lockout!

Senator Stewart: I am honoured that Senator Murray has quoted extensively from the piece which I told the Senate yesterday I wrote for the Toronto Star in 1982. He should also recall that I reminded the Senate yesterday that that was a view I stated with respect to the situation in the Canadian House of Commons, where much greater power is conferred upon the Speaker. The Speaker here is in an entirely different situation. In the House of Commons the practice with regard to the whips was simply practice; not a matter dealt with clearly in the an appendix to the rules and given status as a rule by Rule 1. When he has dealt with that, will he not—

Senator Murray: Well—

Senator Stewart: I think it would be better if you dealt with this all at once. When he has dealt with that, would he not, in candor, admit that whatever I said at that time dealing with the 1982 situation does not have the authority and should not command the attention of the words of Speaker Sauvé, who refused, as I said, to listen to my entreaties, who refused to listen to the entreaties of Liberal ministers and, indeed, many members of the public. She stated that even though her authority was great, even though it was only a practice in the House of Commons, it was not for her to undertake to lay down rules for the future. Is the Speaker of the House of Commons not of greater authority than a mere professor of political science, even though he should have been a member of a faculty of a university from which the present Prime Minister and the present Leader of the Government in the Senate graduated?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will deal with the last point first. A mere professor my friend is not. He is the author of The Canadian House of Commons: Procedure and Reform and was a Liberal member in the House of Commons from 1962 to 1968. Perhaps I should also add a reference to his highly respected treatise on the political philosophy of David Hume, which has been in academic circles—

Senator Cools: He is a great scholar.

Senator Murray: He is a great scholar. So I do not accept his unbecoming modesty in this field.

To deal with the points he made, first with the respect to the provision in the red book regarding the description of our custom—this is in the appendix—that does not have the status of rules. Senator Frith pointed that out the other day in his press conference. Second, it is true that the House of Commons invests far greater authority in its Speaker than we do. On the other hand, however, we permit appeals from our Speaker's rulings.

Senator Stewart: Now.

Senator Murray: Always.

Senator Stewart: It used to be different in the House of Commons. That is no longer true there.

Senator Murray: They no longer have appeals from the Speaker's rulings in the House of Commons. That one fact has considerably reinforced the authority of the Commons Speaker. However, we can, and honourable senators opposite have successfully appealed on many occasions rulings made by Mr. Speaker Charbonneau and on one occasion by the Speaker pro tempore, Senator Molgat.

Yesterday we heard Senator MacEachen, the Leader of the Opposition, reaching back into his vast experience as a House of Commons man, describe this political dynamic that exists when a vote is called—a political dynamic in which the whips are the key players. What happened here the week before last is that one day, perhaps in a fit of pique or perhaps from a strategic or tactical plan, Senator Frith moved this silly motion to clear the house of strangers. The bells began to ring. Then honourable senators opposite left for a few hours; and, finally, with complete contempt for this place and for the rest of us in it, went to a press conference on Thursday afternoon and said "We will be back on Tuesday. Good bye." So much for their respect for Parliament, the Senate or, indeed, their colleagues.

[Senator Stewart.]

"We will be back on Tuesday. Let the bells ring." That is the political dynamic that existed around here the week before last when these time-wasting and dilatory tactics were embarked upon by our friends opposite.

Honourable senators, if you take the position that in the absence of agreement Parliament must wait forever—and of course ultimately you are tying up both houses of Parliament and the parliamentary process—then the position is that the Speaker is really the creature of the whips. He has ceded his authority to the whips. I think a more sensible position—one that sensible people would accept and one that is now contained in the precedent that was established here last week—would be that, when there is no agreement, some person must decide, and that person must be the presiding officer, the whip and then the Speaker, after a reasonable period of time has elapsed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: I have heard a lot of extremely insulting—

Senator Grafstein: When did he decide that? Would the Leader of the Government respond, because obviously there is a question about this. When did the Speaker decide that? When did he come to that conclusion?

Senator Murray: Which conclusion?

Senator Grafstein: The conclusion as to time. Was that conclusion made the previous Sunday? The Leader of the Government had to have been involved. When did he make the decision?

Senator Murray: If my honourable friend will give me a moment to reply, I will reply. I received the letter at about the same time Senator Frith received it—

Senator Haidasz: You wrote the letter!

Senator Stanbury: You had the original letter!

Senator Murray: —which was at 5:05 on the afternoon of the vote. I must say that that afforded me, our whip and deputy leader adequate time to get our people into the Senate for the vote.

Senator Grafstein: Was that your first notice of the contents of the letter?

Senator Murray: Of course.

Senator Stewart: How do you explain Senator Pitfield's comments?

Senator Murray: I have heard a lot of insulting things said about Mr. Speaker Charbonneau in this place—

Senator Hastings: Get used to them!

Senator Murray: "Get used to them" says Senator Hastings. I suppose precedents can be set in the line of boorishness too, and my honourable friend has had something to do with that in the last few days.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Placing these insults on the record would dignify them, especially those from Senator Hébert, Senator Haidasz and others. But I will quote a couple of paragraphs from the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday which may redress the balance. It is an editorial entitled "The tyranny of the bells".

> Canada should erect a statue on Parliament Hill to Senate Speaker Guy Charbonneau.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray:

> Mr. Charbonneau struck a mighty blow for the rights of Parliament on Thursday when, after giving Liberal members ample time and notice to show up for a routine vote, he held the vote without them.
> The most fundamental right of any Parliament is the right to meet, to debate and to vote on the measures before it. One British monarch lost his head for denying it that right.

Senator Buckwold: Good idea!

Senator Frith: As a matter of fact, it could well be a headless statue!

Senator Murray:

> In Canada, that fundamental right of Parliament has come under attack three times in the past decade, a victim of the tyranny of the bells.

The editorial then goes on—and I will not quote it directly—to mention the three cases involved. One was in 1982, when the Conservative minority in the House of Commons let the division bells ring for 14 days; in 1984, when the Conservative minority in the Manitoba legislature did the same thing with respect to a language question. The third assault was on the rights of Parliament which the editorial says was launched by the Liberals in the Senate, first last week and then again on Thursday.

> In many ways, the action of the senators was the most outrageous of them all because the people who took it were unelected. Paralysing the Senate eventually stopped the work of both houses of Parliament, the elected one and the unelected one.

Later the editorial says:

> Why the Commons Speaker in 1982, Jeanne Sauvé, did not exercise her common sense and defend the rights of members of Parliament to debate and vote on public business has always been impossible to understand.

Then there is a reference to the Manitoba Speaker, Mr. Walding. Then it continues:

> Finally, the Speaker of the Senate has got it right. He has seen through the Opposition subterfuge and understood his fundamental duty to Parliament, which is simply to permit it to do its work. There is no rule or principle which should lead him to do anything else. The practice that the whips of the two parties approach the chair before a vote was taken is rendered irrelevant by the refusal of the Liberal whip to do so.

● (1245)

Senator Frith: But if it had been a Conservative Whip, it would have been all right, would it?

Senator Murray: Well, no. As a matter of fact, the Winnipeg Free Press will tell you that it took the same position with respect to what the Conservative MPs did in the other place in 1982.

Senator Frith: Well, that is just wrong!

Senator Murray: The editorial continues:

> Those Liberal senators who are now making a spectacle of themselves in the Senate chamber with unruly displays of bogus indignation know precisely how hypocritical they are being. Some of them were sitting in the House of Commons when the Tories first pulled their bell-ringing ploy. They cheered and applauded Privy Council President Yvon Picard when he accused the Tories—

Senator MacEachen: That is Yvon Pinard.

Senator Murray: Pinard, yes. It is written "Picard". I remember that gentleman very well. He is now a judge. This is, indeed, a misprint. It should read "Yvon Pinard."

Senator LeBlanc: That article is full of falsehoods!

Senator Murray: My goodness—a former journalist and a former press secretary to the Prime Minister, screaming "falsehood" when he meets an unfriendly editorial. How times have changed!

The editorial continues:

> That is exactly what the Liberals tried to do this week. There is a nice irony in the fact that the Tories, who invented bellringing, have now been getting a taste of it themselves. No doubt they deserved it. But Parliament does not deserve it and neither does Canada. Canadians should be grateful that they have a Speaker ready to defend the rights of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: That guy should be a stand-up comic, or a sit down one.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition earlier in this sitting, he devoted a great deal of time to the importance of the Whips, to the role of the whips. I have to tell him that some of his colleagues also alluded to or spoke of the importance of the Whips out of one side of their mouths when they attacked the Speaker by saying, "How dare the Speaker allow a vote in the absence of the agreement of the two whips?" But, on the other side of their mouths, it was, "What role have the whips? You didn't send me a letter. It is not enough to send the whips a letter. The Whips have no role."

Their view was that the individual senator must be written. They want a personal invitation to the vote.

Honourable senators, time and time again I have heard members of the Liberal caucus complain that a letter was sent to their whip and to our Whip, to their Leader and to our Leader, and that they did not receive notice that a vote was to be held.

Senator Buckwold: Twenty minutes later!

Senator Haidasz: Did you get notice from the Speaker?

Senator Murray: Of course; I am the Leader of the party.

Senator Hastings: He wrote it!

Senator Murray: Senator MacEachen's office received notice.

Senator MacEachen: I didn't.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has just quoted from the Winnipeg Free Press an editorial stating what Senator Charbonneau has done as a great new departure, as starting a new and bright era in parliamentary life. It is a great new departure, he says. Something new was done and Senator Charbonneau was commended for that. That is why, if something quite new was being done, I should have been informed!

Senator Frith: Exactly!

Senator Stewart: Something was being changed. Senator Murray, in the name of consistency, ought to deal with this point. And perhaps, while he is dealing with this point, he will go on to deal with the point of privilege that I raised at the beginning of this sitting.

Perhaps he would deal with the fact that the official records show that, contrary to the letter sent to some senators, the Senate resumed at 5:25 p.m. and the Speaker said, "Let the doors to the chamber be locked." Would he deal with that point?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the only thing I can say about that, because I was not watching the clock, was that I got here and our senators got here.

Senator van Roggen: Sure—they knew!

Senator Frith: Yes. Senator Pitfield told us how that happened.

Senator Murray: My friends opposite were in caucus.

Senator Frith: What about Senator Pitfield? Do you intend to keep ignoring what Senator Pitfield said, that your people knew very well what was to happen? They said, "Stick around, because he is going to call them back."

Senator Murray: I do not ignore what Senator Pitfield said, nor do I ignore what Senator Everett said, which was that a member of your caucus told him that you were not coming back for the vote.

I have heard Senator Stewart, Antigonish-Guysborough and Senator Steuart, Prince Albert, as well as other senators on the other side, get up time and time again to recount their experience of the other day. "I was in my office at 5:30 when all of a sudden the bells stopped, so I rushed down."

[Senator Murray.]

Honourable senators, if they wait until the bells stop before they rush down, they will miss a lot of votes in this place. What do they think the bells are for?

Senator van Roggen: We weren't in on the fix!

Senator Murray: Where were you? I haven't seen you in ages.

Senator Molgat: You should have followed the rules.

Senator Murray: The bells had been ringing since 2:30 and senators opposite say, "I was in my office and all of a sudden the bells stopped." Well, if senators are in their offices three hours after the bells started to ring, they must realize that the bells are going to stop sometime.

Senator Stewart: They stopped the previous Thursday and they stayed stopped until Tuesday.

Senator Murray: Indeed, somebody told me that Senator Kirby had said this on television and I did not see it until last weekend, when CBC television reviewed the events of the previous week. There, large as life, was our friend Senator Kirby, heading out of the building on his way to Toronto. He was asked by a journalist, "Are you going back in?" "Oh, I would be very surprised if we went back in."

Look, we all know what is going on here.

Let me say a word for a moment about the role of the party Whip.

Senator Stewart: We are seeing great innovations. That is what is going on.

Senator Murray: "I was in my office," he said, "at 5:30, three hours after the bells started to ring. The bells stopped, so I rushed right down here." Who ever heard of such foolishness? This is foolishness!

Senator Stewart: No, senator, I did not say that.

Senator Murray: Well, I am sorry, senator, I heard it from the other Senator Steuart and I am sure I heard it from you.

Senator Stewart: No, no, no.

Senator Murray: What was your story?

Senator Stewart: Let me repeat what I have already said; namely, that I was in my office in the Victoria Building. It was approximately 13 minutes after 5:00 when I got a call. The call was from Senator Grafstein—this is all on the record; it is no great new revelation—and he said, "There is a rumour that the Speaker is going to stop the bells and put the question at 5:30. You had better come over."

I think that earlier I used the word "scrambled"; that is pretty accurate. I scrambled and got over here. By the time I got here, the door was locked.

I looked at my watch and I said to myself, "Well, I guess the battery finally has given out. I should have replaced it months ago." That is what I said to myself. Now I discover from the Official Record of the Senate that my watch was accurate.

That is what happened in my case. I cannot accept responsibility for what happened in somebody else's case. I raised this point regarding my privileges and I recount the facts as I know them.

Senator Murray: I accept that, but what was my friend doing in his office two hours and 45 minutes after the bells had started to ring?

Senator Hastings: That's none of your business!

Senator Murray: I know what he was doing in his office.

Senator Hastings: Are you the policeman?

Senator Murray: I know what they were all doing in their offices. A decision had been made that they were not coming back.

Senator Haidasz: That is not true!

Senator Murray: Come on, now.

Senator Frith: I told the press that we might come back in the afternoon, that we might come back at night and that we had not decided. We had not decided.

Senator Murray: Look, since we are retailing personal conversations around here these days, reference was made to Senator Pitfield. Senator Pitfield said to one of my Conservative colleagues—

Senator Buckwold: Oh, this will be good.

Senator Murray: —at 20 minutes to 3:00, ten minutes after the vote was called, "The Liberals are gone and they are not coming back."

That was the perception throughout this building among Liberal senators who were taking off.

Senator Frith: Not so! That is wrong.

Senator Haidasz: He was only guessing.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I just want to talk about our friend, Senator Petten, the whip. Senator MacEachen described yesterday this loyal adherent of the party. Indeed, that is the expression Senator MacEachen used to describe whips, and of course he is, and they are.

As 5:30 approached, there was our friend Senator Petten, accompanied, by the way, by Senator Hébert, among others, standing outside in full view of the nation's media and in full view of those of us who were in here, shooing Liberal senators away from the vote.

Senator Petten: Could I have a word?

Senator Simard: You can't take it! You can't take the heat! You have had a week to speak up.

Senator Petten: If you will be still for a moment, senator, I will speak.

Senator Hastings: Shut up, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I will be still.

Senator Petten: Thank you very much.

Honourable senators, much has been said about the letter—the famous letter or the infamous letter, whichever you please.

I was out there, Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: Oh, yes, I know.

Senator Petten: And I did tell my colleagues, "We are not going—"

Senator Murray: Yes, and—

Senator Petten: Do you want me to tell you what happened? Then listen: I told them, "We are not going in now", all right? Just hold on one second, if you don't mind.

As to the letter so much has been made of, do you know what time I got it? I received it at 5:20 out here. Had I got that letter at 4:30, 4:00 or even 5:00—

Senator Murray: Would you have had all the troops in to vote?

Senator Petten: No, I would not have got them all in. I certainly would have taken longer than 20 minutes or half an hour to get them in.

This has happened to your whip over there, and it has happened on this side. Just one second, if you don't mind, senator. Your whip on one occasion took three and one half hours to get people in. On another occasion I took two hours to get people in. This is the way it has always been and the two whips have always come in together.

If the rules were to be changed, if anybody had had the decency to say, "Look, we are going on under a new set of rules," I might not have agreed with it, but at least it would have given me a chance to do something about it.

Senator Murray: Your deputy leader and I—

Senator Petten: Do we understand each other now? Do you know how it was now? I had ten minutes.

Senator Murray: We understand each other perfectly. You were shooing Liberal senators away from the vote.

Senator Frith: Of course he would not do that.

Senator Murray: And you were doing it in full view of the nation's media.

Senator Petten: There was no way I was about to have eight or ten people come in here. We were not coming in until we could get all of our people in.

You can laugh if you want to, but had you given me time—sure, smirk if you want to; smirk and laugh.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Senator Petten: After this I will sit down. I will just say one more thing. Could I have your attention for one more minute?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Petten: You knew that we were in caucus. My colleague and your Whip, Senator Phillips, came down and said, "When are you coming back?" I said, "I am not quite sure. Senator Frith will be making an announcement shortly when he comes out."

If at that time somebody had said, "We are going to change the rules and have a vote," I don't think we would have had much argument. But now I think we do. Thank you very much.

Senator Frith: Good for you.

• (1300)

Senator Murray: The Honourable Senator Frith was in caucus, indeed.

Senator Frith: No I was not!

Senator Murray: One wonders where all these people were.

Senator Frith: No I was not in caucus. Why don't you get the facts straight?

Senator Murray: I heard one story after another here last week until I got the impression that no one was at the caucus; they were all sitting in their offices—

Senator Olson: You do not know where the people were!

Senator Frith: You are right; we were not in caucus!

Senator Murray: —up to three hours after the vote was called. They were coming nowhere near the Senate chamber. What were they waiting for? Some of them headed out for Toronto and other places.

An Hon. Senator: Standing up for our rights!

Senator Lefebvre: That is a straight flim-flam!

Senator Stollery: We had the right not to!

Senator Murray: What were they waiting for?

Senator Frith: Let him flim-flam!

Senator Simard: They were trying to reach Senator MacEachen.

Senator Frith: It is an indefensible case!

Senator Buckwold: Keep thinking!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have quoted this rule before.

Senator Hastings: You will never learn!

Senator Stollery: He does not understand because he has never actually—

Senator Frith: Let him speak.

Senator Stollery: —been a parliamentarian.

Senator Murray: Rule 15 states that the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum. I believe that that rule provides a duty which the Speaker cannot evade.

How it contributes to "order and decorum" in this place for the bells to ring for four or five days as they did the week before—

Senator Stollery: They did not!

Senator Frith: Do not listen! Leave him alone.

An Hon. Senator: We listened to you for twenty hours!

Senator Olson: They did not!

[Senator Petten.]

Senator Murray: —and for three hours—

Senator Stollery: That is nonsense!

Senator Lefebvre: It is a flim-flam! They did not ring that long!

Senator Frith: Let him finish. He does not care about what you say.

Senator Murray: —on an adjournment motion. It is hard to see how that contributes to order and decorum.

Honourable Senators, this is, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, a finally balanced house. No party has a majority. We are 54 Conservatives, 51 Liberals, and 6 Independents.

Senator Frith: And eight doubtfuls!

Senator Murray: The liberal party has lost its majority for the first time in almost 50 years. So they are lashing out.

Senator Simard: They are bleeding!

Senator Murray: They are lashing out at the Speaker, the Governor General, and the Queen. What are we to do?

Senator Stollery: We have heard this before!

Senator Olson: Lashing out at Senator Murray!

Senator Murray: My only interest is to get on with the business of Parliament and of the country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Murray: We had an agreement on Friday night.

Senator Simard: Yes, tell us about that agreement.

Senator Murray: When I say "we", I mean all of us who were here.

At five o'clock I was asked by Senator Frith whether I would meet him.

Senator Frith: Well, Senator Doody asked you, yes.

Senator Murray: Of course I said yes. Senator Doody and I met with Senator Frith. As I indicated, I did not ask for the meeting. Senator Frith asked for the meeting after an impromptu caucus with some of his members on that side.

Senator Doody and I went to that meeting and discussed the situation. I put forward what I thought was a reasonable bottom line as far as the Government was concerned. Senator Frith then went off to consult his caucus. Therefore, when he returned and said to me and to us here, "Yes, we have a deal," I was justified in believing that the agreement was one to which all of his colleagues and all of mine are parties.

I need not, I think, go through the details of the agreement with you—although I could. We stood in front of Senator Frith's desk and we both wrote it out on our sheets of paper. It was that we would begin on Friday with the debate on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Frith: Strictly speaking, Thursday, actually.

Senator Murray: —that was Senator Buckwold.

Senator Frith: It is still Thursday.

Senator Murray: Yes. It was an extension of Thursday's sitting. Senator Buckwold would move the adoption of that report, say a few words and adjourn the debate. On Tuesday we would go to the top of the order paper and debate Bill C-28. That would be a short debate.

There was also a reference to Bill C-21, the next item on the order paper; and a reference to Bill C-39, which Senator Frith correctly said was not controversial and was ready for third reading and would no doubt pass.

There was also a reference to Bill S-8, Senator Marsden's bill, in respect of which Senator Frith might want to say a few words. We were then to resume the debate that Senator Buckwold had started on the report of his committee on Bill C-62.

I want all honourable senators to know this—and I want everyone who is interested to know this: At no time in the ten or twelve minute discussion that was held in Senator Frith's office—at no time when we sat there making a resume of what we agreed upon, was any condition put forward on that agreement. There were no conditions on the agreement. At no time in the discussion that was held before Senator Frith went to meet his caucus was there any discussion or any mention of the Speaker, or the status of the Speaker, or anything of the kind.

What Senator Frith said is on the record. He committed himself and his colleagues to begin on Tuesday with Bill C-28 to work—

Senator Frith: No—

Senator Murray: —their way down the order paper.

Senator Frith: —I said "Start with a fresh sitting." Those were the words I used.

Senator Murray: Yes; to work their way down the order paper to the report of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The fact of the matter is that it is still Tuesday, in parliamentary terms, and Tuesday's sitting can indeed go on, and on, and on.

Senator Hastings: Right to December 31!

Senator Murray: But at this stage, I think honourable senators opposite can understand my surprise that they have not so far honoured the agreement that they made on Friday evening.

So, Honourable Senators, I conclude now for the present by asking the honourable senators opposite—as I think we are entitled to ask—23 hours after this sitting began, when we are still not started on the orders of the day—

Senator Frith: But we are still in a fresh sitting.

Senator Murray: —when we made an unconditional agreement to get on with the business of the House—what their intentions are. Do you intend to honour the agreement or not?

Senator Frith: Yes, and we are honouring it.

Senator Murray: If so, when?

Senator Frith: We are.

Senator Stewart: Honourable Senators, I was the senator who at the beginning of this sitting raised a question of privilege. I had heard the agreement that was made here at the end of the last sitting. My understanding of that agreement was that at the beginning of Tuesday's sitting the ordinary rules would prevail, namely, we would go through routine proceedings and then move on to the Orders of the Day.

Honourable senators may have noticed that I did not participate in the discussion of privilege that took place at last Thursday's sitting. I did not know what had gone on with regard to the timing of the vote. It was only when I received the official report yesterday that I saw clearly what had transpired here. A letter had gone out from Senator Charbonneau saying:

> I will be stopping the division bell and will proceed to put the question now before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. this day.

The official report said:

> The Senate resumed at 5:25 p.m.
> The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked. That is the basis of the question of privilege that I raised. The question of privilege that I raised at the beginning of this sitting is founded upon the official record, which became available to me only yesterday—that is, Tuesday morning. If you look at what I said, you will see how I focus on the question of the timing of the vote. About that I had suspicions, but they were based on my own watch and I was not prepared to rely on them. I suspected that that vote had been taken prematurely. When I received the official record, I knew that it had been taken early. I received that official record only yesterday.

Senator Murray: If you had been around, you would have been shooed away by your whip.

Senator Cools: That is not fair!

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray, you concluded your speech seriously and I am responding to it seriously.

Senator Simard: You did not answer the question!

Senator Stewart: We all know that if a question of privilege is to be raised, it has to be raised at the first possible moment. Also, because privilege is so important to our parliamentary lives, it comes first.

I believe that Senator Frith had no idea that I would have a point of privilege. Nevertheless, the truth of the matter is that we all know that privilege comes first. We all know that.

I would not have been on my feet at this sitting on this particular point of privilege if the evidence—that is, the official record—had not provided a sound foundation for my claim that my privileges had been broken. That is the fact, Senator Murray. I know that you are disappointed. I understand your disappointment, but we should have an understanding on the facts.

We better have an understanding on the facts, otherwise our mutual disappointment and frustration will be perpetuated. Those are the facts. That is what happened. That is how we are where we now are.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray essentially described the discussions we had as to how they took place geographically and what it was we tried to settle on last week.

I do not think I need be very long because I think it is quite clear on the record that what we are doing now is perfectly consistent with the agreement, and I will tell you why. It is because it was made very clear in our discussion—and I used the expression several times and I believe Senators Doody and Murray will accept that—that we were starting with a "fresh sitting" at the top of the Order Paper. There is a difference between the Order Paper and the Orders of the Day. As you know, Orders of the Day come later on the Order Paper. It was quite clear that we were talking about the top of the Order Paper.

Senator Murray: You moved quickly to Orders of the Day, however.

Senator Frith: Yes, that was because we wanted to talk about the fact that Order No. 5 would drop back to position No. 5.

I would remind honourable senators of what was said at the time and what was accepted which, I thought, reflected our understanding. I said:

> On Tuesday we will be starting with a fresh sitting and at the top of the Order Paper.

Then I moved on to talk about what was on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Murray: And said . . . ?

Senator Frith: I went through them and, as you can see, it is on the record. I am not denying anything that is on the record. There does not seem to be any problem between us at all except there seems to be some implication that because we are now dealing with a point of privilege—

Senator Murray: For 23 hours.

Senator Frith: Yes, for whatever length of time. There was no discussion and no conditions were put on. Senator Murray did not say, "But, of course, if, when you come to the top of the Order Paper someone raises a point of privilege, we will have to have a condition that it can only go on for so many hours." He himself said that no conditions were to be put on. Did we try to finesse something? No. Neither of us gave away any position. There was nothing to prevent a member opposite standing.

As we all know, points of privilege, unless they occur during the debate, are raised at the top of the Order Paper. It has always been done that way. Neither Senator Murray nor Senator Doody gave away any rights with regard to two points of privilege. I could not have sold such an idea, and I am sure he could not have sold such an idea to his caucus. He is right: There were no conditions. Neither of us gave that away. Did we try to finesse that? No, because—and I quote, ". . . of the way things were left on the record after the points of privilege that were raised, everyone's position will remain the same." That was the deal and that is where we are.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition in the Senate): Honourable senators, I will not attempt to rehearse the arguments I made yesterday about the function of the Whips in a parliamentary democracy founded upon the party system. That is, the way to discover how the Whips operate and the way they operate is reflected in the rules. I believe that Senator Murray has a very incomplete understanding of the function of a Whip. I attempted to outline it yesterday and I think I am on solid ground, but I will not go into the arguments again.

Senator Murray has illustrated how complete the breakdown of communication has been between the government and the opposition in the Senate of Canada. What he has said has again underlined the weak foundation the government had in going first to the Governor General and then to the Queen, securing the appointments of additional senators in order to break an alleged deadlock. Senator Murray said that everybody knew that these three bills were getting nowhere. How did they know? If Senator Murray had asked me—which he never did—"What is your intention with respect to Bill C-28?—which is the clawback bill—he would have been told, as I believe Senator Doody had been told, that that bill would pass relatively quickly and relatively easily.

When I led the government in the other place, I did so on three separate occasions and my incessant occupation was asking the opposition, "What is your intention with respect to Bill so-and-so?" I did that on a weekly basis and sometimes several times a week.

To this day the Leader of the Government has never asked me what the intention was with respect to Bill C-28, and if he had asked, he would have been told. If the Governor General had asked he would have been told that the Liberal opposition had made amendments to that bill which were rejected in the House of Commons, and that it was our intention, agreed to by the chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and by a member of the steering committee, Senator Kirby, that that bill would clear without further difficulty although there might be some debate.

Senator Simard: What about Senator Poitras? Of course, you can forget about him.

Senator MacEachen: He may have asked Senator Poitras what his interests were, but the Prime Minister built the case to the Canadian people and then to the Governor General on Bill C-28 which, if a simple inquiry had been made first by the government and then particularly by the Governor General, the facts would have been revealed.

Senator Murray: You had nine months.

Senator Frith: Don't forget, you also had nine months.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think the length of time is the factor. The time has nothing to do with whether a deadlock exists. I could mention bills that the government has allowed to languish for ten or twelve months. I could give lots of examples where they have allowed bills to languish for endless months, but with that bill there was no deadlock because we had a clear intention of passing it.

Senator Simard: What about Bill C-21?

Senator MacEachen: Let us go to Bill C-21. That is another bill that we amended and sent to the House of Commons. It was sent back. We insisted on our amendments. We thought the government would call a conference, which it did not.

We asked for a conference and we put a motion asking for a conference. We believe that we ought to employ a frequently-used parliamentary device to settle our grievances on Bill C-21. That motion was never allowed to go to a vote; it was adjourned in the name of Senator Ottenheimer.

New senators, please listen. That motion was adjourned in the middle of May by Senator Ottenheimer and it is now October 9. The reason for the adjournment was that an approach was made to our side saying, "We are adjourning in the interests of having negotiations with the opposition with a view to reconciling our differences."

We began the negotiations. I had two conversations with the minister and then a very long conversation in June with the Deputy Minister of Manpower and Immigration in which I made proposals as to how we could resolve our differences, and we clarified what had been misunderstandings about the bill. I told him that the bill could be cleared before the end of June if we entered into serious negotiations. Well, the fact of the matter is that I never heard back from the Deputy Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Then, in August, I had my office write him a letter recounting the facts which he had commonly agreed upon and repeated what I had said: That in my belief if we had worked we could have cleared the bill before the end of June and that possibility still existed. This is what I was telling the government in the middle of August. Then, in reply to that we heard from the Deputy Minister who said, "Well, I can't carry this any further. It has gone to the government."

Then the Minister of Small Business wrote me about a problem in Elliot Lake saying, "We need that bill." I wrote to him and said, "Yes, we want to pass that bill and we are ready to negotiate and the sooner the better. I think we can clear that bill." Honourable Senators, that is the situation on this side of the house.

Senator Murray: It has been here for 11 months.

Senator MacEachen: We never said that we intended to defeat the bill. It was my firm conviction that we could have cleared the bill and passed it before the end of June. However, negotiations were still open and never concluded by the government. The government never said, "Your proposals are unacceptable. We have new ones." They just closed the book and it has remained closed to this day.

I believe that that is a series of facts the Governor General ought to have known about before he took this action. I think, if it were appropriate for the Governor General to seek advice within the government and to go to outsiders for advice, he might have asked the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate—after all, I have been a privy counsellor much longer than he has been—he might have asked me, "What is the situation with respect to Bill C-28? What is the situation with respect to Bill C-21?"

Senator Murray: No, No.

Senator MacEachen: But he did not even find out the facts, so how can anyone say a deadlock existed?

• (1330)

Senator Frith: Now you have them!

Senator MacEachen: No deadlock existed on these bills, and those are the facts. I find this incomprehensible. How in the name of God could a judge find that a foundation existed for a deadlock respecting those bills. Senator Murray has said that everyone knew these bills were not going anywhere.

Senator Murray: Look at the record, 11 months, nine months and five months.

Senator MacEachen: I must say that the time factor has little bearing on this because bills languish for a long time.

Senator Murray must read my mind, because he said: "We know what you were going to do. We know, but we will not even ask you. We won't step across the gangway and ask what your plans are."

Senator Murray: Did you see Senator Buckwold's letter to Mr. Wilson of September 12 regarding Bill C-28?

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I read it, as well as the reply from Mr. Wilson. That correspondence was assessed, and after a conversation with Senator Buckwold, we said we would not carry on a further dispute or debate with the Minister of Finance; that we were prepared to pass the bill. I recall that conversation with Senator Buckwold.

Senator Simard: Then he did not tell us.

Senator Frith: I told Senator Doody about it.

Senator MacEachen: Surely, honourable senators, before one takes the extraordinary measure of going to the Queen to appoint eight new senators, one should find out the facts on the ground. That is why I have insisted that there was a fact-finding role here for the Governor General, not that he should accept my advice as to what he ought to do. That would be quite out of the question. I am not seeking ministerial status, but I believe that when there is a dispute as to the state of a piece of legislation, it is the duty of the Governor General to find out the facts from all of the parties.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: Those are the facts that I would have given him on those two bills.

Honourable senators, I intend to have much more to say on this when we debate Bill C-21. I intend to table the correspondence to prove that we were in a negotiating mode, that it had never been broken off by the opposition and that our proposals had never been replied to by the government.

Senator Murray: Explain your amendment at the same time you do that.

Senator MacEachen: I would be delighted to explain the amendment. I promise to do that.

I have been personally perplexed that the facts were not put on the table for everybody as to the state of those two bills.

There were three bills mentioned by the Prime Minister in his press conference announcing the eight new senators. I have dealt with two of them. The third is the one we are waiting to debate. It is now on the order paper. I could talk more about that, but I am giving honourable senators the facts now so that I can say to Senator Murray that everybody knew where those bills were going, but Senator Murray did not, because he did not ask.

Senator Grafstein: Why did he not ask?

Senator MacEachen: As I said, that is the normal function of a leader of a government. The Leader of the Government in the Commons is always on the doorstep of the opposition saying, "What are your intentions? Tell me."

Senator Murray: That is what Senator Doody does all the time.

Senator Frith: I told him.

Senator Murray: You said that you would axe the tax; defeat the GST.

Senator MacEachen: I rose to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate why he did not put Hibernia on the list, because the other inclusions are as dubious, in my mind—at least the first two are—as Hibernia would be, because that arrived on the order paper yesterday.

The Leader of the Government could have said that everybody knows Hibernia will not get anywhere. Well, we would like to deal with Hibernia.

Senator Murray: Good.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government should ask us what our intentions are. The government has said that it wants to get on with the business. Why does the Leader of the Government in the Senate not do something about expunging from the annals of the Senate the ruling that we find so objectionable. That will stick in our craw. He must find some way to get that out of the way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: Senator Murray should find some way to get that out of our craw.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition knows how to do that.

Senator MacEachen: The honourable senator will have to work on that and talk to his colleagues in order to find out how that can be done, but that has to be done. Then we would like to go on and deal with, for example, Hibernia. Why can we not deal with Hibernia tomorrow and Friday and adjourn, if honourable senators opposite wish, until Tuesday? In the meantime senators opposite can consider proposals by which that objectionable ruling can be expunged from the annals of this place, or put in cold storage or sterilized or something that would atrophy its presence, then we can come back to the top of the list on Monday or Tuesday.

That is my proposal, if you want to take it seriously.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, speaking to this question of privilege, I rise with some sadness, because, having been here for some 20 years now—many of the faces I see on the other side do not see me that well. I was appointed in 1968, but those who do know me will probably have found me very involved in my committee work and not a very partisan member of this chamber. In fact, it is only two years ago that, after 14 years as chairman of the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs, I had to resign because of my stand on the free trade, which was in opposition to my party. I had to vote against my party.

I enjoyed the work as chairman of that committee for many, many years. I think I am not stretching the point if I were to say that many members of that committee would confirm that I was a fair and impartial chairman.

I trust that most senators who sat on that committee would not have objected to my manner of chairing the meetings.

The Leader of the Government said a little while ago, "Where were you? I have not seen you around here."

I was here last week and I have been here this week. I was supposed to be in Vancouver this week for medical tests, but I put them off because I wanted to be here to speak to this matter. I am going to confine myself, as much as I possibly can, to this question of privilege involving the Speaker's activities last Thursday. I do not think it is of any help now to go into a lot of irrelevant actions, such as the court actions and whether they should have been brought or not brought; the courts will decide that. I do not think there is any advantage in responding to the extensive time the Leader of the Government in the Senate took on the subject of our being spoil sports because we do not have a majority any more. That does not bother me in the slightest. They have the majority and they can overrule the Speaker if they do not like a ruling the Speaker makes, just as we used to do many times over the past 20 years.

Senator Murray: We do not have a majority.

Senator van Roggen: You have an effective majority. Take one or two or three of the independents and add them to your numbers and you will have a majority. Don't try to tell me you have not. In any event, you can always test it.

I am not here to whine about our being in a minority position; I am here to speak to a question of privilege because my privileges were abused because of your activities with Speaker Charbonneau last Thursday evening. I will try to confine myself to that and nothing else.

I still cannot believe what happened last Thursday. There are rules in this place. Over the years we voted when the whips came in. Sometimes when a vote was called there would be a long bell because some senators had left for Toronto or Montreal and had to get back, and we would be informed that the whips would stay out for several hours.

Senator Murray asked what a senator was doing in his office when the bells stopped last Thursday. What is one supposed to do when the bells are ringing for three hours, stand outside on one leg waiting for the bells to stop?

Senator Frith: Apparently.

Senator van Roggen: Senators go to their offices when there are long bells. They are advised by the whip when the bells will stop. That has been the practice as long as I have been here which, as I said, is 20 years.

We are in a difficult situation insofar as the GST bill is concerned. Both sides, I am sure, have been holding extensive caucuses as to what to do to get on with the business of the Senate. I am not going to disclose any confidences of caucus, but I can certainly say for myself that pending an expeditious settlement, or at least getting an idea of whether the courts can deal expeditiously with the question of the appointment of eight new senators, our caucus should have been prepared—and I know many of my confrères were because I spoke to them outside of caucus—to work towards some proposals that could be put to the government in an attempt to get on with the business on the order paper, possibly putting the GST aside, not for months, because we know the deadlines involved, but at least for one or two weeks until the courts decide, and see if they see any merit in pursuing further the actions that have been taken.

It takes time to get 50 partisan people in a caucus to come together, and in such circumstances to ring the bells for a day or two or even five days while those meetings take place is no big deal. If the bells were ringing for five weeks, the Speaker or someone would have to move, and of course, the people would start to move. They would get on our backs, not yours, if we permitted that to happen.

The bells have rung for three or four days and over the weekends before. Incidentally, they were stopped by the Speaker, I assume, and I wondered whether that was to indicate a vote was to take place, but it was not. All he did was stop them of his own volition, and then started them, I suppose.

You know that you have made a mistake. If you had used a little patience and allowed the process to go on for a few days you would have found that public pressure would have produced some proposals, although you might not have agreed with them, but we could have put the Senate back to work again.

I make no apologies for getting on a plane last Thursday night. I thought that between Thanksgiving and the weekend it would be difficult to get enough people organized with cogent thoughts about what might be proposed in our caucus before that caucus would meet again on Tuesday. As I say, I went to Vancouver for medical reasons and I intended to be there all this week on that account.

I come to why we on this side, myself included, find this situation so unbelievable and intolerable. It is not that the Speaker made a ruling we did not like or that we do not have the votes to overrule the Speaker, as you do. That is not the problem. The problem is that the Speaker, to use the quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press, made this great new departure. How did he make this great new departure? He made it in about 20 or 30 minutes in collusion with you people on that side of the house. My objection is that I was not in on the fix. If you are going to be in on the fix, then we all ought to be in on the fix.

The evidence is obvious. Fifty-four senators voted on that motion. If I exclude the two independents, Senators Molson and Everett, Speaker Charbonneau, and Senator John M. Macdonald, who was paired, it means that every single Tory—not 99 per cent but 100 per cent—were in their place for that vote. That is amazing. With the bells ringing and in a situation where under normal circumstances we would probably not be back until the next day—and any politician who has been around knows that that is the type of situation we were in—not one single soul was out having dinner somewhere, not one single soul had gone back to his hotel room, not one single soul was in his apartment, and not one single soul had gone to the airport. You knew. You were advised. You knew the fix was in and what was going to happen.

Senator Frith: And made sure that we did not.

Senator van Roggen: And made sure that we did not. Then what does the Speaker do to make this great new departure? He writes a quick letter. I should not say it was quick because it could have been drafted weeks earlier. I heard rumours that the original was seen in Senator Murray's file, but I have no personal knowledge of that. He wrote this letter and sent copies to the independent senators, the two whips and the leaders sometime between 5:10 and 5:20 for a vote at 5:30. The bells were ringing. People were in their offices. It is immaterial that I was on an airplane. You all marched in here. Instead of shooing them out, my confrères would have come in to object, but the vote goes ahead for the first time in the history of Parliament of Canada without the two whips coming in. There has never been a precedent of this nature in either house. This was all cooked up in 20 minutes. Even then, not satisfied with what you cooked up, you locked the doors five minutes early to make 100 per cent sure that the game worked.

I am simply saying—and I say this with great regret—that this was a sleazy trick. If you were convinced—and maybe you had every right to be convinced—that we were going to be totally obstructionist during this fall session, you have the power to bring in proposals. First you could make a case to the public that the Liberals are holding up the business of the Senate and that the Speaker should act, which would give him public support and credibility. You could do that in four or five days. Second, you could bring in changes to the rules to put a time limit on debate and use your majority legitimately. Using the Speaker illegitimately is what we are complaining about. It is not using your majority that we are complaining about. You have a majority; use it. Do not subvert the Speaker of this chamber and poison this chamber, as you have done.

This great new departure, which you are so proud of having cajoled the Speaker into taking, could have been done over a one- or two-week period with a change in the rules. What are you going to do next time, have them call a vote again and use this as a precedent where the rules no longer apply or are you going to amend the rules to suit yourselves? There is nothing wrong with amending the rules. They have been amended before. Have the guts to amend them.

Look at the hullabaloo the Tories put up in the House of Commons in the pipeline debate 20 or 30 years ago over the use of closure once. Now you use closure on a regular basis; and I, as a parliamentarian, think that is correct. Closure, used as a limitation of debate, has gone on in Westminster for decades, if not forever. It is a perfectly legitimate way to expedite the business of Parliament. I do not believe that Parliament should be held up forever. I do believe in the rules and the rule of law, but I do not like it when someone runs roughshod over the rules, particularly when it is the Speaker in connivance with the government. That is my objection. That is the only point of privilege I raise. It has nothing to do with your majority, being a spoilsport or having my nose out of joint because we are not the government and we do not have the majority in this place any more.

In my remarks I have stressed my belief and dedication to the rule of law, whether it is the rule of law I was brought up to understand as a lawyer, whether it is the rule of law of Parliament, or whether it is the civil, gentlemanly act of playing by the rules, be it on the golf course or in this chamber. When people do not play by the rules and abuse the rule of law I get very upset. It only happens every 20 years or so. Fortunately this type of abuse does not happen often.

I had thought that in my remarks today I might edify some of those opposite with some extensive quotations from a book on the Parliamentary Government of Canada, which is a critical assessment on suggestions for change. It was published 11 years ago. Unfortunately, most of the changes recommended have not taken place, and we continue to be in a situation that could lead to the type of disruption we have experienced here. I have decided not to read these for the moment because I thought I might first establish my own credentials as someone who believes in the rule of law and who understands what it means to play by the rules.

I made a speech in this chamber on June 27, 1973 on the federal disallowance of provincial statutes. This was a case, as you will learn, in which the government of the Province of British Columbia had used its majority in the Llegislature of British Columbia to abolish the property rights of certain individuals. It was my judgment that the federal government should use its power of disallowance in those circumstances. I did not have a lot of hope that they would do so. Senator Hatfield, who was a provincial premier, probably would not like to countenance the federal use of the power of disallowance: but this was something I thought, because of the nature of the acts of the then socialist government of British Columbia, should at least have been suggested.

The speech had some effect. After I made my speech I spoke to Prime Minister Trudeau in his office. He asked me if I really expected him to do what I said, and I replied, "No, sir, but I hoped you would". However, it made headlines in the Vancouver papers. Senator Lawson picked it up and said, "If you can break any rule of law, I don't have to have my men obey their collective agreements any more." The offending section of the statute in question was never proclaimed. You will find this interesting.

Hon. George van Roggen rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to an urgent Constitutional matter.

He said: Honourable senators, last week I gave notice that I would today bring to the attention of the Senate an urgent constitutional matter. I do that now by drawing the attention of honourable senators to Bill 103 introduced by the provincial government in the last session of the British Columbia Legislature. The bill was given third reading on April 18, 1973. In particular I draw to the attention of honourable senators clause 14 of the bill.

I might say that this bill relates to the Pacific National Exhibition, which is the Vancouver equivalent of the Canadian National Exhibition held in Toronto. The bill deals with the appointment of the directors and the operation of the Pacific National Exhibition. On third reading of this bill, however, at the last moment—

Not unlike here

—clause 14 was brought in by the government as an amendment, reading as follows:

Any lease or other agreement entered into under or pursuant to the Act repealed by this Act is, unless it expires before the thirty-first day of December, 1975, void and unenforceable unless and until the lease or agreement is approved and ratified, or any amendments thereto are approved and ratified, by the board.

This simply says that by statute any lease entered into by the board of the Vancouver Exhibition would be null and void on a certain day. It just so happened that the owners or the lessees of the racetrack had just spent $10 million on a new grandstand with a 20-year lease. That was to disappear in one year. That was the most extraordinary theft of property one can possibly imagine—threat and theft—unless renegotiated. What sort of a gun do you need to renegotiate a lease? I considered this to be straight confiscation, and that is why I brought this matter to the attention of the Senate and the government.

● (1400)

Honourable senators will excuse me for a moment. This volume of Senate Hansard is somewhat heavy.

> In effect, the clause simply voids all contracts and agreements entered into legally by the previous board operating under the previous act, without any recourse or compensation of any nature to the parties to those contracts or leases.
> Senator Lawson, who is not present in the chamber today, spoke in Vancouver recently and was quoted in the Vancouver Province of June 11, 1973. You can see the extent of the front page of the newspaper, where it says: "Teamsters Threaten to Void Contracts," with a picture of Senator Lawson. I will read excerpts from this article:
> > Senator Ed Lawson, B.C. president of the Teamsters Union, threatened Saturday that his union may declare its collective agreements void in mid-term since the same principle is contained in the provincial government's new Pacific National Exhibition Act.
> > Lawson said the new PNE Act, a clause of which says contracts with the PNE lasting past December 31, 1975, will have to be renegotiated, destroys the sanctity of contract in B.C.
> > If the clause is proclaimed by the government, making it law, he will recommend the Teamsters either withdraw all support from the government or "adopt the (same) philosophy," he said.
> > If the Teamsters were to adopt the philosophy, he said, they could declare a three-year contract void in the second year and demand greater benefits. The only justification he has heard from the government for the PNE Act is to the same end, he said—"more revenue."

The article continues;

> The Teamsters rejected in 1965 calls by organized labour for a general strike, and still will have no part in wildcat strikes, because the union believes in the sanctity of contract, he said.
> "But how in the name of heaven can you say to the men 'You must go back to work' when they can say we have a policy in this province of voiding contracts for more revenue," he said. ". . . I don't think the government or the minister are aware of the seriousness of what they're doing."

Later, the article goes on:

> In the panel discussion, King—

The Minister of Labour in British Columbia.

> —told Lawson to look back on some of the expropriation deals the former Social Credit government made, such as the B.C. Electric take-over, which he said also violated sanctity of contract.
> Lawson responded in the interview that the new government is "no less despicable" for doing what amounts to the same thing.

Of course, precedents of previous abuses of the rule of law or the rules of this place do not carry any weight with me, for the same reason.

Reading on:

> I might say, honourable senators, that that news item was followed by a very complimentary editorial in the Vancouver Sun on June 12, 1973, headed "Mr. Lawson said it all and said it well." I shall not take the time to read the editorial. It was followed by a further editorial in the Vancouver Province.
> The purpose of my remarks today is to develop my reasoning as to why it is not only the legal right, but also the solemn duty, of the federal government to disallow legislation such as this pursuant to the provisions of sections 55, 56, 57 and 90 of the British North America Act. If I may summarize the pertinent provisions of the BNA Act and—
> Hon. Mr. Martin: Just so that I can follow, what is the date of the act?
> Hon. Mr. van Roggen: The provincial act I refer to passed third reading on April 18, 1973. I might say that this act has not yet been presented to the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia for royal assent.
> Hon. Mr. Martin: Then it is not law now. Is that what we are to understand?
> Hon. Mr. van Roggen: One of the provisions of the BNA Act is that the Governor in Council may instruct the Lieutenant-Governor of a province to withhold his assent on the bill being presented for royal assent. I hope you would not argue that I must wait until the horse has left the barn before I raise the matter.
> Hon. Mr. Martin: I wish to understand clearly what the senator is proposing. Is he asking that the government should disallow the measure?
> Hon. Mr. van Roggen: Yes.
> Hon. Mr. Martin: He is not suggesting what the government should recommend to the Lieutenant-Governor?
> Hon. Mr. Asselin: The law is not yet in force.
> Hon. Mr. van Roggen: I am advocating today that the federal government, through the medium of the Governor in Council, which is the federal Cabinet, disallow this provincial legislation. Three mechanisms exist which might be used for this. The Lieutenant-Governor can withhold assent, which is uncommon, or he could reserve assent for the Governor General, following which ensues one year's period during which final decision can be made by the federal government. In fact, I was about to read from a resumé which describes how this procedure works.

If any honourable senators are finding this dull, Senator Forsey spoke after me and perhaps they will find that much more entertaining. The resumé reads as follows:

> Under the powers conferred upon him by Section 90 of the B.N.A. Act, a Lieutenant-Governor may do one of three things with a bill which has passed through all its stages in the legislature and is presented to him for royal assent: he may signify that he assents to the bill in the Queen's name whereupon it becomes an Act of the legislature; he may withhold his assent; or he may reserve the bill so that it may be considered by the Governor General. The first of these three courses is the normal one, and requires no comment. The second is a simple veto; the bill is dead and can be revived only by introducing it again into the legislature, passing it through all its stages, and presenting it again for assent at a subsequent session of the legislature. The third is not a withholding of an assent (that is, there is no veto), but the decision as to whether assent will be given or withheld is passed back to the Governor General, acting on the advice of his ministers in Ottawa.

In such a case the reserved bill has no force unless and until, within one year from the day it was presented to the Lieutenant-Governor for the royal assent, it receives the assent of the Governor General in Council.

It should be noted that the Governor in Council is not obliged to do anything at all. If no action is taken during the year then the bill has been effectively vetoed.

In addition to this power the Governor in Council may disallow any provincial Act within one year after its receipt at Ottawa.

Some seventy bills have been reserved by Lieutenant-Governors since Confederation, of which thirteen have been assented to by the Governor General.

Of course, the majority of those bills were reserved prior to the turn of the century, but a number of them have been dealt with since then.

I do not wish to take the time of honourable senators with a long and technical legal discussion as to whether or not this power exists. Suffice it to say that at the time of the disallowance of the Alberta legislation of Premier Aberhart, including the Press Gag Law, in 1937, the federal government referred the whole matter to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of reference. I give just one or two excerpts of remarks made by Supreme Court justices at that time as to the power of the federal government in the BNA Act, and as to whether or not that power exists today. Mr. Justice Kerwin concludes:

—these words are so clear that comment or elaboration would appear to be superfluous.

In the opinion of Mr. Justice Cannon section 7 of the Statute of Westminster "gives new force, if necessary, to the existing provisions of the British North America Act and preserves them."

It was also recalled that the power of disallowance by the Governor General has been recognized in at least two judgments of the Privy Council.

Is there any restriction on this power? Here again I quote from a former Chief Justice of Canada:

[Senator Roggen.]

There is nothing in the British North America Act controlling this discretion; nor is there any other statute having any relevancy to the matter.

The power of reservation is subject to no limitation or restriction, except in so far as his discretion in exercising it may be controlled or regulated by the Instructions of the Governor General—

There is one remaining thing and that is, while reference is made to the "Governor General" it is settled law that it is the Governor General in Council—that is, the Cabinet—that has this power. Mr. Justice Taschereau affirmed that:

—power of veto is given to the Governor General in Council, not to the Governor General himself.

I should now like to make a few general observations. The first is that in a majority of instances of disallowance to date, the question was as to whether or not a province had exceeded its jurisdiction. That was the simple question at issue, namely, a question of ultra vires. On the other hand only a minority of instances of disallowance involved legislation which was within the power of the provinces under section 92 of the BNA Act but which was reserved by the federal government because it was oppressive, against natural justice, or otherwise against public policy. While cases in this category are in the minority, they still do exist. Senator Forsey, who is probably Canada's greatest authority on this subject—

This is 20 years ago and he is still regarded in the same way.

—with the possible except of Senator Goldenberg—will correct me if I am wrong in that.

Some say that this power of disallowance should be used by the federal government only when a province has clearly attempted to legislate in an area which is not within its power and that the power should not be used in an area clearly within provincial jurisdiction such as property and civil rights.

I hold entirely the opposite view. In my view, the federal government does not need to rely upon this power of disallowance where a province legislates in matters beyond its jurisdiction, because the Supreme Court of Canada is quite competent to rule on such legislation, and has full power to strike it down if it is ultra vires the province.

It is my view rather that the federal government should use this power of disallowance where a province acting within its jurisdiction passes legislation that is not ultra vires, but which nevertheless denies to the individual citizen natural justice and due process.

I hope to persuade honourable senators this afternoon that if the federal government refuses to discharge this clear duty imposed upon it by the BNA Act, as this and previous governments have so refused in recent years, we now live in Canada not under the rule of law but under the rule of men. For it is my judgment, honourable senators, that the Fathers of Confederation looked upon this provision for disallowance as providing that safeguard for the rights of the individual which is to be found in the due process clause of the American Constitution and which is inherent in Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, Habeas Corpus, and the Act of Settlement under which the citizen of England finds his protection.

Wouldn't it be nice if the Speaker had read some of this?

If Canadian federal governments will not exercise their duty in this respect, then an intolerable void will have been created in the Canadian Constitution, and immediate action should be taken to enshrine a "due process" provision in the Canadian Constitution. And I stress again that until such action is taken it is incumbent upon the federal government to perform its duty in this area.

Our present Prime Minister, I believe, takes the same position, for he suggests considering the abolition of the power of reservation and disallowance only after having introduced a Bill of Rights into the Canadian Constitution. In Federalism and the French Canadians at page 48, sub-paragraph (b), he states:

> The protection of basic rights having thus been insured (by the introduction of a Bill of Rights) there would be no danger in reducing the Central Government's predominance in certain areas (for example by abolishing the right of reservation and disallowance)—

But he pointed out that this should only be done after there has been enshrined in our Constitution a due process clause.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: The senator made reference to a "due process clause" in the Bill of Rights, corresponding to that in the Constitution of the United States. If he will allow me to correct him—I had something to do with drafting that document—there was nothing like the due process clause in the United States Constitution in the proposed Bill of Rights.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: Honourable senators, I will withdraw the reference to a "due process clause" and rely on the Bill of Rights. The expression "Bill of Rights" refers to the present Canadian Bill of Rights which applies to federal matters only. I shall be dealing with that in a few minutes when I read section 1, which is the type of protection I seek for all Canadians, not only those falling under federal jurisdiction. In fact, I notice in turning my notes that the Canadian Bill of Rights is the next item on my agenda.

Part I, section 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, with which all senators will be familiar, is:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> (b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;
> (c) freedom of religion;
> (d) freedom of speech;
> (e) freedom of assembly and association; and
> (f) freedom of the press.

● (1415)

This Bill of Rights is not binding on the provinces, and I say that until such a bill of rights is embedded in our Constitution so that it governs the actions of the provinces, we must not only retain the powers of disallowance, but those powers must be exercised by the federal government or it is failing in its duty and thereby deliberately withdrawing from Canadian citizens the right of due process to which they are entitled.

Honourable senators, I shall now read some excerpts from a paper on this subject prepared in 1968, which I obtained from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. I have endeavoured not to take any of these out of context, but rather have selected some items from this very lengthy paper which many honourable senators may find to be of interest when considering this subject:

> It should be remembered that the powers of disallowance and reservation have been considered as an essential part of the scheme of Confederation. As reported by G. V. Laforest, who is quoted in the first page of this study, these powers were a compromise between the Fathers who supported a legislative union of the provinces and others who had favoured a federal constitution. Thus the powers of disallowance and of reservation are at the root of our system of government . . . To put it another way, if someone is prepared to recommend the abolition of these powers, he must be prepared to accept some fundamental changes in our constitution. When the question of the abolition of these powers is examined, we must bear in mind that it implies a different conception of Canadian federalism.
> Are the "abolitionists" prepared for such radical reform?

The paper goes on to an area entitled: "The Defence of Minorities." I would commend to the consideration of honourable senators that a proper definition of democracy—

And some of you on the other side might just pay heed to this particular sentence.

> —should include not only the right of the majority to rule, but equally the right of minorities to their rights. A citizen, in thinking whether or not he might belong to the majority or minority group, should keep in mind that every single citizen is a minority of one, and if legislation can be promulgated taking away one's rights without due compensation—

And I might add, process.

—then I put it to honourable senators that we are living in a land where a definition of democracy has to be somewhat circumscribed to apply to it.

Professor W.P.M. Kennedy says:

—the power of disallowance was inserted in the British North America Act to cover, in general terms, unjust, confiscatory, or ex post facto legislation, against which there are express safeguards in the constitution of the United States.

A priori, there is a certain amount of support for this contention. It is well known that the constitution of the United States was carefully studied by those who laid the foundations and organized the framework of Canadian federation. It is not unreasonable to suppose that they had in mind in the "disallowance sections" a means of dealing with provincial legislation which might be judged unsound in principle. Cartier, as we shall see, explicitly said that this was the intention. As a matter of fact, from federation to 1893, the weight of evidence, both from the bench and from the federal cabinet, is in favour of this point of view.

The paper comments:

When provincial legislation discriminates against certain persons and, at the same time, deprives these persons of their right to appeal to the courts against the exercise of arbitrary power, the exercise of the power of disallowance is the only remedy. This is particularly true for two categories of persons affected by arbitrary provincial legislation: those who are in a minority and those who are not living in the province. The remedy given to them in a democratic country at the ballot box is of no assistance.

This opinion is that of Professor Frank R. Scott, who wrote in his book "The Canadian Constitution and Human Rights": "Hence the federal government can keep a watchful eye on provincial behaviour, and has the legal power to stop a provincial government from adopting laws which unjustly restrict or attack minority rights or human rights. Many provincial laws have in fact been disallowed in the past, the latest examples being some of the Social Credit laws in Alberta in 1941. The Fathers of Confederation undoubtedly intended that this power should be used to protect minorities: for example, when Georges Etienne Cartier was asked during the Confederation debates in 1865 what would happen if the French majority in Quebec tried to blot out the English speaking minority from any representation in the Quebec legislature, he replied that the law could be vetoed. "I would recommend it myself in case of injustice," he said.

[Senator Roggen.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is up to the honourable senator to decide what he wishes to do with the document put out by the research group. I notice that he has made some selections, which is his right. But, in order to give honourable senators the fullest opportunity of reviewing this matter, perhaps he might wish to have the information incorporated in some other way, perhaps as an appendix to today's proceedings—

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: I am entirely in the hands of the Senate. I merely telephoned the Research Branch of the Library, and asked for any material on this subject. They sent this information to me, which is a paper prepared in 1968. It may be too voluminous to be appended to the Debates of the Senate of today as it comprises some 60 pages. Certainly any honourable senator can obtain a copy by simply telephoning the Research Branch.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, I turn now to another matter. Do we have the same protection as the English under common law? Every school boy is familiar with the over simplified principle that Parliament is all powerful. As the saying goes, "Parliament can make a man a woman." In England, however, with its famous "unwritten Constitution", the courts on numerous occasions have come to the aid of the citizen against arbitrary parliamentary enactments, relying on Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, Habeas Corpus, the Act of Settlement, et cetera; but in Canada, where we have a quasi-Constitution in the BNA Act, this power of the courts is not so clear.

Admittedly, the preamble to the BNA Act makes reference to a "Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom", but unfortunately the true meaning of these words has not received much attention by our courts, and they are after all only part of the preamble to the BNA Act.

Tarnopolsky, in his book on the Canadian Bill of Rights (1966) states at page 19:

It is difficult to ascertain why there was no discussion of civil liberties at the time of Confederation. Possibly this was a result of the reaction to the American experience with the civil war rising out of the controversy over states rights and the rights of certain inhabitants of the United States. It was more probably the result of the belief of the Fathers of Confederation that the new country they were creating was a successor to the heritage of English constitutional Law, the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, the Act of Settlement, among others, and the English Common Law, with its emphasis on the rights of free men which could not be taken away—

Mr. Justice Abbott of the Supreme Court of Canada touched upon this in Switzman vs. Elbling, (1957) Supreme Court Reports, page 328, where he said, in reference to legislation to suppress communistic propaganda and hence public debate and public discussion:

> Although it is not necessary, of course, to determine this question for the purpose of the present appeal, the Canadian Constitution being declared to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, I am also of the opinion that as our Constitution Act now stands, Parliament itself could not abrogate this right of discussion and debate.
> In other words, honourable senators, there may be a power in our Constitution over and above the power of Parliament where matters of fundamental liberties are concerned, but England is not a federal state with statutory powers given to the provinces, and so long as this theory, hanging as it does on a few words in the preamble to our Constitution, remains unclear and undeveloped, the federal government must perform its duty on the power of disallowance.

Honourable senators, let us look at some examples of provincial premiers. I don't see any in the house now, but I wish to recite some rather serious infringements by individual provincial governments across Canada over the years—and I might say I was careful to select examples of governments of all parties—against the rights of Canadian citizens.

> Let us look at some examples of provincial acts or proposed provincial acts, which infringe on the basic and fundamental human rights of Canadians. Before doing so, I might be permitted to observe that it is a very non-partisan list. Between the federal governments that have refused to act under the power of disallowance when, in my opinion, they should have, and the provincial governments enacting the legislation, we have had Conservatives, Liberals, Social Creditors, NDPers, and the Union Nationale, all with their hands in the cookie jar.
> The following is by no means an exhaustive list and is only meant to constitute a representative random sample of legislation abrogating basic human rights, passed or attempted by provincial governments during the past number of years when federal governments have, generally speaking, discontinued exercising the power of disallowance.
> Let us first look at the infamous Quebec "padlock law" to which I referred a moment ago. As honourable senators will recall, this was an attempt to curb communism or bolshevism. Those two words, "communism" and "bolshevism," were used, but nowhere were they defined. That law made it illegal for an occupant of a house to allow any person to use that house to propagate communism or bolshevism, the penalty for such an offence being that the house would be padlocked for a period of one year and the tenant dispossessed, with no redress whatsoever for the tenant.
> I suggest, honourable senators, that that law should have been disallowed by the federal Government. The federal Government was petitioned, I believe by Senator Forsey, to disallow it, but refused to do so. Some 15 or 20 years later, it was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada. However, that certainly was no reason for it not to be disallowed in the first instance. The federal government, of course, now has the right to make a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada any time it wishes to do so.

Again, that is something it might do to remove the cloud from these eight senators and move this whole process forward more rapidly, rather than forcing us to start off in provincial courts saying, "We want the case heard in camera," and then asking for adjournments because they are not ready. However, that is an aside.

Reading on:

> Next, let us look at Premier Smallwood's legislation permitting labour unions to be outlawed at the whim of the premier. This was a 1959 provincial statute which provided, inter alia, that the Cabinet could dissolve any trade union where it appeared to the Cabinet that superior officers of the union or any affiliate had been convicted of a crime. It did not matter that they served their full sentence and paid their debt to society. The Cabinet did not even have to have proof; it just had to appear so.
> There are other examples outside my own province of British Columbia, but let us now go to British Columbia, where most people would expect me to seize upon the takeover of B.C. Electric by Premier Bennett, when he arbitrarily set the price to be paid for the shares. Unlike Mr. Barrett, at least he was going to pay something for them. But then, when the shareholders had the temerity to go to court, he had the legislature pass a second statute saying that no court should entertain any action relative to the first statute.

So much for the tyranny of majorities in Parliament.

> To its great credit, the Supreme Court of British Columbia simply ignored the second monstrosity.
> I am not going to use the B.C. Electric case as an example. Rather, I am going to refer to an instance of common theft by threatened legislation, known as the Parkford Estate. The facts are very simple: In August, 1956 land was quite properly expropriated by the provincial government for a freeway near the Dease Island Tunnel south of Vancouver, at which time compensation . . . in the amount of $280,000 was offered by the provincial Crown, which offer was not acceptable to the several owners of the land in question. That was perfectly proper.
> After some four years of inaction by the government, the owners eventually succeeded in bringing the matter to arbitration, as provided for in the provincial statute, and on October 28, 1960, a duly constituted board of arbitration awarded the owners $442,000, together with interest at 5 per cent per annum from the date of expropriation, for a total award of approximately $550,000.

About twice the previous offer of the Government.

> This award of the arbitration board was subsequently made into an order of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.
> However, this award was not to the liking of the Government. I do not quarrel with that, but what I do quarrel with is that the government then did not pay the amount of the award and did not avail itself of the right of appeal to the courts which was open to it, and as the former owners of the land could not issue execution against the Crown, they sat with their judgment and no money, and without any appeal on the part of the Crown.

Honourable senators, this is where governments go haywire, steal half a million dollars from some private citizens and sit back and just glare at them. You may think this is not entirely relevant, but it is very relevant to my deep feeling about the use of rules of law in this country. Honourable senators may not believe what followed, even after the activities here in the last week or two.

> In 1961, at the spring session of the legislature, Mr. Bennet introduced Bill 77, which simply decreed that the payment for the taking of this land would be settled in full on payment of the sum of $350,000, that being $200,000 less than the award plus interest. This bill was brought into the Legislature by stealth, a word I hope I used in my opening remarks in the matter before us:

> —without notice to any of the parties concerned, on the last day of the session. It made no reference to the award of the arbitration board, but it did purport to erase any judgment or other action by any court relative to the land in question. The bill was disguised to look like a munificent settlement for the former owners of the land. This happened in Canada, honourable senators.

It is hard to believe. Reading on:

> That bill never became law as an all-night negotiation session in Victoria—with the then Attorney General as, I would suspect, a rather chagrined intermediary between the owners and the premier—resulted in the provincial government increasing the amount it was willing to pay by some $80,000. The amount for which the parties settled was only $120,000 less rather than $200,000 less than the amount which the arbitration board awarded. So this common theft was reduced from the intended purloining of $200,000 down to only $120,000.

When members of the public and others hear us in Parliament and elsewhere having long, acrimonious debates about parliamentary rules and the rule of law, and they dismiss it all as some minor technicality, they would do well to stop and consdier just how important it is that we don't operate our nation under the bludgeon of the despicable type of legislation I am referring to in these remarks, imposed by a provincial or federal legislature with a majority, which has been all too sad a history in our country. One of these people involved in the Parkford Estate, one of the beneficiaries of the estate, was an American, a Californian.

• (1445)

My firm received instructions from the Royal Trust Company on his behalf. His lawyer simply said to us on the phone, "But that's no problem. It is unconstitutional. They can't do that, so why worry about it?" So we had to explain, to our chagrin, that unfortunately a legislature in Canada could do just that, unless guided by some principle such as those handed down to us from England.

To continue:

> You might ask why the owners settled. Well, this whole event occurred on the last day and night of the sitting of the British Columbia Legislature for that session, and consequently the lawyer advising the owners hardly had time to weigh all of the factors involved in seeking redress at the federal level, particularly as such redress had not been forthcoming for a number of years.
> I can only make the comment that I can see no distinction between this type of action by a provincial government and that of common bank robbers, the only difference being that the bank robbers go to jail.
> Now, honourable senators, I will deal with my last example, that being the bill of the present Government of British Columbia to which I referred earlier. I speak for myself, and, I know, for many other British Columbians, when I say that while I do not agree with the economic philosophy of the NDP in so far as it advocates a socialist state, I, at least, looked forward, following their election to the Government of British Columbia last October, to a much higher level of morality in government than we experienced under the Bennett regime. If there is one thing the NDP never tire of, it is asserting their superior virtue. It therefore came as a shock to me and, I know, to Senator Lawson, as well as to many other people in British Columbia, to have the new government not only prove itself no better than its predecessor but actually prove itself worse. While its predecessor liked to pay only what it unilaterally considered to be fair compensation for expropriated property, the new government goes a step further and asserts that there will no compensation whatsoever.
> Honourable senators, if I did not point this out earlier, I should mention that clause 14 of Bill 103, which declares these contracts void, was brought in by the British Columbia government as an amendment on third reading, without notice, which is undoubtedly the reason it passed the legislature without an outcry at that time.

That is another example of stealth such as we had here last Thursday. The bill before the legislature passed first reading, passed second reading and went to committee. The government, on the last day of the session, brought in a one paragraph amendment and tacked it on to the end of the bill just before the session adjourned.

> These few examples I have given, of provincial legislation unchallenged by the federal authority in spite of its clear duty and right to do so, clearly place the Canadian citizen at the level of a citizen of some banana republic, without those protections which are embedded in the American Constitution, on the one hand, not to be overthrown by any politician and which, on the other hand, either through usage or the common law, are available to the citizens of England.

I might comment here on what is commonly referred to as the double standard of political morality which we have in Canada, where the public and the press, and media generally, clearly expect a higher level of public morality at the federal level than they do at the provincial level. This applies to both the conduct of public officials and legislation.

Mind you, I am saying this 20 years ago.

Apart from this double standard, you might ask why there are not examples at the federal level of legislation infringing on human rights such as those examples I have given as being perpetrated by various provincial governments. I say to you, honourable senators, one very good reason is that no federal government in its right mind would submit legislation such as I have given examples of to Parliament, because, even if with a majority government it could ram it through the other place, it would never get it past the Senate. So we probably justify our existence in the area of civil liberties by just being here.

I guess if we are going to continue to fulfil that role, we will have to preserve and protect our own rules above all else.

Let me quote Section 29 of Magna Carta.

No free man shall be taken, or imprisoned or be diseised of his free hold, or liberties, or free customs, or be outlawed, or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed; nor will we not pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by law of the land. We will sell to no man, we will not deny or defer to any man either justice or right.

Senator Austin: Honourable Senator van Roggen, would you permit me a question?

Senator van Roggen: Yes.

Senator Austin: I found the review of affairs in the Province of British Columbia very interesting and restorative of memory. I wonder if you could assist us with the reasons why the Province of British Columbia, the Province of Alberta, and other western provinces were unwilling to place the property rights of citizens in the Charter of Rights during the process from 1980 to 1982. As you know, there were many demands from various parts of Canada to protect the rights of individuals, property rights, and rights against expropriation from provincial governments which had indulged in practices of the kind you have now outlined to us. Could you tell us why we were not able to achieve those property rights in our Constitution?

Senator van Roggen: That is a very good question, Senator Austin. As you can well imagine, having given this type of speech in 1972, I was desperately anxious to see property rights included in 1982. While it seemed to be a common perception, at least by certain people in the business establishment and elsewhere, that this was something to do with Trudeau and, of course, that socialists would not have property rights. It was quite the opposite. Prime Minister Trudeau wanted property rights. I believe I am right, Senator Austin. You were there. They were in the early draft stages. It was Premier Lyon who was outspoken against them, as I recall, but I believe you are right that other western provincial premiers would not go along with property rights in the Constitution.

Senator Austin: Premier Lougheed was also adamantly opposed to the introduction of property rights.

Senator Hatfield: Premier Bennett was for property rights, and the Legislature of British Columbia introduced the resolution, which has now gone by after three years of no action.

Senator Austin: Senator Hatfield, I wonder whether you could add something to the discussions, since you were very much a part of them as Premier of New Brunswick.

Senator Hatfield: Yes, and one who supported very strongly property rights. I think the main reason that we did not get property rights in 1981 and 1982 was, in part, due to the objection from Alberta and Manitoba. But it was also due, in part, to a great deal of concern coming from Ontario in that the several drafts that we looked at were extremely controversial and might have had the opposite effect. Plus, at that time there started to emerge a very strong lobby from active women's groups opposed to personal property rights that might interfere with the Marital Property Act or might take away some of the rights that women believed they had.

I would say that today the strongest opponents of property rights are in Ontario, and among the women's lobby.

Senator Frith: The women's lobby across the country?

Senator Hatfield: Yes.

Senator van Roggen: I think Senator Hatfield's summation is not unfair, from my understanding of what transpired. I wish those rather minor considerations had been set to one side while the great principle of property rights had been enshrined. Certainly, it was the provinces that were responsible for them not being included.

Mr. Garde Gardom was Minister of Intergovernmental Relations in the Government of British Columbia. I have a file containing some correspondence with him on this very subject. He was not opposed to property rights, but he did have concerns about the wording and how it would be done, to such an extent that they were unable to come to grips with it at that time.

After quoting Magna Carta, I went on to say:

It is important to keep in mind that at the time of Magna Carta the reference to the law of the land was not designed to encompass an oppressive act passed by some satrap with majority control over a provincial legislature.

While on the subject of Magna Carta, I might quote Coke, who emphasized that it was the liberty of the subject and not the authority of government which was unbounded.

As Mr. Justice O'Halloran of the Supreme Court of British Columbia sets forth in an article on inherent human rights:

> Few succeeding kings failed to try in some way to place themselves above the law. Complacent Parliaments not infrequently encouraged them to do so.

I will not be so unkind as to try and draw any analogies today.

He again quotes Coke who said:

> Magna Carta is such a fellow that he will have "no sovereign."

Or, to put it another way:

> The divine rights of kings was not ejected in order to put in its place a doctrine of the divine right of Parliament denied by the ancient law affirmed time and again over six centuries.
> The American colonists fought a war for these principles, and the ablest men in England such as Coke, Pitt and Blackstone, upheld them.
> Are we to believe that the Canadian Fathers of Confederation considered these rights forfeited to Canadians? Not on you life. But we are in danger, through repeated federal government inaction, of falling between two stools and having neither the protection of the due process provisions of the American constitution nor the common law protection of England, for this will be the result if we try to live by the British North America Act without employing one of its fundamental tools, namely, the right of disallowance.
> Even the continental system, which developed quite differently from the English Common Law, recognizes fundamental rights of individuals and that famous document of France, The Rights of Man and of Citizens of 1789, specifically included the right to property with liberty, security, and the right to resist oppression. In particular, the 17th and last article of that famous declaration of "the natural inalienable and sacred rights of man" reads:
> As the right of property is sacred and inviolable no man may be deprived of it save by evident public necessity lawfully determined and on condition that a just indemnity be paid.

So 200 years ago in France, at least in that declaration, they managed to do what we were unable to do almost 200 years later.

> The provinces have proven themselves wanting time and again. They cannot be relied upon to maintain the rights of the citizen. Time and again they have been thieves of property, liberty and due process. Democracy and the rule of law are surely strong flowers growing in the garden, but, like any other flower, they must be nurtured and not trampled under foot, and it is the duty of administration worthy of the name in a democracy to leave the garden with these flowers stronger than before; not weaker than before. They are strong enough to withstand the depredations of minor potentates, but they are not strong enough to withstand a calculated and planned program of neglect by the federal authority in Canada.

• (1500)

Honourable senators, I might say that the analogy of tender flowers being nurtured and left stronger when you leave than when you come, should also apply to this chamber and the manner in which its business is conducted and its rules applied.

Reading on:

> Honourable senators, I say it is imperative that the federal government disallow oppressive legislation of these predator premiers such as Smallwood, Duplessis, Bennett, and now Barrett, and the failure of recent federal governments to do so is no precedent to be relied upon for now failing to exercise this clear duty. If the federal government will not do so, then no Canadian citizen lies safe in his bed at night secure in his person and his property.

Then the Honourable Senator Manning interjected. At this point I would like to yield to Senator Bosa.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention to the presence in the south gallery of an Auxiliary Bishop from the province of Udine, in northern Italy, who is visiting Canada for the first time. May I express our best wishes for a pleasant stay in Canada on behalf of the Senate of Canada to His Excellency Pietro Brollo.

Senator van Roggen: I will continue reading:

> Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to make a few comments on the important, and certainly serious, issue that Senator van Roggen has brought to our attention. I am not acquainted with the particular piece of legislation in British Columbia to which he has referred, but if its impact and effect is as Senator van Roggen has described it, I probably would feel just as strongly as he that it is bad legislation, not the type of legislation that should be on the statute books of any province, and I would agree there are probably valid and strong arguments that can be advanced for its disallowance.
> The first point I would draw to your attention, honourable senators, is that in considering an issue of this kind we need to weigh very seriously the negative as well as the positive consequences of federal disallowance of provincial legislation. I can speak as one with some personal experience because, as was pointed out, some legislation of the Government of Alberta, of which I was a member at the time, was disallowed, and also there was the withholding of royal assent in another instance. I draw this to your attention without arguing the merits of the case, but I do point out that in issues of this kind the argument is never wholly one-sided.
> No government, provincial or federal, introduces legislation without some reason which, rightly or wrongly, it considers a valid reason for so doing. If there is a question of jurisdiction involved, the situation is very different from those cases where it is a matter of an alleged infringement of the rights of individuals or of some minority group, even though the power to act was within the competence of the legislature.

In the case of the legislation that was disallowed in Alberta, the jurisdictional issue was the key point. That was a long time ago.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In 1943, was it not?

Hon. Mr. Manning: However, I very well recall the intense resentment, even to the extent of what could be correctly described as public bitterness, at the federal government's interfering in an issue that was held to be within the competence of the provincial legislature. In that case there was the argument that the judgment that it was in their competence was wrong, and it was later held to be wrong by the Supreme Court. But if there is no jurisdictional issue involved, public resentment at federal interference would be much stronger than where it can be established in the courts that the matter is outside the competence of the legislature.

In other words, if the federal government intervenes in situations of this kind, there is no way to avoid the public placing on that interference the interpretation that it is political interference on the part of the federal government with the actions of a duly elected provincial government. It is that aspect of the matter that gives a great depth of seriousness to this whole issue.

Federal-provincial jurisdiction is a very sensitive matter in Canada today. We all can name scores of cases where the provinces have felt there was federal interference in the field of provincial jurisdiction. In fairness I should say that there have been other cases where certain actions by provincial legislatures have caused concern in Ottawa, because of overlapping or interference in the Government of Canada's field of jurisdiction. I simply draw attention to the well-known fact that the whole question of federal-provincial jurisdiction is extremely sensitive in Canada today. We are all aware that one of the greatest threats to our national union is what is frequently referred to as a "growing regional alienation."

Honourable senators, I can think of few things that would cause greater regional alienation under present circumstances than for the Government of Canada to disallow the legislation of any province, not on constitutional grounds but on the ground that they are more concerned with the rights of individuals than the duly elected government of that province.

I simply disagree here with Senator Manning. I think that paramount consideration must be the rights of individuals and not the rights of the elective.

To continue:

We are all aware that the more local a government is the closer it is to its people. The municipal governments are undoubtedly in closer touch with their electors than is the case with any other level of government. The provincial governments are next, and the federal government is the most remote. If you think for one moment that you are going to get the people of British Columbia, for example, to accept the proposition that the federal government is more knowledgeable of, and more sensitive to, the rights of the citizens of British Columbia, than the provincial government they themselves have elected, you are mistaken. I say that, much as I disagree with their government and its philosophy.

In my judgment, if we are really concerned about the sensitive areas that bear directly on the question of the future of Confederation, we ought to think very seriously before we recommend that the federal government should interfere in provincial jurisdictions by actions of disallowance, unless it is a case so extreme that it would be obvious to the great majority of people that there should be such interference. Otherwise, I very much fear that the resentment and the adverse reaction would do infinite harm to the fabric of Confederation, which is already under severe strains today, not only in Central Canada but in Western Canada as well.

I have never held for one minute that upholding the rights of the individual to property or otherwise threatens Confederation.

The Hon. Eugene Forsey's intervention is not too long, honourable senators, and if you will bear with me I will read it. After all, he is a leading authority on this subject, and certainly was back at the time this debate took place. Senator Forsey said:

Honourable senators, I rise first of all to say how glad I am that this matter has been raised, because I think that in a good deal of recent discussion, such as there has been—and it has been rather skimpy on the whole—in a good deal of recent discussion of the power of the Government of Canada to interfere with provincial legislation under the provisions of the British North America Act, the matter has not been dealt with with anything like the thoroughness and the logic, let alone the reference to history, that it might have been and, in my judgement, should have been.

There has been, in my view, too easy an assumption that the provincial governments and legislatures are always right, unless they can be proven to have been flagrantly wrong, beyond contestation by their most ardent supporters and defenders. I think this is perhaps a somewhat oversimplified view.

I am one of those who feel that the dominion power of disallowance of provincial acts, and even the dominion power to instruct Lieutenant-Governors to reserve provincial bills, may yet have considerable value, and more particularly in cases where fundamental human rights are involved. If we could get a bill of rights embedded in the Canadian Constitution, entrenched in the Constitution, so that certain rights would be beyond the power either of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces to interfere with them, then I dare say you could make out a fairly strong case for the abolition of the power of disallowance of provincial acts and the reservation of provincial bills.

Of course, all that has transpired with the exception of the property rights we were discussing a few moments ago.

I say it is rather thin, because the number of times in which the dominion has intervened to protect basic civil liberties is lamentably small. It has intervened much more often, though even then not very often, to protect the rights of property. I am not prepared, myself, to regard the rights of property as resting on the same solid foundation as the rights of the human person. I do not suppose any honourable senators will recall what I said on this subject in discussing the report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution, but I did there, when I discussed that in this house, associate myself with the caveat of the NDP members of the committee that the rights of property were probably not seriously in need of protection in an entrenched bill of rights in the Constitution; that on the whole they could be left to the courts to deal with; that we had no reason to suppose that our courts would be insufficiently tender of the rights of property.

However, very few general propositions in such matters can be laid down absolutely and without qualification, and I should be inclined to say that you could even make an argument—I should not be prepared to go to the stake for it—you could make an argument for saying that even with a bill of rights entrenched in the Constitution and protecting the rights of the person, if you did not include something covering the rights of property, you would perhaps find it worthwhile to retain the power of disallowance in cases where there could be shown to be flagrant abuse of the rights of property.

Having said that, I want to turn more particularly to the subject matter of this inquiry. Senator van Roggen was kind enough to place me in a rather high rank of people knowledgeable in this subject, and I think he rather overdid it. He was kind enough to suggest that perhaps I took second place only to Senator Goldenberg. I am sorry, by the way, to see that Senator Goldenberg has left, as I should have liked him to hear the deferential remarks I am now about to make about him. I should think it highly probable that Senator Goldenberg knows a great deal more about this subject than I do. I should think it is absolutely certain that the present Associate Deputy Minister of Justice, Dr. La Forest, knows more than either of us about the subject. I think he is probably the premier authority on this subject in the whole country. Nevertheless I have a certain degree of knowledge—perhaps, somewhat above the average, shall I say—of this subject, because in the course of my somewhat tempestuous past career, I have had occasion to take part in the movement for disallowance of provincial acts in four cases.

[Senator Manning.]

Senator van Roggen attributed to me alone the petition for the disallowance of the Quebec padlock act. Well, honourable senators, I drew up that petition, but I did it on behalf of a group of people in Montreal, organized as a civil liberties union. I did not have the temerity, myself, personally, individually to draw up such a petition. But I did it in association with a number of other people who felt as I did on the subject of that particular legislation.

● (1515)

Then, later on, I drew up, when I was at the Canadian Congress of Labour, a petition on behalf of that Congress, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and the Dominion Joint Legislative Committee of the Railway Transportation Brotherhoods, for the disallowance of the Prince Edward Island Trade Union Act of 1948, which would have placed all unions in that province, except those confined to the province alone, in a most perilous position, to put it mildly.

Then I helped to draw up for the Canadian Labour Congress the two petitions presented for the disallowance of the Newfoundland labour legislation in 1959. I might add that on that occasion the congress tried first of all to get the Government of Canada to instruct the Lieutenant-Governor to reserve those bills for the signification of the Governor General's pleasure. Our view was that by the time the process of disallowance had ground out its result—and it usually is a very slow process, although not always—a great deal of almost irreparable, perhaps quite irreparable, damage would have been done. We felt that there was room here for the exercise of the power of reservation in somewhat the same way as an interim injunction may be used in proper cases—and there are improper cases—in ordinary legal proceedings.

Anyway, honourable senators, I must say that in all those four cases in which I was active in trying to obtain disallowance, I was as unsuccessful as I was in my attempts to be elected either to the Montreal City Council, the Legislature of Ontario, or the other place. The government in every case declined to disallow. I am inclined to think that possibly in the Prince Edward Island case, the government may have dropped a strong hint to the Government of Prince Edward Island about the situation, because, in the next year, the legislature removed nearly all, if not all, of the obnoxious sections of the act of 1948.

Incidentally, this is an interesting feature of the history of disallowance, that in a great many cases the Government of Canada secured changes in, or the repeal of, obnoxious provincial legislation—obnoxious for a variety of reasons—by saying, shortly before the period for disallowance ran out, by wire to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province concerned, 'Unless your advisers are prepared to recommend repeal or amendment of the legislation,' as the case might be, 'before the period of disallowance runs out, and it runs out tomorrow, we shall be obliged to recommend disallowance.' And that in a great many cases appears to have done the trick. So that the actual number of disallowances is not altogether representative of the effect that this power may have on provincial legislation.

It may be worthwhile, honourable senators, as I have just mentioned the actual number of disallowances, to amplify a little, and perhaps correct in minor ways, the figures that Senator van Roggen gave on the withholding of assent, the reservation of assent and the disallowance of provincial acts.

Honourable senators, I am going to close by appealing to members on the other side to reflect on the fact that I do rise in my place—not as some Johnny-come-lately—on this point of privilege at this abuse of our rules and the rights of individuals in this country. If you are going to change the rules and the law, do it properly. Do not do it by stealth. Do not sneak it in here in 20 minutes in the extraordinary fashion that you did last Thursday night.

I would hope you would think about Senator MacEachen's admonition. Something should be done to regularize this extraordinary event that you perpetrated on Thursday, otherwise the atmosphere of this chamber will remain poisoned for a very long time.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I should like to begin by looking at what is happening in Canada today. I should like to draw to your attention three articles on the front page of the October 10, 1990 "Report on Business" in the Globe and Mail. The first article is entitled, "Air Canada cuts 2,900 workers—Takes other measures to slash costs". The article says:

> Air Canada is laying off about 2,900 employees in an across-the-board cost-cutting measure that will affect everyone from ramp handlers to customer service agents and pilots, an airline union executive said yesterday after a briefing with the company.
> As disclosed in The Globe and Mail Saturday, the Montreal-based airline is cutting some of its money-losing international routes, including those to Athens, Lisbon and Madrid originating in Toronto, and the London-Bombay-Singapore run.

The major jobs being cut include:

> —1,400 workers represented by the International Association of Machinists, including 990 customer service agents and baggage handlers, 350 maintenance workers and 50 in the finance department.
> —425 passenger and reservation agents and sales staff represented by the Canadian Auto Workers.
> —440 flight attendants represented by the Canadian Union of Public Employees, which is currently bargaining for a new contract.
> —225 pilots represented by the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association.
> —265 management-clerical jobs.
> —100 jobs at U.S. and international branch offices of Air Canada.

Michel Cyr, an executive with the union representing 9,000 Air Canada ground workers, said the 'layoffs are a savage reflection of Conservative government policy, which privatized this airline, turned air transportation in Canada into a mess through boneheaded deregulation and has promoted a recession.'

He said Air Canada also is selling its share of Place Air Canada, its current headquarters, and moving to Dorval Airport. The move should be completed by mid-1992. Air Canada currently occupies 10 floors in Place Air Canada, a 26-story building.

Mr. Cyr also said the company will centralize all pilot training in Toronto. Most of the training is now done in Toronto. He said centralizing the training will take place 'in the short term.'

Mr. Cyr said he feared the cuts to his union would affect service to passengers. 'Sure, we're the guys who work with our arms and maybe don't think too much, but we put the baggage on the planes.'

Air Canada began briefing its unions about the layoffs yesterday afternoon. After stock markets closed, the carrier also met with industry analysts in Toronto and Montreal.

Later this week, the carrier will meet with its unions to discuss easing the layoffs by folding some of them into early retirement and attrition.

Air Canada's layoffs come in the midst of an economic slump and, more recently, a crisis in the Middle East that has increased fuel prices by 100 per cent, an Air Canada spokesman said.

For the six months ended June 30, profit tumbled to $6-million compared with $21-million a year earlier. Revenue for the latest period was $1.9-billion, compared with $1.8-billion.

In the House of Commons yesterday, Liberal transportation critic Sergio Marchi said he was concerned that the proposed layoffs would affect Air Canada's competitive position while it negotiates an open skies agreement with the United States.

Federal Transportation Minister Douglas Lewis said last week that the two countries will begin negotiating an open air accord next year that would give almost unlimited access to each country's airlines on both sides of the border.

Some job-cutting became imminent this summer when Air Canada grounded its eight Lockheed L1011s, known in the industry as gas guzzlers, and put them up for sale. It takes between 70 and 90 workers to put just one L1011 in the air—hence just grounding the eight involves several hundred jobs.

The carrier had hoped to counter some of the increased fuel costs through the purchase of 34 Airbus A-320s. The A-320 burns about 40 per cent less fuel than the Boeing 727, which it will replace. In addition, it uses two pilots instead of three, another cost saving.

In terms of its routes, analysts pointed out that the only European money-making routes Air Canada has are London, Zurich, Paris and Geneva. Even the London-Bombay-Singapore route is losing money, thanks to competition from British Airways PLC.

The British carrier attracted many of Air Canada's passengers by using a 400-seat Boeing 747-400 on a direct London-Singapore flight, without a Bombay stopover.

Like Canadian Airlines International Ltd. of Calgary, Air Canada has also been taking a harder look at its domestic routes with a view to cutting out the unprofitable ones and reducing an excess of capacity in the marketplace.

This year, Canadian Airlines took about 5 per cent of passenger capacity on its planes off the market and found that even this was insufficient. At the end of this month, it will finalize its cost-cutting options for the domestic market.

The only thing certain about the Canadian Airlines plan is that it will do less flying in the domestic market, spokesman Mike Dukelow said.

Air Canada actually increased its capacity by 7 per cent between 1988 and 1989, from 21,778 available seat miles to 23,348. The figure is calculated by multiplying the total number of seats available for paying passengers by the miles flown.

The second article I should like to refer to is also on the front page of the October 10, 1990 "Report on Business" in the Globe and Mail. It is entitled: "Housing starts at six-year low." It says:

Housing starts across Canada have slumped to the lowest level in six years, pummelled by high interest rates and recession jitters.

Last month, footings were poured for 12,019 new homes, down 12 per cent from August, according to figures from Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp.

On a seasonally-adjusted annual basis, which provides a clearer month-over-month picture of activity, housing starts slid 16 per cent in September to 137,000 homes. In other words, that many homes would be built in Canada by the end of this year at last month's level of construction activity.

• (1530)

"The market is slowing, there's no doubt about that. Housing is just one more indication of what's going on in the economy," said Mark Burchinshaw, chief economist at CMHC.

Housing starts have been tumbling since the beginning of the year, as expensive mortgages and rocky economic times chased would-be buyers from the market.

But the slide, which has hit every corner of the country, has worsened in the past few months after the three-month lag between falling sales and a pullback on the construction of unwanted housing.

"These starts figures today are beginning to show what has already been the case with housing sales figures," said Peter Andersen, president of Andersen Economic Research Ltd., a Toronto-based economic forecasting company. "The collapse in sales still hasn't been reflected in housing starts."

Home sales dropped sharply when interest rates surged above 14 per cent in April. Between the first and second quarters, starts dropped by 9 per cent, but toppled 23 per cent in the third quarter, with activity in each month getting progressively slower, the CMHC figures show.

Construction of houses plummeted in July, but only recently has the slowdown dampened the pace of building of condominiums and apartment buildings. In the first three quarters of this year, construction began on 63,143 detached houses, about 18 per cent fewer than in the same period a year earlier. At the same time, apartment and condominium unit starts have dipped only 2 per cent, to 60,027.

"Up to now, one of the reasons housing starts haven't dropped more is that multiple units have stayed high, because they were reflecting unit sales made a year ago," Mr. Anderson said.

Honourable senators, I have just received a note asking me to yield the floor to Senator Balfour to recognize some distinguished visitors in the gallery. I am happy to do so.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

Hon. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of Baroness Hooper, Under Secretary of State for Health in the Government of the United Kingdom.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

Hon. Keith Davey: Allow me to continue with my news article on housing:

> "It takes that long for units sold last year to get started."
> Last month's decline was widely spread across Canada and particularly harsh in Quebec, which until recently was only mildly shaken by the slump. Starts dropped 24 per cent in the province last month, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 25,000 homes. A slight rise in building activity in Newfoundland last month was considered anomalous.
> Home builders already strapped for business can expect a second blow from the goods and services tax, which will be implemented at the start of next year if passed by Parliament. A year ago, it was thought that the levy, which tacks a 4.5 per cent surcharge on a new home sold for more than $350,000, would hurry the pace of housing construction before the Jan. 1 deadline.
> But it has not worked out that way. "I think home buyers were too pressured financially," said Mr. Andersen, who expects the builder will foot the bill in the end.
> The rest of this year and the first half of 1991 will be even more dismal for home builders, Mr. Burchinshaw warned. While not as desperate as the heart of the last recession in 1982, when construction dipped to 125,000 houses started, the market, he predicted, will take on 174,000 new homes built this year, and 165,000 next year.
> A more pessimistic Mr. Andersen forecasts that starts could drop to as few as 140,000 homes next year.
> Mr. Burchinshaw is expecting a recovery in the second half of next year, after falling interest rates and restored confidence about the economy lure home buyers back into the market.
> Because the usual demand for new housing in Canada runs at about 200,000 units a year, the oversupply of unaffordable housing now flooding most Canadian cities will be bought up in the next few years when construction slides below the level of demand, he said.

Honourable senators, the third piece of bad news in the business section of today's Globe and Mail has the heading "Financial markets hit with barrage of losses", and the subheading "U.S. budget, oil prices, Holy City killings spread gloom." It is a short story, but it is one that is worth drawing to your attention. It reads:

> World financial markets tumbled for more big losses yesterday, hurt by disappointment over the new U.S. budget package, worries over the Middle East and a litany of other woes.
> The Dow Jones average of widely watched U.S. industrial stocks sagged 78.22 points or 3.1 per cent to close at 2445.54, the biggest loss since August's sell-off following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Canadian stocks, insulated somewhat by firmness in energy prices, fared a little better, but the Toronto composite index still fell 27.36, or nearly 1 per cent, to 3139.50.
> It was a session in which almost everything that could go wrong for investors seemed to happen.
> Crude oil surged to its highest level on record, peaking at $40.95 (U.S.) a barrel in the aftermath of the killing by Israeli police of 19 Arabs at Jerusalem's Temple Mount, one of Islam's holiest shrines. The violence once again put the conflict between Palestinians and Israelis before world financial markets.
> Iraqi President Saddam Hussein reacted quickly to the killings with threatening talk of a new missile with a range of hundreds of kilometres.
> In other financial markets, the U.S. dollar slipped to yet another record low against the German mark . . .

Honourable senators, this is the legacy of Reaganism, Mulroneyism and, with respect, of Thatcherism. It is the legacy of private greed and public squalor, and it makes it possible for us to look back in anger.

When we look back in anger, we look first at the Free Trade Agreement. The Free Trade Agreement, which has all but completed the Americanization of Canada, has been a disaster for an overwhelming majority of Canadian small businessmen.

After free trade, it is almost impossible not to say a word on Meech Lake. I spoke on that topic the other day and I do not want to repeat myself, but I refer once again to the rolling of the dice, to Elijah Harper, who proved what one person in this kind of institution can do, and I come to this, the hated GST. It is so hated that a survey I saw the other day showed that 90 per cent of Canadians do not want it. It is being aided and abetted by eight embarrassed, illegitimate royal senators and, I am sorry to say, a hopelessly flawed Speaker.

I spoke about the Americanization of Canada. I would like to quote from an article that appears in The Toronto Star of today entitled "Foreign takeovers increase to record." It reads:

> Foreign control of the Canadian economy grew rapidly last year with a record number of domestic companies taken over by foreign investors.
> And Investment Canada, the federal agency that monitors foreign investment, says the country needs even more to compete globally.
> Offshore investors acquired some 735 Canadian-based firms employing 105,973 in the year ended March 31, Investment Canada reports.
> Non-Canadians also established 229 new businesses employing more than 7,000 people, the federal agency says in its 1989-90 annual report.
> But the value of new investment pales in comparison with acquisitions.
> Foreigners spent $17.1 billion to take over existing companies, but only $2.2 billion on new businesses.
> The United States was by far the largest source of investment, accounting for 52 per cent of the total, while the European Community represented 27 per cent and Japan 6.4 per cent.
> Critics worry about the increasing foreign control of the Canadian economy and criticize the federal agency for never having rejected a foreign takeover in its five years of operation.
> In the past year, the agency has approved deals that have seen foreign acquisitions of companies such as Connaught BioSciences, R.L. Crain, Lumonics Inc. and PCL Industries, which owns Sklar-Peplar Furniture Inc.
> But Investment Canada does not share the critic's concern about the magnitude of foreign ownership in Canada.
> "In recent years, Canada has attracted record inflows of foreign direct investment—investment that is helping Canada to provide jobs for its citizens and to become competitive in today's global economy" said Paul Labbe, the agency's president.
> Indeed, the agency not only monitors foreign investment, but also promotes the sale of Canadian assets to foreign buyers.
> "Clearly, a positive investment climate in Canada is essential, and the promotion of investment continues to have a central role in addressing the challenges faced by Canada in response to global industrial restructuring," Labbe said.
> Investment Canada last year created an "investment prospecting group,"which attempts to attract foreign investment in both existing and new businesses.
> One of the group's aims is "to convince medium-sized foreign firms in high-technology sectors poised to enter the North American market that their best entry point is through Canada."

That is a story that has been repeated over and over again, the Americanization of Canada. I do not know where it will end. It is so depressing that I thought I would complete my comments on what some may consider an unimportant aspect of the Americanization of Canada, but it is something that matters a lot to many Canadians and certainly to me.

I would like to talk about a national institution in a country—let's face it—that has fewer and fewer national institutions. I would like to talk about a national institution which may very well disappear. If it does, it will be a great loss for hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I refer, of course, to the preservation of Canadian football.

● (1545)

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator Davey: Exactly hear, hear. I think it is an appropriate subject to bring up here because football, honourable senators, is about rules. They have rules in football and they have fair play in football, and they even have umpires in football. That kind of stuff does not apply here, however.

There was a particularly interesting article in the Globe and Mail about Canadian football by Patrick Martin. I am sure some of you may have read it, but some of you may have missed it. It was a very significant article. Mr. Martin stated the problem and then he stated the solution. The problem, which he summed up thusly, is:

> Too few people appreciate the exciting brand of football played in Canada. While CFL ticket sales are up marginally this year, attendance in two of the league's most reliable franchises—Toronto and Hamilton—is down substantially. Torontonians have begun to whisper that the CFL isn't good enough for their "world class" city and yearn for an NFL team, the prospect of which threatens the viability of a better Canadian product.

Does it ever threaten the viability of another Canadian product! If the NFL comes in here, honourable senators, you can kiss the CFL, even in dear old Regina, goodbye. It is something we cannot allow to happen. Let me read the article:

> The best case for preserving Canada's football game was made during a recent telecast of Monday Night Football, the premier showcase of the U.S. National Football League.
> Down 7 - 0 to the New York Jets, the Buffalo Bills took possession of the ball deep in their own end. Eschewing the traditional huddle between offensive downs, Buffalo quarterback Jim Kelly led his team the length of the field in an exciting series of plays.
> When the usually immobile backfield players began deceptive crisscrossing patterns of motion prior to the snap of the ball, veteran broadcaster Frank Gifford remarked that all the razzle dazzle looked "like the Canadian Football League." Indeed. What seemed so atypical in the NFL—the quick pace and men in motion—is commonplace in the CFL, where speed, the forward pass and tricky plays are emphasized.

Buffalo, a city of 1.2 million, will be among the leaders in attendance in the NFL this year, as it has been for the past several years, with close to 80,000 people coming out each week to watch their Bills play right through the frigid month of December. Just 150 kilometres away in Toronto, however, in a community of 3 million, an average of only 29,000 show up for each Argonaut game. In between, in Hamilton, home of the Canadian Football Hall of Fame, only half that many bother to attend Ti-Cat outings.

There is no doubt the Canadian game is exciting. With a wider field, deeper end zones and three downs instead of four, passing and mobility, rather than brute strength, become the most important aspects of the game. The Canadian game has more action that the U.S. version. There is less time allowed between plays and teams must yield the ball to the other side more frequently. (When they do so by punting, the player receiving the ball cannot avoid attempting a runback by merely raising his arm and calling for a "fair catch", a frequent copout of NFL receivers.)

Games in the CFL are high scoring. This season the eight teams have averaged 32 points each a game, while NFL teams average only 18.5 points. And most games are very competitive. One quarter of all the games played so far this season have been decided either in overtime or by three or fewer points. The game is frequently determined in the final seconds of play and often involves dramatic, come-from-behind victories.

I am sure Senator Barootes will remember this:

Last year's Grey Cup championship match, won by Saskatchewan over Hamilton, in the final two seconds of play—

Remember? The final two seconds! One of the most exciting football games I have every seen!

—was one of the most exciting football games played anywhere.

I digress to say that, for the last number of years, the Grey Cup has been far more exciting than the Super Bowl, game after game after game, year after year after year.

Despite all this, however, the game is perennially plagued by fan indifference. Low attendance caused the Montreal franchise to fold three years ago, and at one time or another has threatened the viability of almost every team in the league. Last year it was Ottawa and Calgary that had trouble making ends meet; this year it is Toronto, with the biggest market and most lucrative television sales, and Hamilton that are in trouble. And while 68 of the league's 72 regular-season games are being televised, the TV audience has declined considerably as well.

Reflecting this apathy, the league gets pitiful display in the sports pages of many Canadian newspapers, usually buried beneath more extensive coverage of the U.S. game, and the pecking order of television sportscasts often relegates CFL news to a place somewhere between golf and horse racing.

Behind this indifference lie several factors:

The mistaken assumption by non-viewers and marginal viewers that the Canadian game is inferior to the U.S. version;

The lack of hype that surrounds the league and its broadcasts;

The difficulty fans have in identifying with and following the performance of teams and players.

Points number one and two can be tackled together. The CFL must realize it can never compete with the NFL on its own terms. The monstrous U.S. media have made the game a larger-than-life extravaganza—the annual "Super Bore" to determine the NFL champion, is heralded as the second coming—and that is something Canadian television is unable to do. However, the CFL can use its marketing dollars to emphasize not its similarities to the NFL but its distinctive features.

By selling the Canadian game as "boutique football", something for "the truly discerning fan," it may make the game more fashionable and thus appeal to a wider, status-conscious audience (the kind of folk who make it impossible to obtain a ticket to the Toronto Blue Jays baseball games.) The game itself will continue to appeal to the true football aficionado.

To block out the game's identity crisis, however, requires a new formation.

The high turnover of players is one problem. Each summer, many of the previous year's participants are replaced or traded. In addition, and more damaging, many players will be replaced midseason, usually with individuals cut from the later training camps of NFL teams. As a result, the group that takes the field one week may be an entirely different bunch from the next, and the confused fan may find it impossible to get to know "his" team.

While CFL franchises must be free to choose the best squads possible at the beginning of each season, there should be a restriction on the number of players they are able to "airlift" in mid-season. CFL teams are already permitted practice rosters and reserve lists (players intended to be standbys for injured regulars) and the team should be limited to those players alone for the duration of the season. While such a practice would leave several talented football players idle after being cut by NFL teams, it might well ensure that, in the future, such players try out for the CFL squads in the first place and develop a greater loyalty to the team and to its fans.

The lack of identifiable Canadian players is another problem. CFL rules restrict each team to a roster of 37 players, of which 14 may be "imports". However, three of the other 23 players are designated as quarterbacks and may be either imported or Canadian. In practice, this has meant that U.S. players have filled the highly-visible role.

Larry Uteck, a former CFL star and coach of the fine St. Mary's University Huskies in Halifax, believes the CFL has missed a golden opportunity by not requiring each team to carry at least one Canadian quarterback. "I don't think there's any doubt that what the average fan wants to see is local talent playing the game." Mr. Uteck's own quarterback, Chris Flynn, is regarded as one of the best players at the position to emerge from the Canadian university system. Yet he is unlikely to be offered a chance to play in the CFL and develop at that position.

Legislating a Canadian quota at the quarterback position, however, may not be the answer. Frank Cosentino, another former CFL player and head of athletics at York University, argues that the league's mostly U.S.-born managers will continue to favor their American quarterbacks.

A better approach would be reduce the overall number of imports each team is allowed, perhaps to ten, with no exception for quarterbacks. Since no manager would likely want three of this number tied up in one position, he would opt for Canadian talent wherever possible.

The CFL also has penalized its own fans with its illogical "black-out" rule. In an effort to encourage attendance at the stadium, the league does not permit games to be broadcast on television in the home team's market.

That means that if Ottawa is playing the Argonauts and I am at home in Toronto, I cannot watch the game. No wonder the league is in trouble.

Instead of boosting ticket sales, the rule has distanced fans from their own teams. Removing this misguided incentive would increase fan loyalty and, most likely, boost attendance at the games as well. Television networks have made clear their attitude toward the rule. CTV has said it would like to return to broadcasting CFL games, but refuses to do so until the black-out rule is dropped.

Honourable senators, in baseball—

Senator Frith: Now we are on to it: baseball!

Senator Davey: I am a baseball fan. Let's face it, I am a Blue Jay fan!

Senator Grafstein: What about hockey?

Senator Davey: I am a hockey fan, too, but the fact is that when baseball came to Toronto, immediately it was a success and immediately every game went on television and immediately the place was sold out, so you can see virtually every Blue Jay game, home and away, in Toronto, and the place is consistently sold out. That is the message for the Argos, for heaven's sake, and the CFL. That is the point this gentleman is making, and he is right.

[Senator Davey.]

Finally, in an effort to ensure telecasts of as many games as possible, the league spreads its schedule of games too thin. Attempting to have games on as many days as possible means a team will play on a different day almost every week. While this means that games can be viewed on three or four days each week, it leaves the casual fan lost as to when he might find his team playing.

On this point, the CFL should borrow a page from the NFL's playbook. NFL games are concentrated on one day, Sunday, with a single game available on Monday night. Fans have no difficulty knowing when to watch and schedule their weekends accordingly.

The CFL should adopt a similar approach, and hold three of its four weekly games on Saturday. One network could broadcast a game played in the East starting at 1 p.m. Eastern Time, another could broadcast a game in the West, three hours later, and yet another could have the option of broadcasting a third in the evening. The fourth game could take place, and be broadcast, on Friday night. This way, almost all games could be telecast, viewers would have a wide selection to choose from, press coverage of the games would have a greater impact, and, most importantly, fans would know exactly when to watch.

None of these recommendations would affect the way football is played in Canada—there is no need to change that. They would, however, make it a lot easier for Canadian fans to enjoy the game and, in so doing, make sure that it continues to be played in this country.

Honourable senators, I only wish to add a few additional remarks. I note that at the end of the article the writer sets forward his solution. He says that, first, the CFL should eliminate mid-season replacement players.

Senator Lefebvre: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Davey: Certainly.

• (1600)

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Davey, I have listened very attentively to your remarks, especially the last part about your great love of the Canadian Football League and the Toronto Argonauts, and your belief that everything should be done to encourage Canadian players having very prominent roles in Canadian football, but yet you explain the threat of the NFL and the downward trend in attendance in almost every city which has a CFL franchise.

At the same time, you have also impressed me over the years, and I think everybody knows this, with your great love of the Toronto Blue Jays which has set attendance records this year and you do not seem to have any problem with that. To my knowledge, they are all American players, and you do not have any problem with Toronto playing in the American Baseball League, using all American players, setting all kinds of records. I think the attendance is up to 4 million, if I am not mistaken.

Senator Davey: An all-time record.

Senator Lefebvre: It is an all-time record for professional baseball. Yet you are trying to keep the CFL alive. Why do we not promote a Canadian baseball league instead?

Senator Davey: Am I ever glad to have that question.

Senator Grafstein: May I ask a supplementary question?

Senator Davey: No, one at a time. Senator Grafstein knows more about brain surgery than he does about baseball and I absolutely cannot take a question from him.

The solutions advanced in the Globe and Mail article are as follows:

1) Eliminate midseason importing of players.

2) Reduce the number of imports at all positions to encourage the use of Canadian quarterbacks.

3) Concentrate CFL games on a single day (Saturday) with one feature game on Friday evening.

4) Eliminate the blackout rule.

5) Actively promote the game's distinctive features.

In responding to your question, in a sense I do not have a conflict of interest, but a conflict of knowledge. As you know, I was a former Commissioner of the Canadian Football League and I wish to talk about that for a moment or two.

Senator Lefebvre: Go ahead and tell us about that.

Senator Davey: I only wish to say, when major league baseball came into Montreal with the Expos and came into Toronto with the Blue Jays it destroyed absolutely nothing. It created enormous coast-to-coast national interest in baseball. Throughout Canada there are more kids playing baseball than ever before.

I remember going to a Blue Jays game with my leader, Senator MacEachen. I remember being surprised at his knowledge of amateur baseball in the Atlantic region back when he was a kid. Anyone from western Canada knows about baseball, and even in Quebec baseball has been extremely popular. It is a sport that has been popular for more than 100 years. When major league baseball came in here it destroyed absolutely nothing.

On ther other hand, if the National Football League comes in here, it will be the end of the Canadian Football League. It will be the end of Canadian football. Ladies and Gentlemen, if the NFL comes in here, you can kiss goodbye, senator, to football in Regina, you can forget football in Hamilton, and I am afraid that you can forget football in Ottawa. There will be an NFL team in the SkyDome in Toronto. But it will be the end of the Canadian Football League and we will have American football players in Canada. It will be tragic.

Yes, we need more Canadian baseball players. As a matter of fact, the Blue Jays have a guy from Cambridge, Mr. Doucey, who had an extremely fine September and may likely start in left field at the beginning of the season. The Blue Jays and the Expos are systematically looking for Canadian players, and I think they will find some.

I will not do it, but I could write a list of the beautiful people, friends of mine and many of them friends of our friends across the way, who are absolutely slavering at the prospect of putting together the money and bringing an NFL team into Toronto. Of course, it will be productive and a lot of money will be made by a lot of people. The type of people that bring that type of money to the table are not particularly the friends I have.

Make no mistake, the move is on to destroy Canadian football. The first step will be to put a team in Toronto, the second step will be to put a team in Vancouver, and then you can kiss Canadian football goodbye. I do not think that is something we can allow to happen.

Honourable senators, I think that the Government of Canada has a role to play in making sure that it does not happen. The World Football League was prepared to come in here and Mark Lalonde passed legislation which made it impossible for the World Football League to come into Canada. This has not been done by our friends opposite. I used to ask questions in Question Period and I have stopped asking. However, I do believe the surest way of protecting Canadian football, an institution in a country which has so few national institutions, is through actual support from the government across the way. Do I expect them to act? No, I do not expect them to act. More greed, more power, more money. Those are the things that will carry the day. It is not fair.

That brings me back to why I am here and why I want to speak today. We are all concerned about fairness.

Yes, I was a Commissioner of the Canadian Football League. Yes, I resigned as a Commissioner of the Canadian Football League. Perhaps all of us should know when it is time to resign.

Senator Buckwold: Will the senator take a question?

Senator Davey: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: Some of us are casually interested in baseball and some of us are casually interested in football, but as red-blooded Canadians most of us are interested in hockey and I have not heard you talk about hockey. I would like your reaction and ideas on what is happening to our Canadian game of hockey as it is becoming Americanized. As the American influence is moving along, new teams are being planned for the U.S.A. My home city of Saskatoon has been trying for years to get a National Hockey League team. Believe me, we will pack the rink, just like our Senate gets packed.

Canadians across the country are beginning to get a little worried. I would appreciate your wisdom on what we can do to save Canadian hockey?

Senator Davey: First, hockey is difficult for me to talk about because I am a league fan. You know the old story about why will they not give Hamilton a professional hockey team and the answer is because Toronto will want one. You touch a valid point, and it is a very important point, particularly now at the very time the National Hockey League is about to expand. There are several Canadian teams anxious to be involved in the expansion, in particular Hamilton, and more particularly, as far as I am concerned, right here in Ottawa. But you can bet dollars to donuts, and I am sorry and unhappy to say this, but Ottawa will not get a team, Hamilton will not get a team, and no Canadian city will get a team because the name of the game is marketing and money, and the marketing and money is in the big American markets. For example, there is a team in San José.

I always believed that a sport would be popular anywhere where the kids cannot play it. So when you talk about hockey in Atlanta, it was a bust. Whether it will work in San José, I do not know. The market is so big in Los Angeles that it will work there.

I am sorry, Senator Buckwold, that there is not a franchise in Saskatoon. I think there was an honest effort by a group of entrepreneurs to make it happen. One of the greatest critics of the project was a friend of mine, Harold Ballard. I am not afraid to say that Harold Ballard was a friend of mine. He was. He was a very questionable character and he had lots of things about him that were not very attractive, but there were many things that people did not know about him that were exceedingly attractive.

I well remember taking a flag to Maple Leaf Gardens that had flown on the Peace Tower on the same date as his 80th birthday. I was allowed into a board meeting where I presented the maple leaf flag to him. I told him that this maple leaf flag had flown on the Peace Tower today. Mr. Ballard broke down and cried. Indeed, at the funeral, there was this flag.

Ballard was a colourful, bombastic, difficult, oft-times impossible character, but what is wrong with this country is that we do not have enough characters, and we need a few more.

I must say, Senator Buckwold, that was I very anxious to have a team in Saskatoon and it was an honest attempt. But it will not happen, because in professional sport the name of the game is money. The big bucks are in marketing and those are in the big cities in the States. I think we are lucky to have the Canadian teams we have, and fortunately most hockey players are Canadians and it is a very successful and healthy industry for us here in Canada.

I will take Senator Grafstein's question, if he wants to ask it now.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Davey, I do know a great deal about brain surgery. But I think I probably know a touch about baseball through marriage. My late father-in-law was one of Canada's greatest baseball players. It was through his influence that I picked up some limited knowledge. I really do not want to contest the superb knowledge that you have, senator, but I rather question your patriotism and your sense of nationalism. You paid a greater allegiance to American teams than to the Canadian team, the Expos, which was established prior to the Blue Jays. Why is it that you maintained your allegiance to an American team well after a Canadian team was established, since you are known as a fervent Canadian nationalist?

Senator Davey: Senator Grafstein's reservation is, of course, right on. I was a passionate, ardent New York Yankee fan, but that was when there were no Canadian baseball teams. At the time of the World Series, I was not working for Mr. Pearson, but I casually asked him who he liked in the World Series. He asked me who I liked and I said that I liked the Yankees. He was dumbfounded, because Mr. Pearson was a National League fan and he was quite annoyed at me.

Honourable senators, I hope my friends opposite will allow this story because it is such a Liberal story. The first year I was here as the National Director of the Liberal Party, I came here in May, 1961, and in the fall there was a World Series. The party had headquarters in an old house on Cooper Street, and some of my friends will remember that. I put four television sets around the room so the staff and everybody could watch the ballgame. Needless to say the old guard, which I am now but was not then, was shocked out of their minds and immediately marched up to Pearson and said what a terrible thing this guy has done, he has put in television sets for the World Series. They were absolutely incensed. The next afternoon Mr. Pearson came down to the ballgame and sat in the office with me and we watched the second game of the World Series. That is a great story, because he was a great baseball fan.

I remember giving him a copy of what I think is the best baseball book ever written. I would recommend it to anyone here who is interested in baseball, and that includes my friends opposite. That is The Boys of Summer by Roger Kahn. It is a book in which Kahn deals with the Dodgers at the time he was a kid. In the second half of the book he deals with those self-same Dodgers when he was grown up. As he points out in the book, most of us are luckier than baseball players. Baseball players die twice; the rest of us only die once. When Mr. Pearson was no longer the Prime Minister, I remember taking the book to his office and telling him it was a terrific book and that he must read it. I have never forgotten. He told me, "I read the book; Marion has read the book, and God knows she is not a baseball fan".

I have another Pearson story to tell, and then I will stop telling them. This is a story about when he went down to one of the first Expo games after his eye operation. I remember that in those days his great friend was Mr. Stanfield, who called on Mr. Pearson regularly when they were both in their earlier and older retiring years. I remember at the particular game in question the umpires were brought over for Mr. Pearson to meet. Mr. Pearson said to the head umpire, "I am ready to play in your game now." The umpire said, "What do you mean?" Mr. Pearson replied, "I just lost my eye". That is Pearsonian humour.

I do not think that I have too much else to say except in confirming what Jerry says about his father-in-law. His father-in-law was one of the most important and significant minor league baseball promoters and players in all of Canada. There is no doubt about that. However, none of that rubbed off on Jerry.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Dalia Wood: Honourable Senators, I too rise on a point of privilege since my rights have been eliminated in this Canadian institution. So go the rights of the people who pay our salaries.

We may well go back for centuries of history into any other country but ours, because it always seems that it was such a long time ago and so far away. In other words, it cannot happen now or ever in our history. But, honourable senators, it does happen from time to time in our midst. We are now battling taxation without representation. Our George III is none other than our own Prime Minister who is asking for a Boston Tea Party. Eventually he may succeed, but in the meantime, he has virtually destroyed the Canadian Senate and the Canadian perception of a benevolent monarch. Eventually he may succeed, but he has in the meantime virtually destroyed the Senate—

Senator Hastings: Honourable Senator Wood, I am trying to follow you. I wonder if you could go a little slower so that I can understand you—quite a bit slower.

Senator Wood: In other words, you want to hear every word.

Senator Hastings: Because it is so very important.

Senator Wood: Canadians of my age have grown up through periods where their civil rights were compromised. But let's not keep pushing our luck. For instance, there were the Japanese on the West Coast, my own community of Italians in Montréal and elsewhere in the 1940's, Duplessis' "padlock law", Bill 101, and the crowning joy of the notwithstanding clause being applied over individual rights of Canadian citizens.

As we look around this chamber in our air-conditioned and plush comfort we see the murals above us, I would like to quote a line from Colonel McCrae:

"If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields."

Are we guarding our inherited institutions or keeping the faith by circumventing duly inscribed procedures—those procedures emanating from the Magna Carta which was proclaimed on June 15, 1215? Yes, it was at Runnymede that the legendary and the evil King John was forced to sign the Great Charter of Liberties. Many countries, including Canada, the United States and Australia owe these foundations of justice and juries to this development over 700 years ago.

We normally accept this heritage with complacency as an acquired right; one which no one can set asunder. We may ask ourselves how many countries have permanently or from time to time lost their parliaments simply because they allowed internal usurption of its integrity.

When in 1215 the Archbishop of Canterbury, with a group of citizens, confronted the evil King John, they knew with whom they were dealing. In fact, they forced the King to have the Great Seal attached to many copies of the document which they then distributed throughout the realm. There are still four copies in existence today. "Just a parchment," an anarchist may say, just as a flag is only textile.

Consequently, other than historic value, that is just what these items could become if we continue to compromise on democratically instituted rule, regulation, customs and tradition. Magna Carta then was nothing, more or less, than the assertion by the people that the monarch, too, must be under the law and must govern according to the ancient customs, rights, and liberties of the realm. In other words, it was a proclamation that England was not an absolute but a limited, or constitutional, monarchy.

The main task of Cromwell, for instance, was to overcome the general feeling in the army that neither the King nor the parliament could be trusted. When under pressure from the rank and file, General Fairfax lead the army to the Houses of Parliament in London. Cromwell still insisted that the authority of parliament must be upheld. In September, he also resisted a proposal in the House of Commons that no further addresses be made to the King.

Just over a month later, Cromwell took the chair at meetings of the General Council of the army which included representatives of private soldiers known as agitators. He assured them that he was not committed to any particular form of government, and had not had any underhanded dealings with the King. On the other hand, feeling anarchy, he opposed extremist measures such as the abolition of the monarchy. But all Cromwell's efforts to act as a mediator between army, parliament and king came to nothing when Charles I escaped from Hampton Court Palace.

Cromwell now hoped for pacification, a political settlement and social reform. He pressed through an act of oblivion, but the army became more and more disappointed with the parliament. It believed that the members were corrupt, and that a new parliament should be called.

Once again, Cromwell tried to mediate the two antagonists but his sympathies were with the soldiers. When he finally came to the conclusion that parliament must be dissolved and replaced, he called in his musketeers. On April 20, 1653, he expelled the Members from the House. He asserted that they were corrupt and unjust men and scandalous to the profession of the gospel. Two months later he set up a nominated assembly to take their place.

In his speech on July 4 Cromwell told the new members that they must be just and, ruling in the fear of God, resolve the affairs of the nation.

Cromwell seems to have regarded this little parliament as a constituent body capable of establishing a puritan republic. But just as he considered the previous parliament to be slow and self-seeking, he came to think that the Assembly of Saints, as it was called, was too hasty and too radical. He also resented the fact that it did not consult him. Later, he described his experiment as choosing saints to govern as an example of his own weakness and folly.

Do we sense a Cromwell on our present stage? Do we recognize similar saints at our stage of democratic parliamentary evolution? When Cromwell's first parliament met, he justified the establishment of the Protectorate as providing for healing and settling the nations after the civil wars. Arguing that his government had prevented anarchy and social revolution, he was particularly critical of the levellers who, he said, wished to destroy well-tested institutions whereby England had been known for hundreds of years. He believed that they wanted to undermine the natural majesty of the nation, as well as make the tenant as liberal a fortune as the landlord.

Do we recognize any levellers on our present stage? Cromwell required all Members of Parliament, if they wished to keep their seats, to sign an engagement to be faithful to a protector and to parliament, and to promise not to alter its basic character. Except for 100 convinced republicans the members agreed to do so, but were still more concerned with rewriting the constitution than reforming the laws as desired by the Protector. As soon as he could legitimately do so, Cromwell dissolved parliament.

Does this not remind you of a possible similar situation with our allegedly legal senators sitting among us? What agreements did they make with the Protector? Will this also become a precedent in the new rules of the rump Parliament? All of this happened within the first 30 years of the Magna Carta.

As if that were not enough, Charles I had to get into the act. He was charged with high treason against the realm of England. He at once refused to recognize the legality of the court because a king can not be tried by any superior jurisdiction on earth. He therefore refused to plead, but maintained that he stood for the liberty of the people of England. The sentence of death was read in 1669. This, honourable senators, is simply to say that no one can be above men's law or God's law.

Canadian citizens have both inherited and fought to maintain their concept of rights and freedoms. Our monarch is presumed to sympathize and to defend this very right. Nowhere are these symbols more apparent than in this chamber. It is here on the Speaker's Chair that our unelected regents have addressed the Parliament of Canada. It is here that the unelected Governors General deliver the Speech form the Throne. It is here that an unelected honourable senator is named to the most responsible role as Speaker of the Senate of Canada. Honourable senators are also unelected, and I shudder at the thought that the ghost of King John is trying to avenge his unwilling signing of the Magna Carta, thereby setting democracy back 700 years.

It will take a royal, or republican, commission to unscramble the wholesale upheaval of our sacred institution, or something or other that cannot be reached by anyone. In the meantime, I feel sure that our citizens will want some light shed on the mess before either Her Majesty, the Governor General or an official Speaker be allowed to assume the seat of the Speaker of the Senate.

The Speaker, rather than acquiesce to the dubious actions of the Governor General and the Queen, should make it his business to investigate the intrigue, obtain the correspondence and report back to those honourable senators who care. Hopefully, some of the Tory senators will support me in this vital quest.

[Senator Wood.]

I would now like to refer to some notes on the function of the Senate.

> The chief function of the Senate is the consideration of all legislation placed before Parliament. Such legislation could originate in the Senate itself or be received from the House of Commons. The review of legislation passed by the House of Commons may result in its being rejected or amended by the Senate. If it is amended, the legislation is sent back to the House of Commons with a request that consideration be given to suggested changes.
> While members of the Senate may introduce legislation that is considered desirable in the best interest of country, they are not permitted, under the British North America Act, to introduce measures that impose any tax upon the people, or appropriate any part of the public revenue. Such legislation must be introduced in the House of Commons.
> The legislative procedure that is used in the Senate is the same as that employed in the House of Commons . . . In addition to formal discussion or debate on legislation, the Senate makes extensive use of committees in its work. Standing committees of the Senate conduct inquiries on important subjects such as immigration and labour, natural resources, public health and welfare, and external relations. The efforts of Senate committees are of considerable value, as they provide a thorough investigation of a given subject and pave the way for future legislative action either in the Senate or in the House of Commons.

● (1630)

> It was said by Sir John A. Macdonald, the first Prime Minister of Canada, that the Senate represented 'the sober second thought in legislation'. Over the years, the Senate has frequently exercised its right to reject or amend legislation passed by the House of Commons.[1]

The footnote reads:

> [1] Recent examples are the rejection of the bill to declare vacant the position of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and the referral of the Customs Tariff Bill to the House of Commons for proposed amendments.

It goes on to say:

> In such cases, of course, the Senate takes into account the fact that members of the House of Commons are elected by the people. If a legislative measure was apparently conforming with the wishes of the people themselves, the Senate would undoubtedly approve it regardless of the opinions of its members.

The Rights and Responsibilities of the Citizen

> Our Canadian political system is based upon the principle that government is the servant of the people; that the individual citizen has worth, not only to himself and his family, but to the community at large. These facts have led to the recognition of certain basic rights or, as they are usually called, basic freedoms that are intended to protect the individual from injustice and to ensure to him the greatest possible measure of liberty . . . .

Full recognition of these rights is not always achieved even in Canada. We have had occasions in our past when attempts have been made by individuals and groups to deprive others of their rights; when discrimination in such matters as employment and accommodation arising from race, colour or religion has been practised in Canada.

It becomes apparent, then, that it is the duty of every person in a democracy to defend these rights with vigour and determination, both for himself and for others regardless of race, colour or religion. Failure to do so may result in their loss for all.

There are times in the life of the nation when, for reasons of national security, the exercise of some of these rights or freedoms may be suspended or curtailed. In time of war, for example, it would obviously not be in the best interests of the country to permit unauthorized persons to move freely about military areas, or to allow newspapers or individuals to publicize the movements of troops or ships. Restricted movement and censorship may thus be imposed. Even in these extreme circumstances, the approval of the people's representatives in Parliament is necessary before the limitations may be imposed. Such curtailment or suspension of rights is, however, temporary and public pressure will be exerted, if necessary, to have such restrictions removed when the state of emergency is over.

Basic Responsibilities [of Canadians]

It is said that for every right enjoyed by the individual in a democracy there is a corresponding responsibility. While this statement is over-simplified, it is nevertheless true that persons living in a democratic state such as Canada must be prepared to accept numerous responsibilities if democracy is to thrive and flourish. Let us now examine the nature of these responsibilities.

(a) Respect for the Rights of Others—As we have seen, democracy lays particular emphasis upon the dignity and worth of the individual. Over the centuries, various rights have been acquired by the individual which allow him to seek the greatest possible measure of personal freedom, safety and contentment.

It becomes evident, therefore, that in the enjoyment of our own rights we must constantly have regard for the rights of others. We must remember that the responsible person exercises moderation in asserting his rights, and has every reason to assume that others will do likewise. For example, if we expect to enjoy the right to worship in the church of our own choice, and to practise our religious beliefs without fear or interference, then we must be prepared to recognize and defend the freedom of others to differ from us in their religious beliefs and practices.

If we place proper emphasis upon the dignity and worth of the individual, then we must of necessity grant to all others the same rights as we hope to enjoy ourselves—regardless of their race, colour or creed. We must be ready to protect every man from injustice if we are to have assurance that our own rights will be respected and preserved. It may be said, therefore, that respect for the rights of others is a primary responsibility of all persons living in Canada.

(b) Respect for Law—Society itself has, of course, taken steps to protect the individual from injustice. The strength of public opinion has led to the passage of laws that are designed to safeguard our rights and to deal with the offender. It becomes the responsibility of every person in a democracy to respect such laws and to practise their observance.

Such respect and observance of law does not mean that we must accept any law without question or argument. We may question the wisdom of any law, but we must, at the same time, abide by it. We may, for example, not agree that fifty miles per hour is an appropriate speed limit on a public highway. We may actively campaign through our elected representatives, through public meetings and by other legitimate means to have the law changed. We must, nevertheless, continue to observe the speed limit until it is changed by law or suffer the consequences of our act . . . .

I should like to quote from Professor William McKechnie:

> The chief function of the . . . (Senate) is to interpret the will of the people, not to oppose it. They claim the right to stand at times between the Electors and the Elected; to protect the voters from the actions of the servants they have appointed when these servants seem inclined to disobey instructions, or to go beyond the terms of their Commission. They claim the further right, under certain circumstances, not only to protect the people from their servants, but to protect them from themselves. They consider it their duty to delay the passing of ill-digested measures. This is practically to exercise the function of appealing from the Electors in the past to the Electors in the future, thus affording the constituencies an opportunity, under the influence of second thoughts, and perhaps of fuller information, of tempering their impetuosity by discretion. The Upper House thus throw out Bills, not because of its own estimate of their intrinsic faults, but also because of doubts as to how far the Commons have accurately interpreted the instructions received from their constituents at the last election, and if so, whether these instructions may not be modified at the forthcoming one. That such a function is at times useful hardly admits of doubt. The exact direction of its usefulness is, however, somewhat changed in recent years, in consequence of the encroachments made by the modern Cabinet on the independence of the House of Commons . . . The [Senate] is the only barrier—a frail one, mayhap—that offers resistance to the framer of the Cabinet, unrestrained and uncontrolled.

But while the ... Senate of Canada, has the power to delay, by refusing its consent, the passage of Bills approved by the House of Commons, the Constitution provides means by which such power of delay should not be unreasonably exercised ...

The question now is whether the judgment of the [Senate] is not merely to modify, but to annihilate, the whole work of the House of Commons, work which has been performed with an amount of sacrifice of time, labor, convenience, and perhaps health, ... The issue which is raised between a deliberative assembly affected by the votes of ... millions of people, and a deliberative assembly occupied by many men of virtue, many men of talent, is a controversy which, once raised, must go forward to its issue. No doubt there is a higher authority ... It is 'the authority of the nation, which must in the last resort decide.'

There are three conditions under which legislation reaches the Senate—

1. Legislation arising directly out of the policy of either Party on which it was sustained at the polls.

2. Legislation submitted to Parliament in the interval between elections, on the responsibility of the Government, which was not announced on a Party platform nor discussed before the electors.

3. Private legislation submitted by a Minister or private Member.

In regard to each of these three groups, the obligations of the Senate are of unequal force. Presumably, every measure contained in the first group has the endorsation of a majority of the people, expressed through the ballot-box, and binding on both Houses of Parliament—on the Senate equally with the House of Commons. Nevertheless, it may be the duty of the Senate to withhold immediate sanction, or even to negotiate with the sober second thought of the people for a modification of the terms in which the House of Commons rendered its voice articulate; but to ignore indefinitely public opinion would be for the Senate to belie its origin as a trustee for the people, and invite anarchy, if not revolution.

Looking over the whole field of legislation since Confederation, it is remarkable how few in number were the measures approved by Parliament which had the previous sanction of the people. In this category I am unable to find more than five of first-class importance, namely, The Admission of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island into Confederation, The National Policy, Vote by Ballot, and the Construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

With regard to the second group, the Senate may properly take greater liberty. It fully recognizes that a Government exists by public opinion, and that it has the right to draw on that opinion, as on a bank account, till its credit is exhausted or further securities deposited. It remains, therefore, for the Senate to consider whether drafts made on the responsibility of the Government will be honored by the people, and so it takes the precaution sometimes to refuse its endorsation to a Government draft, or to reduce it in amount, so as to afford reasonable certainty that it will be met by the people at the proper time. When a Government measure is designed merely to regulate the business of administration, or to reform abuses or to redress grievances, of which the Government is likely to have fuller knowledge than any Member of the Senate, such a measure may be accepted with confidence, as the greater knowledge possessed by the Government is a substantial guarantee of its utility. No jealous fear that it would strengthen the Government politically should intervene. To allow such sentiments to prevail would be, as was said of Burke, 'to give to Party what was meant for mankind.'

It is worthy of notice that the legislation passed on the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown is often of equal importance with that which public opinion has sanctioned in advance. In fact, the greater part of the legislation on the Statute Book has no other source, of which the following may be taken as examples: The Confirmation of the Washington Treaty in 1871, The Franchise Act in 1885, The Railway Act in 1883, Preferential Tariff in 1887, The Transcontinental Railway Act in 1903, The Admission of Alberta and Saskatchewan into the Union in 1905, The Agreement with the United States for the Reciprocal Exchange of Certain Products in 1911, and the Naval Bill in 1912-13.

The third group requires but little comment. It has no public opinion to support it, and only its merits can commend it to the Senate. Private legislation, as a rule, is very limited in its scope. It derives its importance chiefly from some private object, such as the incorporation of companies for purposes of gain, public utility being a secondary consideration. In dealing with such legislation, the Senate is practically a jury, called upon to decide according to the evidence submitted on behalf of the interests concerned.

But the question here naturally arises: Is Parliament in duty bound to wait for the call of this mysterious autocrat—Public Opinion—before it enters upon any new field of legislation, or should it act on its own initiative and direct public opinion in its aspirations toward the goal of a higher national life and achievement? To assume that the Senate and, for that matter, the House of Commons is in duty bound to watch the variations of public opinion, as a navigator watches the barometer, would be to rob both Houses of their individuality, and often to prejudice their judgment. And while both Houses are bound to keep step with all the progressive tendencies of an intelligent democracy, neither House should surrender its judgment at the dictum of the theorist or the alarmist. The claims made by Edmund Burke before the Electors of Bristol for a perfect freedom of action as a Member of Parliament may with equal force be made by every Member of the Senate. Mr. Burke said:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication, with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion, his high respect; their business, his unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasure, his satisfaction, to theirs, and above all ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own.

● (1645)

> But his unbiassed opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure, no, nor from the law and the Constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you not his industry only, but his judgment, and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion . . . To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of all constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear, and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions, "mandates" issued, which the Member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote and to agree for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience—these are things utterly unknown to all laws of this land, and which arise form a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our Constitution . . . Parliament is a "deliberative" Assembly of "one" nation, with "one" interest, that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices, ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a Member indeed, but when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a Member of Parliament.

To finish, I would like to quote from one of my favourite poems by Sir Walter Scott.

LOVE OF COUNTRY

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land;
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned,
From wandering on a foreign strand?

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to the question of privilege that has been raised, but before I do I would like to say a word of appreciation to all the staff, in the Senate—the people who are reporting our words here and transcribing them downstairs, the pages, the security staff and everyone here who has been so impartial, pleasant and tolerant, given what has been going on. It is very impressive, and I think senators on both sides appreciate what they are doing.

Last week, shortly after the Speaker ruled so arbitrarily on our rights to vote, I was so angry at the betrayal by my friends opposite, people who apparently did not care and who connived in this unprecedented removal of the rights and privileges of people whom they often refer to as colleagues, that, I confess, I was scarcely coherent. Now, like so many of the honourable senators on this side who have spoken before me, I remain even more convinced, with each passing day, that what the Speaker did in taking the ruling he did was so appalling—and it is being perceived as being appalling—that it says two things: First, that we have absolutely no confidence whatsoever in Senator Charbonneau, his rulings or in his ability to be impartial and fair, and, second, that this lack of confidence only grows with every passing hour as his error is compounded by what is now going on in the chamber and on the other side.

The government seems to believe that Canadians do not understand the parliamentary principle involved here, but that is not my experience. I have received many letters over the last few days, and I would like to read into the record two handwritten letters I received from people whom I represent from Toronto-Taddle Creek. The first came on the weekend. It says:,

> I was shocked and appalled at yesterday's events in the Senate. It is hard to believe that Mulroney's Government can have such a cavalier attitude to due process and the rules of our parliamentary system. It does indeed seem that we have a dictatorship on our hands. How can even a majority government behave in such a manner without consequence? How can they simply ignore the lawsuits against them and deny the power of the Supreme Court over them?
> I am outraged and offended by the conduct of this government and I would like to do something about it. I plan to write to our M.P. and to phone various offices about this, hoping that I am merely part of a wave of concerned and outraged Canadian voices. It seems that not just the GST but justice and the honour of our country are also at stake here.

It goes on to say that if there is anything she can do, to let her know, and it is signed Jackie Isaac. A second letter, also from Toronto and addressed to me personally reads:

> I just wanted to write this short note to let you know I fully support your actions against the GST. How ironic for a government to scream about democracy when it used closure every step of the way to get the GST through the House of Commons.
> Brian Mulroney will go down as the worst Prime Minister of Canada. He has done more to damage this country than I ever imagined.
> Keep up the good work and best of luck in your fight against the GST.

It is from Brian Altwasser.

What has led us to this situation is an attempt on the part of members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, in reporting to this house, to reflect the views heard from coast to coast in opposition to the goods and services tax. I would like to read some of the letters that have arrived in the past few days and hours from people across the country. Here is a letter from Edmonton, Alberta, which says:

> You might be interested to know that in an hour-long, province-wide CBC phone-in program, Wild Rose Forum, on Friday, September 28, there was not even one caller who supported Mr. Mulroney's bid to swamp the Senate. The program guest, Conservative M.P. Jim Hawkes elicited a sense of exasperation, anger and even a rage in some ccallers by his asinine attempts at defending Mulroney's political manoeuvring.
> Many thanks for your attempts in killing this tax to date. We wish you complete success in your quest.

It is signed Ray Lapatka. Here is another letter, also from Alberta, from Dr. Ross Harris M.P. It reads:

> Dear Senator:
> I wish to address the issue regarding passage of the Goods and Services tax. It is clear that the people of Canada have spoken eloquently against this tax and I wish to add my voice to the populace in hopes that democracy will reign and the Senate will vote against passage of this bill.
> With the latest Gallup poll indicating that only 15 per cent of the people support the Conservative government, which has tried to shove this tax down our throats, I think this is the time to show Canadians that the Senate does have an important role to play in the workings of government. I only wish that the mechanisms were in place that would allow the Senate to have a vote of confidence and remove this undemocratic governing party from power.
> As a former Conservative, now Reform Party member, I applaud the Liberal Senators who have stood their ground, and listened to the people of Canada. I congratulate the Senate for performing an integral rol in preserving democracy in Canada.

Another letter is from Ms. Maxine Gardiner in Tilbury, Ontario, who writes:

> Dear Senator:
> As a loyal citizen of this blessed nation I have watched and had to stand by while it literally self-destructs without having any recourse to prevent it. I am concerned and indeed very angry at recent developments.
> The present bill before members at this time, in my opinion, will not serve the majority of the citizens of this nation. The GST is a horrific headache for a great number of ordinary working people and will be a hardship for families. A lot of ordinary Canadians, including children, that I talk to, are dismayed and worried about what is occurring in their country and are at a loss as to how to proceed.

[Senator Marsden.]

> The Conservative Party, itself, is treading a very thin line, the anger of the Canadian public is very close to the surface. The present government has used subterfuge under the guise of leadership which is unforgivable. The present government's promise received in September of a tax credit or rebate in December 90 and April 91 smacks of a pay off to citizens and is an insult to our intelligence.
> As a citizen, I therefore encourage and support the actions and stand taken by members of the Senate. Please continue your stand in regard to the GST. DO NOT ALLOW IT TO PASS THE SENATE AND BECOME LAW OF THE LAND.
> I know this places you in a very difficult position, but I do encourage you to hold your ground and uphold the integrity and dignity of the Senate.
> The Free Trade Agreement was and is a disaster, and the GST would add insult to injury.
> Good Luck and Long Live the Senate.

Here is another one from Alberta.

> Dear Senator:
> The people of Canada have at times been characterized as a docile group willing to accept the decisions of others in high places to decide their fate. It is with pride that I have observed our country rally against the proposed GST bill. While my own knowledge of the economy is limited, the evidence is irrefutable that the people have spoken. They do not want passage of this bill. If one good thing can be said about the GST bill, it is that it has heightened the awareness of Canadians. In fact so much that the latest Gallup Poll indicates that only 15 per cent support our present government.
> This is supposedly a democratic country and the people have spoken. Let their voices be heard in the Upper House. Show the Canadian people that they can be heard, and that the Senate has an important part in the democratic process.

That letter is from Miss Nadine Harris. Some honourable senators will have received different letters, but I received today a particularly imaginative letter with a small package. It has a picture of the Prime Minister on the front with one of those cancellation signs over the GST. It is in a Tory blue box. When you open it you find that there is an eraser, a pink pearl eraser with a caricature of the Prime Minister on it. The letter reads:

> Dear Fellow Canadian:
> It is indeed with great pleasure that we enclose, for your edification, a wonderful new therapeutic device designed to relief the symptoms of an over-taxed pysche.
> With the needs of the common man in mind . . .

I am sure the author meant the common person.

> . . . we have developed this magnificent new product so that, in times of anger and distress, he can vent his spleen.
> Governments have, for too long, been over-taxing our patience as well as our pocket books and a universal rage > is emerging. The proposed new Goods and Services Tax (GST) is the last straw for many upstanding citizens.

> Now we offer the opportunity to focus that frustration and act vigorously to exorcise it. The GST eraser offers the ability to harmlessly eradicate, mutilate and humiliate the perpetrators of yet another level of taxing bureaucracy.
> The eraser also highlights an urgent need to be recognized by government and that is to "Earn Respect and Save Extra Revenue." We are asking our elected politicians to please heed the warning—squander this extra money and they too will be erased.
> Sincerely,
> A Frustrated & Concerned Taxpayer.

It is good to know that Canadian citizens are innovative even in times of distress, rage and frustration.

We heard in committee a great many people from the province I represent, and they have very serious economic concerns. When finally we get to the debate on this bill I intend to put on the record in more detail evidence of what the people of my province had to say. However, I wish to bring to your attention its impact on one very important industry in the province of Ontario, and that is the horse industry. One of the great protesters against the GST has been the Honourable Frank Drea, a former Cabinet Minister in the previous Conservative Government of Ontario who, as I am sure every Conservative member and Conservative senator knows, is dead set against that tax because of what it will do to this very important industry. He has written to me several times. At a later date, as I say, I will put his views, which are forceful and detailed, on the record. This afternoon I would simply quote from Joe Burke of the Ontario Harness Horsemen's Association, who wrote:

● (1700)

> The proposed GST, if applied to race horses and horses bred for racing, will deal a devastating and crippling blow to an agriculture-based industry which is already plagued by economic and other problems. Consequently, it is vitally important that, for the racing industry to continually grow, as it has done under the exceptional leadership of Mr. Frank Drea and others, the selling and claiming of race horses must be exempt from the proposed GST, as are all other livestock animals.

And he goes on. Well, Mr. Burke, like virtually every other witness who came from a particular industry or sector, wanted an exemption or a zero rating or an amendment, which, in most cases, seemed entirely justified. Of course, if all those exemptions were granted, there would be no tax proposal left.

One of the very important issues, which I hope the government is pondering, is what are the better alternatives to this tax, which, if implemented, will do so much incalculable damage to the economy of the country, to working people, and to people on fixed incomes in particular. There are several good, workable, reasonable alternatives. Many of them are described in the Report of the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee which we have yet to debate.

I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators this afternoon an executive summary of a much longer and more detailed document prepared by Professor Jack Mintz, Professor Thomas Wilson and Professor Peter Dungan of the University of Toronto, who are not against a consumption tax but who have a splendid econometric model which the tax department knows all about and uses from time to time. They have worked out an alternative which their evidence indicates would save the $200 million which, if this tax passes, would be taken out of the economy in administrative costs, and yet generate the revenues the government needs.

Honourable senators, I am not saying that I think this is necessarily the best form of taxation. What I am saying is that it is a less damaging form of the government's proposal. In other words, this is the most reasonable sort of approach and I would like to describe it to you. Professors Dungan, Mintz and Wilson say:

> The . . . GST is arguably the most important tax reform measure to be adopted in Canada since the early 1970's. Many tax practitioners have widely supported the Goods and Services Tax as a significant improvement over the federal Manufacturers' Sales Tax . . . which is subject to a number of difficult problems.
> As noted by others before us, the most important advantages of sales tax reform largely flow from the abolition of the MST. The advantages associated with the abolition of the MST include:
> 1. The elimination of most of the federal sales tax burden from capital goods and exported goods. The existing federal sales tax system applies to many business inputs and to certain capital goods.
> 2. Equivalent treatment of imports of goods and domestically produced goods. The MST base typically includes marketing costs of domestically produced goods but not imports.
> 3. The reduction in the variability of effective consumer tax rates on most products induced by the MST.
> The replacement of the MST by a direct tax on consumption would realize all the above potential gains. However, the proposed GST, which is an indirect tax on consumption, is sufficiently flawed that many of the potential gains arising from the abolition of the MST are lost by adopting the current proposal for sales tax reform. These flaws arise from the design of the GST which fails to tax all goods and services purchased by consumers at the same rate. In particular, these flaws include:
> The GST is complex. Although the government attempted to have a broad-based GST, it provided for the special treatment of certain goods and services for political reasons: food and housing.

I might add, honourable senators, that many Conservative senators at those hearings indicated that they agreed with the witnesses that additional special treatment should be given, and very reasonably so.

> This requires consumers and businesses to identify goods and services that are tax-free, exempt, partly taxable and wholly taxable. In addition, serious difficulties arise with the taxation of shipping, tourism, financial intermediation and services provided by competing private and public sectors. Experience in other countries would lead us to believe that future governments may introduce more rather than fewer categories of exempt goods and services or even introduce multiple rates of tax. The GST may eventually come to mimic the complex VAT systems adopted in Europe and many developing economies with high costs of compliance.

These professors are particularly concerned about compliance rates.

> The GST is not Compatible with Provincial Sales Tax Systems. The co-existence of two broad-based, non-harmonized commodity systems in Canada at the federal and provincial levels creates additional administrative problems. Brazil, for example, is a federal state with two existing VATs operating at both federal and state levels. With the lack of coordination arising from the existing of two systems, Brazil has experienced extreme administrative difficulties in collecting its commodity taxes.

Those senators who have had the benefit of the excellent brief from Professor Robin Boadway of Queen's University on interprovincial tax problems in this country will know that the situation will be worse in this country than in Brazil. The brief goes on:

> Even if the provinces adopt the GST as a substitute for their retail sales taxes, the private sector will face considerable compliance costs if the provinces do not fully adopt the federal base. If provincial and federal sales tax bases are harmonized in this manner, provinces would have to give up independent sales tax policy, something they could be very reluctant to do.

I stress again that anyone interested should read the longer brief.

> Equity and the GST. With the planned sales tax credits and tax-free treatment of food and medical services, the GST will be progressive across the lower income ranges. However, for families earning more than $30,000, the GST is not progressive—indeed, it is regressive for the higher-income groups whose expenditure on goods and services as a proportion of before tax income is less than lower income groups.

They illustrate this in a chart to show their point, and the point is made very clearly. The total effective marginal tax rate, including both income taxes, GST and sales taxes paid by a person earning additional income is fairly constant at incomes above $30,000. The tax rates are also quite high, above 50 per cent once the GST and other indirect taxes are taken into account.

[Senator Marsden.]

Their next point concerns the problems of harmonization with the United States, and they say something we have heard from many people:

> Much concern has been expressed with respect to tax harmonization of the income tax system with the United States. Yet there is little concern about similar harmonization of the commodity tax system. The introduction of the GST will maintain considerable disparity of U.S. and Canadian commodity tax rates, in that U.S. sales tax rates are typically about one-third of current Canadian rates. With the Free Trade Agreement, continued differentiation in commodity tax rates will make cross-border shopping more attractive for Canadians.

Honourable senators, anybody who was listening to the Hamilton and Niagara radio stations this past weekend will have heard that the lineups to get across the border were 3, 4, and 5 hours long. Canadians are already going south of the border to shop. What will it be like if that tax comes into effect? This is a very serious problem in all the areas close to the border where, of course, the majority of Canadian citizens live. Canadians are not dumb shoppers. They are going to go where they can get lower prices. They stop, they pay the duty, and, even with all of that, they say they are experiencing a bargain. So this problem of harmonization is serious, not only for tourism, where it is really quite awful, but also for day-to-day life.

Their next problem concerns inflation and the GST.

> The most optimistic forecast is that the GST and abolition of the MST will increase prices by only 1 1/4 percentage points. These forecasts, however, do not take into account the degree of non-competitiveness in some industries and the fact that some sectors are regulated. It may also take time for some companies to adjust prices for the abolition of the MST that is indirectly added to the costs of buying goods and services from other industries. Even a 1 1/4% price shock at the time of high interest rates and a slowdown in the economy is not welcome. This is particularly true with the apparent unwillingness of labour to accept the initial cut in real wages induced by the GST.

I draw to your attention, honourable senators, to the mild and academic language in which this is written. This is no group of protesters. These are scholarly economists with a great deal of experience and many years of studying the Canadian economy. They are very worried about these effects and are trying to come to grips with the alternatives. The brief goes on:

● (1715)

> A common reaction to the above criticisms of the GST is to acknowledge some problems but argue that the GST is better than any other alternative available to the government.

The authors of this brief disagree. They propose an alternative that, in their view, would be better than the GST. Their proposal for sales tax reform is formulated with the idea of achieving many of the efficiency gains, and then some, but avoiding administrative costs and complexities of the GST. This alternative includes:

> Abolish the MST.
> Raise federal personal income tax rates by increasing the federal surtax, effectively increasing typical marginal tax rates by 3 to 5 percentage points at each bracket.
> Increase savings incentives in the personal income tax by instituting an investment income deduction of $1000, and increasing RRSP limits by 10% over and above planned reforms.
> Increase corporate tax revenues by reducing the manufacturing and processing deduction, and increasing the rate and broadening the base of the large corporations tax.
> The proposed system eliminates the indirect federal sales tax burden on all capital goods and exported goods and avoids differential effective tax rates on consumer products. It also achieves a more equitable distribution of tax burdens, makes our commodity tax system more harmonized with the U.S., avoids the complexity of running a new tax system . . .

They do not embroider here on the financial, psychological, and stress savings that that would have for virtually every small business and many larger ones.

> . . . and replaces the adverse price shock induced by the GST with general price reductions.
> The virtue of this proposal is that it does not increase the tax rate on savings since it moves the income tax system closer to one based on expenditures (income net of savings).

Their fifth point is a comparison of the macroeconomic effects of this alternative with the 7 per cent GST and they provide in their brief charts giving visual documentation of the macro economic effect of their alternative. They state:

> . . . the alternative proposal would reduce consumer prices by a significant amount, whereas the 7% GST would increase them. Because of the adverse price shock, the GST has a dampening effect on real output. Clearly the favourable long term effects of sales tax reform would involve the serious transition costs.
> By contrast, the economy adjusts more smoothly under the alternative proposal and favourable real output effects are realized earlier.

Their next point is: The favourable price shock from the abolition of federal sales tax would provide some room to manoeuvre for the Bank of Canada.

> The achievement of the lower rate of inflation would entail less real output loss in the near term if sales are reduced, rather than increased.
> If the GST is implemented, it's adverse macroeconomic effects could be eliminated if the rate is set at 5% rather than 7%.
> In addition, a lower rate would permit some simplification of the tax and would facilitate future federal/provincial cooperation on a national sales tax.

Now, honourable senators, that is the mildest of all possible briefs one could have.

When the witnesses were asked in committee about reducing the tax or adjusting it, or what would be the best thing for the Senate to do, they said, "Kill it."

Some weeks have gone by since they appeared, but I have kept in touch with these witnesses, whose brains are among the best in the country. I checked with them very recently and they still say, "Kill it". Increasingly heartily they say to kill this tax. They say conditions are worse than one can imagine.

Honourable senators, far from being able to kill it, we have not been able to get to the debate of the report. First, because the senators opposite filibustered so that the report could not be tabled and, secondly, because of two actions which have outraged those of us on this side of the chamber, the first being the section 26 senators, a highly dubious manoeuvre now before the courts, about which others have spoken, and the second being the unbelieveable, arbitrary, tyrannical ruling from the Chair on our right to vote.

These two actions indicate to many of us that this tax must be much, much worse than anyone thinks it is, if the government is so desperate to get it through without debate and at the cost of parliamentary rules and traditions so that no one will know what it is all about. That, of course, is why we are here debating privilege today.

Many people have talked about the nature of democratic politics. In my view, one of the best Canadian discussions comes in the dissenting statement of Albert Breton to the Macdonald Royal Commission on Canada's economic prospects which, as everyone knows, was tabled in 1984, long before these events.

I would like honourable senators, especially those opposite, to hear what Albert Breton, a distinguished economist, thinker, and contributor to the nature of Canadian society and to discourse in it had to say. He talks about the situation that now faces us. He disagreed with many of the recommendations of the royal commission and has added a supplementary review. He says:

> I hold with considerable conviction to the notion that the mechanisms which discipline and constrain democratic politics, especially democratic politics in federal states, operate with as much force as those which discipline and constrain economic life. That is not a widely shared view, though it is one that is gaining ground. The traditional and more conventional view is that economic mechanisms are so constraining as to be essentially deterministic, while politics, being the exercise of power, can be set in motion or stopped, as it were, at will. In that view, politics is always capricious and beyond rational explanation.
> To my knowledge, Commissioners . . .

He is referring to the other commissioners on the royal commission..

> . . . never held to the traditional view of politics, but it is fair to say, I believe, that neither did most of us accept the notion that political mechanisms are as constraining as economic ones. Over the last two and a half years, our views of politics, and especially of democratic politics in federal systems, have moved quite far away from the traditional concept . . . However, in my opinion, the movement has not been sufficiently great. In a way, that is understandable because breaking away from traditional modes of thought, even in the face of dire necessity, is never easy.

Here, honourable senators, he puts forward a clarification and an extension of the theory of democratic politics in federal states, a theory which he calls the "theory of competitive federalism". He provides a brief but more extensive analysis of the mechanisms of competitive federalism, indicates some reforms that are necessary if we wish these mechanisms to more efficient, and draws a few implications of the theory for key issues. He says:

> I insist that there is still much research to be done in this area and many problems to be resolved. However, I believe that what can be defended seriously at this moment should be present in the debates which the Commission's Report no doubt engender.

Honourable senators, I am not going to give you the benefit of all of his views. I hope and trust that honourable senators will have read all three volumes of the royal commission report. This appears in Volume III.

I do believe it is important, on this question of privilege, to draw to everyone's attention this view of what the nature of democracy is about. As you will recall, Albert Breton had a lot to say about Senate reform, which is very useful. He says:

> It has been and, to a large extent, remains conventional wisdom that the two pillars which define Canada's political institutions—parliamentary government and federalism—lack congruence. That view springs from an a priori abstract and formal definition of what constitutes parliamentarism to which is added a no less abstract and formal notion of federalism. The presumed lack of congruence has had enormous influence, not only on the way Canadians think about politics, but also on the way they have conditioned the evolution of their political institutions. It is true that for almost a century and a quarter Canadian parliamentarism and federalism have co-existed in more or less harmonious fashion, but the general tendency . . . to set parliamentary institutions and federalism in opposition or, if not, to view them as separate and unrelated to one another, is at the root of many of our difficulties.
> From the beginning of their history as a country to the present, Canadians have reflected on their political institutions with one eye on the United Kingdom and the other on the United States. England was and remains a unitary-parliamentary system, while the U.S. was and is a federal-congressional structure. Hence the following questions: Could a federal-parliamentary system work? Should priority be given to parliamentarism or to federalism? With which one of these two pillars is democracy more closely associated?

● (1730)

Honourable Senators, I depart from Professor Breton's statement in the hope that someone will draw this document to the attention of the new Senator Twinn, whose remarks as reported in the press today indicate that he might appreciate some help sorting out his thoughts on the nature of the history of Canadian political institutions, as well those in the United States. In fact, I will send him a copy myself, as he is not here with us today in the chamber.

Breton goes on:

> I wish to argue that parliamentarianism and federalism are congruent; that the issue of having to give priority to either in opting for democracy is a false one; and that it is possible to reform our national federal institutions in ways that increase their effectiveness, while remaining true to their fundamental genius. A clarification of these issues is necessarily an intellectual exercise, one which requires the selection of a particular language. Being an economist by training and by preference, I feel more at ease formulating and discussing issues, even those outside the traditional frontiers of economics (problems of politics and of society, the traditional domains of political science and of the other social sciences), in the language of that discipline. At the same time, such a strategy makes it easier to draw on the powerful methodology of economics. There is, finally, a third bonus that comes from stating the issues of politics in the language of economics: it makes it easier to go from political to economic real life questions and issues and makes it easier to formulate a theory of politics that is "compatible" with economic theory.

Honourable senators will have read, I am sure, the quite penetrating analysis of Canadian Society that Albert Breton and his brother Raymond gave in a series of lectures at the University of British Columbia a number of years ago which is the forerunner of the document to which I am referring. It has had a great influence on the way in which Canadian social scientists at least, as well as American social scientists, think about their country. I discussed Breton's argument recently with a professor of law at Yale University.

Breton goes on:

> Parliamentary (that is, responsible or party) government was not designed. It evolved in response to pressures and influences applied first to monarchs by powerful interests and then, throughout history, to those in office by new emerging centres of power. The dynamics of parliamentarianism are appropriately, if somewhat summarily, encapsulated by the expression "elite accommodation".
> There is not much competition (or not many "checks and balances": the kinds of behaviours associated with > political competition within governments, as distinguished from competition between governments) in such a system.

That is a comment which applies exactly to our situation here this afternoon.

> There are, of course, the checks and balances that come from powerful interests, whether economic (like business and labour, though these are not usually of equal strength), religious (churches), intellectual, (academics and research organizations), and so on. There are also checks and balances that come from Question Period in the House of Commons, from the log-rolling that takes place in caucus and from public opinion. Finally, and very importantly, there is the competition that originates in the requirement of popular support elicited in contested elections at more or less regular intervals.
> All in all, however, competition is quite weak, especially when Cabinet is supported by a good parliamentary majority. The weakness of the checks and balances that come from the lack of separation between the executive and legislative branches is aggravated by the "independence" of the judiciary, an independence which is reflected in the doctrine of "parliamentary supremacy", as contrasted to the doctrine of "judicial review"...
> A necessary implication of the foregoing is that the preferences, aspirations and opinions of the public, unless they are adopted by the power elites, are not likely to be represented as vividly as they would be in a system in which competition was more vibrant. This overly schematic description of parliamentarianism would be even more incomplete if I did not immediately add that the system is susceptible to improvements. The system is capable, as history documents, of absorbing further checks and balances, while at the same time remaining faithful to its own virtues and genius.

I would suggest that over the last two weeks we have seen a new vibrancy within the existing potential of checks and balances.

> The Report contains recommendations which go in the direction of improving competition, such as those aimed at removing budget secrecy and at reforming the Senate, recommendations that I support, although I will have more to say on Senate reform below. But one could go further. I would suggest that in addition serious consideration should be given to finding ways of reducing party discipline in the House of Commons and, to the extent that it exists, in Parliamentary Committees as well, for all matters, except budgetary ones. If that was done—slowly, but deliberately—the power of elected representatives would be increased, their ability to voice the opinions of their constituents would be enhanced, and the capacity of constituents to influence governments would be augmented.

Honourable Senators, what could be more desirable in today's situation in which constituents from coast to coast are asking to be heard by their government. I have said this earlier. It has been written to us in letters. We have received petitions and phone calls. What would be more desirable than to enhance the capacity of constituents to influence governments? What could be more desirable for the government, in fact, if it would only listen?

Breton goes on:

> "Responsible or party government in unitary states, however fine-tuned to better reflect the preferences of citizens, remains a weak mechanism in the performance of the task I have just noted. But when responsible government is married to federalism, that job is done much more effectively. I must hasten to add that some marriages are more successful than others and that some federal structures are better designed than others. I will explore these issues in the pages that follow and indicate what I believe are the ingredients of a good federalism and of a good marriage of federalism with party government. However, the central proposition holds: parliamentary government combined with federalism give the citizens of a country a more effective set of institutions for reflecting their will, preferences and aspirations. Responsible government is democratic government; but responsible government plus federalism is extended democracy simply because there is more competition.
> I must, therefore, address two preliminary questions: How does federalism introduce more competition in any system of government, more particularly, in a system of responsible government? Is competition a "good" thing, that is, something we should want in our political institutions? These questions are answered."

These questions are answered. On the question of competition, Professor Breton goes on to discuss economic theory. He looks at models of optimal competition, as well as at the theories of Adam Smith, price competition and enterpreneurial competition, also called Austrian or Schumpeterian competition, which he discusses and which I hope if you are interested you will read. However, I am sure that you all understand it.

He goes on to state:

> It is not an accident that the extension of the analytical tools of economics to politics was initiated by Schumpeter (although Machiavelli and John Stuart Mill, among others, had anticipated the possibility): it was a natural outgrowth of his work on enterpreneurial competition. Politicians, in that view, are enterpreneurs who compete for resources by introducing new politics, by developing new forms or organization, by heralding new unifying symbols, by structuring a new social consensus, et cetera. Recent writers have characterized enterpreneurial competition as "alertness to opportunities". If that is a good definition of enterpreneurship, it cannot be limited to the realm of economics, but extends naturally to politics and to other areas of life. To be sure, the "modus operandi of competition" will vary between business and political enterpreneurs, but their behaviour will have enough in common to be called competitive.

> Having said that, it must be recognized that not much is known about competitive processes. Earlier, in referring to intra-governmental competition—the competition between political parties, between the executive, legislative and judicial branches of government, between the various departments and bureaus that constitute the bureaucracy of a particular governmental unit, such as that of Quebec or Saskatchewan—I used the American expression "checks and balances". These words correspond to more or less specific and precise behaviour and are useful in characterizing that kind of competition. In his study of American Capitalism, Galbraith used the evocative term "countervailing power" in an effort to describe a particular process of competition, and others have gone on to say that . . . To illustrate, if the federal government chose to subsidize post-secondary education by giving money directly to students instead of giving it to provincial governments, these latter could "complement" by targeting their spending on education more closely to their own priorities, or "countervail" by taking the money away from students.
> This area of study is in its infancy. I cannot therefore associate particular competitive processes with the various kinds of enterpreneurial competition that I will discuss below.

He used the term "checks and balances from intra-governmental competition" and the word "competition", having in mind enterpreneurial competition for politics but no particular behavioural process. He then goes on to discuss federalism. He is particularly "cogent and scathing in his discussion of what is commonly referred to as cooperative federalism.

● (1745)

He makes a point about the real world complications:

> . . . a federal state can be formally defined as a type of political organization in which there are at least two levels of jurisdiction . . . between which the entire set of constitutional powers is divided. The assignment of these powers between the governmental levels is not made by one level alone. That distinguishes federalism from confederalism, a system in which the assignment of powers is made by the provinces alone, and from unitary states, structures in which powers are assigned by senior governments acting in isolation. According to that definition—and it is useful to clarify what he means,

> —Canada is and has been a federation and never a confederation.

He goes on to say:

> The Canadian provinces, on the other hand, in their relationship with their municipalities, are unitary states.

That distinction is important when discussing the subjects of taxation and how Parliament operates.

> The division of powers and the mode through which it is effected define federalism well, albeit in a way that is too formal to be very useful in understanding how such a system actually works. From that point of view, what is much more important are the implications of any division of powers for the operations of, and relationships between, the governments of the federation, all of which are responsible governments. The central and most important implication is that in the search for popular support—something that is as needed for the effectiveness of governing parties as revenue is essential for the effectiveness of business firms—the governments of a federation will find themselves competing with each other. Federalism thus adds more competition to that already present in responsible or party government.
> . . . Political competition is not something that politicians choose or want, whatever their commitment to federalism and, more broadly, to liberty and to democracy. In that respect, they are exactly like business entrepreneurs who do not want competition either. Competition arises from the necessity to respond to the actions of others; it is 'forced' on people by the environment. One does not even have to be aware that one is competing to be competitive. A business firm that adopts a new technology to reduce its costs is acting competitively; . . . someone who supports a particular social movement or a particular lobby is competing; as is the politician who seeks harmony with provincial governments by removing the contentious questions from the agenda of federal-provincial encounters.
> There is so much mystification about this that I must dwell on two corollary points, at the risk of seeming to insist on the obvious for those who have seen their way clear on the subject. First, there is the whole bag of issues that are best summarized by the words 'co-operative federalism'. What is co-operative federalism and how is it to be distinguished from other types of federalisms? To my knowledge, the expression has never been formally defined. That may not be a lacuna because all we have, from practical experience and observation, a good intuitive idea of what is meant by these two words. Two or more persons working together to lift a heavy object; two or more persons engaged in a search for something lost; two or more persons removing snow from a road; these are examples of the kind of behaviour we have in mind when we think of co-operation. In other words, someone helping someone else achieve a certain goal or objective.
> Co-operative federalism by analogy would exist if all the politicians of a federation worked together to achieve some collective end. Instead of working on their own for their citizens, governments would work together for the betterment of all 'the people'. Before examining what is meant by co-operative federalism in more detail, I would like the reader to ask him or herself why it is that we do not, as societies, organize the search for justice on a co-operative basis, but instead set defence against prosecuting attorneys in courts of law? Why do we not organize the working of party politics on a cooperative basis, > but instead pit political parties against each other in grand electoral contests?

Or, indeed, in contests elsewhere?

> Why do we not organize the search for truth on a co-operative basis, but instead require scholars and scientists to compete for research funds and for limited space in research publications? And, finally . . . why do we not organize the production of goods and services on a co-operative basis, but instead implement laws that make co-operation an offence?
> These examples underline the fact that in some areas, co-operation is not an efficient principle of social organization and that it is less efficient than competition, essentially because co-operation can easily degenerate into collusion, conspiracy and connivance and that this not necessarily good!

We all have reason to know about collusion, conspiracy and connivings in this chamber, and we know it is not good.

> In the case of federalism, would co-operation be a better principle of social organization than competition? . . . To answer the question, it must be recognized that co-operative federalism is aimed at removing the competition which is a natural by-product of federal organization. Consequently, to be able to answer the question, it is necessary to know whether competition is a 'good' feature of political organizations.

Before describing whether, in the view of Breton, co-operation is a good feature—and I will anticipate his words by telling you that he believes cooperation is not good and competition is better—let us hear what he has to say about the question, because he stresses that the notion of cooperative federalism is part and parcel of a politics of elite accommodation which plays such an important role in the dynamics of party governments.

> Indeed, in practice, co-operative federalism is nothing but executive federalism. This has been defined by Smiley 'as the relations between elected and appointed officials of the two orders of government in federal-provincial interactions and among the executives of the provinces in interprovincial interactions'.

In this country we know that executive federalism has been discredited after what we went through on the Meech Lake debate.

> The executive federalism contemplated by co-operative federalists, however, effectively extends to all the areas of federal-provincial contact. I transfers to executive and bureaucratic bargaining and negotiation what properly belongs to the realm of the political.
> Co-operative federalism does not necessarily eliminate federalist competition, but by moving it into executive and bureaucratic offices and corridors, it mutes its public manifestations and its effectiveness. The heart of co-operative federalism is secret deals, not the stuff on which a lively democracy thrives! There are other implications of the doctrine of co-operative federalism;

He mentions two:

> A first is a by-product of drumming into the psyche of Canadians the belief that federalism is or should be co-operative.

Honourable senators, a great many Canadians objected to what went on in this chamber last week because, as Breton tells us, for generations it has been drummed into our psyche that we must be nice and cooperative. Well, honourable senators, this testimony from the Macdonald Commission is made abundantly clear, and I hope it is understood by all Canadians that what was being engaged in was competition, competition that allowed the views of Canadians that are not really heard under the elite accommodation.

Breton argues that we have had drummed into our psyches the beliefs that federalism is or should be cooperative.

> Once that is achieved, it provides a fruitful background for the arguments of those, sometimes in one province, sometimes in another, who wish to promote and foster separatism. Indeed, a process that is inherently competitive, even if it is called co-operative, is bound to throw up incidents which separatists—themselves competitive individuals—will use to argue that 'the system does not work', because on a particular matter the politicians of a province have been rebuffed or have simply lost in the competitive game. It would be relatively easy to document that the rhetoric of Canadian separatists is often based on the notion that federalism is not as co-operative as one had been led to believe it should be. I cannot undertake that documentation task here. I simply note that if Canadians had been helped to understand that federalist politics, like all politics, is inherently competitive, the propaganda of separatism would have fallen on more barren ground.
> A second implication of the doctrine of co-operative federalism relates to the condemnation, by those who adhere to it, of unilateralism, that is, of independent action by any one government of the federation. Unilateral action by one government is, of course, a derogation from co-operation, since when one is acting alone one is not co-operating. Consequently, those who espouse co-operative federalism decry unilateral action on the part of any government in the federation. Although in principle, the condemnation applies to all, in practice it strikes much harder at the federal government, simply because the provinces, if they want to act in unison, have to come to an agreement—something that is not easy to do for essentially competitive entities. To put it differently, in the normal course of affairs, the central government is likely to act unilaterally more often than the provinces, to the extent that these wish to act as one, because the costs of co-ordination are positive. A condemnation of unilateralism, if enforced, would therefore affect the central government more than the provinces.

federal government, to prevent it from addressing the problems it alone can resolve and is constitutionally responsible for resolving. Indeed, condemning federal unilateralism is condemning the federal government for acting constitutionally. This is so true that if one takes the trouble to go behind the language of cooperative federalism, to the reality of the arguments which it seeks to convey, one discovers either confederalism or conservative view which seeks to reduce the role of the federal government and, indeed, of all governments in society.

In concluding this argument, I note that the condemnation of unilateralism is also a denial that the division of powers between orders of government is essential to federalism. That indeed is the crux of the matter. Cooperative federalism, if it came to pass, would deny federalism itself. Those who seek cooperative federalism and labour for its realization, seek and labour for a unitary state, disguised in the trappings of federalism, but from which competition would have been reduced to a minimum or even eliminated.

The second corollary point related to the mystification surrounding the notion of political competition pertains to the language of competition and of federalism. Competition in the marketplace . . . wherever it takes place is sometimes smooth, so smooth that one can be led into believing that it is not there.

Indeed, honourable senators, I suggest that the competition in this chamber has been so smooth over the past few years that Canadian citizens may believe that it does not exist. It does exist. Coming back to Breton:

But at other times, it is rough, so rough that outsiders are often at a loss in trying to understand why so much energy and effort are displayed, why opponents are characterized in such vile fashion, why the parties become uncouth and impolite in the process of competing. In describing this second circumstance, it is not uncommon for the outsiders, who would have no problem with "well behaved", to describe the situation in terms of conflict, rancour, combat, suspicion, disharmony, and so on, and to attach to these expressions a negative connotation. The stage is then set for appeals to cooperation and for a rhetoric that praises the virtues of cooperative federalism.

Words have emotional content. For that reason, debates and disagreements are sometimes resolved by using a different language. It is important, however, that the change in vocabulary be only that, not the occasion for unnecessary changes in institutions. When competition is acrimonious one may wish to reduce its acrimoniousness; that can be a legitimate objective. But it is not because we choose to relabel a competitive process by some other name, such as conflict, disharmony, or rivalry, that we will have improved things. Indeed, if relabelling leads to the search for unwarranted institutional changes, we may have worsened this situation. Prosecuting and defence attorneys may be uncouth and antagonistic to each other; things could possibly be better if such behaviour did not exist, but surely justice would not be well served, if, to remove such behaviour, courtroom procedures were transformed from competitive into cooperative ones!

[Senator Marsden.]

Honourable senators, that is the situation in this chamber. Breton says:

Many a time I have been struck by the fact that those who resist the notion of competition and its reality in fact take offence at the language of competition. The question of how a language can be made more genteel and gracious is an interesting and difficult one. It may be possible to have a genteel and graceful competitive federalism, but whether it is or not has little bearing on whether competitive federalism is desirable or not.

Later Breton says:

The "proof" that co-operation in federations is beneficial has traditionally been based on sentimentalism and romanticism. Many people do not mind this, but scholars have generally sought to extract themselves from such clutches; consequently they have searched for a rigorous theory of federalism that would provide them with the desired proof. One of the theories used by these scholars derives from an application tofederalism of the theory of games, specifically an application of the theory of the non-cooperative game known as "prisoner's dilemma".

Professor Breton goes on to describe the prisoner's dilemma game. Perhaps, if all of you are not familiar with that game, I could briefly refresh your memory. Breton said:

Two suspects are taken into custody and separated. This district attorney is certain that they are guilty of a specific crime, but he does not have adequate evidence to convict them at a trial. He points out to each prisoner that each has two alternatives: to confess to the crime the police are sure they have done, or not to confess. If they both do not confess, then the district attorney states he will book them on some very minor trumped-up charge such as petty larceny and illegal possession of a weapon, and they will both receive minor punishment; if they both confess they will be prosecuted, but he will recommend less than the most severe sentence; but if one confesses and the other does not, then the confessor will receive lenient treatment for turning state's evidence whereas the latter will get "the book" slapped at him.

If they could cooperate, the two suspects would decide not to confess. But being separated and held incommunicado, they will both confess, each to "receive lenient treatment" but both will get "the book. This serves to show that non-co-operative behaviour is inefficient.

The question is whether the prisoner's dilemma game is an appropriate model to think about and to analyse federalism. In other words, will the cooperative behaviour which would lead to efficient results in the prisoners's dilemma game also lead to efficient results in the case of > federalism? The answer must be an resounding no. The prisoner's dilemma game is simply not an appropriate model for federalism. Why? For two reasons.

> The first and the most obvious is that the governments of federal states are not kept incommunicado. In Canada, with close to one thousand federal-provincial meetings per year, it is hard to assume that the parties are separated.
> The second reason for the inapplicability of the prisoners's dilemma model to federalism is more basic . . . there are no gains from competition in prisoner's dilemma model: there are only gains from co-operation. To understand the full burden of this point, assume that the parties in the game are not criminal suspects, but ordinary oligopolists. Would we also conclude that they should cooperate (collude?) to improve their position? The logic of the prisoner's dilemma model would seem to push us in that direction. In this "oligopolist's dilemma" game, it is our instinct as economists . . . which keeps us in check; we know that the logic of cooperation appears correct only because consumers are left out of the game. Once their presence is acknowledged, it is easy to understand that competition is for their benefit. We must conclude that cooperation benefits the oligopolist, while competition serves consumers. That is why the prisoner's dilemma model cannot be used to analyse oligopolies.
> It is essentially for the same reason that the prisoner's dilemma game cannot be used to analyse federalism. In this case, citizens are left out of the picture. They are the ones who benefit from competition.

That is a crucial point in understanding why it is that the senators on this side of the house are so determined to pursue this question of privilege. So why is it, asks Breton, that thoughtful scholars are:

> . . . led to adopt a completely inappropriate model to analyse federalism? The answer must be that underlying the use of the prisoner's dilemma model is the (tacit) assumption that provincial governments perfectly embody the interests of the people of their respective provinces. There is no role for competition because each provincial government is assumed to be serving its people perfectly! All models of cooperative federalism in fact make the same assumption.
> We are therefore back to competition and to competitive federalism. But competitive behaviour is not unconstrained or anarchical behaviour; indeed competition would not survive, still less be efficient, if such behaviour was the rule. In fact competitive behaviour is restrained and disciplined behaviour.

I draw that point to the attention of Senator Charbonneau. Professor Breton goes on to discuss the questions of property rights. Then he came to the question of checks and balances. He said:

> Are checks and balances a "good" thing? There are at least two different ways of answering this question. One which is more formal, in that it focuses on structural features of political institutions, and a second one which is more behavioral in that it concentrates on the mechanisms and responses which characterize institutions marked by checks and balances, compared to those which are not.

Such as, for example, this chamber. Professor Breton goes on:

> As the words checks and balances indicate, a system in which they play an important role is one in which more barriers have to be opened, more hoops jumped, more obstacles circumvented and more impediments negotiated in an effort to obtain the passage and implementation of a piece of legislation, than would be the case in a system in which they played a lesser role. From a static short-run point of view, checks and balances reduce the legislative and executive efficiency—defined as the ratio of laws passed and implemented to the time and effort put in passing them—of political institutions.

● (1815)

> Looked at from another point of view, the reduced efficiency of law-making bodies is nothing but the greater popular control over the exercise of political power which is automatically achieved by the fact that checks and balances exist. In terms of this formal way of looking at the problem, one's view about the costs and benefits of checks and balances—and about whether they are "good"—centres one's conception of the role and importance of political power for the conduct of public affairs on the one hand, and on the extent to which that power should be controlled for the greater blossoming of individual and collective liberty on the other.
> The virtues of efficiency versus control are not easily described . . . Indeed, in some instances, liberty is guaranteed by a swift and unequivocal exercise of political power. For this reason, constitutions which recognize that there is a genuine trade-off between political power and liberty nonetheless acknowledge that that trade-off is not always "well-behaved"—that in other words, it is sometimes subject to exceptions—by vesting in constitutions clauses which permit the rapid employment of power in emergency situations, such as that pertaining to "peace, order and good government" in the Canadian Constitution.
> From a structural point of view, parliamentary systems, such as the Canadian system, are characterized by far fewer checks and balances than are congressional systems such as the American. Thus from a short-run static or formal point of view, the Canadian political system, if we disregard its federal dimension, would seem to be more efficient at "making laws" than the American system, again neglecting the federal dimension. Or to put the point differently, political power is more controlled in the American political system than in the Canadian system.
> However, the effective differences in the law-making efficiency of the two systems are not as great as one would have to conclude from an analysis of their structural characteristics . . .

This . . . pertains to the dynamics of checks and balances. A system which places barriers and other impediments to the passage of legislation at the same time and in the very fact of forcing people to deal with the barriers and with the other impediments, stimulates discussion and debate on the matters to be legislated. It is as if the items remained longer on the agenda and consequently attracted the interest—voiced approval or disapproval—of a larger number of persons.

The people who develop an interest in discussing and debating matters kept on the agenda by the checks and balances are not only those who have a professional . . . concern for the matter . . . politicians, bureaucrats, lobbyists and others like them . . . but members of the general public . . .

All sorts of people.

The greater involvement in public affairs which checks and balances generate will, in general, not be limited to haphazard intervention, but will stimulate the publication of magazines and other periodicals intensely concerned with the evolution of policy. It will, in other words, stimulate organized interest in public affairs.

That is happening now.

Strong checks and balances will also mean that those citizens who get involved in public discussions and debates will want to engage in meaningful participation and consequently will seek to acquire more information on public affairs than professionals would of themselves freely choose to make available.

Such as, for example, information on how the goods and services tax is going to affect the lives of the citizens of the country.

The pressures for more information imply that over the longer term, the presence of more checks and balances leads to less secretive political institutions.

As a consequence, checks and balances, by raising the level of political involvement on the part of citizens, increase the legitimacy of the political process. Checks and balances still act to control the exercise of political power, but because, from a dynamic point of view, they raise the legitimacy of that political power, they make its exercise more efficient. The dynamic longer-term effects of checks and balances partially or even completely reverse the static shorter-term effects.

. . . the foregoing argument about dynamic effects reversing the static ones does not mean that law-making will be more rapid in systems with more checks and balances compared to those with fewer. The efficiency of checks and balances must be sought elsewhere.

This is a very important fact that Breton made years ago when he wrote this, and very relevant to what we are here for. He says:

[Senator Marsden.]

In a system with more checks and balances there should be fewer policy reversals over time. That is, changes in governments as a result of elections should produce fewer returns to the status quo ante. It is possible to argue, for example, that the cycle of nationalization and de-nationalization of certain industries which has taken place in Britain would not have happened if the British parliamentary system had had more checks and balances. This is a blatant case; the reader can surely provide some possibly less blatant but still spectacular cases in Canada.

And I say to you, honourable senators, that the GST is perhaps exactly such an example. Many of us believe that more debate, more understanding and more participation by Canadians through our system of checks and balances that we are now exercising would lead to better tax policy, fairer tax policy, tax policy that will not be reversed by the next government, an expensive operation that one does not want to encourage. That is why we believe that what we are doing here is important.

A second area of increased efficiency of checks and balances due to the long-term effects over-turning the short-term one pertains to social consensus. More social consensus means that the difference between majorities and minorities have less saliency. As a consequence, other things being equal, it is easier to enforce laws.

That, in the case of tax, is vital. We all know that tax is a voluntary filing system, and if that breaks down—and many of us believe that it will break down if this hated tax is implemented—would not only weaken civil society, but we do not need to do that. We can build consensus on tax reform. Breton continues:

The dominance of long-term over short-term effects is important. It provides part of the basis for the recommendation . . . for a reduction of party discipline in the House of Commons and in Parliamentary Committees . . . The reduction of party discipline would slow down the passage of legislation—which would be a very welcome benefit to Western members of the Conservative Caucus at the present time, I might add,

—but, in the longer run, the benefits of this slow-down will be a more politically involved citizenry and policies and programs that are more broadly accepted by citizens. It is for this reason that I support . . . eliminating the secrecy surrounding the budgetary process. I also support, for the same reason, the establishment of a permanent Economic Policy Committee of the House of Commons, which would hold annual pre-budget hearings and whose proceedings would be televised.

Both of these recommendations would increase checks and balances. He also notes that:

. . . any reform which increased the legitimacy of the Senate would automatically increase its ability to check and balance. Again, that would sometimes slow down the passage of legislation, but in the long run, through the process described above, it would increase the involvement and the participation of Canadians in public affairs. That must be deemed a net benefit. Checks and balances within our national institutions, as long as they are designed with care and prudence, are therefore of overall benefit.

Breton then goes on to discuss the checks and balances that come from the division of powers in our federal system, and it is an extremely interesting discussion. His very cogent remarks on executive federalism are very relevant for us. He points to the interdependence that exists in the federal system, interdependence with two prime sources: the preferences of citizens and the characteristics of "production and implementation" processes. Breton asks the question as to whether that interdependence calls for federal-provincial cooperation and coordination.

> The question is easy to answer. To the extent that interdependence originates in the properties of the preferences . . . of citizens, there is no need for formal institutionalized coordination. Indeed, one should rely on vertical competition between governments at different levels to deal with the coordination problem . . .
> When we turn to the interdependence on the production and implementation side, there is a strong case for formal federal-provincial coordination. That is the limited case for Executive Federalism . . .
> There is a real temptation, reinforced by the internal logic of parliamentary government, to extend executive federalism beyond production—transport or trade, the free movement of people and goods, > —to the elaboration, formulation and design of policies. If the temptation is not resisted . . . Executive Federalism serves to reduce the beneficial effects of competition.

For that reason, Breton says:

> . . . it is important that federal-provincial consultation on virtually all matters follows, not precedes, debates in the House of Commons and in provincial parliaments. Parliamentary debates should extend to a specification of the areas that could be reasonable coordinated and those which should not be. This kind of sorting is currently undertaken at the Cabinet level. Bringing these matters before Parliament would increase checks and balances and hence democracy. It should be favoured on that ground. Furthermore, it is essential that such matters be debated publicly if a reformed Senate is to perform its "monitoring" role efficiently. To those who argue that this will slow down the decision-making process, I reply with the argument developed earlier, that such a procedure will increase public involvement in public affairs and, over the longer term, will make for a more politically mature citizenry.
> But a more intense involvement of parliament in the policy design of federal-provincial matters and a restriction of executive federalism to "production" and implementation of policies are not sufficient for efficient competition. Efficient competition also requires that more information be available to the public, not only on the federal-provincial and provincial-provincial policies that are co-ordinated, but on the nature and form of the co-ordination. At present, in the Access to Information Act, federal-provincial communications are accorded a status equal to that of national security. That is ludicrous and should be changed.

Now, honourable senators, this debate goes on, in terms of the territorial basis of interests, and these points are very important. They deal with the question of race, language, culture, horizontal competition and what the tasks of governments are, such as nation building and province building. But I am anxious to get to the question which Professor Breton has developed about the role of the Senate, because all of this theory of competitive federalism has been building up towards one of the major reforms which I am sure everyone here hopes will be undertaken, and that is the reform of this chamber. The question that is stated by Professor Breton is, "Who monitors the monitor?". He quotes from political and economic history on this question. He states:

> . . . when the Fathers of the Canadian federation met in Quebec City and Charlottetown in 1864 and 1867, as well as when the Constitutional Convention met in Philadelphia in 1787, the debates on the division of power in both cases took very little time. Agreement was reached almost immediately on the conviction that the proposals envisaged were reasonable, and that in any case, marginal changes in the division of powers could be achieved subsequently either formally, informally, or by judicial interpretation. The wisdom of both groups of Fathers has been vindicated by history.
> What required much time and debate and was the source of intense bargaining in both cases was the Senate. To my knowledge, why things happened that way has not been considered, nor has an explanation been provided of why the structure of the Senate mattered so much to these wise men. The explanation, I wish to suggest, rests on the fact that senates play an absolutely central role in "monitoring" the vertical competition that exists in federations—the competition between the federal and provincial (state) governments. Because of that central role, it is desirable that senates be designed so as to guarantee that competition is as fair and as unbiased as possible. In my view, the Americans understood this, whereas the Canadians did not; they were too British in their outlook to understand federalism and the role of a senate in that form of political organization.
> The Senate acts as a "monitor" of vertical competition by injecting a provincial dimension in the central government. In a well-functioning federation, although it would always be an integral part of the central government, a senate would in some important sense be related to both orders of government. The Supreme Court was therefore right, and revealed a profound understanding of federalism, when it recently argued that the federal government could not alone, that is, without the provinces, change the basic structure of the Canadian Senate.

It is interesting to note, in passing, that the New Democratic Party as well as its predecessor, the Canadian Commonwealth Federation, have consistently favoured, not the reform of the Canadian Senate, but its abolition. One must also acknowledge that these parties . . . have often been luke-warm vis-à-vis federalism as a way of organizing politics. I find great logic in that position, and, to me at least, it confirms that in a federation, a senate has an important "monitoring" role to play. To the extent that federalism becomes absorbed in the interstices of NDP thought, I would expect that party to move from abolition to reform of the Senate.

Although I think you would agree that you are seeing that process even today.

A senate can only play a "monitoring" role if it has legitimacy, and, in our time, that can be achieved only if it is popularly elected. Comparisons with the House of Lords in the United Kingdom are beside the point. The United Kingdom is not a federation and therefore whether the House of Lords has legitimacy or not cannot be an impediment to a role of "monitor" of vertical competition.

However, legitimacy is not enough. If a senate is to inject a provincial dimension in the federal government and thus become capable of "monitoring" vertical competition efficiently, the basis of representation must be provincial, not regional, as is current practice. The persistent confusion between provinces and regions that one encounters in the literature and in public debates is a close cousin, I believe, to the notion that interests are communal. The size of provinces and the location of their frontiers are not "rational" in any real sense of that term, but they are there and they determine the jurisdictions of provincial governments.

There is a growing recognition in Canada that the basis of representation in the Senate should be provincial, but there seems to be no rationale underlying this developing awareness.

The Acting Speaker: According to the rules, I will now leave the Chair until 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8:00 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable Senators, I rise to speak on the question of privilege before this house and say that freedom shrieked on October 4, 1990, at 5:25 p.m., when Senator Charbonneau ordered the doors to this chamber to be closed, preventing Liberal and some independent senators from exercising their basic right to vote.

Freedom was dealt a severe blow here in Canada, whose men and women in World Wars I and II made the supreme sacrifice in defence of democracy. Their supreme sacrifice was desecrated by the Progressive Conservative government here in Ottawa, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and their tool, Senate Speaker Charbonneau. This despicable act by Speaker Charbonneau and his masters is outrageous. It is intolerant and intolerable. It is subversive. Indeed, it borders on the treasonous, because the institution of Canadian Parliament has been undermined. Parliament has been subordinated for the partisan goal of ramming through the Senate an unfair, retrogressive, immoral taxation—namely, the GST-which 85 percent of the Canadian people oppose. But the Prime Minister, who has a lot of power, but lusts for supreme power in this country, wants his way, no matter what hardship it will bring upon hard-working Canadians and overburdened taxpayers; no matter what the damage to small business; no matter its deleterious effect on inflation; no matter the damage to the Canadian economy; no matter the ruin of our country.

Honourable Senators, reasonable, concerned, patriotic Canadians must not allow this ruin to happen. That is why Liberal senators of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will fight this iniquitous, unjust and immoral tax.

We have seen how democratic institutions were toppled by Lenin, Stalin, Hitler and other dictators, who wanted their way, who wanted more power, no matter the cost. Since 1980 in Poland, followed by other eastern European countries, people began to revolt against tyranny, dictatorship and autocratic governments. In Eastern Europe they succeeded in 1989, beginning with the victory of Solidarity in Poland, in getting rid of communist régimes. Only last week the two Germanies united to deal the final blow to dictatorship and oppression commenced by Adolf Hitler.

Now we in Canada have a federal Prime Minister who is acting like a dictator, wielding his majority as a threat to oppose the will of the people, even by curtailing the freedom of Liberal and some independent senators,—preventing them from voting in the Senate.

In the Winnipeg Free Press on September 26 of this year a distinguished Manitoban journalist, Frances Russell wrote that the standoff between the Mulroney government and the liberal senators reflects a paradox in modern Canadian parliamentary democracy. In her article she stated that because the nation's highest democratic institution, the House of Commons, has itself ceased to be democratic, it falls, by default, to an appointed chamber to express the popular will and attempt to hold the government accountable to the people.

She also stated that the Senate is only fulfilling that role now, because of partisanship, and may cease to do so if the Mulroney government swamps it with even more senators as vacancies occur, Tory senators here in the Senate have prevented the democratic process from occurring. Put simply, there are no longer any sustainable constitutional checks on a majority government. It is a four-year, maybe five-year, dictatorship in Canada. Not even the prospect of defeat in the next election is a deterrent to Prime Minister Mulroney. He says, "I am going to have it my way and I don't care how the people vote two or three years hence".

Honourable senators, reform of the Senate is a red herring. The real issue before Canadians is reform of the House of Commons. The journalist, Ms. Russell, concluded her column with comments attributed to our former colleague Senator Eugene Forsey. He stated to her that the government imposes closure routinely, so it is now quite reasonable to make the argument that the Senate is the only protection the public has against the majority government bent on imposing a major new issue, the GST, against the will of the people.

I would like to add that this abuse of power was very clearly spelled out in the Toronto Star on October 6 last. The editorial stated that without rules there is chaos. It went on to state:

> "By throwing away the Senate rulebook and all sense of fair play, Senate Speaker Guy Charbonneau has plunged the upper house into a state of anarchy and done it further damage.
> By rule and tradition, the Senate does not hold recorded votes until both parties agree.
> So it was unacceptable late Thursday last for the Speaker to order a procedural vote and then hold it 25 minutes later without the Opposition Liberals in their seats.

The article went on to state that:

> . . . this was a partisan move by Senator Charbonneau to establish a precedent for the ultimate vote in the Senate on a 7 per cent GST.
> But by shattering parliamentary rules and practices, the Speaker has run roughshod over the rights of all senators—not just Liberals. With this tactic, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is, in effect, trying to impose the GST by dictatorial decree.

The editorial went on to state that:

> If Parliament is to be the cornerstone of our democracy, its rules and procedures must be honoured by all members of both houses.
> That's why, last June, the Manitoba Legislature permitted Elijah Harper, an eagle's feather in hand, to raise the lone voice that stopped the Meech Lake Accord. To have trampled Harper's rights would have made a sham of democracy.

It goes on to state in the editorial that perhaps Canadians

> . . . should not be surprised by this latest turn of events in the Senate. Conservative Senate leader, Lowell Murray had expressed dismay when the Manitoba house insisted that its rules had to be obeyed and Harper's rights respected.

The editorial goes on to state:

> The parliamentary rulebook allows ample room for skilful manoeuvers by all members. They can be frustrating at times. But take away the rules, and laws will have no moral authority at all.

I should like also to draw the attention of honourable senators to another editorial, which appeared in the Edmonton Journal on October 9 last. It stated:

> Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate, throws out the parliamentary rule book, locks the doors of the Senate and calls the vote despite the absence of all Liberals and their allies.

> Bud Olson, an Alberta senator, called the speaker "a little Hitler". . . Senator Ray Perrault compared the showdown to politics in Nazi Germany while colleagues shouted "tyranny, tyranny". Senator Jacques Hébert denounced a "coup d'état". Acting Liberal Senate leader Royce Frith condemned a "straight dictatorship".

We read further in that editorial:

> The Conservative senators, and their masters in the Prime Minister's office, have no claim to the high ground in this fight.
> On the contrary, Tory Senate leader Lowell Murray mocked Parliament with equal enthusiasm. He pretended Charbonneau's unprecedented decision was acceptable, which it is not. He accused the Liberals of being sore losers as if the legality of a vote in the upper chamber were just a petty technicality, which it is not.
> The rules of decorum in Parliament, as in the Canadian courts, do not exist.
> Those rules reflect Canadian society's respect for itself. We do not allow lawyers to scream obscenities at judges because such behaviour would bring the criminal justice system into disrepute.

● (2015)

I would like to add to that. It is the Speaker and his masters who have brought disrepute to a parliamentary democratic chamber. The Edmonton Journal editorial continues:

> The Speaker of the Senate has lost the confidence and respect of his colleagues to the degree that the upper house can no longer function. He should resign, and his ruling on the vote should be referred to a higher authority.
> As it stands, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney has stuffed the Senate with enough marionettes to do the government's bidding on the goods and services tax. He'd be wiser to reconsider the legislation than to win the skirmish with such despicable tactics.
> Canada's political institutions will emerge from this fight in dismal condition. A democratic government can't function properly when citizens and elected leaders hold its institutions in contempt. Is the GST really worth this heavy price?

Yesterday I received in the mail a letter dated October 2, 1990 from a senior counsel in Toronto who is learned in the law. It is addressed to the Prime Minister and it reads:

> Dear Mr. Mulroney:
> In your battle with the Senate of Canada, which you describe as being anti-democratic, it is time for you to stop hiding behind the will of the accountable House of Commons.

If we look at your track record on the GST, it is apparent that you have little patience for either real democracy or the House of Commons. You applied closure in the Commons to stifle any debate and you kicked out of Caucus members of your own party. These members honestly represented their electors' overwhelming voice of opposition to the GST.

Although you know that 85% of Canadians want no part of the GST, for so many reasons, all of which have received eloquent expression, you are not prepared to listen to them. To you democracy means a five-year dictatorship with the views of Canadians being irrelevant except when an election writ is issued.

Supplementing this arrogance, you have added cynicism by stacking the Senate with political cronies, some famous and some infamous, whose significant purpose will be to do your bidding. In the 1984 election, akin to dressing yourself in the raiment of a virgin, you lectured the then Prime Minister, John Turner, with the words: 'You could have said "no"'. Unfortunately, he didn't know, and neither did Canadians, that you were to become the biggest political pork purveyor in our history.

To arrogance and cynicism you have added incompetence. During this country's most delicate phase of constitutional debate, the Meech Lake accord, you just had to boast of yourself as a "dice roller", par excellence; that somehow you, alone, with an unfailing sense of timing and persuasion, had whipped all the other players into shape. When the whole thing fell apart, your GST whiz, Don Blenkarn, publicly pronounced that Newfoundland should be towed out to the middle of the Atlantic and sunk. A great day for national unity, Mr. Prime Minister!

To arrogance, cynicism, and incompetence you have added a curious indifference by maintaining personal silence during the standoff, across the barricades, between armed Quebec police and armed warriors. Your Minister of Indian Affairs said he wouldn't negotiate 'at the end of a barrel of a gun.' Whose barrel? Whose gun? You continued to maintain your silence as the world was treated to the spectacle of watching Canadian soldiers armed with rifles stare down Indian mothers holding nothing more than their children. Why weren't you there on the first day instead of on the seventieth day? Suddenly Canada's outspoken criticism of the Republic of South Africa is drawing some catcalls.

The Canadian people have rallied around the Senate of Canada as the only chamber of Parliament that, until now, has expressed a willingness to listen to them as they cry out against the GST. In your railings against the Senate, not once did you show the slightest interest in the thoughtful report of the Standing Committee or in listening to their 'second sober thought', which report and thoughts are, after all, the Senate's constitutional function.

This learned counsel continues:

[Senator Haidasz.]

With tyrant-like fury you have attacked the Senate and, spurning practice, precedent and convention, you have loaded its ranks and avoided any consultation with either Parliament or the provinces. Surreptitiously you prevailed upon the Queen, herself, to resort to an unused and untested section of a statute when Canadians believe there no longer exists any such right of monarchical involvement.

Arrogance, cynicism, incompetence, indifference and tyranny. Is it any wonder that the party you lead has attained what was once regarded as an unthinkable political phenomenon; that is, a cross-over between its percentage of popular support and the prime rate of interest!

Prime Minister, in 1988, you piously observed that four years of public office was really the actual mandate between federal elections. Now you speak of clinging to the last day of a five-year term. Please reconsider the matter once again. When a person in your office is as universally disliked as you are, anytime soon is the best time to go.

Yours very truly,

It is signed by Bruce Haines, Q.C.

Senator Corbin: Did he receive a reply?

Senator Haidasz: I do not know, honourable senators. Perhaps we should find out.

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, many of the comments that have been made in the press and here in this chamber indicate why Canadians have been looking more and more to the Senate as a forum which may listen to the people and respond to their concerns as bill after bill, through stage after stage, is rammed through the House of Commons. But, honourable senators, there is no closure in our chamber; neither is there any allocation of time, according to our rules.

There are many rules in our rule book. There are rules setting out terms for discussion, there are rules of how to conduct debates in this chamber, and there are rules for negotiation between the two houses. However, it has been made clear by the Prime Minister—particularly by the Government Leader in the House of Commons, Harvie Andre—that they will not deal with our chamber. Mr. Andre said, more than once, "It's got to be our way or no way." What a shame! What dictatorship! What tyranny! Then last week the long arm of our Prime Minister reached into the Senate to force his will on this chamber through an executive closure, something that has never been attempted in this chamber. He prepared his strategy, his coup, by appointing eight senators under a constitutional rule not used since Confederation.

Senator Beaudoin said last week it was crystal clear that the Prime Minister had every right to appoint extra senators to pass his goods and services tax. Well, honourable senators, it has been proven by learned counsel in this chamber, and constitutional experts and learned counsel throughout Canada, that what the Prime Minister did is not crystal clear. That is why there are court cases mounting across Canada. A court case has been launched by some of our colleagues in this chamber. A court case has been launched by the Attorney General of the Province of British Columbia. A court case has been launched by Ms. Weir, the Leader of the NDP in New Brunswick. A court case has been launched by a Canadian citizen, a lawyer, from Guelph. We are impatiently waiting for the rulings from these various courts about the impropriety of the Prime Minister appointing eight divisional senators, which has been described as illegal. I maintain that senators opposite cannot decree what is right and what is wrong on the issue of the appointment of the eight divisional senators. That is now for the judges of our country to decide.

The Prime Minister, had he been following precedent and practice, should have tested section 26 of the Constitution in the Supreme Court of Canada to check the legitimacy of his proposed appointments. However, he chose not to do so, and that is despicable. I recall that in the early 1980s, when we had what could hardly have been a more major debate in our country—the debate on the patriation of the Canadian Constitution—the government of the day, led by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliot Trudeau, was highly motivated and determined to bring back our Constitution from Britain. Many provinces wanted to attach some of their concerns and conditions to this process, and there developed quite a row. So the former Prime Minister took the issue to the Supreme Court, not on a question of whether it was legal, because most people had indicated that it was legal to go ahead in the way he was proceeding, and he had a minority of provinces supporting him, but to find out whether it was right.

The court returned a ruling that it was legal but not right, and from that ruling Mr. Trudeau was then forced to seek the agreement of a majority of the provinces of Canada to go ahead with his major proposal, the patriation of the Canadian Constitution. On the contrary, Prime Minister Mulroney chose not to go near the Supreme Court of Canada. He has left the validity of these eight appointments in deep dispute. It seems to me that he does not care about the propriety of such extraordinary appointments.

Last Thursday we also found out that the Prime Minister placed a heavy hand on the shoulder of his old friend, Guy Charbonneau of Montreal. It appears that he had asked him for the ultimate favour, "Friend, do this for me, help me to force through the goods and services tax, even though it is detested by the overwhelming majority of Canadians and even though its first casualty will be the rights and privileges of senators." This was done by a government whose popularity has dropped to 15 per cent in the esteem of the people of Canada who elected it. This was done by a Prime Minister whose personal popularity, we are told, has gone into a free fall and dropped to 15 per cent. It is evident that the Prime Minister does not give a damn about parliamentary rights, the rights of Canadians or the voice of the majority of Canadians.

Honourable senators, it is clear to us on this side that our Constitution has been violated. The rights and privileges of each one of us on both sides of this chamber were violated by the vote that was taken on October 4, and irreparable damage has been done to our parliamentary system. I believe that Senator Charbonneau has destroyed the privileges of each and everyone of us in this chamber. Guy Charbonneau has taken a very dangerous path. He has dishonoured himself, disgraced the Speakership of the Senate and has really disgraced us all.

I mentioned in my speech last week that we have been fortunate to have peace in Canada. We have been fortunate to have brave men and women fight for the rule of law and democracy. Today, as freedom comes to many nations of Eastern Europe, as the Iron Curtain has crumbled and the Berlin Wall has been knocked down, our Canadian democracy, which we have taken for granted, has been diminished by the way the vote was taken on October 4. I think it is incumbent on each and every one of us in this chamber to protect our rights in this institution. Personally I am shattered that Senator Charbonneau, a man of such great stature, a World War II veteran, could, for reasons best known to himself, have sent us all to disgrace. Furthermore, as though that was not enough, he set aside legality, courtesy, dignity and the authority of our parliamentary system. We must ask ourselves today: Where do we go from here? Canada is such a wonderful country, and I hope and pray that wisdom, prudence and honour will prevail in the Senate of Canada.

I would like now to refer to some of the statements of Sir John Bourinot. He said:

> No system of government or of laws can of itself make a people virtuous and happy unless their rulers recognize in the fullest sense their obligations to the state and exercise their powers with prudence and unselfishness, and endeavour to elevate public opinion. A constitution may be as perfect as human agencies can make it and yet be relatively worthless, while the large responsibilities and powers entrusted to the governing body— responsibilities and powers not set forth in acts of Parliament—are forgotten in view of party triumph, personal ambition . . .

He said:

> Constitute government how you please, infinitely the greater part of it must depend upon the exercise of powers which are left at large to the prudence and uprightness of ministers of state.

He goes on in his book to speak about the Speaker and the nature of the Speaker's function. There have been other experts in constitutional and parliamentary law, such as Professor W.F. Dawson, who wrote in one of his books:

> There is no doubt that the Senate has a tradition of orderly debate and gentlemanly conduct. There is also no doubt that a chamber that prides itself on its non-partisan approach to legislation will never arouse the strong feelings that occasionally disturb the House of Commons. It is impossible to imagine, for instance, the Senate ever becoming sufficiently aroused that a sitting would have to be suspended for disorder. The few cases of disorder that have occurred have been largely the result of the activities > of a very small number of Senators with exceptionally strong opinions.

He goes on to say:

> On the whole, the Speakership of the Senate presents few of the problems that confront the office in the House of Commons. The Speaker still presides over a House noted for its short sittings, leisurely procedure and docile manners. The reform of 1906 . . . gave the Speaker the reserve power he needs to control any unexpected outbreaks or bad temper in the House.

He went on to say something that may be considered as an interpretation of our rule 15, that being:

> The one feature—political partisanship—that has traditionally plagued the House of Commons Speaker in Canada should be present in the Senate in an even greater degree, but it has never become important. It is natural that this should be so, for the Chair of the Senate does not carry with it the same responsibility or the necessity for a strict application of the rules which mark the Chair of the Commons. Debate is never as heated and awkward political situations simply do not arise in the Senate.

He then said:

> On the whole, Senators have been satisfied with those who have been placed in the Chair, and the proceedings of the Senate have never suffered from any partisan political suspicions.

What happened on October 4 in the Senate? It smacks of political suspicions and subordination to a partisan government. Therefore, it should be clear to all honourable senators that the Speaker is guilty not only of gross misbehaviour but of committing a despicable act in denying some of us senators a vote in this chamber.

Here we see that what happened on October 4 continues to take place and that Parliament has been damaged. Indeed the national fabric in this country is being torn apart, and that is why I believe no government more than this government deserves the rejection of all parliamentarians and the people of Canada.

It looks as if this government has forgotten that governing is a subtle art, that governance requires a subtle hand, that governance requires honesty with the Canadian people, that governantes requires an open process; but this government rejected all of those principles. I might add that forcing the GST on the Canadian people against their will is not the way to govern Canada.

I think it is axiomatic that no law should be passed by any parliament that the people will not obey. So this government is in danger of pushing the people of this country to revolt. This government is in danger of pushing the Canadian people into a lower standard of morality than we have enjoyed in this country.

I say to you, honourable senators, that we have reached a very sad point in our history. I hope that the long debate that we had last week, and that we are continuing this week, puts on the record, realistically and fairly, the inalienable rights of a democratic parliament. I hope also that this abuse by the government of Canada will be seen and understood better each day—understood especially by the men and women on the street.

I am forced to say that I deeply regret that in this parliamentary process in this chamber, by one small letter that we heard was dictated by the Leader of Government in the Senate and signed Speaker of the Senate, which is inexplicable and unjustified, those responsible in this government have destroyed over one hundred years of building a Canadian parliamentary system. Honourable senators, we must not allow anyone to destroy our hard-won freedoms in this country. In spite of the difficulties and troubles of our times, we must rally and fight, not only to preserve our parliamentary institutions but to renew and strengthen legal authority, respect for the rules of the Senate and respect for our constitutional rights.

I have not heard anyone on the other side convince me that what they did on October 4 was right. I do not think they have honestly tried to explain their action of October 4. Perhaps what they did is unexplainable. In these debates not one Progressive Conservative senator stood up to defend the Speaker's action.

Senator Murray: I beg your pardon? You were here trying to stop me.

Senator Haidasz: You tried it, but you did not convince me.

Senator Cogger: You were standing up on your chair.

Senator Murray: Calling the Speaker Hitler.

Senator Haidasz: What you tried to do is indefensible.

Senator Cogger: Stand up on the chair again!

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in this fierce clash of views, especially today, each and everyone of us must stand up to defend our constitutional rights so that freedom will survive in Canada and that Canadians may live and work in peace in a just society. That, honourable senators, is our primary goal, our sacred duty. We must remind this government that a government is the servant of the people and not their master. Any violation of this principle should be protested and condemned. That is why we have no other choice in this chamber but to demand, and to get, the resignation of the Speaker of the Senate, because he has violated the rights of this chamber and thereby violated our Constitution and offended all Canadians. By his malicious act perpetrated on October 4 the Speaker of the Senate has destroyed our confidence in him and in the Speakership of this chamber.

Honourable senators, this subtle despotism in Canada must be eliminated in Parliament and wherever else it raises its ugly face in this country. We must therefore renew the battle for democracy to preserve the dignity of the senate. It is only in this way that we shall survive, and it is only in this way that we shall be serving the Canadian people.

The parliamentary impasse in this chamber has been caused by the federal government's obscene haste and undemocratic ways in ramming through the Senate its unpopular and unfair legislation such as Bill C-62, the GST; Bill C-43, the criminalization of abortions; Bill C-28, clawing back the sacrosanct senior citizens old age pensions, to which they contributed for so many years by their hard work and their taxes.

Senator Murray: That is what Senator MacEachen said he would pass right away.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I ask you: why is this government doing this? What is this government's real purpose? Why the impatience and the obscene haste? Why the refusal to meet with our leadership on this side of the chamber to seek ways to overcome this impasse?

• (2045)

Before we can resume oral discussion of legislation in this chamber, we have to wait for the courts to rule on the propriety, some say the illegality, of the appointment of the eight divisional senators.

Last week and this week we received in our offices from the clerk, on behalf of the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, an announcement inviting us to a meeting of the committee at which the Minister of Justice would appear and have her say concerning Bill C-43. Well, I do not even know, and I did not read anywhere, that the committee has decided to begin hearings on Bill C-43, the criminalization of abortion in this country.

Senator Murray: The chairman is a member of your own caucus; so what are you talking about?

Senator Haidasz: Imagine if some of the members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee would include a member of the disputed or putative senators, those eight divisional senators. Even now their status in this chamber is being studied by the courts. How could those senators accept a position on such a committee? It would be a very dangerous thing for them to vote on any part of Bill C-43, because should the courts rule that the appointment of these divisional senators was illegal, and had the bill passed and abortions been committed under that bill, thousands of pre-born, innocent, helpless Canadians would have been killed by abortion. I ask honourable senators, how or who can bring back the life of those aborted Canadians?

That is only one comment that I have on the problem concerning the divisional senators, whose status is not clear and, in fact, whose status is challenged by many people and even a provincial government.

Were we to proceed in a discussion of Bill C-62, what would be the role of those divisional senators whose appointments are challenged?

Honourable senators, Bill C-62 is a very important piece of legislation. It deals with taxation. It takes out of the pockets of hard-working Canadians their hard-earned money so that the Minister of Finance can go about his business. At one time he said his business was to reduce the national deficit by the money coming in from the GST. We now hear that it is supposed to be a neutral tax—that it won't affect, to any great extent, our national debt.

Senator Cogger: Will Senator Haidasz entertain a question?

Senator Haidasz: Please, after I finish my speech, because it is already after 9 o'clock.

Senator Cogger: We have all night.

Senator Haidasz: You will have your right to speak after I finish. Please respect the fact that I am on my feet. I am coming close to the end of my speech, but, before I do so, I want to put into the record the September 28 editorial which appeared in the The Toronto Star which is entitled, "Dump the GST and try fairness." This article states:

> By stacking the Senate with loyal supporters, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney insists that he has the moral authority to decide the fate of the GST.
> In fact, that authority flows from the people of Canada, the vast majority of whom abhor the GST. It is a terrible tax.
> The GST would undermine the cherished tradition that the burden of taxation should be allocated among Canadians according to their ability to pay.
> Besides treating almost everyone uniformly, the GST would treat almost every purchase the same: Good, bad, essential and frivolous all become one under the 7 per cent GST. Whether it's a hearse ride to the cemetery or a limousine ride to the Royal Alex, the same GST tax meter will click away.
> In trying to deflate these widespread criticisms, Mulroney keeps saying that the GST is needed to replace the discredited $18.5 billion-a-year manufacturers sales tax (MST) applied on most factory goods.
> It is widely acknowledged that this hidden sales tax does hurt the economy, by penalizing our exports and by favoring imports over domestically produced goods. Nearly everyone agrees that the MST has to go.
> But is it good enough for Mulroney to say simply that the GST will be less bad than the MST?
> In their outpourings of rage against the GST, Canadians are demanding the fairest possible alternative, not one that is merely less bad.
> The Star has always believed that the fairest tax is the income tax, because it is based on the ability to pay. Yet that's the one viable alternative that Mulroney steadfastly refuses to explore.
> Since it takes the expertise of tax lawyers and accountants—and the wizardry of computers——

I might add that some of those computers to deal with the very complex features of the GST have not yet even been manufactured. The editorial continues:

> Since it takes the expertise of tax lawyers and accountants—and the wizardry of computers—to examine the effects of elaborate tax changes, few have dared challenge the government's intricate framework for the GST.
> But one who has done so is Osgoode Hall law professor Neil Brooks. On the opposite page, he outlines one way > the government could fine-tune the income tax system to offset the revenues it would lose by dumping the federal sales tax.

> While his approach was only intended as a sketch of what could be done, it would entail only modest increases in income tax rates. For example, people in the top tax bracket would have to pay roughly an extra nickel on the last dollar they make.
> Yet for that small price, the over-all tax system would be made more progressive and inflation would drop, not rise as it would under the GST. Furthermore, the thousands of bureaucrats hired to collect the GST would no longer be needed.
> But Ottawa wouldn't have to rely solely on increases in income tax rates to recover the money it would lose by abandoning the federal sales tax. The government could bolster its revenues by broadening the income tax base.
> If Mulroney, for example, were to close some of the most glaring loopholes in the system, he could introduce even smaller rate increases than those indicated on the opposite page:—

I will skip part of the editorial and read its conclusion. In conclusion it states:

> This list is by no means exhaustive. But if a handful of these unnecessary tax privileges were eliminated, the need for income tax rate increases could be significantly reduced.
> It's true that Mulroney has an obligation to pay for government services, and to reduce the over-all deficit.
> But he has a bigger duty to spread the tax burden fairly and not to preserve the advantages of the privileged and the rich.
> Fairness is all that Canadians ask.

That completes the editorial.

Honourable senators, I have already spoken for one hour and ten minutes.

Some Hon. Senators: Carry on.

Senator Haidasz: I do not know whether I should monopolize your priceless time in this chamber when we are all so tense and almost livid with anger over what happened in this House on October 4.

Honourable senators, I now see that the Leader of the Opposition has taken his place in the chamber.

Senator Simard: He is back.

Senator Haidasz: I also see Senator Gigantès, Senator Stewart and the others who made such tremendous speeches yesterday and last week.

Senator Cogger: And today.

Senator Haidasz: At this point in our debate on the question of privilege I shall take a few moments of rest.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: May I now put my question?

[Senator Haidasz.]

Senator Haidasz: If you do not want to make a speech and include your questions in it, I guess I will have to entertain your questions.

Senator Cogger: Thank you senator, that is very kind of you.

I would quote to you from the Debates of the Senate of October 4, less than a week ago. I would refer you to page 2375 where it states:

> Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, although the clock of the Peace Tower struck midnight five minutes ago, I should like to take this opportunity to raise a question of privilege—

I have listened to the honourable senator very carefully for better than an hour now. I have also read what he had to say less than a week ago. As a matter of fact, that same night, when Senator Molson was going to speak, he said to the honourable senator—and I quote from page 2395 which reads as follows:

> Senator Molson: Perhaps I had better sit down until the honourable senator is finished. Would he like to take the floor?
> Senator Haidasz: I have spoken already.
> Senator Molson: I know that, but you are still at it.
> Senator Haidasz: According to the rules, I can only speak once.

Senator Haidasz: It is a new question of privilege.

Senator Gigantès: Don't be specious. Try for once to be straight. I know it is a difficult thing not to be crooked.

Senator Cogger: From my understanding of today's debates, the one person who came up with a new question, and who did not entertain us earlier—if I can call it that—was Senator Stewart. Senator Stewart was not in his office when the bell rang—maybe he was, but I don't know—and he was wondering whether the battery on his watch was running or was not running. It is only today, from reading the transcript of Hansard, that he found out that he had a legitimate question of privilege, which he raised.

What I am asking Senator Haidasz is this: Was the battery on his watch also defective? Is that a new question, or is what we heard tonight a rehash of what we heard last week? Can the honourable senator explain how what he had to say tonight differs from what he had to say on October 4?

Senator Haidasz: First of all, so far as watches and clocks are concerned, I learned after I came into this chamber at 5:30 p.m. when these doors were opened, in the letter from Speaker Charbonneau, which said, "I shall notify you I shall call the vote at 5:30." The vote was already over at 5:30, because I entered the chamber after the vote and I looked at the watch and it was 5:33. He did not even follow his own timetable.

So far as I know, we are debating a question of privilege which Senator Stewart raised on Tuesday at around 2 p.m.

Senator Cogger: He now has a battery in his watch as opposed to something else last week; is that right?

Senator Haidasz: Would you repeat your question?

Senator Cogger: I said that what you spent an hour and ten minutes talking about tonight relates to the battery in the watch of Senator Stewart and not to the question of privilege of last week.

Senator Haidasz: I think that is a specious question and there is nothing to answer.

Senator Stewart: Senator Cogger has just uttered another misrepresentation of the question of privilege which I raised earlier, at the beginning of this sitting.

I brought up the question of privilege at this sitting because the official report of what had happened at last Thursday's sitting had just come into my possession.

• (2100)

I discovered that the vote which Speaker Charbonneau said was to start at 5.30 had actually started at 5.25. That was just one leg of the cancer that afflicts. In order to discuss that leg of the cancer it was necessary for me to explore five or six other legs of the cancer.

This whole cancer should be excised from the Senate of Canada, Senator Cogger.

As I understand it, Senator Haidasz has taken up my question of privilege and has explored not only the aspect relating to the time when the doors were locked but has tried to look at the whole of this cancer—each leg as evil as all the others.

Senator Cogger: I was only asking an innocent question.

Senator Stewart: I seem to have harangued Senator Cogger. I apologize for that. What was hot anger last week has burned down to cold fury.

Senator Cogger: It appears to me that it might be clear in your mind how the current question is different from that asked last week, although that may not be clear in the mind of Senator Haidasz.

Senator Gigantès: Is the honourable senator now trying to suggest to us that he has the capacity to read someone else's mind?

Is the honourable senator now telling us that he can read the good doctor's mind?

Senator Cogger: I am only pointing out that the speech given by Senator Haidasz, for the past hour and ten minutes, sounded frightfully repetitive. It sounded like something I had heard before, and I wanted to know whether I was in a time-warp.

Senator Gigantès: You are in a time-warp. You are totally incapable of understanding the outrage you have caused. Senators opposite are absolutely incapable of a decent thought and do not know how to behave in a civilized manner. You ought to be ashamed. You are in a time-warp! You are of a time before democracy was invented.

Senator Cogger: I think your colleagues are abusing your privileges. It seems to me that they are answering for you.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Haidasz is quite capable of defending himself. All of you opposite have no concern, no respect, no sense of what is democratic.

Senator Stewart: Look at Senator Doyle! That is what he thinks of democracy!

Senator Simard: Vous allez prendre votre pilule ce soir.

Senator Gigantès: I have given up taking pills and trying to make myself appear younger. I am quite satisfied in my old age to sit here fighting for the freedom that you are trying to abolish. I still have a voice; I still have feelings; I still have resentment.

How did your leader have the gall earlier today to stand up, knowing full well he was prevaricating, and say that we were blocking the passage of two bills, one of which had been clearly indicated to be a bill on which would be passed relatively quickly, and the other a bill which our leader had serious discussions respecting getting it passed by June.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps by June 8.

Senator Gigantès: Did the Leader of the Government in the Senate not know about this, or did he try to use that as another crisis, as he did with the Estimates, when there were printed Estimates and senators opposite would not follow tradition and table them and tried to get us to vote carte blanche for $7 billion.

Senator Corbin: How much?

Senator Gigantès: They wanted us to authorize the spending of $7 billion without showing us the Estimates. That is against the tradition of any Parliament of British descendancy. That has not been done in India or Zimbabwe, but it has been done here. Why? Because Mr. Mulroney can brook no opposition.

Look at his behaviour! That behaviour has driven provincial premiers, who were willing to cooperate, into a situation in which they would not. He has used brutality and bullying. That is where you people come from. We will never tire of telling you about that. You should be ashamed of yourselves!

Senator Simard: Goodnight!

Senator Cogger: I am satisfied with the answer.

Senator Gigantès: I have not finished. I am glad Senator Simard is wishing me goodnight. I only hope that every time he offers some of his abominations he gets a verbal shot in the mouth.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I hope you are not trying to stop a grass roots member of this place from speaking. Every business operation in Canada operates with a set of rules and regulations. When a new employee is hired, he or she is made aware of the rules and regulations of the particular plant, store or office in which he or she works. If anyone breaks the rules and is caught, the boss takes over the job of assessing the discipline.

Nearly every senator and member of Parliament drives an automobile. The rules of the road on which we travel are for our protection, so that people's lives are protected. If the rules are broken, the police stop the people concerned and issue tickets which are paid in hard-earned cash.

Air, bus, airplanes, and railway employees operate under rules—regulations and safety rules as prescribed by the Canadian Transport Commission. I forget the new name. Yes, honourable senators, on the railroad we stretched the rules on safety as far as we could in order to get the trains going faster than road travel. Sometimes we stretched the rules too far and something happened, or we were caught by the officials and had to attend investigations; and, in time, received time off without pay or demerit marks.

The House of Commons has a set of rules and regulations so that the Parliament of Canada can operate in an efficient manner in order to conduct the business of the government for all of the people of Canada. Yes, tricks are played by both sides, but the government of the day can limit debate by the use of time allocation or closure.

We come now to the red book, called the Rules of the Senate of Canada. These are the rules and regulations that were talked about, thought about, fully debated in committee and finally passed, after hours of hard work by members of both sides of this house. The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders makes recommendations to the Senate chamber, whose members, in turn, debate and pass the laws under which we operate each day.

Those rules are the "Good Book", or, if you like, the "Senate Bible". Those rules guide us in both our Senate and committee sessions.

The Speaker's job is to conduct the meetings and to keep senators operating in a correct manner so that the rules are adhered to.

Rules 49 and 50 and the guidance given on page 70 clearly describe how and when a vote is to be taken. These rules are the laws of the Senate. No one, especially the Speaker, has the right to push the rules aside unless there is unanimous agreement between the house leaders and the senators to set aside a particular rule in order to speed up the work of the Senate.

Honourable senators, the voting rules are crystal clear. The whips notify or signal the Speaker when they are ready to proceed with the vote. The Speaker states: "Let the doors of the chamber be locked." At that point, honourable senators, the clerk and the assistant clerks call out the names of each senator.

This is the process, this is the way the Speaker must operate. This is the democratic process that must be followed, as the rules clearly state on page 70 of our rule book.

Honourable senators, during my service on the CNR, I have attended hundreds, thousands, of brotherhood meetings, plus many organization, fraternal and charity meetings, and never once have I attended a meeting where the chairman was called upon to break a tie vote.

During brotherhood meetings the language at times could be a little rough around the edges, and at times the debate was tough and very heavy, but before the meeting was over and a decision one way or another was rendered. Honourable senators, the parliamentary procedure during the meeting was first class. If a member did not operate within the rules, the sergeant-at-arms moved in and the member was escorted to the door until he was able to return and operate within the rules and regulations of the brotherhood, as laid out and debated at the Brotherhood's general convention, where the suggested changes were debated in committee before they were passed and sent to the floor of the convention.

When the convention adjourned, the rules and regulations, as passed by ballot vote of all members, were photocopied immediately and each delegate received a copy upon leaving the convention.

These laws were laws that all brotherhood meetings, conducted each month or bi-monthly, adopted at the first meeting held after the convention.

If the chairman or president did not conduct the meeting according to the rules, the sergeant-at-arms would remove him from office and report him to the officials in Toronto or Montreal where a special hearing was held so that both sides of the argument were listened to by a brotherhood board, which rendered a decision in 30 days. If the chairman were found guilty, he was permanently removed from his chair and office for a period of two years. With this knowledge of rules, and my experience in the House of Commons for 16 years, six years in the chair as Assistant Deputy Speaker and four years as Chief Government Whip, I was shocked and appalled at the way the Speaker of the Senate was allowed, with full government support, to throw the rule book out the window. Surely, in our democratic process, the rules should be strictly adhered to.

The House of Commons and the Senate are considered by Canadians to be the highest court in the land, where all classes of Canadians, regardless of creed, colour or religion, meet to debate the various bills so that the way of life of all Canadians, rich and poor, will be improved. The job of government is to protect the people at all times.

The democratic system of government is not the type of government of the day that our soldiers, air force and navy members fought for. The system of government by the people of the people, for the people has been totally destroyed by the action of the Speaker of the day. Thursday, October 4, and Friday, October 5, 1990, were black days for me and for all Canadians. On Thursday, October 4, I said in this house:

> Honourable senators, I do not see my name on this list.

I have yet to find out why.

When I was a young lad in Toronto, my dad, who was an immigrant from Ireland, told me to be honest and sincere at all times. "When you work for a man, be loyal to the boss or get out and work for someone else. Help your fellow man or woman over the rough spots in life. Treat them as you would like to be treated. The Good Book says that all people are born equal. Some are lucky and are very rich and many are poor; but when the great scorer comes to write your name, it is how you played the game of life that counts and how you treated your fellow man and woman."

Honourable senators, I wish to thank all the staff of the Senate for their help and kindness to all senators, on both sides of this house, during these trying times of Senate debate. They are first-class employees. You will all get your reward when you go to heaven. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I think I also have a duty to rise on this question of privilege since I was denied the right to vote here in the Senate. It is the first time this has happened.

I think that if we consider what has been happening in the Senate, we must conclude that Senate reform is urgently needed. In this respect, I would like to talk to our new senators and others who may not be familiar with what happened in 1983-1984, about the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform. The report was published in January 1984. The committee's joint chairmen were the Hon. Gildas Molgat, Senator and the Hon. Paul Cosgrove, P.C., M.P.

On one of the first pages of the report we see a photograph of the Senate. In 1983, I was sitting on the other side. Among the other members who sat with us on the committee were the Hon. Martial Asselin, P.C. Of course you know Senator Asselin, and there was also Roland Comptois, M.P. for Terrebonne.

There was also Howard Crosby, M.P., a Progressive Conservative.

I am naming all these people because later on you will see the report's conclusions are important and apply to both parties.

There was William Doody, senator, who is of course well-known. Gaston Gourde, Liberal M.P,. for Lévis; Maurice Harquail, Liberal M.P. for Restigouche; Bill Jarvis, P.C., Progressive Conservative M.P. for Perth, Ontario, at the time; myself, Jean LeMoyne, Liberal senator from Rigaud, Quebec; Derek Lewis, Liberal senator from St.John's, Newfoundland; Paul Lucier, Liberal senator from Yukon; Rod Murphy, New Democrat, M.P. for Churchill, Manitoba; Arthur Portelance (who is no longer with us), Liberal M.P. for Gamelin; Marcel Roy (who was defeated), Liberal M.P. for Laval; Blaine Thacker, Progressive Conservative M.P. for Lethbridge—Foothills, Alberta, and Arthur Tremblay, Progressive Conservative senator from Les Laurentides, Quebec, who sat with us in this Chamber.

Others member who also sat on this committee were: Margaret Anderson, senator, Harvie Andre, M.P. at the time; James Balfour, senator; Martha Bielish, senator; Peter Bosa, senator; Herb Breau, M.P.; Coline Campbell, M.P.; David Collennette, P.C., M.P.; Ernest Cottreau, senator; Jean-Guy Dubois, M.P.; Jake Epp, P.C., M.P.; Joseph Guay, P.C., senator; Earl Hastings, senator; Jacques Hébert, senator; Henry Hicks, senator; Leonard Hopkins, M.P.; Renaude Lapointe, P.C., senator; Al MacBain, M.P.; Roy MacLaren, P.C.,M.P.; Lorne McCuish, M.P.; Charles McElman, senator; Ray Perreault, P.C., senator; William Petten, senator; Richard Stanbury, senator; David Steuart (from the West), senator; and Norbert Thériault, senator.

All these people participated in the proceedings of this committee which went on for quite sometime.

I would now like to tell you about the committee's conclusions. The conclusions of committee reports usually come at the end. In this case, the joint chairmen felt it was preferable to put them at the beginning, so that the report would have a stronger impact on the media and on all Canadians who were interested in these issues.

Chapter 1 starts as follows:

> We have concluded that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada.

If I understand correctly, the report proposes an elected Senate.

> An appointed Senate no longer meets the needs of the Canadian federation. An elected Senate is the only kind of Senate that can adequately fill what we think should be its principal role—the role of regional representation. We propose a Senate different in composition and function from the House of Commons and from the present Senate. The second chamber we recommend is designed specifically—by its distribution of seals, by the way it is elected, and by the powers it exercises—to represent the sometimes diverse interests of the people of Canada's provinces and territories in federal legislation and federal policies.
> In fulfilling that role, an elected Senate would strengthen the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country.
> We reached this conclusion after reviewing the work of previous inquiries into the questions of Senate reform . . .

In fact, there have been a number of inquiries. To my knowledge, there was an earlier one by Senator Lamontagne with the legal and constitutional affairs committee. And there were others before that. This is not the first time we were talking about Senate reform.

> We reached this conclusion after reviewing the work of previous inquiries into the question of Senate reform and after hearing the testimony of witnesses in all provincial and territorial capitals. We also benefited from the advice contained in the more than 280 briefs submitted to the Committee. We were told frequently that, after so many abortive attempts at Senate reform, the time has come for vigorous action—for fundamental change in the Senate—and that it would be a mistake to adopt inconsequential reforms.
> Our conclusion was not reached lightly or easily. Although a substantial part of the testimony we heard favoured direct election, a roughly equal part opposed it, mainly on the grounds that a parliament with two elected houses cannot be reconciled comfortably with the principle of responsible government as it has operated in the British and Canadian traditions. Some highly respected people in public life and in the academic community prefer a reformed system of appointment to election. Among this group is one member of our Committee.

Although a reformed appointed Senate could bring about some needed improvements, we are persuaded that it would lack the political mandate to fill what we believe is the Senate's primary role. Only a politically strong second chamber can dispute, when necessary, the decisions taken by a government that is supported by the House of Commons. Therefore only an elected Senate can satisfy the original intent of the fathers of Confederation: the provision of a chamber that would balance judiciously the power of the Commons (which is based on representation by population) by safeguarding the legitimate interests of the people of the less populous provinces.

In proposing an elected Senate we are rejecting not only a reformed system of appointment, but also certain other proposals that have been made in recent years. One of these is abolition of the Senate. It is a course of action that from time to time has appealed to some Canadians, and it is the preference of one member of our Committee. However, the weight of the testimony brought before the Committee was overwhelmingly opposed to abolition.

In the last report we made, we said we were against abolishing the Senate outright. This solution . . .

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have a question. If the Senate is to be treated the way it was treated by Senator Charbonneau, who was acting under pressure and constraints, and according to suggestions made by Senator Murray who, in turn, was controlled by Harvie Andre who was controlled by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, do you really think it is worthwhile to have a Senate, if there are no rules and it is impossible to do anything at all in a Chambre subject to a reign of tyranny and betrayal, with a total lack of frankness and trust?

Senator Simard: It certainly helped you.

Senator Gigantès: You are going to get a verbal slap in the face, Senator Simard, if you go on.

Senator Simard: No threats, please.

Senator Gigantès: These are not threats. You are a lightweight, Senator. This morning you attacked Senator MacEachen. That is just looking for trouble, and anyone who looks for trouble is not very smart. To attack Senator MacEachen is suicidal for someone of your substandard capabilities. Would you be so kind as to answer my question, Senator Leblanc?

Senator Leblanc: I can't answer that. I was reading from a report by a special joint committee of members of the House of Commons and the Senate, who sat down, in an atmosphere of peace and tranquility, to try and prepare a report that would reflect the situation in 1983-1984. Today, things may have changed.

Senator Tremblay: A very good answer!

Senator Leblanc: That is how things were at the time. The report is obviously based on the situation that existed back then.

Senator Simard: Senator Gigantès wants to get back to ancient history again, Senator Leblanc. Don't let this Greek distract you.

Senator Leblanc: I will continue my quote:

> In proposing an elected Senate we are rejecting not only a reformed system of appointment, but also certain other proposals that have been made in recent years. One of these is abolition of the Senate. It is a course of action that from time to time has appealed to some Canadians, and it is the preference of one member of our Committee. However, the weight of the testimony brought before the Committee was overwhelmingly opposed to abolition.
> Another option we reject is the creation of a legislative chamber composed wholly or in large part . . .

Senator Simard: Listen to that, Senator Gigantès. It might do you some good.

Senator Leblanc:

> . . . of delegates of provincial governments acting under the instructions of those governments. Proposals for such a chamber are usually inspired by the German Federal Council, the Bundesrat. A Bundesrat is appropriate for Germany . . .

I know, because I have been to Germany several times and to their parliament as well. I saw how things work over there. Of course, it is not easy to take an institution and apply its principles to another country. Our culture and traditions are different.

> The Canadian federal system is quite different, and a Bundesrat-type chamber could lead to serious problems. We share the view, contained in the 1980 report of the sub-committee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs . . .

the Lamontagne report I referred to earlier.

Senator Tremblay: In 1980.

Senator Leblanc: Yes.

> . . . that such a Chamber would subordinate, in an inappropriate way, the federal legislature to the executive branch of the provincial order of government. It would, in the words of that report, make the federal Parliament a hybrid amounting to a monstrosity.

● (2145)

That was the term used in the Lamontagne report and it is repeated here in referring to the report.

> Nor do we consider that a system of 'indirect' election—the election of senators by members of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures—would result in any significant change in the role and political authority of the present Senate.
> It has been pointed out to us that only a few years ago many people were recommending a Bundesrat-type Senate, and some have asked whether direct election is a fad, a passing interest that will fade as quickly as did interest in the Bundesrat. To respond, as one journalist has, that "democracy is never a fad" . . .

The report quotes what the journalist said. I don't know who the journalist was.

> . . . is perhaps too simplistic, but there is truth in that response. It seems to us that direct election is the proper path for Canada's long-term political and costitutional development.
> Many witnesses who favoured an elected Senate were quick to point out that embracing the principle of direct election is only the first, although an important, step. It is also necessary to decide what kind of elected Senate would best suit Canada's parliamentary system of responsible government. We must also confront the difficult question of how to distribute among the provinces and territories the appropriate number of seats in such a politically powerful body.
> We believe that Canada should establish an elected Senate designed in such a way that it would not be vying continually for supremacy with the House of Commons: it should have significant powers, but it should not be able to undermine Canada's well-tried system of responsible government. We therefore propose that the new Senate be given only a suspensive veto, which would allow time for national debate and reflection, but which the Commons could, after a suitable lapse of time, override by re-passing the legislation in question.
> We also propose that every effort be made to ensure that senators have a significant degree of independence of party.

This is to make them less partisan in certain circumstances.

> Only then will they be able to speak in favour of local and regional interests without having to be concerned primarily, as members of Parliament must be, with adhering to party policy. A healthy measure of independence is therefore essential if the Senate is to fill its role of regional representation. This does not mean that senators would lose sight of the needs of the country as a whole.

In fact, that is how it works in the House of Commons. Members look after the interests of their ridings but they also consider the well-being of the country as a whole. That is what federal members are supposed to do.

> It is for this reason, and also to distinguish senators from members of the House of Commons, we propose that senators be elected for a single but comparatively long term—nine years—with one-third of the senators being elected every three years. To lessen party influence in the choice of senators, all but one of us prefer 'first-past-the-post' elections in single-member constituencies to proportional representation in multi-member constituencies.
> Each province would be divided into as many constituencies as it had senators.
> We recognize that, in the absence of proportional representation for an elected Senate, the political parties will have to work hard to achieve balanced representation from across the country in the Commons and the Senate. This is as it should be. In striving to do this, they will have to adapt their policies accordingly, and this can only benefit national politics.
> On the question of the distribution of seats, the Committee was advised by nearly all witnesses across Canada that the divsion should be made not on the basis of the present four Senate regions but by allocating seats to each province and territory. We accept that this kind of allocation reflects more closely the diverse nature of Canada.
> As to how many seats should be allocated to each province or territory, we recognize that there is no perfect solution. We believe that giving and equal number of seats to each province would not be appropriate, having regard to Canada's historical development ant the configuration of its population.

Which means that the report is opposed to the western concept of a Triple-E Senate. The report says clearly that it is unnecessary for each province to have the same number of senators.

> If each province had the same number of seats, five provinces with as little as 13.4 per cent of Canada's population would have a majority of seats if they had the support of the territories.

I don't think the Triple-E concept already existed at the time. So that was the main reason why people thought provinces should not have equal representation in the Senate.

> While the less populous provinces merit a stronger voice in Parliament, equal representation in the Senate would tilt the balance too far and would be unacceptable to the vast majority of Canadians, not only to those living in the two largest provinces. We therefore propose a compromise . . .

● (2200)

Canadians are good at striking a compromise, although nowadays, it seems to have gone out of fashion, but who knows, we might get back to it some day.

> . . . whereby most provinces would have an equal number of seats, but Ontario and Quebec would have more and Prince Edward Island and the territories would have fewer. Our proposal would, for example, give the four western provinces together as many seats as Ontario and Quebec jointly.

This would balance representation of the four western provinces with that of the two central provinces.

> We believe that most Canadians would agree that our proposed distribution, or something close to it, represents a fair solution.

> One of the original purposes of the Senate, and indeed, of the federation itself, in 1867 was to help protect Canada's French-speaking minority. Today, that purpose can best be achieved by an elected Senate with a special voting procedure.

> We are therefore proposing that measures having linguistic significance be approved only by a double majority: that is, by a majority of francophone senators and by a majority of all senators. If such measures failed to be approved by the double majority, they would not become law, and Senate rejection of them could not be set aside by the House of Commons. For these measures, and for them alone, the Senate would have an absolute veto.

Contrary to other laws where it is stipulated that the Senate had a suspensive veto. I think that is very important.

[Senator Leblanc.]

> Our proposals for the design of an elected Senate are interdependent, and it is important that they be considered together.

And the numbers, the distribution and the powers . . .

> These proposals contain some novel features and will require public discussion.

Naturally, we will go out and probe the public opinion.

> To put in place any kind of elected Senate will require federal-provincial negotiation and subsequent constitutional amendment.

Of course, the Constitution will have to be amended to accommodate an elected Senate and that will mean consulting our friends the provinces.

> As regards that process, some witnesses from Quebec and some members of the Committee suggested that so far-reaching a change as the introduction of an elected Senate should not be implemented without the agreement of the National Assembly of Quebec. All this will take time. Meanwhile, certain reforms to the present Senate should be made now.

> These reforms are set out in detail in our report. They are designed to be consistent with an elected Senate, into which we hope the present Senate will evolve, and to help prepare the way for it. For a couple of members of our Committee, who believe that an elected Senate should be introduced only after a lengthy period of public discussion, these reforms are of particular importance. The reforms include the introduction of a fixed term for future appointments, the more flexible use of the Senate's powers in a way that could give the chamber a suspensive veto, and increased use of investigative committees. The implementation of these reforms will provide a basis for assessing how much more effective an appointed Senate would be and could confirm whether the Committee is justified in its judgement that the election of senators is necessary.

> Some witnesses said that reforms are needed in other institutions, such as the House of Commons and the Supreme Court. Our terms of reference do not allow us to comment on those suggestions. We should say, however, that the reforms we propose for the Senate do not preclude and need not delay any desirable reforms in other institutions.

That is the House of Commons and the Supreme Court.

> It is our conviction that an elected Senate along the lines we propose would strengthen Parliament and make a significant contribution to easing some of the tensions > that have troubled our country in the last decade. We believe that our conclusions on these important matters merit consideration by the federal and provincial governments and by all those who are concerned about our national well-being and the effectiveness of our political institutions.

> We urge the government to implement our recommendations as soon as practicable and request, pursuant to Standing Order 69(13), a comprehensive response to this report.

I do not know if the House of Commons has tabled a response to the report; I am not aware of that. The proceeding was new in the House of Commons. During the time that I was sitting in the House of Commons, that did not exist. The reports were tabled and the Government did not have to make comments or respond in any way to those reports that were tabled.

Later on, they changed the rule. They decided that the government would have to respond to major reports. I have no idea whether it ever did.

I will dispense with Chapter 2, "The Committee's Hearing and Decisions".

It deals with the historical background of the committee, where it went, with whom, etc. This has probably less significance just now.

On the other hand, I feel that Chapter 3, entitled "The Arguments for Senate Reform" is much more important.

> In this chapter we describe the arguments that have been made for reforming the Senate. These arguments spring from a belief that, in one way or another, the Senate has not filled its role adequately. It is therefore appropriate to look first at the role originally intended for it and at the evolution of that role.
> The original purpose of the Senate: The Senate was created in 1867 to fill not one but two major roles in the new federation. One was to protect and represent, so far as federal legislation was concerned, what Sir John A. Macdonald called "sectional interests". Sectional interests include those interests peculiar to a region or to a linguistic or religious group. In this report we use the more familiar term 'regional interests'. The other major role—

On course, in 1867.

> —was to help ensure political stability by acting as a counterweight to the popularly elected House of Commons. These two roles were to be carried out by the exercise of 'sober second thought'

"Second sober thought" indeed!

These two roles were to be carried out by the exercise of 'sober second thought' in the review of legislation emanating from the lower house—a house that drew its mandate from election based on population, although in those days the franchise was restricted.

As the powers of the national government in the federal system were to be relatively large, the Senate's check on the use of those powers was to be comparatively strong. The second chamber was given powers equal to those of the House of Commons except with regard to money bills.

The role of protecting and representing regional interests was reflected in the structure of the Senate. An equal voice was given to each of the three Senate divisions (or regions, as they have come to be called): Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime provinces. Each of the three regions—to which a western region was added later—had an equal number of seats, regardless of the size of its population.

This meant that both the less populous provinces and the predominantly French-speaking province of Quebec were to be given some protection against the wishes of a simple majority of Canada's population, as represented by the decisions of the House of Commons. Historians say that without this protection there would have been no federation. As George Brown, a prominent father of Confederation from Upper Canada, said: "Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give us representation by population in the lower house, on the express condition that they could have equality in the upper house. On no other condition could we have advanced a step."

This was of course for the protection of French-speaking Canadians in those days. Without this condition, I do not think there would have been a federation. The report seems to confirm that.

At the same time, it is our understanding that there was also a concern to ensure representation for the English-speaking minority in Quebec. This group, already protected in the Quebec Legislative Assembly by section 80 of the Constitution Act, 1867, received additional protection in the Senate. Each of the 24 senators for that province was to represent one of the 24 electoral divisions of Lower Canada and was to reside or own property there. Because of the way the anglophone and francophone populations were distributed within the province, this helped to ensure that some Quebec senators would be English-speaking.

The Senate's other role—acting as a counterweight to the popularly elected House of Commons—was reflected in the way senators were chosen. They were to be appointed rather than elected, > and only from among those citizens who were at least 30 years of age and who possessed property worth at least $4,000.

Things have not changed to this day.

They say that $4,000 was a fair amount of wealth in those days. I do not think you could ever compare $4,000 in 1867 and $4,000 in 1990.

> Implicit, therefore, in the role of the Senate were the representation and protection of several minorities: the people of the less populous provinces, the French- or English-speaking people of Quebec, and people with property.

Now let's talk about the evolution of the Senate's role.

> The most important development affecting the role of the Senate since 1867 has been the gradual change in public attitudes, not only in Canada but worldwide, toward appointed or indirectly elected legislative bodies. The resulting loss of political authority meant first that the Senate's use of its so-called absolute veto over federal legislation came to be resented and, subsequently, that the Senate was no longer prepared to use its powers except on rare occasions. The last bill to be rejected by the Senate was a 1961 government bill to change the Customs Act, although the Senate has successfully amended a number of bills since then. One important consequence of this development was that senators could no longer act as politically powerful representatives of regional interests. The Senate's role therefore evolved toward one that complemented rather than competed with the popularly elected House of Commons. Its principal functions are now improving legislation . . .

Through its committees, of course.

> . . . and investigating questions of public policy.

Honourable senators, I think I could suspend my presentation at this point. It would take a lot of time to read the whole report, and there is also an appendix to that report. The report is about sixty pages long.

You already have a good idea of what the committee wanted to recommend and the reasons behind those recommendations. I thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I rise as my colleagues have done to protest the abuse of the privileges that have been taken away from us and to protest the usurrping by the Speaker of the Senate rules of procedures of this chamber.

I rise also on another point, which is that is that we have now introduced a new dimension in the debates of this chamber, namely, legislation by exhaustion. This government, having obtained its majority, having trampled over the rules of the Senate, has now decided that the opposition is going to be allowed to speak for as long as it wants, but it is not going to reverse its stand. The government senators are not going to re-establish the rules they have trampled on but are going to allow us to speak until we are exhausted, until we drop, and then, at that time, they will pass their legislation.

I want to reassure the Leader of the Government in the Senate that on this side of the house we are on the right side of the issue. We have taken on this battle like a mission. For us it is a matter of principle. We are fighting for a principle, and therefore there is a will and conviction behind our fight. I can assure him that exhaustion will not make us lie down. We have a lot of troops on this side and everyone is geared up to continue this fight, and we will.

The moment the Leader of the Government got his majority he could not contain himself. He had to pull a fast one. It is obvious, as Senator Stewart said some time ago, that they do not know how to govern. They have been out of government for such a long time that they do not know how to govern. What did they do? Having broken the rules of the Senate, they proceeded to abuse the privileges of senators. They advised independent members by sending them a letter saying that a vote was going to be held at a particular time; but they did not advise other senators, particularly those on this side.

What did they do? At about 5 o'clock on October 4 a letter was sent out, purportedly from the Speaker's office, to the Leader of the Government and his deputy, to the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy, the two whips, and the six independent senators. No one else received that letter.

What happened? At 5 o'clock this letter was apparently delivered to the people mentioned, and at 5:25 the vote was taken.

Was this a vote of the Senate? It was not a vote of the Senate; it was a vote of the Conservative caucus. They used the red chamber for a meeting of their caucus. I would ask honourable senators to look at the list of members who are listed in the vote. They are all Conservatives.

Senator Corbin: Read the list.

Senator Bosa: I will read it. The list contains the following names: Atkins; Balfour; Barootes; Beaudoin; Beaulieu; Bélisle; Berntson; Bolduc; Buchanan . . .

Senator Stewart: No, no, he is against the GST.

Senator Hébert: It must have been a mistake.

Senator Bosa: But he is listed here. The list goes on: Carney; Castonguay; Chaput-Rolland; Cochrane; Cogger; Comeau; David; DeWare; Di Nino; Doody; Doyle; Everett—Senator Everett is an independent and he was invited to this caucus meeting. The list goes on: Eyton; Forrestall; Grimard; Hatfield; Johnson; Kelleher; Kelly; Keon; Kinsella; Lavoie-Roux; Lynch-Staunton; MacDonald (Halifax); Macquarrie; Marshall; Meighen; Molson—he is another independent. The list continues: Muir; Murray; Nurgitz; Oliver; Ottenheimer; Phillips, Poitras; Robertson; Roblin; Ross; Rossiter; Simard; Spivak; Sylvain; Teed; Tremblay; and Twinn. The list totalled 54. There was one abstention: Macdonald (Cape Breton), and he, apparently, was paired with Senator Lewis.

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, in fairness to Senator Buchanan, I would point out that Senator Buchanan is on record as being opposed to the goods and services tax. I hold in my hand a report dated October 20, 1989, from the Chronicle Herald, a Halifax newspaper. The dateline is Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. It states:

> Premier John Buchanan said Thursday the Mulroney government faces the prospect of a damaged Atlantic-Canadian economy.
> The premier, in an interview, said he is concerned about economic trends in the region.
> "I'd have to be living up on the moon not to be concerned, because I am concerned," Mr. Buchanan said Thursday following a cabinet meeting in Yarmouth.
> "I'm concerned, not so much with the political ramifications here as I am with the economy of this part of Canada."
> Mr. Buchanan said it is important that he and other Atlantic ministers voice their opposition to the Goods and Services Tax and Via Rail cutbacks during the first ministers conference in November.
> He said there must be a "rationalization" by the federal government concerning the way cuts are spread out.

> Mr. Buchanan said he was confident the Mulroney government will turn things around once it "recognizes and appreciates that these problems are not imaginary. They are real and . . . the present situation with respect to our economy is going to worsen."
> Mr. Buchanan said the GST, in particular, "is wrong in every possible way."
> "It's a consumers tax which will hurt the economy.
> "It will . . . fire up the flames of inflation . . . and impede economic development and therefore hurt and reduce provincial revenues; and that will hurt services," the premiere said.

That story goes on and on; yet Premier Buchanan's name appears in the list of elite senators, the "insiders", permitted to vote on October 4, 1990.

In view of his strong statement against the GST I think we should recognize that when he voted on October 4, it follows that he was voting only against the specific motion which was then before the House and not on the GST question. It is clear that when that question comes to the house he will be voting against the GST. I think that is almost inevitable. I say "almost" because if he votes for the GST he will have given new meaning to the most famous of the Canadian political stories. I am speaking of the story of a politician, which has been told repeatedly by Liberals and Conservatives, and, I suppose, New Democrats too. Let me recount it from a Liberal point of view.

A Conservative politician was travelling around his constituency. He talked affably to the people in one house. There was a little boy who was interested in this curious politician. He said, "Our cat, Nellie, has had six new kittens. Do you want to see them? The politician was led away to see the six kittens. After about ten days that politician happened to go back to the same house. He, of course, was extraordinarily affable—the election was almost at hand. He asked the father and the mother how they were and then the little boy how he was. He also asked the little boy, "How is the cat and how are the kittens?" "Oh," said the little boy, "The cat is still very well and the kittens are very much better." The politician asked, "Well, how is that?" And the little boy replied, "Well, they are all Liberals now." The politician said, "But I thought they were all Progressive Conservatives, because that is what you told me a few days ago when I was petting them"; to which the little boy replied, "Oh, but they have their eyes open now."

Honourable senators, it may be that Senator Buchanan has undergone a great change. The fact of becoming a senator may have changed his mind on the GST. He may have undergone transfiguration. He may see new virtues in the GST, virtues which were not evident when he was the premier of a relatively poor province at the extremities of Canada. I say "almost" because it is almost certain that he will vote against the GST, but, like the kittens, his eyes may have been opened. Now that he is a senator in Ottawa he may see things different from when he spoke in his own province.

[Senator Stewart.]

I am sorry to interrupt, but in defence of Senator Buchanan I thought these things ought to be said.

Senator Bosa: Thank you very much.

Senator Gigantès: May I ask Senator Stewart a question? Senator Stewart, must we expect from you, out of regional solidarity, that whenever the name of Senator Buchanan or, indeed, any other Nova Scotian from across the way, comes up, no matter what they have done, you will, out of this regional solidarity for which Nova Scotians are wonderfully well known, stand up and defend them regardless of what their attitude is, regardless of the fact that they may have sold their souls to Mulroney?

Senator Stewart: No, I think Senator Gigantès misunderstands my intervention.

Senator Gigantès: Please explain how.

Senator Stewart: When Senator Buchanan was premier of Nova Scotia and when he spoke in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia—-

Senator Gigantès: He was premier of Nova Scotia?

Senator Stewart: Yes, for a long time. When he spoke in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, on October 20, 1989, he spoke from the point of view of a premier who understood some of the implications of the GST on the economy of Nova Scotia. He has since been translated to the Ottawa scene, and it would appear—and I don't want to prejudge the case—that the central Canadian viewpoint is setting in.

Senator Gigantès: A plastic central Canadian viewpoint.

Senator Stewart: I don't know about that. The simple answer is this; that when someone from the Atlantic provinces speaks on behalf of the people of the Atlantic provinces, regardless of political position, I should applaud, and I would hope other honourable senators from that region would do the same.

• (2230)

Senator Gigantès: Do you expect applause from people from the other side, because they are from the same region you are from when you are defending the rights of your fellow Nova Scotians not to be taxed unjustly?

Senator Cogger: Did you get Senator Bosa's permission for this question?

Senator Gigantès: I have the permission of the honourable Senator Bosa to put a question to Senator Stewart, who has put a question to him. I am trying to get the purport of the question posed to Senator Bosa by Senator Stewart so that I can better understand the flavour and the context.

As you can see, I have Senator Bosa's permission.

Does the honourable Senator Stewart expect to see the same generosity of spirit and solidarity expressed by honourable senators opposite from his region, or have events since last Thursday convinced the honourable senator that some honourable senators opposite are beyond hope, especially one who comes from the university with which you are affiliated?

Senator Stewart: I appreciate the fact that Senator Bosa has yielded the floor to allow me to deal with this important point. It takes my mind back to the Confederation debates. The intention of the Fathers of Confederation was that senators coming from Quebec and the Maritime provinces would be alert to protect the people in those provinces from the dominance of Ontario, which it was expected would control the House of Commons under the principle of responsible government.

That is plain on the record, and that is why so much attention was given to the composition of the Senate when the Constitution was being written.

What has happened is that political parties have exerted their influence. I am sure that a very good case can be made for an elected Senate on the basis that it will tend to liberate senators from the sway of their party colleagues in the other place.

When we have an elected Senate, I feel confident that senators from Nova Scotia, senators from Newfoundland and elsewhere, will stand up to vote for the people in their province, that they will react to the letters and the telephone calls which must come to them from people who are threatened by a measure such as the goods and services tax.

In the meantime, until there is an elected Senate, one can only hope that considerations of what I have called the Prime Minister's shilling will not be too important.

Perhaps I should explain the expression "the Prime Minister's shilling".

There was a time in England when the navy and the army were recruited by rather dubious methods, a time when press gangs were used to recruit men for the navy, a time when the Queen's shilling was used as a technique to recruit people into the army. Recruiting officers would enter pubs, not early in the evening. There they would approach healthy young men at an opportune moment and offer them the Queen's shilling.

The acceptance of the Queen's shilling committed the recipient to service in the army. That is why the expression "to take the Queen's shilling" is a standard expression in English history.

I used that expression a couple of times this evening, and I felt I should explain it.

Honourable senators, there are senators who have taken the Prime Minister's shilling, and I know that they feel that they have a special commitment, particularly with regard to the GST. We even have been told by the Prime Minister that when the GST gets safely into the statute books, some of them will feel that they have done their duty and will fly away to their corporate board rooms.

When there is an elected Senate, the people from the regions will expect their senators to represent the interests of these regions; but, on the other hand, when we do not have that situation, senators will feel pressured—there is no doubt about this—in their caucus, by their leaders, to do what the party wants, which very often is what Ontario wants, and they will be told: "Forget the people in Nova Scotia; you are up here now." They will be told: "Forget the people in Newfoundland; you are up here now." They will be told to accept such things as the deregulation of air services, regardless of what that does to the people in Stephenville, Newfoundland, and regardless of what that does to the people in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, or the people in Charlottetown.

We know that such things happen. It does not help the people from Stephenville, Charlottetown or Yarmouth in any way at all.

Senator Frith: Or Bayfield.

Senator Stewart: This specific problem does not arise in the case of the place where I happen to live, but it did arise in the case of Stephenville, in the case of Charlottetown and Yarmouth. There are senators in this room who know what I am talking about. They intend to vote for the GST. Well, wait until they go back to Newfoundland; wait until they go back to Prince Edward Island; wait until they go back to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to continue asking questions of Senator Stewart, because he has raised a disturbing process and questions regarding something I have some doubt about and some difficulty with.

Do I have your permission?

Senator Cogger: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: I am all for an elected Senate. If senators cannot be elected, let us abolish the Senate. You have said that elected senators will represent their regions. Will they represent the interests of their people, or will they represent the majority? What happens if the majority is wrong?

I had a discussion on this with one of my colleagues opposite. What happens if the majority is wrong? Will elected senators defend the people they represent or the party that has won a majority, even though it may not be a majority of the people, even though that majority may have been won by the usual Madison Avenue techniques, which have been so well adapted, especially by the boardroom giants of those opposite, the sellers of Aspirin, the sellers of faulty cars, the sellers of trips to the Caribbean that fail, and all of these nice practices of the big business tycoons who support the Tory party.

Will the elected senators defend the interests of the people, or will they defend the misled people?

Senator Stewart: Perhaps we are asking Senator Bosa to be too patient. I am quick to admit that there may well be a great deal of truth in the fears that the honourable senator has expressed, but let me say this: If we had an elected Senate, I can guarantee that any senator intending to seek re-election, whether he be from Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island—and I can only speak for those areas—would think carefully before voting for this measure.

Senator Murray: Is this a question of privilege?

Senator Stewart: A question was asked of Senator Bosa and another question arose. I am trying to deal with the question that was put to me. I apologize if Senator Murray is disturbed by the notion that elected senators, particularly those who would seek re-election, would be more attentive to the interests of their people than they would be to the interest of the government.

I have one last word for Senator Gigantès. The concept of responsible government is subtle. It often is said that responsible government means that the executive government is responsible to the elected representatives of the people, and that the elected representatives of the people, in turn, are responsible to the electors.

I ask: What happens in the case of a Prime Minister who does not intend to run again? What happens when—and this is of concern to all of us, because all senators are scoffed at on the basis that they are not responsible to the electorate—that there are many people in the House of Commons who will not run again, perhaps many ministers of the Crown? This is not new with this government. This has been the case since 1867 in this country, as well as in the United Kingdom.

The doctrine that the elected representatives of the people are responsible to the people is, in large part, a myth, a myth imposed upon the people as a means of convincing them to accept the actions of the people they elected in the last election, perhaps two, three or more years ago.

Let us not be misled by mythology. Let us not be misled by the mythology that the elected representatives of the people always intend to go back for re-election and are, therefore, responsible.

Senator Bosa has been most patient, and I thank him for that.

Senator Bosa: Thank you. I assure honourable senators that when I get copies of today's Hansard, I will autograph them and deliver them to the senators whose names have been immortalized today.

Senator Gigantès: I will hang that copy with pride in my office.

● (2245)

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I want to draw your attention to something that appears in the Debates of the Senate of October 4, 1990, on the bottom of the second column of page 2342. You will read there that the Honourable Lowell Murray, Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, said:

> When Your Honour calls the division on this matter, my colleagues and I will be standing and calling for a recorded vote.

I want to back up one step. I want to read Rule 49 to you.

> (1) When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for "yeas" and the "nays" and shall thereupon decide whether the question has carried.
> (3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.

[Senator Stewart.]

What does that mean? On October 4 there was a motion moved by Senator Frith. Let me read to you what he said on that occasion, which is on the same page:

> Honourable senators, of course I am disappointed with the ruling. I am particularly disappointed because I think it is so clearly an attempt to strain the clear words of Rule 33 and turn to other rules based on the word "laconic". The very clarity of the section is what makes it not necessary to refer to other rules.
> However, I think the most important result of His Honour's ruling for the Senate is the consequences of it, and that means that something that is concerning a lot of people, is concerning the provinces, is apparently concerning a former Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, and appears to be concerning the media—and, according to my mail and telephone calls, concerning a lot of people—is not receivable. That is the question that we should clear up, namely, the status of the eight additional senators. I should think they would want this matter cleared up, and it appears that a lot of people do want it cleared up. It is the subject of law suits. It is the subject of a law suit that is in the process of being brought today, as I have said to the press and I am saying here now. That action is being brought by some of our colleagues in the Senate because people are so concerned that the matter should be clarified by the courts before we go any further.
> Those are the serious consequences of His Honour's ruling—that, in effect, we are prevented in the Senate from dealing with this.
> I believe this matter should be cleared up. We cannot properly do business in this place until the situation is clarified. Everyone is concerned about it. It keeps coming up again and again. We have to give ourselves time to get this matter clarified by reference to the court.
> I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Now what happens? The Leader of the Government had this situation cooked up long before it came to the Senate. He was going to trigger a standing vote if Senator Frith had not given him the opportunity to do so. He wanted to have a recorded vote as soon as possible, because he was going to put the Grits in their place. He was going to have a standing vote so that the bells would ring; and he knew that if the bells rang we would walk out and probably stay out longer than normally is the case. Had Senator Frith not moved that motion, Senator Murray would have done something to cause the motion to be moved. The evidence is here in Hansard on page 2342. When the Speaker rose to put the question, those opposite did not wait for the Speaker to say "Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?" and "Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?". The Speaker would then have said that in his opinion the "yeas" had it or the "nays" had it, in which case those who did not agree with the Speaker's opinion would have stood up and a recorded vote would have been asked for.

Before the Speaker put that question, the Leader of the Government in the Senate stood up, as did the Deputy Leader, and said:

> When Your Honour calls the division on this matter, my colleagues and I will be standing and calling for a recorded vote.

That is what happened. If he had not premeditated this event, why did he stand up before the Speaker put the question? He is an expert parliamentarian. He has been in this chamber for some 11 years and has been the Leader of the Government in the Senate for six years. He knows the rules of the Senate like the back of his hand. Why would he do that? Because he wanted to trigger this event so that he could put his ill-conceived plan into play.

Senator Corbin: Who did you say knows the rules?

Senator Bosa: Senator Lowell Murray, except that he got carried away with the emotion. They are not used to having power, and, consequently, the moment they had the majority they lost their cool. He dove head first into the situation. In doing so, he ruined the reputation of the Speaker. Senator Charbonneau is finished. The reputation of the Speaker has been ruined. The fact that he cooperated with the leadership—Senator Pitfield said yesterday that they were in collusion—also impacts on the Speaker, although the Speaker, in my opinion, was a victim and the only mistake he made was being loyal to the Conservative Party. He accepted the condition that was put on him by the leadership of the government.

Senator Hébert: But he had a choice. He could have said no.

Senator Bosa: He had a choice. Do you remember the televised debate during the election of 1984? Prime Minister Mulroney said "Yes, sir, you had a choice; you could have said no". The Speaker had a choice. He could have said no. While the primary responsibility lies on the shoulders of the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Prime Minister, much of it also lies on the shoulders of the Speaker, because he could have said no and he could have resigned with his reputation intact.

Here is a man who has had a brilliant military career. He served his country from 1942 to 1944. He had a successful business career. He is an important businessman. Until last week he also had an unblemished parliamentary career. He was a highly respected man who time and again rubbed shoulders with international leaders. But with the stroke of a pen they nullified him. The ultimate insult to the Speaker was perpetrated by the leader, which shows you that they are not well prepared for these things.

What did the leader do? Senator Thériault had risen on a question of privilege and said his rights had been violated because he had not been properly notified, as senators on the other side had been, that a vote was taking place. He said he had the same rights as other senators and he was complaining about the fact that he had not been notified. However, our whip had distributed copies of the Speaker's ruling, and the honourable senator complained about the fact that his copy was in English. After all, he is a French-speaking member and we are a bilingual country. Usually, when notices go out, especially from the Speaker's office, they are in both languages.

When Senator Lowell Murray heard this point of privilege, he immediately felt that he had to correct Senator Thériault's impression that the notice was only in English. What did he do? He retrieved the file that was sitting in front of Senator Doody, his deputy. He pulled out a sheet of paper, a letter, and he showed Senator Thériault the French version. In doing so he gave away his secret.

This is the emblem of Canada, and, because this is a copy, the emblem appears to be in black and white. The letter that was put on my desk by my whip was like that, as was everyone else's, except that of the leader. His letter contained the red emblem. Senator MacEachen, you were not present, but Senator Murray had a red emblem on his document, which means that he had the original. That was the ultimate insult to the Speaker of this chamber. Senator Murray showed everyone that he had the original of the letter and that it had been, therefore, drafted in his office with the cooperation of his colleagues and then handed to the Speaker, who had it distributed under his own name. That is a shame.

I noticed that, but I did not have the quickness of mind to say "You referred to a document and now you must table the document." When a minister rises and reads from a document, he is required by the rules to table that document. But we did not have him table the document, and when I pointed a finger at him and said that the Leader of the Government in the Senate had shown us the original letter, which means that he had concocted this plot a long time ago and that the ruling was made in his office, he did not deny it. Why did he not deny it?

Senator Hébert: Because it was true.

Senator Bosa: Because it was true. Today we have a chaotic situation in the Senate. That ruling forced us to fight, filibuster and demand that the ruling be redressed and that the Speaker resign so that we may restore proper Senate procedure to this chamber. We could not proceed as if nothing had happened because, after doing this, they would have done something else. But what is most surprising and most disappointing is that they have the majority, and they could have used that majority at the appropriate time in order to pass their legislation. They did not do so. They were trigger-happy.

● (2300)

Let us consider Senator Everett. He purports to speak for himself. I regret that he is not here, because I do not like to speak when he is absent from the chamber; but this is my turn to speak. I am sorry that he did not come to the Senate today. I do not think I am doing anything wrong, however. If he finds that what I am saying is incorrect, he can always rise on a question of privilege to rebut it.

There was another rule broken when the vote was taken, when the Conservative caucus had its meeting in this chamber and the Speaker, acting as Chairman of the Conservative caucus, allowed the Conservatives to vote by themselves.

The rule book stipulates that in order for a vote to take place the two whips have to walk in, and then the doors are locked. This is a recent amendment to the rules. Let me show honourable senators what happened. This is what Senator Everett said at page 2365 of the Debates of the Senate:

> Honourable senators, I have been pilloried and insulted this evening by people whom I hold in high regard and whom I like dearly. Why would I put myself in a position to be treated in this manner? Surely I would only do so if I felt extremely strongly about my actions.

In other words, Senator Everett is speaking from conviction. He satisfied himself as to that. He came to the chamber and some senators questioned some of the things he was saying.

He went on to say:

> It would have been easier to have stayed in my office—
> An Hon. Senator: Yes.
> Senator Everett: —and avoided the vote.
> Senator Perrault: At least you got a letter!
> Senator Everett: It would have been easier to have stayed in my office and not have pushed my way in, as I did.

Then I made an intervention. I did so because when the bell stopped I came out of my office. I saw him rush into the chamber and I said to him: "The doors were closed!" Senator Everett stated: "That is right."

Listen to the absurdity of what he said a little later—and, believe me, he was trying to make a point. I will read the preceding paragraph so that we can have this in sequence. He stated:

> It would have been easier to have avoided the vote this evening and waited until the vote was called on the GST. Incidentally, I still do not know how I will vote on the GST.

He is giving us notice that he is not committed to supporting the GST, but he says that he has not made up his mind yet. He then goes on:

> Why did I do that? Because I feel strongly about a principle, a principle that I feel has wrecked friendships. If my actions have caused people I like to be unhappy, it has been worthwhile because of that principle. That principle is that the work of Parliament must go forward. I would attack the Liberal side or the government side if the business of Parliament is unnecessarily delayed.

Senator Everett is an arbiter, an umpire—he is a Pope. He then goes on to say:

> I spoke against Senator Murray's point of order, as I thought it was a delay of Parliament. I strongly believe that the progress and process of legislation should go forth.

Here comes the crunch:

[Senator Bosa.]

> What has happened here is not a delay in the normal course of debate; it is not even a filibuster that I could enjoy, in which we could all take part, and one that might go on all night and all day. That is part of the legislative process.

So he accepts a filibuster. Senator Cools stated:

> It will go all night and day!
> Senator Everett: Believe me, when the bells are allowed to ring from Thursday until the following Tuesday, that is not part of the legislative process.

Honourable senators know that traditionally the Senate sits on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. What happened on September 27 was that there was a motion for adjournment at around 3:30 or 4:00— between 3:00 and 4:00, at any rate.

Senator Hébert: It is on the record.

Senator Bosa: My point is that usually we adjourn at that time. We adjourn at around four o'clock. There have been times when we had nothing on the order paper and adjourned earlier than that. But that particular day I believe we adjourned at 3:30. Well, we did not adjourn; we walked out, because we learned that the Leader of the Government in the Senate was surreptitiously going to usher eight British senators into this chamber. They were going to catch us by surprise; but we have some people on this side who opened their eyes and saw what was happening.

In order to prevent that, because it was a surreptitious action on their part, we moved the adjournment of the house and that is a non-debatable motion. Therefore, the bells had to ring and, in order for the vote to take place, the two whips would have had to walk in.

We walked out in protest because the Leader of the Opposition had sent a letter to the Governor General saying that before he made his recommendation to the Queen about the appointment of those eight senators—

Senator Hébert: So-called senators.

Senator Bosa: Yes, because the matter is now before the courts. I thank Senator Hébert for helping me.

What happened? The Governor General did not heed the request of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Bosa: He did not heed the request of Mr. Gray, the Acting Leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in the House of Commons. He did not heed the request of those two gentlemen. He went ahead and made his recommendation to the Queen anyway.

Senator Haidasz: Arrogance!

Senator Bosa: That was real arrogance. We decided that we were going to boycott that, that we were going to protest that. The leaders of Her Majesty's Opposition in both houses were denied access to something that historically is their right. They were denied the right. They were denied the right to make a presentation to the Governor General.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Bosa: That is the reason why we allowed the bells to ring and we walked out.

Senator Everett said that we allowed the bells to ring from Thursday until Tuesday. But we were back in the chamber at 2 o'clock Tuesday afternoon. So, yes, it is true that we left the chamber on a motion to adjourn and did not come in to vote, but it is also true that it is an established tradition in this chamber that we only sit three days a week, with some exceptions.

Senator Hébert: Of course; we have the committee work.

Senator Bosa: Of course, the committees. But there have been other exceptions. We have sat on Fridays and we have sat on Mondays.

When I was a member of the Special Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety, chaired by Senator Kelly—I say this in jest; please don't take it personally—he was a real slave driver. He made us sit on Friday from 8:00 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. He made us sit on Saturdays from 8:00 a.m. to 10:00 p.m. He made us sit on Mondays from 8:00 a.m. to 10:00 p.m. And we ate sandwiches—dry, stale sandwiches.

Senator Hébert: You are getting your revenge now.

Senator Bosa: I am afraid to get my revenge, because I might gain weight.

At any rate, I repeat that the Senate usually sits three days a week. That particular week we sat for three days and returned on Tuesday, yet Senator Everett says, "Believe me, when the bells are allowed to ring from Thursday until the following Tuesday, that is not part of the legislative process."

Honourable senators, I do not know whom he is defending. Why did he not say, for instance, that the Speaker's ruling was wrong? He may want to be impartial; Senator Davey Steuart referred to him as being sanctimonious. But if somebody wants to be impartial, he ought to be impartial all the time, not only some of the time.

Honourable senators, Senator Everett knows the rules. Do you mean to say that Senator Everett did not know that the Speaker of this house had distorted that ruling, that it was an unprecedented ruling? Do you mean to say that Senator Everett did not know? Senator Hébert, I am asking you. You know Senator Everett.

Senator Hébert: I know him a little. I thought I knew him better.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I do not think he acted impartially when he made those statements. When he comes back, if he thinks that I have abused his—

Senator Corbin: To whom are you referring?

Senator Bosa: Senator Everett.

Senator Corbin: Oh, when he comes back.

Senator Bosa: Yes, when he comes back.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bosa, are you now moving off that particular question of privilege? If you are, I should like to put a question to you.

Senator Bosa: Yes, go ahead and put a question.

Senator Corbin: Would you accept one?

Senator Bosa: Sure.

Senator Corbin: Earlier you quoted from the Debates of the Senate. I was working, as usual, on the French text. You alluded to a ruling by the Chair, at page 2342, or you were quoting the Speaker, who said:

> After careful reflection and study, it seems to me that the terms of Rule 33 are rather laconic. Therefore I have first to be conscious of the Senate's Rule 1:

Senator Bosa: Did you say that now? Who said that?

Senator Corbin: You were quoting the Speaker, who said that.

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Corbin: This appears at page 2342 of Hansard, the second paragraph on the left hand side of the page. The Speaker said:

> After careful reflection and study, it seems to me that the terms of Rule 33 are rather laconic.

Have you got that?

Senator Bosa: Yes. They are clear, in other words.

Senator Corbin: They are clear. Do you feel that "laconic" means that they are clear? Is that your understanding of the term "laconic"?

Senator Bosa: That is my understanding, yes.

Senator Corbin: Let us for the moment accept your definition, and bear with me. I want to pursue this, if you wish, before you answer.

The Speaker continues: "Therefore I have first to be conscious of the Senate's Rule 1," and then he goes on to quote citation 84 at page 25 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition.

When something is clear to you, do you need to go to another rule or to an interpretation to understand the meaning of a laconic rule? The Speaker, of course, was making a reflection. He was making a reflection from his position in the Chair on the rule of the Senate, a rule which all senators adopted many years ago. It is one of the older rules in this book, as I understand it. I think it is even older than Senator Molson, who was once a chairman of the Rules Committee.

What does rule 33 state? It states:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

Senator Bosa, accepting your understanding of the word "laconic," and accepting that the Speaker has the same understanding of the meaning of that word, why in the world did he not accept rule 33 at face value? Can you explain that to me?

Before you answer that question, I should like to be clear as to the meaning of the word "laconic." I deliberately looked into Webster's Third New International Dictionary of the English Language Unabridged. I turned to the word "laconic" and all the derivatives of that word. I will read them now so that we have an understanding of what people who write dictionaries understand of the meaning of that word.

The recitation begins with the word "laconian." It states that it is an adjective that is usually capitalized and is from the Latin Laconia, a region of ancient Greece; and from the Greek Lakon, noun and adjective, plus the English "an", Laconian. The meanings are as follows:

> 1: of, relating to, or characteristic of Laconia, a region of ancient Greece.

I know an area in New Hampshire that is called Laconia Notch. When you come through that notch you can see the face of the old man of the mountain up in the hill. It is a geological marvel. Of course, the Americans have exploited that, as they exploit just about every landmark possible. That is one meaning of "laconian."

The second meaning states:

> ..of, relating to, or characteristic of the people of Laconia.

I see Senator Gigantès listening attentively. The honour of his people are at stake here. I wish he would add to my comments later.

Those are two definitions for the word "laconian." There is another definition of the term "laconian" when it is used as a noun and capitalized. It states:

> ..a native or inhabitant of Laconia.

There is then the definition of the word "laconic," which is what the Speaker used in his ruling. He thought that rule 33, which relates to questions of privilege, was laconic. Let us see what "laconic" means, according to people who write up dictionaries.

Senator Bosa: May I ask a question?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Bosa: What is the word above "laconic" or "laconian?"

Senator Corbin: "Laconian?"

Senator Bosa: What is the word above? Are you reading from a dictionary?

Senator Corbin: Yes, I am reading from the blue dictionary on the Table, Webster's. I see that you have Oxford. That Oxford dictionary was not there when I consulted the Table, so I am using Webster's Third New International Dictionary. Let us stick to one dictionary; it is tough enough to get a meaning of this word.

I am at the word "laconic." It comes from the Latin Laconicus; from the Greek Lakonikos, from Lakon, Laconian, and so on. Those are the roots of it. It further states:

[Senator Corbin.]

> 1 archaic, usually capital: of or relating to Laconia or the Laconians: SPARTAN

"Laconic" can mean "Spartan" in its old sense. It goes on to state:

> 2 a: speaking or writing with Spartan brevity:—

You said that "laconic" in your mind means "clear". They say here that "laconic" alludes to the brevity of something—a citation or definition, or whatever.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senator, have you finished with the Webster's definitions, or are there more?

Senator Corbin: There are more. May I continue?

Senator Gigantès: When you are finished I should like to comment on that, if you and Senator Bosa will also allow it, because the ancient Greek language is my field of specialty.

Senator Corbin: Not only that, I think it is your duty to intervene, my honourable friend.

The second definition is:

> . . . speaking or writing with Spartan brevity: CURT, TERSE, UNDEMONSTRATIVE.

They then give literary examples taken from literature. There is "Laconic, these Indians." That was written by Weston LaBarre. There is another quotation which states: "an antiseptic romance between Jones and a laconic young widow." That was from Martin Levin. Is it in that sense that the Speaker was using the word "laconic?" I do not know; he has not explained it to us. It probably sounded nice and had a nice ring or resonance to it, so he thought he should use it and from there go to other interpretations of the rules rather than stick to the rules.

Definition 2b of "laconic" states:

> b: spoken, written or expressed briefly or sententiously: PITHY—

There is another example from the pages of literature. It states: "the tone of the commentary laconic and masculine." That was taken from the Times Literary Supplement. There is another literary example. It states:

> ..a laconic derby-hatted interlude that stops the show.

Henry Hewes is the author of that. For a synonym for "laconic" it states "see CONCISE." Another definition follows that one for "laconic." It states:

> 1: a laconic person 2 a: curt or concise expression b laconics pl: concise sentences—

I do not know what the Speaker has against laconic rules or laconic statements, but to me it seems like darned good stuff. It is brief, it is to the point, it is Spartan and crystal clear.

We now go to the word "laconical," adjective from "laconic." There is then "laconically". The dictionary states:

> . . . in a laconic manner.

There is then "laconicism." There is an example from literature here again. It states:

> . . . one of the most heroic laconcisms of all literature.

That was written by D.C. Smith. There is then the word "laconicum" from the same root in the singular. In the plural it is laconica. The definition states:

> . . . the sweating room of an ancient Roman bath.

That is probably where the Speaker is right now, namely, in the laconicum. There are then two more words that come from the same root. "Laconism", again comes from the Greek. The definition states:

> . . . imitation of Lacedaemonian manners, esp. in terseness of expression, fr. lakonizein to speak laconically, laconize}

Definition one of "laconism" states:

> . . . brevity or terseness of expression.

The literary example states:

> . . . the provocative laconism of the newspaper headline, which conceals meaning almost as often as it expresses it.

That was from B.R. Redman. Definition 2 of laconism states:

> . . . a laconic expression.

Finally under that litany of laconic words is "laconize", which is a verb. The definition states:

> vi: to incline to the Spartan cause or manner: to subject to Spartan rule.

Senator Bosa, I certainly will not prevent you from quoting Oxford. They may come up with other jewels.

Now that you have heard me recite these definitions in various versions of the word "laconic," have you a better understanding of what the Speaker was trying to achieve?

Senator Bosa: Oh, yes.

Senator Corbin: Can you elaborate on your thoughts? It would be most useful to understand how that person's thinking functions, because I just do not understand it.

Senator Gigantès: Perhaps I could clarify this.

Senator Bosa: Yes, if you would just bear with me for a second, Senator Gigantès.

I, too, took the liberty of taking the Oxford dictionary from the Table to look up the precise meaning of "laconic." It does give the explanation that you have so laconically given, Senator Corbin. It states that laconic is brief, concise, sententious, given to such speech or style, hence, laconically.

It goes on to state that "laconicism" is derived from the Latin and the Greek and has to do with the Spartans being known for their terse speech.

This is the version that I have. But above the word "laconic" is the word "laconian", and above the word "laconian" is the word "lackey". You know what lackey means, do you?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Bosa: It is all in connection with the same thing.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: The Spartans, who were also known as Laconians, were known for their terse but precise speech. For example, when a young Spartan was going to war, his mother would say to him: "Come back with your shield on"—except she cut it down to the smallest number of words.

When Leonidas was defending phonetically against the Persians, the Persians summoned him to surrender the Spartan weapons. He used two words in answer: Molon lake—two words. We would say, "Come and get it." But nothing was unclear. It was terse but perfectly clear, which is characteristic of rule 33. It is terse and brief, because you do not have to confuse the meaning. Generally, when people use too many words in the rules, it means that people have either a confused mind—which is very characteristic of a Tory mind—or they have something to hide. They want to have grounds for trickery and certainly 33 gives no such grounds whatsoever. It is too clear.

• (2330)

Senator Bosa: The Hansard reporter has just left and she could not possibly have taken down the words that you uttered a few moments ago which were not English. They probably sounded all Greek to her. Perhaps you would spell them for her.

Senator Gigantès: I will give them to the reporters in writing.

At the same battle of Thermopylae when Leonidas had said, "Molon Labe" the Persians then said to him that if they fired all their arrows the sun would be hidden and Leonidas answered, "Good shade." There was no mistaking his meaning and there never was mistaking the meaning of Spartus, one of the very best speeches in Thucydides which is replete with great speeches. There is a very short one paragraph speech by the representative of Sparta and therefore a representative of the Spartan Senate which ruled Sparta. In other words, it was not the House of Commons that ruled in Sparta, it was the Senate.

Senator Hébert: Was it elected?

Senator Gigantès: No, it was not elected. That speech is superb and it is an indictment of the Athenian empire. I have not forgiven the Spartans for defeating Athens in the 5th century B.C. This was an indictment of the Athenian empire so pithy it absolutely grabs you by the guts with its clarity as Article 33 does. It said very simply that when a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate . . ." there is no doubt about that.

Senator Corbin: May I interrupt for a moment.

Senator Gigantès: Sir, I will yield to you. You are senior to me, though younger.

Senator Corbin: It has nothing to do with that. What we are attempting to do here is to shed light on a difficult pronouncement made by the Speaker.

Can something that is laconic be termed "rather laconic"? Let us take an expression used by Senator Beaudoin which is "clear cut." When you speak of something laconic, can you say it is "rather laconic?" It seems to me that is muddying the term rather than crystallizing it.

Senator Gigantès: It is rather like saying "rather unique" or "rather pregnant." You are either pregnant or you are not, or you are unique or you are not. There can be no "rather" attached to laconic. You are either laconic or you are not; but article 53 is.

Senator Corbin: One is a chicken but not more or less a chicken.

Senator Gigantès: It is like "more or less pregnant," as I said.

Senator Corbin: Excuse my interruption, Senator Bosa, since you were the original speaker.

Senator Bosa: Thank you very much for the explanation of the word "laconic."

Honourable senators, English, which is my third language, is a language I started speaking in Italy. My first teacher was Flying Officer MacRae from Aberdeen, Scotland. In fact, the first song I learned that I thought was an English song was Just a Wee Deoch-an-Duoris. I didn't find out it was a Scotish song until I came to Canada in 1948.

Senator Petten: Would you sing it for us?

Senator Bosa: Do you want me to?

Senator Petten: Yes.

Senator Bosa: The first line is:

Just a wee deoch-n-duoris,
Just a wee yin, that's a'
Just a wee deoch-n-duoris
'Afore ye gang awa'
There's a wee wifie waitin'
By a wee but 'n'ben
If ye can say "It's a braw brecht moonlecht necht"
Yer a' recht, ye ken.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bosa: Perhaps I may come back to the point I was making. Senator Everett made an intervention after Senator Grafstein had spoken.

Senator Muir: I was born in Scotland.

Senator Bosa: Do you identify with my accent? Was my Scottish accent all right?

Senator Muir: We could certainly all hear you.

Senator Bosa: When I sang Just a Wee Deoch-n-Duoris, did you understand me?

Senator Muir: No, no.

Senator Bosa: I will sing it to you in private in the reading room.

Honourable senators, Senator Grafstein was addressing the Senate and he started out by saying the following:

> Honourable senators, I should like to rise in partial response to the honourable gentlemen and ladies who have recently entered this chamber and bring to the government's attention—and to the attention of all honourable senators—a serious problem relating to the consequences of proceeding with matters in this chamber, as well as matters on the other side, if some serious question arises with respect to the constitution of both this and the other House.

We can certainly tell that Senator Grafstein is a lawyer. This is not very laconic. He goes on to say:

> I see that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is smiling. Let me, with some seriousness, address an issue that was brought to my attention by learned counsel today. I asked—as have all of us—legal counsel and others about the consequences of proceeding if there is some taint, either in this place or the other place, with respect to legislation or votes that might go forward. I am sure that if all honourable senators would seek their own counsel on this, they might also find that there are several serious consequences.
> The first one, in particular, is the consequence of the government's proceeding with a tax measure. The tax measure carries, and a court subsequently finds that the tax measure is ultra vires because of the Constitution of this place or the other place. The dire consequences for all taxpayers in Canada is the following—and this took place in British Columbia.
> Air Canada proceeded to challenge legislation introduced in British Columbia to put a tax on airplane gasoline. The Supreme Court of Canada this year found that that tax measure was ultra vires. However, the consequence was that the Supreme Court of Canada found that Air Canada could not collect from the government the money it had paid under a law that was ultra vires—that is unconstitutional.

This is a legal argument. I do not have a legal argument since I only studied commercial law but I do think I got the gist of his argument.

He went on to say:

> The consequence here could be that the Canadian taxpayers could, in due conscience, proceed to pay tax pursuant to tax measures passed either in this place or the other place, and a year or six months from today it could be found that this house or the other was not properly constituted and the tainted tax measures, as a result, were unconstitutional. Each Canadian taxpayer would then be in a position of not being able to claim back the moneys that he had paid. That surely is a serious question for all citizens of this country.

The contention now is that New Brunswick has more senators than members of the House of Commons and that is the legal point which is now before the courts and which will be dealt with on Friday, if my information is correct. Senator Grafstein went on to say:

> An even more serious question concerns another pending vote that we have, which deals with the most controversial legislation we will see in this decade—not on the GST but the abortion legislation, which includes criminal consequences. Think, honourable senators, as I have tried to do in the last few days, of what will happen > if subsequently such a measure comes forward, as it will; if such a measure is proceeded with, as it will be; if a vote is taken, as will be done; and subsequently a court finds that this house was controverted due to its constitution.

He was referring to the eight new senators that have been appointed with the permission of the Queen, and that the fact that they might not be legally considered to be bona fide senators of this chamber. At this point Senator Murray made an intervention. He said:

> I thought that you were going to call for a vote on that!

Senator Grafstein then went on to say:

> Think of the consequences and the concern that every Canadian citizen would have with respect to law and order in this country; respect for peace, order and good government.
> I raise this not as a whimsical matter. I am very sympathetic toward the honourable gentlemen and ladies who have recently entered this place and, more specifically, toward the comments made by my friend to the far right.

Then Senator Murray intervened by saying:

> That is Senator Meighen.

> This is a matter that should be of concern not only to members on this side but to all members and to the Honourable Speaker.

Honourable senators, some of these eight divisional senators are the most distinguished people in our society and they are being subjected to this humiliation concerning whether their appointment was legal. It must be humiliating to be in such a position and they must feel very uncomfortable because they were, I am sure, called by the Prime Minister who asked them, "Please give me a hand. This is what is happening." He probably did not explain to them all the consequences, and now they sit there.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senator, you are talking of them in their absence.

Senator Bosa: I am not denigrating them. I know they are on a roster in order to keep up with our prolonged debate.

Senator Corbin: Are you aware, Senator Bosa, that they are not respecting their call to this place? You seem to want to excuse the divisional senators for their absence here tonight, and yet I can quote from the writs which are placed on the Journals of the Senate of October 3, 1990. I will skip the official preamble which includes the names of the Governor General and Her Majesty the Queen and continue on. It states:

> TO
> Our Trusty and Well-beloved
> WALTER PATRICK TWINN

and then, honourable senators, I would list the names which are: Wilbert Joseph Keon; Michael Arthur Meighen; Normand Grimard; Thérèse Lavoie-Roux; James W. Ross; John Michael Forrestall—and I give credit to him because he is one who understands Parliament. I have know him for many years. He is one who understands Parliament. I will give him full credit for that. I have known him for many years.

• (2345)

Then there is Janis Johnson and Eric Arthur Berntson.

The writer states:

> GREETING:
> KNOW YOU, that as well for the especial trust and confidence We have manifested in you, as for the purpose of obtaining your advice and assistance in all weighty and arduous affairs which may the State and Defence of Canada concern, We have thought fit to summon you to the Senate of Canada and We do appoint you for the division of the Maritimes.
> AND WE do commend you that all difficulties and excuses whatsoever laying aside, you be and appear, for the purposes aforesaid, in the Senate of Canada at all times whensoever and wheresoever Our Parliament may be in Canada convoked and holden, and this you are in no wise to omit.

Where are these senators? In bed? After Her Majesty has commanded them to be in this place when and wherever it sits? I think Senator Bosa is treating these people too lightly. They should respect the command of Her Majesty. Do not excuse their absence. They ought to be here, as we are.

Senator Bosa: I thank Senator Corbin for drawing that to my attention.

What were you reading from, for the benefit of all honourable senators?

Senator Corbin: I was reading from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate No. 95 for Wednesday, 3rd October, 1990.

Senator Bosa: I have a copy of that.

Senator Grafstein ends his speech by stating:

> This is a matter that should be of concern not only to members on this side but to all members and to the Honourable Speaker.

Then Senator Beaudoin takes the floor.

Senator Hébert: Who is that?

Senator Bosa: Our constitutional expert.

Senator Hébert: For whom everything is still clear.

Senator Bosa: Senator Beaudoin took the floor in defence of the contention Senator Grafstein had made, that perhaps there is an element of doubt in the legality of the so-called "British senators". Senator Beaudoin states:

> Honourable senators, if I may reply to that point of law.

I was listening very carefully to what Senator Meighen just said. If the question of the unconstitutionality of a nomination may be raised following a report by the Clerk of the Senate, which is an obvious proof that a senator is sitting here in a perfectly legal way, well, the same thing could be said for every senator here.

I find it surprising that a question of privilege can be raised immediately following a ruling made by the Speaker of this House.

He went on to state:

Rule 33 says:". . . has arisen". What happened since the Speaker made his ruling? It is simply that some senators here do not agree with it. One cannot raise a question of privilege because one does not agree with the Speaker's ruling. The Speaker made his ruling. Now it is this House's ruling. On that point, I think I agree with what the government leader has just said, that it is a repetition of the same argument which we heard yesterday following the Speaker's ruling. I think this behaviour is contrary to the rules of this Chamber.

I did not hear Senator Beaudoin make any comments on the ruling the Speaker made, and whether that was contrary to the conventions and rules of the Senate. But he did say that it was contrary to the rules of this chamber.

He goes on to state:

About the point of law that has just been raised, you ask: what would happen if we find out in six months that eight senators are seating here illegally? This would not invalidate their work. What they would have been doing would be absolutely valid. There is such a thing in law as the principle of de facto. Should there be ever a judicial hearing, the courts would deliver a verdict in due time.

He was very emphatic about that, as if he sat on the bench and knows what the courts would do.

He goes on to state:

I say once again that the eight senators have the right to sit in this Chamber. The eight senators who have been appointed, and we have the report from the clerk, sit here in conformity with the law and the Constitution. I think we must get on with the debate on the matters before us. If later on the courts give a ruling, then it would be another matter. It would be another debate.

He says that if the courts determine that the senators are here illegally, there will be another debate on this. He does not bother with the matter then. He just proceeds.

Senator Hébert: I will be looking forward to that debate.

Senator Bosa: He then states:

I will also reply briefly to Hon. Senator Gigantès who read at length from a long newspaper article. The person who wrote the article says section 26 is null and void. To prove his point, he goes back one hundred years and re-writes the section to show what it means. There is no stopping history! The Queen of the United Kingdom was our Queen in 1867. She is today the Queen of Canada.

[Senator Bosa.]

The Governor General who was the representative of the British government in the past represents now the Queen of Canada. Section 26 cannot be changed. It remains what it is. Everybody knows, and the Supreme Court said so many times, that constitutional law is constantly evolving. The Constitution cannot be interpreted today as it was in 1867. Keep playing that game and we will revert to colonialism. We will revert to the status we had in 1867. How preposterous.

The eight senators that have been appointed are Canadian senators. They are not "British" senators:

Then Senator Frith intervenes and states:

You are substantiating my motion. Keep up the good work, Senator Beaudoin.

Senator Beaudoin replied:

You started the debate.

To which Senator Grafstein stated:

Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Beaudoin agreed, and Senator Grafstein asked:

Would the honourable senator not agree that it would be in the national interest to have the question of uncertainty put to rest as quickly as possible?

That was a reasonable request. We should find out if they were legally appointed, and, if so, we could put the matter to bed right away and not have to deal with the matter any longer.

Senator Beaudoin, in response, stated:

No, I disagree strongly on that point, senator. I have not seen thus far any opinion from any expert in this country which has clearly demonstrated that section 26 is obsolete. If there is such opinion, I would like to see it.

Even the article which the honourable senator opposite has quoted is not entirely affirmative. If it were, it is clear that it could not be said about section 26, "Okay, the Constitution is frozen at 1867. The Queen is not the queen of Canada." I regret to say that our history is there. The Queen is the Queen of Canada. The advisor to the Queen is the Prime Minister of Canada.

The Clerk says that the new senators qualify as to property, and that they have sworn the oath of allegiance.

That is to state that they have sworn the oath and have sworn that they own $4,000 in property in the province they represent, or in the division they represent, and that they are over 30 years of age.

Senator Beaudoin went on to state:

That is the end of it. You may go to the Supreme Court, but you will lose.

Senator Grafstein replied as follows:

The decisions of the courts are obviously difficult to predict. There appears to be serious divided opinion on this issue, not just in this place but in some of the regions represented by honourable senators. The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario are raising these serious issues. Those are uncontroverted facts. I see that the former Premier of the Province of New Brunswick is agreeing with me—

That means that Senator Hatfield was nodding his head while Senator Grafstein was speaking, and he is a Conservative senator. He sits on the other side.

Senator Grafstein went on to state:

I see that the former Premier of the Province of New Brunswick is agreeing with me when I say that there are provinces which are contesting this matter. Thus, there is serious division in the country on important constitutional matters.

It is quite true, as the honourable senator has said, that it might be, in his view, clear. Obviously, it is not in others.

Since this place and the other place are now being held in some disregard in the country, would it not be in the national interest for the government, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to bring these matters to a head as quickly as possible, and to agree to a reference as quickly as possible so that provinces and individuals would not have to pursue their courses of action which might take months or years in the courts?

This is the argument Senator Grafstein put forward. He continued to state:

Senator Beaudoin, as a distinguished Dean of Law, would you not agree that that would be in the national interest? In order to facilitate that, would you not impose upon your side to bring the matter forward? I am sure that this side of the Senate and the Opposition in the other place would concur in order that we could, in the national interest, bring these matters to a head. If we are wrong, that will be the end of it. However, if you are wrong, there are serious consequences.

Senator Grafstein presented his case clearly and concisely. I was impressed with the points he made. Even though I am not a lawyer, I understood what he was saying.

Senator Hébert: That was crystal clear.

Senator Bosa: Yes, crystal clear.

October 11, 1990

To continue:

Senator Beaudoin: I will add one last comment. When something is clear cut, there is no need to refer it to the court. If matters that are clear cut are referred to the court, we will always be before the courts. We make a reference to the Supreme Court when we have a doubt. We just do not have a doubt.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I should like to ask Senator Beaudoin a question. It is helpful to have the benefit of his professional advice.

In the memorandum prepared by the Library of Parliament, we are told that when the British North American Act was being prepared, Lord Carnarvon noted—

Senator Roblin: We have heard this about 15 times before.

Senator Stewart: Yes, but this afternoon we have the opportunity of having genuine expert guidance on its interpretation. I do not think we should let that opportunity slide by.

Senator Balfour: Are you being sarcastic?

Senator Stewart: If an honourable senator on the government side is questioning the credentials of Senator Beaudoin, I certainly do not concur with that honourable senator.

Senator Roblin: Come on, you can do better than that.

Senator Stewart: I take Senator Beaudoin quite seriously. I am asking a serious question on which he may be able to give us guidance.

Lord Carnarvon, we are told, noted two other conditions added by the delegates from British North America: that the appointments should be made by the Crown, rather than the Governor General, and that their number should not exceed six. He added that:

The intervention of the Crown is to my mind a doubtful proposal: but it is designed to be a check upon popular feeling and the action of the Local Government and I do not see that we can take exception to it.

Those were his Lordship's words. They are, of course, not statute law.

I should like to turn now to the British North America Act, as it was then called. The scheme explained by Lord Carnarvon is embodied there. Provision is made in section 24 for the summoning of ordinary senators by the Governor General on the advice of the Prime Minister.

If we then turn to section 26 we find an entirely different procedure. Section 26, in part, reads:

If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit . . .

It is clear that different tests are being applied in the case of the senators to be summoned under section 26.

Nevertheless, Senator Beaudoin tells us this afternoon that, in effect, the two sections say the same thing. The Prime Minister advises; the Governor General summons. In both cases, there are limitations as to the numbers to be summoned; in both cases there are requirements as to where the senators may come from. The fact that the Act contains these two separate sections led me to believe that an attempt was made—and I believe a successful attempt—to ensure that there was, as Lord Carnarvon said, a desire that the Crown—which at that time meant the Queen as advised by Her British ministers-would exercise a check upon the Canadian Prime Minister. That is why we have the two sections and not one. That is my interpretation. I believe I see Senator Beaudoin giving a nod to that.

Senator Beaudoin says that now "the Queen" in section 26 means the Queen as advised by Her Canadian ministers. He said that yesterday and he repeated it emphatically today.

There are two quite distinct processes. The second process seems designed to achieve impartiality. I think Senator Beaudoin is correct when he says that "the Queen" now means the Queen acting on the advice of Her Canadian ministers. However, the intention of section 26—the manifest purpose of which is an appeal to an impartial body when there is an alleged stalemate between the ministers and the Senate—can no longer be achieved by reason of the changes to which Senator Beaudoin has made reference. Has section 26 become a limited version of section 24? I need assistance on that point, and I will listen carefully to Senator Beaudoin's reply.

Senator Beaudoin: We are debating a question of privilege and a point of order. I do not want to postpone the decision of the Speaker; on the contrary.

What I have to say has already been said. The only point I should like to make at this time is that the Supreme Court is interpreting the Constitution of Canada today; we are in 1990. The Constitution was written in 1867.

In fact it was not written in 1867. It came into force in 1867 because the Fathers of Confederation debated the elements of the Constitution at the Charlottetown Conference in 1864. Continuing:styleonti6;4

Senator Beaudoin: There are many cases which say that the Constitution is essentially an evolutionary document—a living tree. We could speak for hours and hours on that, but that is not the problem.

We have to interpret section 26 as it is today. It is clear-cut that it is the Queen in right of Canada, and the Prime Minister has the right to advise the Queen. He was justified to do that, having regard to the deadlock that we are facing here. We have to get rid of this deadlock. I have nothing else to say.

In other words, he believed that the Prime Minister had the right to advise the Governor General, who, in turn, advised the Queen to accede to his demand for the appointment of the eight senators; but he does not recognize that the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition in both houses had the right to make representations to the Governor General. He ignored that particular fundamental right.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bosa, you read into the record the word "deadlock". What "deadlock"? What are you referring to?

Senator Bosa: I am sure Senator Beaudoin was referring to the fact that there are three contentious bills in the Senate: Bill C-62, which has not yet been debated; Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance bill—it is now up to the government to decide if it wants to sit down with the members of the Senate to try to arrive at an agreement with respect to that bill.

Senator Hébert: It is everything or nothing!

Senator Bosa: They could make some compromises.

Senator Hébert: We are ready.

Senator Corbin: Did you say that those bills are now in the government's hands; in other words, it has created the deadlock?

Senator Bosa: We have dealt with the bill and made some amendments. We notified the other place of the proposed amendments. They accepted some amendments and rejected others. We made additional concessions and now there is a stalemate. We have done everything we could. The government members in the House of Commons are not coming forward for a conference, which the rules of the Senate call for when there is a deadlock between the Senate and the House of Commons.

Senator Hébert: There is no deadlock until they refuse.

Senator Bosa: If we were in a deadlock; but there is no deadlock, because all they have to do is pick up the bill and say "Ladies and gentlemen, how can we compromise?" We need this legislation. But they have not come forward, so there is no deadlock. Then there is Bill C-28, which involves the clawback.

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, perhaps this is a point on which you are going to provide clarification. It relates to what has been called a "deadlock". Three bills have been cited as making up the deadlock or logjam. If I heard Senator MacEachen correctly this afternoon, Bill C-28 is not one of the logs in that logjam. If I understood correctly, the motion on our order paper would have the Senate resolve that it does not insist upon its amendments. I believe Senator MacEachen indicated that that motion will carry.

Then we come to Bill C-21. Again I refer to what Senator MacEachen said earlier this day. He referred to discussions and negotiations between himself, on the one hand, and I assume the Honourable Barbara McDougall on the other hand, which led him to believe that with certain amendments that bill could go forward for Royal Assent. But the government, for some reason, abandoned those discussions and forgot about them during the long, summer adjournment.

We come to the third log in the alleged logjam, which is Bill C-62. Correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding is that Bill C-62 came to us on May 1. We had two days of debate. Then the bill carried on division at second reading. Consequently, there never has been a vote in this house against the principle of Bill C-62. Then, at the end of June, on the motion of the government, the Senate adjourned for the summer. It came back three months later. On the day the Senate resumed after that three-month summer adjournment, the committee presented a report. The committee report is not favourable, but there has been no vote—

Senator Murray: It is another one of the stated intentions of Senator MacEachen and others to do everything they possibly can to kill the bill.

• (0015)

Senator Stewart: I hear an intervention by Senator Murray, who said there was a stated declaration by Senator MacEachen. What was that?

Senator Murray: I was referring to the stated intention of Senator MacEachen and others to do everything they possibly can to kill the bill.

Senator Gigantès: To which bill are you referring?

Senator Stewart: Bill C-62; there is no problem on that.

Senator Murray: Bill C-62.

Senator Stewart: But that is a stated intention and this is a house in which the vote of some senators is very difficult to predict. We do not have to strain our imaginations to know who those senators are. I put it to you, Senator Bosa, that there might not have been a logjam in this chamber on Bill C-62, that it might have carried by one or two votes.

Therefore, looking at the logs that made up this so-called logjam, there is not one that is adequate to justify the use of section 26, if, indeed, section 26 is still operable.

Then I come to the other question, which is the question of importance. Let us say that Bill C-62 had been put to the vote at third reading and defeated. If I am correct, Senator Bosa, one then would have to ask: Is that bill sufficiently important to the public to justify the use of section 26 of the Constitution, assuming, again, that that section was still operable?

I refer to that second aspect, because of what was said by Senator Wilmot about the discussions out of which section 26 emerged, where he talked about the reform bill of 1832. If I remember correctly, the reform bill of 1832 was put through the House of Commons once and then was defeated in the House of Lords. There followed a general election. The bill again went through the House of Commons and the Lords, even at that point, were not prepared to accept the will of the people. In that situation the government was able to secure the reluctant agreement of the King William to create sufficient peers, if he had to do so, to make the bill carry in the House of Lords.

Therefore, is it not true that when we talk about a stalemate we have to talk about two things? First, are there government measures which are in fact not in speculation or imagination, being held up or blocked? Are there indeed—

Senator Murray: Eleven months, nine months and five months.

Senator Stewart: How long did we take, Senator Murray, on the pharmaceutical bill? It became law, did it not?

Senator Murray: Oh, yes.

Senator Stewart: All right. And there will be other bills of relatively little importance which also take a long, long time because there is no great urgency for them.

Senator Murray: These are three budget bills, senator, two of which are from the 1989 budget—I made this argument this afternoon and I really should not be repeating it—in respect of which the House of Commons has voted confidence.

Eleven months, nine months and five months may not look like much in terms of the reform bill in the British house in 1832, but in terms of the twentieth century legislative process, that is blockage. That is deadlock.

Senator Stewart: That is what the Leader of the Government in the Senate says; but let us look at Bill C-62, which I think we would all agree is the big log.

Senator Murray: The which?

Senator MacEachen: The big log.

Senator Stewart: It came to us at the beginning of May. In two days it received second reading and was sent to a committee. We then went away for three months. The committee reported on the very day we came back.

It is true that the committee report is not one that causes the Government Leader's heart to lift.

Senator Murray: Oh, yes, it does.

Senator Stewart: Oh, what does that mean?

Senator Murray: It flip-flops.

Senator Gigantès: No; he said that it lifts his heart that we want to kill the bill.

Senator Stewart: That is what I thought he said, but I don't think he heard correctly.

Senator Gigantès: He is confused.

Senator Stewart: No, I think it is simply that he did not hear accurately.

Senator Gigantès: Maybe he is being tricky again.

Senator Stewart: No, no, I think he did not hear accurately.

My argument is that there was no real evidence, prior to the time we went away from here on June 27, to suggest that this bill would not move forward in the ordinary way. We were away for three months. Suddenly, on the day we came back, there was a strongly negative report from the committee. But that is not conclusive evidence as to the future fate of the bill.

Senator Murray: No?

Senator Stewart: Not in this house.

Senator MacEachen: How about Senator MacEachen's statement?

Senator Stewart: Well, I tell you, Senator Murray—

Senator Murray: What do you think of Mr. Chretien's statement that the Liberal senators will do exactly what he tells them to do and this bill shall not pass? What do you think of that?

Senator Stewart: I am sure that Liberal senators will pay a great deal of attention to that. But count the house.

Senator Murray: I am counting it now, senator.

Senator Stewart: But this is not the time when you should have made that decision. You did not count the house accurately. You did not give sufficient attention to the house before you insisted upon the appointment of these eight additional senators. That is where you made your first mistake.

So I say that there are two aspects to this: First, there is the question whether there is indeed a logjam, and second, there is the question whether the logjam is of sufficiently great importance to justify the use of section 26, assuming, of course, that section 26 is still operative.

Senator Murray: Those are political arguments that you are taking to court.

Senator Stewart: I am sorry?

Senator Murray: Those are political arguments, I think you will agree, although you are taking them to court in the guise of legal arguments.

Senator Stewart: No, I think they are constitutional arguments, Senator Murray; but we could spend a great deal of time trying to agree on our terms.

Senator Bosa, do you make this distinction between the number of logs in the logjam, on the one hand, and the importance of the log or logs to the public interest on the other? Is that a reasonable distinction?

Senator Bosa: Thank you, Senator Stewart, for your intervention. I could say that the Leader of the Government in the Senate was so trigger-happy that the moment he had his majority—

Senator Murray: We do not have a majority yet.

Senator Bosa: Yes, you do.

Senator Murray: Do your arithmetic!

Senator Bosa: Is the Leader of the Government saying that the eight British senators do not constitute a sufficient number to give the government plurality?

Senator Murray: Now you are right; it is a plurality. The standings are 54 Conservative, 51 Liberal and 6 Independent senators. It is, as the Leader of the Opposition mentioned earlier in this sitting, a very finely balanced house. Neither of our parties has a majority.

Further to that, Senator Kirby, a mathematician of note, has been doing some work. I understand that he finds that in the normal course of events over the next few years the majority will fluctuate. It could well happen that while the Conservatives might gain a thin majority some months from now, we could lose it some months from then. It is, and will remain, a very finely balanced house as far ahead as I care to look.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, this is a very important point that Senator Murray now makes. As I recall, what the Colonial Secretary said in 1874 was that the Governor General and the Queen should be satisfied that the new creations would be sufficient to break the deadlock or stalemate or logjam, whatever.

[Senator Murray.]

That was the Colonial Secretary's interpretation. It is not in the statute, but does Senator Murray take it seriously at all? He has now told us that it is conceivable that even with the eight new senators, Bill C-62 may not carry. Consequently the new senators will not have been a remedy.

Evidently the Governor General did not bother to explore the facts as to the legislative situation. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Did the Governor General explore the point that Senator Murray himself now makes, that even with the eight new senators the bill may not carry, so that we will find ourselves at the end of the day, to coin a phrase, without the bill but with the eight new senators?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not expect that, God willing, there will be any change in the standings between now and the time Bill C-62 is voted here. There are no retirements coming up in the normal course of events. I think we both understand how any change in the standings could otherwise occur. Therefore, I do not expect any change in the standings before that.

But in a house that is now constituted of 54 Conservatives, 51 Liberals and 6 Independents, the only thing I can say for certainty is that the Conservative Party has a fighting chance to win a vote, which is more than we have had in this place for 50 years.

Senator Gigantès: If I understand the Leader of the Government properly, he is talking about the logjam. Perhaps I did not hear him well this morning, but he was saying that section 26 could be invoked whether or not there was a backlog or a logjam. He was trying to dissociate the appointment of the eight senators from the existence or non-existence of a logjam. He was saying that he would not have to prove in court that there was a deadlock before that. Is that not what he was saying this morning?

Senator Murray: I think what I was saying this morning is that there is a somewhat different definition of "deadlock" as between Senator MacEachen and myself. The further point that I made tonight is that in contemporary Canada in the 1990s bills held up in the Senate for eleven months, nine months and five months respectively spell deadlock to me, although it seems not to be a deadlock at all in Senator MacEachen's mind. We disagree on what constitutes a deadlock in the legislative world of the 1990s.

• (0030)

Senator Gigantès: But were you not saying this morning, sir, that one does not have to prove the existence of a deadlock in order to invoke section 26 of the British North America Act?

Senator Murray: What I have said is that the Constitution Act of 1867 does not say anything about "deadlock." What section 26 says is:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

Senator Gigantès: But then why is the appointment of senators—

Senator Murray: Deadlock is not mentioned in the Constitution. That was the point I made this morning.

Senator Gigantès: But why is the appointment of senators put into two different sections? Why do we have section 24 and section 26 to deal with senators? There must be some reason for those different provisions, namely, the necessity to reach some sort of solution. That is what the Colonial Secretary said.

Senator Murray: Four senators or eight senators, you mean?

Senator Gigantès: Yes. Why four senators or eight senators under section 26? Why didn't they say, "Let the Senate of Canada have not 104 senators but 112?" Why the two sections? Obviously, there are two sections, because section 26 is for a special circumstance. The court, I submit, would listen to arguments on whether or not there is a special circumstance or whether or not there is a deadlock.

This morning my leader was showing you that he can demonstrate that there was no deadlock, because he was prepared to accept the passage of the clawback bill; because he made proposals and he will table the correspondence to that effect about Bill C-21, in which he proposes to compromise and let that bill pass; and because, in the case of Bill C-62, we received it in May. We then struck a committee and the committee began its work. Parliament then adjourned for three months, but we were back here with a report on the first day that Parliament sat. Where is the delay on our part?

Senator Hébert: There is no delay!

Senator Murray: This newly found enthusiasm for some of this legislation is truly death-bed repentence on the part of my friends opposite.

Senator Gigantès: We are not dying from it, do not worry! You will die before us.

Senator Murray: Well, I hope not.

Senator Gigantès:I intend to live until I am 97.

Senator Murray: My friend says that the court will listen to arguments about whether the conditions exist to justify invoking section 26. Perhaps the court will. Maybe my friends will put forward some of those "political" arguments; Senator Stewart calls them "constitutional" arguments. Perhaps the court will listen to them.

I thought that your legal case, such as it is, was based on two other arguments, one being that section 51A, the "Senate floor" provision of the Constitution Act, impedes the operation of section 26; and the other being that section 26 was invalid because it had not been used since Confederation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Murray has been—

Senator Murray: Is that one of your arguments?

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps this is quite irregular, but Senator Murray seems to have been engaged in a mini question period. Perhaps I may take advantage of that and ask him a question.

Can he tell us when the first approaches were made by the government to the Governor General and then the Queen with respect to the use of section 26? There has been a report frequently stated in Ottawa that the Palace had been alerted in the middle of the summer by the Governor General and by the government, and that the preparations were in place even before the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. That takes some validity away from the fact that the government abruptly terminated negotiations mid-summer on Bill C-21 as if there were an effort to create the momentum of a problem.

I should like to know what the dates are.

Senator Murray: I do not have the dates, but I can give the honourable senator my clear impression that it is not the case that any advice or alert, as it were—even of an informal kind—was given to the Palace at mid-summer. My impression is that a kind of informal alert or advice may have been given at some official level a matter of hours or days before the formal instruments of advice were put forward. That happened on September 26.

In any case, the minute of the meeting of the council was dated September 26. That was a formal document that went to His Excellency, the Governor General, recommending that the Governor General advise Her Majesty the Queen that letters patent be issued, and so on. That occurred on September 26.

If any informal alert was given, my impression would be that that would have happened a matter of hours, or days at the most, before the formal instrument of advice was sent forward.

That is my impression. I will see if there is anything further that I can state about that. Certainly, if I am wrong, I will correct the record.

Senator Gigantès: That would be a first!

Senator MacEachen: On that point, it would be interesting to know when the Governor General conducted his "independent"—as he said—investigations on the use of section 26. He had brushed off the concerns expressed by the Liberal Party and said that he had received advice from the government and outside sources. When did he do that? Was it the day of the instrument of advice, or was he alerted some weeks before? What day did the Queen sign the letters patent? Was it just sent to the Palace without any advance notice?

Some day it will all be revealed to all of us, but it would be interesting to know the precise dates. We asked earlier for the actual documents, but we have not received them yet. But we should like to receive them.

In any event, there must have been some time that elapsed, and there must have been some opportunity for the Governor General to do these private investigations, which he told us he did, with persons outside the government—certainly it was not with members of the Liberal Party who had asked to be consulted and had alerted him to the circumstances not being appropriate.

He did not even ask us what we had in mind.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to the questions that the Leader of the Opposition has posed concerning his Excellency. It is a matter of fact that His Excellency could not be unware, since he lives here and one assumes continues to read the newspapers and follow news reports, that there was a public issue developing over the possible use of section 26 of the Constitution Act.

If he decided to do some personal research and to take some independent advice on the meaning of section 26, and so on, in advance of any formal advice being tendered to him by the government, that would only be the prudent thing to do.

Also, it should be noted that His Excellency meets on a weekly basis with the Prime Minister and from time to time with senior officials of the government. So it would not surprise me to learn that His Excellency had done some independent research before he ever had any confirmation from the government that the government was making this recommendation to him.

Senator Stewart: May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate something concerning that independent advice? The Governor General says that he had advice from the ministers. That is constitutional. That we understand.

He says also that he relied on independent advice. I do not think that that is enough. I am not saying that he should not try to inform himself, but he says that he relied on "independent advice." I don't think the names of these persons have been formally revealed. Who are these new, unnamed advisers to the head of state? To whom are they responsible?

We have heard a great deal here about responsible government. We have been told that the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister are responsible in Parliament. To whom are these independent advisers responsible?

In earlier times people used to talk about kitchen cabinets, advice by royal mistresses and the like. Are these independent advisers members of a kitchen cabinet? I use that language simply to try to get my point across. Are these constitutional advisers? If not, how is it that the Governor General can plead their advice in support of the decision that he made?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Governor General takes advice from his ministers, has access to law officers who are employed for that purpose, and it appears in this case sought outside advice. I do not have the faintest idea who the advisers were, whether they were legal advisers, constitutional advisers, or people with a background in political science and history. Whoever they are, I am confident that they are respected professionals.

To whom are they responsible? To what are they responsible? They are responsible to the norms of their profession, the same way that my honourable friend was when he was a full-time academic.

Senator Stewart: The "norms of the profession" are not an entity capable of holding anybody responsible; they are a code of conduct.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Murray: Quite.

Senator Stewart: I have no constitutional problem with the assertion that the Governor General used the advice that came to him from the ministers of the Crown.

I have no problem at all there; but it would appear from what he has written that he relied to some extent on these independent advisers. Who are they? Where do they fit into our constitutional structure? What specific questions did he address to them?

Senator Gigantès: Were they secret advisers?

Senator Stewart: I do not want to use that language.

Senator Gigantès: You should!

Senator Stewart: I want to know who they are. This is an important constitutional question. We want to know by whom this country is governed, and if the Governor General is saying that one of the influences that operated upon his mind when he made his decision came from independent advisors, we should know formally who they are and in what capacity they tendered advice to the Governor General.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, they were professionals and were engaged in offering professional advice, in much the same way that the government, on occasion, seeks professional advice in the legal field in addition to the advice that it receives from the law officers of the Crown.

My honourable friend pretends to be scandalized by all of this. This seems to me to have been perfectly normal and prudent. It seems prudent that the Governor General wanted to consider the advice of the law officers of the Crown and, as well, obtain advice from lawyers, constitutional experts, political scientists, historians, whoever they were, in dealing with this matter.

Senator Stewart: I suppose we need go no further until the Senate has been given the names of those who were employed by the Governor General in their professional capacity.

But let me ask this: Does the fact that the Governor General used these independent professional advisors imply that he might have rejected the advice of the law officers of the Crown? It seems to me that that possibility is clearly implied. Evidently in this instance the advice given by the independent advisers coincided and travelled with the advice given by the Prime Minister.

But let us say that it had travelled in the opposite direction. Would the Governor General then have said to the Prime Minister: "I am sorry, Prime Minister, I do not think you are right on your law or that you are right on your facts."

Is that what the Leader of the Government in the Senate is saying?

Senator Murray: I am saying that my friends opposite cannot have it both ways. Over the past couple of days they were excoriating of his Excellency, accusing him of having been a puppet and a rubber stamp. Now my friends opposite are complaining that the Governor General was prudent enough to take outside advice in addition to the advice he presumably received from the law officers of the Crown to satisfy himself completely as to the constitutionality of the proposed action.

Senator MacEachen: I do not object to the Governor General's asking anyone for opinions. What is curious to me is why he ignored those who know most about the factual situation, or those who know a great deal about the factual situation.

I wonder what a professor at Queen's, for example, would tell him as to the nature of the discussions and the parliamentary situation.

This is a clear case in which the Governor General went outside of the government. He ought to have gone to people who would help him make an objective assessment of the facts.

Surely he received the Prime Minister's point of view, because the Prime Minister revealed that on television, and I think that was false.

I began to say today, and will continue to say, that those statements made by the Prime Minister, if they are the ones that he made to the Governor General, are false. Perhaps the Governor General ought to have heard the other side of the story, but he did not bother to ask. He just said: "My Prime Minister, my pal, could not tell a lie, so I will not ask the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Buckwold or the Chairman of the Committee on the Unemployment Insurance Bill just what the facts are on these bills. They would not know. They are just the other party to the dispute, and they have no views."

That is what I find objectionable, because if section 26 is a living section, and if the original intention was to be carried out, there has to be an independent finding of facts in order to implement it, an independent finding, not one in Canada by involved persons.

The only person in this case who could take on the role of an independent finding of facts is the Governor General, but he did not bother. That is my complaint.

Senator Murray: It is not a matter of just obtaining the facts; it is a matter of political judgment.

Senator MacEachen: Not just the facts; but the facts are an important element in reaching a conclusion, because every constitutional situation is founded on a set of facts.

• (0045)

Senator Murray: My friend and I had this argument earlier today. I say that in the year 1990 there are three bills before the Senate, and they have been here for 11 months, nine months and five months. I call that blockage. Those bills should have been out of the Senate well before now, especially the bills arising from the 1989 budget and the bill arising from the 1990 budget in respect of which the Commons had twice voted confidence in the ministers of the Crown. I say that is deadlock; I say that is blockage. My friend says that it is not, because "their intentions were always honourable."

One would like to believe that, but it would be, as Oscar Wilde said, "a triumph of hope over experience."

In any event, what we would be doing by involving the Governor General would be asking him to get involved in a matter of political opinion or judgment on which government and opposition differ.

Senator MacEachen: Political fact.

Senator Murray: The facts are there, and the facts were enumerated in the Minute of the Council put forward. It was pointed out that these bills were in the Senate since their introduction here eleven, nine and five months ago.

Senator MacEachen: At least four months of the so-called delay was caused by the government. The government has created its own delays and now says, "We have had a delay, and we are going to London to get senators."

I say that because the government side adjourned debate on Bill C-21 in the middle of May and let it sit on the order paper. The government created the delay.

Senator Murray: What we were waiting for with Bill C-21 was for my honourable friend to swallow his pride and get up and admit that he had botched that amendment. If that amendment had gone through it would have been a nullity, because it proposed to refer to a conference a motion that would no longer exist if the amendments were passed.

This sounds rather complicated, and I suppose it is, but I am waiting for my honourable friend to explain that amendment.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I can do that.

Senator Murray: I am waiting for an explanation to the amendment proposed to Bill C-21. That amendment begins with "Remove all the words after that", and then there is a series of "whereas"' and "wherefores"; and then it says that the motion, Senator Doody's motion, be referred to a conference between the two Houses.

If that amendment had passed, the motion my honourable friend is referring to would no longer exist.

We have tried to explain this. In fact, my colleague, Senator Ottenheimer, tried to get up one day on a point of order but he was shouted down and told he was too late to raise a point of order.

Senator Stewart: When was that ?

Senator Murray: That was before the summer recess.

I invite the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition to look into what I think is a piece of incredibly bad drafting that went forward in his name. I say it is a nullity.

I think that if it were ever to pass, the whole intent of the amendment would be lost.

In any event, examine it and come back and explain it to us if, and when, we get to Bill C-21.

Senator MacEachen: At the time the point of order was raised it was dealt with and the motion was put.

I am sorry the Leader of the Government in the Senate did not understand that, but the Chair accepted it and the Table Officers found it appropriate, and there was no debate about the wording.

It is a red herring to conceal the fact that if there has been a delay of the UI bill, the delay of four months was caused by the government. So the government has created its own delay, as evidence to go to the Queen and request extra senators be appointed.

I find it preposterous for honourable senators opposite to say that the lapse of time in the passage of that bill is a justification to create new senators. That is really preposterous.

Senator Murray: This is the kind of debate that you would propose to hold at Rideau Hall between yourself and the Prime Minister. That is quite an inappropriate role for the Governor General. The role of the Governor General in our constitutional monarchy is to accept the advice of the ministers on a matter of this kind, not to involve himself in the legislative process.

Senator MacEachen: Not to know the facts. He is not to know when the Prime Minister says, "I have a bill in the Senate for 11 months now." He is not to know that four of those months of delay were caused by the government.

Is that not an important fact that he ought to know? I would think so if he is to make a recommendation to Her Majesty to use a never-used constitutional provision. Should the Governor General not know that there were active discussions going on to clear Bill C-21, with every prospect of success, had the government acted in good faith and continued the negotiations?

I told the Leader of the Government earlier that I intend to put all of these facts on the record. Perhaps we will be able to testify in court as to the state of Bill C-21.

Senator Stewart: I have notes.

Senator MacEachen: It is all there. Then the government has the nerve to say there is a deadlock when the government terminated the negotiations and never gave its views on the proposals which had been made.

Did the Governor General hear about that? Of course not, because that was concealed from him. I think it was his duty to find out what was taking place. Those are facts, not opinions. That is not ministerial advice. He could have sent a fact finder to ask people on this side of the house what their conception was and then make up his mind knowing the facts. That is why Canadian ministers, when this original article was included in the Constitution, refused to have the matter determined within Canada. They felt there would be a cozy arrangement between the Governor General and the Prime Minister which they would not trust, and wanted an outside judgment provided by Her Majesty, who would act on the independent advice of her British ministers. We repeat that that arbitral quality of article 26 has not been fulfilled and ought to have been. Perhaps it could not have been fulfilled. As Senator Stewart argued, if it could not be fulfilled, the section is inoperable. Those are our views.

I have learned something today: all you have to have is the passage of time and then you can get the new senators. That is a new one. It would be a new one on Senator Wilmot; it would be a new one on Sir John A. Macdonald who defined the circumstances; it would be a new one on the Tory Senate who passed a resolution, following 1874, defining the circumstances; it would be new to the British government that the lapse of time would trigger article 26. That was invented in 1990. I do not think it will ever stand. Wait until we get all the bills that have languished for months and years by the government itself.

Senator Murray: But these bills have been in the Senate for 11 months, 9 months and 5 months. They are in the Senate because my friends opposite did not pass them—would not pass them—and insisted on amendments. They sent messages to the House of Commons but did not accept messages—

Senator MacEachen: That is the parliamentary process. You are seeking immunity from the parliamentary process under article 26.

Senator Murray: I believe John Turner said that at the end of the day the elected house must have its way. We reached the end of the day on these matters some time ago. Eleven months, nine months and five months is too long a period of time to have budget bills from the House of Commons—two of them from the budget before last—hanging around in this house.

So to the concerns of Canadian ministers in 1866 and 1867 that these matters should be subject to a non-Canadian arbiter and the advice of British ministers, a lot of things relating to Canada were decided outside Canada, all of them in the "old country", as we used to call it, in the United Kingdom on the advice of British ministers in those days. But this is 1990. This is the 20th century. In 1990 the answer that came back from the Palace to journalists, who inquired with regard to possible invocation of section 26 by the government, was "of course Her Majesty will take the advice of her Canadian ministers. She is a constitutional monarch."

Senator Stewart: I wonder if Senator Murray would expand upon a point to which he made reference. He said that in the case of Bill C-21 progress had not been made after May 23, which is the date that Senator Ottenheimer first started to stand the order in relation to that bill. He said that progress had not been made because the motion moved by Senator MacEachen was—

Senator Murray: Impossible.

Senator Stewart: Impossible, yes, that is what you said. That motion by Senator MacEachen had been on the order paper for some time before May 23. If that motion created an insuperable obstacle to the progress of Bill C-21, why did the ministers of the Crown engage in discussions subsequent to May 23? Are you saying they did not?

Senator Murray: I am sorry. Ministers of the Crown engaged—

Senator Stewart: —engaged in discussions on Bill C-21 after the motion by Senator MacEachen, which you say created an insuperable obstacle, was already before the Senate. What was the point?

I have a note made in May that sets forth a timetable which would have had that bill clear this house, if I recall correctly, on Thursday, June 7, passing the House of Commons on the following day, Friday, June 8. I know Senator Murray has been very busy. Perhaps he is not aware of the facts. There were discussions, and Senator MacEachen and I have documentation with respect to those discussions.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there were discussions. I must assume that the proposals that were put forward by my friends opposite were found to be not acceptable by the government. That is the end of that. The honourable senator may have put forward something which, if the government had accepted it, would have seen the bill passed right away; but that, with respect, is not relevant to the present discussion.

Senator MacEachen: I think it is very relevant.

Senator Murray: Second, it is much like the letter that Senator Buckwold sent to Michael Wilson regarding Bill C-28 which ended with his saying "accept my two amendments and the bill is yours." Mr. Wilson was not willing to accept those two amendments, but now my friends tell me they are going to pass Bill C-28 anyway. That is good news, but I would like to know when.

Senator MacEachen: The government was notified, through Senator Frith, that this bill would be passed before you ever brought your British senators into the chamber.

Senator Murray: With respect, you had better look at that again. There were some conditions attached.

Senator Gigantès: Excuse me, Senator Murray, were those independent experts—

Senator Murray: I know my friend will be here tomorrow and so will I.

Senator Gigantès: I will not be here tomorrow. Were those independent experts consulted by the Governor General paid a fee, and will that fee appear in the government accounts?

Senator Murray: I do not have the faintest idea, honourable senators.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable senator please find out and let us know?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will obtain any information I properly can and convey it.

Senator Gigantès: Because these are public funds.

Senator Murray: If there were any, yes, they would be public funds.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I permitted some questions to be put during the debate. The questions were not put to me so I do not feel I have any obligation to answer them.

Senator Murray stated that at the present time the members opposite have a reasonable chance of winning a vote; therefore, they would be able to pass the legislation they so eagerly want. I would like to remind Senator Murray that we had the majority on this side, as he said, for 41 years. How many bills went through in the past six years, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: In the past six years approximately 301 bills were passed. Eighteen went through with amendments which were accepted by the other place.

Senator Bosa: Senator Murray complains that Bill C-22, the drug bill, was not adopted quickly. Senator Bonnell was the chairman of the committee studying the bill, and he conducted hearings from coast to coast. It was a very controversial bill.

Senator Hébert: But we passed it nevertheless.

Senator Bosa: Nevertheless it was passed. The committee report predicted that the price of drugs would dramatically increase, which became a fact. So I do not see how Senator Lowell Murray can say that bills are being held up here and that we have frustrated the will of the elected people.

Look at Bill C-62. It had barely been introduced in this chamber when they filibustered it for two days. Then when we wanted to table it, they refused to do so. The moment they surreptitiously brought in their eight British senators—

Senator Hébert: Through the tunnels.

Senator Bosa: —sworn in in secrecy, they immediately triggered a situation in which they would have a vote and circumvent the rules of this house. Was there really a deadlock? In order to have a deadlock a bill would have had to have been debated for a long time. This bill had not even been tabled, but they were so trigger-happy that they pulled this trick of changing the rules. They were naive, because they thought they were pulling a fast one on the opposition because they had numerical superiority at this point. In assisting themselves in having the bill passed through the workings of the Senate, they succeeded in drawing attention away from Bill C-62 to a procedural battle involving the Speaker.

Senator Hébert: And a scandal!

Senator Bosa: This is what they succeeded in doing. If this is called a filibuster, that filibuster evolved from the breaking of the rules, from ringing the bells and then bringing in the members of the Conservative caucus. As I said earlier, this vote was not a Senate vote. The vote that was taken on October 4, 1990 at 5:25 p.m. was not a vote of the Senate. Present were 53 senators of Conservative persuasion, along with 2 independents who voted with them. This is, in effect, a Conservative caucus meeting in the red chamber.

Senator Hébert: And they specifically invited these independents.

Senator Bosa: We did not get an invitation, because we would not expect to be invited to a Conservative caucus any more than they would expect to be invited to our caucus. The Speaker of the house presided over that caucus and recorded the names. Then Senator Murray went out in the lobby and said that the Liberals are upset because, for the first time in 41 years, they have lost a vote. Can you call this a vote? This is a Conservative caucus vote, not a vote of the Senate.

Before questions were put to me I was dealing with the Debates of the Senate of October 3 on page 2328. I was quoting Senator Stewart at the bottom of the first column. He says:

> Allow me to take up the point to which Senator Grafstein referred earlier.

This has to do with the legality of the appointments.

> I refer to the abortion bill. Let us look forward to the situation, the quite possible situation, in which that bill passes this house with most government senators supporting the bill while most senators on this side vote against it. The bill may pass by reason of the votes of some of the eight new senators, the bill becomes the law of the land and goes into effect. Months pass and abortions are performed under the provisions of the bill. What remedies are available to the children who have been destroyed?

• (0100)

Senator Murray: Oh, come on! Sit down; enough of that!

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray dismisses it!

Senator Murray: I certainly do! This is nonsense!

Senator Stewart: He says that this is nonsense. He is not concerned. It is trivial; it is beneath his sublime dignity and importance!

Senator Murray: Sit down and save that stuff!

Senator Murray said that with such arrogance. This arrogance became evident the moment the Conservatives had numerical superiority. We have seen a change of personality.

Senator Hébert: It is British arrogance coming from the British senators.

Senator Bosa: Senator Murray has changed. He used to be a kind gentleman. He used to speak softly and was never arrogant, but, all of a sudden, listen to the language that he uses. "Sit down and save that stuff!" While Senator Stewart was talking of a very important matter, the abortion bill.

Senator Corbin: Even Senator Doody has been slightly tainted. I have detected a change of attitude in that normally docile, very cooperative person. He has changed for the worse and I am sorry about that.

Senator Bosa: Who?

Senator Corbin: Senator Doody.

Senator Bosa: I think he is still in control of himself.

Senator Corbin: It is an uphill battle for him, but I think he will make it. He is such a nice guy.

Senator Bosa: When Senator Murray was trying to get the floor last Friday, when we raised the sound a few decibels so that he could not be heard, Senator Doody was very jovial. He took matters in stride. He never got upset. When he took the floor, he continued to be kind and gentle, as he usually is.

Senator Corbin: He is a man of courage and great willpower. I respect him, but he has been tarnished somewhat.

[Senator Bosa.]

Senator Bosa: I will continue reading from page 2328 of the Debates of the Senate of October 3, 1990.

> Senator Stewart: I am directing my question to Senator Beaudoin because he is an expert. I ask him: What is likely to happen? What remedies are available? I put the question to the honourable senator, not as a debating point but as one which is of deep concern to many people in the province that I represent in this chamber.

That is a very straightforward question. It is not only a matter of concern to the province of Nova Scotia, where Senator Stewart comes from, but to all other provinces. It troubles many Canadians all over the country.

Senator Corbin: Obviously, we have all seen the reaction.

Senator Bosa: At this stage Senator Everett stood up, and this is the point at which I wanted to arrive. This is why I read the background of Senator Grafstein's intervention, Senator Beaudoin's intervention and the questions that were put intermittently by Senator Stewart.

Senator Everett is reported to have said:

> Honourable senators, I would like to try to set Senator Grafstein's mind at ease with respect to the point he has raised. I suppose it is possible that a court may find that the appointment of the eight senators was improper.

He now puts it conditionally. He says that it may be possible that the appointment of the eight senators could be found to be improper. He goes on to say:

> However, I believe that, given that they were duly sworn in and took the oath, a court would be loath to invalidate the acts of the legislative body. Let me give, as an example, the situation experienced by Manitoba.

Senator Gigantès, you will be interested in this.

> Manitoba came into Confederation on the basis that French would be used in the courts and in the legislature. In 1890, and again in 1916, the legislature invalidated the use of French—
> Senator Gigantès: Shame!
> Senator Everett: —both within the legislature and the courts—
> Senator Roblin: And the schools.
> Senator Everett: That is correct. Eventually, in the 1980s, the matter came before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court could have invalidated all the acts of the Manitoba legislature going back to 1890 had it chosen to do so. However, it did not. It validated those actions and merely said that the statutes that had been passed had to be translated into French.
> I therefore suggest to honourable senators that if the court were to find that the appointment of the eight senators was improper, it would in no way invalidate the actions of the Senate during that period because, indeed, those senators had been duly and properly sworn in.

At first he speaks in the conditional; now he speaks in the imperative. He says that it will happen. There are no ifs or buts about it.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bosa, let me get to my seat. I have a question.

I do not think Senator Everett, in his intervention, addressed the point raised by Senator Grafstein on the question of abortion. Senator Haidasz should be able to speak to that. The point Senator Grafstein was making is that the vote may be extremely tight on Bill C-43 and it might or might not pass, depending on the votes of the eight. Then a final and irreversible thing will have happened.

Suppose the courts change the situation as the government views it and take the position that those eight senators were not properly put in? Issues will arise that are a lot more definitive than mere translation.

A Manitoban who was denied his right to trial in French certainly suffered, but he could go and find a bilingual lawyer. He could get someone to translate for him. That is not the same as the prosecution of someone on the grounds that an abortion that was procured was a criminal act. This law might or might not pass, as Senator Grafstein said, with the help of those eight senators. Senator Everett did not address that point at all, if I remember correctly. It is a serious point and one that senators opposite seem intent upon disregarding.

Senator Bosa: No, he did not, but Senator Stewart dealt with the matter. In fact, I just read it into the record a moment ago. Senator Stewart said:

> Months pass and abortions are performed under the provisions of the bill. What remedies are available to the children who have been destroyed?

This is the question he put, and he received a sarcastic answer from the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Gigantès: Could you quote to us that sarcastic answer? I think it was so shocking that we should be reminded of it.

Senator Bosa: Yes. I suppose Senator Gigantès was not in the chamber ten minutes ago when I dealt with this, but I will repeat it.

Senator Gigantès: Please do. It is worth repeating.

Senator Bosa: Senator Stewart asked:

> What remedies are available to the children who have been destroyed?
> Senator Murray: Oh, come on! Sit down; enough of that!
> Senator Stewart: Senator Murray dismisses it!
> Senator Murray: I certainly do! This is nonsense!
> Senator Stewart: He says that this is nonsense. He is not concerned. It is trivial; it is beneath his sublime dignity and importance!
> Senator Murray: Sit down and save that stuff!

Is that not arrogance?

Senator Stewart: Let me tell Senator Bosa that I have noticed over the years that this is a kind of retort that Senator Murray often uses—almost always uses—when some senator strikes too close to the truth. You have come too close to the truth. When I hear him speak like that, I am not offended. I knew that I had come close to the motherlode of truth.

Senator Bosa: I will continue to read the intervention made by Senator Everett, still at page 2328 of the Debates of the Senate of October 3, 1990.

> The courts are loath—and I defer to the expertise of Senator Beaudoin on this point—to frustrate the work of a duly constituted legislature. So, to address Senator Grafstein's point, I think he will find that the court will take a similar course, even if the action that is contemplated here were to succeed in the court.

Is that not preposterous? Senator Gigantès, did you hear that? Is that not preposterous? He has said:

> . . . I think he will find that the court will take a similar course, even if the action that is contemplated here were to succeed in the court.

In other words, he admits that the case can succeed, that the case now before the courts can be won by the people who are challenging the legality of the appointments. But he says, "Okay, so what? If it is found that the eight senators have not been legally appointed, all legislation that has passed in the chamber will be accepted. The courts will not disallow it." Is that not preposterous? And he uses the example of the French language having been put aside in 1890 and again in 1916. He says that it did not invalidate the laws that were passed from that time to the present.

But what are the consequences, honourable senators? Look at the consequences of that. The people of Quebec, the French Canadians, have never forgotten that. There is still bitterness and animosity in this country as a result of that ruling. There has been frustration and disagreement in this country because of the fear held by French Canadians at this betrayal. This is a constitutional betrayal which has been addressed in recent years.

Senator Gigantès: Too late.

Senator Bosa: But what are the consequences? Senator Everett's logic is this: Look. We may be doing something illegal here today, but it doesn't make any difference. Let's go ahead and pass the laws that are before us. Let's deal with the agenda we have in the Senate. Then, if we find out that these laws were approved with the help of the eight senators, who may have been illegally appointed, the courts will not disallow those laws.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bosa, let us take another case. Let us consider the clawback, Bill C-28.

Suppose that the bill comes before us. Suppose that we abstain in a vote and it is passed. Suppose that the eight senators have voted for it and it is then found that they were illegally appointed.

I say that all the pensioners, who will see that the value of their pensions has diminished because the $50,000 upper limit is not indexed, will go to court. Certainly the pensioners' organizations will have a good case with which to go to court.

It is bad legislative practice to get the state into a situation in which money will be spent by the state and private individuals and organizations in the courts to undo legislative stupidities that could easily have been avoided had some common sense prevailed, if arrogance had not been the only motivating force of this Prime Minister and his puppets in this chamber.

• (0115)

Senator Bosa: Senator Grafstein also makes a good point on that. This is to be found at the same page of the Debates. He states:

> I have another question for Senator Everett.
> Senator Doody: Give us a break!

At this stage they are becoming a little annoyed because too many questions are being asked. Senator Grafstein proceeds to say:

> I raised the question, not only in terms of the legal consequences but also in terms of respect for law and order, respect for peace, order and good government by the public. Is the honourable senator saying that the francophones of the province of Manitoba were happy and satisfied with that result?

He is asking that question. Of course they were not happy. They still carry a grudge for that which was perpetrated against them. Senator Grafstein continues to say:

> Would it not have been better in those circumstances to deal with the matter—if they could have dealt with the matter—expeditiously? Would that not have been in the national and public interest? It is not only a question of legalities; it is a question of respect for law and order.

He also could have added "fairness." Senator Everett then says:

> Surely it is also a matter of a balance between the legality of the situation and the fact that legislatures have to perform. If I took your point, you could then frustrate any legislature in the country by merely creating some sort of action that would be brought to the courts and then saying that the matter is sub judice so that the legislature cannot deal with it.
> Senator Murray: Exactly.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bosa, excuse me, but in the past the courts have shown—from the words of Senator Everett himself—that they do take under due consideration the necessity for legislatures to perform, and they do not accept various requests for cases to be heard on the grounds that the cases are frivolous. In the records of the courts we have courts that have actually fined someone for bringing a privileged case before it. To say that if people are allowed to have recourse to the justice system then legislatures will be paralyzed is to criticize the rather excellent court system that we have in this country for not having discernment enough to distinguish between frivolous, harassing cases and something of true value and importance as our case is.

Senator Bosa: Yes, I agree with you. But what has been said here is that if they were to allow these things to be challenged in the courts, they would paralyze the legislatures. How many times did these things happen? When did the Senate challenge—

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: If this government stays in power for long it will happen often!

Senator Bosa: I recall a couple of instances. For example, in 1978 the government of the day wanted to reform the Senate. It introduced a book entitled The House of the Federation. Do you remember that?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Bosa: That book was at that time circulated. It stated that the Senate was to be changed. It was to be abolished as it is constituted today and was to be called the House of the Federation. In the House of the Federation, as portrayed in that government publication, 50 per cent of the senators, were to be chosen according to the percentage of votes that each party received at the last federal election; and 50 per cent were to be chosen on a proportionate basis on the percentage that political parties received in the provinces—that is, the provincial legislatures. So that you would have a house that would be fully balanced. In other words, 50 per cent of the senators would be federally appointed and 50 per cent would be provincially appointed.

Some provinces stated that the government would not unilaterally do that because the Senate is representative of the regions. When the Fathers of Confederation constituted the Senate, the senators were supposed to represent the regions. Consequently, to make a radical change as was proposed—namely, to convert the present Senate into the House of the Federation—the provinces and their rights were affected.

A court challenge was launched and they won. The Supreme Court said, "No. The federal government does not have the right to do that." Consequently, they withdrew the bill. That is merely one instance.

There was another instance in 1981, at the time we were patriating the Constitution. Senator Hatfield is not here, but he played an important role in that undertaking. A challenge was put by three provinces to the Supreme Court of Canada. The Supreme Court of Canada rendered a verdict which stated that the federal government had the legal right to patriate the Constitution, but it was not conventional. In other words, it was not the usual manner in which the federal government dealt with the provinces. That was another challenge.

Senator Hébert: And what did the government of the day do?

Senator Bosa: Eventually nine of the provinces came on side. Unfortunately, Quebec did not.

Senator Hébert: So they decided not to repatriate, did they?

Senator Bosa: They decided not to repatriate until they received a majority. They compromised.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bosa, may I be allowed to interrupt you once again?

Senator Bosa: Yes. If I am wrong, please correct me.

Senator Corbin: I thought you were interrupting your remarks. I had hoped to rise earlier.

Senator Bosa: No, I have another point.

Senator Corbin: If you do not mind, I should like to refer back to your speech and to your opinion. This does not specifically relate to what you are now debating, but you said earlier that the divisional senators took the oath—

Senator Bosa: It was done surreptitiously.

Senator Corbin: —surreptitiously in a secret place. Can you tell me where the oath was taken and by whom it was received? Do we know that?

Senator Bosa: I do not have personal knowledge of this. I heard that it was taken in the Speaker's office.

Senator Corbin: In the Speaker's office? But it could also have been in the Clerk's office.

Senator Bosa: It could have been in the Clerk's office, yes.

Senator Corbin: I am not drawing the Clerk into the debate—the Table Officers are sacred. Some day we will know, but I am trying to find out where the oaths were actually taken.

You have been a senator here for how long, Senator Bosa?

Senator Bosa: For thirteen and a half years.

Senator Corbin: When you came to the Senate, where did you take your oath?

Senator Bosa: Right here at the Table.

Senator Corbin: How many senators have entered the Senate since you took the oath? Also, tell me where they took the oath?

Senator Hébert: I am one of them!

Senator Bosa: I believe that since then, thirteen and a half years ago, I have become probably the fortieth in seniority, if not the thirty-fifth in seniority. I have not looked at the board outside to see.

Senator Hébert: It changes every day!

Senator Bosa: I know that I was at the bottom of the scale, then I went to the top; then down, then up again. I think I am reaching the top of the fourth column.

Senator Corbin: You are a senior senator and have seen many people come into this place through the front doors; is that so?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Corbin: With two senators on either side of them?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Corbin: You have seen them walk to the Table, put their hands on the Bible and take the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Corbin: You have seen that, have you?

Senator Bosa: They were supposed to have been dragged to the Table because they were supposed to be reluctant to accept this appointment, but some of them were running ahead of the people who were to have been dragging them.

Senator Corbin: As far as you are concerned, the prescribed procedure for the oath is that at one point the Speaker gets up and is informed by someone—I believe it is the Clerk—that a senator is waiting at the door to enter the Senate, and two senators go out and bring the person in and he takes the oath. That is the way it has been done for every senator who has ever been called to this chamber, except for the eight divisional senators, whose names will not be on the board because there is no enough room for their names on that board. They will have to add a cedar shingle underneath it and burnish their names into the shingle. I do not care if it is eastern cedar, western red cedar, or whatever. There is no room on the board; it is a full slate as it is.

Senator Hébert: They will have to wait for the court!

Senator Corbin: Their names will be there temporarily and then who knows what will happen.

Senator Bosa, how did those people who took the oath come into the building? Normally you come into the red chamber through those double doors-that is, the two sets of doors. There is the outside lobby, the inner lobby and then this inner sanctum that we like to refer to as the upper chamber or the chamber of sober second thought, where people come in with their heads held high, smiles on their faces. They come in here, they walk in, and the perks are there, waiting for them.

You think they took the oath in the Speaker's office; I think possibly in the Clerk's office. I do not know. I have no reason to believe otherwise. But I suppose it could have been done in the Clerk's office, because the Clerk is charged with administering the oath. How did they get in the building?

Senator Bosa: I do not have the faintest idea.

Senator Corbin: Did they come through the tunnel? They were not good enough to be brought to the front door of the Senate. Do you think they used the main entrance to the Senate part of the Parliament buildings to come in here, or did they walk through the tunnel? Did they come through an open window in the first floor, or the freight entrance? How did they enter the building of Parliament and come to take the oath? Are you aware of that?

Senator Bosa: No, I am not aware. I suppose it must have been embarrassing for them, because these are distinguished people. They are Canadians who are highly respected and have great prestige. In addition to being done surreptitiously, I also think it would have been demeaning and humiliating for them.

Senator Corbin: Do you think some of them would have been allowed to use the distinguished and prestigous private entrance of the Speaker of the Senate? We are not allowed to use that entrance. Do you think that some of the senators—before they became senators—were allowed to walk in through those doors, the same doors that Her Majesty has used sometimes, as has the Governor General and other top-level dignitaries? Do you know?

Senator Bosa: No, I do not know, but anything is possible.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, the following is from the Debates of the Senate of Wednesday, October 3, 1990. At page 2311, the Speaker said:

• (0130)

> Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a return from the Clerk of the Senate—

That would lead one to presume that the Speaker was not aware that these persons had taken the oath.

He continued:

> —showing that the Honourable Senators Walter Patrick Twinn; Wilbert Joseph Keon; Michael Arthur Meighen; Normand Grimard; Thérèse Lavoie-Roux; James W. Ross; John Michael Forrestall, Janis Johnson; and Eric Arthur Berntson have taken and subscribed the Oath of Allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, and have made and subscribed the Declaration of Property Qualification required of them by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said Declarations.
> Accordingly, the senators' Writs of Summons will be printed in today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

When the Speaker said that, one is led to understand that he was not personally present at the taking of the oaths, but that he received a return from the Clerk. One would think the Clerk informed the Speaker that these people had taken the oath.

The Declaration of Property Qualification is normally taken in the privacy of the Clerk's office. That is where I made my declaration, and that is where most of us do that at, I believe, the beginning of each Parliament. So here we have a situation in which the right of those disputed senators to sit in this place is controversial.

Senator Gigantès: Is that normal?

Senator Corbin: On questioning senior members of this chamber, I have been led to believe that never in the history of Parliament has the oath been taken elsewhere than in the Senate chamber. That is a serious matter.

Honourable senators, I should like to quote from Parliamentary Procedure, by Bourinot, of 1884. I retrieved this older text from the vaults of the Senate because I wanted an authority close to passage of the Constitution Act, 1867. I believe this is the first edition of Bourinot, published by Dawson Brothers in 1884.

At page 109 Bourinot says this respecting the introduction of new senators. The text states:

> The practice of introducing new senators is invariable—

"Invariable" is an important word.

[Senator Corbin.]

It continues:

> —in the upper chamber. The speaker will state to the house whenever the clerk has received a certificate from the clerk of the Crown in Chancery—

That is the person we now refer to as the Secretary to the Governor General.

> —that a new member has been summoned to the Senate. He will then inform the house: "Honourable gentlemen, a new member is without, ready to be introduced." The new member is then introduced between two senators, and presents at the table her Majesty's writ of summons, which is read by the clerk, and put upon the journals. He will then subscribe the oath before the clerk (one of the commissioners appointed for that purpose) by repeating the words after that officer. That having been done, the new member signs the roll, and then makes obeisance to the speaker, who, shaking hands with him, indicates the seat he is to occupy, and to which he is conducted by the members who introduced him. The speaker will finally acquaint the house that the new senator had also formally subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867.

I checked a later edition of Bourinot, the Fourth Edition, by Thomas Barnard Flint of the Nova Scotia Bar, which is interesting. He was Clerk of the House of Commons and editor of the Third Edition published by the Cannon Law Book Company, Law Publishers, Toronto.

At page 111, respecting new senators, the following appears:

> The forms attending the introduction of newly appointed senators are invariable. The speaker first reports to the Senate that the clerk has received a certificate from the secretary of state showing that a certain gentleman whose name is given, has been summoned to the Senate.

The Persons Case had not yet gone to Westminster. The text goes on to state:

> It is then ordered that the same be placed upon the journals. The entry is as follows: "This is to certify that his Excellency the governor-general has been pleased to summon to the Senate by letters patent under the great seal bearing date the . . . day of . . . 19 . . . of . . . in the province of . . . Esquire, &c., &c. The speaker then informs the Senate that there is a new member without, ready to be introduced. The new member is then introduced between two senators, and presents at the table his Majesty's writ of summons, which is read by the clerk, and put upon the journals. He will then subscribe the oath before the clerk (one of the commissioners appointed for that purpose) (t), by repeating the words after an officer. That having been done, the new member signs the roll, and then makes obeisance to the speaker, who, shaking hands with him, indicates the seat he is to occupy, and to which he is conducted by the members who introduced him. The speaker will finally acquaint the house that the new senator had also formally subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act (u).

In substance, nothing has changed.

I was called to the Senate and sworn in in 1984, and the exact procedure was followed. The officers referred to may have changed over the years, but essentially the same ceremony takes place. For the first time in Canadian parliamentary history a decision was taken by someone—and it is our right to know who made that decision—to take in senators not through the front door of the chamber but through the side doors, the back doors, the underground tunnel, I do not know.

That, as far as I am concerned—and I want Senator Bosa's comments on this—was a cheap and demeaning process. Not allowing this lady and these gentlemen to walk into the Senate chamber the way everybody else come in here was cheap and demeaning.

Senator Gigantès: And in all solemnity!

Senator Corbin: Yes, and with all dignity through the front doors. They should have walked down the red carpet to the Clerk's Table and have had the privilege of shaking hands with the Speaker and to have been escorted left and right by two honourable senators. That action, in my opinion, has diminished not only those individuals involved, but the Senate.

They were really taken in. They are only now beginning to awaken to the fact that they were taken in when they accepted the call to this place.

The rights, privileges, customs and traditions of this place have been diminished. The Senate, per se, has been diminished. I want that on the record. I want honourable senators to reflect on that. I want the divisional senators especially to reflect on that. I will always respect them, but I think they were diminished because of the way someone decided they would enter this place. That was demeaning; but what do you think, Senator Bosa?

Senator Bosa: I agree. Senator Corbin has asked me if I knew where the eight senators were sworn. I heard that they were sworn in in the Speaker's office; then I heard that they were sworn in in the Clerk's office. I did not see them come in. I did not see them being ushered in.

Senator Hastings: Yes, in the middle of the night.

Senator Bosa: I do not know if they were ushered in in the middle of the night, but the point I was making was that Senator Everett stated that if we challenge these actions, the legislative schedule will be paralysed.

I was trying to recall from memory how many laws have been challenged in the courts. I had said that the proposal by the government in 1978 to establish the House of the Federation was challenged in the courts. I said that the Constitution Act, 1982, was challenged in the courts.

I do not know if any other law has been challenged to the extent that those two matters were challenged. I am not aware of any others.

For Senator Poitras and Senator Everett to say that we would frustrate any legislature in the country by merely creating some sort of action that would be brought to the courts, and then saying the matter is sub judice so that the legislatures could not deal with it, is an exaggeration. That is an extreme exaggeration. All they had to do was to say that this was a problem facing the Senate. All you had to do was to agree to deal with it, and we could have proceeded with the rest of the business of the house. Instead they dug in and in this way showed the arrogance they were harbouring inside them, which exploded the minute they had their majority. They circumvented the rules of the Senate. They called for a recorded vote on a procedural motion in order to trigger an event where we would go out and they would call in the Conservative senators to have a caucus meeting in the red chamber. They had a Conservative caucus in the chamber with the Speaker of the Senate presiding. Other than these Conservative senators and Senator Molson and Senator Everett, the two independent senators who from time to time see eye to eye with the government side, no other vote was recorded.

• (0145)

Let me point something else out to you. With their arrogance, senators opposite decided that as soon as we did not accept their rulings, they were going to legislate by exhaustion. That is what they are doing now. They are trying to make us stay here day and night until we drop.

Senator Hébert: We will not drop!

Senator Gigantès: They will drop!

Senator Bosa: Senator Hébert, I have never seen so much unity in the Liberal ranks as I see now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bosa: I have never seen such fiery speeches, such devotion and such fervour in fighting this battle. We are fighting the battle in this way because we are on the right side of the issue. This is a mission that we are going to pursue to the end. That is why Liberal senators of all ages are here. Did you hear the speech Senator Croll made the other night? We are here fighting for this cause. But, on the other side, members do not have to speak.

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, let me remind you of what we have seen here. We have seen the intrusion of eight additional senators into the Senate of Canada. That was done in a precipitous way. There is no evidence that these senators are needed for the purposes that are being alleged. Then we saw Senator Charbonneau usurp power—power which the Speaker of the House of Lords and the Speaker of the Senate never had; power which neither the lords nor the senators have ever entrusted to the person who sits in their Chair. He has done that twice.

We are beginning the last quarter of the year. Some of the transactions to which I referred took place in September. I find it difficult to believe that for three months the government believed that it could not get Bill C-62 enacted by ordinary due process in the Parliament of Canada. I have been told that the real reason for these actions is a commitment made by the Prime Minister, or someone on his behalf, to the Conservative caucus—particularly the members of the caucus in the House of Commons—that they would have a long Christmas holiday. It is to start sometime in November and run through December, January and perhaps throughout most of February. I have been told that that is the real reason there are a few weeks available to get Bill C-62 on the statute books if that commitment to the Conservative caucus for their prolonged Christmas holiday is to be kept. They want to deal with the fall Supplementary Estimates early and then bring back Parliament in a new session in time to deal with the final Supplementary Estimates for the current fiscal year.

They had a long summer. We have all had a long summer. We were put out of here by a government motion on June 27 and returned on September 25—a three-month holiday that was paid for by the taxpayers. Now a new lure is being held up: a nice, long winter vacation. I am told that some people like to take off from these new airports, which occupy so much of our fine agricultural land that Senator Sparrow was talking about, to their favourite winter haunts such as West Palm Beach. Don't think there is any thought in the head of the Prime Minister of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the Parliament of Canada will be here on Christmas Eve or New Year's Eve trying to put the GST bill through. Not a thought! By then they will be nice and brown on the beaches of Florida. That is the real motivation for this inordinate haste and this unseemly constitutional trickery and usurpation by Senator Charbonneau. That is the kind of trivial consideration that has been operating in this Parliament during the last two weeks. Have you heard that, Senator Bosa?

Senator Bosa: I heard it loud and clear. Someone is laughing. Is someone questioning my sincerity in saying that I heard that loud and clear? I want to go back to the arrogance. The moment the Leader of the Government felt he had a majority in this chamber he became arrogant. The Conservatives trampled all over the rules. They never had this power before. It is like a person who is held by the collar and given a drink once in a while. Soon he wants more, but you prevent him from having what he wants. That is not the situation in Italy. In Italy there are no restrictions on liquor. That is why you find fewer drunks there than in any other country. Why? Because it is free. It is right there. Even children drink a glass of wine.

Now the Conservatives opposite have power and they exercise it with a vengence. It is as if you handed them a bottle of whisky for a drink and they gulped it down in one shot. Before Bill C-62 was tabled, they pulled this trick. They trampled over the rules. They made their own rules because they were going to show the Grits what they could do now that they had the majority. What happened? Now the Conservatives have had a taste of what we can really do—that we are serious about this debate, and that we are going to keep on debating this until they withdraw that ruling, until they restore the rules of the Senate and until they chastise the Speaker. Now they have gone from being arrogant to being insecure because they know we mean it.

I would like to read a column that was written by Don McGillivray of Southam News, which appeared in the Ottawa

[Senator Stewart.]

Citizen on Wednesday, October 10, 1990. The headline is "Dose of insecurity good for arrogant Tory government".

> Is a majority government free to do anything it wants, subject only to the decision of the voters in the next election? That is essentially the proposition put forward these days by the Mulroney government. Justice Minister Kim Campbell stated it succinctly on Sunday on television: "We have to introduce a tax. If you think we're wrong, turf us out at the next election."
> It sounds democratic. The government is responsible only to the voters who get their say once every four or five years. The electors then delegate all power to a prime minister and his party.
> This is what Prime Minister Brian Mulroney called "parliamentary democracy and responsible government" in one of the speeches he made while forcing his way past Senate "obstructionism".
> "It is my duty to defend our system of government," he said.
> No checks
> Perhaps this system, without any effective check on prime ministerial power between elections is becoming "our system of government".
> But are we in danger of ceasing to be a full-time democracy and turning into an intermittent democracy? Do we have four-year or five-year dictatorships punctuated by moments of democracy when the ordinary citizen is expected to decide all questions by putting an X in one of three or four boxes printed on a piece of paper?
> Perhaps the theory of unchecked government seems unsatisfactory because of the backdrop of events in the United States.
> The struggle over the 1990-91 U.S. budget among the White House, the Senate, the House of Representatives, the leadership of the Republican and Democratic parties and rebellious elements in both parties may not be the best way to decide on taxation and spending.
> But at least the citizen who wants cuts in medicare or heavier taxes on business is able to feel his or her opinion is being heard.

That opinion is being heard in the Senate. He continues:

> Not so with the goods and services tax. The debate on the GST was over before we realized it had started. We had an election in 1988. Many of us thought it was almost a referendum on free trade with the U.S., a referendum the majority lost because its votes were divided between two opposition parties.
> But now it turns out that with those same X-marks we absentmindedly gave an irrevocable mandate for the GST. And by the next election it will be a fait accompli. We can "turf" the Tories. But will the government we elect free us from the GST?

The checks on the executive power of the Canadian government have never been as strong as in the U.S. And in many ways they have diminished.

Closure, the arbitrary ending of a debate by the majority in the Commons, was once rare. Now it's common.

● (0200)

Refusal of an opposition to show up for a vote (commonly called "bell ringing") has been virtually outlawed as a delaying tactic by rule changes in the Commons and, for the moment, by a Senate Speaker's ruling.

Some new checks on the government's power may have arisen, though. A cabinet must now heed Supreme Court decisions on cases under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. And the Access to Information law, despite government foot-dragging, has here and there opened a window on things the cabinet would rather keep hidden.

And a government determined to plunge ahead in defiance of the public may generate its own checks and balances.

The Mulroney government is no longer as comfortable in its majority as a couple of years ago.

It seems that enough Tories have been tossed out of the government caucus over the GST or have quit to join the Bloc Québécois that the Tory whip is no longer as sure as he was of winning every snap vote. A few Conservative absentees could spell disaster.

That kind of insecurity is part of "our system of government" too. It's good for arrogant governments.

I think Mr. McGillivray has captured the essence of the day.

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Bosa has just read an article from the Ottawa Citizen.

Senator Bosa: This article is taken from the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, October 10, 1990 at page 15. It was written by Don McGillivray.

Senator Lefebvre: The article explains the arrogance of the government and the trampling of parliamentary procedures that has taken place in the other place. I get the impression from Senator Bosa that he is explaining to us that now, with the eight royal senators that have been added here, the Conservative side has a majority that would allow the Tories to do the same thing to the rules, procedures and conventions of this chamber. Senator Bosa has said that the arrogance being displayed over the last few days by the Tories in this chamber has always been there but was hidden under wraps until the day they proclaimed the eight additional senators.

In my view, he is saying that the Conservatives will try to pull the same things here as they have tried to pull in the other chamber, but the Canadian public is becoming more and more aware of their anti-democratic rulings. Could you elaborate on that, Senator Bosa?

Senator Bosa: I would be pleased to. All I have to do is repeat one sentence of the same article:

> Refusal of an Opposition to show up for a vote (commonly called "bell ringing") has been virtually outlawed as a delaying tactic by rule changes in the Commons and, for the moment, by a Senate Speaker's ruling.

He is aware that a ruling by the Speaker of the Senate would be tantamount to eliminating any possible delaying tactics that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition may institute to draw attention to a bad bill. This is now common knowledge. The papers are beginning to write about it. They are not writing about the GST now—they are writing about the raping of the rules of the Senate.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I rise to express my views on what I consider to be a valid objection raised by Senator Stewart as to the procedures of this house. It has been discussed in great detail by many senators.

Honourable senators, I must admit that I was an innocent victim of electronics last Thursday night, that ill-fated night.

Senator Bosa: I wonder if Senator Buckwold would allow me to say one word.

Senator Buckwold: You can even say five words.

Senator Bosa: I merely wanted to draw to the attention of the Hansard staff the omission in the index of the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, October 4, 1990, of the interventions of Senator Stanbury and myself. They are to be found at pages 2398 and 2399 of the Debates of the Senate of that date.

Senator Frith: But, considering what they have had to go through with this, you forgive them.

Senator Bosa: Oh, yes, I was going to add that with what is happening here it is a wonder that we have as much accuracy as we do.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you very much for that important intervention, which I think the chamber will be interested in knowing.

Honourable senators, I started out by saying that I was an innocent victim of the electronic inventions of the day. Last Thursday at a little after five o'clock I waited for my taxi. I saw a group milling around outside and asked one of the security people what was going on. He just shrugged. He did not say anything, and I quite innocently got into the taxi and went to the airport, where I met Senator Sparrow, who was on the same flight going to North Battleford, Saskatchewan.

It was my luck that just as we were checking in Senator Sparrow, who has always had these modern conveniences, had a telephone in his briefcase. All of a sudden I heard ringing. Senator Sparrow was just checking in ahead of me. His secretary called him and said, "You won't believe this, but the Senate is sitting." This would have been a little after 5:30 p.m., just after we got to the airport.

Senator Sparrow had already checked in and I was standing at the counter, ticket in hand. I could hardly believe it. Certainly it was not unexpected that we might be called back at any time, but to have this kind of surprise thrown at us was quite awesome.

Senator Sparrow and I immediately agreed that our place was not on that airplane, that we should contribute to the additional deficit of Air Canada, get in a cab and come right back here.

We arrived here by approximately 6:20, at which time it was all over. Everything had taken place.

Well, honourable senators, I felt insulted, and I am sure others have expressed the same view. I had no way of knowing that this was going to happen. If it were not for that telephone, I would have had a much easier weekend, I can tell you. I would not have been part of the explosion that took place in this chamber.

Senator Phillips: You were not coming back prior to that telephone call?

Senator Buckwold: No, I was on my way home, as many senators were about to do.

Senator Frith: Not that weekend, we weren't.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, but I had a speaking engagement. The Deputy Leader will remember that I spoke to him about a speaking engagement in Saskatoon on Friday night. I asked his permission to go, as it was an important event.

Senator Phillips: Thanks for the further proof.

Senator Buckwold: Quite frankly, honourable senators, we arrived back here and then, of course, the whole mess started.

How desperate can a government get? How can it continue to use every means, legal or illegal, decent or indecent, proper or improper, to ram through a piece of legislation that in the end is going to be its nemesis? It will never be forgiven. I am talking not only about the legislation itself but about the procedure. It will never be forgiven by the Canadian public.

The Tory party has killed itself, in my opinion, for the next generation, just as it has done in times past, when it made the wrong move. Surely they have to have some feeling for what is going on. I am talking not just about the expression of opinion that was given to our committee as we travelled around the country, but also of the economic indicators.

It was not difficult to see what was coming. We were into a recession in this country. If the government had any common sense or any political savvy, instead of just having to be dead right—and believe me, it will be "dead" right—if it had been able to look at the economic indicators, it would have been happy, if not to withdraw the bill, then at least to postpone it or delay it for a period of time.

Of all times, this sort of taxation, a new change in the direction of the burden of taxation, is the worst thing the government could do. I am sure that thinking senators on the other side feel the same way.

[Senator Buckwold.]

We hear the indicators. Today the Conference Board of Canada reported that this is absolutely the wrong time to make such a change. Most of the think tanks—many of whom who supported the GST, by the way, and I will get into that later in my speech when we are discussing the GST—as they make their explanations and predictions of what is happening to the economy of this country, are blaming a variety of things, plus the imposition of the GST. Read the report of the Conference Board. Read the reports of other think tanks. The GST, in addition to inflation and unemployment, is adding to the whole disillusionment of the country in the economic policies of this government.

I will have the opportunity to discuss the report of the committee on the GST. But I have to tell you that it will be a factual speech, because I will really just go through the work of the committee.

Honourable senators, there is a calamity befalling this country. I want to say to my Conservative friends across the way that if they think there is any shift in public opinion, they are wrong. I have heard some of them say, "Well, the mess you guys made last Friday and Saturday was something that will cause the Canadian public to turn on you." They were disgusted. Well, none of us was very proud, but, believe me, the Canadian public have not changed their opinion on the Liberal stand.

I think it was yesterday when my very nice secretary brought in the mail. That nice young lady was almost ruptured with the load of mail that had poured in, all of it, with one or two exceptions—hundreds of letters, petitions and signed statements—encouraging the Liberal senators to do what they have said they were going to do, what we are determined to do and will continue to do: block the GST, do everything we can against the despicable act of parachuting in new senators. That was a procedure never followed in the history of Canada, and it was done to bring in a tax vilified and hated by the Canadian public.

I thought I would reinforce that statement of public support by dipping into the letter bag and taking out some letters at random and reading them to you. I have not had time to read some of them completely myself because there are just too many, but I thought you might be interested to hear what the ordinary people out there in this great land of ours— who I respect—and, believe me, some of the opinions are more meaningful to me than hearing from the president of the Chamber of Commerce.

These are the people who are out there providing the jobs and the little service industries. These are the people who are building up small businesses. If you look at where people work in this country, you will find that it is not in the steel companies of Canada or even in General Motors. The great majority—65 or 70 per cent—are employed in service industries and in small businesses. These are the people who are creating employment. These are the people who write to me and to other senators and, I presume, even to our friends across the way.

The first letter that I happened to pick up is from Toronto. It is from Mr. I. Good. This is a good letter. It reads:

> Subject GST
> Dear Mr. Buckwold:
> This is my third letter to you. Down with the GST. Economically we are in a recession, yet Mr. Mulroney and his cronies conceptionally keep their blinkers tied tight.

These people have good lines; I will have to remember this. He goes on to state:

> The Mulroney government is only interested in big business and the money spent on preparing for the GST. This stupid government has lost sight of the consumer, the person that will decide the fate of the economy.
> Analogy: Saddam of Iraq says, "To hell with what the world and the United Nations thinks." Mulroney says, "To hell with what the consumer thinks."
> Good luck—keep up the blockade.

It is signed Mr. I. Good. That is just the beginning. I have hundreds of these. Do you want me to go until 10 o'clock? If so, I would be glad to.

Senator Hastings: Go until tomorrow morning.

Senator Marchand: Until eight o'clock, anyway.

Senator Frith: Yes, eight o'clock would be fine.

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

Senator Phillips: Go until at least eight o'clock!

Senator Marchand: Go ahead.

Senator Hastings: Go and get the mail bag!

Senator Buckwold: Do you want me to go and get the mail bag? We can bring in the mail bag. I am not strong enough at this hour to lug it in. I might need some help. I am just a little guy, and it is a big bag.

Senator Lefebvre: You would need some help with it.

Senator Buckwold: This letter is from Grace M. McCarthy, MLA Vancouver Little Mountain, B.C. Grace McCarthy, as all of you know, is a leading political figure in British Columbia. She appeared before our committee and wrote me afterwards. The letter is in the file.

Senator Phillips: I thought it was from Pat Carney.

Senator Buckwold: Pat Carney? She would not write me if I told her that I would give her $10 for every word.

Senator Hastings: Did she attend a meeting in Vancouver?

Senator Buckwold: Pat Carney attend a meeting? She did not even know that it was going on.

Grace McCarthy wrote:

> Dear Senator Buckwold:
> It was a great pleasure meeting you in British Columbia, and I hope that some of the representations made across the country have made a significant impression on the committee.

This, I believe, is a former deputy premier of British Columbia, not a Liberal. She goes on to say:

> My personal concerns regarding the G.S.T. include the timing of its presentation in the midst of what will be a recessionary period for our economy. In my view it will be especially damaging to Western Canadian economies, and it is for this reason I urge the Senate to stand firm against the House of Commons to protect this region of Canada.

If I can interject, as a regional senator I have to take that kind of advice.

Senator Stollery: That is right!

Senator Buckwold: She goes on to say:

> The unwielding process which has been developed by a group of bureaucrats who obviously don't know what doing business is all about, and the enormous burden this places on each and every Canadian is so unfair to our people. I do wonder at the political wisdom of the government!
> Again, it was a pleasure to see you in Vancouver. I was very pleased that the Senate Committee has produced these hearings for Canadians from coast to coast to be heard. I do hope the hearings have had an effect.
> Sincerely,
> Grace M. McCarthy, M.L.A.

The next letter just came into me on October 10—is that today?

Senator Fairbairn: No.

Senator Buckwold: What day is it?

Senator Phillips: The tenth is tomorrow.

Senator Lefebvre: It is only the ninth.

Senator Phillips: The tenth is tomorrow. Look at the Table.

Senator Buckwold: We lose track of the days and nights! This letter is from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. The fax is signed by Bill Parsons, but the letter is from John Bulloch, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. He sent me a press notice that has just been put out by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. It does not represent D'Aquino's big guys or the big department stores; it represents the people who provide employment. Mr. Bulloch says:

> The Federal Government should withdraw Bill C-62, the GST legislation that is presently before the Senate, fix the flaws, and delay implementation of the new tax by a period of one year.
> The Conference Board of Canada has confirmed that we are now in a "made-in-Canada" recession as a result of the government's high interest rates. To make matters worse, inflation and declining ouput are now being compounded by high energy prices. This is not the time, therefore, to introduce a massive consumption tax and drive consumers and small businesses into the ground.

Surely these words must have some impact on you people dozing across the way.

An Hon. Senator: None!

Senator Buckwold: You have made up your minds that you will not listen to anyone, especially to the people. I am hoping that some of this might even sink through so that you get to feel that people are being hurt by this tax. It is not the Liberals or me as the chairman, it is the people out there who are begging us to do something to a tax that they just will not accept.

I will now go back to the letter. It states:

> When the GST was first contemplated by the government, the Canadian economy was enjoying a period of robust economic expansion, relatively low interest rates and inflation, and a competitive Canadian dollar. Times have changed. The timing of January 1, 1991 for this horrendous new tax could not be worse.
> People are hurting in this country.

I wish you people would remember that. People are hurting out there. They are losing their jobs. They are losing their businesses. More and more, they are losing faith in their country's leaders. All you have to do is look at the polls that ask: "What kind of confidence do you have in your country's leaders?" You will see that that is proved in every poll. There is four times as much confidence in chartered banks, according to a recent poll, than there is in the federal government.

Senator Frith: They love their bankers more!

Senator Buckwold: Yes, they love their bankers. They hate bankers—and if you want the clipping I will show it to you—but the lowest level in the poll was the confidence in the federal government. There was four times as much confidence in the chartered banks. This letter concludes:

> This is the time for the Prime Minister to show economic statesmanship, rather than brinksmanship.

It is signed John F. Bulloch, President, Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

As I read these letters, quite frankly I do not know what I am coming to because I have hardly glanced at them. Some of them may even be supportive, I do not know. I hope I have not taken the wrong letters.

Senator Poitras: Yes; You have the wrong letters now!

Senator Buckwold: The chance is about one in two hundred that I might happen to pick up a letter that is from a relative of Mr. Mulroney, or of Senator Phillips, or perhaps from Senator Spivak's mother-in-law, telling her that this is a great deal.

Senator Phillips: You did not answer those letters, though.

Senator Buckwold: So far I have not found one like that. This one comes from my home town of Saskatoon from Patrick T. Mackenzie. It reads:

> Dear Sid:
> We have just returned from six months in New Zealand—

[Senator Buckwold.]

That is the great illustration used by the government so often of a tax paradise for bringing in their value-added tax, or goods and services tax.

Senator Phillips: I take it those people are hurting, are they?

Senator Buckwold: In New Zealand?

Senator Phillips: No, the ones who visited New Zealand.

Senator Buckwold: If you will let me read the letter, we will find out. I have not read it myself. Maybe they are.

Senator Stollery: Absolutely!

Senator Poitras: But they spend six months there!

Senator Buckwold: However, we have New Zealand, the great illustration. Here is a country that brought in this tax four years ago. In four years the rate has already gone up 25 per cent and brought on a depression like they have never seen before. Unemployment has now, they say, levelled out. That is what we can expect will happen in Canada. The record is there. Even our committee had representations made to it from people who had been in New Zealand and lived in New Zealand.

Senator Poitras: Your members of the committee.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, that is fine. Some of us were impressed. Believe me, the members on the opposite side were not impressed with anything—they were not even impressed with the hard chairs that we sat on, although they made a good impression there sometimes.

An Hon. Senator: Thank you.

Senator Buckwold: You are welcome. He says:

> We have just returned from six months in New Zealand, where they have a GST of 12 per cent. It is very expensive, though beautiful, country in which to live. The everyday impact of living with 12 per cent tacked on to everything is very strong and the kiwis do not have provincial tax on top of the federal tax as we do.

This is an important point. He goes on to state:

> They also had their income taxes reduced with the inception of GST.
> It is a mean tax that concerns as well as infuriates me. How can a government say—

And the "mean tax" is the GST in Canada that he is referring to. He goes on to say:

> How can a government say that it cares for its citizens when it won't even do what ordinary taxpayers want? A government that drinks continually from the communal trough without going to large corporations, where millionaires can "get out of" paying any tax at all.

• (2030)

> Now, in order to get his way Mulroney is planning to stack the Senate with his cronies.

This was written on September 24, just before we got "the stackers."

> Now, in order to get his way Mulroney is planning to stack the Senate with his cronies—legally too, he claims. I'm disgusted. Where will this stop. Rather than stack the Senate this government should be forced to hold a general election.

These people are not dumb!

> Please listen to the concern of 80% of Canadians and get all the Liberal senators out on voting day. We are all justifiably cynical of government but my father-in-law Norman MacKenzie was in the Senate in the 60s so I know that the Senate has the clout to oppose Mulroney.
> Yours sincerely
> Eileen MacKenzie

Senator Lefebvre: The letter from the person who had visited New Zealand said that the GST there was at a rate of 12 per cent, did he?

Senator Buckwold: Their rate is 12.5 per cent.

Senator Lefebvre: That person also indicated that income tax rates had been reduced.

Has this government announced a reduction in income tax rates?I have been told that since this government took office it has raised income tax rates tremendously, affecting middle-class Canadians, not upper-class Canadians.It is my understanding that this government has no intention of lowering income tax rates.

Would Senator Buckwold comment on that?

Senator Buckwold: Representations were made to the committee by dozens of petitioners. The current government actually reduced income taxes—but do not get too excited because that applied only to those in the higher-income brackets. Of course, those who are in those brackets needed the reduction!

Senator Lefebvre: That was done for Mulroney's friends.

Senator Buckwold: Ordinary Canadians pay most of the income taxes in this country. The poorer Canadians got a slight reduction. The tax burden was put on the average working man and the average small business person. That is the way this government operates.

As we now know, in New Zealand there is a plan to reduce income tax rates. Also, as the gentleman has pointed out, New Zealand does not have any provincial sales taxes to contend with.

Senator Marchand: Dr. Norman MacKenzie was the former president of the University of British Columbia. He was an outstanding president and an outstanding senator. I believe he retired in the early 1970s. I thought I would let honourable senators know more about Norman MacKenzie, as you just left it hanging.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, now that I think of it, Norman MacKenzie lived in Saskatoon. He was the distinguished Dean of Engineering at the university for many years. He eventually moved to Ottawa and took a position with the National Research Council.

That is just for the information of honourable senators.

May I continue with my reading of the letters? A News Release, dated October 2, 1990, from Co-op Atlantic states:

> IMMEDIATE RELEASE
> Co-op Atlantic, on behalf of co-operatives in Atlantic Canada, called on Senators of all parties to vote against the GST legislation now before the Senate. Co-op Atlantic is owned by 174 co-operatives across The Atlantic region. More than 160,000 families own these cooperatives and those families include over 500,000 people in the region. Co-operatives are non-partisan businesses which are owned by local people to solve community problems.
> Co-operatives oppose the tax for two reasons:
> The tax discriminates against co-operatives and puts them at a disadvantage compared to their competition. The GST attacks the ability of people in their community to form businesses which are owned and controlled by people in the community and which meet community problems.

To explain why—and I will go into this in more detail when I discuss the committee's report—by some strange bureaucratic ruling, which so far has not been changed, although representation has been made, the share capital of the co-op, which in any other business would be common stock, is treated under the goods and services tax as a membership fee. It is treated in the same way as a golf club membership. There is a tax of 7 per cent on that capital. Anybody who wants to join the co-op and put in $1,000; $2,000 or $3,000–which is how co-ops operate—must pay 7 per cent on that.

We have had representations from co-ops right across the country. In my part of the country millions of people belong to co-ops, all of whom are making the same complaint.

Senator Beaulieu: Who is that letter from?

Senator Buckwold: It is a news release from Co-op Atlantic. Sid Pobihushchy is the president of that co-op.

Senator Beaulieu: He is a well-known supporter of the Liberal Party.

Senator Buckwold: Is that a criminal offence? It may be in Senator Beaulieu's mind. Mr. Pobihushchy represents 500,000 people. I do not think the fact that he is a Liberal should make any difference. When he appeared before the committee in Halifax, quite frankly I thought he might be a member of the New Democratic Party. He certainly is not a Tory.

I am glad Senator Beaulieu has raised this issue because there are intelligent people living in the maritimes.

Their problem is that this will affect their share capital. This will mean unfair competition.

The news release goes on to state:

> The tax is regressive. It taxes a single mother with three children at the same rate as a billionaire.

You people opposite would know about that. It goes on to state:

> The GST moves the tax burden in this country away from those who can afford to pay toward those who can less afford to pay.
> "We approached the Government with our concerns in early June. They promised to have answers for us by the end of July but when we finally met in September they were back to asking the same sorts of questions they had asked in June," said Eric Dean, Co-op Atlantic General Manager.

Is he a Liberal too, Senator Beaulieu?

The news release goes on to state:

> "It seems to us that the whole idea of the Senate is to act as a check and a balance. When 85% or more of Canadians are opposed to something, and when the elected Chamber has no regard for their opinion, the Senate has a role to play. This is especially true when the elected chamber has been elected with the support of only 43% of the electorate. We expect the House of Commons to act in good faith and to respect the views of Canadians, and if they do not then the Senate has a role to play.

Senator Muir should be interested in this. This is a co-op from Atlantic Canada.

Senator Muir: I am listening to you. Take it easy! Control yourself!

Senator Buckwold: It just seemed to me that the moment I started talking about Atlantic Canada, Senator Muir started talking to his desk mate. That shows how interested he is in this subject.

Senator Muir: I am trying to stay awake to listen to your malarkey.

Senator Buckwold: I am only reading what Canadians are saying. You have accused me of dishing out malarkey; I am only repeating what the people have said.

Senator Muir: Just carry on.

Senator Buckwold: I will. The news release goes on to state:

> This role should be played very infrequently but if it is not played in this type of situation then the Senate has no role at all. In this case Senators have a duty to vote against this regressive, flawed and discriminatory piece of legislation because it offends the 'peace, order and good government of Canada'", said Sid Pobihushchy, Co-op Atlantic's President.

That co-op represents 500,000 people in the Atlantic region. The next letter is from Glenwood, Yarmouth County, Nova Scotia. Since Senator Muir is not interested in what maritimers have to say, he can leave now.

This is a letter from Kathleen Wilson. She writes:

> Dear Senators:
> I just saw two cookies from the latest uncooked batch of Senators interviewed on CBC's Midday.

[Senator Buckwold.]

They are now well done; they have been roasted. She continues:

> Among other things, they did some proselytizing about their plans to help "change Canadian institutions."
> I really don't want the likes of those two changing Canadian institutions, which, thank God, seem to work just fine, at this moment in time.
> Please keep going with your fight against the GST and this traitorous government. You are a valiant band.

● (0245)

They must be thinking of you, Senator Frith. Kathleen Wilson wrote that on October 4.

The next letter comes from Mr. Orin Durey of Regina, Saskatchewan. It reads as follows:

> Dear Sir;
> I am following up on the phone call I made to you in Saskatoon on Sunday. I strongly disagree with Mulroney's stacking of the Senate and his push to ram the GST down the throats of Canadians. What this country needs is fair taxation, not regressive taxes that hit the poor and the middle class and allow the banks and the transnational corporations to pay next to nothing.

I was told this time and time again. Every one complains about the banks, yet everyone has four times as much confidence in them as they have in the federal government. At the end of the letter it says:

> P.S. All the noise-making Friday has to be done to stop the Government. Give 'em a blast for me! Thanks.

Consider yourself blasted!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: How do corporations pay taxes?

Senator Hastings: They don't! They have never paid taxes.

Senator Buckwold: Your question is how do they pay taxes? They pay by the profits they make and by the prices they charge.

Senator MacDonald: Consumers pay taxes.

Senator Buckwold: I have heard that argument before.

Senator MacDonald: They pay them through lower dividends.

Senator Buckwold: Your argument is that they should not pay anything.

Senator MacDonald: It would be helpful if you could tell me how corporations pay taxes.

Senator Buckwold: Everyone loads on a tax somewhere, and corporations take more than their fair share. This is what we were told across the country. The consumer pays in any case. The corporations have to get a return on their investment. If their taxes are higher, they raise their prices, profits or margins. I do not accept that. Many of these companies may have to take a lower return on their investment. I guess that is the reason you and I sit on different sides of the house.

I have another letter from Jim Rutledge of Saskatoon. I have a lot of friends in Saskatoon, although I do not know Mr. Rutledge. He says he is a retired cabby with 28 years in our fair city with never a dull moment. He said he had a half section of land which he sold in the spring of 1989. In this letter he is making reference to Bill C-28. He is saying that he had to pay a tax on his old age pension. I will save that letter until we get into Bill C-28. He said because he sold his farm and made additional revenues that year, he had to pay his old age pension back. The guy was a taxi driver. He had to pay back $1,300 of his old age pension. He asked me how this can occur when the law has not yet been passed. He said he does not like to trouble me with his minor problems, but answers today seem to be few and far between. It is a little off the subject, but we will come to that in due course.

The next letter I have is from Terry Mester of Welland, Ontario. He says:

> Dear Senator Buckwold:
> I just wish to begin by expressing my great pleasure with the Senate for exercising its Constitutional Rights with respect to the Goods and Services Tax, Unemployment Insurance and many other matters over the past year. The Conservative Government is ruining our Country and the Senate is the only Institution that can stand in their way.
> It is, however, unfortunate that Mulroney has been able to attain a majority in the Senate through his unorthodox methods. Although he does not have an absolute majority in number, because a few of your fellow Liberal colleagues are ill, coupled with another Liberal retirement on October 4th, he almost has a majority in practice. Combine this with the three Liberal retirements next year—including yourself—he will rule the Senate without difficulty.
> Almost as disastrous as the Goods and Services Tax passing is the fact that the Unemployment Insurance amendments will now pass, and next year they will probably be ramming through the Free Trade Agreement with Mexico. The worst result, however, will not be until after the Liberals are re-elected and the Conservatives use their Senate Majority to get vengeance on us. I guess that will just have to be the price we pay in order to stand up for our principles.

That is a wise statement. A lot of people have said that some day we will get this treatment back. That does not bother me at all. As Mr. Mester says, it is proper that we stand up for our principles.

> At least the Liberals can say that we did everything in our power to stop the Tax. I hope that you will continue to keep up the good work!

I will now read my next letter of October 10.

> I've been living in Edmonton almost ten years. Originally I'm from Newfoundland, Canada. My reason for leaving my home is the same for thousands of other Newfoundlanders who have left over the years, employment. Before I left to come out west I was married with one child, working in a foundry for $3.25 per hour, paying 11 per cent sales tax and 80 cents for a litre of milk. Still I was doing good compared to other people I knew at the time which was 1981 not 1950. Since I've left Newfoundland my people there are paying over 13 per cent sales tax, employment and wages are the lowest all across the country and a litre of milk has almost doubled in price. Brian Mulroney gave the French fishing rights off the Grand Banks, and most of our fish plants had to shut down, but let's not forget, we do have free trade with the United States. Soon our Prime Minister will sign a free trade agreement to include Mexico also. The U.S. will have everything they ever hoped for, access to Canada's rich natural resources, and one of the cheapest labour forces where an auto worker earns $1.30 per hour. Try competing against that, Ontario. Newfoundlanders will have plenty of company in the boat then, we better start bailing now to make room.
> If this GST goes through Newfoundlanders will be paying a 19 per cent tax, that's like rubbing salt into a festering wound. This should be an eye opener for the Canadian people to what this GST is going to do and that is "Make the poor pay more". Start taxing the rich and big corporations more, plug up the loopholes they use to exempt them from paying. We need a government that is going to support economic growth where it is needed the most, not one that's going to stifle it through levying high taxes on the ordinary working man, who are the majority in this country! I'm pretty sure they will prove it in the next election if this GST goes through. Mr. Mulroney will need all the luck of the Irish he can get, maybe even George Bush and the marines.
> As a Newfoundlander and a Canadian citizen who is concerned about the effects of the proposed Goods and Services Tax, I am asking you Mr. Buckwold and the entire Senate to do whatever you can to defeat the GST and to explore fair tax alternatives, which I'm sure we can accomplish through the people of Canada.
> I look forward to hearing from you.

It is signed Kenneth Spurrel.

I have another letter from Weston, Ontario.

> As suggested by the Leader of the New Democratic Party of Canada—Audrey McLaughlin—I am writing to you to urge you on in your efforts to stop the proposed GST. According to articles in the newspapers, there are fairer ways of raising the money the Government says they need, and I have already sent many of those clippings to Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Wilson. Please get the Senators together to save us from "death by taxes".

It is signed Mrs. M. Kendler of Weston, Ontario.

I am sure you will find this correspondence interesting. It lets you know what people think out there. I have a feeling that many of us are far removed or isolated from what the ordinary guy thinks.

I have another letter from Downsview, Ontario.

> I find it incredible that in this democratic society, the voice of Canadians is being ignored. Are we truly a democracy then? How is it that the GST can still be passed regardless of how Canadians feel? How is it that the very people we elected to represent us are now turning their backs on their duties to the country? I'm saddened for Canada and disgusted at the Tories. What does it take to put a stop to the GST?

It is signed by Monica Segal.

This next letter of October 9 gives you some idea of the problems people face.

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Buckwold, I believe at the beginning of your remarks you mentioned someone's father-in-law who had been a senator here. The Table has provided me with the name of a certain Hon. Norman Archibald MacRae MacKenzie, C.M.G., M.M. and Bar, Q.C., B.A, LL.B., LL.M., LL.D, D.C.L., D. Litt., D. ● (0300)

This, as honourable senators can see, goes on and on. He was also a member of the Canadian-American committee, the National Planning Association, 1957 to 1963; was President of the Vancouver branch, English-Speaking Union of the Commonwealth; Chairman of the Canadian delegation to the 10th Annual Conference on UNESCO, Paris, 1958 and so on. He was a member of the faculty club of UBC in Vancouver, the Vancouver Club and the University Club, Vancouver. He was summoned to the Senate February 24, 1966. His party politics were independent Liberal, his religion, United Church. His address, 4509 West 4th Avenue, Vancouver, B.C.

Senator Frith: That could very well be the same fellow.

Senator Lefebvre: That could be the same person you mentioned in your letter; a very distinguished Canadian, obviously.

Senator Phillips: I should like to ask Senator Lefebvre a question. Was that the same Senator Mackenzie who annoyed Prime Minister Trudeau when he was appointed a mediator on a strike on the St. Lawrence Seaway and awarded a pay increase of 33 and one-third per cent?

Senator Lefebvre: I have no reason to believe that he could or could not be. I will let the Honourable Senator Phillips fill us in with more history, if he wishes.

Senator Kenny: Exactly who was he, again, Senator Lefebvre? I didn't get his background.

Senator Lefebvre: He was probably one of the most distinguished Canadians to occupy a seat in this chamber. He has a list of degrees that would probably take up a page and a half. I will send this list along to the Honourable Senator Kenny if he wishes to peruse it. He could get at least 25 pages on this gentleman alone on just a short synopsis of his career.

This shows the type of person who was chosen by the Liberal Prime Ministers to sit in the chamber. It is just an example.

Senator Hastings: Just to clarify Senator Phillips's mistake in history, the former Senator Norman Mackenzie was appointed to the Senate by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson. He did arbitrate a seaway dispute at the request of the then Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson and he did a remarkably successful job of arbitration in that case.

Senator Phillips: But the award was 33 and one-third per cent.

Senator Hastings: Oh, it was an excellent settlement of the seaway strike, yes.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you for referring again to a distinguished citizen originally from my city.

Senator Frith: We are now back to the studio.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, we are back to the studio again. I think that not only did Senator Mackenzie have a distinguished career, but it should be observed that the members of his family are obviously carrying on the tradition of interest in the welfare of this country, which is evidenced by that interesting letter which I received and read into the record.

Honourable senators, I will now read a letter from Mark and Linda Caruana-Dingli of Willowdale, Ontario, of September 26, 1990. It is addressed to me.

We are writing to you in the hope that you can be of help to us.

For the past six years my wife and myself have been saving for a down payment on a new home. In February of 1989 we signed an Agreement of Purchase and Sale for a condominium to be built and ready for occupancy in the year of 1991. To date we have deposited $45,000 towards our home which will not be completed until 1991 and will not be registered until one year following completion. Because of this we were worried we would have to pay the GST despite the fact that our contract was signed in 1988 well before the implementation of this tax.

We wrote to Michael Wilson asking him how his tax was going to address this problem and he replied that a rebate program would be in effect. We received this reply while the proposed GST was still 9 per cent.

When the proposed tax was changed to 7 per cent, we again wrote to Michael Wilson asking about the rebate program. Since then he has failed to respond to our last three letters.

Honourable senators, this is something we have heard innumerable times, that people have not been able to get a response from the Minister.

Senator Hastings: And when they did get one, it was wrong!

Senator Buckwold: That is right.

We hope that in some way you might be able to help us get a reply to this urgent problem. The new tax and our closing are drawing near and we need to know whether we will have to forfeit our deposit since we may not be able to afford the extra $14,000.

We have enclosed all of the relevant correspondence with Mr. Wilson.

Senator Lefebvre: How much extra did you say?

Senator Buckwold: $14,000, according to this letter.

Senator Lefebvre: And what is the value of the house?

Senator Buckwold: The value of the house is $206,000. The letter states:

. . . we need to know whether we will have to forfeit our deposit since we may not be able to afford the extra $14,000.

We have enclosed all of the relevant correspondence with Mr. Wilson.

We look forward to your reply.

Honourable senators, there are several pages here. I am sure you will be relieved that I will not read them, but I just want to draw to your attention the kind of problems people are facing. Anybody who tells you that there is no tax on housing had better look at the record closely to see what some of the witnesses had to say in that regard.

The next is a letter that I received October 10 from Leslie Cassettari, President of Independent Travel Professionals.

Dear Sir:

Please find enclosed a copy of a letter dated April 3, 1990 addressed to Michael Wilson. No reply to this letter has been received. I originally wrote to Prime Minister Mulroney on April 18, 1989 and received a "form letter" reply from the Prime Minister's office dated January 19, 1990 and a reply from Michael Wilson's office (undated) at the end of February. None of the issues raised in my original letter and repeated in my letter of April 3, 1990 have been addressed and I sincerely believe that these are legitimate business concerns.

He goes on to point out his concern regarding the travel industry. Again I will not read his letter to Mr. Wilson, although if senators want me to do so I would be happy to, as well as his comments on tourism, which as an industry will be one of the major casualties of the goods and services tax.

I have a letter from an MLA of the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly which I received October 10. As I have said to honourable senators, I just picked these off the top of the pile. This letter is from Anne Smart, MLA, Saskatchewan Centre Constituency:

Please continue your strong fight against the GST. Many, many people are hoping you can succeed in stopping this regressive tax.

As the Opposition Critic for Seniors' Issues in the Saskatchewan Legislature, I have been meeting with seniors' groups across the province, and I know that they are deeply concerned about the impact of this tax on people with fixed incomes. A tax that applies to services will hit seniors hard. We are counting on you to help us. We were very pleased by the strong statements quoted by you in the Star-Phoenix.

Keep up the good work, and all the best!

The next letter is from Audrey Dosman of Hamilton, Ontario:

Please pass on my encouragement and support to the Liberal and Independent Senate members in their stand to defeat Bill C-62, the proposed Goods and Services Tax (GST).

I hope that when/if the Bill is defeated, a strong recommendation will be made to pursue a more fair and alternate tax reform.

The next letter is from Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. This is a long letter. Do I have enough time to read it?

Senator Frith: Oh, I think so.

Senator Buckwold: Are you sure?

Senator Frith: Well, no, let's see—yes, I think so.

Senator Buckwold: I will be glad to read it. With all this mail, I am ready to compete with Ann Landers.

Senator Lefebvre: Please read it.

Senator Buckwold: It states:

When are Canadian taxpayers going to get value for the money they pay in salaries, perks, pensions to politicians—senators included. It is about time you Senators showed the Canadian people that you are really needed and worth the money you cost us. It seems all you do is hold up bills (to make it appear to us that you have our interests at heart) and then end up approving the bills anyway. To us this is a waste of our tax dollars which are becoming intolerable and people are very very angry. If things don't change, there is bound to be a revolt in this country. People are fed up to the eyeballs. (Just look what happened in the Ontario election). People are no longer prepared to sit idly by and let politicians of all stripes walk over us.

You must not let this GST proceed. We are angry as hell that the Mulroney government has already spent millions of dollars on something that isn't even law yet. Some started September 1/90 (funerals for example—appalling). Seventy per cent of Canadians are against this tax, but this government is so arrogant they don't listen. They were the ones who raised the MST from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent.

Honourable senators, this person in Moose Jaw knows all about that. This terrible manufacturers' sales tax, so degraded by the government in six short years, was raised by 50 per cent. It is unbelievable, but Mrs. R. Mackey of Moose Jaw knows about it. People aren't stupid. She continues:

They should have found a different method than this GST. This is a horrendous tax-gouging, money-grabbing piece of legislation to be taxed on everything we buy and do. It is going to hit the very low income and average wage earners the most. We simply cannot afford any more. We will have the provincial tax on top. This government is infringing on Provincial jurisdiction with this tax. They don't hesitate to give themselves $6,000 extra tax free and you senators an extra $153 per day tax free with no qualms as to who must pay for this. The whole political system is corrupt. To think after six years you can all get a lifetime pension from $18,000 per year and up for the rest of your lives from taxpayers' pockets. You don't have to wait until 65 years of age. Millions work a lifetime and have no pension. Don't try to tell us they pay for it. Bullspit—six years they pay a pittance. How they look at themselves in the mirror is more than I can fathom. They think they deserve this. They know the conditions of the job—the hours, et cetera—but we shouldn't have to pay for it. We certainly get few honest and competent people representing us—in fact they don't represent us once elected—the leader rules the roost. They all hope for six years under their belt and they are set for life.

GST should be scrapped and better and less complex complicated methods of raising money. To require 4,000 extra people to run it is ludicrous. It is time to stop giving so many unnecessary tax breaks to Corporations and chances to defer their taxes.

● (0315)

Ordinary tax payers don't have that option—Pay or get taxed high interest. Loopholes should be closed. It is so unfair. Corporations should pay higher taxes. Tax the very wealthy (lots of our politicians are in that bracket) higher taxes. They seem to get the breaks. The income tax system should be revised to a progressive tax system. They should have revised the MST. This GST is going to raise inflation, thereby raising the cost of living. Interest rates need to be lowered. If we had a fairer tax system there would be no need for this GST. Make everyone (cheaters & tax dodgers as well) pay their fair share. There are too many getting away with little or no tax. The average taxpayer is nailed on every dollar he earns. I think MLAs & MPs should pay on every dollar too—no more $26,000 per year tax free, plus perks, trips, limousines, cheap lunches) etc. It is very unfair & we are angry.

EARN YOUR PAY! DO SOMETHING FOR THE CANADIAN TAXPAYER! The PCs say you are irresponsible for trying to stop this UIC. If that isn't the kettle calling the pot black. They claim to hate the Senate so much but don't hesitate to put PCs in vacant seats. Mulroney will be responsible if he tries to use the never used clause to stack more PCs & cost the taxpayer more again. We are fed up and desperate for true democracy and fairness.

[Senator Buckwold.]

She goes on to speak about the abortion law. She states:

Also the abortion law is not fair to women or doctors. Who are these people to dictate the personal lives of women? The men again get off scot free—

I am sure that senators will be interested in this phrase. She says:

—even although it took "two to tango". I'd like men to have just one child—be sick for nine months . . . and see how they'd like to be dictated to. We wouldn't have many children. Women are being treated like chattels and ignorant people. This Bill should be thrown out. You seem to have lost democracy to dictatorship in Canada today.

This was written by Mrs. R. Mackey, who then adds another P.S. She says:

If Mulroney adds extra to the Senate to get his own way, he will suffer the consequences from the taxpayer. Time to elect MPs for four years only and do away with us having to pay them lifetime pensions after six years. This is crooked and unfair to taxpayers. My husband worked 36 years to earn what he gets and we are nailed to the wall with taxes, taxes and more taxes. When is it to end?

This lady is expressing the frustration that she feels out there. She is a pensioner who is probably on a modest pension. She is upset at these senators and others, not only over the GST but also the whole system.

The next letter is from Barrie, Ontario. This is from Janice Brown. It reads:

Of all the things that "King Brian" and his "court" have done to the detriment of this fine country of Canada, I think the GST would be the worst. It will negatively affect every man, woman and child. The country is already struggling against a recession, high interest rates and lack of affordable housing.

The manufacturer's tax has been with us for 60 years, so it can't be all that bad, so why not change it where necessary to make Canada's exports more competitive? I also am sure there are many other ways of lowering our deficit without such a regressive and unfair tax. The people of Canada are taxed to death. We're getting fed up with it.

As you know, approximately 85 percent of Canadians are definitely against the implementation of this tax. So please do whatever is necessary to convince all the senators to vote "NO" to the GST. Let's show "King Brian" that this country is still a democracy and that dictators will not be tolerated.

Thank you for your time and consideration

Sincerely,
Janice Brown

These are the people out there that governments should be listening to. I have a letter from S. Deane from Paris, Ontario. It reads:

Dear Senator Buckwold:

I feel the average worker in Canada is now paying too much in taxes. The GST would just add to his burdens.

ENOUGH IS ENOUGH

Would you PLEASE do all within your power to stop this unfair tax.

Also John Crow's cure for inflation is far worst than the disease.

These people know. Is my time running out?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Fairbairn: No, Senator.

Senator Buckwold: I am sure that you find these quite interesting.

Senator Fairbairn: I really do.

Senator Frith: Yes, we do.

Senator Marchand: This is good stuff to have on the record!

Senator Frith: It is great human interest.

Senator Buckwold: I will go out and get another handful and bring them down.

Senator Fairbairn: Keep going; we have to.

Senator Buckwold: I am reading many of these for the first time.

Senator Fairbairn: We want to hear from the people.

Senator Buckwold: Here is one from Willowdale, Ontario. It reads:

Dear Sir:

I hope the Senate will hold firm to its opposition to the new GST.

The only fair tax is the Income Tax.

If the corporations will benefit from the removal of the 13 percent MST, then tax the corporations.

The GST engenders its own expenses, with thousands more Civil Servants running around collecting the new tax.

Sincerely,
Flora E. Ness

This letter is from Parkland Lumber and Hardware Limited, New Sarepta, Alberta. It is addressed to me and reads:

Dear Sir:

I wish to urge you to defeat the proposed GST. As you are no doubt aware the GST would mean the death of many small businesses. The extra bookkeeping would be too much to handle.

This is what is going on in small towns in the western part of Canada. He goes on to state:

In this small community there are as many as five businesses which would be closing because of it, including myself. Our local electrician has already quit and taken a job with a large company.

Others have told me they plan to go underground, which is the same warning given by John Bulloch. It is sad to see our country becoming more like Russia and destroying the incentive of its people. Again I ask you to do all possible to kill this horrible monstrosity

P.S. Another small contractor has just advised me he plans to close down because of the GST.

This is from W.E. Anger, President.

This next letter is from Salmon Arm, B.C. It reads:

Dear Senator Buckwold:

It is indeed a sad day for Canada to see our democratic system eroding away so quickly and being supplanted by a virtual dictatorship. I refer, of course, to the great efforts that you and your committee went to by holding public hearings across Canada to find out first hand how the people felt about GST. It would not matter to Mr. Mulroney if 98 percent of the people felt the government should deeply slash federal spending and scrap the tax.

The other day (as you know well by now) at a break in a cabinet meeting Brian was laughing at a question from the media about possible Senate rejection of the GST. He simply indicated that he was not concerned since in the fall he planned to appoint 15 new senators.

And he did that. The letter goes on to state:

It goes without saying they would be all carefully picked Tories selected to force the GST through to get his own way, and continue the extravagant spending.

> How can we deal with such treacherous trickery? As I say, our democratic tradition is fading very quickly. Perhaps the only solution is to play the same sort of games in the Senate—such as calling a sudden secret vote—

This is rather far-sighted. He goes on to say:

> —before he has a chance to tamper with the voting to suit his own purposes.

Did you hear that Senator Frith? This individual, Jim French, suggested that we call a sudden vote before Brian Mulroney has a chance to tamper with the voting to suit his own purposes. He is far-sighted.

Senator Frith: Yes; that person has good hunches.

Senator Marchand: A lot of people think that the Prime Minister is a dictator!

Senator Frith: They were able to sniff a crime out better than we were in advance.

Senator Hastings: Senator Buckwold, as we have been going along, you have been discussing the manufacturers' sales tax. One of the descriptions of that tax given by the Minister of Finance was a "hidden killer of jobs" as he damned it. If it was such a "killer of jobs", he increased it three times—probably to enhance its ability to kill jobs.

Am I not correct, Senator Buckwold, that there is now quite a bit of excellent evidence by the Taxation Foundation of Canada that we might just be in a position where, with a bit of amendment and changing the manufacturers' sales tax would be much better than the damage that we are doing, or planning to do, or will do if we pass the GST? Are they not calling for us to halt this madness and take another look at amending, in a worthwhile manner, the manufacturers' sales tax?

Senator Buckwold: I had the privilege of reading an advance copy of the Canadian Tax Foundation's study on the GST in which they came to no conclusions. They merely analyzed it.

You are quite correct, they did not put nearly as much damaging evidence on the present MST. They did indicate that it has problems—and this is contained in our report—but that the GST will create a whole new set of problems.

If you look at their report, which is a fairly lengthy one, which I read over the weekend, they indicate that the Government has not done enough study on the alternatives, all of which were presented to our committee—that is, Consumption taxes, Income taxes, retention of the MST, and all these types of things.

The Canadian Tax Foundation, which is a reputable, responsible and non-political body, did not make any recommendations or draw any conclusions in their report. They merely analyzed the situation but left it clear that the Government has a lot of homework to do in reviewing the alternative sources of revenue that would be available and that have not, in their opinion, been thoroughly assessed. They also reviewed, as you indicated, the present manufacturers' sales tax, which has been with us for 60 years, and under which this country has prospered.

• (0330)

Respecting the manufacturers' sale tax, despite the fact that it is a burden on exports, to a small degree—we were told 1 per cent or 1.5 per cent—a change in the Canadian dollar by one or two cents is much more serious. We should remember that.

I will continue with these interesting and informative letters. I am sure honourable senators opposite are waiting with bated breath.

The next letter is from Lee Jay Auto Body Ltd. of Edmonton, Alberta. This letter is dated June 21, 1990. It states:

> Re: G.S.T.
> This letter is with respect to a conversation I had with yourself regarding our current government and their proposals. You had informed me that it would best be addressed if I wrote you a letter. Therefore, I shall attempt to do so in some sort of respectable manner.
> We are very disappointed with the government because they do not even hear or attempt to listen to what the Canadian people are telling them. They show no respect for the population and proceed to install things that only they feel is right.
> I think Mulroney and Wilson had too many talks with Mrs. Thatcher in London. We do not want Canada to be like Britain (God Forbid) and we do not want them to sell us out to the U.S. anymore either.
> The people said this free trade wouldn't work and they didn't listen and has it helped Canada? No. But America, Yes.
> Now they are trying to tell us the G.S.T. is good for us and good for Canada. Maybe good for the politicians, as they would have that much more of taxed to death Canadian money to play with and spend on themselves mainly. Or have Mulroney give it away to some other country so he could appear as Mr. Nice Guy, helping the underdeveloped. What about helping his own people? When has this government done anything like forgive 190 million dollars in collectible taxes from Canadians. But he can forgive 190 million of other countries, because he's soooooo nice. You can tell he doesn't pay any, or he wouldn't be quite so generous.
> Back to the G.S.T. Now, we may not be scrappers like the people in Romania or the likes, but this G.S.T. could start a riot in this country. How can they, elected by us, just do as they like and not pay any consequences? It is scary what they are doing to this country.
> The advertisements they are currently running on radio are also false and like our government can't be trusted. They can not even speak the truth. They are saying this is not an additional tax! Then what is it? We don't pay a services tax now, why then in January are we going to have to? We are smarter than they give us credit for.

That is very important. We well remember one of our witnesses, a major player in the business world, who said: "We know the answers. Don't listen to those people. They don't know."

These people do know. These are well-written letters. These people are well informed.

The letter continues:

> If we advertised like that they'd be on our case real quick. It is misleading and untrue.
> As a small business we do not need any extra headaches like collecting yet another tax for them. It is hard enough now to try and make any profit. Now we will have to hire additional people to look after this G.S.T., which is costing us already without any additional staff.
> If Ottawa would save a few of the 19 millions they are spending now to police us to see that we do this G.S.T. thing, it would likely be a lot better for all of us and they would be further ahead in the long run.
> We are really tired of this Government. Tired of them spending like there was no end to where the money comes from and then taxing us, the average Canadian, to death. Yet giving themselves, and the Senators also, thousands of tax free dollars more in raises and concessions. Where is at least one concession for us, or for small businesses? But the big corporations get mega concessions, don't they?
> It really kills any small business incentive to stay in there. We hope the Senate will do something about this G.S.T. as the Government will not. Imagine taxing cookies, really, there is no other way except taxing the kids cookies. I'm ashamed to tell anyone I'm Canadian.

The next letter is from Steve Strugnell of Victoria, British Columbia. He writes:

> Dear Sir:
>
> We are writing today to ask the Senate not to pass the "GST".
> The Senate refused to pass the "Free Trade Agreement" until Canadians had a chance to vote on it. We respectfully ask the Senate to do likewise with the GST.

These people know the score. Mr. Strugnell continues:

> A full 80% of Canadians oppose the tax. It should be delayed until after the next federal election. We have lived with the manufacturers tax till now; a few more years won't hurt. This bill is going to affect small business and ordinary Canadians, and we should have the right to vote on it.
> Please sir there are enough liberal senators to defeat the bill or at least delay it until after the next election. Show Canadians that the Senate believes that they can decide if the GST is good for the country. The Conservatives don't trust our decision.

Am I boring honourable senators opposite?

Senator Stollery: No, you are not. You are educating them.

Senator Buckwold: The next letter is from Mr. and Mrs. D.R. Dandeno of Waterford, Ontario. They write:

> My wife and I are both retired and are on a fixed income. We are strongly opposed to the new GST tax.
> We do not feel the prime Minister and his government have any mandate to impose such a tax upon the population which is overwhelmingly opposed to it. The tax system has grown increasingly unfair and particularly to the lower and middle income groups. We think it is long overdue for the government to introduce a truly fair system of taxation which ensures the tax burden is fairly shared by $%all$%. Finally, Government spending should be $%really$% cut back. As a former public servant with 38 years service I am still in contact with my former department and there are still many examples of large amounts of wasteful and unnecessary spending ie: recently all staff at our Regional Headquarters were given new chairs in order to use up surplus funds. Currently yet another reorganization is underway which involves tearing down walls, moving offices and building new ones etc etc.
> It would appear that our only hope to avert this new tax is for the Senate to either reject this tax outright or to delay it until the government must go to an election in order to implement it.
> As chairman of the banking committee you are in a position to listen to the majority of the people in the country and ensure this unwanted and unwarranted tax is rejected. In doing so you will have the backing of the general public as certainly almost all the people I know are opposed to it.

Honourable senators, that gives us a good idea of the type of mail that comes into my office.

I see some honourable senators are getting tired, but let me read another letter. This is from Doug Overbaugh from Simcoe, Ontario. He writes:

> As a Canadian citizen, voter and taxpayer, I wish to express my very strong opposition to the proposed goods and services tax. Elected officials are expected to perform in a reponsible manner toward the good for Canadian citizens. This proposed, regressive tax is opposed by over 80% of our country's citizens. As this tax would add 7% toward the cost of practically everything Canadians buy, it is going to seriously erode the purchasing power of each consumer. I implore you and your fellow senators to reject this tax as the vast majority of Canadians have already done.

I have another handful of these letters. I was going to read the proposal put forward by Professor Neil Brooks. Professor Brooks appeared before the committee. It is a report of the way Professor Brooks, a highly-regarded man who was referred to by many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. He proposes that we do not have to have the sales tax at all but that we should simply change the tax system, and that would have a relatively small impact on the overall tax rates.

I will reserve that for some other time.

Honourable senators, in conclusion the mail I receive is an infinitesimal example of the thousands of people opposed to this tax. There have been letters and petitions from ordinary citizens, not the President of Sears or the Hudson's Bay Company, but from people running small businesses, pensioners; from good Canadians trying to get by.

As the committee travelled across the country the members of the committee could not help but be influenced by the impact of the submissions.

As we travelled across the country some members of the committee came to the conclusion that this tax was not for Canadians. It is as simple as that.

Before I started out on that Odyssey across the country I had no idea that this would end up being such a controversial issue. I could not help but come to the conclusion that the majority of the committee members, after listening to the public, came to the conclusion that something has to be done. That is why the Senate committee has taken very serious and well-considered action in recommending the rejection of the bill.

Senator Hastings: Before you proceed with more letters, respecting the Brooks proposal, one fact came through loud and clear; that being that there are alternatives to the GST. The Brooks proposal is an excellent alternative.

If Senator Lefebvre has any information regarding that, would he place it on the record.

Senator Lefebvre: I have a copy of the article which you mentioned, Senator Buckwold. I will refer to it during my remarks, but I have other things I want to put on the record first.

● (0345)

[Translation]

Honourables Senators, I could not take part in this debate without emphasizing the exemplary conduct of Senator Syd Buckwold who chaired the committee meetings. He had the onerous task not only of studying Bill C-62 but also of holding public hearings in all our Canadian provinces and in the two territories.

He has done an extreordinary job, showing competence, dignity and great skill. I had to honour of sitting on the committee for two weeks, one in the Maritimes and the other in the Far North and in the city of Vancouver. Senator Buckwold deserves our congratulations and sincere thanks.

When discussing the adverse effects of the decisions of this government, which is forcing Bill C-62 upon all Canadians, we must first consider what took place here in the Senate when senators of the Liberal Party, which I am honoured to belong to, were absent from the vote.

Today I reread page 70 of our Rules and I quote:

> Senate voting procedures can be found under Rules 49 and 50.

For your guidance I will read Rule 49 from page 19.

[Senator Buckwold.]

> 49. (1) When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for the "yeas" and the "nays" and shall thereupon decide whether the question has carried.
> (3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.
> (4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which the senator has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.
> (5) Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices. The Speaker shall in all cases have a vote. When the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

I will now go on to Rule 50.

> 50.(1) A senator shall not vote on any question unless the senator is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.
> (2) Without leave of the Senate a senator shall not speak to a question after the order has been given to call in the members to vote thereon.
> (3) With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reasons assigned by the senator, be withdrawn or changed by the senator immediately after the announcement of the division.

Now let us turn to page 70, which explains Senate voting procedure.

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung, and when . . .

This is important.

> . . . the Whips have entered the Chamber . . .

"The Whips", in the plural.

> . . . have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote. The Speaker puts the question again. All senators in favour of the motion rise, and the Clerk of the Senate records their names on the division sheet. All senators opposed to the motion rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. All senators who wish to abstain then rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. The Clerk announces the official result of the division, giving the number of "yeas", the number of "nays" and the "abstentions". The Speaker then declares the motion carried or lost.

> The procedure on a standing vote on an amendment is the same as the foregoing, except that the Speaker reads both the main motion and the motion in amendment, and puts the question on the motion in amendment. He then declares the motion in amendment carried or lost and puts the question on the main motion.
> The Clerk is responsible for recording the votes. He sends copies of the division sheet to the Debates of the Senate and the Journals of the Senate for publication.

That gives you quite a clear picture of voting procedures in this Chamber.

I am still wondering how a Speaker of this Chamber could have flouted a Rule which is explained very clearly and unambiguously.

Honourable senators, I will give you an example of what has happened here. Before returning to page 1 and reading the Rules, I would also like to give you an example of what has taken place in the Outaouais, due simply to the announcement made explaining what this Mulroney government intends to do to Canadians in the region that I had the honour of representing in the House of Commons for 19 years.

I would like to draw your attention to two newspaper articles which, I believe, clearly explain the frustration felt by Canadian entrepreneurs with the Mulroney government, which is bringing in this harmful tax.

When I have read the articles you may understand why it is our duty to do what we can to prevent Canadians from having to shoulder this additional burden.

I would like to refer you to an article from the newspaper Le Droit, dated October 10th, on page 10, by Michel Gauthier from Maniwaki, in Upper Gatineau. I quote:

> Bérard is closing down his factories intermittently at Gatineau and for good at Mont-Laurier.
> The factory, the Placages de l'Outaouais, will be shut down for every three weeks every six weeks until mid-March, and the Mont-Laurier sawmill will close down completely after December 1st, indicated businessman man Claude Bérard yesterday.
> After next March, the two plants may remain closed indefinitely.
> These measures will affect some 350 workers, 175 in the factory and the same number in the forest.

This figure does not include indirect jobs, as you all know.

> This decision has nothing to do by action taken by Algonquins from Barrières Lake, in the La Vérendrye Wildlife Reserve, says Mr. Bérard.
> "I am closing for economic reasons" he said.
> Soaring interest rates, higher gas prices, a very high Canadian dollar, a tighter market and additional costs due to the new GST are the reasons mentioned by the Gatineau entrepreneur.
> "It is going to cost me $500,000 in gas, and $100,000 more because of the GST. And the wood market has fallen by 40%. There is simply no demand and prices have fallen steeply. Interest rates are far too high and they will ruin small businesses", indicated Mr. Bérard.
> He blames the federal government and Prime Minister Mulroney, whom he calls a "numbskull" in this instance.
> "It is because of the government that I am in a Catch-22 situation today. I predict that 15 to 20 other plants will close in Quebec, including some others in the Outaouais", said Mr. Bérard, adding that he will have to have finished pulling his equipment out of the forest by the end of the week. He has not ruled out the possibility of taking legal action against the Quebec government over the dispute with the Algonquins, which has so far prevented him from carrying out forestry activities. "First I am going to sit down and talk with them. Legal action may be taken, but I do not have that in mind for the moment", he said.

Honourable Senators, I just wanted to give you some concrete proof of the harmful effects the proposed GST is having.

Here we have a man from the region, who is very well-known as a builder in the Outaouais. He has build up businesses with a group of entrepreneurs who support what he says. He is a businessman whose businesses are being destroyed by the decisions of the Mulroney government and its friends.

Conservative Senators have the nerve to criticize us because we want to save Canada from bankruptcy at all costs. Yes, we do want to stop the GST. Most Canadians are on our side.

You have seen and heard the many letters that have been read out here by Senator Buckwold. These letters represent perhaps 2% of all the letters he receives everyday. We are all getting letters. I believe that Conservative Senators are getting them too.

Mulroney's candidates in the 1984 and 1988 campaigns promised to create jobs, jobs, jobs! They travelled across Canada and came to the Outaouais region, which I know very well. The damaging decisions of this government have shown us that it has lost all touch with reality. Everyday the unemployment rate rises, which flies in the face of announcements made by Mr. Mulroney's candidates in the last election.

I think it is a terrible disgrace. The impact will be felt more and more, not only in the Outaouais region but everywhere in Canada.

Senator Hastings asked me a question about an article which appeared in the Toronto Star, I believe, and the heading is . . .

● (0400)

[English]

. . . Toronto Star of Friday, September 28, 1990. It says that there are alternatives to the hated GST. Osgoode Hall law professor Neil Brooks has devised one that would be fairer to the poor and middle class. This was sent to Senator Buckwold, from whom I received a copy. The letter attached is from Mr.

E.J. Gordon of Toronto, Ontario and he says that he took the liberty of including the article to help us in our deliberations.

I will read a few excerpts. It is a long article. Neil Brooks is a professor of tax law and policy at Osgoode Hall. The following is adapted from an article published by the Institute for Research on Public Policy:

> The debate about the proposed goods and services tax (GST) has been hampered by a lack of well-articulated and quantified alternatives.
> This article is an attempt to remedy this deficiency by comparing the government's proposed 7 per cent GST with an alternative that would also repeal the manufacturers' sales tax (MST).
> The proposed GST has created more public discussion and debate than any proposed tax change in Canada's history. The intensity of the public discussion is well-founded. The proposed tax will mark a fundamental change in the federal governments' tax mix—the relative amounts of revenue the government collects form different tax bases.
> Compared to the proposed GST reforms, here's an income tax alternative that is straightforward:
> The MST should be abolished and most of the lost revenue could be collected through the income tax by increasing the federal income tax rates.
> If the MST were abolished, and no consumption tax substituted for it, only approximately $10.5 billion would have to be raised through the income tax.
> If left untouched, in 1991 the MST would raise $18.5 billion in tax revenues.
> However, if it is abolished, provincial revenues would also decline by about $0.8 billion. Provinces levy their retail sales taxes on the price of goods which includes the MST.
> If the MST is abolished, the price of goods will drop and thus provincial sales tax revenues will decline.
> Thus for the change to be revenue neutral to all levels of government, $19.3 billion of revenue must be found:

As honourable senators know, the government boasted at the beginning that this tax would be revenue neutral. We do not hear that from the Tories any more.

> About $2.3 billion of the MST falls on goods purchased by the government sector. If the MST were abolished, and the reduced taxes reflected in prices, the government sector would need $2.3 billion less in revenue to finance its purchases.
> About $2.3 billion of the MST falls on alcoholic beverages, tobacco products and gasoline. There is little reason to reduce the tax burden on these; therefore, the relevant excise taxes would be increased to recover this revenue.
> If the MST were abolished, the refundable sales tax credit could be repealed: Savings—$0.9 billion.

[Senator Lefebvre.]

> If the MST were abolished, and all tax and cost reductions passed on directly through prices, the consumer price index would decline by slightly more than 2 percentage points.
> This would save Ottawa $1 billion in transfer payments to individuals and provinces. It would also result in additional income tax collections of $0.2 billion because of reduced tax indexing effects.
> Finally, if the MST were abolished, there would be a substantial windfall to corporations.
> In 1991, more than $1.5 billion of the MST would be levied on exports. If the tax is repealed, corporate profits will be increased by this amount.
> Moreover, some large percentage of the MST levied on corporate fixed capital investment likely falls on corporate profits. Therefore, if the MST were abolished, it seems fair to raise the revenue collected through the corporate income tax by $2 billion.

The article goes on and on. It is very well researched by a person who is a recognized authority in the field. He concludes the article by stating:

> Simply increasing the income tax rates is a viable alternative to the GST.
> Low-income households, on average, would pay less federal tax; high-income individuals would pay more.
> Perhaps most significantly, the largest beneficiaries of such a change would be middle-income Canadians.
> For example, the average consumable income of families in the $30,000 to $35,000 class would be about $270 greater under the income tax alternative than under the GST reforms.
> If the government wished to make the alternative more progressive, two or three additional rate brackets could easily be added to the present three rate scale brackets. Moreover, in spite of the base-broadening reforms in 1987, the present income tax base is still full of loopholes that could be closed.
> Further, as a complement to these reforms, if the government were to enact a wealth transfer tax, an additional $2 billion could easily be collected every year from Canada's wealthiest families. Income tax rates would then not have to be raised by nearly as much as I've suggested.
> The implementation of the GST has provoked more controversy than virtually any other government policy initiative. In light of the many criticisms of and concerns expressed about it, to justify enactment of the GST, it should be necessary for the government to show that the additional revenues could not be more satisfactorily obtained from the income tax. This burden of argument has not been discharged.

There you have an excerpt from a very excellent article, the reading of which I would suggest to all honourable senators. Its reading might help in our deliberations in terms of the implications shown to us by Mr. Neil Brooks who is a professor of tax law and policy at Osgoode Hall.

What I read was adapted from an article published by him by The Institutes for Research on Public Policy. He is not just an ordinary person walking around, someone who some of the Tories say do not understand the tax. What he has said is typical of people who do understand it. However, it seems that it is very difficult to get through to the people on the other side, who do not seem to want to listen to anyone but who wish to go full speed ahead in terms of implementing a very nefarious tax which will have negative repercussions throughout the economy of Canada, including the area I mentioned previously in western Quebec, an area which I know very well and where I make my residence, an area which I had the honour to represent in the House of Commons for almost 20 years.

I hear the repercussions every day. Mr. Bérard, the person whom I quoted, is known as a person who has built many industries in the Outaouais and who has created hundreds of jobs. He now sees all these jobs being killed by many nefarious and badly-conceived policies of the present government. I refer to high interest rates, high energy costs and the high Canadian dollar. On top of all this, they will now have to pay the GST. He says that his industries will have to pay at least $100,000 in the first year. He cannot survive and has already announced the permanent closing of one of his industries with the probability of another closing. He has said that his contacts in the industry tell him that more and more of these industries will be closing throughout Quebec, including more in the Outaouais region of Quebec where jobs are badly needed and where there is high unemployment.

[Translation]

To keep in touch with reality, I think it is important from time to time to read articles in the local press about the daily lives of average Canadians.

I would like to get back to the Rules of the Senate, because I think there are still senators who do not or will not understand how we are governed. We, as senators, are responsible for the rules in this Chamber. Not the Speaker, unlike the situation in the House of Commons. The senators determine the rules. You all read this book on the day you were sworn in. Admittedly, few senators are interested in the contents.

I will now read a few passages from the rules.

INTERPRETATION

1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed inthe Senate or in any committee thereof.

In the margin we read:

Procedure in unprovided cases.

[English]

In English it states:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

I would like to go back to Rule 49, which I read in French at the beginning of my remarks. It might be relevant to read it in the other official language, English. It states:

(1) When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for the "yeas" and "nays" and thereupon shall decide whether the question has carried.

(2) In the absence of a request for a standing vote, the decision of the Speaker is final.

(3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.

(4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which the senator has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

(5) Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices. The Speaker in all cases shall have a vote. When the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

Rule 50 states:

A senator shall not vote on any question unless the senator is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.

(2) Without leave of the Senate a senator shall not speak to a question after the order has been given to call in the members to vote thereon.

(3) With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reasons assigned by the senator be withdrawn or changed by the senator immediately after the announcement of the division.

I would now like to turn to the famous page 70 which has been quoted many times here in the chamber. I would like to put it on the record once again because it is very relevant to the questions of privilege. It states:

Voting in the Senate is described in rules 49 and 50.

At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked".

● (0415)

It says "whips", in the plural.

The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote. The Speaker puts the question again. All senators in favour of the motion rise, and the Clerk of the Senate records their names on the division sheet. All senators opposed to the motion rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. All senators who wish to abstain then rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. The Clerk announces the official result of the division, giving the number of "yeas", the number of "nays" and the "abstentions". The Speaker then declares the motion carried or lost.

The procedure on a standing vote on an amendment is the same as the foregoing, except that the Speaker reads both the main motion and the motion in amendment, and puts the question on the motion in amendment. He then declares the motion in amendment carried or lost and puts the question on the main motion.

The Clerk is responsible for recording the votes. He sends copies of the division sheet to the Debates of the Senate and the Journals of the Senate for publication.

That is as clear as anyone could possibly make it. That is why I wonder how a decision could have been made to hold a vote in this house, as in any other chamber, under the British parliamentary system, without the presence of both whips. I cannot conceive of such a happening.

Next month I will have spent 25 years in Canada's parliamentary system—19 of those years in the other place and six in this place. I have never yet seen a vote taken under these circumstances. I am appealing especially to the 23 new senators who have entered this chamber—whether they be Royals or others. Some of them have no parliamentary experience, but it has shocked me that the ones who do have parliamentary experience support what has happened in this chamber.

I have studied the system at Westminster on many occasions. I have been to many of Canada's provincial legislatures throughout my parliamentary career. Never once have I encountered anything to match what has taken place in this chamber. If this government stays in power much longer, I believe we will witness the destruction of the parliamentary system of government as we have known it and as it is known. Many of the decisions made in Parliament not only follow rules laid down and adopted by senators or members of the House of Commons or legislative assemblies in our provinces or territories, but also the precedents and conventions. We will remember this event for many years to come.

In the other place, I had the honour of being whip on many occasions. I was the Chief Government Whip in both a minority and majority government, and I was also Chief Opposition Whip. In all the years that I was present in that house, whether as a government or opposition whip, in a minority or majority position, not once in the hundreds of votes in which I participated was the vote taken without both whips being present, signifying to the Chair that we were ready to vote, with the members being present.

Senator Hastings: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

[Senator Lefebvre.]

Senator Lefebvre: Yes.

Senator Hastings: I appreciate his many years of service as a whip, including chief whip in a minority government, in the other place. Did he receive compensation for fulfilling the role of whip? If so, did that compensation come from the Government of Canada through the House of Commons, or did he receive it as an official of his party? Is a whip considered an official of the House of Commons or an official of his party? If he is an official of the House of Commons, in fulfilling his role where does he derive his authority and to whom does he report?

Senator Lefebvre: To deal with the historical aspects, the whips in the other place are named by the leader of the party. The Prime Minister of the day appoints a chief government whip, and the Leader of the Opposition appoints a chief opposition whip. There may be three or four parties in opposition in the other place, but there would be only one chief opposition whip recognized as such. If there are three or four opposition parties, they would be consulted. However, when the two whips—one representing the government and the other representing the opposition—come in the chamber, the votes are taken. We always hope that the other parties are included, but officially there are only two whips recognized by the Chair.

The extra payment to the whips in the other place comes from the parliamentary appropriations. The House of Commons budget is voted on and put forward by the government of the day, with the support of all members, of course. The extra payment does not come from the party to which you belong but from the taxpayers of Canada, as does your salary.

I would like to deal with the question of the official position of the whips. Now that I am no longer in a position to be seen to favour my own position, I have always felt that we, in the House of Commons and perhaps here as well, should have adopted the system in Westminster. The chief government whip over there becomes a member of the cabinet. The Prime Minister in Great Britain resides at 10 Downing Street. Next door to him, at 12 Downing Street, resides the Chief Government Whip. I was in that office many times discussing how they operate. He is a member of the cabinet.

Perhaps someday a Prime Minister will recognize this and name the chief government whip a member of the cabinet. Because he was not a member of cabinet, I found it very difficult at times to carry out my duties. Decisions would be taken and ministers would question me. Because of the knowledge I had of what was going on in the chamber while this person was in the cabinet, I would say, "I am sorry to say that you took the wrong decision." On many occasions, ministers had to change their request to bring forward a certain policy. As Senator Fairbairn knows, because of her association in the PMO for many years while I was government whip, changes had to be made at the last minute because the whip had not been present in the cabinet room when a certain discussion was held. Sometimes they would phone and ask my opinion, and the discussion would continue afterwards; but sometimes it was ignored.

When I first went to Westminster I was amazed at the difference in the operation between Great Britain and Canada. However, there have to be differences. We have evolved our own system from Westminster, but this is one aspect where I believe we have made a mistake by not adopting their line of administration.

Does that answer your question, Senator Hastings?

Senator Hastings: Senator Lefebvre, you, as a whip, received an extra consideration for your services. You, as others, were an officer of the chamber, with duties to fulfil to this chamber. That is why you were remunerated. Others who have duties to perform in the chamber are recognized and paid for fulfilling those responsibilities to this chamber or to the House of Commons.

Senator Lefebvre: The British parliamentary system can only operate efficiently and well when there is an understanding and acceptance between the opposition and the government. Eventually these two sides must agree on the business, otherwise it could not operate and there would be complete chaos.

In all the years that I was in the House of Commons, never once did I hear a complaint that one whip who gave his word to the other whip, whether he was the opposition whip or the government whip, went back on his word. If that happened, the whole system would deteriorate and you could not operate a British parliamentary system. The whips had to give each other their word that they would be present at a certain time and ready to vote, and that they were not trying to pull surprises or trying to undermine the relationship between them. This is completely foreign to me. What took place in this chamber is completely foreign to our system. This will remain a dark spot in our parliamentary history in Canada. Students of parliamentary procedure and political science will be discussing it as the Charbonneau decision in years to come.

I am happy that I was not involved. I would not want to lend my name to such a nefarious way of doing business.

To continue, we will go to . . .

6. These rules shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Senate.

So, this further explains how we are regulated here in the Senate.

PART II
ROUTINE OF BUSINESS

7. (1) Unless otherwise previously ordered, the Senate shall meet for the transaction of business at two o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day.

(2) On the first day of each session of Parliament, a bill is read pro forma, the Speech from the Throne is reported by the Speaker and a Committee of Privileges, consisting of all the senators present during the session, is appointed to consider the orders and customs of the Senate and privileges of Parliament.

8. When it appears, on notice being taken at the commencement of or during a sitting of the Senate, that fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned, the Speaker shall adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day, without question put.

It is very important to remember this rule, honourable senators. Last night, a point of order was raised to ask for a quorum. I think rule 8 is rather, how shall I say, easy to get around. I think it should be given some serious thought and I would suggest, for instance, that when a quorum is called, the rules provide for a period of two, three, four or five minutes during which the government has a chance to gather its troops in the adjoining rooms, since the wording of rule 8 is rather confusing.

9. Whenever the Speaker, from illness or other cause, finds it necessary to leave the Chair during any part of the sitting on any day, the Speaker may call upon any senator to take the Chair and preside as Speaker during the remainder of such day, or until the Speaker resumes the Chair before the end of the sitting for that day.

10. Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator chosen by the Senate under Rule 66(1)a) to preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if that senator is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence and shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of the Speaker until the Speaker, or the Speaker pro tempore, as the case may be, resumes the Chair.

11. Every act done by any senator, acting as aforesaid, shall have the same effect and validity as if the act were done by the Speaker.

12. If, at six o'clock in the afternoon, the business be not concluded, the Speaker or the chairman of the committee leaves the Chair until eight o'clock, the Mace being left on or under the Table, as the case may be: Provided that, if at the said time, a division has been ordered, the Speaker or the chairman shall not leave the Chair until such division has been taken and any formal business immediately consequent thereon has been completed.

I had another newspaper article I wanted to bring to the attention of honourable senators. If you will allow me, I will read another article that once again illustrates why we, as senators, have a duty to do everything we can to prevent the passage of C-62.

[English]

The second article that I wish to put on the record is taken from the Montreal Gazette of October 10, 1990 under the byline of Mr. Peter Hadekel. The headline is "GST inconsistencies will confuse and anger shoppers", and with the Christmas season coming upon us I think it is relevant to have this person's impressions on record. Mr. Hadekel begins:

> Get ready for a brawl in the mall next January when the goods and services tax takes effect.
> Shoppers will be confused, angry and suspicious at the sticker prices they will see and clerks will be bombarded with questions about whether the GST is included or not.
> It's going to be downright ugly in the K Marts and Woolcos of the nation. And it's all because the federal government is giving retailers a choice of including the new tax in their prices or charging it at the cash register.

This is a government that told us that the tax would be highly visible. This is what they are doing now; they are allowing people to hide it. The article continues:

> There'll be no uniformity in the way retailers are going to price their products.
> Most major chain stores—who account for about 70 per cent of the volume in Canada—will charge the GST at the check-out counter, in the same way they now charge provincial sales tax, says Mr. Alasdair McKichan of the Retail Council of Canada.
> In Quebec, where a provincial GST will also be added to the purchase price, that means most big retailers will add a big wallop at the cash register.

● (0500)

> But smaller-scale retailers, who operate most of the stores, will generally include the GST in the purchase price.

Do you get the difference, honourable senators?

> McKichan says many of them can't afford to spend several thousand dollars on new electronic cash registers that calculate GST at the point of sale.

That alone could make comparison shopping a real nightmare for consumers. Let us admit that this government said they were going to make it less confusing and more visible to the Canadian shopper. Here is an expert in the field saying that this should make comparison shopping a real nightmare.

> They'll have no easy way to compare prices from one store to the next.
> And stores that include GST in their pricing may suffer from the fact that their sticker prices will appear higher than in stores that don't include the tax. Of course, all retailers will attempt to combat the public confusion with in-store signs and decals that say whether they include GST or not.
> Revenue Canada, in fact, will require merchants who include GST in their prices to post signs to that effect. They'll even offer to supply the signs free of charge.
> That's fine, as far as it goes. But it's still asking a lot for consumers to make the mental calculation of adding or subtracting GST when they want to compare prices.
> And it's not beyond the realm of possibility that some retailers may try to profit from the confusion by inching up prices.
> While most of the big stores will charge the tax . . . a few major retailers—including Woolco—have decided that the fairest way to play the game is to include the GST in the price. "They feel customers would be less resentful if they included it," says McKichan.

So retailers, as you can see, honourable senators, are trying to find ways of decreasing the resentment of their own customers, resentment not brought about by decisions made by Woolco or other stores but resentment building up in the Canadian people over decisions and policies brought about by the Mulroney government. The article continues:

> Woolco believes this will make life easier for shoppers and will spare them some nasty surprises when they actually get to the cash register.
> And in cases where a provincial tax is added on top of the GST, customers will be confused if they have to make two calculations, McKichan acknowledges.
> But many retailers havent decided what to do. They're watching their competitors carefully. They don't want to be caught advertising a more expensive product than the next guy simply because they're including the tax in their advertised prices.
> "We are offering to supply consumers with pamphlets that clearly explain that you have to compare apples with apples when comparing prices," McKichan says.
> According to consumer surveys done by the Quebec Retail Council, most shoppers would prefer to have the GST broken out separately on the sales slip so that the amount of tax is clearly visible, says council president Gaston Lafleur.

Honourable senators, one of the main announcements made by this government was that they would ensure that this tax would be highly visible. You probably remember the way they attacked the MST, saying it was hidden and that when Mr. Wilson was going to bring in his tax it would be highly visible and everybody would know what is going on. We now see another example of how, when it comes down to the hard facts, this government wishes to hide once again.

> But this is a very complicated business for retailers, especially supermarkets. Food is exempt from the GST but many other goods sold in supermarkets, like bathroom cleanser or cork-screws, will be taxable, so it's not simply a matter of hanging signs in the aisles.
> The same complications arise for drugstores selling tax-exempt medical products.
> It's going to take a while for the public to understand what's happening to prices.
> While the federal government's new monitoring agency on the GST may help to explain pricing, it's a shame that consumers have to be saddled with such an inconsistent system.

So there you have it once again, honourable senators. This was to correct an existing tax that the Tories kept saying was hidden and confusing; but what they have done, of course, is to make it even more difficult for small business people to keep operating. It is another example of policies of the Mulroney government, aided and abetted by their friends opposite—supported completely, never dissenting, trained seals all of them, both new ones and old ones—helping to kill small business in Canada and making it increasingly difficult for the average Canadian to understand what is going on.

Yet they have the audacity to criticize Liberal senators who are trying to prevent the passage of one of the most destructive laws ever attempted to be foisted on the people of Canada. I would think that there would be one senator on the other side who would be independent enough to stand up and join us in condemning Bill C-62 as destructive for business, as I have shown once again by this article. This tax would make it not only difficult for business people to operate, but increasingly difficult for the average Canadian. You have just heard this article read. I wish you would all get a copy of it.

Those of you who know average Canadian shoppers should go and ask them if they are going to like it come January 1. If we do not stop this legislation, Canadians, when they go shopping, will find that some stores will advertise a certain product including the GST while others will advertise it without the GST. Then everybody will have to go around with a little calculator adding on the GST or removing it, trying to do comparison shopping. I find it very odd that none of the people opposite seem to be even remotely interested in these problems.

I had the honour of serving for two weeks on the committee chaired in such an admirable fashion by Senator Sidney Buckwold during its public hearings. I was at the hearings in the Maritimes, and then in Yellowknife, Whitehorse and Vancouver. These problems were brought to our attention at almost every meeting.

Let me read you some small excerpts from the report which was tabled by Senator Buckwold.

[Translation]

> I. PRICE EFFECTS OF THE GST
> A. Minimum Estimate
> (1) The Government estimates that introduction of the GST would result in a one-time increase in the Consumer Price Index (CPI) of about 1.25%. While several economic "think-tanks" concur with this estimate, it has been criticized on at least two grounds. First, the Government's 1.25% estimate assumes that the savings from removing the current Federal Sales Tax would be fully passed along to consumers. Many groups believe that this assumption is unrealistic and fails to take into account a number of special circumstances including inadequate inventory rebates and regulated or uncompetitive markets.
> (2) Second, the Government assumes that organized labour is either naive or is powerless to address a reduction in the purchasing power of its wages. According to the information received by this Committee, members of organized labour ware well aware that the GST would reduce their real income and are extremely skeptical about the Government's price estimate. This is already being reflected in new labour contracts that contain GST protection in the form of cost of living allowance clauses and fixed wage increases. To the extent that labour is successful in obtaining further wage hikes because of the GST, this will feed into firms' cost structures and result in higher prices. In the real world, expectations are crucial but there is no indication that the Government has built a wage response into its price impact estimates.

Another example of a government that has completely lost touch with the average citizen. I hope that among the Conservative senators who sat on this committee—we all heard the demands made by various groups—I hope that at least one of them will have the courage to rise in this Chamber and support our action.

> (3) A realistic appraisal came from the Chief Economist of the Conference Board of Canada, Mr. J. G. Frank who told the Committee regarding the Board's own price impact estimate of 1.4% and the Government's 1.25% forecast, "I would say to you, again candidly, that is a lower bound estimate. That is the minumum you can expect, and it goes up from there based on how those two assumptions are at odds with reality. "(45:43) These assumptions, full pass-through of FST savings, no wage-price inflationary spiral, are key to the Government's estimates of the price impact of the GST.

And now, about the evolution of the FST.

(4) In estimating the impact of the GST on the overall price level, it is important to assess how the price of individual goods and services are likely to react. The application of the GST will affect relative prices by raising significantly the price of services and other items that currently bear no direct federal sales tax. The brief received from Informetrica Limited indicated that the GST would raise the price of recreational services by 8.0%, restaurant, hotel and tavern services by 7.4%, natural gas by 7.3%, electricity by 6.8%, women's and children's clothing by 5.9%, footwear by 4.8% and so on.

And now on to No. 5.

(5) In order to achieve a small overall price increase from introducing the GST, the prices of other goods currently subject to Federal Sales Tax must fall when that tax is removed. It has been suggested that the price of automobiles, furniture, and household durables that now contain the Federal Sales Tax will decline once this tax is removed. However, for this to happen, manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers will have to lower their prices to reflect the elimination of this tax. Much of the debate about the price impact of the GST centers on whether firms will actually pass on to consumers the savings from the sales tax reduction or whether they will simply increase their price markups.

Honorable senators, this is one more example of the confusion created by a government that does not want to listen to its citizens.

I would like to give another example:

• (0515)

[English]

When we held hearings in various parts of the country, one of the subjects that was brought to our attention in many, many regions was tourism, because of its importance in the areas of Canada. The report states:

The tourism sector employs 1.2 million Canadians and generates $24 billion in revenues. The industry is comprised mainly of small to medium-sized businesses and creates more new jobs than any other sector. It is Canada's second largest export activity.

Very few of us realize the importance of the tourism industry, and especially the fact that it is mostly small to medium sized and family-owned businesses. The very heart of our country is being destroyed once again by policies of the Mulroney government.

The report further states:

The Tourism Industry Association of Canada (TIAC) testified before the Committee and painted a bleak picture for tourism in Canada, one that will only get worse with the GST. Foreign visits to Canada are declining while Canadian trips abroad are increasing. Canada's share of the world tourism market is declining.

Most tourism trade is between Canada and the United States and residents of both sides of the border are aware of higher Canadian prices on a wide variety of items, most notably alcoholic beverages and gasoline. To the extent that the GST further heightens these price differentials, it will lead to an increasing deterioration in our tourism balance. This will put at risk 28,000 jobs and $500 million in spending in Niagara Falls, 48,000 jobs and $2,750 million in Vancouver . . .

Can you imagine, ladies and gentlemen of the Senate, you are putting at risk 28,000 jobs in the Niagara region, 48,000 jobs in the Vancouver region, and I have not heard any of you protesting.

Senator Neiman: Senator Lefebvre, I wonder if you happened to listen to Morningside the other morning when a group of reporters from Winnipeg described the smuggling that is going on. I am sure the Speaker pro tempore will be aware of the smuggling going on across the border through Deloraine and other points. They said it is amounting to thousands and thousands of dollars. The part of the program I listened to described in particular the smuggling of liquor and food across the border. One optimistic gentleman had attempted to come across the border with the equivalent of $12,000 worth of liquor in Coke bottles. This problem is occuring across Canada at all of our border points.

Senator Lefebvre: Thank you for putting that on the record, Senator Neiman. I had not heard about that particular instance, but you are quite correct that it is becoming more and more widespread. I am told that the underground economy is becoming more and more prevalent in Canada and that people are doing things not quite according to the rules and regulations, because they are fed up with the policies of this government which is making it more difficult for the average small business person to keep up.

The report further states:

The effect of the GST on tourism services can be seen by examining some of the goods and services that are con> sumed by tourists and contrasting the amount of GST paid with the amount of FST paid. The Statistics Canada Social Policy Simulation Database and Model provides an opportunity to compare the effective FST and GST content in a variety of expenditure categories. The tax content of expenditures in hotels and restaurants will increase by almost six times, from 0.9 per cent under the FST to 6.04 per cent under the GST. For recreational services the tax content would increase from 1.4 per cent to 5.4 per cent. The tax content in local and inter-city transportation would double under the GST, from 3 per cent to 6.4 per cent. These products are consumed intensively by tourists and the GST will significantly raise the cost, to both non-residents and residents, of tourism in Canada. Canadians will not be eligible for a tourism rebate. Foreigners will be eligible for a rebate on a select package of goods and services only.

In other words, of course we welcome tourists from other countries, but it is hard to accept that our Canadian citizens will not be eligible for the same consideration from this government as foreigners. The report further states:

> The provisions of Bill C-62 attempt to address some of the problems that the GST poses for foreigners coming to Canada, but it still leaves the problem of discouraging Canadians from travelling in Canada. In particular, this tax will apply to Canadians who travel domestically for recreational purposes but not when they travel abroad, although air travel to the United States will be taxed. Any existing price advantage to vacationing in the United States will be enhanced with the GST.

In other words, the policies of this government will encourage Canadians to travel elsewhere but in our own country. Another example of the uncaring attitude of the Mulroney Tories.

> The recommendation by TIAC to reduce the tax rate to 5 per cent and tax all goods and services, addresses this problem to a partial extent, but the GST, by its very nature, makes domestic tourism spending by Canadian households less attractive than foreign tourism spending.

In other words, Canadians, do not travel in your own country. Go to the United States; it will be cheaper.

> The federal government is attempting to alleviate some of the adverse consequences of the GST on foreign tourists in Canada. Under the provisions of Bill C-62, the government is offering a rebate to foreign tourists to Canada of the GST paid on accommodation in Canada and goods taken outside of the country. The minimum rebate will be $20 and can be claimed four times per year. The government has not yet decided the exact mechanism for the rebate's delivery. One possibility is to offer it at exit points such as duty free shops. Tourists would also be free to apply for the rebate after leaving Canada.
> This rebate mechanism is a means of treating tourist expenditures in a manner which is consistent with treatment of exports. Goods exported from Canada are zero-rated and there is no reason why effective exports by foreign tourists should be treated differently. Although foreign tourist spending in Canada can be viewed as an exported service, not all of these expenditures qualify for the tourist rebate. TIAC takes the position that any service which generates foreign exchange is an export and should be free of tax, not just spending on accommodation and goods taken out of the country. Outfitters and guides argued before the Committee that packages sold to foreigners should be treated in their entirety as an export and zero-rated.
> Numerous groups have suggested recommendations which they claim can be put into place with little administrative cost. For example, point of sale rebates can be granted for hotel accommodation on the basis of identification provided by guests. And if a rebate is to be granted at point of sale, no need for a minimum rebate exists. Consequently, the $20 minimum should be eliminated as was suggested by Tourism Vancouver and the Vancouver Hotel Association.

Just imagine being lined up in the morning at a hotel check-out waiting to pay a bill for two or three days' accommodation and the person in front of you, who is an American citizen, is checking his bill which states that the hotel room accommodation is $100 per night, or thereabouts. He asks, "What is this special GST tax that is added on?" The clerk will then explain to the gentleman that, if he can prove he is not a citizen of Canada, the GST, which is totalled every day and added to the bill and shown together with phone calls, meals and accommodation, will be removed immediately. Imagine you are sitting there and listening to this conversation. You are living in your own country, you are travelling in your own country, you love your own country and you want to spend most of your holidays in Canada. You listen to this conversation and wonder where have we gone wrong. Here I am, already paying income taxes and everything else and this person in front of me is having removed from his bill the 7 per cent GST on every item that was charged to him. Therefore, if his bill is $500 he will be given a gift of $35. Can one imagine the arguments that will take place at cashiers' desks in hotels? No wonder the tourists are being asked to apply after the fact—in other words, keep the tax hidden and do not let Canadians know that people from outside Canada will be getting a refund. Don't give it to them at the point of sale, for God's sake, then Canadians will get to know what we have been trying to do to them. We have to keep talking about this to make sure that Canadians do know what is being done to them.

The report further states:

> In keeping with the principle that spending in Canada by foreigners constitutes an export and should be free of tax, the Guide Outfitters Association of British Columbia recommended that packages sold to non-residents should be entirely free of tax. Similar recommendations have been made with respect to tour packages sold to foreigners and conventions and conferences attended primarily by non-residents. On the surface such extensions of tax-free status could cost the government some tax revenue but all interested witnesses before the Committee noted the strong price sensitivity of tourism spending. The government might actually be engaging in false economy by trying to tax tourist spending.

That is another example of small business being very worried about the government's decision and the effects that this will cause to these people. This was brought to our attention on many occasions throughout the hearings.

Before closing, I wish to put on the record the many times the Funeral Services Association of Canada appeared before the committee, particularly the occasion in Halifax, and identified funeral services as an essential service that should not be taxed. The association stated:

> We believe that every Canadian has a right to a burial or a cremation according to the rites and practices of his or her religion and cultural heritage, and that Canadians find it offensive for the government to tax those services.

In this regard, the report further stated:

> Aside from its overall objection to being taxed, the Association raised an issue about the taxation of pre-paid funerals.

• (0530)

> Under a prepaid funeral arrangement, a price of a funeral is set and money is paid into a trust account prior to the death of the person. This money, and any accrued interest, cannot be obtained by the funeral director until the time of the person's death. Revenue Canada apparently acknowledges that while these funds remain in trust, for income tax purposes, they do not represent income to the funeral home. However, according to the Association, Revenue Canada is taking the view that "where a client prepays for funeral services the client is providing consideration to the funeral home and the GST will be payable." The Funeral Service Association believes that since no funeral has been supplied and no money has been received by the funeral director, there should not be any GST payable.
> The Committee also heard from the Ontario Funeral Service Association that it has been given a number of conflicting opinions from Revenue Canada on when the tax is to be collected and when it is to be remitted. Some of the questions left unanswered include:
> 1) Should the tax be collected at the time of the prearrangement or when the funeral service is provided?
> 2) Should the tax be remitted at the time of the prearrangement or when the funeral service is provided?
> 3) Should the amount of tax collected be based on the original deposit or on the amount in the trust account at the time of death, which includes accumulated interest?

As of 29 August 1990, three days before they were due to begin collecting the GST on prepaid funerals, representatives from the Ontario Funeral Services Association stated that they were confused about how to apply the GST. At that time, they were still being given conflicting advice from Revenue Canada on the matter.

It was quite eloquently explained to us that two people on the same day telephoning the same office to receive information on the GST were given conflicting answers. How do you expect the average Canadian to fully understand the implications when some of the 4,000 highly paid individuals who are being hired to implement this tax cannot even give the average Canadian a straight answer? This is what is going on in the country under this government.

[Translation]

i am sorry the people who support this government keep criticizing us because we are trying to use every means at our disposal to prevent this disastrous tax from being added to the tax burden of Canadians . . .

Senator Simard: Listen to this hypocrisy!

Senator Lefebvre: . . . and speaking of hypocrisy, we have the perfect example in Senator Simard who is now silent. He has no valid arguments against the facts I just mentioned here. He sits there, reading his paper, because he has lost all hope of arguing successfully against the facts . . .

Senator Simard: You must be dreaming!

Senator Lefebvre: No, these are the facts. You can read what I said tomorrow.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Senator Simard: I rise on a point of order. I will tell you Liberal senators something, just as I told your New Brunswick cousins for 15 years. By the way, I have spoken in the Legislature of New Brunswick. I spent a lot of my time, if not all of it, in cities and towns on radio and television, in basements and upstairs, where I met with people in New Brunswick denouncing the Grits of New Brunswick. That is why we won for 17 years. You guys just relax. We have at least another 15 years to go. While you say you are a diminishing plurality or, more exactly, a minority, I will not spend too much time speaking at 5 a.m. in the morning. We will go out in the trenches where you guys used to be strong.

[Translation]

. . . only the Liberal Party can save and represent Francophones. For seventeen years, we have proven the opposite was true in New Brunswick. And it will happen again!

In the federal government we have my member, Bernard Valcourt, who is a good example. He goes to Saint-Quentin, in Fredericton and Moncton, the Francophones vote for the Mulroney government. It is a government with guts.

We don't need any encouragement and we don't need you reading reports that are ten or twelve years old, including the Rules of the Senate.

We will go where it counts, talk to people and explain the advantages and the weaknesses of the GST. If there are so many weaknesses, why didn't you propose any amendments? I heard Senator MacEachen saying that perhaps a number of amendments might be considered. Last week (Senator Poitras, you were there), did they open the door wide enough to allow amendments? No, they said: "Keep quiet, we'll take care of that. The rule of the majority will decide". That is what Senator Frith told us last week.

In the five years I have been in this Chamber, he often reversed the decision of the Speaker because it didn't suit them. In committee, they elected the chairman. Senator MacEachen was in control through his straw men, obviously. He controlled both the chairman and the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Meanwhile, Senator MacEachen was away representing the Bank of Montreal, either in Montreal, Toronto, or Brussels.

We should have another talk about conflict of interest!

To get back to what I was saying . . .

Senator Lefebvre: You want to keep up this farce?

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: Just listen, it will wake you up. Senator Frith wasn't even listening to you! It took some noise to make him sit up and take notice, just so he would realize you finished your speech. He thought you were still reading the Rules of the Senate or going your morning prayers.

This is just to say, Senator Frith and Senator MacEachen, that we will have a chance . . . we are starting to get sick and tired, not of working in this Chamber but of listening to this nonsense. Eventually, there will be debate . . .

Senator Lefebvre: On the same point of order . . .

Senator Simard: If you have a point of order, all right. We will have a debate, and we will talk about the GST and we will say what people told us as well.

Senator Lefebvre: This is ridiculous.

Senator Simard: Sit down! There is no point of order if you say there are no more rules here.

[English]

Senator Frith: You do not have a point of order.

Senator Simard: You have said that there are no more rules, regulations or procedures; no point of order either, yet you have raised points of order ten thousand times over the last two weeks.

Senator Lefebvre: That is an example of typical Tory arrogance. How many seats do you now have in the provincial legislature in New Brunswick with your Tory arrogance? Explain that to us. Go ahead and explain it.

Senator Simard: I am going to tell you something, buster. McKenna has been there for about three years. Everyone has said that he looks tired and fed up. And he has been missing national glory since Meech Lake. There is a rumour going around that he is considering quitting after the next election and could be replaced by Doug Young, a former member of the New Brunswick legislature, now a finance critic for the Liberal Party in the House of Commons and Mr. Chrétien's right-hand man who, by the way, did not go out of his way to offer his seat to Chrétien.

Senator Lefebvre: Who is going to be your candidate in Beauséjour?

Senator Simard: I am talking about your former New Brunswick leader, and also your ex-leader. However, that is another thing.

Senator Lefebvre: Why don't you have the guts to run against Mr. Chrétien if you are so good. Go ahead and try it.

Senator Simard: I will do better than that. Are you challenging me?

Senator Lefebvre: Yes, I am challenging you. Go ahead.

Senator Simard: All right. You resign your seat in the Senate tomorrow and I will resign my seat in the Senate. You take a riding in Quebec and I will trounce the hell out of you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lefebvre: That is the biggest farce ever said.

[Translation]

I am very pleased to hear that. I will read to Mr. Bérard, tomorrow, that senator Simard finds that it is a farce that a man closes his sawmills. That is the farce that Senator Simard just said, that 350 jobs will be lost next week. Senator Simard finds that it is a farce. It is shameful, Senator Simard.

[English]

Senator Simard: He is now offering me to run in New Brunswick. Senator Robertson, you will remember when you were in the legislature with me in New Brunswick and you will remember the first thing the Liberals were saying, "Simard, you are not an Acadian, so there is only one place for you to go. That is to Quebec".

Senator Hastings: The Senate.

Senator Simard: They told me to go back to my friend Duplessis in Quebec. Now that I am in Ottawa they are telling me to go back to New Brunswick. Make up your minds.

Senator Lefebvre: Try and find a Tory to run against Chrétien.

Senator Simard: I am fed up with you Grits. I am staying here unless you resign and then I will join you. You pick your riding and let God decide.

• (0545)

Hon. Joan Nieman: Honourable senators, after this stimulating series of interventions, I hope you will forgive me if I appear to have lost the thread of the discussion I was about to embark on.

I should like to begin by saying that I am also one of the persons in the Liberal caucus whose privileges were very much violated by the acts of last Thursday. I was here when the bells started to ring. I went to the caucus meeting. After some discussion and exchange of views about what we could possibly do next to circumvent what was obviously happening in the Senate chamber with respect to the rules, I went to my office. I was doing work there when, sometime around 5.30 p.m., I received a call to tell me to come to the chamber immediately, that a vote was going to take place. By the time I arrived here, the doors were not locked; they had been opened again because the vote was over.

I find this absolutely deplorable. This is a shocking abberation so far as this chamber is concerned. The rules of the Senate are part of the laws and procedures of this chamber. Unless we can depend on the person who is supposed to interpret them for us to do that fairly and according to the plain language that is before us, then we can no longer have confidence in him. The Speaker made his ruling prior to the bells ringing and took the action he did that caused the vote, which was entirely illegal, in concert and obviously at the direction of this government. How can any other senators—the Liberal senators or the independent senators—have any confidence in future rulings he may make? That is why it would be most appropriate if he chose to resign his position.

I say that with a great deal of regret, because I have had respect and friendship for the Speaker over the years I have known him. The events that have happened here have caused me much sadness and worry. I am not proud of what has gone on here in the last week. I do not believe any person who has been party to it, those who have read about what has occurred, or have seen it on television, can be too happy with what has happened.

I mentioned in the early hours of last Friday morning that I thought the only good that could eventually come out of this is that there might be a push for a change in the way our Parliament is now conducted. I believe the article written by Don McGillivray in the Ottawa Citizen has been read here tonight. The heading is, "Dose of insecurity good for arrogant Tory government". Mr. McGillivray starts off by saying:

> Is a majority government free to do anything it wants, subject only to the decision of the voters in the next election?
> . . . Justice Minister Kim Campbell stated it succinctly on Sunday on television: "We have to introduce a tax. If you think we're wrong, turf us out at the next election."

Our Prime Minister has made that comment or something similar several times. Mr. McGillivary comments:

> It sounds democratic. The government is responsible only to the voters who get their say once every four or five years. The electors then delegate all power to a prime minister and his party.

This apparently is the way we are operating at the moment. However, I am quite confident that when the framers of our Constitution conceived and agreed upon our parliamentary institutions, they did not imagine that we would be operating the way we are today. Obviously there have been improvements in Parliament over the past 130-odd years, but there are many areas where I believe the parliamentary system has degenerated.

Senators are part of the system. We are part of that Constitution, and we have the democratic right and duty to carry out our duties until such time as the Constitution is changed. For many years I have been interested in how we are governed here in Canada, in our institutions, and how our democracy, as fragile as it is, seems to improve one year and then fall back in other areas and other years.

After being in this chamber for 18 years, I have come to the conclusion that we have to make some radical and serious changes to our parliamentary system. I arrived here just over 18 years ago, and after a matter of months I was quite disillusioned with some of the actions and procedures that I saw, particularly in the Senate. I must say that I felt sorry for the new senators, because if I was disillusioned with the relatively quiet and inoffensive occurrences that I was witnessing in those days, I am wondering how they can understand what this chamber is supposed to be about and what our parliamentary system is supposed to be doing for the people of Canada. I do not think we are serving Canadians well.

When I was first appointed, Senator John Connolly had been Speaker here for many years. I told him that one of my first speeches was going to deal with reform of the Senate. He said: "Now, now Joan, just take it easy. You have to stay here a little while and find out what's going on because this is a rather complicated institution and it takes several years to really understand it." Fortunately, I took his advice and kept quiet for several years. In the interval, I have come to the conclusion that in spite of what the political scientists, the media and many other people have been saying for years, it was not reform of the Senate that is required; it is reform of Parliament. We cannot simply reform this chamber in isolation, and the one good thing that may come out of that is the realization that people will understand that.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Senator Neiman, will you permit a question?

Senator Neiman: Of course.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I do not know you very well at this point, but I am sure I will get to know you better. You have been in this chamber for over 18 years. The Liberal Party was in power in the House of Commons and this chamber for many years. Why have you not had better success in your efforts to reform this chamber?

Senator Neiman: As you become more familiar with the background of this federal institution, you will understand the dynamics. In my view, the House of Commons has been one of the chief opponents of Senate reform, particularly of an elected Senate, because it saw that as derogating from its own powers.

I am not prepared to make a complete speech on parliamentary reform tonight. One of the greatest hurdles we have to overcome is the other house. I do not know whether you believe this chamber should be elected, but I have come to see that as the only way for us to go. However, the greatest hurdle is still our friends on the other side. I am not talking about one party; I am talking about the other place in general. Over the years the executive has gained more power and backbenchers increasingly have less power. That did not start with this government; it started many years ago. One of the problems is that backbenchers in the other place—and again I am speaking of all parties and not any one party in particular—feel that they have a less important role to play. They feel they are there simply to reinforce whatever the government of the day has decided to do. For us to try in isolation to have an elected Senate would mean that the backbenchers in the other place would have less power. There are many other things involved.

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, I call a quorum.

• (0600)

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Your Honour, shall we canvass adjacent chambers to bring in senators?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators a quorum has been called. Rule 8 reads:

> When it appears, on notice being taken at the commencement of or during the sitting of the Senate, that fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the senators who may be in the adjoining rooms having been previously summoned, the Speaker shall adjourn the Senate until the next sitting day, without question put.

Having counted, I see a quorum. Please proceed, Senator Neiman.

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I understood the answer the honourable senator gave me. It is true that the parliamentary institutions have evolved and the executive keep gaining more power, even in the legislative assemblies.

But my question is this: did the Liberal senators and the Liberal Party disagree while the Liberal government was in office for God knows how many years, about Senate reform would explain why no reform was ever achieved? Even if they had the majority both in the Senate and in the House of Commons, nothing happened. Do the members of the Liberal Party in the other place disagree with the Liberal members in this house, and was it the case when they both had a majority?

[English]

Senator Neiman: Yes, of course there was. I think that a lot of senators here at one point were not really persuaded that an elected Senate was the proper way to go. However, over the past 10 years senators have become more and more convinced that if this house is to survive as an institution, it will probably have to be elected. In spite of that attitude, that concept has never been a popular one with the people in the other place because they feel that their authority would be lessened. So if there is anything on the list of things to be done, Senate reform or parliamentary reform, because it would obviously involve both houses, is very low on it.

I believe that the events of the last couple of years have persuaded the Prime Minister, finally, that perhaps he should take some action, and I think that it has finally crystallized the Liberals in the same attitude. The Liberal Party has had that policy for years but has never done anything about it. It just explained—

Senator Simard: Why?

Senator Hastings: What has your Prime Minister done in eight years?

Senator Simard: We'll get back to you!

Senator Neiman: I suggest that you ask the people on your side. I am sure that many of your members would not be any more enthusiastic about such a prospect because they cannot yet envisage it. To be honest, we have not really worked out the dynamics. However, many people on your side, such as Senator Roblin, are proponents of an elected chamber. As I say, it may come to pass if the Prime Minister thinks that it is time that we made some changes, and if our side has arrived at a decision to make a commitment to push for it. I will not hold my breath. I have only a few years left here, and I am not confident that anything will happen before I leave. In the meantime, we must live with the system we have and use the instruments available to us properly.

In thinking about what has been going on here, I have been looking through notes that I gathered over several years with regard to legislative and parliamentary functions. I have here a reference from Dr. J.A. Corry, who gave a series of Massey lectures. The title of this particular lecture is "The Power of the Law." He was talking about the advances we have made in our use of law. He said:

> One of the great advances we owe to democracy is a greatly changed attitude to law and the laws. Law is now seen for what it is, a product of the human community created by it for its own purposes of maintaining the order necessary for social life.

I think of that point particularly in light of this acrimonious debate on the GST. Each side tries to advance its idea of what is good for our society, and I think that is a proper course for this chamber. Dr. Corry went on to say:

> The original impulse of the democratic movement was to enlarge individual freedom, so that rough criticism of existing laws, of the persons who make them and enforce them, cease to be an offence. That is what party politics is about.
> The objective is to maintain a private sphere of life where we can do what we like, say what we like, fight for what we believe in, try to get what we want, all within the rules of the game.

We have certainly been talking about rules in the last week. He goes on:

> Conflict,up to a point, is a sign of vitality. The difficult question is to determine at what point the essential legal frame of the community is threatened.

That is something we should also be thinking about in terms of what has happened here in the past week. He goes on:

> To be wholesomely effective or even workable, laws must keep in close touch with the community sense of right.

It has been made obvious that the Canadian community at large is outraged by the GST legislation, and, without doubt, believes that it is not right.

I have another article written by Dr. J. R. Mallory on the structure of Canadian Government. He was talking about Parliament, particularly the House of Commons. He said with regard to the House of Commons:

> The first of its functions is to act as an electoral chamber: to give a government authority, to sustain it and thus make stable government possible, and to withdraw confidence from a government which no longer deserves to rule.

He then said:

> The second function is to legislate.
> Its third function is to act, as John Stuart Mills said as the nation's congress of opinions and committee of grievances. The business of Parliament is not only the articulation of grievances, but the informed discussion of public issues before decision is taken. To Bagehot parliamentary debate had a reciprocal function. Not only did it provide a full discussion of alternatives before parliament acted, but, more important, it performed the educative function of making the voter aware of the general shape of the issues confronting the country so that his contribution on election day would be the better informed.
> The essence of our whole system of government is that it is a structure having at its basis freedom of speech and thought. Decisions reached in Parliament are the result of free discussion which takes place within an elaborate and sophisticated set of rules known as parliamentary law.

The Senate rule book is part of our parliamentary law. He goes on:

> Werenohl states the principles underlying parliamentary procedure as follows:
> 'The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law have, however, been always kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament: These are—to protect a minority and to restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every member to express his opinion within the limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; and to prevent any legislative action being taken on sudden impulse.'

Senator Robertson: The honourable senator talks about the requirement of rules for the protection of the minority. Do you believe that such rules should apply to the committees as well as to the Senate itself?

Senator Neiman: We have to have the same rules in committees, and they have to be observed in the same way. If these rules do not appear—and I gather from your expression you think that they do not—to serve the purpose that you think they should serve, this is the place to debate the changes.

Senator Robertson: It was not the tyranny of the committee, it was the tyranny of the majority to which I referred, and I think you have confirmed that.

Senator Neiman: That may well have occurred and, if so, perhaps we should look at the rules again. That is one of our major complaints with what has happened. That is one of the reasons why this house has taken so long in dealing with legislation that comes from the other place. There have been numerous articles in the papers recently enumerating the number of times that the government has imposed closure in the other place to prevent further debate on matters, and it does so through, as we have said, the tyranny of the majority. It has its way to do it. Therefore, the only recourse we have on this side is to act as some kind of a counterbalance where we can—and we cannot always do it—by applying the same rules as they do over there. I have heard no criticism on that side of the chamber of the way the House of Commons has been operating, but the people have been criticizing and complaining about the fact that the so-call elected members have not been carrying out their duty to allow proper discourse and discussion over there.

● (0615)

Senator Robertson: On that point, Senator Neiman, if I may, in reality, do you see time allocation as very similar to closure? You are familiar with all of the rules, of course.

Senator Neiman: I wish I were familiar with all of the rules. I am ashamed to say that I do not know them as well as I should. In principle, I see no objection to time allocation. There does come a point in the parliamentary procedure where discussion probably should be brought to an end, but this has to be decided by everyone, and then I think it can be carried out. However, the fact is that, on the other side, because closure is really a very severe instrument, if we were to have anything like that on this side, I would hope that the use of it would be restricted and that the ways it could be used would be spelled out very clearly, because I think the government over there has abused that particular procedure.

Senator Robertson: On that point, Senator Neiman, I have not served there, and I do not think you served there either. There are two or three people here now who have served in the other place, but if you will study the rules in the other place, you will find that closure, in fact, gives more time for debate than does time allocation. I took it upon myself to ask the researchers in the Library of Parliament to go back and double check. I asked others as well. I suppose time allocation has a nicer sound than closure, although closure does give more hours of debate; but if you go back over the last six years, whether you want to call it closure or time allocation, it has been used about 24 times in the past six years.

Senator Hastings: Shame!

Senator Robertson: In the previous six years, time allocation or closure was used about the same number of times. The point I am making is that it is easy to say that those in the other house abuse closure; but, in my humble opinion, I do not see much difference between closure and time allocation, and the intrusion of closure or time allocation has not been that much different under either party. If you want to verify that, the data is there. I have researched it a couple of times. It is rather interesting.

Senator Neiman: I have not seen those figures. As I say, I am not familiar with the precise difference. Perhaps Senator Lefebvre knows.

Senator Lefebvre: I have a different impression entirely. My impression is that it has been used more in the past six years than at any other time in our history, but I will wait until we have the Parliamentary Research Branch of the Library of Parliament give us the facts. As I say, my impression is that time allocation and closure have been used more often by the Mulroney government than by any other government in the history of Canada.

Senator Simard: Don't listen to the Liberals. Get your facts straight.

Senator Neiman: In any case, honourable senators, I would be delighted to get the information and put it on the record as soon as I have it. To me, this is all part of a larger problem of the power of a majority government simply to dictate what will be done. The same thing happened when the Liberals were in power. In the past, as far as the Senate was concerned, there was a view that it should just do what it was told and pass bills without comment or without too much criticism. I feel that all of that has to change in the future.

I must say, in closing this part of my comments, that I was extremely heartened to hear a radio conversation between Peter Gzowski and three political scientists yesterday morning discussing what had been happening here in Parliament. For the first time, I think Mr. Gzowski began to understand the dynamics and problems in our Parliamentary procedure and the rightful position of the Senate in the legislative process. More importantly, it was the first time that I heard these three political scientists, whom I have heard before over the years and whom I respect, actually entertain the thought that it was not the Senate of Canada that primarily required reform, but that it was Parliament itself. I will be getting a copy of the transcript of that particular broadcast and I will be very happy to read parts of it into the record as soon as it is available.

I thought that I might bring to your attention, if you have not had an opportunity to read it, an article which appears in the Canadian Parliamentary Review for the Summer of 1990. Particularly for the new Senators, they will be hearing more about Bill C-21, which,is before us and about which there has already been some discussion, particularly by Senator MacEachen yesterday. This article is by Blair Armitage, who is a Committee Clerk in the Senate. The headnote is as follows:

> In June 1990 the Senate considered a motion requesting a conference with the Commons in order to discuss Senate amendments made to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and Immigration Department and Commission Act. The Commons had accepted some amendments, amended others further and rejected others. The Senate is insisting that the remaining amendments be accepted. Should such a conference materialize, it will be the first such occasion since 1947, when the two Houses met to resolve differences over amendments to the Criminal Code. This article looks at some political and procedural aspects of parliamentary conferences.

Honourable senators, I think it would be worthwhile reading the article. It is not very long, and I should read it into the record because I think all honourable senators will want to be more familiar with these conferences.

> We must first differentiate between "conferences" and "free conferences". Initially, the conference procedure was quite awkward. "Managers" acting on behalf of either House would meet, exchange written messages and withdraw, without a word spoken. If, after two such meetings no resolution had been reached, then a free conference could be held to allow the managers to discuss their respective positions without any restriction save for general directions given them by their respective House.
> This formal sequence was used once, in 1903, and found too cumbersome. In 1905 both Houses resolved that, in future, any conference could be a free conference and in 1906, incorporated these resolutions in their rules. Since the 1903 experience, all conferences have been "free".
> Since Confederation, fifteen formal requests have been made for a conference between the two Houses. On only one occasion, in 1924, was a request ever denied. On July 19, 1924, the Commons requested a free conference with the Senate regarding contested amendments to Bill 255, An Act to amend the Pension Act. The Senate rejected the Commons' request, remarking that it ". . . does not see the utility of a free conference at this late hour of the session". In fact, the session was prorogued later that same day. The bill, however, did receive Royal Assent. The Commons reconsidered the amendments of the Senate and subsequently agreed to them.
> In the other fourteen instances, only three times did the free conference mechanism fail to effect a successful conclusion and subsequent Royal Assent for the bill under discussion.
> No hard and fast rule exists for the size and composition of the management "team" representing either House. An examination of the political affiliations of managers sent by both the Senate and the Commons show several instances of teams of two, three, even four parties being represented. Only once has a one-party team been sent by the Senate. In 1940, the Commons named its managers in the same message in which it requested a free conference and the Senate felt obliged to respond in kind by sending an all-Conservative team, the rationale being that since the Commons was sending an all-Liberal team, the lines were already clearly drawn.
> Bourinot says ". . . [it] is not customary nor consistent with the principles of a conference to appoint any members as managers unless their opinions coincide with the objects for which the conference is held". In at least one instance, however, a senator acted as a manager, despite having moved a motion recommending that the Senate not further insist on its amendments. This would suggest that the Senate preferred to show solidarity when it came to its right to amend legislation.
> Essentially, then, conferences have been seen in the past as an effective means of formal intercourse between the two Houses on official business of Parliament. The British authority, Erskine May, contends that, in the United Kingdom, messages have made conferences obsolete but recent developments in Ottawa—no matter how they might turn out—demonstrate that close personal proximity with one's opposition in a bargaining situation tends to focus one's mind.
> In one instance, related by F. A. Kunz in The Modern Senate of Canada, this phenomenon is clearly highlighted. A Commons team, having been given absolute authority to take a very hard line, came back with a report which amounted to a complete capitulation, much to the jeering dismay of their colleagues.
> The only restraint on requesting a conference is that only the House in possession of the legislation involved may make the request.

• (0630)

> In Canada's case it has always been the Commons which has asked for the conference.
> The Senate, in its message to the Commons acceding to a request for a conference, names its managers as well as the time, date and location (which it has always supplied) of the conference.
> The number of managers sent has tended towards a pattern, but has a varied history. In early conferences, the Commons teams often outnumbered those of the Senate, sometimes doubling the number of Senate managers. In the period since 1925, however, equal numbers from either House has been the rule in practice, if not by formal resolution. These teams ranged from three apiece to six apiece, with three being the favoured size on four out of six such occasions. This pattern of matching team sizes was established by the Commons, since it responded on five of six occasions with its list of managers matching the list provided by the Senate.

Determining the staffing requirements of the conference is based on deduction, since public records of these meetings do not seem to exist. Professor Kunz, however, provides us with a clue: he writes "In the end the controversial clauses . . . were redrafted by the Minister of Justice, the Deputy Minister of Justice, and the Law Clerk of the Senate in the presence of the managers." It might be inferred from this reference that such expert counsel as either side should desire would be permissible. Additionally, a recording secretary or clerk of the meeting would be required. It might also be deduced that meetings are not public. Therefore, official reporters would not be necessary, although interpretation services would continue as per policy for in-camera meetings.

The conference is convened at the time stipulated in the message from the Senate. When this time approaches, the names of the managers for the Commons are called out and they leave for the meeting. When the Commons managers are ready they await—standing and uncovered—the mangers of the Senate. The Speaker of the Senate, upon notification that the Commons managers await, reads aloud the names of the Senate managers who rise and depart for the conference. It is important to note that the business of both Chambers is suspended during the conference.

It is not clear whether or not adjournments of short or long duration are permissible. While no injunctions are written down against this practice, it would seem that, at the very least, long adjournments (overnight, for example) would be highly unusual. The fact that business in both Houses is suspended while the conference meets indicates a high degree of urgency, as does the fact that managers from the Commons are, according to the authorities, supposed to remain standing throughout the meeting. While it might be argued that the conference could be adjourned to accommodate the schedule of both Houses and that the Commons managers should be allowed to sit, the "feel" of the whole procedure seems to indicate an emphasis on the importance of the event and its urgency. Whereas in the United States conferences are held on a regular basis, without interrupting sittings of either House, conferences in Commonwealth parliaments are rare and suggest a conflict of some import.

Once convened, the Senate managers stand, uncovered, and receive the formal message of the Commons, which states its objections to the Senate amendments. When a conclusion is reached, either to agree or disagree, the conference is adjourned and the managers report their recommendations to their respective House.

If the recent motion requesting a conference passes and the Commons agree, it will be interesting to see the outcome of the conference. An examination of the results of these meetings indicates that the Senate either prevails or comes to a compromise with the Commons which usually confirms the intent of their original amendments.

Honourable senators, I find that article extremely interesting and I think it will be of some use to us in the coming weeks as we deal with the question of Bill C-21. I do not know if any of my colleagues here can add anything, because my throat is giving out at this point. Senator Frith, have you any comments you can make?

Senator Frith: I believe that Senator Kenny does.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: The honourable senator who has the floor and his colleague before him, Senator Lefebvre, have urged us to speak to the GST and examine the report of the Committee on Banking chaired by Senator Buckwold.

I would suggest that on both sides of the chamber there is hope that we will soon be able to begin dealing with item 5 on the order paper.

But until we get to the GST we on this side will try to convey as faithfully as we can what was said during the cross-Canada hearings on the GST, unlike the one-sided arguments we have been listening to for the past few days.

In the meantime, as I say, I should like to put on the record of this chamber an editorial on the GST signed by Alain Dubuc and published in today's La Presse. The heading goes like this:

> The homework of undisciplined students.

I am quoting Alain Dubuc:

> With their inelegant uproar the Liberal senators have managed to make people forget that their brilliant fight against the GST was the result of long work.
> During the summer the senators crisscrossed Canada and spent many days listening to what Canadians had to say about the GST. This on-site inquiry led the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to put out a huge report of over 200 pages.
> People may have forgotten that the conclusions of the report prompted the Liberal senators . . .

You know, honourable senators, there are people who do not see any difference between the Senate and the Liberal majority in the Senate. Once again it does look like Alain Dubuc knows the difference. It is not the Senate that is blocking the GST. It is not the institution that makes all that noise and discredits our parliamentary institutions. It is the Liberal majority over there.

Senator Lefebvre: Thank you.

Senator Simard: I continue quoting Alain Dubuc:

> People may have forgotten that the conclusions of the report prompted the Liberal senators to block the GST instead of proposing amendments.

> How is it possible that this document, which has played a vital role in the ongoing crisis, has not been quoted, commented and analyzed?

And Alain Dubuc goes on:

> Reading the report might provide an explanation. If senators are undisciplined students, they are also students who botch their homework. The lengthy text of the Liberal majority is an endless, simplistic and partisan manifesto which contradicts everything we may have heard about the exactness and precision of senatorial research.
> In fact, when selecting groups anxious to give evidence on the GST . . .

A small digression, if I may. I can almost hear Senator Poitras say—as he did so many times in committee and elsewhere—that the Committee on Banking has been controlled, railroaded and manipulated by the chairman. No wonder a Montrealer like Alain Dubuc heard about it.

Senator Lefebvre: That is not true at all.

Senator Simard: Well then, Senator Poitras is mistaken, Alain Dubuc is mistaken, and the Citizen is mistaken.

Senator Lefebvre: Yes.

Senator Simard: So everybody is mistaken, except Senator Lefebvre.

Senator Lefebvre: And the Canadian people!

Senator Simard: I am not talking about the contents, I am referring to the manipulation by the Liberal senators. I will get back to that. I know this is long, I know it may seem very long to you. Perhaps it hurts a little, byt it is not all that long!

Listen, you all read editorials. You told us all about the world baseball league, about the National Football League and what have you. We are talking about the GST. You did ask us to speak to the GST issue. Alain Dubuc is talking about the GST. If I may, I will conclude:

> In fact . . .

Again, this was written by Alain Dubuc in his editorial this morning, Thursday, October 11, in La Presse of Montreal:

> In fact, when selecting groups anxious to give evidence on the GST, the senators made sure they got the anti-GST lobbyists and Western Canada over-representation by people dead set against the tax, like local labour unions.
> Therefore the bulk of the document is not a report but a catalogue. Still it has its use: identify the GST victims and stress the contradictions in the legislation.

We knew there were weaknesses but we were not even given enough time to read it, we had only two hours, you were there, Mr. Speaker. We did not even have two hours, let alone time enough to digest it and come up with amendments.

Senator Lefebvre: Did you read it since then?

Senator Simard: Yes, we read it. I fully agree with the comments of Alain Dubuc.

[Senator Simard.]

This is getting you down! It seems to me I let you speak as much as you wanted earlier today and last night as well.

● (0645)

Senator Lefebvre: Ever since you came in, you interrupted every single speaker.

Senator Simard: I wanted to tell you something, Senator Lefebvre . . .

Senator Lefebvre: So what's your story, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: Senator Lefebvre, some of the staff outside were telling us:

> Senator Lefebvre has been speaking really well this week. He never talked as much in all his 20 years in the House of Commons.

Senator Lefebvre: It's true. I was busy with legislation.

Senator Simard: So why not let us get on with it? But back to our subject and Alain Dubuc.

I thought I would read some of this to you.

Senator Lefebvre: What did you accomplish in your life, anyway?

Senator Simard: Well, I fought the Grits in New Brunswick for 17 years! I don't have to do another blessed thing for the rest of my life!

Senator Lefebvre: Is that what you accomplished?

Senator Simard: Yes.

> The bulk of this document is not really a report but a catalogue. It is useful, however, in that it identifies the victims of the GST and draws our attention to the contradictions in this legislation. The senators' concern for detail borders on the trivial, however, when they take a close look at the problems of Newfoundland, worrying about the poppies, the sale of flowers via a wire service from outside or the impact of the GST on the cost of shipping Christmas trees from Nova Scotia.
> Where the report really goes on the skids is in the analytic part.

According to Alain Dubuc:

> In the summary of recommendations, the senators merely drew up a list of demands by all the various lobbies, without editorial comment, as though these parliamentarians had decided to abandon their responsibilities and turn into stenographers.

That is what happened on the 24th. That is what could have been avoided if the Liberal majority in the Senate, faced with the departure of Liberal senators and a shrinking majority, had not panicked.

Senator Lefebvre: Poor Tory ghosts!

Senator Simard: I continue. Be patient, Senators, we did not abuse the time of the Senate over the past 10 days. Senator Poitras, you did not find that we had abused the time of the Senate. Even if we spent one hour out of every ten days! From the very beginning, you alone have had the right to speak.

Senator Lefebvre: You have no defence. Alain Dubuc never read the report.

Senator Simard: That is again a gratuitous statement. What does he know about Alain Dubuc's reading habits and his analyses? What does he know? To my knowledge, Alain Dubuc does not report to Tom Lefebvre every morning!

When the time comes, I will read to you some more of Alain Dubuc's editorials. They could certainly do you some good.

I conclude, Mr. Acting Speaker:

> It would be no use looking for an analysis of the impact of the value added tax in the countries where it exists, for the senators did not look into that; or for a strict study of the economic impact, for it is non existent; or for possible alternatives, because they are reduced to another list, without conclusion.
> In short, the findings of the reports, which certainly must have cost Canadian taxpayer a bundle—

By the way, I add the amount of the bill. It is going to cost one million dollars to Canadian taxpayers. I continue with Alain Dubuc's statement:

> Is short, the findings of the reports, which certainly must have cost Canadian taxpayers a bundle, could have been foresen from the start. It is not surprising, therefore, that following this sad exercise, Liberal senators prefer to shout rather than discuss the situation.

it is signed "Alain Dubuc".

I will leave you with this; I thought it would be something for you to digest this morning before you had your breakfast. I am sure it will stimulate your appetite!

Senator Lefebvre, I warn yout that once you have ended your shenanigans, recovered your senses and your mind, we are going to deal with this report.

Senator Lefebvre: Can you do that?

Senator Simard: We will first analyze the report, and then we will tell you what you could have put into the report, if simply you had not panicked.

We will also tell you about the amendments which the Government accepted on the recommendations of the House of Commons Finance Committee. We will tell you also what Minister of Finance Michael Wilson is planning to do. I am not going to reveal any secret, for he went public and explained the reasons why it is important to adopt this bill as soon as possible, even if it meant some corrections at a later date on a number of things which could normally be considered and amended through regulations or administrative measures. Whether Senator Lefebvre likes it or not, Minister of Finance Michael Wilson will have the opportunity to table several other budgets before the Liberals assume again power in 1993, 1997 or Year 2001. Year 2001 may seem quite distant to you. I can understand that. You are not used to sit in the opposition. Anyway, we are going to talk to you a lot about the GST. Meanwhile, try to save face and find a way to apologize first of all to the Canadian public.

i strongly urge Senator Frith to apologize to the Canadian public for calling in the press, ssme of your political cousins, including Mr. Riis, of the NDP, and the others. You should apologize, Senator Frith, because you are responsible for the whole mess. We could not honestly blame Senator MacEachen, for he was in Brussels at the time. But you were here, Senator Frith, and the TV cameras had their sights on you. We could see that the whole weekend. We saw Senator Frith calling in the journalists. We saw Senator Hébert doing everything he could to be knocked down perhaps by a camera, a newspaperman or a security officer. There is nothing he enjoys more than playing the part of a martyr. Senator Frith, I do hope that together with your colleagues, including Senator Lefebvre who looks wide awake this morning, you will apologize to Canadians.

Today, I intend to write Senator Leblanc a formal letter asking him just how much that cost a day—

[English]

I intend to write a letter to Senator LeBlanc, who is chairman of the Internal Economy committee, and ask him how much this circus is costing Canadians. I hope that we will get those figures soon so that we can tell Canadians how much it is costing them, how much more the Liberals' education on the GST is costing us. I'd like to tell Canadians how much the last ten days has cost them and how much more it will cost per hour, per day and per week.

As much as I like Liberal senators, I do not want to play their game. We will be discussing the GST and Canadians will realize that it is not the monster that Liberal senators would have them believe it is.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Simard for significantly reducing the burden that was on me to bring us all to 8 o'clock. I will now continue, if I may.

Senator Fairbairn: We are all ears.

Senator Kenny: I am back by popular demand. There were some people who felt that I rushed through major issues raised during the sitting last night. Thus I feel obliged to recapitulate the first portion of it, and I will do that now. If I am going too quickly for any of you, just raise your hand.

The major issue raised during the hearings on Bill C-62 were with respect to the GST credit system. The system of GST credits is subject to the same indexation provisions that apply to the tax system in general; that is, the credits and threshold are indexed to the rate of inflation measured by changes in CPI in excess of three per cent. Thus, the real value of these credits will generally decline by three per cent. Virtually all opponents of the tax cited this feature as a major flaw in Bill C-62. Some proponents of the bill also commented critically on this feature.

The credits, in addition to other elements of the tax reform package, are designed to make the GST package progressive at the lower to middle-income levels. As the real value of these credits declines with inflation, this progressivity will diminish.

The government has responded to this point by stating that the FST credit has been increased at more than the rate of inflation. At issue is whether the increases were to offset higher tax rates or declines in real value of credit due to inflation.

Senator Hastings: I do not wish to disrupt Senator Kenny in his excellent dissertation. I welcome Senator Ottenheimer back to the Chair. He will recall last night, when he was acting as the Speaker of the Senate, that I called for a quorum. He undertook to study some precedents and told us that he would report to us later. I am wondering if he might like to report to us now, or would he like to take a little longer, or maybe even a trip to Westminister?

Senator Frith: Please take a full delegation of colleagues from your side if you do go.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I presume the honourable senator is referring to a quorum call yesterday which was made by a senator on my left. That decision was given by the Chair pursuant to Rule 8. I am not aware that there is anything pending to be done with respect to the matter. It is a completed matter.

Senator Hastings: With respect, you are right, Mr. Speaker. You did render your decision; but you said that you were going to check the precedents to make certain that your decision was correct. I am asking you now if you checked the precedents and if you would care to give them to us.

Senator Murray: What question?

• (0700)

Senator Frith: It was about the question of what takes place after a quorum is called and exactly how the notice is given under the section to those in the adjoining rooms. We accepted the ruling that was taken at the time. However, I thought Senator Ottenheimer had said that he took the advice from the Table; but it was not too clear. He did not have any real precedents to rely on and was going to look into it. In the meantime, he was going to rule that a quorum was here and we proceeded.

It is disappointing to find out that Senator Ottenheimer is not going to apply his talents and experience to clarify that issue, if it needs clarifying. However, if he is not, so be it.

Senator Kenny: If the Speaker is not going to give us more information, I will soldier on.

Senator Frith: Yes, carry on.

Senator Kenny:

> The credits, in addition to other elements of the tax reform package, are designed to make the GST package progressive at the lower to middle income levels. As the real value of these credits declines with inflation, this progressivity will diminish.
> The government has responded to this point by stating that the FST credit has been increased at more than the rate of inflation. At issue is whether the increases were to offset higher tax rates or declines in the real value of the credit due to inflation.
> B. The Single Person's Credit
> A unique feature of the GST credit regime is the additional credit made available to single adults. This credit is not available to those with incomes below about $6000 and the maximum value of the credit is available only to those with incomes in excess of about $11,000. Many witnesses decried the fact that the credit is not available to those who most need it. The House of Commons Finance Committee recommended that the single person's credit be abolished and any savings used to enhance the credit for the first adult in each family.
> C. The Take Up Rate
> Some witnesses argued that the GST is particularly onerous for the most disadvantaged of Canadians who will not file for a GST refundable credit because they have no taxable income. One suggestion was for the government to undertake a major outreach program to ensure that all Canadians eligible for the credit do in fact receive it.
> The take up rate for the refundable child tax credit is very high, about 96% of those registered to receive family allowance payments. This high take up rate can be explained by the personal characteristics of those who are responsible for children and the fact that the credit is relatively generous. It is possible that some transient individuals will not apply for the tax credit; however with a relatively generous credit such individuals have a strong incentive to inform themselves about the credit and apply for it. The Committee also heard evidence from native and social policy groups that illiteracy poses a serious problem for the take up rate of the GST credit.
> D. Social Assistance and the GST Credit
> Some witnesses expressed a fear that provincial governments will treat the refundable GST credit as income and reduce social assistance payments accordingly. This fear was expressed in several provinces although no evidence was presented that such would be the case.
> Social assistance is usually determined by calculating a family's financial needs and comparing this with the financial resources of the applicant for assistance. In no province—

[Senator Kenny.]

Senator Poitras: May I ask a question, sir?

Senator Kenny: When I am finished.

In no province or territory is the existing refundable child tax credit or sales tax credit considered as income for the purposes of determining social assistance benefits. In Saskatchewan, family allowance receipts are treated as income, but this is the exception, not the rule.

II. FST INVENTORY REBATE

When the GST comes into force on 1 January 1991, a very broad range of goods and services will be subject to this new tax. Some goods sold in that year will come from inventory acquired earlier, upon which the FST applied.

To avoid a double taxation of sales from this inventory, the federal government is offering a rebate of the FST on existing inventory at the end of the year.

These inventory rebates rates are not included in Bill C-62—they are determined by regulation.

These rebates do not vary according to trade level. The average FST content in a retailer's inventory would generally be lower than the FST content of the inventory of say a wholesaler or importer. The general rebate rate is 8.1% of the value of inventory. An exception is made for automobile dealers who get an inventory rebate of 11.9% (calculated as 13.5/113.5) because the FST for automobiles is applied at the wholesale level.

The nature of the FST makes it difficult to determine exactly how much tax is embedded in inventories. Rebate formula, while arbitrary, are likely to be an acceptable compromise for practical reasons. The Committee has heard some evidence of apparent inequities in the effects of these rules. Automobile dealers are not the only taxpayers whose inventories contain a tax far higher than the 8.1% level, nor are they the only ones who can easily calculate and identify the amount of tax in inventories. The Committee has heard from associations of cosmetics and toiletries firms, pleasure craft dealers and importers, all of whom claim that the rebate percentage penalizes them significantly and who also believe that they can identify accurately the amount of tax in their inventory.

Broadly based rebate rules will penalize some while overly compensating others. If the Government provides the higher rebate to the groups listed above, there is still an equity problem, although not as easily identified, among the remaining taxpayers.

The Minister of National Revenue has responded in a letter to the chairman to the comments of importers. He offered no additional relief, stating that importers have the opportunity to manage their affairs in light of the announced rebate rate so as to minimize any adverse effects.

GST and the Taxation of Food

The government has decided not to tax basic groceries. It is however taxing a wide range of food products. Those that are consumed outside the home and those that do not meet the basic definition of groceries. The committee has been informed that approximately 40 per cent of the food dollar is spent in restaurants or take-out establishments. Statistics Canada gives such spending a weight of only 29 per cent for purposes of calculating the Consumer Price Index.

Drawing the line between basic groceries and other taxable forms of food is bound to be arbitrary to some degree and can lead to tax inequities among competing products.

The Committee heard evidence of just such effects. The bill was originally to tax all cookies. It was amended in the House of Commons to treat as basic groceries all cookies sold in packages of six or more.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Senator Frith: You cannot rise on a point of order when we are on a question of privilege.

Senator Simard: On a point of privilege then. My privileges are being denied here and our Liberal colleagues are jumping ahead of us.

Senator Hastings: What is going on?

Senator Simard: Order Number 5 on the order paper will allow debate to take place on the GST. Senator Kenny is using the present debate to read and discuss the report that should be discussed on Order No. 5. This is my question of privilege, as we are expected to follow the rules.

Senator Frith: Your honour, Senator Simard is speaking on the question of privilege, and he will have to wait his turn.

Senator Simard: Never mind.

Senator Frith: He is not on a point of order.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is the honourable senator on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Senator Simard: A question of privilege.

Senator Frith: He is speaking on this question of privilege, so he must wait his turn. However, Senator Kenny may be willing to cede his turn to him.

Senator Kenny, are you prepared to cede your turn on this question of privilege

Senator Kenny: What did you say?

Senator Frith: We are on a question of privilege and Senator Simard wishes to speak on it, a right to which he is entitled. Do you wish to cede to him at this point and then continue later.

Senator Kenny As long as I can come back to my point, that is fine.

Senator Simard: But before I continue with my question of privilege—

Senator Frith: You are on this question of privilege.

Senator Simard: I am talking on my question of privilege.

Senator Frith: Then you must wait until this one is finished.

Senator Simard: You said that I could proceed.

Senator Frith: Not on a separate question, but on the question with which we are dealing now.

Senator Simard: Then I am speaking on your question of privilege.

Senator Frith: Carry on.

Senator Simard: Take your pick.

Senator Hastings: Yes, it is the same nonsense.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please proceed after you have acknowledged the graciousness of the honourable gentleman who ceded to you.

Senator Frith: All right; iron handed.

Senator Comeau: That's on the record, Staff.

Senator Robertson: Be careful, Staff, we might strike you dead.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Simard: It is early in the morning, but Senator Frith has said, with regard to my question of privilege, that it is against the rules to speak on it because the rules do not allow it. He must be referring to the house rules; yet for the past 10 days they have been telling us that there are no longer any rules here, that the book has been thrown away.

Senator Fairbairn: Since Thursday.

Senator Simard: So, Senator Frith, would you please show a little more consistency and tell us which rules apply? Is this a new rule that you have manufactured? Will you not answer the question?

Senator Frith: Are you asking me for a ruling?

Senator Simard: I am asking which rules you are applying when you question my question of privilege, because last week you and your colleagues threw the rule book away and said that it was no good because the rules had been broken, that Senator Charbonneau could not be the Speaker. You certainly demonstrated that there were no more rules when you opened the chamber door and let the media come onto the floor.

Your Honour, I don't know whether I had a question of privilege. I think my question of privilege is just as good as the question of privilege we are discussing. My question of privilege is this: Order No. 5 on the order paper deals with the Banking Committee report on the GST. We are on a question of privilege, and Senator Kenny is reading the famous, biased, Liberal—

Senator Robertson: Buckwold.

Senator Simard: —Buckwold whitewashed the report.

Senator Hastings: Baloney!

Senator Simard: The Liberal report. So it is correct that they can proceed while sitting on both sides of the fence—while raising a question of privilege and reading from a report that we want to study, hopefully soon, but evidently not for a few days. Should we let the Liberal circus go on? That is my question of privilege.

Your Honour, I do not want you to spend too much time on it. We are all tired. I think I have made my point. You do not have to rule on it—

Senator Fairbairn: What a relief!

Senator Simard: —because there are no rules. So have a good morning and let Senator Kenny resume.

However, I wish that Senator Frith would try to keep some order on his side. I understand that it is a big job, and especially when the gang leader is encouraging the troops. Again, I serve notice to the Chair that this morning I will be dictating a letter to Senator Romeo LeBlanc, Chairman of the Internal Economy committee, asking him for the figures on how much this circus is costing Canadians. We have been sitting here day and night at great expense. The staff is tired. Now there is a rumour in the hallways that new staff will be hired.

Senator Doody, are you aware of that?

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Simard: They intend to call on Senator Leblanc to supply new staff to pinch hit for the regular staff.

Senator Comeau: Price is no object!

Senator Simard: It is our duty to tell it like it is.

In any event, perhaps Senator Kenny will continue with a new document and show some fairness. We can read that report ourselves. Perhaps he could read the rule book.

Senator Hastings: He is not reading the committee report!

Senator Robertson: Yes he is; he is on page 33.

Senator Hastings: He is not.

Senator Kenny: Thank you, honourable senators. Once again, I must express my appreciation to Senator Simard. He is trying to help us through a difficult time to 8 o'clock, and my voice has not been up to its usual standard. I think we should award him an honourable membership to our team over here.

We were on cookies, so let us go back to cookies.

GST and the Taxation of Food.

The government has decided not to tax basic groceries. It is however taxing a wide range of food products, those that are consumed outside of the home and those that do not meet the definition of basic groceries.

The Committee has been informed that approximately 40 per cent of the food dollar is spent in restaurants or take-out establishments. Statistics Canada gives such spending a weight of only 29 per cent for purposes of calculating the Consumer Price Index.

Drawing the line between basic groceries and other taxable forms of food is bound to be arbitrary to some degree and can lead to tax inequities among competing provinces.

The Committee heard evidence of such effects. For example, the Bill originally provided for the taxation of all cookies. It was amended in the House of Commons to treat as basic groceries all cookies sold in packages of six or more. Chocolate bars are sold increasingly in family-sized packages which compete directly with chocolate covered baked goods: they have the same ingredients and appeal to the same market. Yet the tax treatment of the two differs in Bill C-62.

• (0730)

Soft drinks also compete with tax-free beverages such as mineral water, coffee and tea. Again these competing products are treated differently.

Several suggested amendments to the Bill were submitted to the committee amending Part III of Schedule VI which defines basic groceries.

I now move to "Agriculture, Fisheries and Tax Free Status":

Agriculture and Fisheries

Under the GST, food is zero-rated throughout the production chain. For fishermen and farmers this means that they are entitled to claim input tax credits and obtain a refund of tax paid on their production inputs. At the same time, there is no tax assessed on their output so that farm and fishery production remains completely tax free.

The special issue that arises for such tax free production stems from cash flow considerations. Farmers and fishermen must pay out an extra 7% on their purchases and then file with the Department of Revenue to claim a refund of the input tax credits. Although registrants selling taxable goods are in a similar position in respect to having to wait for a refund of their input tax credits, they nevertheless have the cash flow benefit of using the GST which they collect on their sales. This is a benefit that farmers and fishermen do not enjoy since their own sales are non-taxable.

The amount of time which farmers and fishermen must carry the extra 7% on their input costs before obtaining a refund will depend on how often they file a return. GST registrants making taxable and zero-rated supplies of $500,000 or less may file annually, quarterly or monthly. Registrants making taxable and zero-rated supplies of $500,001 to $6 million may file quarterly or monthly, while those with sales over $6 million are required to file monthly. Thus, if farmers and fishermen choose the quarterly filing option, they could wait up to three months between the time they purchase an item and the time they file for a refund. Furthermore, the Government will not begin paying interest on the refund amount until 21 days after the registrant's return is received by Revenue Canada.

The Government proposes to deal with this cash flow problem by zero-rating at the point of sale a number of types of purchases made exclusively by farmers and fishermen. This will include combines, large tractors, fishing boats and commercial fishing nets. Representatives of fishermen and farmers told the Committee that the list of tax free items designated by the Government was inadequate and would not relieve their cash flow problems.

In Newfoundland, representatives of the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers told the Committee that the best solution to the problem would be a system of GST-exempt identification cards for fishermen that would apply to a whole range of fishing-related purchases made by fishermen. In Regina, the Western Canadian Wheat Growers suggested that the problem be dealt with either by not collecting tax on any business related purchases by farmers or, at a minimum, extending the list of items designated as non-taxable at the point of sale. Both farmers and fishermen also pointed out that the GST system of paying tax on inputs and claiming these back later placed a significance compliance burden on them.

It should be noted that the list of items that are non-taxable at the point of sale is made by regulation and does not require legislative amendment to be extended. I now move to "Horses":

The GST treats the sale of horses as a taxable supply. In Toronto, the Ontario Racing and Breeding Council argued that including horses in the GST was discriminatory since it is the only form of livestock that is taxed. They noted that horsemeat is Canada's second largest red meat export to Europe. The Council also argued that the extra paperwork burden would end export sales to the U.S. and would lure breeders to the U.S. in order to avoid the "hassle of GST registrations, credits and waits for reimbursements". Horse breeders are asking that sales of horses be zero-rated along with the sales of other forms of livestock.

This could be achieved either by amending Part IV of Schedule VI of Bill C-62 or by including it in regulation, since number 10 of the same section provides for zero-rating of prescribed property.

Although there is obviously some benefit to horse breeders of having domestic horse sales zero-rated, it is uncertain what the proposed changes would do for export sales of horses since under the GST all exports are zero-rated anyway.

I now move to "Plant and Tree Nurseries":

The Canadian Nursery Association argued that plants and trees should be zero-rated under the GST since these help to control pollution. The witness claimed that planting of trees is one of the surest and least expensive ways of halting or even reversing the build-up of carbon dioxide in the air.

Whether or not plants and trees are worthy of special treatment is open to debate. A number of merit goods are taxed under the GST. The provisions for zero-rating are designed not for agricultural products per se but for production of basic groceries. Zero-rating of trees and shrubs could be accomplished through an amendment of Bill C-62 to include trees and shrubs in the list of zero-rated agricultural and fishing items or by including it in regulation as supply of prescribed property as provided under Schedule VI, Part IV, number 10.

I now move to "GST and Housing":

Under the provisions of Bill C-62, the GST is to apply to the sale of all new or substantially renovated housing. The sale of existing housing units is not subject to tax and . . . residential rents are exempt from the GST.

• (0745)

HOUSING REBATES

Purchasers of new residential units will be eligible for a rebate under most circumstances. Those purchasing a unit valued at $350,000 or less will enjoy a rebate of 36% of the GST paid, reducing the effective GST rate to 4.5%. Those purchasing a home valued above $450,000 will receive no rebate and for homes valued between $350,000 and $450,000 the rebate declines from $8750 to zero as the price of the house increases. These rebates are also available to purchasers of condominium units.

No equivalent rebate is made available for newly-constructed rental units. Witnesses have suggested that the GST makes home ownership relatively more attractive than rental accommodation . . .

TAXING LAND

Several witnesses have suggested that land should not be taxed. Some supporters of the GST . . . argued . . . that land should not be taxed because it is not consumed. Others have argued that taxing land discriminates against those who face high housing costs in southern Ontario and Vancouver.

Markets with high housing costs are associated with high land prices. Applying the GST consistently across all markets will cause homebuyers in Toronto to pay more GST, but it will not distort relative prices compared to other markets.

They will all rise in price by the same percentage.

A . . . distortion does arise because the thresholds for the rebate are applied universally across Canada. A $400,000 home in Toronto might resemble a $300,000 home in Ottawa in all respects except location. The Ottawa home would receive the full GST rebate while the Toronto home receives only a partial rebate.

Current economic conditions have severely depressed the housing market . . . in southern Ontario . . . Removing the GST from the land component of house prices could offset some of the negative effects of high interest rates.

Land is a long-lived asset—it rarely depreciates. It has been suggested therefore, that land not be taxed because it is not "consumed". Land does . . . produce a stream of benefits which are consumed and the taxation of land could be seen as a simple and convenient way of taxing this stream of benefits.

To remove the tax on land, however, requires more than simply zero rating land. It would require that the GST be applied to the price of a house, excluding land. This raises questions about administrative complexity and enforcement since land prices vary by a large amount, even within the same communities.

GST AND SOFT COSTS

All services associated with the sale of a home will be subject to the tax. Real estate brokers have suggested that their services should be exempt since they are equivalent to the services of a stock broker—i.e. they sell an investment good to homeowners.

TRANSITIONAL RULES

An FST inventory rebate is offered for most goods purchased prior to 1991 but sold in the new year. This is to prevent the double taxation of such goods. For new homes, the FST rebate is limited to homes sold before 1 April 1991. No equivalent restriction applies to other goods which receive the FST rebate.

The committee heard evidence that the slow housing market might result in double taxation of houses built in 1990 and sold in the spring of 1991.

GST AND REMOTE REGIONS

Goods and services in the more remote regions of Canada cost more than they do in central Canada, largely due to the added transportation costs involved in shipping materials to these regions but also due to the lesser degree of competition and higher markups. The FST is imposed at a trade level prior to these transportation charges and local markups. The GST is imposed on the retail value of sales.

Tax reform . . . means that residents of remote regions will pay more consumption tax than residents of central Canada for the same goods and services. It also means that these residents will pay more tax under the GST than they did under the FST.

These points were made to the committee by numerous witnesses in Atlantic Canada and the Northwest Territories.

GST CREDITS

The GST credits are a part of a package designed to ensure that families with incomes below $30,000 benefit from tax reform. But a $24,000 income in Yellowknife or Iqualuit does not imply the same standard of living as in Edmonton or Ottawa. Thus a family in central Canada with this income is entitled to full GST credits, but a family in the north with the same standard of living would not receive full benefits . . . This violates the principle of horizontal equity.

GST AND TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Zero rating transportation from the GST will not provide general benefits to residents of remote regions. When they directly consume services such as airline flights to other parts of Canada, zero rating will reduce the cost of such services. But, when transportation costs are an input into a final product purchased by consumers, zero rating provides no benefit. This is because the GST is applied to the full retail price . . .

To remove the GST from the transportation component of goods, it must be applied to the retail price of goods, exclusive of transportation costs. This is administratively complex.

NORTHERN ALLOWANCE

It was suggested to the Committee that the northern deduction for income tax purposes be increased by at least 40%. It has the benefit of not requiring an amendment to this Bill. Such a suggestion would benefit those with taxable income but not the lowest income households who would benefit more from a revision of the tax credits.

TAX-FREE STATUS

One approach to relieving northerners of the added burden of the GST is to make all retail purchases in the north tax free. This would more than compensate them for any added burden of the GST. It might also create enforcement and leakage problems; nearby communities, which do not benefit from tax free status, might have purchases routed through northern communities, genuinely or on paper only, to benefit from this tax advantage.

Social assistance rates in the north are based on need and actual spending up to some allowable maximum rates for a two-adult family are as follows. In Alberta, for food, it is $268. In the Northwest Territories it is $241 to $458 depending upon the area. For the Yukon it is $274, while for Alberta it is $430 maximum, including utilities. The maximum amount specified for utilities applies to the Northwest Territories. For the Yukon it is $475, plus utilities.

Charities and Non-profit Organizations.

The GST legislation provides that most activities undertaken by charities and non-profit organizations will be exempt from the tax. However, sales of a type generally made by commercial businesses will be taxable. Where supplies made by charities and non-profit organizations are exempt, the tax paid on the inputs used in these supplies would not be eligible for input tax credits. To offset the extra tax that these organizations will incur as a result of the GST, the Government proposes to provide a rebate of 50 per cent of the tax paid on inputs used to produce exempt supplies by charities and eligible non-profit organizations. To qualify for the rebate, non-profit organizations must receive at least 40 per cent of their funding from government grants.

As noted, sales by non-profit organizations that compete with commercial organizations are not eligible for exemption. The Committee heard from several non-profit organizations about problems with regard to their taxable status under the GST. S.A.W. Industries Inc. in Prince Edward Island explained to the Committee that while their wood-working business, PC Industries, which employs mentally handicapped persons, is exempt from the current Federal Sales Tax, its sales will be taxable under the GST. The change in tax status will place PC Industries' operation at a disadvantage in relation to its competitors that do not employ mentally handicapped individuals.

A letter has been forwarded from the committee to the Minister of Finance to draw this matter to his attention.

The Newfoundland and Labrador Command of the Royal Canadian Legion raised a problem with respect to the sale of poppies and wreaths which are manufactured by Vetcraft, a shelter workshop operated by Veterans Affairs. Poppies and wreaths are sold to the Royal Canadian Legion Dominion Command which sells them to provincial commands which, in turn, sells them to branches for a nominal profit.

According to the testimony of the legion, local branches will be subject to the GST on their purchases of poppies and wreaths. It appears that poppies should not be taxable since it can be argued that they are not sold but are exchanged for charitable deduction. Furthermore, the consideration involved is usually less than $5 and part VI of schedule 5 of the legislation provides that fund raising sales by volunteers of goods costing no more than $5 would be exempt from the GST. Wreaths, on the other hand, are sold for more than $5 and may not qualify for an exemption. The committee has sent a letter to the Minister of Finance drawing this matter to his attention.

With respect to the amateur sports community, goods and services provided through the private, for profit, sector, are generally subject to the GST. This includes all recreation and sports activities. In Canada, many such activities are provided by quasi-public bodies, designated as charities, registered amateur athletic associations and non-profit organizations. They will also have to charge GST on their services unless the activities are aimed primarily at children under the age of 14 years, or are for the benefit of mentally or physically disadvantaged children. Whether or not these organizations charge GST on the services they provide, they must pay the tax on the inputs they buy. The bill offers a rebate of 50 per cent of GST paid by charities and 50 per cent of GST paid by non-profit organizations which are dependent on government for at least 40 per cent of their funding. This rebate applies to the tax on inputs used to provide tax exempt services.

With respect to the GST on fees, the technical paper proposed that the GST apply to fees charged to those over the age of 14 years, whereas the bill now proposes to impose tax on the age for which a program is designed. It still uses 14 years as a threshold age. Virtually all representatives thought the age limit was too low. Teenagers are not adults. If the worthiness to society of such programs is a major factor in determining exemption from tax, an age limit of 18 years makes more sense, according to witnesses. Such was the recommendation to the House of Commons Finance Committee.

Concerning the 50 per cent rebate, Bill C-62 creates two classes of volunteer sports and recreational associations, those eligible for a 50 per cent rebate of GST paid on inputs and those ineligible for such rebates. Registered charities are automatically eligible for the rebate. Non-profit organizations must receive no more than 40 per cent of their funding from governments to qualify.

The Federal Government has been encouraging sporting organizations to become less dependent upon government while, at the same time, penalizing them for doing so. The House of Commons Finance Committee recommended that the threshold level be lowered to 15 per cent of government funding. Some witnesses suggested that the provincial governing bodies be treated the same way as the national governing bodies; that is, automatically eligible for the rebate. Others went even further, suggesting that all sports organizations be eligible for the rebate and that the rebate be 100 per cent. The charitable status of an organization can be altered by an amendment to the Income Tax Act, which would affect more than its GST status, for an organization to be deemed, for the purposes of GST only, to be a charity. This latter approach would require an amendment to the bill.

Concerning the administration, the rebate for charities and some non-profit organizations apply to GST paid on inputs used to produce exempt services. These organizations must not only keep track of GST charged, they must be able to apportion input taxes. This is a task faced by all producers of goods and services. These organizations may find such accounting tasks particularly revolting.

Concerning registration fees and insurance, registration fees for sporting activities often contain, as a significant component, an insurance premium. Insurance is tax exempt, yet when it is embedded within a taxable registration fee, it is effectively taxed. This is a typical problem with exempt goods and services. If these organizations could segregate insurance from other elements of the taxable fee, it would continue to be exempt. Such a solution might be more costly to administer than it is worth.

I would like now to turn to the issue of small business compliance. A value-added tax can, in many instances, be a relatively inexpensive tax with which to comply.

• (0815)

IX. SMALL BUSINESS COMPLIANCE COSTS

A value added tax can, in many instances, be a relatively inexpensive tax to comply with. Such a tax can also be designed so as to be very difficult to administer and comply with. Some of the VATs in Europe have such a complex design. With a greater number of tax rates and more exempt products, the compliance costs associated with a tax regime can increase dramatically.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business is particularly concerned with this issue, specifically as it affects the small business community. There is a great deal of evidence to suggest that compliance costs weigh more heavily on small businesses than they do on larger firms.

A. Some International Evidence

A recent study of the U.K. VAT shows that overall compliance costs have fallen by about 25% from fiscal year 1977-78 to 1986-87 demonstrating that experience with a taxation system can reduce the costs of compliance. This same study also showed that the costs for the smallest of firms rose over the same period. These very high costs can be offset by making use of the small traders exemption. Nevertheless, small registered traders still face tax related costs (0.78% of taxable sales) which are many times higher than those faced by large traders.

A study of American retail sales taxes shows that average compliance costs differ between states by a factor of almost 2, attributable mostly to differences in the tax base. It is the determination of the tax status of individual items which accounts for the bulk of compliance costs. As a consequence, food and drug retailers face the highest costs. Similarly, compliance costs increase as the taxation base in a state becomes narrower.

These characteristics are consistent with those found in a number of other countries employing consumption taxes.

B. The BTT Alternative

At one point the federal government gave serious consideration to a VAT alternative referred to as the Business Transfer Tax, or BTT. Under such a variant, traders would essentially calculate the difference between sales and purchases, and remit a tax which equals some proportion of that difference. Virtually all sales would be taxed at the same rate.

C. Zero Rating All Sales Between Businesses

In the agricultural sector, a wide variety of transactions are zero rated. Thus traders do not have to collect taxes on sales and apply for credits on purchases. They must keep appropriate records to ensure that required taxes are paid. It has also been suggested that such a rule apply to all non-retail sales between businesses.

Such a mechanism would not reduce paper burden for registered traders, although it would benefit those who suffer a cash flow penalty under the GST. It would also not reduce the number of traders who must collect and remit taxes, since virtually all firms make some sales at the retail level.

D. The Quick Method

The federal government has responded to some small business concerns by offering a quick method of determining the amount of tax these firms must remit to the government, expressed as a percentage of sales for various classes of business. Approximately 800,000 firms should be eligible to use this reporting method.

Firms which stray from the value added norm for their class can benefit, or be disadvantaged by this quick method of accounting. It has also been suggested to the Committee that such accounting rules have not worked successfully in other countries.

E. Dual Tax Regimes

With the GST, Canada would be unique amongst VAT nations by levying two distinct consumption taxes at the retail level. All of the compliance problems which may plague a VAT or the GST are amplified when combined with the existing provincial retail sales taxes.

Business compliance costs would be increased dramatically under such a dual tax regime. The two most costly aspects of complying with a sales tax are the determination of an item's tax status and the determination of the appropriate tax. Each of these tasks must be performed twice under the system which is to be in place in 1991.

The federal government has to date failed in its attempts to integrate its GST with provincial sales taxes.

The government of the province of Quebec has recently announced its intention to integrate with the GST, but this will not likely be done prior to the startup date for the new tax.

The CFIB has suggested a delay in implementing the GST until such time as three or four large provinces are ready to jointly implement a sales tax with the federal government.

X. TAX TREATMENT OF INDIANS

Consistent with Section 87 of the Indian Act, the GST will not apply to purchases made by Indians on the reserve or to purchases off the reserve that are delivered to the reserve.

A number of Indian Groups that came before the Committee took the position that they should be exempt from federal taxation with respect to purchases made both on and off the reserve. This position is based on their interpretation of Section 87 of the Indian Act, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and of individual treaties between the Crown and Indians.

Section 87 of the Indian Act provides an exemption to Indians and Indian bands in regard to: 1) their personal property situated on the reserve; 2) any interest they may have in reserve lands or surrendered lands. Some Indians believe that exemption from all forms of taxation is an aboriginal right and that that was the underlying rationale for section 87 of the Indian Act.

Honourable senators, I fear that my time is up.

Senator Frith: For now.

Senator Kenny: I hope to be back this evening. At that time, perhaps I will have an opportunity to carry on further.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I should like to speak more slowly, I hope, than Senator Kenny, because I know the reporters are getting tired.

I should like to put a few things on the record, because this matter has touched me very deeply. I was going to say that I begrudge granting the denomination of "Honourable Senators" to the other side of this house, but I have had a long association—over 23 years—with many of the people on the other side of this house and I feel I cannot allow one bitter experience to colour my life and their lives.

• (0830)

I am also aware of the fact that a number of people on the other side are as disgusted as I am with what has gone on. One of them has told me that he wished that he had the guts to withstand the pressures that are being brought to bear by his leadership. I cannot really understand a person like Senator Lowell Murray trying to justify what has been done in the house in the name of the GST.

There is no doubt about there being a conspiracy, a long-term plan. All one has to do is go over what has happened in the last few weeks to realize the extent of that conspiracy. We go back to Mr. Wilson's braggadocio about how he would ensure that Bill C-62 passed the Senate because he had a few tricks up his sleeve. Then we go on to Senator Ottenheimer's magnificent foundation that he built on the question of privilege, which ended up being a mirage. However, he sucked us in. He sucked the Deputy Leader of the Opposition into believing, or accepting for the moment, that that was the way in which matters of privilege should be dealt in this house. Of course, as soon as someone read the rules and realized that it was not the way in which this house handled matters of privilege, the Speaker disallowed the privileged matters on the other side and used that ruling to disallow their privilege on this side, which, of course, led to the motion to adjourn the house.

Then the bells were turned on. The Speaker then, on his own, without any authorization of any kind, and without notification to anyone, turned off the bells. When anyone inquired, it was made clear "Well, we are obviously not coming back for the weekend, so I thought it was better to turn off the bells and leave them off during the weekend so as not to bother the staff."

Senator Murray: Do you disagree with that?

Senator Stanbury: I disapprove of the clear conspiracy that was involved.

Senator Murray: Do you think that the staff should have sat here all weekend and listened to the assault while you were in Toronto?

Senator Stanbury: I wish you would keep your remarks to yourself while I am speaking. I agreed with turning the bells off. I thought that it was a very reasonable thing—

Senator Murray: Good, I hope that is on the record.

Senator Stanbury: —to turn off the bells at that time. However, when the bells were turned off the last time, I assumed that it was for that reason.

Senator Murray: Were you on your way to Toronto then?

Senator Thompson: No. Certainly I was sitting in my office and I never received a call to come here. I was right in my office.

Senator Murray: You are here, are you?

Senator Thompson: Yes, I am here. You bet I am here.

Senator Austin: Don't get personal.

Senator Stanbury: Why should I continue to talk when several other people are talking? I simply tell you that the conspiracy was an evil one. It began with Mr. Wilson and probably even before that. When I saw the government leader pull the original letter, supposedly the Speaker's letter, out of his file to confirm that there was a French version, I realized that probably the whole thing had been cooked up before Mr. Wilson made his little speech.

Of course, this last week the bells were stopped for a different reason. They were stopped for the purpose of denying the opposition a vote. They were stopped because of a conspiracy between the Speaker and the government whip and the government leader. There was no practical notice of the resumption of events. The doors were locked earlier than the notice provided and the whole matter was a long-term plan, a plan of conspiracy which had evil intent from the beginning. There is clear evidence of a conspiracy in the disclosure by Senator Pitfield of his pre-warning of the lockout. So I do not think that anyone should doubt what was behind that whole event. It was quite a stupid tactic because, by that time, if you intended to allow the illegals or the "swamp" senators, or whatever you want to call them, to vote, then you had the majority anyway. So why did you not let us come back in, then force a vote and defeat us? I do not understand. Instead, you play dirty games and we end up with a bitterness in this house that will be difficult to eradicate. The only reason I believe that we can get rid of that bitterness is that I am aware of the kind of pressure that senators on the other side are experiencing, as I have had it expressed to me. I sympathize with them, and the kind of pressures those honourable senators are experiencing should not be suffered by any human being.

All of this was done in honour of a piece of legislation, the goods and services tax bill. The Conference Board of Canada tells us that it will drive us deeper into recession, will cause greater inflation and will punish the entire population of Canada. It involves a huge increase in the cost of living to the poor and the lower middle income people, and it is a punishment that should not be inflicted upon the people of Canada at a time of recession. It is a "made in Canada recession." The experts say that this recession is the result of policies of the Canadian Government, and for the government to inflict another punishment upon the people of Canada is just unthinkable.

We are doing the government a favour by delaying the implementation of this tax, because I believe that by now the government knows that it would be disastrous to begin the implementation of it on January 1. They are going to have to back away and they will not put it into force until at least June 1991. Perhaps we are being used as the tool to supply the excuse to delay the implementation of the tax. We know perfectly well that it will be disastrous when it is implemented, particularly if it is done in the middle of a recession. If it were a tax that the government had talked about, there might be some excuse. The government mentioned in the course of its original mandate that it would look at tax reform. It went ahead with phase one, the good side of tax reform, and then it said that after the election it would go ahead with the other side of tax reform. Of course, everyone knew what that would be, but people did not know that it would be the kind of thing that it is. The first time they talked about—

Senator Carney: Order please.

Senator Stanbury: Do you have a question?

Senator Carney: I am wondering whether you are still speaking to this question of privilege or whether you are debating the matter of the tax?

Senator Stanbury: I am speaking—

Senator Carney: If you would like to move to the debate, we are ready to do that.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Stanbury: —to the question of privilege, and I would appreciate not being interrupted.

Senator Carney: I would also ask you to refer to rule 28, since you are making a point that the rules have been broken.

Senator Stanbury: I am doing exactly that and I—

Senator Carney: You have made the point—

Senator Stanbury: All right, go ahead and speak.

Senator Carney: You are charging the Conservatives with breaking the rules.

Senator Thériault: Have you finally decided to read the rules?

Senator Carney: Rule 28 says:

> A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of the senator's speech in which the senator may have been misunderstood, and then that matter shall not introduce new matter.

I understand that you have already spoken about four times on this subject. I suggest that you refer to the rules and try to follow them.

Senator Stanbury: In the first place, I have not spoken before on this matter of privilege. Secondly, your reading of the rules is quite wrong. There is a clear provision which says that on matters of privilege senators are entitled to speak as many times as they wish. We have been following that practice. A number of senators have spoken two and three times, and that is provided for in the rules. So please let me speak, and you can bring up your procedural matters later.

Senator Carney: Would you care to have me read the rule again?

Senator Stanbury: Please, I am in the middle of my speech, although I am willing to entertain questions.

Senator Carney: You are breaking the rules of the Senate.

Senator Stanbury: This is my first speech.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please. I understand that a point has been raised, and I wish to dispose of it.

Senator Molgat: No, absolutely not!

Senator Murray: The Speaker is on his feet. Sit down!

Senator Molgat: I am sorry. I do not intend to—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: There is no rule that precludes the honourable gentleman from speaking.

Senator Molgat: We are already speaking on a question of privilege—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: So the honourable gentleman has the floor.

Senator Molgat: He has the floor.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: That is exactly what I said.

Senator Stanbury: I intend to continue to speak.

Senator Molgat: Pay no attention to them.

Senator Stanbury: I want you to know about the kind of people whose rights and privileges you have destroyed in this action of the Speaker. If honourable senators wish to follow me, they will see that I am reading from the Canadian Parliamentary Guide, the spring edition of 1990. One of the members you have offended is the Honourable Willie Adams from the Northwest Territories. He was born June 22, 1934 in Fort Chimo, Quebec of Lizzie Adams at the Chimo Mission Schools where he was educated. He has 10 children -Mary Jane, Jesse, Harry, David, who was deceased in September 1983, Jimmy, Christine, Willie, Lizzy, Victoria and Isaac. He is an electrician, a member of a group that will be hit the most by the GST. As to his legislative career, he was summoned to the Senate on April 5, 1977. He was a member of the Northwest Territories Council from 1970 to 1974.

In his private career, he is a small business man. He is the owner of Kudlik Electric Ltd. and Kudlik Construction Ltd. at Rankin Inlet in the Northwest Territories. He is also the president of Polar Bear Cave Investments Ltd., and Director of Noble Peak Resources Ltd. His party is Liberal, his religion is Anglican.

Now, Senator Willie Adams is a perfect example of the kind of individual whose rights and privileges you have taken the liberty of destroying in this place.

Perhaps at another end of the scale, you have the Honourable Jacob (Jack) Austin, P.C., Q.C., B.A., LL.B., LL.M., Doctor of Social Sciences (Honourary). He is from Vancouver South, was born March 2, 1933, in Calgary, Alberta, and is the son of Morris Austin and Clara Edith Chetner. He was educated at the University of British Columbia, Harvard Law School, and the University of California at Berkeley. He was married on February 4, 1978 to Natalie Veiner Freeman, daughter of Harry Veiner, and he has three children: Edith Clare, Sharon Jill and Barbara Joan. He is a lawyer.

As to his legislative career, he was a candidate in the general election of 1965, sworn to the Privy Council on September 22, 1981, and was summoned to the Senate on August 19, 1975. He was appointed Minister of State on September 22, 1982, and was Minister of State for Social Development from 1982 to 1984.

In his private career, he was called the B.C. Bar in 1955, to the Yukon Bar in 1966, and was Associate Professor of Law at the University of British Columbia in 1955. He was a partner with Nemetz, Austin and Co., with the great Mr. Justice Nemetz. That was in Vancouver in 1958. He had his own firm in Vancouver in 1966 and was a partner in the firm of Andrews, Swinton, Margach, Austin & Williams in 1966, and was also Associate Counsel at Swinton & Co. He was Executive Assistant to the Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources in 1963 and Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources from 1970 to 1974. He was President of Giant Mascot Mines Ltd. in 1968, Brameda Resources in 1970, and International Division, Bank of B.C. from January 1985 to November 1985. He was appointed Q.C. in 1970. He is a member of the University Club of Vancouver, the Canadian Club in New York, the Rideau Club in Ottawa and Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa. His part is Liberal and his religion is Hewish.

Now, honourable senators, that is a very different background from that of Willie Adams, but his rights and privileges are just as important as those of Willie Adams.

Then, if you want a different kind of example, we can go to the Honourable Mark Lorne Bonnell, M.D., C.M., L.M.C.C.

Senator Murray: It takes all kinds.

Senator Stanbury: He is from Murray River, Prince Edward Island. He was born at Hopefield, P.E.I., the son of Mr. and Mrs. H.G.H. Bonnell, and he was educated at Prince of Wales Collegiate, Charlottetown, and Dalhousie University. He was married on July 6, 1949, to Ruby, now deceased, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Jardine of Charlottetown, P.E.I. He has two children: Mark Lorne and Linda Florence. He is a physician.

As to his legislative career, he was first elected to the P.E.I. Legislature in the general election of 1951. He was reelected in the general elections of 1955, 1959, 1962, 1966, and 1970. He was appointed Minister of Health from 1955 to 1959, was the Liberal House Leader in 1965 and was Acting Leader of the Prince Edward Island Liberal Party in 1965. He was Minister of Welfare from 1966 to 1970, Minister of Tourist Development from 1966 to 1971, and Minister Responsible for Housing from 1970 to 1971. He was summoned to the Senate on November 15, 1971, by the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau.

• (0845)

He has a private career as President of King's County Medical Centre, member of the King's County Memorial Hospital Medical Staff, President of Hamon Enterprises, Mayfair Theatre Corp. and Island Cablevision Ltd. He is an honorary member of the P.E.I. Tourist Association, a member of the Prince Edward Island Medical Society and the Canadian Medical Society. He was Past Master of St. Andrew's Lodge and Pilae Temple in Halifax.

His party is Liberal, and his religion is Presbyterian.

Now, we have had one senator from the North, one from Vancouver and one from Charlottetown, with entirely different backgrounds. Senator Bonnell's background is that of a medical doctor and as a provincial politician of great experience. Those are the people over whom you are prepared to ride roughshod in destroying their rights and offending their privileges.

There is now another kind of person in Canada, the Honourable Peter Bosa. He has described the riding he represents as York-Caboto. I realize that half of the caucus on the other side has been here for only a few weeks, but those of us who have been here for any length of time know that Peter Bosa has had an ongoing argument with the rest of English-speaking and French-speaking Canada concerning the name of that great explorer whom we call, in English, John Cabot, and whom the French-speaking Canadians call Jean Cabot, but whose real name was Giovanni Caboto. The honourable Peter Bosa has made a point of emphasizing that name by putting it into his designation as a senator. So his designation as a senator is York-Caboto.

He was born May 2, 1927, in Friuli, Italy, son of Antonio Bosa and Angela Moro. He came to Canada in 1949. He was educated at the University of Toronto, and was married on July 20, 1968, to Teresa, daughter of Alessandro and Concette Patullo.

Senator Cools: You speak good Italian.

Senator Stanbury: I hope I do not offend anyone's particular culture because I do not know the proper pronunciation of some of these names. He was married at Boiano, Italy, and has two children: Angela and Mark. He is a businessman.

As to his legislative career, he was summoned to the Senate on April 5, 1977, and was a member of the Special Senate Committee on Constitutional Reform. That was a committee which I chaired, and which dealt with Bill C-60. The committee also went on to discuss the possible reform of the Senate and what might be done within the federal government to reform the Senate. We made a long list of those matters, none of which was ever taken up by federal governments, either Liberal or Conservative. I think that those who speak about the need for Senate reform should understand that the people who have been most anxious to reform the Senate, in order to increase its credibility, have been the senators who are already here, on both sides of the House. We have made great efforts to persuade our governments, both provincial and federal, as to methods that could be used to reform the Senate, up to and including an elected Senate, and different ways of doing the voting for an elected Senate. However, noone has paid any attention.

I recall that when Mr. Horsman of Alberta was making a speech in Toronto about the "Triple E" Senate, I was invited to the event, and also to a reception afterwards to chat with him about it. Of course, as he made his speech, and in our discussions afterwards, his whole line of approach was that "You senators are resisting reform. You are a terrible bunch of doughheads and greybeards"–

Senator Cools: Not I.

Senator Stanbury: —who are resisting reform. I presented him with four speeches I have made in the Senate since 1968 on Senate reform. Senator Fairbairn has been kind enough to give me a few of the studies, which point to what the Senate has done to try to persuade those who have the power to reform the Senate to so reform it. Why, once, only a few years ago, we had a Prime Minister who bravely started off with a resolution of the House of Commons to abolish the Senate; but he did not get anywhere with it. He did not take it anywhere. He did not follow through.

There have been, I would suggest, thousands of initiatives undertaken over the years to reform the Senate, and many of them have come from the Senate itself. However, as we all know in this country, the Senate is not in a position to reform itself. It is governments, federal and provincial, who may reform it. They find it almost impossible—well, impossible so far—to get together to think of a way of doing it; and there is a fairly good reason why that is so.

The reason is that no one wants to share power. The Senate has been seen as being powerless, and if there is to be a Senate that is effective, elected or equal, then the Senate will, of course, have power. It cannot be otherwise. It will have a political base. It will have people to represent, and it will be obliged to take part in the national debates.

Now, who is going to give up a piece of power so that the Senate can have that power? Provincial premiers have come to believe that they alone speak for their provinces. They do not even admit that the Members of the House of Commons, elected from their province, speak for their province. They certainly do not admit that the present senators who are appointed from their provinces speak for their province, so why would you think that the provincial premiers would ever give up any power to an elected Senate, or any kind of Senate, to speak for the regions or the provinces.

Why do you think the Prime Minister would want to give up to the Senate any of the power which he wields by reason of what we now have as an electoral dictatorship? The Prime Minister is not elected—he is elected in his own little Baie Comeau, or some place—but is appointed leader of the party by the delegates of his party. It is a very narrow group of perhaps 2500 people who get together in a coffee klatch and decide who the leader is going to be.

Because he becomes the leader, that elevates him into becoming the Prime Minister if the party wins that election. It has nothing to do with his being popularly elected by the people of Canada. He is appointed by his party to be their leader and then there is an election where a number of Members of Parliament are elected and if he is lucky he gets a majority. That is wonderful, except that from then on the majority in the House of Commons are his prisoners. He is the one who decides whether they become the chairman of a committee, whether they take a trip to Zululand, whether they become a cabinet minister, a parliamentary secretary, or anything. It is the Prime Minister who decides whether they get any recognition at all.

When he states that he wants to pass the GST without any changes and without any discussion, and that this is what he is going to do, and it will be his way or no way, what do the members of his party in the House of Commons do? Of course, they do what he asks them to do. If they do not, as two of them did not, they get kicked out of the party. It is a marvelous system. Talk about power. He is the one who advises the Governor General, the one who appoints cabinet and decides whether people are in or out of the cabinet, who controls the House of Commons and decides what pieces of legislation will go through and what will not. He is the one who has complete control of the system that we call democracy.

Are there any checks and balances in that system? I had always believed that we did have checks and balances in the system. As a matter of fact, our democratic system is not only the Prime Minister, the cabinet and the House of Commons. Our democratic system involves a constitutional monarchy with many elements. The Queen is the Head of State and, under a constitutional monarchy, takes her advice from her representative, who is the Governor General. He is not now appointed by Her Majesty, but he was back in the days of Section 26. Now the Prime Minister appoints the Governor General. So the Prime Minister also has control over him, and we have had evidence of that in the last little while in the implementation of Section 26. The Governor General did not ask for any other advice. He just took the Prime Minister's advice that there was a deadlock in Parliament that had to be resolved, and therefore the Prime Minister would have to appoint eight more senators. Why was it not four? Did he ever consider whether four would be sufficient, or whether it was necessary to appoint eight? Did he ever consider the question of whether or not there was a deadlock, or did he just take the advice of the Prime Minister that that was the situation?

The Governor General has a responsibility to the Canadian people. He failed to exercise it in this case; but it is another example of the kind of pressure that the Prime Minister is prepared to bring on people to do his will.

I have talked a little about the constitutional monarchy, about the Queen as Head of State, and the appointment of the Governor General. We are willing to trust the Governor General to do something very important, but he is appointed. We then go down the list to the Prime Minister, and he is appointed by the delegates of his party. We then we go down to the cabinet, and they are all appointed by the Prime Minister. There is one little group that gets elected, and they are in the House of Commons. However, they have no control over anything, because the Prime Minister has them in his pocket and he controls them.

Now we begin to see whether there are some checks and balances in our system. There had better be, if you put a guy like that in power.

Suppose, at the last election, the Prime Minister had stated—which might have been normal for him to say—that we were going to improve our relationship with the United States. Then let us suppose that about the same time that he introduced the GST he had tried to put into effect an act to say that we were going to join the United States. He could say that he had discussed that measure during the election campaign. However, who is to stop him from having us join the United States? Where are there any checks or balances in our system? There are certainly no checks and balances down to and including the majority in the House of Commons.

We now come to a body such as the Senate, which has power under the Constitution. If one were to say that the Fathers of Confederation, or their British peers at that time, foresaw the possibility of a deadlock in government, one could also say that he foresaw an elected government doing some heinous act which somebody had to control, and that "somebody" was the Senate, and it was given the power to control it. It was given the power to pass, amend or reject legislation, and that is what we are doing here. An institution such as this has to do it when there is a situation where a thoroughly-hated government throughout the country tries to pass a thoroughly-hated piece of legislation. There are many reasons why that legislation is hated throughout the country. It will exacerbate our recession, which is a good reason right now, but, in addition to that, it will be regressive and will increase by 60 per cent the cost of living of lower- and middle class Canadians. It will reduce the cost of living of the upper class by about 6.5 per cent.

I will not make a speech on the GST now, because it will take a long time to explain all of the difficulties associated with the tax. However, the fact is that it is a bad bill, and I cannot understand why the Prime Minister would expend his good will—such as he had before this started—so lavishly and negligently on a lousy bill, instead of re-writing the bill and getting it into a condition where some of these terrible effects might be overcome.

The members of the Senate are appointed, and the Prime Minister says that we are an undemocratic, anti-democratic group of people and that he or the House of Commons, which he controls, are the "be-all and end-all" of our democracy. Of course, he has no understanding of the Canadian Constitution. He showed that a little while ago, as did the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He has no idea of the constitutional history of Canada or the impact of constitutional change in Canada. He does not understand that we do not have a government which has a "be-all and end-all" Prime Minister and a "be-all and end-all House of Commons", that we have a democratic system which is made up of many parts.

It is not only the Senate that has the opportunity, when necessary—and this is a necessary time—to block something ridiculous that the government wants to do. There is another check or balance, and that is the Supreme Court of Canada.

Here is a Prime Minister who has gone to all the trouble of using his pressure to get the Governor General to make these eight appointments, but he will not even submit the question to the Supreme Court of Canada, which is one of our few clear checks and balances on the power of government. He makes us bring an action, which we have to bring in a lower court because only the government can bring it to the Supreme Court of Canada. At the private cost of individuals, other governments, other senators, this matter has gone before the courts. However, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Government in the Senate state that we must not wait for the courts to decide. They are willing to go ahead and make decisions that will affect the life and welfare of every Canadian without waiting to find out whether the people who are going to vote on it have any right to vote.

That is all the respect we have for the one check or balance which Canadians generally accept as being available in such a circumstance.

A government cannot be allowed to continue to operate in this way. When we have a dictatorship of this kind, we really must do something to curb its ambition and its ridiculous stubborness, where it says, "It must be our way or no way".

Perhaps one could say that is the end of it, that we do not have any more checks and balances. We do have. Our system is much more multifaceted than the Prime Minister suggests, when he says, "If I, as Prime Minister, and the elected House of Commons, say it has to be done, it must be done and nobody can stand in the way".

There are many parts to our system, and the only little slice of it that is elected is the House of Commons. Everyone else is appointed. There is the Auditor General who protects Canadians from their government; there is the Chief Electoral Officer who protects Canadians from their Members of Parliament; there is the Privacy Commissioner, with whom we have had a little controversy lately, whose job it is to protect Canadians against their government and against each other; there is the Information Commissioner who has similar responsibilities; and there is the Human Rights Commission, which has the responsibility to protect us against our government and against each other. There are many agencies which we have found necessary to build up around that slim electoral group that is controlled by a single person, the Prime Minister, to protect ourselves under our Constitution so that we are not subjected to this kind of dictatorial action, the effects of which we are now feeling.

It is the same with all dictators. When they get desperate enough, they will do anything. They will break the rules and do anything that comes into their heads. I expect there will be a lot more dirty tricks. I know it is not the individuals within the group, because I know many of them well enough to know that they would never submit to this sort of thing if they were not under tremendous pressure to do so. The fact is that when dictatorial people become desperate, they will do anything. That is what they did last Thursday, or whatever day it was when they decided that they were going to run roughshod over the rules.

● (0900)

Senator Murray: This is still Tuesday, by the way.

Senator Stanbury: What day is it?

Senator Murray: This is Tuesday.

Senator Stanbury: I have lost track of time.

Senator Murray: That is obvious.

Senator Stanbury: I have not lost track of what you did to us, and that is the important thing.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Stanbury: You know you did it to us, and you know you planned to do it to us. All I am saying is that these are desperate measures, which we understand, because when a dictator decides that he is going to do something, come hell or high water he does it, and he does not—and I do not normally use these terms—give a damn who gets injured in the way, and that includes the Canadian people.

Senator Barootes: You must be talking about Trudeau.

Senator Stanbury: You talk about Mr. Trudeau. I will go for your bait to the extent of saying that at least Mr. Trudeau referred matters to the courts and then observed what the courts had to say. I was interrupted at the point where I was telling honourable senators about some of the people whose rights and privileges have been offended. When I say offended, I mean offended. I am offended. I find that I am heart-sore for Canada: that there are people in government in Canada who do this ridiculous sort of thing. I was introducing to honourable senators the members whose rights you have destroyed and whose privileges you have offended.

Senator Comeau: Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Stanbury: Would you like to ask one?

Senator Comeau: Yes.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 9, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 97D.]

THE HON. JEAN CHRÉTIEN

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators the presence in our gallery of a great Canadian.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): A great Canadian, whom I join with other honourable senators in welcoming to the gallery. This is the second time in a few days that he has been here. My only comment must be that he is either underemployed or excessively confident about the outcome of the byelection in Beauséjour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

THE SENATE

Senator Stanbury: The Hon. Senator Comeau has a question for me.

Senator Comeau: I was in the Chamber earlier this morning and I heard an honourable senator from the opposite side recite word for word very slowly the Buckwold bathroom report. I was wondering, since you are now reading a bunch of biographies, if you would not like to read the telephone book. It might be more interesting.

Senator Austin: You have not been following the debate. You have no idea about what he is saying.

Senator Stanbury: The honourable senator is very kind to point out what I am doing. I am doing it very carefully because, as you will notice, I have not found any senator on that side whose rights have been abolished or whose privileges have been offended. I am only assuming that they have the right to say whether or not their rights have been destroyed. As far as I am concerned, there are those whose rights have clearly been destroyed and whose privileges have been offended. I have selected very carefully the names of the people I have mentioned. If I had wanted to read the telephone book, as the honourable senator suggests, then I might as well have read the whole page from the guide that I am reading. I read one paragraph, which is at the top of the page, and I then went to another page to give another example.

Senator Comeau: Then why do you not read it in French.

Senator Stanbury: If you want me to take the time, I will read it in both official languages.

Senator Comeau: You might as well.

Senator Stanbury: What I was reading was the description of the Hon. Willie Adams, who is from the far north and who is one of our finest senators. When I read his background and what he has done in life in those far reaches of the north, I referred him to honourable senators as being the kind of person whose privileges had been destroyed in this ridiculous action. It is such a stupid thing to have done that I cannot understand why it was done in the first place. However, you did it, and because you did this stupid thing, you have caused no end of bitterness. It was unnecessary. You could have defeated us in a vote. There was no need at all for you to exclude us from the house. The trouble is that it was a long-range plan, something which had been planned for over two weeks. You did not have any flexibility to cancel it when it went wrong.

I have already described the Hon. Willie Adams. You all know him. You know that he is a fine Canadian, and that he is offended by what you have done.

I then went on to discuss the Hon. Jack Austin. I read his biography because, from an entirely different standpoint—that of the world of business and the federal government—he is unique in this house.

I passed over Staff Barootes. I guess that is reasonable.

Senator Cools: He is difficult to pass over.

Senator Stanbury: I then came to Peter Bosa. I spoke about the multicultural nature of Canada and of Peter Bosa as a representative thereof. I spoke of the fact that he served at the municipal level of government, at the staff level in the federal government and in the Senate of Canada for many years. Again, honourable senators know the type of person he is. They know of his excellent character and integrity. I cannot imagine how they could stomach the destruction of his rights and privileges.

I am now passing over some pages. However, if you would like me to read them all, I shall be glad to do so.

I spoke about the Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, who has a great history both in the medical profession in Prince Edward Island and in provincial politics; and I was about to introduce to you the Hon. Sidney Buckwold, whom we all know is one of the brightest lights in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Senator Stanbury: Sidney Buckwold, B.Comm. from Saskatoon, born on November 3, 1916 in Winnipeg.

Senator Comeau: May I ask you a question?

Senator Stanbury: Yes.

Senator Comeau: You were saying that your privileges had been offended when the bells rang and you were not able to make it for the vote.

Senator Stanbury: I was not told about it.

Senator Comeau: Could you tell me where you were at the time the bells were ringing?

Senator Stanbury: Yes, I was on my way—

Senator Murray: To Toronto.

Senator Stanbury: No, I was not on my way to Toronto. I was on my way to my hotel.

One thing I will tell the Hon. Leader of the Government is that he has not caught on at all. We agreed to stay here for the weekend. We were ready to do whatever we had to do during the weekend. There was a complete lockout without notice.

Senator Comeau: I have a second question. Since the rest of the senators of your party were at the caucus and, as Senator Frith stated, as reported in the Debates of the Senate, "We were in caucus trying to decide . . . ." how come you were not invited to that caucus?

Senator Stanbury: I was in the caucus, not that it is any of your business. I was in the caucus until it adjourned at about 4:30 p.m. or 4:35 p.m. We were to reconvene later. I decided that I had to get over to the hotel to rearrange for my rooms. Thus, I left to walk over to the hotel.

I entered the hotel, turned on the television to Newsworld, and immediately heard that the vote had been taken. I immediately got dressed and returned to the Senate. I arrived in time to hear Senator Frith begin this motion with respect to privilege.

Senator Comeau: I have one last question. I will read the statement made by your Deputy Leader. He said, "We do not know. I hope that some day the Senate investigates this blatant breach of privilege and find out the time the bells started to ring. I can tell you what happened with us. We were in caucus trying to decide".

Senator Grafstein: As a new senator, when did you know that the vote would be taken? He is a new senator. Let him tell us when he first knew that there was going to be a vote in the House at 5:30.

Senator Comeau: My whip told me.

Senator Grafstein: When were you told? At what time were you told? Was it before five o'clock?

Senator Comeau: At 5:15 or so. The bells were ringing and I was outside the chamber.

Senator Grafstein: When were you told, at what time?

Senator Comeau: When the bells are ringing, senators are being called for a vote. When the bells ring, I come into the anteroom and wait for the vote to be taken.

Senator Grafstein: Were you told before five o'clock?

Senator Thériault: Did you do that previous weekend?

[Senator Comeau.]

Senator Comeau: The bells ring, I know the bells are ringing, and I am here to vote. I do not listen to a whip who tells me to go away.

Senator Thériault: So you spent the weekend before in the anteroom waiting for the vote.

Senator Comeau: We knew you people were gone by then. You had told us that you were going.

Senator Grafstein: Then you called the vote. You knew we were gone and yet you called the vote.

Senator Cools: He communicated with the gods.

Senator Comeau: You can't take a question, can you. You can't take the heat.

Senator Stanbury: All you are doing is confirming that you waited until you thought that we had all left for home before calling the vote and then locked us out to be sure that we could not get in, even if we had not gone home. You then found out that we had not gone home, because we all turned up in the house. Anyone who suggests we did not—

• (0915)

An Hon. Senator: And they held it five minutes early.

Senator Stanbury: And you held it five minutes early to be sure we were not here. Of all the dirty tricks. This is not just a dirty trick, it is a parliamentary crime. If we had the means to lay criminal charges, that is what we would do. In civil life, this would be a crime.

I would like to introduce the Honourable Sidney Buckwold. He was born on November 3, 1916 in Winnipeg.

Senator Cools: He is a young man.

Senator Stanbury: He is the son of Harry Buckwold and Dorothy Freedman. He was educated at the University of Saskatchewan and McGill University. He was married on September 17, 1939 to Clarice Rabinovitch, daughter of Samuel Rabinovitch, Regina, Saskatchewan. He has three children: Jay, Judith and Linda. Clarice has been here a great deal to support Sidney.

As to his legislative career, he was a candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1963 and the byelection of 1964. He was summoned to the Senate on November 4, 1971 by the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau. He was government whip in the Senate from 1973 to 1974. He is Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and was Vice-Chairman of the National Liberal Caucus, 1979-80.

As to his private career, on graduation, Sidney Buckwold entered Buckwold's Ltd., a family business. He was alderman of the City of Saskatoon from 1953 to 1957 and mayor from 1958 to 1963 and from 1967 to 1971. He is a member of the University of Saskatchewan Senate and is on the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation and Western Development Museum. He is the chairman of St. Paul's Hospital Advisory Board and is on the board of directors of the Alvin Buckwold Mental Retardation Unit. He is President of the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association and the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. He is the Western Vice-President of the Zionist Organization of Canada. He served on the National Productivity Council from 1962 to 1963, and as an officer in R.C.A.S.C. from 1942 to 1945. He was named Saskatchewan Salesman of the Year in 1971 and, also in 1971, Saskatoon Citizen of the Year. He is the Hon. Colonel, North Saskatchewan Regiment. He is a member of the Liberal Party, and his religion is Jewish. What an outstanding Canadian. Think of the abuse you have given him over the last couple of weeks.

Senator Cools: He is an outstanding Canadian. His community is very proud of him.

Senator Stanbury: I hear that one of Senator Buckwold's gremlins, Senator Murray's assistant, is sitting in the Press Gallery. I am not sure that he understands it is a "press" gallery. However, from what I have heard he has done over the last few months in the way of harassment of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I am not surprised. He has left now. He had the decency at least to listen.

I should now like to move to another example of a great Canadian with a different background. She happens to be sitting beside me now—the Honourable Anne Clare Cools. She was born on August 12, 1943 in Barbados, British West Indies. She is the daughter of Lucius Unique Cools and Rosita Gordon Miller. She was education at Queen's College, Barbados and McGill University. She was married March 23, 1986 to Stuart Rolf Calhoun. She is a social worker, which again is a different level in our society.

As to her legislative career, she was a candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1980. She was summoned to the Senate January 13, 1984 by the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau.

As to her private career, she was a member of the National Parole Board from 1980 to 1984. She is an Executive Director of Women In Transition Inc., Toronto, a United Way member agency. She is a Founding Vice-Chairman and member of the Executive Committee of the Justice Committee on Spousal Abuse. She was a field instructor, Faculty of Social Work, University of Toronto, from 1977 to 1978; Social Service Departments, Seneca College, from 1977 to 1980, and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, Toronto, from 1978 to 1980. She is a member of the Board of Directors of the Pauline McGibbon Cultural Centre, Social Planning Council of Metro Toronto and Advisory Council Family Mediation. She is a Canadian member of the Empire Club of Canada and the Royal Commonwealth Society of Canada. Her party is Liberal.

I should like to pay tribute to Senator Cools. When you look at the kind of humane and human service that she has rendered to the people of Canada throughout her life, we can be most honoured that we have her here as a member of the Senate.

There is another group of people who should be mentioned, one of whom is represented by the Honourable Eymard Georges Corbin. Senator Corbin comes from Grand-Sault. He was born on August 2, 1934 in Grand Falls, New Brunswick. He is the son of Georges Jules Corbin, deceased, and Marianne Bard. He was educated at the University of Sacré-Coeur, Bathurst, Coll. St. Louis, Edmunston and Séminaires des Eudistes, Charlesbourg, Quebec. He was married on July 31, 1965 to Yvette Michaud of Drummond, New Brunswick. He has three children: Sylvie, Louise and Isabelle. He is a teacher and journalist.

Regarding his legislative career, he was first elected to the House of Commons in the general election of 1968, and was re-elected in the general elections of 1972, 1974, 1979 and 1980. He was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, 1970, and to the Minister of the Environment, 1971 to 1972. He was the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees, 1982 and Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, 1984. He co-chaired the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages from 1980 to 1982. He was summoned to the Senate on July 9, 1984 by the Right Honourable J. Turner. He chairs the Senate Liberal Caucus, and chaired the National Liberal Caucus from 1974 to 1975 and the Atlantic Provincial Liberal Caucus from 1975 to 1976. He was a delegate to the International Parliamentary Conference on the Environment in Bonn in June, 1971 and the United Nations Conference on the World Environment, Stockholm, 1972. He is an associate of Internationale des Parliaments Langue française, and was President of the Canadian Section from 1978 to 1981 and International President from 1978 to 1982.

As to his private career, he was a teacher in Grand Falls from 1957 to 1959. He was the Information Officer, Department of Youth, New Brunswick from 1961 to 1962 and the Assistant Director from 1963 to 1964. He was a journalist for l'Évangeline, Moncton, 1962 to 1963, and a broadcaster for CBC and CBZ in Fredericton and CBD in Saint John, New Brunswick, from 1964 to 1966. He was editor of Le Madawaska, Edmunston, from 1967 to 1968. He is Commander of the Ordre National du Lion du Sénégal and Ordre de la pléiade. His party is Liberal.

That, again, is an example of a great Canadian who has joined us in the Senate more recently and who has fulfilled a tremendous role, not only in his community but in the Parliament of Canada and in the Senate of Canada.

The whole range of democratic institutions that I previously mentioned, which make up our democracy, was designed carefully by the Fathers of Confederation and the statesmen who have adapted the Constitution since that time and created our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It was never intended that an elected House of Commons, controlled by a dictatorial Prime Minister, should have the exclusive rights of looking after the welfare of the people of Canada. That was never the intention of the Fathers of Confederation or they would not have written the Constitution that they did. It was clearly designed to provide some checks and balances.

In an extreme case, such as we have now, the only check or balance that is left is the Canadian Senate.

The system has so many elements, and almost all of them are appointed. That does not make them undemocratic. They are appointed by the people who have been elected. To make it less than a dictatorship, the Prime Minister of the day makes appointments to the Senate which seem right to him at the time. The next Prime Minister makes another group of appointments, and so on. Nearly half of the Tory caucus has been appointed all at once within the last few weeks. But the Prime Minister of the day makes those appointments under our present system.

It was the intent of the Fathers of Confederation that all of the senators would not be appointed by the same Prime Minister and become a rubber stamp like the majority of the House of Commons. Our whole purpose is to apply our judgment. We have applied our judgment on some 300 pieces of legislation which have passed through this place since the Conservative government began.

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Stanbury: Yes.

Senator Molgat: I know he is a distinguished member of the legal fraternity. In the United States, quite a number of the judges are elected. This is a matter of some controversy.

You are speaking now about the numbers of Canadians who hold appointed position and yet have very important roles in the whole system. Has the legal fraternity in Canada looked at the question of electing judges in the country? Is it an issue within your group? Have there been studies in this regard?

• (0930)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, before Senator Stanbury replies to that question, may I, on a point of order, remind honourable senators that they must speak from their seats. My honourable friend is sitting in Senator MacEachen's seat—

Senator Doody: Naked ambition.

Senator Murray: —and if Senator Molgat wishes to intervene he should return to his own seat.

Senator Molgat: I will be glad to do that, and I recognize the point raised. I was carried away by the oratory of my honourable friend—

Senator Murray: I appreciate that.

Senator Molgat: —and I have transgressed the rules in that regard. I noted Senator Doody's comment, and ambition has always been a reasonable pursuit and not unknown in political circles.

Senator Doody: But rarely do we see such a display.

Senator Molgat: I presume that I can remain in this seat as long as I do not speak.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think that the rule would be that the honourable senator may remain where he is but that he cannot be recognized or speak from there.

Senator Molgat: Fair game; I agree.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Stanbury: Thank you for the question, Senator Molgat. I am not the right person to answer your question because for about 23 years I have not been actively engaged in the practice of law or in legal organizations. I am sure there are those on the other side, and on our side, who could answer more accurately questions on what the Canadian Bar Association has discussed on the matter of elected office. I can say, however, that I have never detected among Canadians any desire to have elected judges, and I think that is because of the same principle I was discussing. We are all aware that no one Prime Minister names all the judges or civil servants. We depend for 99.04 per cent of our wellbeing on appointed people, but they are appointed over the years by different Prime Ministers and by different orders in council. The reason we have always had a reasonable balance and have accepted the judgment of these people is because it is understood that they have been non-partisan, that they have tried to be objective in their judgments. One of the saddest things for me in the Senate has been the change from the days when we were really non—partisan, when we sat together in committees and we worked together.

The initiatives for amendments came as often from those on the other side of the house as from our side, and we frequently made unanimous recommendations to ministers which frequently were accepted—until the change of government in 1984, when things began to fall apart and when government supporters began to say, "It must be our way or no way." Even with that, we have managed to process over 300 pieces of legislation in this house without amendment. About 18 pieces have been recommended for minor amendment, but the government has never accepted any substantial amendments. We now have a poisoned atmosphere in the house, to the point where we all feel partisan. I am sure that the people on the other side feel just as partisan as I do, except that they understand what they are doing. They know that they are acting against the interests of the people of Canada and of the Senate. We all feel partisan because of the acts of this government over the past number of years that have made it impossible for us to do our usual non-partisan job of improving legislation and getting on with the business of the country.

All that I want to say in conclusion is that, so far as I am concerned, the democratic system, this great broad democratic system that we have, belongs to the people of Canada, and Canadians are no longer willing to accept without question the dictates of the Prime Minister that are being imposed upon a captive House of Commons and now a captive Senate. It is not the Senate that has been raped; it is the people of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators—

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, is Senator Murray rising to speak to the question of privilege?

Senator Doody: Senator Murray has the floor!

Senator Austin: I am asking Senator Murray whether he is rising to speak to the question of privilege, because it is my intention to speak for the first time on that question.

Senator Murray: I appreciate what Senator Austin has said, that it his intention to speak for the first time on the question of privilege; but had for the past 43 hours or more we have a series of speeches relating to Senator Stewart's question of privilege. There have been very few interventions from this side of the house. I spoke some time before noon yesterday. I understand that in my absence during the night Senator Simard had a brief exchange with Senator Lefebvre. However, there have been very few interventions on this matter from this side. I would think that our customs, traditions and sense of elemental fairness would dictate that after these dozens of speeches and these hundreds of thousands of words that have been spoken into the record by those on the other side, when someone from this side rises to speak the honourable senator would be recognized.

It is true that Senator Austin rose a little after me to seek the floor, but he did not make it to his feet quite as quickly as I did. That says nothing about his fleetness of foot or how nimble he is; it is just that he had not been waiting as long as I have to get the attention of Your Honour to take the floor to say a few words. However, in a situation—

Senator Austin: Senator Murray, let me interrupt you for just a moment. I respect you as the Leader of the Government in this chamber, and when I saw you rise, I assumed that it was on the question of privilege. I believe that this house should listen to you as you speak on that question, but I shall insist on having my turn to deal with the question of privilege when you are finished.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should do me the courtesy of hearing me out. In our parliamentary system, when two honourable senators seek the floor at more or less the same time, it is always open to one of my friends opposite to move that Senator Austin be heard, or, if Senator Austin had been recognized, it would be open for one of my colleagues on this side to move that Senator Murray be heard. However, that is an elaborate process that takes up a lot of time, and it is not a frequently used practice in this place, at least in my time here.

Some 44 hours ago we, on this side, returned to this chamber after the Thanksgiving weekend expecting and, indeed, having the right to expect, that we would be getting on with the business of this Parliament. We had an agreement with honourable senators opposite. On their behalf Senator Frith had entered into discussions with Senator Doody and me. He had consulted with his Liberal caucus and he had returned to this chamber, on their behalf and in their presence, to state that we had an agreement and to place on record the terms of that agreement.

Reference has been made on several occasions in the course of this sitting, which began on Tuesday at 2 o'clock, to that arrangement. We all know the terms of that agreement. The agreement was that we would begin Tuesday's sitting with the order paper, which starts with Bill C-28, and that we would work our way down to Bill C-39, Bill S-8—Senator Frith listed off these bills and made a comment on each of them. He indicated what he believed would take place, what the intentions of the Opposition were, how many speeches would be made, for example, on Bill S-8 and how quickly, for example, Bill C-39 would receive third reading, and so on. So, as I say, we are entitled to expect that, and we had a right to expect that the business of the Senate on Tuesday would go forward in the way we had agreed.

Anyone who has been following the progress of this chamber was entitled to expect that when we returned to this chamber at 2 o'clock on Tuesday we would be getting on with the business of the nation.

Senator Lucier: Without Charbonneau in the Chair!

Senator Murray: My honourable friends are wrong about that. There were no conditions. As I told the house earlier in this sitting, the name of the Speaker never came up in any discussions between Senator Frith and the two representatives of this side. It never came up, nor did Senator Frith attach any condition whatsoever relating to Speaker Charbonneau when he came to this agreement and when he announced it. The farthest we went is that we publicly agreed to disagree on the question of the ruling or rulings that had been made by Mr. Speaker Charbonneau.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Murray is simply repeating the arguments he made earlier in the sitting, to which Senator Frith replied. The order of debate is in its normal form, and questions of privilege take priority according to our rules.

Senator Murray: I hear what the honourable senator is saying, and the last thing that I would want to do is to offend against the rule of repetition, because what we have had for the last 44 hours is such an excellent example of observing the parliamentary rules. Let the record show that I made that comment in a sarcastic vein. In any case, no one in this place who has been following the progress—"progress" is not the word; observing the events in this chamber—could possibly expect that the agreement announced by Senator Frith and Senator Doody on Friday left open the possibility that instead of getting on with the business of the Senate it would be open to honourable senators for the next 44 hours or thereabouts to engage in a filibuster, to engage in an obstruction on a spurious question of privilege. That is what has been happening. While I have not been in my seat constantly for the past 44 hours or so, I have certainly been here a good deal of the time. I have had reports from others on what has transpired in my absence.

However, to give honourable senators opposite a rest from their filibuster for a few moments and an opportunity to get their second wind, permit me to read a few paragraphs from The Ottawa Citizen. It is a description by Julian Beltrame and Jim Poling of Southam News of what happened yesterday. The Hansard will show it anyway. When the Hansard for this sitting eventually comes out, of course, it will have all of these speeches on these so-called questions of privilege. They will be there verbatim, and those readers who want to punish themselves by reading through this stuff will be able, even on a cursory reading, to see how very little any of this oratory, this rhetoric, these interventions, had to do with anybody's privilege. However, for those future readers of Hansard who do not wish to punish themselves by reading through all the speeches, here is a summary—I think quite a good one—of what happened yesterday, put together by the Southam journalists:

● (0945)

> The senators kept talking Wednesday—about football, about soil conservation, about what the newspapers are saying, about an obscure 18-year-old property-rights issue in B.C.
> And in case nobody recalled what that issue was, Liberal Senator George Van Roggen was more than willing to oblige. For two hours, he re-read a speech he originally delivered in 1972.
> Liberal Senator Eymard Corbin expounded at length on the practices of Viking kings.
> The Liberal filibuster in the Senate, which last week produced pandemomium as Liberals ran rampant in the hallowed chamber of sober second thought, atrophied to tedium Wednesday as Grit after Grit rose to drone on about virtually anything and everything.
> Liberal Senator Michael Kirby—who always takes advantage of any opportunity to—

Senator Comeau: Get himself in the press!

Senator Murray: Well, certainly, in any questionable practice by colleagues, he is one of the good guys, disassociating himself from the caucus. It reminds me of the incident during the last election when Senator Kirby was involved in an attempted coup against poor Mr. Turner; but I digress.

> Liberal Senator Michael Kirby admitted to reporters in an aside that he could no longer stomach the scene—

Senator Kirby: Mr. Chairman, Honourable senators, I rise to point out what I said to the press. When I left here, having served on the night shift the other night, I was on my way out of the chamber at about 8:15 or 8:30 in the morning, having just come off a 2-hour speech. I was asked where I was going, and I said I was going back to my office because I did not think I needed to be in the chamber since other senators had arrived. I said absolutely nothing about stomaching anything, other than I did say I was hungry and I was on my way to fill my stomach. There is no question I said that.

Senator Murray: Be very careful. They use tape recorders, senator. Be very, very careful.

> Liberal senator Michael Kirby admitted to reporters in an aside that he could no longer stomach the scene and was staying away as much as possible.

Senator Cools: Is he away? He seems to be here.

Senator Murray:

> Another Liberal, Joyce Fairbairn, brought in an air mattress to lighten the load; others read newspapers, yawned or broke the monotony by heckling.

Now, honourable senators, seriously speaking, this performance that we have witnessed for 43 hours or so—

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Thériault: I wonder if the Leader would permit a question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senator, when I finish my remarks, of course.

Senator Thériault: I wonder if the Leader will permit a question, yes or no?

Senator Murray: When I have finished my remarks.

Senator Thériault: Will he permit a question now?

Senator Murray: No, I will not permit a question.

Senator Thériault: Yes or no?

Senator Murray: No. Honourable senators, this is not a very edifying spectacle that we have witnessed these past 43 or 44 hours.

Senator Stanbury: It certainly is not.

Senator Murray: Seriously, taking up the time of Parliament, wasting the time of Parliament and the Senate, and obstructing the public business in this way, indicates contempt for all of us here, and, I think, a contempt on the part of Liberal senators for this institution and for their role in the parliamentary process.

Now, Honourable senators, privilege is a very sacred thing to parliamentarians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Stanbury: You destroyed it!

Senator Lucier: Forty-three hours and you finally heard it! You finally got it!

Senator Murray: Is my honourable friend going to get his horn out? Where is the bell ringer? Where are the kazoos? Where are the horns?

Senator Austin: Is privilege only 43 hours long today?

Senator Murray: I will come to the point that Senator Austin was making in a moment. I will deal with the point that Senator Austin was just making in his question, asking whether privilege was only a matter of 43 hours. Of course, the answer to that question is no. However, honourable senators—

Senator Austin: So I will be allowed to speak?

Senator Murray: As I say, privilege is a very sacred thing to parliamentarians, but what has gone on here in the past 43 or 44 hours simply debases the whole question of privilege.

Senator Stanbury: What went on before was worse!

Senator Austin: Your behaviour debases parliament!

Senator Murray: It debases the very idea of parliamentary privilege. It is a charade.

Senator Austin: The Speaker's behaviour debases Parliament!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have just read a brief summary of what is going on here.

Senator Cools: The Citizen is no authority.

Senator Molgat: We will gladly produce ours.

Senator Murray: I have just read a brief summary from the newspaper of what has gone on here for the past 43 or 44 hours. People who want to do more detailed research in the future will be able to read through the volumes of speeches that have been made, and one thing will be absolutely clear: this has been a time-wasting filibuster. This is a charade. This is obstruction.

Senator Molgat: Not at all! Not at all!

Senator Murray: This has nothing to do—

Senator Austin: Not true!

Senator Murray: —with privilege at all.

Senator Austin: Rights of the minority are about to be attacked again!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is, in all or most of the parliamentary assemblies that most of us have ever heard of, a practice regarding privilege. Honourable senators know what that practice is. Honourable senators know that the practice is that, after a certain time—

Senator Kirby: There is also a practice of not calling a vote until the whips have come in. You ignored that practice.

Senator Austin: You want it both ways!

Senator Murray: And then, after a certain time, the Speaker decides whether he has heard enough, or the Chair decides whether it has heard enough in order to—

Senator Molgat: There is no such rule or practice!

Senator Austin: That is a rule that you made up!

Senator Molgat: There is no such practice.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators know perfectly well that is the practice in most of the legislative bodies—

Senator Austin: But not in our house.

Senator Murray: —that most of us have ever heard of, and, honourable senators, there was a ruling on that very matter.

Senator Molgat: There is no such practice in this house!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I beg your pardon. That is the practice in this house.

Senator Molgat: It is not!

Senator Murray: That is the practice, and that practice was confirmed in a ruling from Mr. Speaker the other day.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Thériault: Get him to make another one!

Senator Austin: You are going to quote that as an earlier authority?

Senator Stanbury: We will accept nothing from that Speaker!

Senator Lucier: When you wrote that ruling, did you get it right for him?

Senator Murray: The ruling was never appealed by honourable senators opposite.

Senator Molgat: That is exactly what we are doing now!

Senator Murray: No, you are not. The ruling was never appealed and the practice that exists in almost every legislative—

Senator Molgat: It does not exist! It does not exist!

Senator Murray: —body and which exists in this place was, in my view, simply confirmed by the ruling from—

Senator Molgat: It does not exist and is not confirmed!

Senator Murray: —the Chair the other day.

Senator Molgat: Not so!

Senator Murray: And indeed, the practice was referred to—

Senator Molgat: No such practice!

Senator Murray: —and I have placed this on the record last week. Senator Frith, Senator MacEachen and Senator Olson, on September 25, very vigorously drew the attention of the Speaker to the fact that he has a duty in this regard. As Senator Frith put it at page 2239 of the Debates of the Senate:

> Your honour has a duty to decide when you have heard enough on this point of privilege to make up your mind—

Senator Austin: Senator Frith has risen in his place and said he was in error, and you know it well. He was in error, and I have quoted authorities in this chamber to show that is an error. Senator Ottenheimer introduced, in his question of privilege, a completely false argument on prima facie.

Senator Murray: Senator Olson has not said that he was in error. Senator MacEachen certainly has not said that he was in error.

Senator Thériault: I rise on a point of order.

Senator Murray: I am speaking already, honourable senators.

> Your Honour has a duty to decide when you have heard enough on this point of privilege—

Senator Molgat: Point of order!

Senator Thériault: Does the Leader know the way that points of privilege are dealt with in other parliaments?

Senator Murray: Absolutely.

Senator Thériault: You know, do you?

Senator Murray: And I would be glad to read Beauchesne for you.

Senator Thériault: I wish you would, because it is not how you are presenting it at all. You have never sat in any other parliament and you do not know. However, ask your deputy. He will tell you how they are dealt with.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do know, and I have heard enough first-hand evidence from those who have sat in other legislative assemblies as to how points of privilege are handled; and if honourable senators wish, I can place on the record a number of citations from Beauchesne. I simply hope that you will give me a moment again to point out that Senator Frith made the point, supported by Senator Olson and Senator MacEachen, who have not recanted for convenience's sake, as Senator Frith did. At page 2239 of the Debates for September 25, Senator Frith said:

> Your Honour has a duty to decide when you have heard enough on this point of privilege to make up your mind as to whether a prima facie case is made. You are not being asked to decide on the question of privilege, but simply whether a prima facie case has been made for a point of privilege. Your Honour should decide when you have heard enough. Do I take it that Your Honour is going to let this thing go on forever?

Then a bit later, he continued:

> Are you going to intervene at some point and say, "I have enough to decide whether or not there is a prima facie point of privilege"? In my respectful view, Your Honour, that is your duty.

And, a little later, Senator Frith said:

> Your Honour is saying that it is fine so long as it is within the rules. The rules or traditions to which Your Honour has referred require, as Senator Ottenheimer said, only that Your Honour make the decision as to whether or not you have heard enough to determine whether there is a prima facie case. That is all. I submit that you have heard sufficient to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case.

Senator Molgat: What page are you quoting from?

Senator Murray: From page 2239 of the Senate Debates for September 25.

> I suggest, Your Honour, that it is quite possible that they will think of some other reason for the filibuster—

This is early in the afternoon, I think, of September 25; but in any case, Senator Frith said:

> I suggest, Your Honour, that it is quite possible that they will think of some other reason for the filibuster, but, on this point, I think Your Honour has heard enough to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case.

And some honourable senators agreed. I suppose those honourable senators are on the other side. Now, honourable senators—

Senator Austin: And the point of privilege continued on.

Senator Murray: And honourable senators, what happened is that in due course Mr. Speaker decided whether there was a prima facie case of privilege, as I recall.

Senator Austin: He forced himself upon the Senate.

Senator Murray: Well, he ruled on the questions of privilege and the points of order after he had an opportunity to reflect on them. I do not know how much reflection is needed here, frankly, but it is not my job to instruct or to remind the Chair of all of that. The Chair and his advisors—and I do not envy them the task—will perhaps want to plough through these mounds and mounds—

Senator Lucier: We know who his advisors are!

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: —of the speeches that are in the Hansard and decide whether there is any question of privilege—no, I must be careful—decide whether there is prima facie case of privilege on which a motion could be based.

• (1000)

Senator Grafstein: Would the honourable senator please point out in the rules where the words "prima facie" appear as they apply to privilege?

Senator Murray: I have already reminded honourable senators what the practice is in almost all the parliamentary bodies that most of us have ever heard of.

Senator Grafstein: Prima facie questions respecting privilege do not apply in the Senate.

Senator Murray: I will quote Beauchesne, which is often quoted in the house.

Senator Austin: Beauchesne is not relevant.

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Murray: Go ahead.

Senator Molgat: Would he agree that when our rules are clear we do not go to Beauchesne. It is clear in our rules that the first place we go to is our own rule book.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the rule is not clear.

Senator Molgat: Crystal clear.

Senator Murray: There is no way, according to our rules, in which you get to a prime facie case of privilege.

Senator Molgat: Read Rule 33.

Senator Murray: Of course I have read it.

Senator Molgat: Well, then, you cannot understand English.

Senator Murray: Absence some process intervening, then questions of privilege, spurious questions of privilege, could be used ad vitam aeternam to hold up the business of the house. That is why Senator Frith—

Senator Grafstein: Are you suggesting that Senator Stewart's question of privilege is scurrilous?

Senator Murray: I said spurious, and many of the speeches that were made on this side are on spurious questions of privilege. They are not questions of privilege at all.

Senator Austin: This is no spurious question of privilege.

Senator Murray: I just mentioned the speeches about the Canadian Football League, soil conservation, and an obscure 18-year old property rights issue in British Columbia. These have nothing to do with privileges.

Senator Austin: These are no doubt relevant to the arguments.

Senator Grafstein: These speeches have a lot to do with rules and respect for rules; so does football.

Senator Murray: To return to Senator Molgat's question, the reason that Senator Frith invoked the prima facie rule, supported by Senator Olson and Senator MacEachen, is that he was concerned that the questions of privilege were going to take up unduly the time of the Senate—

Senator Thériault: You used them when it served your purposes. That is what you did until you got the extra eight.

Senator Grafstein: You took an unprecedented action.

Senator Murray: There were several hours of questions of privilege relating to the conduct by the chairman of the affairs of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. That is true.

Senator Austin: When there was a clear rule about committees.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith, supported by Senator MacEachen and Senator Olson, invoked the concept of prima facie, and referred to the rule and practice that exists in most of the assemblies most of us have ever heard of; Beauchesne was invoked, and the Speaker was called upon to make a decision as to whether or not there was a prima facie case.

Honourable senators, there are the rules. There is also common sense and respect for your role as parliamentarians—

Senator Stanbury: When did you learn that?

Senator Murray: —and respect for this house and respect for other parliamentarians as distinct from the almost contemptuous proceedings that have been taking place here for the last 43 hours. We had an agreement on Friday, and I am sorry that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is not here.

Senator Stanbury: He answered yesterday.

Senator Murray: It was he who discussed it with us and he who put it on the record, and no reading of the honourable senator's words could lead any reasonable person to the conclusion that that agreement could possibly lead to a 43 hour or 44 hour filibuster, to an obstruction of parliamentary business, all under the guise of privilege. No reasonable person reading the words of Honourable Senator Frith—

Senator Austin: So you say.

Senator Molgat: That is not so.

Senator Murray: No reasonable person—

Senator Stanbury: There is not a reasonable person on that side.

Senator Austin: Where is Senator Simard, the expert, when we need him?

Senator Murray: My goodness, such heckling at such an early hour in the morning.

No reasonable person reading the words of Senator Frith outlining to the house and to the public the terms of the agreement could come to the conclusion that that agreement left open the possibility that, instead of getting on to the Orders of the Day sometime on Tuesday, 43 or 44 hours later we would still be held hostage to obstruction and delay and to a filibuster by honourable senators opposite.

No reasonable person reading the speeches that have been made in this house for 43 or 44 hours could have believed that this was possible in the terms of the agreement—

Senator Molgat: That is incorrect.

Senator Grafstein: It is in your hands now.

Senator Molgat: Let the record show that is not true.

Senator Doody: Get out the whistles, get out the bells, bang your desks!

Senator Grafstein: There is no obstruction here.

Senator Murray: Senator Grafstein says, "There is no obstruction here."

Senator Grafstein: You have to act. In order for the nation's business in this chamber to be conducted, you know what you have to do. You do not want to do it. You refuse to do the nation's business.

Senator Thériault: Get an apology or replace the Speaker.

Senator Grafstein: It's up to you, Senator Murray.

Senator Molgat: Erase the wrong rules that have been done in this house.

Senator Grafstein: The burden is yours. You call the shots.

Senator Molgat: Withdraw the wrong rulings that have been done in this house.

Senator Grafstein: Restore this house.

Senator Thériault: It won't work.

Senator Grafstein: If you are playing to the press, tell it correctly. You are the Leader of the Government in the Senate and its your burden. You know what you must do. You are afraid to do it. You know what you are doing and your colleagues know what your duties are. Each one of your colleagues knows what your duties are. Exercise your duties.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, 44 hours into this circus—

Senator Thériault: 100 days if necessary.

Senator Murray: I hope the record shows that 44 hours into this circus—

Hon. Senators: Order, order!

Senator Murray: —honourable Senator Grafstein says there was no obstruction here. After we have heard 44 hours of alleged questions of privilege, stories about the Canadian Football League, which has a lot to do with privilege—

Senator Grafstein: The Canadian Football League has rules. The purpose of the speech was to demonstrate respect for rules. There are baseball, football, hockey rules, but not here.

Senator Murray: —soil conservation, and re-reading a speech, as Senator van Roggen did, that he made in 1972.

Senator Stanbury: Because it was pertinent.

Senator Grafstein: Relevant and pertinent.

Senator Murray: What has that got to do with anyone's privileges? It has nothing to do with anyone's privileges.

Senator Thériault: Because you never sat in any Parliament you do not know what goes on.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, no reasonable person, reading the words that Senator Frith spoke on Friday when he announced the terms of our agreement, and then reading the speeches that have been made for the past 44 hours or so, could come to any conclusion other than that the agreement has been violated, dishonoured, and completely broken by honourable senators opposite.

Senator Austin: Totally wrong.

Senator Thériault: Not true.

Senator Austin: You don't have the courtesy to wait until Senator Frith is in the chamber to make that—Senator Murray: Wait? He's off shift.

Senator Austin: You repeat your accusation. You don't even wait to have him present.

Senator Stanbury: It's another dirty trick.

Senator Murray: I have heard 44 hours of largely oratory, rhetoric and re-reading of a speech made in 1972, all under the guise of questions of privilege. As I have said, honourable senators, that practice debases the coinage of parliamentary privilege—

Senator Olson: You are the one who is doing that.

Senator Murray: I say, honourable senators, the time has come to move to put an end to this charade, to this contempt of the Senate and the obstruction of parliamentary business.

Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule 46(c), I move:

> That the Orders of the Day 1, 2, 3 and 4 be postponed until the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Molgat: We do not accept in any way that that motion is in order; but, in any case, the least we should have is a copy of the motion.

Honourable senators, I want to point out to you that the rule is extremely clear, that the only motion that can be moved, and I refer to Rule 33, is a motion calling upon the Senate to take action on the question of privilege.

Senator Cools: Precisely. Your motion is out of order.

Senator Molgat: I submit that we should have that motion now.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I consider it outrageous that the government leader in the Senate attempts to move a motion during the course of a question of privilege which is based on a set of facts that describe one of the greatest abuses of a parliamentary chamber. We are continuing with the debate on the question of privilege and I wish to associate myself with the position that was taken by Senator Stewart in terms of the abuse of the privilege of myself as a senator and of many senators. Indeed, I would argue for all senators, because the abuse of the privilege of any one senator in this chamber is the abuse of the privilege of every senator in this chamber.

I consider that the government has to take credit for a very crafty manoeuvre, a crafty manoeuvre which began at the moment of sitting on September 25th when Senator Ottenheimer, who is now sitting in the Chair, rose up at 2 o'clock and stated:

> Honourable senators, I give notice that there is a matter of privilege I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators. I am serving notice now so that I may pursue it at the appropriate time.

After a number of Conservative senators rose to make the same claim of privilege, and there was an introduction of some honourable senators, Senator Ottenheimer rose again, and his opening point was that the process of privilege is ruled by a statement in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition at pages 25 and 26. I will quote the same quotation given by Senator Ottenheimer. Citation 84(1) states:

● (1015)

> Once the claim of a breach of privilege has been made, it is the duty of the Speaker to decide if a prima facie case can be established. The Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that privilege appears to be sufficiently involved to justify him in giving such precedence (or as it is sometimes put, that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed); and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.
> (2) It has often been laid down that the Speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege is limited to deciding the formal question, whether the case conforms with the conditions which alone entitle it to take precedence over the notices of motions and Orders of the Day standing on the Order Paper; and does not extend to deciding the question of substance, whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the House itself.

Honourable senators, that rule has never applied to questions of privilege in the Chamber as I noted in an address which I made in this Chamber on October 4 quoting from an article entitled "The Powers of the Speaker of the Senate" presented by Norman B. Williams in December 1975. He said on page 10:

> It is firmly established that the Speaker of the House of Commons is "responsible for the due enforcement of the rules, rights and privileges of the House". By contrast, the Speaker of the Senate, according to the Rules of the Senate, is only allowed to "preserve order and decorum".

I mentioned rule 15. Mr. Williams goes on to state:

> When a Member of the House of Commons moves that a matter affecting the privileges of Members be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, > the Speaker must first decide whether there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege.

Here he refers to Beauchesne. He then goes on to state:

> The Speaker of the Senate is not called upon to make such a ruling. The Senators by majority vote would decide whether the Senate would study a matter pertaining to its privileges.

He refers to rule 33. That has always been the practice in this Chamber with respect to questions of privilege, and that practice follows the practices that have been prevalent in the House of Lords for many decades.

The rule cited by Senator Ottenheimer from Beauchesne has never applied to this particular chamber.

Senator Murray: We have a ruling to confirm that it does. My friends have never appealed it.

Senator Austin: We have Speaker Charbonneau finding his way from that first reference by Senator Ottenheimer on September 25 in the Debates at page 2218 and a subsequent reference on September 27 at page 2289. Senator Ottenheimer is at least consistent in speaking on the question of privilege. I am quoting from the right hand column on page 2289 of the Senate Debates:

> I listened with interest to the historical analysis and resume with respect to the appointment of senators under the section 26 provision. I listened with great interest to the Honourable Senator Everett, and I think he is absolutely right when he says that the Chair will have to make a decision as to whether or not there is a prima facie case. If there is a prima facie case, the senator raising the point of privilege has the right to put forward a motion, which then has precedence over other motions. If there is no prima facie case, then that is the end of it.
> I would surely not subscribe to the suggestion that if no prima facie case is met, then this Senate, as an integral Upper House of the Parliament of Canada, can do nothing until the Supreme Court of Canada has made a decision.

Senator Ottenheimer has put a procedural rabbit in the Senate hat and then pulled it out three times, making the same argument, then quoting Senator Everett quoting Senator Ottenheimer on whether a prima facie case is to be made in this Chamber.

Clearly, when the Speaker made his so-called ruling he quoted no Senate precedents. He quoted no Senate authorities. Senator Murray came in and told us that of course, a precedent would not be a precedent unless it was created anew—

Senator Murray: I was quoting Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough.

Senator Austin: But with a different top spin on the argument. You are saying that it is in order to create any precedent, however spurious; but I am saying that by creating a fallacious precedent and arguing from that fallacious precedent is another form of error.

Senator Murray: My friend did not appeal that ruling.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, it is clear that there has been a chain of events orchestrated by the Government and directed by Senator Murray to undermine the privileges of senators in this Chamber. I will not dwell at length on this question, but Senator Pitfield made a cogent and I believe unanswered argument when he spoke about the appearance of collusion between the government and the Speaker with respect to the process since this Chamber reconvened on September 25.

We have, on the question of privilege, a chain of events. My privileges to which I am speaking, the question of denying me the opportunity of notice of a new point of departure by the Speaker, denying me essential natural justice and fairness in the conduct and practice of this Chamber as directed by the Speaker, is embodied first, in a decision to call a vote contrary to all of the rules of this Chamber. Honourable senators have heard at length the practice and the rule as laid out on page 70 of our rule books with respect to the whips and the practice with respect to the whips in signalling the commencement of a vote.

The Speaker is not empowered under our rules to commence a vote unless and until the whips of both the government side and the official opposition side are in place and signal that both parties are ready to vote.

That practice has long standing and it is based in fairness. It is based in a sense of fairness in parliamentary practice. That fairness recognizes that governments change from time to time. The people change their minds and others are offered the opportunity to govern.

We cannot have the chaos of arbitrary rules by one group, then arbitrary rules by another. We cannot have a tyranny of the majority and advance the public business. We are here to advance the commonwealth of Canada. Our parliamentary traditions are insightful and in fact brilliant in recognizing the balances required.

As I said in my address on October 4, I regret and am deeply saddened by the practice of this government in removing that delicate balance of relationship between government and opposition that makes parliament work and without which parliament cannot work.

We are in great danger of seeing this Parliament not work because of the rulings of the Speaker with respect to the timeliness of a vote in this Chamber and with respect to notice to honourable senators as to when a vote would be taken.

Honourable senators, there is no natural justice in the practice in which the Speaker engaged. The Speaker arbitrarily determined that a vote would be taken. The record of argument here shows that less than half an hour of notice was given to honourable senators, and only then to some honourable senators. Senator Pitfield has pointed out the remarkable coincidence of all the Conservative senators being in this chamber and none of the Liberal senators being in it. Perhaps there is something to the argument that all honourable senators on the Conservative side were in the chamber. Perhaps one could stretch the argument that they were eager, as an honourable senator said earlier, ready and willing to vote.

● (1030)

Honourable senators, it begs human judgment and experience to believe that all were here, that one was not absent, two were not absent, five were not absent, but that all were here. It is amazing.

We have had a number of stories of prior notice given to one or two independent senators. Certainly, there is the story attributed to Senator Molson being notified—indeed, consulted—about the practice before the Speaker began this process of arbitrary decision making. Having decided when the vote would take place, the Speaker wrote a letter dated September 27. In that letter, allegedly sent to the Opposition Leader and the Opposition Whip, the time of 5:30 in the afternoon is mentioned. Yet, honourable senators, in the Senate Debates it is recorded that the doors were locked at 5:25. Is that natural justice? Is that fairness? There is one error of parliamentary practice, one breach of fairness after another committed by Speaker Charbonneau.

How could any parliamentarian who believes in the practices that we have evolved over the decades and centuries accept the behaviour of Speaker Charbonneau? How could any of us accept that behaviour and ask any respect for a single member in this chamber? It boggles my imagination that senators on the Conservative side can defend that behaviour, that they can defend these breaches of our longstanding parliamentary privileges. I believe that the most outrageous form of grievance exists in this chamber with respect to the behaviour of Senator Charbonneau as Speaker.

Honourable senators know that our Speaker is the appointee of the Prime Minister by Order in Council. The Governor in Council appoints our Speaker. The Speaker's continuation as Speaker in this chamber depends on the pleasure of the Prime Minister. Even so, over the years there has evolved on the part of Senator Charbonneau's predecessors a practice of impartiality. They have removed themselves from participating in debates. They have removed themselves from their right to vote, which nonetheless remains. They have endeavoured to become non-partisan. They have endeavoured to earn for the office, as well as for themselves, the reputation of impartiality and objectivity. Can the events I have recited and which honourable senators on this side, including Senator Stewart, recited meet any test of impartiality and objectivity? Can any of those events be so described? Honourable senators, of course not, without any question not.

Senator Charbonneau blundered. He panicked. He was following a line of action which, in my view, was concerted from the beginning.

What was the game plan on the Conservative side? The game plan was to turn the Speaker of the Senate from an officer who merely presides at sittings of the Senate into an authoritative ruling Speaker. Why was that the game plan? Because, honourable senators, the government believed that it could not move its business through this chamber if it could not bring about a change in the rules. The Speaker was the first weapon of the government in this change of the rules. The Speaker had to be empowered, the Speaker had to be given authority over the rules. How to do that? Well, Senator Ottenheimer called the first play, prima facie. This argument about making a prima facie case and the request that the Speaker rule was a design to empower the Speaker to become a ruling officer in this chamber.

There is some argument in changing the role of the Speaker by the front door, honourable senators, but clearly not by the back door. Senator Molgat and I in previous sessions of the Senate have addressed this chamber asking the approval of legislation that would allow this chamber to elect its Speaker. Senator Molgat earlier in these debates said that he would reintroduce that bill, and it is sorely needed.

We have seen in the practice of Senator Charbonneau that an appointee is an impossible position when this House is divided. At the best of times the Speaker, appointed by a Prime Minister, would be suspected of partiality, would be suspected of a lack of objectivity, would be suspected of partisanship. But these are not the best of times; these are the worst of times. Our Speaker stands condemned by his partiality, by his partisanship in the Chair. The chain of condemnation hangs on the authority of the Prime Minister to appoint and maintain this Speaker in the Chair.

There is a case to be made for reforming the office of Speaker of this chamber. I wish that those on the government side would advance, and advance quickly, their support for a change in the office of Speaker, and the manner in which the Speaker is appointed so that the Speaker might play a role as a ruling officer in this chamber similar to that of the Speaker in the House of Commons. But no Speaker can become a ruling officer in this chamber as long as that Speaker is appointed by the Prime Minister and held in thrall by the government side.

Honourable senators who have looked at this issue may know that in the House of Lords the Lord Chancellor is not a ruling officer. The practice in the House of Lords has been to prevent the Lord Chancellor from becoming an officer who can rule. The Lord Chancellor is placed on the woolsack by the Prime Minister in the United Kingdom.

The Lord Chancellor is by practice in the House of Lords not accepted as someone who can rule on principal issues affecting the House of Lords. Our practices are modelled after those practices. There is a reason why we have the custom of saying "Honourable senators" rather than "Mr. Speaker". It is because we remind ourselves every time we use the phrase "Honourable senators" that the Speaker does not rule in the Senate and that the Speaker has no authority to rule in the Senate. It is the rule book that rules. The rule book exists by negotiation among honourable senators of the various political parties here. It is a set of rules evolved from practice, principles of natural justice and fairness in that practice. That is why the rules are so important to us. That is why we, on this side, must maintain the rules. The rules are all that stand between our rights as senators who are in the opposition or are independent Senators and the anarchy of the government—the rule of the majority, the tierany of the majority.

• (1045)

Honourable Senators, these words are deeply felt on my part. I believe that our privilages have been vastly abused.

In my province, British Colombia, we had a very long-serving premier, W.A.C. Bennett, who coined a phrase that I have never forgotten:

> A man who does not stand for something will fall for anything.

Unfortunately, that phrase applies to Senator Charbonneau. He did not stand up for the accord which has governed this house. He did not stand up for our long-served principles. He did not stand up for our rules. He fell for anything because he had nothing to stand by. His partisanship is patent.

One way to resolve this problem is to have the government respond with a structural change in the role of the Speaker. That would be most welcomed on this side. I would suggest that government members consider Senator Molgat's bill, which was tabled in the last Parliament, and move quickly to amend this invidious and impossible role which the Speaker here has as a delegate of the Prime Minister.

Honourable Senators, what Senator Murray misses—and it grieves me that he does so—and what some of the people in the press miss—and it grieves me that they do so—is that Parliament's business is the business of protecting all members and being sensitive to the rights of an opposition.

When I spoke on October 4, I said that I had spent six months on a joint Senate and House of Commons Committee dealing with legislation to patriate the Constitution and to create a constitutionalized Bill of Rights in this country. The government, of course, did not want that hearing process to go on for six months. It was set originally for three weeks. However, the time for listening was extended because of the demand of Canadians to participate in that process and because the rights of the opposition—the Conservative opposition and the NDP—to put their arguments fully and completely to the Canadian people and to have those arguments well and truly presented were respected by the government. We have not seen a Mulroney government with such a temperature.

We have seen the government operate with "seamless webb" theories about constitutional amendments and in a huge hurry to pass them through the parliamentary process. We have seen them again in a huge hurry to pass a consumption tax—a general sales tax—and not accord Canadians a full opportunity to present evidence, or accord the other place the opportunity to fully debate the matter. They have used closure over and over again to pass that legislation through the House of Commons. Now a government in this chamber is seeking to use, bend and break every rule in our rule book in order to have its way.

This is a government that had no suggestion that amendments were possible to the GST until ten days before the use of section 26, a posturing about amendments. Any serious attempt to receive amendments to the GST legislation, Bill C-62, were brushed aside in the House of Commons. But the government would have us believe that they would be interested in receiving amendments. Of course they would not; of course the government is determined to find its way through the rules or destroy the rules of this chamber in order to have its way.

Honourable senators, there is interesting material about this chamber, its role and the role of the Speaker in these matters which I would like to draw to your attention. I am sure you will find it interesting and relevant. I am referring to a well-known study regarding this chamber entitled: "Second Chambers: A Comparative Study with Special Reference to the Senate of Canada" by Frank Andrew Kunz. This book is dated December 1960. I should like to refer to his conclusion at page 241:

> Similarly, Arthur Meighen wrote in 1937 that 'the Senate is worthless if it becomes merely another Commons divided upon party lines and indulging in party debates.' Instead he urged that members of the Senate must get away 'lift their mind far from those hard drawn lines of party or they cannot serve their country. They have to make up their minds to give every government fair play and not to stand in the way of legislation unless they are convinced it must be defeated on its merits and that the consequences of the failure to defeat it would be serious; not to stand stubbornly in the path of any government proposal unless it is brought there in their judgment to serve the ends of party, by largesse in this or some other part of the Dominion, rather than the true interests of the nation.'

There, in the words of a Conservative Prime Minister who served in this chamber as a senator and opposition leader, is the test. Let me repeat the test:

> (Honourable senators) have to make up their minds to give every government fair play and not to stand in the way of legislation unless they are convinced it must be defeated on its merits and that the consequences of the failure to defeat it would be serious.

Mr. Kunz goes on at page 242:

> And Mr. Nolan recalled in the House of Commons in 1954 that when he, as the President of the Provincial Political Association in Nova Scotia, once had asked Senator Meighen to address a provincial convention, Meighen told him that when he went into the Senate he felt he should divorce himself from all political work. Therefore, he refused to attend that meeting and he also assured Nolan that no other Conservative senator could go. 'It was the attitude taken and it should be taken by all senators.' To further emphasize the judicial character of the Senate, Senator Ailsworth favoured the adoption of legislation to disenfranchise members of the Senate so that they could more consistently take an impartial attitude when legislation came before them. This way, he hoped, they would be in the same position as the members of the bench.

● (1100)

How far, honourable senators, we have travelled from those definitions of the Senate. Continuing the quotation:

> There is an organizational aspect of the Senate's impartiality never mentioned by its defenders: this is the practice that chairmen of committees of the Senate do not change with the change of government. At present, the chairmen of twelve of the Senate's 16 standing committees, not counting the three joint committees, are hangovers from the Liberal regime.

Honourable senators will remember that these words are dated 1960.

Senator Murray: Who is it?

Senator Austin: Did you miss the quotation by Senator Meighen?

Senator Murray: I missed the source.

Senator Austin: This is "Second Chambers: a comparative study with special reference to the Senate of Canada" by Frank Andrew Kunz. I have been referring—

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, on a point of order it seems to me that I presented a motion to your Honour and asked Your Honour to—

Senator Austin: There is no point of order; we are on the question of privilege!

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Murray: I put a motion—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please.

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Murray: I put forward a motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Austin: You are not in order.

Senator Grafstein: There is no motion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please. The Senate was debating—

Senator Murray: Senator Austin should resume his seat!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Yes. The Senate was debating a matter of privilege.

Senator Austin: It is the question of privilege.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I am speaking of what went before. The Senate was and is debating a matter of privilege. Senator Murray spoke on that matter of privilege. During the course of his remarks, he asked for and required a ruling from the Chair with respect to whether the Chair had heard enough evidence to make a determination on whether or not there was a prima facie case. He also moved a motion. The Chair did not put that motion; it has not put that motion but has been hearing Senator Austin. One of the reasons for so doing is that there was a debate on a question of privilege going on.

The Chair is now in the position where it must determine two things: number one, whether the Chair has the authority to rule on whether it has heard enough evidence with respect to a prima facie case. If the answer is negative, then obviously that is the end of that. If the answer is affirmative, then the question becomes whether the Chair has in fact heard enough to rule on whether or not there is a prima facie case.

Senator Austin: In the middle of an address!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Certainly, I am not ruling on the question of whether there is a prima facie case or not, which is a much more drawn out or further-down-the-line process. A point was raised by an honourable senator asking whether the Chair had heard enough to rule on whether there was a prima facie case or not a prima facie case.

Senator Grafstein: Sit down!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The honourable senator is now asking that such a ruling be made. I may seem repetitious but I want to make things clear. In my opinion, what I want to do is adjourn for about 20 minutes in order to discuss the matter with the officers at the Table and then come back and give my ruling on it.

An Hon. Senator: He's leaving the chair.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: That is what I so do.

An Hon. Senator: No rules. Forget the rules.

Senator MacEachen: Your Honour, you had better hear a few points before you leave the Chair, because you are heading for great difficulty, great difficulty.

Senator Austin: There is no Chair; we stand adjourned.

Senator Grafstein: Do you mean that the Chair can make a point and then not listen to a response to his particular point and turn his back to the Senate!

Senator Stanbury: You're really making a mess!

Senator Grafstein: First of all, they lock the doors. Then whoever is in the Chair turns his back on the Senate when people want to speak!

An Hon. Senator: People have a right to speak.

Senator Grafstein: What is going on here? What is going on? Is this normal practice?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I was speaking—

Senator Grafstein: There is nobody in the Chair. He turned his back on questions that were being raised! He turned his back on us!

Senator Murray: The Speaker has left the Chair for 20 minutes to reflect on what he has heard.

Senator Grafstein: He has turned his back on the questions that were being raised!

Senator Molgat: I have the right to take the Chair in this Chamber, and I shall do so.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators—

Senator Murray: This is highly improper.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I was speaking when Senator Murray interrupted me.

Senator Grafstein: It is unbelievable! I hope that Senator Austin will put on record what happened here in the last few minutes so that there is a record of this particular conduct which again is unprecedented. Unprecedented! What is going on here?

An Hon. Senator: Dictatorial!

An Hon. Senator: We now have a speaker in the Chair.

Senator Murray: There is not. The sitting has been suspended by the Speaker!

Senator Grafstein: How can he say that he has heard enough without listening to—

Senator Murray: The Speaker has suspended the sitting, as he said, for 20 minutes, to consider the points that have been made!

Senator Grafstein: Without listening! He turned his back on senators.

Senator Murray: He left the Chair and said he was taking 20 minutes. The sitting is suspended.

Senator Grafstein: Put on the record what happened.

Senator Thériault: It won't work! It will not work, Murray!

An Hon. Senator: What are you doing?

Senator Grafstein: What are you doing here?

Senator Murray: The Speaker has suspended the sitting for 20 minutes!

Senator Thériault: It is not suspended, and you know that it will not work! You know that it will not work! You were told that Friday! The only way this Parliament will work is if you apologize and remove that speaker and expunge from the record that breach of privilege! You can go away for 20 minutes—

Senator Grafstein: The press had better stay here.

An Hon Senator: It won't work.

Senator Grafstein: The press had better stay here! Let them recount exactly what happened. Let them be witnesses, because we cannot have witnesses from the independent scribes because the Speaker has left the Chair. Let the press understand exactly what has happened here. The Speaker got up and left in the midst of points of order being raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and turned his back on the Senate. Those are the facts. If the Fourth Estate is to be here and is truly a Fourth Estate, let it act as a Fourth Estate. Let it make this record, because they won't believe us!

You members of the Fourth Estate, show your independence. You now have an obligation to this nation and to this Parliament! This is unheralded, absolutely unheralded in parliamentary history, where the Speaker turns his back on the Leader of the Opposition and won't listen to a contentious point while he interrupts a point of privilege! It's unheard of, unheard of! Shame! Absolute shame!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I should like to speak on this matter—

Some Hon. Senators: We cannot hear. The electronic sound system is not functioning.

The Senate recessed during pleasure.

At 11:08 a.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed, the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I was addressing the chamber when the sound system malfunctioned and I was cut off most inappropriately.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If I may interrupt honourable senators, I refer you to the rule book, rule 61(1), which is found at page 25. It reads as follows:

> At the commencement of each session, a Committee of Selection consisting of nine senators shall be appointed whose duties shall be to nominate
> (a) a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore;
> (b) the senators to serve on the several select committees.
> (2) The Committee of Selection shall, within the first five sitting days of each session, present a separate report to the Senate in respect of its nomination of a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore pursuant to paragraph (1)(a).

That was done properly at the beginning of this session. I was nominated and I was elected—I point out elected—by this Senate.

I refer you now to page 6, rule 10:

> 10. Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator chosen by the Senate under Rule 66(1)(a) to preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if that senator is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence and shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of the Speaker until the Speaker, or the Speaker pro tempore, as the case may be, resumes the Chair.

Honourable senators, the events of this morning were unprecedented events. Senator Ottenheimer was in the Chair, left the Chair in the middle of an honourable senator's speech—

Senator Murray: He left the Chair for 20 minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The matter is totally contrary to all possible procedures in this Senate. Therefore, under the circumstances, I intend to remain in the Chair until such time as Speaker Charbonneau returns, in which case, of course, as Speaker pro tempore I would leave, or until such time as the Senate decides to forcibly eject me.

Senator Austin: I will continue with my question of privilege.

Senator Murray: I have a point of order. What happened this morning—

Senator Olson: What makes your point of order more important than that of anyone else?

Senator Austin: This takes priority over your point of order. You interrupted an address which I was making.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down, Murray!

Senator Murray: I was rising on a point of order.

Senator Austin: That the government leader would rise in the middle of—

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, since we have no agreement as to who should speak, it is in order to move that Senator Murray be now heard.

Senator Austin: You are interrupting me. I am on a question of privilege. There is no motion before this house, nor can a motion be introduced.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Murray, you are rising on a point of order?

Senator Murray: Senator Roblin has made a motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Roblin is rising on a point of order?

Senator Roblin: I was trying to assist the house in determining who should speak, because there seemed to be some disagreement.

Senator Austin: I was speaking. You cannot interrupt an honourable senator in mid-address.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, let us go back to where we were. The Honourable Senator Austin was in the middle of a speech.

Senator Austin: On privilege.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: He was interrupted at that point by the actions of Senator Ottenheimer. I think all senators would agree that there can be no motion made during the middle of an honourable senator's speech. It would be in order at the conclusion, but not in the middle.

If it is a point of order regarding that matter, I am prepared to listen to a point of order.

Senator Murray: What happened this morning was that Senator Austin had indeed been speaking after I had presented a motion to the Chair and asked the Chair to put the motion. The Chair had not put the motion.

Senator Olson: He had no right to. Why should he put your motion?

Senator Murray: My friend says that I have no right to do that. That is a matter not for my friend to decide.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

An Hon. Senator: The Senate decides points of order.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have put a motion.

Senator Olson: There is no motion by you in front of this house.

Senator Murray: I was recognized on a point of order.

Senator Austin: I was recognized and I proceeded to speak relevantly to this question of privilege for many minutes. I was in mid-speech when Senator Murray returned to the chamber, got up and addressed Senator Ottenheimer and asked to put a motion—

Senator Murray: No, no.

Senator Austin: —to put a motion which cannot even be tabled during a question of privilege. This is an unbelievable attempt to muscle in, which certainly Senator Murray promised the press he would exercise against the privileges of honourable senators on this side.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Would you proceed with your point of order.

Senator Murray: From the point of view of the chronology, the fact of the matter is that Senator Austin and I rose at the same time—

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Murray: Senator Austin and I rose at the same time to speak. The Chair recognized me. Senator Austin knows that. If he disagreed with that, somebody could have moved that Senator Austin be now heard. Nobody did, so I spoke.

At the end of my few remarks I presented a motion. I think honourable senators are aware what the motion was.

Senator Olson: That is just wrong. That is a wrong chronology.

Senator Murray: No. I have it right, Senator Olson. Senator Austin has just told you I have it right. He may disagree later.

I made a speech. I made a motion that we proceed to the Orders of the Day and that Orders numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4 be put over until the next sitting of the house.

Having made a motion, I sat down waiting for the Chair to put the motion. Instead, Senator Austin and I think several other senators rose and began to make their speeches, certainly not on my motion, that had not been put, but on matters of privilege.

I rose and again appealed to the Speaker to do two things: One is to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege.

An Hon. Senator: You did not.

Senator Murray: That is exactly what I did. I asked the Speaker to rule whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege. There were some comments from the other side to the effect that we do not do that in this house, et cetera. I pointed out that Senator Frith, supported by Senator MacEachen and Senator Olson over a week or so ago, were urging

Mr. Speaker in this house to intervene when he had heard enough.

Senator Olson: You misinterpreted what I said.

Senator Murray: When he had heard enough, the Speaker might intervene and say that he had heard enough to decide whether there was a prima facie case and that he would then rule or take the matter under advisement and come back later.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? What did Senator Murray put to the Chair? What was the Chair expected to decide as to the subject matter of the question of privilege? Is it that there was no privilege involved in the ruling of Mr. Speaker Charbonneau? Is that what Senator Ottenheimer, as Acting Speaker, was asked to rule, that that did not constitute a prima facie case? I want to know what the subject matter of the ruling was to be.

Senator Murray: If you are asking me, my answer is that the first statement, or speech on the question of privilege was made by Senator Stewart, and he outlined his views on the matter. Since then there have been literally dozens of speeches, ostensibly on that question of privilege, but most of them on subjects as varied as the Canadian Football League, soil conservation, and a reading by Senator van Roggen into the record of a speech that he first made in 1972.

What is the question of privilege? If you want to go back to the original speech, supposedly on privilege, it would be the speech of Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough, which he made on Tuesday.

What I wanted Senator Ottenheimer in the Chair to do was what you asked Mr. Speaker Charbonneau to do a week ago. That was to decide whether he had heard enough to enable him to make a decision as to whether there was a prima facie case of privilege. There were some opinions expressed back and forth about whether a prima facie case of privilege counts for anything in this chamber, whether we have a process.

Let me say I argued also, as honourable senators did the other day, that in most other assemblies that most of us know it is the practice for the Speaker to rule whether a prima facie case exists or not, after which a motion can be put. Further, I said that that practice had been confirmed in this house by a ruling that Mr. Speaker Charbonneau had made the other day on this very matter.

After some discussion back and forth, Senator Ottenheimer rose to say that it appeared there were two matters at least that were before him. One was whether he had the authority to decide whether he had heard enough. The second was, if so, whether the prima facie practice exists in this house. I would not say it was heckling, but there was a noise level in the chamber. I did not hear much of the rest of what he had to say, except that he wanted 20 minutes to reflect on this matter, or these matters, and to come back and let us know what he had to say. We are at that point. Senator Ottenheimer left the Chair when the Leader of the Opposition came in asking to be heard and so on.

A few minutes later, after the sitting had been recessed during pleasure, Senator Molgat took the Chair and remained there. That is the situation we are in at the moment.

My contention is that Senator Ottenheimer, having suspended the sitting for 20 minutes, has now returned, I presume to tell us the status of our various points of order or questions of privilege and, indeed, the status of my motion which I put forward and would like to hear put. I think that he should take the Chair according to the practice we always follow in this place, and that we should hear him out.

• (1115)

En passant, I would like to reread the rule put forward by Senator Molgat to justify his simply taking the Chair and attempting to refuse Senator Ottenheimer the resumption of it.

Rule 10 reads:

> Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator chosen by the Senate under Rule 66(1) (a) to preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if that senator is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence and shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of the Speaker . . .

The fact is that no such notice was given to the Senate by the Clerk of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker. We followed the course that I have always seen followed here when the Speaker left, as he did some time after the beginning of this sitting on Tuesday. Various honourable senators at various times have occupied the Chair for various periods of time.

I do not think that the rule cited by Senator Molgat is at all relevant. In any case, I have given, to the best of my knowledge and recollection, I think, a fair and accurate recitation of what happened here this morning. I think the time has come for Senator Ottenheimer, who suspended the sitting and who has returned, to tell us the status of our various questions and motions. I think he should take the Chair and do so.

Senator Grafstein: Why did Senator Ottenheimer refuse to listen to the objection of the Leader of the Opposition?

Senator Murray: I do not know, except that Senator Ottenheimer had left the Chair.

Senator Grafstein: He was in the chamber!

Senator Murray: Well, we disagree on that matter.

Senator Grafstein: He saw Senator MacEachen come in and rise as he was about to make a point. But Senator Ottenheimer turned his back on Senator MacEachen and walked out. Why did he do that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Senator Grafstein: You were there! You saw it! You were sitting across the chamber! You weren't mute or dumb!

Senator Olson: There is some question on the latter point.

Senator Murray: I know I was here and I know what I saw.

Senator Grafstein: Did Senator Ottenheimer not see Senator MacEachen? Did he not turn his back on Senator Mac-

Eachen after he saw Senator MacEachen rise on a point? There are two sides to this chamber.

Senator Murray: Senator Ottenheimer was out of the Chair on his way out of the chamber.

Senator Grafstein: He saw him. He stood in his place and then he turned his back. You saw it, I saw it and the press saw it.

Senator Murray: Why is Senator Grafstein assuming that Senator MacEachen has been somehow silenced by this? Why is he assuming that Senator Ottenheimer, whatever it is he has to say, is not going to hear Senator MacEachen?

Indeed, senators, I would be able to reply to the Honourable Senator Grafstein if he would rise in his place for a change, be recognized, make a proper speech and abide by the rules of the Senate.

Senator Grafstein: You asked me a question. Let me respond.

The reason why it was important for Senator MacEachen and other senators to address this issue is because we are dealing with an unprecedented point of privilege that is on the face of the Senate Hansard. It is not some partisan procedure concocted by one senator or another. It is on the face of Hansard.

Senator Murray: I suggest, honourable senators, that the sitting had been suspended—

Senator Grafstein: It is on the face of the Hansard of October 4, 1990. It is on the face of Hansard in writing and it is important.

There is no controversy about the facts. Let me tell you what those facts are: A letter went out from the Speaker to certain senators to tell them to come to the chamber for 5:30 on October 4. The Speaker resumed the sitting at 5:25, and this appears at page 2343 of Hansard, October 4, 1990. There it shows that at 5:25 the Speaker said: "Let the doors to the chamber be locked".

Honourable senators, if that is not a breach, if that is not a lock-out, I don't know what is. And Senator Everett said on the record that he had to force his way in to vote after that time. Now, if that is not a breach of privilege, I don't know what is.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, including Senator Grafstein, debated this at very great length—

Senator Grafstein: I have not debated this point.

Senator Murray: —last week. It finally degenerated into the bell ringing, whistle blowing, desk banging circus that took place here on Friday last. We thought we had reached agreement on how to end that, but that agreement has been breached and apparently thrown out the window by one side.

• (1130)

Senator Olson: No, that's not true.

Senator Stanbury: You only say that when Senator Frith isn't around.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Murray: Having said that, honourable senators, we now find ourselves in a position where Senator Ottenheimer, who suspended the sitting for 20 minutes in order to reflect upon the points that had been made by Senator Austin, myself and, perhaps, by others, has returned to the chamber. And by all the practice that is known in this place he ought to resume the Chair to tell us what he has to say, to tell us the status of our various motions and so forth. That is the orderly thing to do.

Senator Olson: Just bulldoze away.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators—

Senator Ottenheimer: Would Senator MacEachen allow me to say a word? This might be helpful.

Senator MacEachen: Certainly.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, there are two things I want to say. First, with respect to Senator MacEachen's entry into the chamber, actually I had already said whatever words I did say, to the effect: "I suspend the sitting of the Senate for 15 or 20 minutes". I was out of the Chair and off the platform when Senator MacEachen entered, or when I saw him.

Senator Grafstein: Not so! Not so!

Senator Ottenheimer: The honourable gentleman has his opinion, but I do think we can take one another as being truthful. I am not lying. I did not say, "when he was here;" I said, "when I noticed him" or "when I heard him". This is not like a horse race. There is no photo finish.

I was then of the opinion that I had left the Chair and was down off the Speaker's platform when Senator MacEachen came in, or when I saw him, or when I heard him say something to the effect that he wished to speak on this. I did not think I could then go back into the Chair. That is the point I wish to make—not to argue, just to make.

Senator Grafstein: Would Senator Ottenheimer just answer one short question?

Senator Tremblay: Wait a minute!

Senator Grafstein: Was Senator Austin not still standing, asking—

Senator Doody: He is coming to that.

Senator Ottenheimer: Senator Grafstein, I am coming to that. There were two points that I wanted to communicate to honourable senators, and not argumentatively. The first one I have come to.

The second one is this: As I recall the latter part of the events, Senator Austin was speaking on the matter of privilege. Senator Murray got up. I do not recall all of what he said, but he made reference to a motion he had made with respect to which he had previously asked whether the Chair had heard enough evidence to make a determination. There was inherent in that a previous question; that is, whether the Chair had the authority to make such a determination.

It was certainly my intention, on coming back in, if I could have resumed the Chair, to have heard Senator Austin. In the coming together of all of these events and the lack of an atmosphere in which one necessarily thinks or hears as one should think or hear, I realized that apparently Senator Austin had not finished his speech. I was indeed going to hear him before getting into the ruling. To say anything else would be hypothetical.

Those are the two points, one with reference to Senator MacEachen and one with reference to Senator Austin. That is all I wish to point out.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I appreciate what Senator Ottenheimer has said. The question of privilege that is before the chamber is one raised on the conduct of Senator Charbonneau. The point is that his conduct is objectionable and has abused privileges of members of the Senate.

Senator Stanbury: There is no doubt about that.

Senator MacEachen: That is the question of privilege, that in his ruling he has blatantly disregarded the practice and the rule of the Senate, and that even the lock-out technique was used in order to prevent members, for five minutes, from entering the chamber. That is the question of privilege.

It is directed against the Chair. Here we are asking the accused to exonerate himself. I think in this case that the Chair ought not to take upon himself the decision whether to terminate a debate which affects his conduct. It is unthinkable that the Chair should do that. That is my view.

The termination of the debate on the conduct of the Chair ought to be done by consensus of the house. The Chair says, "You are attacking me and I have heard enough. I terminate your right to speak. I terminate your right to speak by fiat. And not only am I able to do that, I am also able to determine whether there is any ground whatsoever in the validity of the debate. I have the power to terminate the debate and I have the power to decide whether there is any validity in what you say."

I do not know of any Speaker in any Parliament who would undertake that. This is what I object to. I am not entering the debate as to whether the Speaker should ever say, "I have heard enough." I am not entering the debate on the question of whether he ought to have the right to discover a prima facie case. I am not entering that debate.

What I am saying is this: when the Speaker is under attack by almost half the members of the house, ought he to have the right to end the debate and to say that he has decided that members' privileges are trivial? That is what is before us. I think that Senator Ottenheimer really should disqualify himself from entertaining a decision of that kind. It is against every principle of justice that the person against whom the grievance is raised is able to decide the time to be spent on debate and whether it is valid. That is my objection.

I say further that in this case we ought to proceed by consensus to decide when we want to terminate this debate rather than have the speaker terminate it.

• (1145)

We have a shadow hanging over Senator Charbonneau and now we will ask another member of the Senate, who is in the Chair, to undertake an act that is bound to bring more difficulty, more disdain, and more disgrace. I think that we should avoid that, especially when we said yesterday that the house was finally balanced. By a further decision of the same Chair, those members are to be denied to speak further and they are to be told that they do not have any grounds at all. I think that is wrong.

With all due respect to Senator Ottenheimer, he has been a firm advocate of the government policy in the house and on procedural questions.

Senator Bonnell: He sat in the caucus also.

Senator MacEachen: He has been in caucus every time these matters have been discussed. Can he transform himself into an impartial judge in that situation? I do not think it is possible for any of us to do that, namely, to say, "I shed for this instant all my partisan activities and views and I will now be a solemn, impartial judge." I do not believe it. If the Leader of the Government persists in this unnecessary move, then he will have further difficulty.

What does it achieve? By a fiat of the Chair you might succeed in ending the debate on privilege, but what have you achieved?

An Hon. Senator: Start a new session.

Senator MacEachen: Have you restored calm to the house? Have you restored moderation? You have created another grievance and have put another member of the Senate on the dock. You have not made it any more certain that you will reach the Orders of the Day.

Yesterday I made a suggestion to the Leader of the Government that he do something to deal with this ruling to try to reduce its amplitude and to put us on a new basis to go ahead. I think we should try that to see if we can reduce the tension rather than create new tension, which this is bound to do.

What will we do in this circumstance? Senator Molgat has taken the Chair. He claimed his right to take the Chair and takes the view that he can only be removed by the arrival of Speaker Charbonneau.

An Hon. Senator: Where is he?

Senator MacEachen: Or he will not leave unless he is physically ejected by the constables. Isn't it a sand situation that we are in?

What if Senator Charbonneau comes in? Will he then undertake the job of ending the debate about his own conduct? I think this debate on privilege will end. Of course it will end—there is no question about that. We do not need this debate on privilege to say, "You might as well hear it on this subject as another." By trying to force the pace you will add to the tension, the trouble and the immoderation.

I think that Senator Murray should suspend his pressing on this point today. Just let it sit and do not ask Senator Ottenheimer to produce a verdict on this point for the reasons that I have stated. Let the debate go on. You can terminate it, but you will have bad consequences for the atmosphere of the house, which is beginning to improve.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Fairbairn: It was.

Senator MacEachen: It is beginning to improve.

Senator Austin: I was civil.

Senator MacEachen: I think it has improved. The atmosphere is decreasing, but you will increase it if you persist. Why can't you wait? Take another 24 hours and let this sit and see what happens. But do not press the issue today. That is my advice.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is the good fortune of the Leader of the Opposition and the misfortune of the Senate that he was not here last week to have applied these soothing words to the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I am doing it today.

Senator Murray: I take that point and I am glad to hear the soothing words today. Unfortunately, he was not here last week when we made an agreement on how we would move out of the situation we were in. The agreement was read into the record by Senator Frith. I dealt with it again this morning. No reasonable person reading the agreement could come to any conclusion 46 hours later but that the agreement had been dishonoured, abrogated unilaterally and thrown out the window.

An Hon. Senator: Come on!

Senator Olson: You are getting a little miffed.

Senator Stollery: You could not say that with Senator Frith in the house.

Senator Lucier: You know perfectly well that agreement was with Charbonneau out of the Chair.

Senator Murray: I was not trying this morning—

Senator Lucier: You know that, too.

Senator Murray: I am not trying now—

Senator Doody: That is true.

Senator Lucier: You knew perfectly well that we would not come back with Charbonneau in the Chair. We told you that for seven hours.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend was here last Friday and saw me hold the floor for four hours or so under much more difficult circumstances than these. I am quite prepared to hold the floor for another four hours, if necessary, to make my point.

An Hon. Senator: That's okay with me.

An Hon. Senator: Until December 31 would be all right with me!

Senator Lucier: The people of the Yukon—

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Doody: No one interrupted Senator MacEachen. Senator Lucier, try to keep it down for a few minutes. Let us try to get this place back to some semblance of order.

Senator Lucier: That's all right with me.

Senator Murray: I am trying to make a couple of points. I was not trying this morning, nor am I trying now, to put an undue burden on whoever is occupying the Chair at a particular time. I am asking—after almost 46 hours of readings about the Canadian Football League; of speeches about soil conservation; of reading verbatim into the record at great length the report of the Buckwold committee; of discussion of the GST, some of which was quite interesting; of readings, by Senator Stanbury, of biographies from the Parliamentary Guide—

Senator Lucier: And soil erosion.

An Hon. Senator: And hearing about the honourable people whose privileges you have denied.

Senator Murray: —all of these under the guise of privilege—I am asking that the Senate decide to move to the Orders of the Day, which was what the agreement we made here last Friday was all about.

Senator Buckwold: It was an agreement with conditions.

Senator Murray: The motion I made is not dissimilar to—

Senator Austin: It is not quite consistent.

Senator Murray: —in fact it is quite similar to the motion that was made by Senator Cogger on Friday. I put that motion forward not with a view to putting any particular pressure on the occupant of the Chair—there is no reason to put any pressure on the occupant of the Chair—and not so that the Chair would decide, but so that the Senate could finally decide, so that we would not be held hostage indefinitely; and so that we would be able to get on with the business of the country that is before us.

Senator Cools: This is the business.

Senator Murray: The second point I want to make is that the Leader of the Opposition has, I think unfairly, stated that what we are trying to do here is put the Chair in a position to adjudicate his own case. On the contrary, no one is asking the Chair to adjudicate his own case.

Let me put it directly to honourable senators that if they have the courage to put forward a motion of censure of Mr. Speaker, all they have to do is give notice and that debate will get on. There will then be a vote in this place.

The things that have been said about Mr. Speaker Charbonneau—never mind his conduct in his official position, but about his person, in the course of these discussions this week and last have been absolutely reprehensible in every way. It is not just that I happen to have been and am proud to be a friend of 30 years standing of Guy Charbonneau that I make a statement like that. Things have been said in this chamber about the person of Guy Charbonneau that should never be said about a dog. Some of you people should be heartily ashamed of the things that you have said in this Senate about Senator Charbonneau.

Do not worry about offending his sensibilities or anyone else's sensibilities by putting down notice of motion or a motion for censuring the Speaker—at least that would be the formal, official, and if I may say so, honourable way to proceed. We will then debate it and, ultimately, we will have a vote.

Senator Olson: With or without the eight strangers?

Senator Murray: But do not talk—

Senator Olson: They are in here.

Senator Murray: There are not eight strangers in here, senator.

Senator Olson: They are here.

Senator Murray: This is nonsense. This is an insult.

Senator Olson: It is an insult to you, not to the people of Canada.

Senator Murray: It is an insult to the Senate and to those senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Murray: There are no strangers in this place.

Senator Grafstein: What is an insult?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Murray: There are no strangers in this place.

Senator Stanbury: Let the courts decide.

Senator Grafstein: And your counsel says that it is an important, complex constitutional matter. Is that the matter that we are talking about?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: Your counsel said that.

Senator Austin: And it is an insult.

Senator Murray: And Senator Olson has said that there are strangers in this place. That being the case, I suppose he will want to get up and repeat Senator Frith's motion of one or two weeks ago that strangers be cleared from the house. Is that his next move? Look—

Senator Olson: We need to find out if there are strangers according to the law.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Olson: Let us try using the law for once.

Senator Murray: Thank you, senator. Yes, you can take your political argument into the law courts and we will see what happens.

In any case, I have suggested that, far from asking the Speaker to adjudicate that case, the honourable and proper thing for you to do is to ask the Senate to decide whether Speaker Charbonneau is guilty of all these horrendous things that you have been saying about him.

You could have appealed his rulings. I have pointed that out. You could have and still could change the rules if you do not like the precedents set by the Speaker's rulings last week.

Senator Olson: We don't do that; you do it.

Senator Murray: You could draft a new rule. I suggested that to you yesterday, namely, that you draft a new rule on privilege—

Senator Lucier: Mulroney drafted the last one.

Senator Murray: —if you did not like the precedent that was set by his ruling. But you did not appeal. You have not tried to draft new rules—

Senator Grafstein: The rules are adequate.

Senator Murray: —on holding a vote. You keep making these quite unworthy speeches about the person and the office of the Honourable Guy Charbonneau.

The time has come to fish or cut bait. If you have the courage, put forward a notice of motion—

Senator Steuart: After you people whitewash it. Don't hand me that.

Senator Murray: —expressing your views about Speaker Charbonneau. Perhaps you can find a more honourable and decent way of expressing your opinions than many of you have done in the last little while.

I will speak in favour of Senator Charbonneau, and I think my friends on this side will speak in defence of the person, the office and his rulings. We will then have a vote on the matter. All senators will have an opportunity to express themselves at that time.

Senator Lucier: When you ring the bells for that vote, who will decide when they stop ringing?

Senator Murray: That will be the proper official, if I may say so, and it will be the honourable way to proceed.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I believe I am entitled to resume my place in the order of the debate on the question of privilege.

• (1200)

I regret the tone the Leader of the Government took in response to Senator MacEachen, because I believe there is a genuine desire on our part to lower the temperature in this place.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I believe there is a problem with the sound system.

Senator Doody: Yes, there is. It has been called to the attention of the appropriate officials. There is no translation available.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I suggest, honourable senators, that the Senate adjourn while these repairs are undertaken.

Senator Austin: And I will continue when the Senate resumes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 1:45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed, the Speaker in the Chair.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators—-

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Austin to yield to me on a question of personal privilege.

Senator Austin: Certainly. I will continue after you have completed.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Honourable senators, we are learning in these circumstances a great deal about our private lives because we always seem to have to explain where we were at a certain time when something took place.

The point I wish to clear up is the question of whether there was a breach of some agreement made among Senator Murray, Senator Doody and me. The reference to this agreement is found at page 2406 of Senate Debates of October 4, 1990.

I have been told by my colleagues that Senator Murray has repeated several times that there was some breach of the agreement. Honourable senators will remember that the Leader of the Government in the Senate took that position on an occasion when I was present. At that time I put on the record the fact that we were in the course of completing the agreement. I said that we were implementing the agreement. I said that the agreement we reached before last weekend was that we would permit Senator Cogger's motion to carry.

Honourable senators will remember that Senator Cogger's motion was to say that Orders 1, 2, 3 and 4 be postponed until the next sitting of the Senate. Just to put that into context, the point was to bring Order No. 5 forward. So the effect of Senator Cogger's motion was to have us go straight to the GST legislation, to put it in simple terms. The agreement made on that point was that Senator Buckwold would move the motion for the adoption of the report because the motion for the adoption of the report had not at that time been made. It was understood he would say a few words so that there would be, to quote the Leader of the Government in the Senate, "a clean launch" of that order.

So far, so good. I am sure all honourable senators will agree with that.

The second point was that we would start with a fresh sitting on Tuesday, and that the order paper would be restored to its state at that time.

Honourable senators will know that Orders of the Day come later than the top of the order paper. The clawback legislation is Order No. 1, Bill C-21 is Order No. 2, Bill C-39 is Order No. 3 and then there is the legislation respecting copyright, Bill S-8. This is all set out at page 2406 of Senate Debates. Then we were to deal with the legislation respecting provincial laws application to offshore areas.

When we started on Tuesday that is exactly what the order paper showed.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

I have to underline again—so honourable senators will know what we are talking about—that we are talking about Orders of the Day, and that they come later than the top of the order paper.

The third point we covered was with respect to the question of privilege, and the question of everybody's position being the same.

I am at a bit of a disadvantage because I have to try to base my question of privilege on what I have been told, so if I am wrong, I am sure someone will correct me.

Those were the points we discussed in my office, and those were the points we discussed when the three of us gathered here before we got started. It was quite clear that we implemented the first part of the agreement, in that Senator Buckwold did introduce the debate on the report. That was done.

Then we had a fresh start. We were to start at the top of the order paper.

As I pointed out the last time Senator Murray raised this point when I was present, the time to deal with privilege is always at the top of the order paper. Any senator who has been here for any length of time knows that questions of privilege come at the top of the order paper.

I am repeating what I said the last time, but I thought that the matter had been laid to rest when Senator Murray raised this matter before and I stood up and said, in effect, what I have just said.

I was at home catching a couple of hours of sleep when I was told that things had taken place here and that I had better come back. When I came down here my colleagues told me that Senator Murray was saying—and correct me if I am wrong—that I had broken the agreement. Apparently the breaking of the agreement was related to something about whether Senator Charbonneau's name had been mentioned. He had not raised that point previously. The point he raised was that we were dealing with privilege and not going straight to the Orders of the Day. There was no agreement to go straight to Orders of the Day; the agreement was to go to the top of the order paper. So I thought that the matter was laid to rest and there was nothing more to be said.

Honourable senators, how could this come about? This has never happened in all of the time I have been here dealing with Senator Doody in his capacity as Deputy Leader of the Government. We have reached a number of agreements over the years. We have not had any difficulty in this regard in the past, although there was one exception last week, and I cannot recall exactly what it was, but it was not a material matter. I stood up and said that we had agreed to something and he said: "That is correct, except for one point." It had something to do with "session" rather than "sitting".

When one thinks of how long Senator Doody and I have been working together, our record is not bad. Up to now there has never been any repudiation of agreements by our side or their side.

So what record do we have on this last point? I will not go over all of the rest of it because that does not seem to be in dispute.

I have been told that Senator Murray said that Senator Charbonneau's name had never been mentioned.

Honourable senators, let me repeat what I have already put on the record. At page 2406 of Senate Debates I stated:

> Because of the way things were left on the record after the points of privilege that were raised, everyone's position will remain the same. Our position is that the vote on Wednesday should not be a precedent, and that such votes should be held in accordance with Rules 49 and 50. Proceedings for a vote are outlined on page 70 of the rules. As I say, our positions remain the same on that. Our position with respect to Speaker Charbonneau remains the same. I think that covers everything that we discussed.

In case there is any doubt, let me say again that our position with respect to Speaker Charbonneau remains the same.

I would expect that if I had misstated the position Senator Doody or Senator Murray would have stood up and said: "Wait a minute. Speaker Charbonneau was not referred to. He was not involved in this." So, let us look at the record to see if that happened. No, it did not. Senator Doody stood up and said:

> I should explain to our caucus—

That was necessary because the Liberals had had a caucus to discuss this, and I had gone back to the caucus and indicated what had taken place. The Conservatives had not had a caucus, so Senator Doody wanted to explain to his colleagues, understandably, what had taken place. He said:

> I should explain to our caucus that we did indeed have those discussions with Senator Frith, and the report that he has given is correct in every detail.

Senator Doody and I have had a six-year relationship, and Senator Doody in this case agreed that what I said was correct "in every detail", and both sides of the chamber assumed that what I had said was correct "in every detail" because of what Senator Doody said, as I would have assumed in reverse circumstances.

So I am looking for an explanation because this is the first time this has ever happened. This is the first time Senator Murray, in the same period of time, has ever repudiated an agreement or claimed that I had repudiated an agreement or claimed that Senator Doody had repudiated an agreement.

So I can think of no reason for this discrepancy, except that Senator Murray, as we are all aware, is under a great deal of pressure. He was here this morning when I arrived 5 or 5.30. He is in a very difficult position. We all make mistakes.

If the allegation is that Senator Charbonneau, or anything dealing with Senator Charbonneau, was not a part of the agreement, and I put that on the record, and Senator Doody said: "It is correct in every detail", I do not know what else I can say.

I cannot think of any other explanation except that Senator Murray forgot, and I understand how that could happen in the position he is in—to some extent the position we are all in, but there is nobody here under more pressure than he is.

That is the only explanation I can give for the fact that there seems to be a misunderstanding about the agreement, even though it was put on the record, was correct in every detail, was raised again when I put it on the record and not challenged, and then when I was away apparently this came up.

If I am wrong about what Senator Murray has said, then I am sure I will be corrected.

• (1400)

Thinking back, I cannot remember any situation that was clearer. The explanation can only be that Senator Murray misunderstood and did not rise to repudiate what I said at the time—nor did he the second time I dealt with it, or when I raised it for the third time. The only reason I can see for that is that he, like anyone under a great deal of pressure, can make mistakes.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will take a couple minutes of your time because I have already stated my views on this matter on several occasions, and I—believe it or not—dislike repeating myself.

Senator Frith: I know how you feel.

Senator Murray: The agreement we reached was not only an agreement between the leadership of our two parties and the house, it was one on which the Liberal caucus was consulted. I believe all of us who were present were parties to that agreement.

If Senator Frith had said to us that they would pass Senator Cogger's motion Friday afternoon, proceed to have Senator Buckwold move adoption of his report then give us the weekend off, and come back Tuesday and see what happens, I would have known what he had in mind. I would have come back and consulted my caucus, and I would have been thrown out on my ear for ever suggesting such a thing.

Senator Frith did not do that. He came in here instead, and, at the invitation of Senator Doody and me, placed the agreement on the record. Not only did he say that we would be starting with a fresh sitting and at the top of the order paper—he could have sat down if that was all there was to it—he then went on to discuss what would happen, as he saw it, with the various items of legislation. He said Bill C-28 could be passed with a short debate; Bill C-39 would pass; he might have a word about Bill S-8; and then Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, as I said this morning—not once but several times and I will repeat it one last time for the record—I will content myself with what is on the record at page 2406 of the Debates of the Senate of October 4, 1990. Any reasonable person who reads that can come to no other conclusion than the following: on Tuesday we were going to meet, go through the routine proceedings and work our way down the order paper to the GST report, and Senator Buckwold would complete the speech he started so briefly on Friday night. If you asked any reasonable person, upon reading this agreement, whether it could be expected that 48 hours after Tuesday's session had begun Tuesday's session would still be going on and that we would be consumed with lengthy speeches on alleged questions of privilege—speeches having to do not with Bill C-28, C-21, C-39, S-8 or C-62, but rather with the Canadian Football League, soil conservation, Senate reform and all manner of things under the guise of privilege—if that arrangement had been contemplated, the answer would have been no.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: I will leave what I have said on the record. The agreement is on the record. What Senator Frith has said is on the record, and, frankly, I suggest he is playing with words.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Balfour: Give someone else a turn!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not have much to add. It has all been said. I want to say that the term "repudiation" is a strong word. Neither Senator Murray, myself nor Senator Frith repudiated the agreement we made on Friday. What has obviously happened is that I was far too naive in not being more specific in the wording of the agreement. I have had, as Senator Frith pointed out, the good fortune of being able to deal with my good friend across the way many times over the past six years. We have worked out many details—some contentious and some routine—to the satisfaction of both sides, and I would like to see that situation continue. I do not believe that this legislature or any other legislature can function unless there are channels of communication open between both sides where matters can be resolved.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: There are things that arise from time to time that cannot be resolved on the floor of the chamber. There has to be some good feeling and open-mindedness on both sides to resolve difficulties when they arise. If ever that truism was demonstrated, it was demonstrated in this place over the past week.

Senator Thériault: Right on!

Senator Doody: I must say one thing in my own defence in accepting the terms of that agreement. I offered to explain what the terms of the agreement were, as I saw them, to our caucus. Senator Frith had already done so, and I said his assessment of the situation was correct in every detail. I am not so dishonest as to suggest that had I known that I had agreed to 40 hours of debate on a question of privilege I would not have felt obligated to reveal this to my colleagues as a reason for having given them a weekend off. I do not think it would have been a deal I could have convinced them to accept; nor would my position as the Deputy Leader have lasted long had I accepted such a deal. That may well have been implicit in the agreement. If it was so, I did not realize it, nor would I have agreed to it at that time.

[Senator Murray.]

I can only say to honourable senators on both sides of the chamber that I will be far more careful next time, but hopefully the situation will not repeat itself and we can get back to the stage we were at before this unfortunate situation occurred.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with what Senator Doody said about the need to maintain the openness of these channels, as they are sometimes called. I think we can close it by saying that we have no intention of changing that relationship. I am sorry and I understand how Senator Murray may have got into trouble with his caucus as the 40 hours developed. I can tell him—if he can sympathize with me—that if I had said that we would be debating C-62 for sure on the Tuesday, I also would have been thrown out of my caucus on my ear.

Senator Doody: Even if you had said Wednesday or Thursday!

Senator Frith: We would have all been thrown out on our ears. We should realize that there are a number of things we agree to, and one is that at no time did I ask for, anticipate or insist on 40 or any other number of hours nor did my friends opposite agree to any number of hours. In fact, they may have thought it was unreasonable for anyone to think, as an implication of the fact that we would be continuing with our point of privilege, that it would last that long.

I have found that we all tend to invoke the doctrine of the reasonable man when we wish to reinforce our interpretation or anticipation of events or agreements. Senator Murray says that no reasonable person would expect that to flow from this agreement. Others might say if you understood that there was no limit placed and it is a point of privilege, it could happen that that would be reasonable. One way or the other, we both feel the record justifies us and we have explained our positions. We understand each other better, and I think we should close this discussion with Senator Doody's statement and description: Let us hope that such an unfortunate result of an agreement and that this unfortunate situation—I think that is the word he used—does not occur again.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am pleased that I am allowed to resume my question of privilege, which I began some hours ago and was much interrupted. I appreciate the comments of the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government and the two house leaders when they said that they are restoring, at least to some extent, the comity and the accord that is necessary in this chamber if its business is to be done.

The question of privilege raised by Senator Stewart (Antigonish Guysborough) relates to the unprecedented actions of the Speaker in determining when a vote would be held, who would be given notice of that vote, when the doors would be closed and who would be allowed to be present when the doors were closed. I said this morning—and I will not repeat it at length—that my privileges as a senator were denied by that behaviour and that the Speaker lacked, in his actions, any elemental fairness or concept of natural justice and he abused the rules as they stand.

Honourable senators, when Senator Murray interrupted me in mid sentence this morning, I was referring to a work by Frank Andrew Kunz entitled Second Chambers: A Comparative Study. This paper has special reference to the Senate of Canada and is dated December 1960. Honourable senators will recall that the point I was making related to the way in which, by convention and precedent, the Senate conducted its business and the positions of senators in discharging their responsibilities as legislators. I mentioned the words of Senator Arthur Meighen in 1937. I will repeat those words because they are significant to the point I was making. He says:

> They—

meaning honourable senators

> —have to make up their minds to give every Government fair play and not to stand in the way of legislation unless they are convinced it must be defeated on its merits, and that the consequences of the failure to defeat it would be serious . . .

Honourable senators, there is additional material that I believe is highly relevant to the question of privilege. I move to page 243 where Mr. Kunz says:

> In 1919 Sir R. Borden's bill to do away with the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement on the rates of wheat and wheat-products failed to pass a Senate composed of a majority of Conservative Senators. The Bill was postponed until 1925-26, and then the Government of that day—being Mr. King's government > —refused to repeal it and it has remained the law of the country.

It goes on:

• (1415)

> By its impartial action—

by this he means the impartial action of the Senate:

> —the Senate saved prairie farmers $26 million per year for 29 years or a total of $754 million. 'What the Senate saved in 1919, the Prairie provinces, through their membership in both Houses of Parliament, have jealously guarded ever since'.

This chamber saved the Crow's Nest Agreement for the farmers on the Prairies. It was this Chamber that defeated a Government bill seeking to withdraw statutory spending commitments.

Mr. Kunz goes on:

> Again, in 1936 when Prime Minister King brought up the Bill to amend the Railway Act, there were 63 Conservatives, most of them appointed by Sir Robert Borden, and 32 Liberals in the Senate. Some of the Opposition Senators said they were determined to block the Bill because it did away with the Commission form of the CNR and put them under political directors. But a sufficient number of Conservative Senators maintained that the CNR had been losing upwards of $50 million a year and in the election Mr. King and his supporters had promised if they were elected they would bring in legislation that would put the CNR in a position where the deficits would disappear. The Bill was passed.

That Bill was passed by a combination of Liberal and Conservative senators.

I read on:

> During a Senate debate in 1945, Senator Euler reminded the House that the very first vote that he and nine other of his fellow Liberals cast in the Senate was against the Bill which proposed to apply the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to the Province of Manitoba. They proposed an amendment that decisions should be subject to appeal. When that amendment was rejected by the Commons, the Senate insisted on it. The result being that the Bill died a natural death. And he added "It is to the credit of the Senate of Canada that its members have seldom availed themselves of their power to exercise a partisan spirit."
> In 1951 the fight in the Senate against a Government Bill passed by the Liberal majority in the Commons was headed by Liberal Senator Crerar, former Minister of Agriculture, who stated flatly: "There is no justification for the Government paying a single cent, and I say it as a farmer of Western Canada and one who will be a beneficiary through the 4 and one-half cents a bushel being added to the wheat payment." At the final vote eight other Liberal senators showed their political independence by opposing the Government and voting against the payment.
> It may be recalled that the Senate votes of 21 - 11 on the Estate Tax Act in 1958, already referred to, also cut across party lines.
> And referring to the controversial Naval Bill of 1973, Senator McIntyre said in 1951 that "If a similar Bill were to come before us today the Senate should again protect the Canadian taxpayers. The Senate showed its independence when it defeated the Naval Bill, and it has continued to do so throughout the years."

Then he said something which I believe is very much in doubt today:

> There are no party politics in this Chamber and I hope there never will be.

What we have seen is this Senate Chamber taking a number of actions to deal with spending bills and defeating those bills or deferring those bills or refusing to act on those bills. This is well within the precedents, well within the authority of this Chamber.

Let me make a few more reference to Mr. Kunz' paper:

> There are reasons to suggest that we can dismiss today the proposition that the idea of a Second Chamber is incompatible with the requirements of democracy. Indeed, it is perhaps the very requirements of democracy which call for the existence of a Second Chamber. It has been > suggested repeatedly in this study that one of the "raison d'être" of a second chamber is to try to keep watch, through various legislative and executive devices, over the increasing power of the Executive. Now, as an objection to this notion, one may choose either of two arguments. On the one hand, one might admit that the real danger to the fundamental principle of Western liberalism, that is to the highest possible development of individual personalities, comes from the legislative and executive omnipotence of the Government, but one might refuse to agree that a Second Chamber is the most effective protection against such a challenge. Yet, the question arises: If not Second Chamber, what else? All proposals are welcomed. But there are none. On the one hand, one might reject the notion outright that an omnipotent Executive involves any danger at all, arguing that it may well be much more harmful if a government is restricted and cannot act promptly, than if it is completely uncontrolled. Consequently the argument in favour of a Second Chamber as a check over the Executive is immediately lost. However, I am sure few people would disagree that the lesson to be drawn from the first 60 years of the Twentieth Century clearly indicates that the greatest single source of danger to individual freedom is the power of an unrestricted Executive. True, to agree on the scope of this danger, one must prefer freedom to speed and effectiveness in governmental operations. Therefore, the problem in the final resort remains a question of value-judgment. However, what I am contending is that once it is agreed on that a Second Chamber is needed for the performance of protecting and controlling functions, it is inconsistent to divest it of all sources of power. It may be argued that Second Chambers are needless; in this case they should be abolished. But if it is admitted that they are needed, they should be powerful.

I think that case is incontrovertible and I find that the editorial mentioned by Senator Murray in his address to this Chamber in these proceedings is completely flawed. This is the editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press under the title "Tyranny of the Bells".

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator tell us which copy of the Quorum that is?

Senator Austin: This is from our Quorum of Wednesday, October 10, page 22. It states:

> Canada should erect a statue on Parliament Hill to Senate Speaker Guy Charbonneau.

After that it goes on to argue that Mr. Charbonneau struck a mighty blow for the rights of Parliament. This, of course, is the question of privilege that is before us. He struck a mighty blow against the privileges of parliament, in my view.

The article's principal position is that the business of the government is the business of Parliament, that the business of the government is the business of the people. The argument says in part:

[Senator Austin.]

> The reason the bells are rung is to call the members to a vote. When one party demands a recorded vote, it is that party's clear duty to show up to be counted. If it fails to do so, the clear and obvious duty of the Speaker is, after a reasonable time, to get on with the business of Parliament.
> Why the Commons Speaker in 1982, Jeanne Sauvé, did not exercise her common sense and defend the rights of Members of Parliament to debate and vote on public business has always been impossible to understand.

Of course, the editorial writer does not understand the point that was made by Mr. Kunz, that freedom comes before efficiency; that the rights of Parliament come before the government program.

There is no basis of explanation, but clearly the argument is badly founded and is on the opposite side of the position of the same newspaper in 1956 during the pipeline debate. That is not to say that the Winnipeg Free Press is the only newspaper in Canada that is inconsistent in its editorial policy.

I would like to read a letter from a citizen, which appears in the Financial Post of today. It appears under the title "Senate playing proper role in debate". It is on the editorial page, page 12. It is written by Henry Berry of Toronto, whom I do not know. He states:

> In the constitutional turmoil of our day, is the Senate obstructing the will of the people as expressed through their elected representatives or is it protecting the people from their elected representatives and government?
> Elected politicians, party leaders, prime ministers and students of political theory know that our democratic system of government is also undemocratic, that our so-called representatives, once elected, often represent us no longer and that laws and policies can be imposed upon an apathetic, uninformed, powerless and often slumbering electorate without any fear of retribution until the next election.
> The elected government of any nation of several million inhabitants, in order to govern, has required the assumption that the majority of the citizenry are ignorant and uninformed, that policies at and between election be made by the party system, that elected members merely represent their constituency, that they are not delegates of that constituency and that they can therefore act independently of it but not independently of the party, caucus or cabinet.
> The last few decades have seen a growing dissatisfaction for these reasons and greater citizen participation in decision-making has become the slogan of the participatory democracy movement. Elected governments have shown that their authority must be limited by something more than a general election held every five years.
> The Senate is presently acting in a way to limit the power of the legislators. In the system of checks and balances that is government, a Senate or upper chamber has had a responsibility which has gone beyond that of the mere vote getter. The Senate, in its ideal role, as an unelected body, not one influenced by the considerations of the next election, but as a body appointed by the elected, can take a larger view of issues and it can examine, suggest amendments and delay legislation it regards as unwise or intemperate. The institution of the Senate is one form of check on the elected government. A free vote in the House of Commons, in which individual members are able to vote according to the will of their constituency rather than at the command of their cabinet and prime minister is also a form of restraint of otherwise unchecked party authority.

Another useful check is that of the referendum. If the assumptions about democracy as they are promoted by the politicians and political parties at election time are correct, namely, that the populace are willing and intelligent enough to understand the issues and make an informed choice, the referendum is an instrument of truly participatory democracy which must come into use with some frequency.

Elected governments, when faced with wide-spread disapproval of their policies and intentions or when devising legislation that will significantly affect the nation, the lives and habits of its people, their traditions and values, their ability to work, to earn, to save, to secure their property and to conduct their business, should be required to consult the populace and to respond to the general will.

The Senate's action of the past few weeks in obstructing the passage of the goods and services tax, although drawn along party lines, has been in response to the will of the majority of Canadians.

Honourable senators, I submit to you that it is the duty, the obligation and responsibility of honourable senators to deal with these questions of damage to the Canadian governments and of an arbitrary government which cares not about the will of the people. We are doing our job in delaying legislation so that the arguments on the merits of this legislation can be seen and can be understood by the people of Canada. It is the job of the Opposition to oppose. If we did not have the witnesses who came before the Banking Committee, if we did not have the wide-spread evidence in the country of the unpopularity of this legislation, then perhaps the legislation should be allowed, however in error. But there is wide dissatisfaction with this legislation. It is our responsibility to deal with that dissatisfaction and to hold the government to account.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, my own province of British Columbia, as I have said in this chamber, is opposed to the GST legislation. A unanimous resolution of the legislature of the province of British Columbia has urged this Parliament and the senators from British Columbia in Parliament to oppose the GST legislation. I cannot do my job as a senator when I am deprived, in an arbitrary fashion by the Speaker, contrary to the rules of the chamber and to the rules of justice, of my opportunity to participate in this debate and to participate in properly arranged votes.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, today I want to discuss, as all senators on this side are discussing, the fact that our privileges were breached in the most unbelievable and undemocratic way last week. In case anyone forgets—and sometimes I think some members of this house and some members of the press do forget—what brought all of this on was an unbelievable breach of the rules. I shall read from the rules in the hope that new senators opposite remember them. Some day they may be on the other side and may find someone trying to breach their rules—I hope to God not—the way the Speaker has breached ours.

At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote. The Speaker puts the question again. All senators in favour of the motion rise, and the Clerk of the Senate records their names on the division sheet. All senators opposed to the motion rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. All senators who wish to abstain then rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. The Clerk announces the official result of the division, giving the number of "yeas", the number of "nays", and the "abstentions". The Speaker then declares the motion carried or lost.

That did not happen, as senators know. One Whip evidently came in, and the Whip representing almost half of the members of the Senate did not come on.

Why did we not come in? We did not come in because we were not notified.

I want to refer for a moment to what Senator Pitfield has said. Senator Pitfield is an independent senator and he received notice. I never received notice. As I have said before, I do not think that should be dependent on the Whip—who wasn't even in his office, by the way, when that notice was sent to him—but I will deal with that in a moment.

Senator Pitfield said what I think is the most damning thing against the Speaker and against Conservatives, or some on that side of the house, that could be said. He said that he turned to a Conservative senator, indicating that he was going somewhere. The Conservative senator replied to him, "I wouldn't go too far because the Speaker is going to call a vote." As Senator Pitfield said, that proved, beyond any shadow of a doubt, collusion. There was a deal made.

I cannot remember, in all the long time I have been in the legislative assembly, in this chamber or paying attention—and that is ever since the second World War—ever hearing a charge, except on one occasion, that the Speaker took his orders from the government. And we all know that infamous case. That man disappeared. He lost one of the great careers in Parliament. He left Parliament in disgrace.

Honourable senators, I think the same thing should happen here. I think the Speaker should do the decent thing. He is an embarrassment, unfortunately, to this chamber, to the Senate and to the people on that side of the house. I think he should do the decent thing and resign.

I now come to the question Senator John Stewart raised about the time at which the vote took place. He looked at his watch. He got down here and couldn't believe it because the vote was taking place three, four or five minutes before the time shown in the notice. Then, the next day, he checked the record and found out that, indeed, the vote had taken place before the time given in the notice. What does that prove? It proves, among other things, that there was collusion. It proves that this was a cooked up deal to deny us our privilege, the most basic privilege that we have in this chamber or in any Parliament or any legislature, and that is the right to vote.

It proves something else. It proves the absolute ineptness, the inability, of Senator Lowell Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and whatever small gang he has around him—and I certainly do not point to most of the people on that side—to handle anything. I am talking about his inability even to pull off a little, sneaky deal, you might say, in the middle of the night to force his will on an Opposition that is standing up against him. They should call that bunch over there "The Gang That Couldn't Shoot Straight". Every time Lowell Murray goes to shoot us, he shoots himself in the foot, and at the same time he shoots his Prime Minister in the head.

Honourable senators, let us look at his record. The Prime Minister has entrusted Lowell Murray with some tremendous responsibilities. One of the reasons that a great many people voted for the Conservatives under Prime Minister Mulroney was that he said he would bring peace and order to this country. He said that Prime Minister Trudeau had divided the country, had ruled by confrontation, and that he would bring the country together as a united nation.

At first, it looked like he would do it. He called the premiers together. He gave them practically everything they wanted. I remember the press describing the first federal-provincial conference presided over by Prime Minister Mulroney as a "love-in". There was nothing in the air but friendship and good will.

Let us look at the situation today. Is the Prime Minister going to pull this nation together and make it, in the words of his great friend, George Bush, a kinder, gentler nation? Honourable senators, the country has never been so divided. It has never been so close to falling apart or being pulled apart. Find me one province—it used to be Saskatchewan, but it is not any more—with the exception of Quebec, whose Premier is on the side of Brian Mulroney. You cannot find one.

The country has never been is such disarray. And the point man for the Conservative government and Brian Mulroney has been Lowell Murray.

[Senator Steuart.]

Let us look at the next job he was given, the GST. That is the centrepiece of the economic plan of Brian Mulroney and Mr. Wilson to pull this nation out of debt, although again, that is not what they told the people to begin with.

Senator Murray made a mess of the GST. He said, "I can't get the GST through the Senate because the Liberals have the numbers." The Prime Minister fixed that and gave him eight more senators. Well, now they say over there that they do not have a majority, they have a plurality, and they can win the vote if they get one. But he still cannot get it through. He is still in a mess. Every time he tries to make a move to get his way, he gets in deeper, he gets into a bigger mess.

He has this side of the house so riled up that, if we were not ready to fight before, we are now. If we were ready to put up a mere token fight—I never was and most of us never were, but that is what the public thought—I can tell you, and I will tell the public today, that there is no tokenism. We are here to the bitter end. We are going to fight this thing as long as we can. And I can tell you something—that is going to be a long, long time.

I wouldn't bet on January 1 if I were you people. I wouldn't even bet on January 15.

Then Senator Murray tries to pull his latest deal off and even misses on that. Would anyone with any common sense believe that we would have agreed to the deal that was supposedly made between Senator Frith and Senator Doody? Let us look at the other side of the coin. If what Senator Murray said was true, then tell me what we would have got out of it. Why would we have made such a deal? We were filibustering. We were outraged at what happened and we were holding out to get that unbelievable breaking of the rules expunged, to say that it never existed, that it is not a precedent. We wanted that changed.

We wanted the Speaker out, and we wanted some changes in the rules on the bell ringing so that there would be some order in here. We never got any of those things, so would we have agreed to stop the fight against the dictatorship of this Speaker? That is nonsense. Both sides gave a little. We agreed to begin the debate on the GST, but we never agreed to give up our right to keep on fighting over this question of privilege.

How did senators opposite think they would get away with it? Well, they thought the press would go along with them. They thought that the press generally has no use for the Senate as an institution, and I am afraid that that feeling is there with most of the press, as it is with most of the public. But Senator Murray guessed wrongly again, because some of the responsible press saw through this. Although they still don't like the Senate, and still think it should be reformed, done away with or elected, they said that what was done was wrong. The irony of it is that the Conservatives did not have to do it. They just had to wait a little while. If they had waited a little while, we would have got past this stage and on to the next stage. Whether they could have stopped us at the next stage I do not know, but they certainly would not have been here debating this for 26, 30, 35 hours or I whatever length of time we are going to go.

I do not know why the Prime Minister does not change Senator Murray's responsibilities. I do not know how long he is going to hang on with a man who has proven that, no matter what he is given—Meech Lake, the GST, anything—he cannot handle it.

Honourable senators, can you imagine a man going across Canada on Meech Lake, to a province, for example, not in favour of the agreement—Newfoundland or New Brunswick—and, before he goes, he announces over and over again that the agreement is a seamless web, that there can be no change, not a comma, not a period? Of course, in negotiations he got nowhere. And of course, we went through that terrible display that went on for days and days over at the Conference Centre, before it finally collapsed. It took one lone Indian standing up in his legislature to say "No", and it took Clyde Wells to stand up and say "No" for us to find out the depth of bad feeling about Meech Lake in this country.

I have said that some of the press went along with the Tories. They still do. No matter what we do in the Senate, they attack us. That is up to them. I have a feeling that, if we had a competitive press in this nation, some of the people who write for newspapers would be lucky to carry them. But some of the responsible press in the country have seen what the Conservatives are trying to do. They have written editorials and columns to show them up.

• (1445)

Honourable senators, the press say that they want the Senate reformed. Well, who doesn't? They say they want the rules reformed. Who doesn't? The rules of the Senate were made for a far different time and a far different Senate from what we have today. But rules are not changed by an arbitrary decision. The rules of any institution are changed by setting up a committee of both sides to study the situation, to come back, to make compromises and then to reach consensus. That is the way rules are changed.

Honourable senators, people talk about an elected Senate. I have never believed in an elected Senate. I used to say to people, "In Saskatchewan we have 14 members elected," and I would hear people say, "We are not represented." You hear people in Alberta saying that they are not represented, because even though they elect 14 members to represent 800,000 people in Saskatchewan the public is saying, "They cannot do the job. How would you like to elect six more and send them down to see if they can do the job that the people that you sent down years ago cannot do?"

So I have changed my mind, because I have seen that under our system, if you elect a majority government, you in effect have elected a dictatorship for four or five years. There needs to be a system of checks and balances.

If we had an elected Senate today do you think for a moment that we would be debating the GST in its present form? They would have known that every senator in western Canada almost without exception, regardless of political stripe; every senator in eastern Canada, regardless of political stripe; and every senator in the north; would have been against it. They would have changed it. They would never have brought it in. They would have sat down with the Senate of the day, the elected Senate. There would have been give and take, and they would have brought in a tax reform that would have passed.

I will tell you something about the Liberal government that was in power. Do you think the oil policy or the energy policy would have been put in if there had been a free vote in the Senate or the Senate had been an elected body? I will tell you this: there would not have been a senator from western Canada who was Liberal who would have voted for it. There is a gentleman here, Senator Buckwold, who stood up against it. There were not many of us; we had no power and it went through. But, if we had had an elected Senate it would not have gone through the way it did.

There were, however, some good things about the energy policy as well as some very bad things. But the bill would have been reformed. In other words, if we had an elected Senate the government of the day would have to sit down with someone other than the cabinet or the few people—not so few anymore, actually—in the Langevin Block who are gathered around the Prime Minister of the day to decide what the policy is. They could call in their people from the backbenches and say, "This is the policy, like it or lump it." In the case of the GST, if any of them did not like it how did the government act? They threw them out of the caucus.

The Prime Minister and some of his ministers have attempted for six or seven years to bully the Senate, to downgrade the Senate and to call us names in the paper, out in the hall, and everywhere. They have threatened that they will do away with us.

I remember a colleague who stood up and said, "It will be the end of them and we will do away with them." He knew he was talking blarney; so did we. But the public thought that was pretty good.

Brian Mulroney now wants to change the Senate, and I would challenge him to do so. Let him bring in a bill in the House of Commons to have an elected Senate with a little more equal representation for the regions; let him pass it and send it here. Even if we wanted to, we could only hold it up for six months. But he has not brought it in.

Pierre Trudeau said he wanted to change the Senate; he never brought any changes in. Every Prime Minister since the nation started said that he wanted to change the Senate, but the Senate is still the same. The Senate has the power.

The Senate has not only the legal right, but in the case of the GST it has the moral right. Millions have written to us, phoned us and have appeared at our cross-country hearings and said, "Do not put this terrible tax on us." That is why we are here fighting. I don't understand why some of you who are taking your orders from Brian Mulroney are not standing up. I hope before this debate is finished—that is, when we get onto the debate of the GST—you will stand up and say, "Look, I have looked at it and listened. I have seen the tricks and the way that you have denigrated and degraded the Senate. I have had enough. I will either vote against it, or speak against it, or I will not vote at all.

Senator Buckwold: There were two who did that in the House of Commons.

Senator Steuart: And what happened to them?

Senator Buckwold: They had the guts to do it.

An Hon. Senator: They were kicked out.

Senator Steuart: But at least they can sleep at night. I think some of you new members may have a little trouble sleeping at night—maybe some of the old ones as well.

I have been doing some reading on the role of the Opposition in Parliament—that is, in the House of Commons and in the Senate—and never forget that we are part of Parliament. We are the upper house of Parliament.

I discovered a paper by Gerald Schmitz, who writes for the Library of Parliament. I want to read some of the things that he has to say about not only the position of the opposition in Parliament but also the position and the role that politics plays in both the opposition and the government side. He says that a situation in which the activity of politics is devalued is bad for parliamentary democracy. He goes on to state:

> Parliament, after all, is fundamentally about debate—"rhetoric" in the classical Greek sense—and the transacting of the people's business in public. It is also about the right to dissent in a civilized manner.

I must say that last week we were debating, but not in a civilized manner. I hope that that does not happen again. But try and ram more of that down our throats and we will take whatever action we have to take to defend our rights and the rights of people in the future who will sit either on this side or on that side.

When our rights were abridged and were taken away from us, you members over there might not realize it but your rights were taken away, too. Someday you will be back over here. Some Liberals will be back over there and they will be in the majority. If they decide that they do not like something and they have that precedent that the Speaker, working with some of you people, tries to leave on the books, then you will be as handcuffed as we are. You will suffer and democracy will suffer. Mr. Schmitz goes on to say:

> The division between government and opposition is as old as political democracy itself. In Aristotle's Athenian polity the essence of self-government was that citizens were, in turn, both the rulers and the ruled. Government could alternate among different groups of citizens, and the minority could seek to persuade a majority of its point of view by peaceful (i.e., political) means. In an age of mass politics, direct citizen democracy has been replaced, with rare exceptions, by representative systems providing for periodic elections. In turn, these electoral contests are usually dominated by a small number of political parties which select their own candidates and leaders. What has not changed, however, in our modern liberal-democratic society is the hallowed principle that government must rest on the consent of the governed—

I repeat: "It must rest on the consent of the governed." This particular move that you have embarked upon does not rest on the consent of the governed, and you know that. You are getting mail and phone calls, and you are going home to where you come from and are taking the abuse. I see it happening all the time. He goes on to say:

> Of course it is not only in British-style parliaments that this sort of ongoing legitimate contestation for decision-making power takes place. Every pluralistic democratic legislature contains both supporters and opponents of the executive. And, in all parts of the world, these legislatures are confronted with the problem of "executive dominance" in the face of modern demands for more and more government services. The complaint is often heard that because of these pressures legislative politics is inefficient, ineffective, and in danger of becoming obsolete. Accordingly, we shall look at some of the countervailing powers available to oppositions in legislatures which, through their heritage in the British Commonwealth, look to the "Westminster model" of parliamentary democracy for inspiration.
> Although one speaks of a "model," British parliamentary practice has evolved over centuries and still rests entirely on convention. The emergence of a set pattern of government and opposition is of comparatively recent origin. There was a time when the subjects thought fit for parliamentary debate were severely limited, when opposition to the government's handling of affairs of state could be considered to smack of treason, and was hence dangerous. In the 16th and 17th centuries, the Member of Parliament who went beyond presenting private, local and special grievances or bills, to oppose the Crown, or even to debate such national issues as the right of succession, foreign policy and religion, risked imprisonment or worse. Of this period the historican Macaulay commented:
> > . . . every man who then meddled with public affairs took his life in his hand . . . It was, we seriously believe, as safe to be a highwayman as to be a distinguished leader of the opposition . . .

That was a long time ago. But I am telling you one thing, honourable senators: If you can break this rule one day and another rule the next day, then don't kid yourself: don't think it can't happen here. We are watching it happen here right now. Again, I urge everyone of you to stand up and oppose it as we are opposed to it.

I want to go on now to what he talks about regarding the opposition in modern day Canada. He goes back to the position of the opposition in the case of the thirty-second Parliament 1980 to 1984. He states:

> The first session of the first parliament of the 1980s set a number of seemingly unenviable precedents which tested the stamina of both the government and the opposition. The session was the longest on record (approximate> ly 400 sitting days), not least because of several episodes in which the opposition, as a last resort, employed its tactics in order to block the normal course of parliamentary business. Yet in the end, the session gave birth to a new Canadian constitution as well as many major pieces of legislation. From the point of view of the future role of the opposition, it is important to assess how parliament acquitted itself under the strain of these extraordinary circumstances.

> Parliamentary reform rose to the top of the agenda in Canada in the late 1960s, largely as a result of the frustrating experience with successive minority governments and the exceedingly long and acrimonious debate over the adoption of a national flag. However, the reform process itself became so vexed that eventually the government imposed a series of changes to streamline the rules of debate over the strenuous objections of the opposition. Then as later, there were critics who wondered what was the use of reform, if after all, "the function of Parliament as a whole is to ventilate, not to legislate." Still, most interested observers continued to believe strongly that parliament had to be more than just a place for fruitless "ventilation." In the wake of the bitter debates of the 1980-82 session, a special Commons committee was established with a mandate to review the standing orders and procedures of the House and to suggest further reforms.

● (1500)

I want to draw that to the attention of honourable senators opposite. That government was a Liberal minority government, yet it set up the Lefebvre committee.

> During 1982 and 1983 the Lefebvre committee produced a series of innovative reports. One of the most notable early recommendations to be accepted was the automatic referral of reports from government departments and agencies to the relevant Commons standing committees—

They did other things as well. Anybody who wants to go back and read the history of 1982 will find that the changes recommended by that committee were agreed to by the opposition. They met with the opposition; they debated with the opposition; they brought in committee reports and the rules were not changed until opposition members had an opportunity to play a role and agree to changes.

> Although the election of September 1984 left the opposition caucuses smaller and weaker than in the previous parliament, one of the first initiatives of the Mulroney government was to set up a special committee on House of Commons reform, with the avowed intention of giving more clout to backbench MPs. The McGrath committee tabled its first report in December 1984 and continued its work until tabling a major final report in June 1985. As a result of the committee's recommendations, changes to the Standing Orders were made on a provisional basis in June 1985 and February 1986. In June 1987 the entire reform package, with slight additions and modifications, was made permanent.

That was Prime Minister Mulroney in his early days, the great democrat. He listened to Parliament. He set up the McGrath committee, and he worked with both opposition parties. Nothing was brought in until there was consensus.

What a difference a few years makes when the same man that took those steps, when he had a powerful majority, now turns around and gives orders to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and one or two others of his henchmen, who then hand those orders to the present Speaker.

I can tell you that if something like this ever happened in the House of Commons the members would storm the Speaker's Chair, as they have did on another occasion, and they would not stop until the order was changed.

Throughout parliamentary history reforms have taken place after a consensus was reached. Nowhere can one find where they impose the guillotine rule, as they did here last week.

Make no mistake, whether that rule is expunged from the record this week, next week, next month or next year, it will go. It has to go. If it does not go, then there is no protection for the rights and privileges of honourable senators.

This paper shows that when the rules of the House of Commons have been changed, when the rules of the Senate have been changed—and they have been changed from time to time—those changes have been agreed to.

One can study the history of this institution and I do not think one would find a situation that we have seen in this last while with one man—we know he did not act on his own—to arbitrarily change the rules, the basic rules of this institution. That is why we are saying that he must go and that this rule must be changed.

I want to say something else about the legislation that has brought about this battle, the GST legislation. More and more of the provinces are falling into line. Some of the Maritime provinces, and now Saskatchewan, are agreeing to meld the GST with provincial sales taxes. That is happening because the federal government has seduced, once more with the taxpayers' money, the provinces. The federal government has told Saskatchewan to reduce its 7 per cent provincial sales tax to 5 per cent, put it on top of the 7 per cent GST, apply it to a wider range of goods and services, so that it will make more money.

When the GST matures after one or two years it will produce billions more dollars for the federal government. If the provincial governments piggyback on top of it, they will receive billions more in revenues.

The Canadian people are the highest-taxed people in the western world. Imagine what these taxes will do to our relatively competitive position under the Free Trade Agreement. We are already suffering under the Free Trade Agreement. We are not ready to compete with the Americans. If and when this goes through, the recession we are in now will deepen and lengthen.

The Free Trade Agreement is bad enough, but this tax, combined with the Free Trade Agreement, will hurt the Canadian public, will hurt the Canadian economy—the tourist trade, for example—and I think it should be fought with everything we have. We can fight it. That is our legal and moral duty. You people opposite cannot stop us. Be warned that the government is not going to stop us. We will not stop until the government backs off. There will be so much trouble implementing this that members of the government will look back and say, "Why in God's name did we ever try to foist this on the Canadian public."

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I always enjoy listening to the spirited remarks of my fellow westerner, Senator Steuart.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Honourable Senator Perrault would allow me a brief moment—-

Senator Perrault: I would be most pleased.

Senator Marsden: —to read a letter that has been sent to all senators from His Worship, Mayor Art Eggleton of the City of Toronto. As everyone knows, Toronto is an important city in this country.

I will read the letter without comment. It states:

> "I am writing on behalf of the people of Toronto to urge you to defeat the proposed Federal Goods and Services tax.
> It is not without some trepidation that I ask you to overturn the decision of an elected house. However, the Senate has the constitutional right and the moral obligation to reject such ill-conceived measures as the GST, which threatens disastrous consequences upon Canadians and our already battered economy in general.
> The brief of the City of Toronto to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on 18 July, 1990, which was unanimously supported by Toronto City Council, outlined our deep concerns regarding the GST: it will damage, to name a few, our valuable service, fashion, film, publishing and tourism industries; It will hit hard those most vulnerable in our community, for example, those who live in weekly-rent rooming houses will be compelled to pay a GST; and it will act as a serious damper on our economy, one that threatens to turn an economic downturn into a veritable tailspin.
> For these reasons, I urge you to take decisive action and defeat the GST.

That letter is signed by Art Eggleton, Mayor of the City of Toronto.

Senator Cogger: Could you explain how that relates to the question of privilege?

Senator Marsden: I thought that since the Mayor of Toronto had just issued this, it would be of great interest to all honourable senators.

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Cogger: I thought the question on the floor relates to Senator Steuart's question of privilege resulting from the decision of the Chair last week.

Senator Marsden: Of course, all of that arises out of the goods and services tax.

Senator Cogger: If you want to read all of your correspondence into the record, and eat up more time, that is fine by me.

Senator Perrault: I think the senator's intervention was totally relevant to the point at issue here.

Senator Cogger: I asked the senator to explain to me how it was relevant.

Senator Perrault: You would not understand in any event.

Senator Cogger: Give me a try.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I always enjoy listening to Senator Steuart from Saskatchewan, who at one time was one of the most effective provincial Ministers of Finance in this country. Isn't it interesting, as we discuss this matter of privilege, that his right to talk on a range of topics is questioned by certain members in this House.

I think that this debate has gone on too long. Personally, I think we have been here long enough; but there is one easy answer to the problem, which is that there must be a clear indication that the attempt of a few days ago to rewrite the Senate rule book, or indeed to abandon it, is not going to be a precedent in this chamber. That is the key question.

If there had been some indication over these many long hours on the government side that the government's action is not to be a precedent, progress could be made here; but there has not even been a defence on the part of any senator sitting opposite of the illicit action taken by the Speaker, not even an attempt to defend these abortive actions taken by him.

Honourable senators opposite have sat there and have not contradicted any of the points made by senators on this side. They have hung the Speaker out to dry. They have, obviously, tried to cut their public relations losses.

If we had an indication that this rule book, the traditions of this chamber, will henceforward be observed, we would not have any problem advancing the people's business. We could have debates on all of the matters on the order paper.

Honourable senators, I have been in three parliamentary assemblies in my checkered career, and I have the scars to prove that. I have been in public life for 32 years, and at times it seems much longer than that. With this background, I can see accumulating in this chamber and in the other place evidence of a lack of respect and a reverence for Parliament.

Do the Conservative senators really know how the system has deteriorated since 1984? Do they realize they have used closure on more occasions than all other Governments of Canada combined in the entire history of the country? Do they remember the ringing words of John Diefenbaker and other Conservative leaders when they condemned closure as almost a form of parliamentary AIDS? They damned closure and said:

"There can be no restriction on the right of members to speak and to state their positions."

When the bells rang for 17 days in the other place, the Tories trumpeted: "These are the bells of freedom ringing out. They are sounding the Conservative concern for human rights." Yet, what happened in this chamber the other day? The bells went for three hours and the Speaker said, in his judgment, work was being impeded and we all had to come back to vote—only the Speaker did not inform all of the members of the impending vote.

At the very least, do honourable senators opposite not think that the process was rather unusual? The violent reaction was not a Liberal ploy. The only elected member in this chamber, Senator Waters of Alberta, was also pounding his desk in indignation because he had not been informed of the vote. Do you support this kind of thing?

When Adolf Hitler requested special powers after the burning of the Reichstag in 1933, they had a debate the following day and Adolf Hitler allowed the opposition to vote. He got his special powers, but not before a number of the deputies had registered their serious concern about the effect of the proposed measure on the long-term future of Germany. In the Senate of Canada, for the first time in the history of this nation, the opposition was locked out of the chamber.

• (1515)

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Perrault: That is what happened, Senator MacDonald, and you know it happened.

Senator MacDonald: Come on!

Senator Perrault: Sit down. You speak later.

Senator MacDonald: Not now?

Senator Perrault: Uncle Adolf gave the opposition a chance to vote but you did not.

Senator MacDonald: Your whip could have had all the time he wanted to get in here, and you know that.

Some Hon. Senators: Wrong!

Senator Perrault: That is not true at all.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Petten could have asked Senator Phillips for the two hours you needed to get your senators ready.

Senator Perrault: The overwhelming evidence indicates, without a doubt, complicity and collusion.

Senator MacDonald: You set up a straw man to go through three days of points of privilege.

Senator Perrault: Senator Waters, who is not associated with the Liberal Party, said it was done deliberately to him. You were all there.

Senator MacDonald: Come on! Senator Petten waved you away.

Senator Perrault: In Nazi Germany the opposition voted in 1933.

Senator MacDonald: For two hours.

Senator Perrault: In the Conservative Senate in 1990 the voters were denied an opportunity to express their opposition. That is what happened here.

Senator MacDonald: You set up a straw man.

Senator Perrault: That is what happened here. Some of you fought in World War II to defend the freedom of the Opposition.

Senator Cogger: Tell us about American football.

Senator Perrault: Where are your principles now? You would rather hear talk about football, because this hits too close to home.

Senator Corbin: At least they have rules in football.

Senator Perrault: If some of you fat cat corporate representatives went to an annual meeting of the board of directors of your favourite corporation—and many are represented in the ranks of the new senators—what would happen if you locked out the dissident shareholders and refused to allow them to vote at the annual meeting? Do you know how long you would be chairman of the board? I see one of the senators smiling over there. Use that analogy. Where is Senator Castonguay who supported, financially and otherwise, the free trade deal that you wrote, which has led to 160,000 unemployed men and women in Canada today? What would he do with dissidents at an annual meeting? If the word is out that some shareholders at this meeting are going to disagree, do you lock them out and have the vote five minutes before you promised you would? That vote was taken at 25 minutes after five, not 5:30. Were we expected to sit here and take this? Any Speaker with a sense of honour, tradition or reverence for the British parliamentary system would have resigned before yielding to government or opposition collusion. He would have left his position for the sake of unity and understanding in the Senate.

You say you want understanding. Did you hear the statement made today by Otto Jelinek, the Minister of National Revenue—who is an over-achiever if I have ever seen one? He made an obscene statement, an attack on the senators. All I can say is that Otto Jelinek is a far better figure skater than he is a cabinet minister, and he is skating on thin ice on this one. He is going to crash through the ice at any moment.

Senator Buckwold: Tell us what he said!

Senator Perrault: I am not going to repeat it. He is a pathetic excuse for a Minister of Revenue. As the Prime Minister said the other day, some people in this country should have their mouths washed out. Otto is a prime candidate. The Minister of National Revenue wants the Senate to cooperate with him, yet he is reduced to uttering blasphemies and obscenities. I fear that a lot of school children may have heard him talk that way and now think that if Uncle Otto talks that way, that is good enough for them.

The length of time that this point of privilege has taken is an insult to the Canadian people, some of whom are represented in the galleries today. This has been a huge waste of public funds. The situation could have been easily resolved by the Speaker departing from the Chair and issuing a public statement to the effect that the position of the Speaker must be beyond partisan control and, if he does not have the support of the members of this chamber, he willingly would step aside so the business of Canada can move ahead. That is all we would need. But you are going to tough it out. You are using bully-boy tactics. Don't try to give us any reasons why he should remain.

Evidence was presented the other day by Senator Pitfield that showed collusion between the government and this position of the Speaker. Having demonstrated that, any court of Canada would have found the Speaker guilty on that count; but you members on the other side decide that he is going to keep coming into this chamber. As long as he keeps coming into this chamber, we are going to keep on talking.

Speaking of instructions, that brings me to my next point. The Conservative Party has issued a directive to all Conservative members of Parliament and senators instructing them what to say when they get in difficult positions. A Conservative with a conscience gave us a copy of this. It is the game plan by the spin doctors at Conservative headquarters about how to defend yourself when you are in impossible, indefensible positions.

Senator Buckwold: Read it right through!

Senator Perrault: The truth takes a fearful battering in this mean text. Truth is lying inert on the floor battered, bewildered and defeated. The message says that when the Conservatives are pinned down, tell the people that this is a question of democracy, the right of the elected government to carry on business on behalf of the people it represents. Don't talk about the GST in detail; don't talk about the fact that it is going to hurt the people in northern Canada, the west and in the Atlantic provinces. Did the senators from the Atlantic provinces find out how this would affect you?

Senator MacDonald: Why did you vote for it here in 1987?

Senator Perrault: You will have a chance to speak later.

An. Hon. Senator: Listen to him!

Senator MacDonald: It was discussed in the banking committee.

Senator Perrault: We will listen with rapt attention to you later.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Buckwold and Senator Kirby recommended—

Senator Perrault: Who has the floor here, friends? I am on my feet. You can answer me.

The official Conservative line is to go throughout Canada and say it is a question of democracy—it has nothing to do with the GST, which is a "minor background issue". Isn't that an interesting point? They are told to tell the people they are fighting for democracy when they pull the most undemocratic parliamentary stunt in the history of Canada since Confederation. You are going to have a difficult time trying to convince people that you are the protectors of democratic principles. You have disqualified yourselves from describing yourselves as defenders of democracy when you will do this to an opposition group in this chamber.

I will describe the document. Under the table of contents is shown "Our key message"; second, is "Questions and answers"; third, "The impact of the delay"; and, four, "Conservative quotable quotes." The Conservatives were handed this at their caucus meeting two weeks ago as they walked out of the door, according to our informant. The document says that these are the sub-messages you should try to convey to the Canadian people. Tell the people that this is not about the GST. Tell that to the United Church of Canada, the Catholics and all the other churches that say what a hardship the GST will place on the poor. Tell them it is not about the GST! Tell those people who live in the north that they are now going to have to pay an additional 7 per cent when they transport goods from Toronto to Yellowknife!

Senator MacDonald: Why did you vote for it in 1987?

Senator Perrault: Tell them that for the first time in Canadian history—the year we are battling illiteracy—that you have decided to put a tax on books. Tell them that economic authorities have predicted that there is going to be a 6 per cent increase in inflation induced by the GST if introduced on January 1.

There was a report today saying that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Business Council of Canada called an emergency press conference to say that the government's policies have been wrong economically and they are terribly worried about the introduction of the GST on January 1. Have you read that? How much convincing do you need?

Senator Cogger: How does that relate to the point of privilege?

Senator Perrault: It relates to the point of privilege because you have said in this document to keep on procedure.

Senator Cogger: But the Board of Trade held a press conference today—

Senator Perrault: Senator Cogger, we will listen to you later. Here are the sub-messages. We will go through this Tory document. This could be entered for the Pulitzer Prize award for fiction. It would not make it on a factual basis. The sub-message is:

> This is not about the GST, it is about unelected Liberal senators denying the elected government its right to govern.

Of course that is the line you have been delivering at every press conference. That is all you talk about in each press scrum. You say it is the Liberals, not the GST. Not one of you have mentioned what you are going to do to the country when this measure comes in. Yes, the role of the Speaker is the immediate question in this place, but the larger debate is precisely about the GST and what it may do to this country.

Then it says:

> The Senate is currently obstructing three other financial bills. This will add a lot of money to the deficit.

Tell the folks that. That is the guidance they have given you.

The Minister of Justice is from Vancouver, British Columbia. To be kind to the Honourable Kim Campbell, she has a credibility problem, which she is wrestling with but is being defeated by it. Recently she is reported to have said:

> We just had to act against the Senate Liberals while they have been holding up all sorts of bills.

What are the facts? I want the people in this chamber to hear the facts. Until this summer's parliamentary recess, 286 government bills had been passed by the Senate since the Tories came to power in 1984. 267 were passed without amendment by the Liberal majority in the Senate; another 19 were passed with amendment, including those where the House of Commons accepted some or all of the Senate amendments. Until the recess, only two bills had been delayed because the Conservatives had refused and contrived to refuse to meet in a traditional Commons-Senate conference to resolve differences. You know that device is available when there is a deadlock. Not one bill has been rejected by the Senate since 1984, and your spin doctors want you to tell the people that these financial bills are being obstructed by the Senate. You should be ashamed of yourselves that your national party is lying to the people of Canada.

Senator MacDonald: Talk about 62!

Senator Perrault: Senator MacDonald says "Talk about 62". I am ready to go. You stay where you are and I will get into 62.

These terrible Liberals who are trying to block legislation—which is a lie—want want to add to the deficit. I feel sorry for some of the naive Tories rushing out to the battlements with this kind of misinformation. It is going to be embarrassing for them. Let us talk about Bill C-69, because this is one you say we are blocking.

Senator Cogger: 62!

Senator Perrault: We will get to it. We want to have a comprehensive understanding of our position here. We do not want any misunderstanding. We are opposed to Bill C-69 for the following reasons.

Senator Lewis: What is 69?

Senator Perrault: Bill C-69 is the bill on the government expenditures restraint act. The Conservative Party likes to tell us that we are fighting for those folks back home. Cutbacks to transfer payments to all provinces for post-secondary education and health care and cutbacks to transfer payments to Ontario, Alberta, and B.C. under the Canada assistance plan will force the provinces, because of the essential nature of the programs affected, to increase taxes. This is a bill designed to switch taxation from the federal level to the provincial level. If the provinces decide not to increase taxes, they will be forced to make cutbacks. There have already been cutbacks to essential services such as medicare in Canada. In turn, hospitals will have to close beds, limit costly operations or find other reductions. Students will have to face higher tuition fees. Incidently, I hope the students of your areas have told you what a devastating impact the GST will have on them and their attempt to struggle through university, despite the fact that there is a Conservative government.

• (1530)

They are looking at overcrowded classes and other cost-cutting measures. This is occurring despite the fact that on March 24 Michael Wilson said: "Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and provincial governments." Riotous applause greeted this statement. He said: "Let us solve these problems not on the backs of the hospitals and universities; let us solve those problems outside of that arena, my friends."

Since March 24, 1982, he has come in with a banana knife to clip off all the programs that will help the people in the areas I have mentioned. Is that Conservative integrity? Is that a government one can trust?

It is the third time since 1986 that the Conservative government has attacked the Established Program Financing since 1986. Cumulatively, EPF cutbacks between 1986-87, 1990 and 1995, amount to the astronomical sum of $31.2 billion, of which $22.2 billion should have been allocated to health care and $8.9 billion to post-secondary education. Is that why those fresh-faced new Conservative senators came here, to add their endorsation to this kind of draconian cutback to the services to the people of this country? Is that why you came?

Canada Assistance Plan cuts in assistance to the poorest in Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia contradict the government's commitment to come to the aid of those who are in need. The only people who have had a tax cut since the Tories came to power in 1984 have been the millionaires of Canada, the very wealthy. They are the only ones who have had tax cuts. We will get that on the record, too.

Senator MacDonald: Take your time, we will wait.

Senator Perrault: That is fine. I hope you will.

Let us consider taxation in Canada. The Conservatives say the present system does not work and they need more money. Let us consider the profits and taxes of the seven largest banks since 1981. The aggregate profits amounted to $916 million in 1981 while federal income tax paid was $8 million, or a .87 per cent tax rate. In 1982 there were $951 in aggregate profits, with $7 million in federal income tax paid, for a .74 per cent aggregate tax rate. In 1983 there were $1.641 billion in aggregate profits, $41 million in federal income tax paid for a tax rate of 2.44 per cent.

In 1984 there was $1.865 billion in profits with only $17 million in income tax paid for a tax rate of 1.91 per cent.

From 1981 to 1984 inclusive, it is alleged that Canada's largest banks made profits of $5.373 billion and paid federal taxes on these profits at a rate of 1.34 per cent. It is alleged that persons at the wickets of the bank are paying higher tax rates than the banks themselves.

These allegations are appalling, whether they apply to the situation before the government came to power or afterwards.

I question whether we are properly developing the resources of our present tax system.

As we went across Canada with the tax committee, the message was clear. It came through clearly to Senator MacDonald. People said that they did not mind paying taxes because we have a large debt and a deficit, but they wanted to make sure the GST tax system is not regressive, that it is fair, and that the very wealthy would not get away with a lesser proportionate burden. That was the inspiring testimony of the several witnesses who testified before the committee this summer. They just want the tax to be fair.

Yet, how can one believe in the GST when Dalton Camp, the former adviser to the cabinet, was telling the Toronto Star a few weeks ago that the tax is regressive, of course, but the election is still a long way away and people will forget about how regressive it is. He said: "We are good at public relations."

Is that the kind of cynical attitude you want to support as Conservatives? Your public relations guru admits that it is a regressive tax. It will hurt young people and young families. It will hurt people on social welfare. It will hurt the poor more than the rich.

Bill C-69, the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program, faces elimination less than two years after it was introduced. It was a campaign promise that was implemented for a few months to help the Conservatives get elected and then withdrawn. The Minister of State for Forestry and Mines said on May 3, 1988, that 30 per cent will be guaranteed for two years until the end of 1990. The mining regions of the north and junior exploration companies will be the hardest hit by the elimination of this program.

They say that Bill C-21 is another bill being blocked by the Liberals. If we had sat down and used regular parliamentary methods to resolve our differences, through a conference between the government and opposition, it could have been resolved weeks ago. Instead, Mr. Jelinek has paraded around the country uttering his foul obscenities against the Senate. He and his colleagues could have done some intellectual work, but obviously he is incapable of doing that. He should send a substitute and we might reach a settlement.

We have been slowing Bill C-21 first because the government will not meet to discuss it. It cuts $1.5 billion from regular benefits. I say to my friends in Quebec that Quebec will suffer the highest loss, $507 million.

The federal government proposes to end the federal government's contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, which is $2.8 billion. Of course, that action brings to mind the so-called "level playing field" that the Americans want with Canada. Their definition of a "level playing field" seems to be for us to reduce many of our benefits, including social welfare, hospital plans, medical plans and government participation in unemployment insurance. I do not believe that is the Canadian concept. We do not mind paying for services if they are offered as they have been in Canada. We do not like the implications of the level playing field.

[Senator Perrault.]

The proposed Tory bill increases entry level requirements and reduces the duration of the claims. It will hurt workers living in those regions of higher unemployment, especially as Canada heads into a recession. One out of every 55 Canadians will lose their claims entirely, 775,000 Canadians will have their claims reduced, and we believe the government of the day does not possess any mandate to abandon a 50-year commitment to one of Canada's most important social programs. We want to sit down and work out an arrangement that will not tie up this legislation.

Bill C-28 deals with the clawback provisions. The committee heard much about that across Canada. It heard concerns from senior citizens about the effect on their incomes of the clawback provisions in Bill C-28. We have been concerned about this bill because it will take $1.7 billion from family budgets over the next five years, or $500 million a year by 1991.

Some time ago I read an essay in which the author said a Conservative who claims he is in favour of social benefits and progressive social programs is very much like a fat boy who huffs and puffs around the school yard in a program of compulsory athletics pretending that he is enjoying himself. Conservatives are not at home unless they can claw back a few benefits from the people, unless they can reduce medical care benefits or cut back on those people who are supposed to be "cheating" on their hospital care.

Family allowance benefits are already taxable, 30 per cent of family allowances are already paid back to the government. Within ten years close to one million Canadian families who now receive family allowance or old age pensions will begin to lose these benefits due to partial indexing, which is inflation at less than 3 per cent at the $50,000 threshold.

The clawback is an anti-family, anti-senior tax. The Conservatives are attacking the Liberals for stopping it and not allowing it to be bulldozed through the Senate. We would be absolutely delinquent in our responsibility to the people of Canada, especially the less privileged, if we did not slow this down and try to persuade this arrogant government that changes should be made. The clawback of family allowance and old age security is a major attack by the Mulroney government on the universality of these programs. Some of us are willing to stand up and fight it.

I suppose the GST is in that category of measures that are allegedly being blocked by the Senate. When we were attempting to have the Senate committee report tabled in this place, every effort was made by Conservative members to prevent debate. Even now they approach that task with trepidation. They know the weaknesses in the bill. We have yet to receive any indication from the government that it is willing to take out some of the unfair provisions.

I have mentioned the insanity of taxing cenotaph wreaths. Why did you include that? You know better. You do not want to hurt the veterans and widows. Why did you let some bureaucrat put that provision in the GST bill? Why not say you will not tax wreaths that will be placed on cenotaphs to honour Canada's war dead on November 11? You know better.

Are you going to sit back and take it? One of your leader's favourite phrases is the "seamless web". We heard that the Meech Lake agreement was a seamless web that must not be touched. The supposedly "gossamer fabric" of that agreement must not be touched, not one strand altered.

And now we are hearing the same about the GST. Even if you would pull it back for a few months—

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, you seem to have forgotten that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee met on September 24. We received a 318-page report. I received the French version at noon. The committee met at 1.30 p.m. At 2.15, one of your members moved a motion to end discussion of the report by 7 p.m., while members had to take a position on the four options the report contained, a report we did not even have time to read.

You keep talking about democracy and Bill C-62, but you wouldn't give us enough time. In fact, you gagged us by imposing a 7 p.m. deadline. So I hardly think you should talk about . . .

Senator Corbin: I have a point of order.

[English]

Senator Perrault: You will have a chance to speak later in the debate. You will have an opportunity to speak to Bill C-62. I hope we get to that debate very shortly. I know you agree.

[Translation]

Senator David: You don't like my questions!

Senator Perrault: You can ask your question later.

Senator Corbin: You should speak from your seat, according to the rules.

[English]

As a matter of procedure, the rule states that if a senator wishes to speak he should rise in his place. The honourable senator is not in his place.

Senator Perrault: We will give you a fair opportunity. You will be able to speak later in the debate. I do not want to take a question, but will take a question when I am finished.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If Senator David wants to ask a question, he must speak from his desk.

[Translation]

Senator David: You will get a chance as well, since it's on the Order Paper, the same as Bill C-28. This has nothing to do with your point of order.

● (1545)

[English]

Senator Perrault: In any case, the concerns about Bill C-62, the goods and services tax, are basically that the GST is the wrong tax at the wrong time. Increasingly, this consensus is emerging in Canada's business community. Another concern expressed by the Conference Board of Canada was also expressed at the news conference given by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and other organizations, which are calling for drastic spending cutbacks and are saying that inflation is going to be exacerbated by the GST on January 1.

Senator Cogger: Is the senator aware that the Manufacturers' Association supports the GST?

Senator Perrault: I know the attitude of the Manufacturers' Association, because some of them are going to benefit. Yes, I do, senator; and when we get to the formal debate on Bill C-62, let us examine that position very carefully.

Senator Cogger: But you have been talking about nothing but the GST for the last half an hour.

Senator Perrault: Well, make your speech, senator.

Senator Corbin: They can't speak. Their whip has told them to clamp down.

Senator Perrault: The line in this Conservative propaganda document is that this so-called "paralysis" of government by the unelected Senate is contrary to the principles of our parliamentary system. Honourable senators, the Senate is not acting contrary to the principles of the parliamentary system; its actions are part of the essence of a parliamentary system.

When Canada was brought into existence, it was felt necessary to have a second chamber which would protect the regional interests and which would be the ultimate guard of the people against capricious and arbitrary action taken by the House of Commons. The Senate has rarely exercised its ultimate power to veto or to stop a bill, but that does not mean that if circumstances of a serious nature exists the Senate should not exercise that power. This is what we have been doing.

Eventually we are going to come to a vote. Probably senators opposite have more votes than we do. The Senate has a responsibility, however, to sound the alarm in Canada about the ultimate implications of the GST as we see them.

Is it not significant that the city of Toronto, Canada's largest city, one that is in the very centre of Canada's industrial and business heartland, should write a letter of this kind to the Senate, pleading for us to stop the GST? Do senators opposite want to ignore that, as well? Do they want to ignore the views of the cooperatives and the credit unions?

They are quite right in saying that the present manufacturers' tax should be changed, but even the supportive Manufacturers' Association will state that there are certain imperfections in the GST that should be improved upon and changed. This is what we should be doing. We should be looking at ways to put into force in Canada a fair system of taxation which is going to help people at all levels.

Then this Conservative position paper—and I am sure that Senator Cogger probably helped distribute them at the door; he may have been in charge of the literature distribution section—

Senator Cogger: You already read these questions into the record on October 4, 1990 at page 2357 of Hansard. Why don't you change the menu, to paraphrase your own Senator Frith?

Senator Perrault: There is more to your document than that, although I realize that you want to get some exercise by jumping up and down.

One section of this document has to do with questions and answers. One question is: Why has the government stacked the Senate by appointing eight new senators? It says that the following is the way that loyal Tories should answer that:

> The Liberal senators have consistently obstructed legislative proposals in the Senate after they have been passed by the House of Commons.

The fact is, and this very much goes to the procedural questions we have been discussing in recent days and recent hours, the stacking of the Senate—and that is the Conservative word, that is not ours; the word "stacking" is your own—was illegally done. The fact that there are court challenges moving ahead is an indication of that. I understand from the news this morning that Ontario is going to make an appeal to the courts, as is the city of Toronto. These are not insignificant developments. Those of you with backgrounds in law know this to be a fact. You do not simply try to speed up the process and create eight new senators who may or may not have the entitlement to vote.

Senators opposite know the principles and traditions of this country. Why are they trying to circumvent the established procedures? Why were they so supportive of taking fast votes the other day? It wasn't so that they could get by all democratic obstacles before the courts could speak, or is that an unfair suggestion?

This is what the Tory document says about the actions of the Liberal party in the chamber:

> This is contrary to our system of government, in which responsibility rests with elected representatives in the Commons.

If there is a terrible mistake in drafting a bill and it comes to us, does this mean that we should say that, despite the fact that we know it is wrong and bad legislation, we should vote for it because the people's elected representatives have spoken? That is the argument currently employed on the other side.

Many of the editorials in newspapers are written by people who have never read the Senate report on the GST. They often take this position: Well, it is terrible. The GST is awful, but the people's representatives have spoken.

But should we really inflict on the Canadian people two or three years of economic damage until the next election? If we were close to an election, I could almost agree with arguments that the Senate should not impede progress of the GST, but we have three years to go. The havoc Conservatives could create in three years boggles the mind, and that is the concern.

Senator Corbin: Would Senator Perrault accept a brief question?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Cogger: Are you in your chair?

Senator Corbin: Oh, yes, you can check the chart. I will ask the Speaker whether I am in my chair.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When you answer the question, would you take your seat, Senator Perrault?

Senator Corbin: We will set an example on this side.

Senator Cogger: For the first time.

Senator Corbin: Senator Perrault, is it not a fact that when this party, which is now the Official Opposition, sat on the government side you were the Leader of the Government in the Senate at one time?

Senator Perrault: That is right.

Senator Corbin: Is it not also a fact that this house stopped dead in its tracks legislation that had been proposed by the Liberal government of the day? Is that not a fact?

Senator Perrault: When I was Leader of the Government in the Senate we had many meetings and conferences with the government of the day, slowed bills down, met with government officials, conferred and obtained commitments of change. Indeed, we amended many of the bills. The senator is absolutely correct. This was never a rubber stamp operation when Liberals were in the government in the other place.

Senator Corbin: Did you not at one time stop dead in its tracks the Liberal legislation on transportation?

Senator Perrault: That is correct, and not only that but a bill relating to electronic surveillance. The Conservatives charge that somehow, when Liberal governments were in power, everything was expedited, yet we block everything done by the Conservatives. That is totally wrong.

I notice that some Conservative senators who have been here for a while do not add in their voices in that charge against us. I welcome the senator's intervention; it is true. In the other place, the honourable senator was a distinguished parliamentarian. He is recalling, accurately, some of the history of that place.

The second question posed by this Tory paper is:

> The government says that opposition to the GST is undemocratic, but aren't the Liberal senators only acting as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition?

This is the question the Conservatives have in their document, a copy of which I am sure Senator Cogger has in his briefcase. This is old stuff to him. Here is the answer he is supposed to give: "This is not about the GST," reads the paper.

Senators opposite do not want to talk about the GST.

Senator Marsden: They are confused. They don't know whether they want to talk about it or not.

Senator Perrault: Yes, they are terribly confused. Then, to return to the propaganda scene, they say that Liberal senators are violating one of the most basic principles of our democracy. Responsible government, the will of the House of Commons, must be supreme to the will of the Senate.

Do senators opposite mean to say that if the House of Commons were to pass a bill calling for every second blue-eyed Albertan to be denied a vote in the next election, we should approve? Do they mean to support the view that the Senate should say, "Oh, yes, because the people over there have spoken, we have to take the vote away from every second blue-eyed Albertan"? That is the insanity of the premise you are advancing. Honourable senators, I believe that the Senate should be elected and that there should be equal representation per province where possible. But it is here, it is legal despite its imperfect form, it is established and it is supposed to protect people's rights.

The Liberal Senate is operating within its designed role of opposing government bills that are hugely unpopular and are dangerous to the continued well-being of the regions of Canada. Both here and in the other place democracy is under assault. The use of closure was frightening in the other chamber. I said this the other day and I don't want to repeat it, but even Mr. Blenkarn, the chairman of the Commons committee, had pangs of conscience, and that is rare for him. There was closure of debate on second reading and time allocation at the report stage and at third reading. Is this in the Conservative tradition, Senator Cogger? Senator Cogger used to applaud Mr. Diefenbaker when he condemned closure used by the Liberals. How can Senator Cogger support it now?

Honourable senators, this is what the Conservative pamphlet, the prompt notes, the cue cards for the Conservatives, has to say: Tell them that governments are elected to make decisions on behalf of the Canadian people and are accountable to the Canadian people for their actions.

Senator Cogger: Have you got anything against that? That is quite true.

Senator Perrault: That is largely a correct statement, with the exception of those instances when an exceptionally bad or dangerous bill comes from the other place. Can anyone cite in history a bill that has come under more assault by the public of Canada than the proposed goods and services tax? It is a great revenue producer in Ecuador, Peru, Costa Rica, El Salvador, The Dominican Republic and the Ivory Coast, and you want it here in Canada?

John Bulloch said the other day that without any question it is the world's worst retail sales tax—the worst tax ever devised. He said that at the very least we should have six months to straighten out some of its imperfections so that it will not be so damaging.

Senator Cogger: What is your alternative?

Senator Perrault: There is not even a suggestion of a deathbed repentance or change. Senators opposite are marching Canada to the fiscal and financial electric chair and Liberals here are trying to be like the governor, making efforts to give the Canadian people a last minute reprieve.

This is also stated in the Conservative prompt sheet:

> The constitutional provision to appoint new senators has never been used before. After 123 years, doesn't this mean it is effectively null and void?

The Tory sheet instructs that this is the way good, obedient Conservatives should answer:

> Canada's leading authorities on Parliament and the Constitution have made it clear that the government is within its rights to use section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1967 to appoint new senators.

Well, honourable senators, it is now a matter for the courts to decide. That kind of upset the game a little bit, did it not? I notice that Senator Cogger has a clipping about the Toronto Argonauts in his hand.

Senator Cogger: No; I am prepared to quote it to you.

Senator Perrault: You will have a chance to listen and to speak, and I promise to be here when you speak. But I have been waiting in frustration for 16 hours, and I want an opportunity to speak.

Senator Cogger: We have been here for 50 hours, senator, 50 hours as of now.

Senator Perrault: Reference is made to the leading so-called constitutional authorities of Parliament. Can you imagine the process? This is something which I suggest is an affront to all of us. Here is a process where a former Cabinet minister, now Governor General—I am not attacking or criticizing him unfairly—is involved. Why would he not confer with Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to find out whether it had some valid concerns about the appropriate nature of resorting to this ancient device of appointing eight senators? Why would he not consult with the Opposition? Would that not have been appropriate? Is it fair to place Her Majesty the Queen in the position of having to make these appointments when she had no real power or input into the process? Honourable senators, I think it is a misuse of the monarchy and I regret it very much. It was very wrong. How can you possibly say that there was a deadlock in the Senate when we had not even debated the bill yet? Perhaps, senator, you may have been able to make a persuasive argument that would have changed our minds and brought us all over to your side.

[Translation]

Senator David: I have no more illusions at all. In any case, you didn't give us enough time to examine a document like that in committee.

Second, the committee decided to reject it, so your party's intentions were clear, at 7 p.m. on the 24th.

Senator Perrault: Senator David, may I continue?

• (1600)

[English]

Would that not have been the logical thing? Do you think that if the Queen, on her own initiative and using her own powers, had made the decision, after being told that we had not even had a debate yet, but "we want eight new senators," she would have said "yes"? You know that she would not have said yes.

Her Majesty has an extensive knowledge of Canadian history—perhaps a greater knowledge than many Canadians. You could not establish the basic foundation for that request for Her Majesty that eight senators were required when we had not debated the matter in the Senate. Why didn't you wait? The courts may have interesting things to say about it.

Why not have a referendum on the GST and let the people decide? That is the fourth question in that Conservative pamphlet.

Senator Cogger: Government by Gallup poll.

Senator Perrault: The answer you are supposed to give is: "The people did decide. In the last election Canadians gave the government a mandate to reform the sales tax system."

The details were not discussed as part of that campaign. You know that. The Prime Minister made $100 million worth of promises. The day after the election he said, "We are in some economic and financial difficulties." What happened during the 24-hour period between the time when the votes were counted and when he made his first statement? He said:

> The government's intentions have always been clear and up front.

Government intentions have always been vague. The Prime Minister said that taxes would be reduced and benefits would be increased. He also said that he would give new meaning to the word "patronage." That is one promise that the Prime Minister has kept. No one can accuse the Prime Minister of breaking that particular promise.

We remember when he went on the television debate with Mr. Turner. He stated that he would give new meaning to the word "patronage." He said, "You had a choice." Do you remember those words? You had a choice also, my friends. He also had a choice to give us a new Senate. He could have advanced the legislation months ago for an elected Senate with equal representation of the kind they have in Australia. He had his choice and he chose his friends to bring to the Senate—24 add-ons since August 24.

Senator Cogger: When is the last time you looked at the Constitution?

Senator Perrault: May I continue quoting from this Tory-approved paper? It states that a white paper in June 1987 set out plans to replace the existing sales tax.

This is what you Conservatives are supposed to say. If you do not have a copy of it, I could lend it to you so that you could make copies of it in your Conservative office. On the day the election was called in 1988 the Prime Minister said that tax reform would be part of the campaign. That was vaguely expressed. He never got into the details.

The Prime Minister never came out to British Columbia and said, "We have decided that we will charge you 7 per cent tax on the transportation of goods from Ontario with the net result that you people in British Columbia will have to pay more for stoves, frigidaires and appliances than they are in Ontario."

[Senator Perrault.]

You never came out and told us that. You never went to Alberta and said that. Do you have any clippings from Alberta newspapers about speeches made by Brian Mulroney in 1988 saying that Alberta would get a sales tax? Not a word.

In the televised debate just before the last election the Prime Minister said clearly that the existing federal sales tax would be changed. He did not say how—in fact, he suggested that it was merely a cosmetic operation. Instead, it is being replaced and the attempt is made to replace it with the GST. This is a classic case of talking out of both sides of one's mouth.

From this document, whose format is like a catechism or a primer you would give to a student going to elementary school, Question 5 states:

> The government says it wants to get on with its agenda. So why has it bogged down in a fight about the GST?

That is the question that the Tories are supposed to answer by saying this:

> This is not about the GST.

And this is the fifth time that this phrase has appeared in the document. It states:

> This is not about the GST. It's about elected Liberal senators denying the elected government is right to govern.

Over and over again the theme is repeated. This suggests to me that a deliberate strategy was developed to wreck the reputations of Liberal senators in this chamber for the crass reason that the Tories wanted to get this bill through at any cost.

The answer? This is about the Senate using its role to its fullest potential in order to defeat legislation which Canadians in overwhelming numbers oppose, as do respected organizations. The churches have sounded a warning that this will be difficult for people below the poverty line, as have the cooperatives and the credit unions. I cannot imagine how an Atlantic senator could support a measure opposed by all credit unions and co-ops in the area where co-ops and credit unions were begun.

Senator Olson: But you will explain that to them.

Senator Perrault: I wonder how you can possibly stand up and say yes when you know it will hurt people belonging to these those organizations, because it is clearly so discriminatory and regressive.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: You have given an assurance that I can stand up when you are finished, have you? You have given us that assurance, have you?

Senator Perrault: I will help you to your feet if you are physically handicapped. I would be pleased to do that.

Senator Olson: We look forward to an explanation from you.

Senator Perrault: The document then goes on to state:

> For 19 years, the Liberal majority in the Senate did not contest any measure proposed by the governing Liberals in the House of Commons.

That, my friend on the other side, is a deliberate falsification of the truth. It is not truthful. The record will demonstrate otherwise. It casts increasing doubt on the credibility of this document, which must have been knocked together by a fiction writer specializing in romantic "pot-boilers".

Senator Buckwold: They have a happy ending, though.

Senator Perrault: Yes, romance novels have a happy ending. That is the problem with the GST—it does not.

To say that we did not contest any measure is to acknowledge that you simply do not know what you are talking about. You should not allow accusations of that kind to be turned loose on an unsuspecting public.

The document states that since this government was elected in September 1984 the Senate has held up some 50 bills. That is an absolute lie. Some of the bills were kept a little longer for study and consideration. Many of the delays were caused by your own activities. To say that 50 bills have been held up is untrue.

Senator Oliver: That is right.

Senator Perrault: Senator, you have not been here. You do not know what you are talking about. Bring the record here and we will discuss it. But we have not held up 50 bills at all. You were supposed to be turned loose on the Canadian people to make that charge? You will be laughed at.

I gave the record a few moments ago. Only 10 bills were slowed down to be amended and improved. In almost all of those cases your government ministers were gracious enough to thank us for slowing them down and making needed improvements. Yet when you get on the political trails you say that we have held up some 50 bills. Senator, you cannot support that; you know that it is untruthful. You know that some of the ministers came and were gracious to the committee. You have some good ministers over there. They thanked us for our help. Why do you have to say this? Tory Question 6 asks:

> How exactly is the Liberal majority in the Senate obstructing government business?
> Apart from the GST, the Liberal senators are refusing to pass three other financial bills.

We have already dealt with that. Again I say that essentially they are also major money grabs where the dispossessed and the poor will be the main victims. We then hear, and I quote, "If Bill C-28 on high income recovery and large corporations tax is not passed, $2.5 billion will be added to the federal deficit." They say that Bill C-28 is a program for "high-income recovery". Do you know where they will get the money from? They will get it from the unemployed. They will get it from the men and women who are not working. They will take it out of their benefits. And you describe it as "high income recovery", for Heaven's sake!

Senator Buckwold: It's a clawback.

Senator Perrault: Aren't those incredible semantics? Your income recovery program will come out of the pockets of the unemployed. I should like to go down to the Atlantic provinces and sell that one. It is called high income recovery.

The other day your Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, said that the difference between a recession and normality is often just a technical matter of being a bit above or below the line. Do you remember that? That is a fancy way to say to someone who was just discharged from his or her position, "Listen, you are not really unemployed. You are just technically a bit below the line."

Let us remember that former Prime Minister, a Conservative, who said he condemned the rumours circulating around Canada that there were a lot of people unemployed and looking for jobs. He said that all those false stories were being circulated by a lot of people who are out of work. That is the Tory attitude. Just use these phrases. Bill C-28 concerns high income recovery, not a vicious clawback of entitlements.

The high income recovery program is premised on the fact that they can get money out of the low-income people. If Bill C-69 on government expenditure restraint is not passed, more money will be added to the federal deficit. This is stated in the document. This is the clawback provision.

People for years marked down, on a line in their income tax return, an amount that they thought would be a contribution to their retirement income, but the government wants to claw back much of that. That is not deprivation of social rights and social payments by the Tories—no, it is called "the income recovery program" and is designed to lead Canada back to prosperity once again. What nonsense!

The paper then states that the Liberals are saying that they are acting in the public interest by opposing the GST. The document states: "How do Conservatives respond to that?" The answer is to tell the press that the Liberals are being opportunistic and they know it. You have heard some of these phrases on the television and radio in recent days because the Conservatives have memorized them and are using them as directed. It then goes on to say that when Jean Chrétien was Minister of Finance 13 years ago he recognized the need to replace the existing federal sales tax. In fact, Jean Chrétien never expressed a need for the GST and all of its regressive features. This Tory tract goes on to say that the Liberals have no alternative to offer because there isn't one. Let me repeat that it says the Liberals have no alternative to offer because there isn't one, and that is why their position today is irresponsible.

Are we really being told that this is the only alternative open to the government?

The government says the manufacturers' sales tax is iniquitous, that it is wrong, that it has been preventing Canadian companies from exporting over recent years. Then why, for Heaven's sake, did the government boost it three or four times since coming to power? It was at 9 per cent six years ago and it is now at 13.5 per cent. The government is shedding oceans of crocodile tears when it says it is going to launch a fight against the manufacturers' sales tax because it ties the hands of Canadian manufacturers when, in fact, Tories have boosted the tax by 50 per cent since coming to power six years ago.

If one of the new senators gets off this line of questioning, how will he or she answer that? This government never offered Canadians any alternatives. There was no discussion of other possibilities. What we needed long ago was a royal commission on finance made up of responsible elements of business and, yes, even members of the other parties, because we have a big deficit and a big debt and no government can avoid the problem, including an NDP government. It is irresponsible to attack a measure and not have alternatives; I agree with that. But to say there were no alternatives and the government had to go with the GST is not being honest. The GST is a tax grab, not tax reform.

I was reading an essay the other day that said that great tax reform capital of the Ivory Coast introduced a GST. The ruler of that country was not interested in tax reform; he knew the treasury was empty, so he introduced a GST in 1960. That essay states:

> The GST and its equivalents around the world are regarded by most governments as huge cash cows which can produce extra tax revenue at any time with a minimum of democratic debate. The Goods and Services Tax equivalent in the Ivory Coast has now zoomed to a whopping 25 per cent. The GST is regarded as a particularly attractive revenue-raising device by those governments either unable or unwilling to practise fiscal and financial discipline.
> Governments disinclined to attack problems of debt and deficit by the imposition of ability-to-pay taxes, by restructuring their spending patterns and by adopting tough and responsible fiscal policies opt for a GST as a regressive but much easier route to get their hands on even more taxpayers' money.

Isn't that great! If the government does not have the financial and fiscal discipline to put the house in order, it makes a money grab.

Senator Corbin: From what were you quoting and what is the date?

Senator Perrault: That quote is from an essay I read in an economic magazine. I do not have the page reference. I do not have the date.

Isn't this an incredible position in which to find ourselves-that is, being told that there is no other route but the GST.

Do honourable senators opposite not think it would be a good idea to start collecting taxes from some people earning over $500,000 a year? There are some who earn incomes in that area who don't pay any income tax. There is another list of people earning over $250,000 a year who don't pay taxes. Do honourable senators opposite not think it is time for a wealth tax, as they have in other countries of the world? I see a senator nodding his head in the negative. I suppose to a Conservative that might destroy incentive.

Are there no other routes?

Senator Cogger: What is your alternative?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: A businessman telephoned me the other day. He is with one of the largest companies in Canada. I am asking his permission to quote him publicly. He said: "We should, first of all, clearly earmark special moneys contributed by the taxpayers to reduction of the debt and deficit." He said there should be a special debt and debt reduction fund. He said that those who earn between $15,000 and $25,000 should pay 1 per cent additional short-term tax payment, and then it should escalate from that to incomes over $500,000 taxed at 7.5 per cent.

He said, "I do not care what governments say. We love this country. We love the country more than all of the political parties put together." We want to help Canada out of its problem. I asked him for an analysis of his plan. I asked him what the yield would be. He said, "I will work it out and send it to you."

The point I am attempting to make is that there are Canadians who want to do something about the deficit problem and the debt problem. We are together on that.

Senator Cogger: Whom are you quoting?

Senator Perrault: I said that a businessman telephoned me the other day with this proposal.

Senator Cogger: I am asking you what Mr. Chrétien's alternatives are to the GST. That is what I want to know, not some taxpayer's notion.

Senator Perrault: That will be announced in due time. I am speaking now as a senator now. The fact is that there are other avenues we can go down in an effort to solve the present problem.

When honourable senators opposite ask opposition senators to come up with alternatives, that is legitimate. However, we are not the government and we do not know how much money is in the kitty. Until you get there you do not know how much money is there. The same happened with the New Democratic government in Ontario. They say they now have a different perception of matters. That happens. The same happened to this government when it came into office in 1984.

All I am saying is that there has to be a better way to develop alternatives than to pass a measure which has been condemned so roundly by many groups as being regressive.

Senate Finance Committee members will recall the senior citizen who attended a committee meeting on the Prairies, I think it was. He said he was a veteran of the war and had always paid his way. He wanted to help battle the debt and deficit, but he wanted to feel that he was not being exploited, that he was paying his fair share, not too much and not too little.

I think Canadians believe that. I do not care how they vote—Conservative, Liberal, NDP, whoever—they want to solve this problem; but if the perception is out there that the tax system is not fair, then people are going to balk and resist. No good law can be passed without the essential support of the people of the country.

Honourable senators opposite know that, just as we on this side know that.

There are many good ideas out there. Together with others, I am attracted to the idea—apart from the GST or anything else—of making my own individual contribution, earmarked specifically for debt reduction, as would many other people. We have a problem and it needs solving.

I do not think we should make this simply a political battle. I hope we get to debate the GST within the next few hours.

Then the pamphlet says:

> "Opposition parties and others claim the Senate appointments are unconstitutional."

Again, we have the court challenge.

There is much more in these documents, but I will not burden honourable senators with more.

Are there no taxation alternatives? There were allegations made to the committee of a very disturbing nature. One was that since 1950 individual income tax in Canada had gone up from 50 per cent of total collected to 88.1 per cent and that corporate income tax had gone from 50 per cent down to 11.9 per cent. There was a comparison made available to committee members under the heading of "Personal Income Tax as a Percentage of Total Tax Receipts". In this comparison we have Canada at about 38 per cent, the United States at 36 per cent, and France at less than 15 per cent. Of course, there are other factors in the taxation picture. One cannot merely take these statistics as the only guide to the justice of a tax system, or determining whether it is progressive.

Under the heading "Taxes on Personal Income as a Percentage of Gross Domestic Product" we have Japan at 7.3 per cent—these are the latest figures, 1987—United Kingdom, 10 per cent; United States, 10.9 per cent; and Canada, 13.4 per cent.

We seem to have much of the burden of this government on those personal income tax rates. I suppose the question that arises from that is: Are there other sectors where taxation is not sufficiently high? I say that because we have to find the money.

By way of concluding my remarks, I should like to appeal to the Speaker to take the appropriate action. I am not being partisan. Those of us who have served in legislatures know that when a Speaker loses the confidence of the House, regardless of the reasons, he should graciously resign. I do not think the Speaker needs to be urged to leave. As one writer said, democracy means the protection of minority rights; it does not mean the imposition of majority privilege. That was the view we held in the House of Commons when the bells rang for 17 days. I would like to see a rule adopted in the Senate which would limit the time the bells can ring, because I do not think it is democratic to have them ring for four months. That would make a travesty of the system.

Senator Barootes: How long, five days?

Senator Perrault: Perhaps five days. I certainly do not think three hours is sufficient. I do not think the bells should be stopped over a weekend when we normally have Saturday and Sunday off.

They now have a limitation in the House of Commons, as I understand it. When the Senate Rules Committee next meets it should work out an agreement on this.

The tradition is that when a Speaker loses the confidence of all the members of the House, the Speaker removes himself. The senator now in the Chair is capable of replacing the Speaker, and there are other senators across the way who are also capable. What we saw the other day was a disgrace. That is why there was so much anger. Many people across Canada said they could not understand why we were putting on what they felt to be a show of this kind. I do not think that the "show" helped the reputation of the Senate.

As I said to one commentator today, what would inspire some senators who are members of the Order of Canada—and there are some across the way as well—and former premiers, such as Senator Robichaud, former members of cabinet, former MLAs, MPPs, to be so indignant? Because they regarded the Speaker's action as a basic affront to their rights and privileges. The opposition in this place exercised its absolute right to attempt to delay a vote on a motion, and, as Senator Pitfield said the other day, obviously there was collusion or some type of communication between the government and the Speaker.

● (1630)

The bells rang for a brief period of time, and then this action was taken to effectively remove the rights of several senators to vote. How could this happen? How could the Senate be reduced to this state of affairs? All of you belong to organizations. Surely it is not in our Canadian tradition to exclude dissident voices from meetings. This attempted parliamentary coup d'etat was in the dubious tradition of banana republics everywhere. It is not Canadian. Usually these actions are taken by insecure and frightened leaders attempting to fend off the inevitable expression of will of the people. Usually governments under seige, or organizations under seige, resort to these semi-dictatorial tactics as defence mechanisms; but that does not work in Canada. There has been criticism of the opposition's reaction to what might be described as an abortive parliamentary power play. But if this arbitrary action had been accepted—to use Churchill's words—by a supine and silent opposition, we would forever have enshrined a precedent that would have reduced this place to a hollow mockery of a viable parliamentary chamber.

We can use the analogy of a referee at a football game. If the referee happened to be from Vancouver and decided that when Vancouver Lions got the ball there should be four downs instead of three downs, and that the Lions were going to get that ball over the goal line regardless of what happened, do you know how long that referee would last in Vancouver or in any other Canadian city? Not long.

We should have known that this outrageous strike against democracy was in the works.

We remember the time when the Conservative Party condemned closure as undemocratic, unfair and a device to muzzle the opposition. As a matter of fact, some of the best parliamentary speeches within memory were made by John Diefenbaker on that very point. Some of us remember the screams of outrage from the Conservatives who told the Canadians that closure was tantamount to a political form of the black plague. They accused the Liberals of being dictators. There were impassioned attacks upon closure. I seem to recall that at one point Conservative MPs took the Canadian flag and draped it across a desk and proclaimed that they were the custodians of freedom in Canada. What about today? What a contrast! As I said earlier, since 1984 you have used closure more than any other government in Canadian history. Contrast that with the manner in which the rights were protected by previous Liberal governments. We did not take any action to restrict bell ringing on that occasion. We made a deal. We can sit down and make a deal here. Back then we decided we would split the bill. It was not a perfect answer.

Senator Cogger: You guys do not respect deals!

Senator Perrault: That is not fair. Look at the record. You are an old pro in this business, senator. Read those words again.

Senator Cogger: What page?

Senator Perrault: Page 2406:

> Because of the way things were left on the record after the points of privilege that were raised, everyone's position will remain the same. Our position is that the vote on Wednesday should not be a precedent . . .

That is exactly what we are talking about.

Senator Cogger: I will also quote:

> On Tuesday we will be starting with a fresh sitting . . .

For the last 50 hours you have been talking about a point of privilege. That was the deal.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: We will not be making another deal to get this weekend off because you do not live with deals. You got home to Vancouver last weekend with a deal that afterwards you did not respect.

Senator Perrault: Come on! Maintain your Conservative cool.

Senator Cogger: Have you cancelled your flight to Vancouver?

Senator Doyle: You will not get away with it.

Senator Perrault: Senator Frith said as follows:

> Our position is that the vote on Wednesday should not be a precedent, and that such votes should be held in accordance with Rules 49 and 50. Proceedings for a vote are outlined on page 70 of the rules. As I say, our positions remain the same on that. Our position with respect to Speaker Charbonneau remains the same. I think that covers everything that we discussed.

[Senator Perrault.]

You may say that a difference of opinion exists, but I cannot think of any words that are any clearer than that. Our position is that the vote on Wednesday should not be a precedent. Why do you think that we have been speaking for hours? We do not want, and we will not accept, that the action on that infamous Wednesday night is to become a precedent.

Senator Cogger: Read the words of Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: If your house leader would stand in his place and say that it shall not be a precedent and that you are going to observe the rules that are in a Senate rule book; if you would make that commitment, there would be no further problem. But you have refused to give that commitment.

Senator Cogger: When we make a commitment, we live with it, but not you guys.

Senator Perrault: We are not going to accept a situation where the capricious decision of a Speaker will decide what goes on in this chamber. You are going to have a long weekend if you think that is going to be the Liberal position.

Senator Barootes: You cannot stand to lose a vote.

Senator Perrault: That is ridiculous, senator. You are an old pro and you know that is ridiculous.

Senator Barootes: You cannot stand the thought of losing a vote in this chamber. You will not vote. You refuse to vote.

Senator Perrault: I will be pleased to vote when the occasion arrives. It will arrive.

Senator Cogger: We can vote on the motion moved by Senator Murray this morning.

Senator Perrault: But from the highest levels of your party—and I hope this does not offend you—

Senator Barootes: Try us!

Senator Perrault: —there has been an increasing impatience with democracy and an appalling lack of respect for tradition and precedents, both in this chamber and in the other place. I would think, knowing his capability as a writer and as a man of conscience, the former editor of the Globe and Mail in our midst would have written some editorials, had this occurred under different circumstances a few years ago, and would have condemned the party attempting to take away the right to vote.

Senator Doyle: No, no, no. Come on!

Senator Perrault: Oh, yes. Removing a person's right to vote would not coincide with the objectives of your publication.

Senator Doyle: That is a prevarication.

Senator Perrault: Contrast that with the manner in which rights were protected by—

Senator Doyle: Let us have a vote now.

Senator Cogger: There goes the weekend.

Senator Perrault: Contrast that with the way in which the rights of the opposition were protected during the time of a Liberal government. You suffer so badly in comparison. In retrospect I presume that you regret the fact that the Tory bells were not cut off before 17 days in the other place.

Senator Doyle: That has been recognized. It cannot happen again.

Senator Barootes: Are you ready for questions now, senator?

Senator Cogger: Senator, can you go on for a couple more hours or would you like to move the adjournment?

Senator Perrault: I hope that we can come to some honourable solution to the differences that separate us.

An Hon. Senator: What do you propose?

Senator Barootes: Go ahead and tell us what your proposal is.

Senator Perrault: I have already given you some ideas. There should be no action to restrict the rights of the opposition. This debate will come to its normal conclusion, and we know, now that you have a majority here, that you will want to protect the rights of the opposition. However, some of us are disappointed that when it came to removing our right to vote the other day, some of you did not stand up and oppose it. Senator Cogger, Senator MacDonald and Senator Barootes should know better. I could not have walked in the chamber if a Liberal Government had tried that—

Senator Cogger: The answer was given by your own Senator Everett.

Senator Perrault: —and most Liberals would have felt the same way about it. We have a finely developed idea of what the system is all about. I cannot imagine how the Speaker could have written a letter in which he said that in, light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the Senate to assemble senators for division within a reasonable time period. Surely our friend and colleague Senator Charbonneau should not have written a letter of that kind when he knew the bells had only been going for three hours and that we were in a meeting down the hall discussing what we were going to do. He had no right to write such a letter.

May I paraphrase something he should have read to the chamber at that time: "In light of instructions which I have received from my old friend the Prime Minister, who is becoming frustrated, angry and impatient—

Senator Barootes: And you are asking for cooperation after reading something like that? You have nerve.

Senator Perrault: —with the process known as democracy—

Senator Barootes: Is it to inflame?

Senator Perrault: —I have been ordered to call back the Senate at unreasonably short notice so that a vote can be taken and, if possible, several votes.

Senator Barootes: You are a great arbitrator.

Senator Perrault: I know that the bells have only rung for a brief time, but Brian is a very impatient man these days. He can be one mean dude when he loses his cool.

Senator Barootes: Very funny. And then you ask for cooperation and understanding. Great!

Senator Perrault: Is it any wonder that the place exploded the other day when that was our perception of what had happened?

Senator Barootes: We never rang bells; we never blew whistles; we never rapped on desks.

Senator Perrault: Yours was a procedural ploy that has never been employed in the history of Canada.

Senator Barootes: Shame on you, then!

Senator Perrault: Senator Barootes, you are very vocal, as usual, but can you cite another instance where the right to vote was removed from the opposition?

Senator Barootes: If you want to inflame us, keep it up! We react too! We are human beings over here!

Senator Perrault: The same Prime Minister, who gave lavish lip service to Senate reform in his campaign—remember the speeches he gave about Senate reform—demonstrated his contempt for parliament by appointing many of his friends and demonstrating his contempt for the Senate and Senate reform in so doing. Loading the Senate with political pals is not the first step towards Senate reform. We should have realized that the Conservative spin doctors would attempt their silly coup in the Senate. I know the idea did not come from senators here, because I do not think that they are that devious.

Senator Barotes: This is not Sampson and the Temple! You cannot pull the temple down over your heads when you are losing. Your actions are going to result in the abolishment of this house and it deserves it.

Senator Perrault: How could the consciences of the senators be so dulled as to be willing collaborators in this attempted action against the Senate? We should have seen it coming. We saw Mr. Blenkarn in the other place and the tactics he adopted. We should have seen the signs when he bludgeoned the bill through the Commons, limited discussion and debate and cut off the opposition there. We should have known better. We were too trusting. He used closure as his main weapon, and he has been apologizing ever since for his rough tactics. He had a quote the other day in the newspaper. Mind you, it did not add to the intellectual resources of the nation, but what can one expect from Mr. Blenkarn? He said:

> We will do and the Prime Minister will do what has to be done. We are going ahead with this. There is no economic justification for the Liberal dominated Senate to block the GST legislation. Adding the tax quote does not fit the political program of the Liberal senators.

Talk about inflammatory statements! You say how can we expect cooperation when statements of that kind are made. Did you read the statement made today by the Minister of Finance to inspire cooperation on the part of senators? He should go back to figure skating as quickly as possible. Read it in tonight's paper.

Senator Barootes: Have you got the right minister? You have the wrong minister.

Senator Perrault: I am talking about Otto Jelinek.

Senator Barootes: He is not the Minister of Finance.

Senator Perrault: He is the one who made the statement. They keep on shoving him from post to post because he is having trouble coping. If I gave him the wrong portfolio, you will understand that it may have been my perception of his latest shift. Mr. Blenkarn continued:

> If I had my druthers and if the Prime Minister had his druthers we would abolish the Senate, but we are stuck with it.

Is that designed to win cooperation from the Liberals in the Senate?

Senator Cogger: Your own colleague asked for abolition a couple of hours ago.

Senator Perrault: How about the statement made by that great Alberta diplomat, Harvey Andre! He has never said a kind word about the Senate in his life. He said we had a triple-L Senate—lazy, late and Liberal. Ha, ha, ha! Do you think that is supposed to inspire cooperation!

Senator Barootes: It is better humour than yours.

Senator Perrault: This pilloried body has even improved your own legislation since 1984 on at least ten or twelve occasions, and you know it. Why don't you tell the media that? You say you are indignant because I have suggested that the Prime Minister was the evil architect behind this whole preemptive strike in the Senate, and that gives lip service to Senate reform. I often wonder how so many Conservative senators, many of whom know better, could have cooperated in such a sleazy and sly operation. How could their consciences be so dull as to be willing collaborators in this attempted rape of the Senate? Those are the things that disappoint some of your colleagues. We believe that when essential principles are at stake, we stand together and do not sell out the right of other members of the Senate. I have a great deal more documentation, but I know other senators are anxious to speak.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1645)

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Senator Perrault gave an undertaking that rather than have interruptions he would take some questions.

Senator Perrault, you were a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in 1987 when we were studying tax reform. The chairman at the time was the Honourable Ian Sinclair.

Senator Perrault: A good chair too.

Senator MacDonald: A good chair. I had the honour to be deputy chairman. On that committee were Senator Buckwold, the present chairman of the Banking Committee, Senator Kirby and yourself. Other senators who from time to time took part in those discussions on tax reform were Senators Barrow, Bosa, Godfrey, Haidasz, Olson and Stewart.

In our 12th report, dated December 1, 1987, we recommended that the government introduce legislation to implement a broad-based, multi-stage sales tax to replace the existing federal sales tax. That was three years ago.

I am the first to admit that one can change one's mind for any number of reasons. I have heard those reasons given here. Usually, when points of privilege were raised the GST invariably came into the privilege. I never heard anyone on that side say any good thing about the GST. I might say that in this recommendation of the committee there was not a dissenting voice.

As Senator David has reported, we have a committee that in one day presented us with four options and said that it had decided—meaning the majority of the committee—to bring in option four, which says that this bill should not be proceeded with. That is the strongest recommendation the committee can possibly make.

If there is an exception I would love to know it, but I will say that if all senators on that side have nothing good to say about the GST, is it not fair to conclude that the report would be adopted and, if you had your way, the bill would be killed? Is that not a fair and reasonable assumption? What is the point of the Leader of the Opposition in this place getting up and saying there is no evidence of a deadlock? Who is expected to believe that? The committee has said the Senate should kill the bill. Everyone agrees. Is the oratory on this side supposed to be so persuasive that Senator Hays or Senator Robichaud, or someone, will say they were wrong and will support the government? Would that not be the rationale for the invocation of this Section 26 which has created so much controversy? Is it not reasonable for the Government of Canada to assume that there is a deadlock?

Senator Perrault: That is a perfectly fair question. I am not disputing it. I am saying that in the course of parliamentary negotiation and discussion many bills have been approved or changed or altered. However, I do not see how you could possibly say there is a deadlock until it is debated and discussed. These may have been an initial recommendation of the committee, but there are all sorts of possibilities or initiatives beyond that point. That is why I do not know how anyone can go to Her Majesty and say that we have an insuperable deadlock. It does not meet any of the conditions of other deadlocks we have had in Canada. There must first be a debate and discussion.

Senator MacDonald: One of the options given to the committee was the making of amendments. There were none.

Senator Olson: You would not let us discuss it.

Senator MacDonald: The report had been written beforehand and said that one of our options was to have made recommendations. We discarded that option.

Senator Perrault: The unfortunate part about the sequence of events you have described is that you were unwilling at one stage—or at least that was apparent to us—to discuss the four major recommendations. We could not even have your representatives on the committee discuss the options. You filibustered here for several days.

You may accuse us of unduly prolonging debate. You did very much the same thing. You did not want to debate the report or the options, or anything else. It is not true to say there was no possibility of debate.

Senator MacDonald: I wish Senator David had been here to describe again the circumstances of those six hours in which the committee considered a 270 page report and during which a time limit was put on what the decision would be. You know there was no opportunity. I think you were at that meeting; Senator LeBlanc was not.

Senator Perrault: For you to suggest that these were 270 pages of detailed new material which committee members had never been seen before is not accurate. Almost all of that material represented a condensation of various proposals.

Senator Barootes: Select.

Senator Perrault: —and views expressed to the committee and received by it.

Senator MacDonald: Carefully chosen.

Senator Barootes: Selectively chosen by the chairman alone.

Senator Perrault: I know you want to be fair. If you look through that brief you can find numerous examples of companies that say the bill should be passed. You know that. Do not try to do that to Senator Buckwold.

Senator Barootes: Are there any economists who said that? Nine out of ten said to pass it.

Senator Perrault: You effectively filibustered your own bill when you went through that process. We were begging you to debate the report that had been tabled by the committee. Why were you so unwilling to discuss the report at that stage when there was an opportunity for input?

An Hon. Senator: It was tabled by one man, read by one man.

Senator Barootes: May I ask a question? I have three questions, one of which has been usurped by my friend, as he read from your previous Banking, Trade and Commerce committee.

In your experience in this chamber of sitting on a committee, not necessarily with Banking, Trade and Commerce, that brought in a report either on legislation that was before it or on a subject matter for study, do you know of any instance in which that report was done solely and entirely by the chairman, with no input permitted from the members of the committee of either political stripe? Have you ever had such an experience, where no one but the chairman was allowed to write, read and present the report?

Senator Perrault: That is not an accurate assessment of the situation. He did not write the report. We had an objective and competent staff prepare an objective report insofar as they were capable.

Surely, this is the type of matter we should discuss when the bill comes before the Senate for debate. If we can remove this procedural obstacle, as I am sure we can, we can get to that debate.

Senator Barootes: We are not standing in the way of that.

Senator Perrault: I hope that when debate on the bill comes forward, that will be part of your remarks during the debate.

Senator Barootes: I ask this question with all respect and humility. I think this has been brought to your attention. We do have in this House a fairly prominent expert on parliamentary procedure. He is your own Senator John Stewart. I am referring to an article he wrote for the Toronto "Pravda", also known as the Daily Star. I am referring now to the ringing of the bells. I wish Senator Dave Steuart would also listen to this.

Senator Perrault: What is the date of that?

Senator Barootes: March 18, 1982. This eminent and well-known expert writes, with respect to the ringing of the bells which has so inflamed you people, that "the purpose of the bells is to call the members to the chamber to vote. It is not to permit either side to stop the work of Parliament." Senator Stewart states that in his view "once it has become obvious"—note that he says "a few hours would be more than sufficient"—"that the practice is being used not to round up members but to stop the House, the Speaker has the power to complete the interrupted vote." This is from your own expert on political science.

I want to ask a question in this respect. There is more to his statement, but I do not want to embarrass you by reading other parts of it.

Senator Perrault: I would be glad to answer that.

Senator Barootes: May I put the question to you first?

Senator Perrault: You challenged me on the basis of that. Put the question.

Senator Barootes: My question is about the ringing of the bells. For 42 years in this hallowed chamber the Conservative Party has been in opposition and the Liberal Party in the majority. How many times has that Conservative opposition in the Senate ever used the ringing of the bells to stop the work of this chamber?

Senator Perrault: First, honourable senators, no Liberal government attempted to bring in such an obnoxious and reactionary bill as the GST.

Senator Balfour: How about the NEP?

Senator Barootes: What about the freezing of wages and prices?

Senator Perrault: That did not have the implications—

Senator Barootes: Zap, they are frozen.

Senator Perrault: I regret that Senator Stewart is not in the chamber to reply. However, he has stated that this represents a distortion of what he said. Second, his references were made to the House of Commons where they elect their Speaker. There is a profound difference.

Senator Barootes: They didn't elect the Speaker then. They did not have an elected Speaker in 1962.

• (1700)

Senator Perrault: Senator Barootes said it was 1982; now it is 1962. The Speakers were elected in 1982.

Senator Stewart, when he is here, will wish to reply in more complete and accurate detail. But, first, it was in the other chamber, which is a profound difference. Second, that is a chamber in which there is an elected speaker. Third, I would add this observation: that having the bells ring for three hours is surely not unreasonable by any definition. Come on, Senator Barootes, your own party rang the bells for 17 days.

Senator Barootes: That was in the other chamber, to which you say we have no relationship.

Senator Perrault: Were you quoted in the Regina Leader Post as condemning the Conservative Party for allowing the bell to ring for 17 days? The bells rang for three hours in the Senate. Are you really suggesting to us that this is unreasonable?

What is Senator Barootes's definition of an unreasonable length of time to ring the bells?

Senator Barootes: I don't have one. I am only quoting your own Senator Stewart.

Senator Perrault: He said that it was not in relation to the Senate; but I will let Senator Stewart answer for himself.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable Senators, on that point I wish to say that we are somewhat at a disadvantage in not having seen Hansard—at least, I have not seen it—for yesterday's discussion period. Senator Stewart stood up and explained what he had written. He explained that it was for the House of Commons, where traditionally the Speaker is not chosen by patronage appointment, Order in Council or without consultation. In fact, the Speaker was then elected or selected by the house following consultation with the opposition parties in government.

Speaker Fraser, of course, is a more powerful figure than previous speakers, but speakers of the House of Commons have always had much more power than speakers of this house, for the reasons Senator Stewart clearly set out.

Senator Barootes: You should get a 9.9 for fancy skating!

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable Senators, I rise to speak on Senator Stewart's question of privilege concerning the unprecedented action of the Speaker of this house last Thursday when he subverted an express rule of this chamber by calling a vote on a motion before the house before both parties had signified their readiness to proceed.

I know the rules in question have been read before, but I feel I should refer to them once again for emphasis. Undoubtedly, there are many senators absent. They are probably in their offices listening with bated breath and would like to hear this.

[Senator Perrault.]

In the Rules of the Senate of Canada at page 19, under the heading "Part IV", Rule 49 is set out:

> (1) When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for the "yeas" and the "nays" and shall thereupon decide whether the question has carried.
> (3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.
> (4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which the senator has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.
> (5) Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices. The Speaker shall in all cases have a vote. When the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

Rule 50 reads:

> (1) A senator shall not vote on any question unless the senator is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.
> (2) Without leave of the Senate a senator shall not speak to a question after the order has been given to call in the members to vote thereon.
> (3) With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reasons assigned by the senator be withdrawn or changed by the senator immediately after the announcement of the division.

At page 70 of the rule book, in Appendix C, we find the following:

> Voting in the Senate is described in Rules 49 and 50.
> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote. The Speaker puts the question again. All senators in favour of the motion rise, and the Clerk of the Senate records their names on the division sheet. All senators opposed to the motion rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. All senators who wish to abstain then rise, and the Clerk records their names on the division sheet. The Clerk announces the official result of the division, giving the number of "yeas", the number of "nays" and the "abstentions". The Speaker then declares the motion carried or lost.

> The procedure on a standing vote on an amendment is the same as the foregoing, except that the Speaker reads both the main motion and the motion in amendment, and puts the question on the motion in amendment. He then declares the motion in amendment carried or lost and puts the question on the main motion.
> The Clerk is responsible for recording the votes. He sends copies of the division sheet to the Debates of the Senate and the Journals of the Senate for publication.
> If an error has been made on a division list, correction is made at the earliest possible moment by the Speaker of the Senate.
> If there is confusion, a mistake or irregularity in the conduct of a division, the Speaker interrupts the proceedings, puts the question again and orders that the division be taken again.
> The result of an equal vote is deemed to be in the negative. The Speaker may vote, and if he does so he must register his vote at the time of the division; he has no casting vote.
> Strangers are not obliged to withdraw from the galleries when a division is called. The doors being locked, no one is allowed to enter or leave the galleries during a vote except members of the Parliamentary Press Gallery.
> Voting in a select committee, in practice, is by voice or a show of hands, and the result of an equal vote is deemed to be in the negative. A recorded vote is taken if the committee so decides.
> There is no recorded vote in Committee of the Whole.

I just want to make an observation. When the Speaker puts the question and asks for the "yeas" and "nays", he then expresses his opinion as to the result. I want to emphasize that because it will come up a little later.

These have been rules of this house for many years. I dare say that if we were to search the records we would find that the rules were adopted unanimously by all parties at the time of enactment. And why not, since they were adopted for the benefit of all senators, so that it would be clear to all exactly what rules were to apply on the taking of a vote in this chamber; and, of course, up until now, the rules have been followed and relied upon.

In this regard, I would like to read from The Parliamentarian, being the journal of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth, the July 1990 edition, which I am sure all honourable senators have read. I refer to page 218, which contains a review of Erskine May's Treatise on the Law, privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament (21st Edition). We all know the regard in which we hold Erskine May's rules of procedure.

This review is written by Dr. Subhash C. Kashyap, Secretary-General of the Lok Sabha, of the Parliament of India. He, himself, is a learned author. I would like to read what he has to say. I will have to quote some of the first part of the article before I get to the part in which I am most interested. It reads:

> It is 145 years since the first edition of Erskine May was published in 1844. To introduce May or his volume to anyone who is even remotely interested in parliamentary practice and procedure will at best be an effort akin to introducing the Bible to a practising Christian. And to describe May's work as the most exhaustive, authentic and authoritative treatise on the working of the "mother of Parliaments" will be, to put it very mildly, an understatement. Yet, to be asked to review it was a matter of privilege, to agree to do so a pleasure and to actually attempt it a task at once challenging and onerous.
> When I embarked upon the none-too-interesting proposition of reading over a thousand pages of the twenty-first edition at least once, I was reminded of the claim made by A.R. Browning of the Australian House of Representatives in his review of its twentieth edition which appeared in The Parliamentarian . . . that he may well have been the first person to have read an edition of the entire text of May in 50 years. Mr. Browning has been proved wrong in his apprehension that a single reading of May in its entirety could well cause his premature retirement. He still holds fort in Australia as the Clerk of the House! I have no such fears, for after serving Parliament for 37 years now, I am already ripe and ready to retire honourably and happily.
> The experience of going through May has indeed been rewarding and stimulating. As stated elsewhere . . . modern Parliament is a multi-functional institution, performing a wide variety of roles. Besides its traditional law- making functions, Parliament exercises many roles: representational, grievance ventilation and redressal, educational, leadership recruitment and orientational, legitimizational, overseeing and surveillance over administration and control over the executive.

Now I come to the most important or pertinent part of this review:

> Parliamentary practices, procedures and conventions make for orderly and expeditious transaction of business and impart an element of stability and predictability in the course of proceedings within the Chamber. They also afford a chance to the Members of every side to make their contribution to the business before the House. Designed to ensure decisions by majority opinion, the rules of procedure also safeguard the right of minorities to have their say and to be protected against any possible tyranny of majorities.
> Parliamentary procedure is not an arbitrary standard or a product of one mind, but the result of the considered and enlightened opinion of many which has gradually evolved over the years. As a time-tested tool, it provides for an efficient and effective method of accomplishing all legitimate objectives of a legislative body.

> Inside the House, this body of impartial rules guarantees equal rights to all, imposes responsibilities on all, offers participation to all, saves the time of all and in short serves the best interests of all. Parliamentary policy is essentially representative, responsible and responsive. Ministers are responsible to Parliament. Parliament has to be responsible to people's opinion. Parliamentary procedure is intended to facilitate debates and discussions on the problems and perceptions of the people from whom the Members derive their legitimacy.

● (1715)

I will not go on with the rest of the review, but I particularly wanted to draw this part to your attention. You will note the writer's remarks with respect to the objectives, need and use of parliamentary practices, procedures and conventions and how they are designed, amongst other things, to safeguard the rights of minorities to have their say and to be protected against any possible tyranny of majorities. This is appropriate in the present circumstances. Why not? Surely the majority needs no protection. The majority can always look after themselves.

Honourable senators, I venture to suggest that all of us in life's experience have been members of many organizations, all of which have established constitutions, regulations and rules to govern the operations of such organizations, the conduct of members and the proceedings of the meetings. Even our courts—for which we all have a great respect—have rules and procedures that are strictly adhered to in their operations. The strength of these institutions, if not their very existence, depends on the way such rules and regulations are obsered and respected by their members. Once these rules are abused or flouted, the institutions disintegrate.

That is the danger we find ourselves in as a result of the action taken by our Speaker in apparently the design of the government in doing its bidding. It has destroyed in this chamber the respect for the Chair, which is a sad situation and obviously a shame on us all. It will only confirm in the public's mind its well-known view that this government can only operate by subterfuge and trickery, as so well illustrated during the Meech Lake fiasco. It is another example of the abysmal way the government is running this country.

In this respect, I feel I should read to you an article in that well known magazine Maclean's. It is in the October 15 edition and is found at page 88. It is an article written by Allan Fotheringham. It states:

> The principle of parliamentary democracy is that a government with a majority mandate can legislate—because it has the arithmetic—anything it wants.
> Therefore, it takes some talent for a government with successive majorities in the Commons to reduce the country to anarchy. It takes a real gift to convert the aging and unelected Allan MacEachen into the most powerful politician in the country. The Mulroneyites have lost the gift of how to govern and the place dissolves into Albania-like confusion.

[Senator Lewis.]

The Tories, in their disarray, claim that they can't let the troglodytes and superannuated bagmen in the Senate dictate the business of the country. Under normal logic that would apply—but as we know, we are not in normal times. This government has lost the moral suasion to govern, such is its unpopularity and especially that of the chap at the top.

The Liberals are leaderless, Jean Chrétien dancing around outside the Commons on each side of every issue. The NDP has a leader who hasn't really caught on yet. Despite all this, the Conservatives are reduced to shouting matches and arcane procedural manoeuvres in the fusty old Senate—while those foreigners who are still interested wonder if this is a tinker-toy country after all.

If one were a simple sort, one would think the principal players in the headlines in this "crisis" would be named Mulroney or John Crosbie or Michael Wilson or some such. Instead? The front pages are full of MacEachen and Royce Frith and Michael Kirby and Jacques Hébert, monikers that normally would not leap easily to your lips, names almost as celebrated as the never-to-be-forgotten Gerry Caplan.

How a government, six years in power, given the sway by the voters to dominate the Commons, can find itself in such a fix is wonderful to behold. Joe Clark's brief hiccup of history in office looks absolutely rock-solid by comparison.

Politicians who live by the polls die by the polls, and these Tories, who won those two majorities through the most sophisticated polling devices in Canadian political history, are now terrified of the downside. When the personal popularity of the Prime Minister is lower than the interest rates, polling revenge is complete. Allan Gregg and Angus Reid are more feared than anyone but, well, say, Allan MacEachen and Royce Frith, those household names.

Pierre Trudeau, with his one political obsession, finally shucked off the demeaning link with Mother England on that rainy afternoon on Parliament Hill when he and the Queen put their signatures to the document that supposedly made us an independent country at last. Because these present guys don't know how to govern, they've undone all that in foreign eyes by having to "ask" Buckingham Palace's "permission" to apply lawyers' jiggery-pokery to solve a problem of basic unpopularity.

Lewis Carroll is the architect. The nearest analogy to what we have seen on the nightly TV screens is the Marx Brothers in A Night at the Opera. Woody Allen would write the script. Stephen Leacock, who looked like a senator, could do the scene justice.

The delicious part is that Brian Mulroney, who trounced John Turner in that 1984 debate on patronage and won the election on the exchange, is now wobbling all over the map trying to get his legislation through with an orgy of patronage appointments.

The standard wisdom is that this zoo act in the Red Chamber will immediately speed Senate reform. In fact, the reverse will be true. An examination of the Commons will be the more likely result. Why can't a two-term majority government muster enough skills and managerial tactics to get its platform through Parliament? The people who are going to come out of this the worst are not the basically irrelevant senators, given their brief hour in the sun.

The public, on reflection, will look with some cold eyes of examination on a government that was elected to govern, somehow cannot manage to do it and finds itself in Gilbert-and-Sullivan public rows with people who don't represent anyone but are smarter at the rule books than those who are supposed to be in charge.

It's why there has been such a rise in regionalism in Canadian politics. In Quebec, Lucien Bouchard's Bloc Québécois sets out to do the same thing as the Parti Québécois wants to do: separate from the rest of the country. Prognosticators on the Prairie plain and in British Columbia estimate that if an election were held the Reform Party would walk away with 60 or 70 seats. In Ontario, voters were so disgusted with the political leaders who wasted so much time on the Meech Lake farce that they took out their revenge on the first politician who dared to go to the polls, David Peterson.

The fragmentation is going to continue as the disgust for the centre grows. The voters, in 1984, tried what they thought was sensible in an attempt to draw the country together: they gave a massive majority mandate to Mulroney's Conservatives. They reaffirmed it in 1988 and what has happened since? Those given so much power have proved incompetent in dealing with it, niggled to death by minor scandals and hobbled by a Prime Minister who can't explain what he's trying to do.

The voters have given up on them. The contempt for the continuous juvenile wrangling in the Commons is now equalled by the geriatric kindergarten did-so-did-not conduct of the Senate. Why give a government a majority if it doesn't know what to do with it?

To follow along those lines, I should like to read to you a letter that was published in the Edmonton Journal of October 3 this year. It is a letter from Richard McGuire, a fine Canadian citizen, I imagine. It reads as follows:

Canadian democracy is in a crisis.

But it is not, as Journal editorials and some columnists suggest, a problem of an unelected Senate trying to block the will of a "democratically-elected" House of Commons. Rather, it is a crisis of a Tory government determined to defy the will of Canadians on a whole range of issues, and to shut Canadians out of the decision-making process.

Our Constitution grants strong powers to the Senate to block unjust legislation precisely for the kind of situation we are encountering today with the GST. The Senate is an imperfect safety valve against the abuse of power by the House of Commons. The Americans refer to this as "checks and balances."

Democracy means more than casting a vote once every four or five years in a heavily manipulated election.

And this next statement is interesting, Senator Perrault. He goes on to say:

After all, Hitler was "democratically elected" in 1933. Rather, democracy means rule by the people, and this implies an ongoing participation by the people in the political process.

Only the Senate saw fit to allow democratic public participation on the GST through nationwide public hearings. Most Canadians who believe in democracy would prefer an elected Senate. But we do not hear The Journal questioning the legitimacy of the Supreme Court of Canada, which also is politically appointed.

Never in my lifetime has the House of Commons introduced legislation as draconian as the GST. Media coverage has focused mainly on such trivialities as the increased cost of a haircut, but has largely ignored the big picture: this is part of a massive shift of taxation from the rich to the middle and lower classes.

Many small businesses will be crippled by the enormous increase in the paperwork of collecting this complex tax. This is not a mere retail sales tax but a multilevel tax that confuses even the experts. Many small businesses will be forced to close.

The GST, it appears, is the reward to big business for saving the Conservatives in the 1988 election. It is not an attempt to make taxation fairer.

The GST, and Meech Lake before it, are not merely tough, but unpopular, measures causing a slight dip in the polls. Rather, they are an abuse of power by a sleazy, manipulative government that is now rejected by more than four out of five Canadians.

If the Senate is not successful in stopping this anti-democratic government, Canadians have one last resort to re-assert democracy: large-scale civil disobedience and defiance of the GST.

• (1730)

That is what we are seeing in the country today.

I must say that I believe there is sufficient evidence to suggest that the whole event of which we are complaining was nothing but a government ploy, one planned over a period of time.

If you wonder why I say that, then consider the following: We have heard the pronouncements of government ministers predicting that action was to be taken to force the GST legislation through the Senate.

We have seen the wholesale appointment of senators to this chamber.

Then there was the unwarranted appointment of eight so-called divisional senators, all with the expressed purpose of forcing the passage of the GST and other legislation.

We had the spectacle of government members in the Senate attempting to delay adoption of the committee report on the GST legislation by means of spurious points of privilege until the Prime Minister had time to stack the chamber with his supporters. I think we spent two days on that. You will recall gracious Senator Martha Bielish tendering her early retirement for the purpose of facilitating the Prime Minister's plans.

Then we come to Black Thursday itself. Despite all denials from the government side of collusion between the government leadership in the Senate and our Speaker, what did we see? Those of you who were present will recall—and it is clearly recorded in Hansard of Thursday, October 4th, at pages 2342-3—how the Leader of the Government in the Senate, without waiting for the motion to adjourn to be put, with alacrity jumped up to announce that he would be calling for a recorded vote. This makes it clear that he wanted the bells to begin ringing.

In the excitement of getting the bells ringing, the Speaker did not even express his opinion as to the result of the voice vote. The Speaker was at that time in breach of the rule of the Senate relating to voting procedures, as expressed on page 70 of our rules.

Honourable senators realize that the rule requires the Speaker to call for the "yeas" and the "nays". He has then to express his opinion as to what the result is.

Honourable senators will notice in the record that the Speaker read the motion but there was no expression of opinion by the Speaker as to the result of that voice vote, because it was already arranged that there would be a recorded vote and that the bells would be ringing, setting the stage for what occurred.

Then we come to the dastardly act itself. With full knowledge of the requirements of our rules for the procedure to be followed on voting, and with full awareness that all senators were aware of such rules and, from previous experience, how they operated, the Speaker issued his letter of intent to call the vote. In doing so, he gave only 30 minutes notice, which, in effect, when one allows for delivery delay, was much less than that.

Then to compound the illicit act, the Speaker proceeded to lock the doors and take the vote before the time he had himself specified for the vote to be taken. The record shows, and senators have testified, that the doors were locked and the vote taken at 5:25 p.m., and not at 5:30 p.m. as set by the Speaker in his letter.

What else do we find but that all government members were miraculously in their seats in advance of the vote being taken. Surely it is inconceivable that they would all be present unless forewarned by their leadership to be in their place. In this regard, we must remember what Senator Pitfield, an independent senator, stated he was told by a government member concerning the plan of taking a vote before it was actually called.

All the foregoing leads to the conclusion that there was a preconceived plan to ignore the Senate rule and perform another dirty trick.

But there is worse. We now have the Leader of the Government, in effect, admitting to the whole dirty deal. We all heard him on Wednesday when he interjected, in an apparent defence of the Speaker, and spoke of the apparent problem with the Senate rules as to voting procedures. He posed the question as to what was to be done in the situation when the members failed to come into the chamber to vote. Were the bells allowed to go on ringing?

In other words, when the whips were not ready to signify to the Speaker that they were ready to proceed to the vote, was the Speaker not justified in calling the vote on his own. He based his argument on the proposition that under Rule 15 the Speaker would be justified in calling the vote for purposes of order and decorum. The Leader of the Government actually said that that was what the Speaker could do. It was all thought out beforehand.

As to the point about the excuse that was used in applying Rule 15 pertaining to order and decorum, surely this is stretching the rule beyond credibility. Was there a lack of order and decorum in the chamber? Was there disorder? There is no evidence of either.

For those of us who were not present, it is hard to know that, but perhaps among government members in the chamber there was a lack of decorum and disorder.

Thus it follows from the government leader's own words that the Speaker's action was planned from the beginning.

But if we accept the government leader's proposition regarding the justification of the Speaker's action, what follows? Surely in the face of the Senate rule on voting procedure and the practice followed over the years, and the awareness by the Speaker of senators' understanding of such procedure, something else was required of the Speaker, if only from a sense of morality.

If the Speaker honestly believed he had the authority and justification to call the vote, he should have done something more than just issue a letter giving only 30 minutes notice.

Should not the Speaker have consulted with all parties in the Senate and informed them of his views and so forewarned them? But he did not!

At the very least, should not the Speaker, in view of his knowledge of senators' reliance on the rules, have given a more reasonable length of notice of his intention to call the vote? Surely in the circumstances, was a mere 30 minutes a reasonable length of time? Surely not!

In effect, the short notice literally caught senators, apart from government members and selected independents, up in the air.

It is quite apparent that the whole affair smacks of another sleazy tactic of which the government has become so notorious in the public's view.

In this case it is the Speaker of this chamber who is left to take the blame—the Speaker who should be beyond reproach. It is certainly a pity that he allowed himself to be manipulated.

Before concluding, honourable senators, a short while ago the Prime Minister is reported to have suggested that his opponents should wash their mouths with soap. I would suggest that there is another good use for soap, although in this instance it would take a gross amount of soap. It is useful for the removal of slime!

Senator Doyle: Would the honourable senator permit a question? The honourable senator quoted at great length from Maclean's magazine. I wondered if that is the same magazine that, in 1957, showed its far-seeing capacity to judge Canadian politics by congratulating Louis St. Laurent on winning the 1957 election.

Is that the same magazine that has continued since 1957 to be right on the nose with every election?

Senator Lewis: I am sure the honourable senator knows that magazines and newspaper publish all sorts of things, and that we have to take much of it with a grain of salt.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is nice at this time to rise on this question of privilege and to see a distinguished gentleman in the Chair, which we did not have last week. The person now in the Chair will show some dignity and respect.

Honourable senators, I am not a very long-experienced parliamentarian. I have been at this only since 1951, about 41 years, and I have never, in all of that time, heard of a Speaker making such a ruling as was made here last week in calling a vote and locking the opposition members out of the chamber. That vote was taken against the rules of this assembly.

I would like to have got on with the debate on the goods and services tax, because there are areas in my province that can benefit from this tax if it ever gets into law.

Instead of giving them an opportunity to debate the goods and services tax, the Speaker made a drastic decision, supported by the Leader of the Government, which has forced me to decide that I cannot support this government on any measure.

Senator Murray: Not even for the location of the GST headquarters?

Senator Bonnell: Senator Murray says "Not even for the location of the GST headquarters?" Let me tell you about the GST headquarters, because I have a letter here from the Mayor of Summerside telling me the drastic things this government has done to close the air base in Summerside. The only hope of any future development they were given by this government was a promise of some offices for the administration of the federal GST. The Mayor of Summerside would like to support that move because the town needs the jobs. In fact, he appeared before the committee and supported the GST. Since that time the Province of Quebec said "We are going to have the jobs in Quebec, we are going to go along with the GST, and we are going to collect the money within our own province and pay the federal government at the end of the month." So there will be no federal jobs in the province of Quebec. Other provinces are getting on the bandwagon and saying they should keep those jobs within their own provinces. Consequently the federal government's contribution to the GST would be almost nothing. So that promise of the GST centre in Summerside will be just like the air base—it will be gone with the wind. The offices for the GST will be housed in the different provinces.

Senator Barootes: Is that a point of privilege?

Senator Bonnell: That is one of my points of privilege, and I have many more.

Senator Barootes: Summerside?

Senator Bonnell: Summerside is very dear to me, and I want to support it as much as I can. If you are against the GST, stand up and say you are against it, but do not stop me from supporting Summerside.

Senator Hastings: Stand up!

Senator Bonnell: He does not want to stand up. He just talks from his seat.

• (1745)

Senator Barootes: He has asked me to stand. Senator Bonnell, much as I appreciate your capacity as a legislator who has been in public office for 41 years, and much as I appreciate you as a friend, a fellow physician, and your need to raise a point of privilege, I thought it had to do with some loss of a right in this house, not with the GST itself. That is item 5 on our orders of the day, which I pray, Mr. Speaker, we will some day arrive at. If you wish to speak on a point of privilege, I will listen to you until tomorrow morning; but if you wish to speak on the GST, I beg you, wait until we get to item 5.

Senator Olson: But there is a connection.

Senator Hastings: There is an intrinsic connection.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable Senators, I am trying to support my town of Summerside. I said that if you are against Summerside and want to vote against the GST, then stand up, and you stood up. I do not know where you are anymore.

Senator Barootes: I am for the GST and for Summerside!

Senator Bonnell: I agree that you are a fine gentleman and a great physician, but you do not have 41 years experience in a legislature, and you have stood up to show that you are against the GST. Where are you?

Senator Barootes: I am for the GST and for Summerside.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable Senators, the other day I thought of an old friend of mine. Some years after "Rocket" Richard had retired from hockey, he was at the Montreal Forum watching the Canadiens play the Detroit Red Wings. Someone asked him who he would pick as the three stars of the game. Like the Speaker, he wanted to be fair. He said he would pick Jean Beliveau as the first star because he got a goal and assisted on the second goal and played good hockey all night. He said he would pick "Boom Boom" Geoffrion as the second star because he got a goal and assisted on the first goal and played good hockey all night. For the third star he picked his brother, the "Pocket Rocket", because although he didn't score any goals he was always where the puck was. Asked whom he would pick as the fourth star, he replied, "Gordy Howe, because if it wasn't for the three goals he got the Canadiens would have won the game." That is what happened with the Speaker the other day. To be fair, he was like Rocket Richard picking the three stars from the Montreal Canadiens.

Honourable Senators, I know that some of you are probably getting hungry, so I will carry on until six o'clock and then adjourn the debate; but first let me tell you that the essence of this whole thing—

Senator Phillips: Were you here last week?

Senator Bonnell: I was here last week. I was here Thursday and I was home on the weekend. I returned on Tuesday, the same as you; and, as far as I know, we are still on Tuesday. I would like to refer to Rules 49 and 50 and, to keep the record straight, so that my good friend from Saskatchewan will understand what I am talking about in my point of privilege, it is the voting procedure in this place. It has been talked about and read many times, but it will not hurt for it to be put on the record once more, to remind those opposite—especially the new senators—that we have operated by rules here since Confederation—rules that were approved and carried by the house and which have been accepted by all senators until this time. No longer can we on this side feel that this red book is worth a hoot. I would think the Speaker is probably going to write a new rule book. It will probably be Tory blue, Mulroney blue, rather than red, which is the colour of the Senate Chamber. The rule says:

> At the conclusion of the debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result.

We did not get to that point with the Speaker the other day, because the Leader of the Government stood up, along with others on that side, and wanted a recorded vote. They asked that the bells be rung. We on this side of the house never asked for the bells to ring. The Leader of the Government asked for the bells to ring and they stood up.

> If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote.

That is what happened. Two members on the Government side stood up.

> The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked".

Senator Barootes: Is that Rule 49 or 50, Senator Bonnell?

Senator Bonnell: I am reading from page 70.

Senator Barootes: Which rule is it, 49 or 50?

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bonnell: I believe it is 49.

Senator Barootes: It is neither. The whips are not mentioned in either Rules 49 or 50.

Senator Bonnell: Aren't they? Let me continue reading to you from page 70 where the whips are mentioned.

Senator Barootes: Read the preface to Appendix I.

Senator Bonnell: The Speaker will say "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked" when the whips have come in. Not when one whip is present and the opposition is locked outside. The Speaker also called the vote early, not at the time specified in the letter, so that the opposition did not have a chance to get here. The Liberal whip was outside telling the Liberal senators not to go in until everyone was present. They locked the door and locked the whip out.

Senator Barootes: May I read the preface to you?

Senator Bonnell: I can read. I have my own glasses.

Senator Barootes: The title of that appendix is "Forms and Proceedings", which is what you are reading from. Under that title it says:

> (This appendix is a general description of Senate practice and is included in this volume as a source of information on the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate referred to in Rule 1.)

Senator Hastings: They are the proceedings of the Senate and its customs and usages.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you for reading that for me. I could have read it myself, but you are a great assistant to me. You would make a good assistant surgeon.

Senator Barootes: The rules are 49 and 50. Read it to yourself.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable Senators, until I was so rudely interrupted by my good friend and colleague from western Canada—for whom I have respect, but he gets so confused at times—

Senator Hastings: He is getting old.

Senator Barootes: Just the facts, please.

Senator Bonnell: I heard of a fellow the other day who was called a "little something" and he told the press he was not little—meaning he was called the other word. I will continue to read from page 70:

> The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote.

It does not say that you lock the doors before the whips get in. It does not say that you call the vote when the opposition party is locked outside. It does not say that you run a parliament this way.

So, honourable senators, with the kind of action that was taken by our Speaker, we have every right to speak on a question of privilege before this house. I have before me many letters showing that the people of Canada agree with what the Liberal senators are doing. They also agree that the government of Canada has become so dictatorial that somehow the Senate should use its sober second thought and put a stop to the actions of the House of Commons under the leadership of Prime Minister Mulroney. I have an article from the Edmonton Journal entitled "Tory defiance of voters crisis of democracy". The paper, which is not a good Liberal paper, defines a voters crisis for democracy.

> Canadian democracy is in a crisis.
> But it is not, as Journal editorials and some columnists suggest, a problem of an unelected Senate trying to block the will of a "democratically elected" House of Commons. Rather, it is a crisis of a Tory government determined to defy the will of Canadians on a whole range of issues, and to shut Canadians out of the decision-making process.
> Our Constitution grants strong powers to the Senate to block unjust legislation precisely for the kind of situation we are encountering today with the GST. The Senate is an imperfect safety valve against the abuse of power by the House of Commons. The Americans refer to this as "check and balances".
> Democracy means more than casting a vote once every four or five years in a heavily manipulated election. After all, Hitler was "democratically elected" in 1933.

● (1800)

> Rather, democracy means rule by the people, and this implies an ongoing participation by the people in the political process.
> Only the Senate saw fit to allow democratic public participation on the GST through nation wide public hearings. Most Canadians who believe in democracy would prefer an elected Senate. But we do not hear The Journal questioning the legitimacy of the Supreme Court of Canada, which is also politically appointed.
> Never in my lifetime has the House of Commons introduced legislation as draconian as the GST. Media coverage has focused mainly on such trivialities as the increased cost of a haircut, but has largely ignored the big picture: this is part of a massive shift of taxation from the rich to the middle and lower classes.
> Many small businesses will be crippled by the enormous increase in the paper work of collecting this complex tax. This is not a mere retail sales tax but a multi-level tax that confuses even the experts. Many small businesses will be forced to close.
> The GST, it appears, is the reward to big business for saving the Conservatives in the 1988 election. It is not an attempt to make taxation fairer.
> The GST, and Meech Lake before it, are not merely tough, but unpopular, measures causing a slight dip in the polls. Rather, they are an abuse of power by a sleazy, manipulative government that is now rejected by more than four out of five Canadians.
> If the Senate is not successful in stopping this anti-democratic government, Canadians have one last resort to re-assert democracy: large-scale civil disobedience and defiance of the GST."

That is from Richard McGuire from Edmonton.

I have also before me a question from Jack Sheriff, of 246 Main Street, Wolfville, Nova Scotia. He says:

> Since the present government has rammed the bill through the House of Commons in the face of almost universal opposition to the bill, it is now the responsibility of Senate to represent the will of the people and either kill the bill or stall it until (or help force) an election with the GST as the central issue.
> Power has gone to the head of Mr. Mulroney. He is no longer paying attention to the voters. He believes he can do no wrong, especially at mid-term.
> So where does democracy end and autocracy begin? When does a majority of votes in the House of Commons override the will of the people? At what point does the convenience of a mid-term political strategy dictate and contradict the expressed dissatisfaction of the Canadian people?
> What is responsible government?
> At what point, when a government is irresponsible, unfair, and wrong-headed, does the Senate express 'sober second thought', assume responsibility and take action?

He says that the time is now. He goes on to say:

> The Bush and Mulroney tactics of stone-walling, brain-bashing and brain-washing are totalitarian tactics. Canadians are upset and overwhelmed by the tyrannic measures of this government yet are bewildered by the question of "How do you fight City Hall?" Tory strategy is that if once the GST is in, the measure is carved and set in stone. Millions of our tax dollars have already been spent on propaganda and ads to tell us how workable and effective the GST is. Businesses are being deluged with documentation to demonstrate how to file the GST as though it's already been implemented. But it is not yet a fait accompli. Moreso than any previous government has dared to tread, this government is treading and it is treading too far. The buck must stop somewhere. The buck (or ball) is now in the Senate's court.
> As you know, the Japanese government tried a similar ramming technique. The Japanese voters cried halt, and the GST was stopped.
> My accountant has acknowledged how terrible a a tax this is and suggests that the GST on top of an income tax is not only grossly unfair but insane and killing for small businesses. As if I don't already know it! I hear it daily from my customers.
> Both Dennis Mills and the Institute for Research on Public Policy have put forth alternatives. The government refused to listen. Will the Senate? I enclose a copy of a recent newsletter referring to Neil Brooks' report. I assume you have a copy of Mr. Mills' alternative. I trust the Senate will not only listen but pay attention and respond to these alternatives.

There should be a call for an election. Short of that, there should be a national referendum on an issue that will so drastically and disastrously affect the personal pocket book and the collective economy of every Canadian.

Canadians don't want the GST. Short of an election, confronted by an autocratic government, who represents the majority of Canadians at this point in the face of a monolithic, bureaucratic force? The Senate! And you . . . and your committee.

The challenge is yours. I trust you will not be deterred by charges of partisan politics but be up to the challenge of helping ensure that Canadians enjoy the right of representative government.

Mr. Mulroney has finally gone too far. Arrogance obviously has no limits. He is prepared now out of sheer perversity to push through the GST at any and at all costs, even if it destroys us at the same time. It is up to the Senate to find a way out of this dreadful dilemma because, clearly, even if Mr. Mulroney recognizes his folly in pursuing this course, he also clearly has become so deeply mired and committed that he feels obliged to proceed pell mell into the abyss and lacks the grace and the face to pull out.

Help him . . . and help us. Or God help us all! Stop this misdirected man and stop the madness by stopping the GST bill.

You and your members have the brains and the tact to do the right thing as opposed to the political thing. Canadians are counting on you. You may be sure that you can count on Canadians to support you.

I rarely write letters. But I can not stand idly by and watch my business and other businesses go down the drain. Canadians have a right to vote on this issue. The government is dealing with OUR tax dollars and proceeding with the GST when they know it is opposed by the majority of taxpayers. There is no mystery about this. Mr. Mulroney's standing in the polls continues to plummet with each passing day. Yet Mr. Mulroney doesn't seem to get the message. Please GIVE it to him! This I beg of you . . .

The Acting Speaker, Senator Belisle: Honourable senators, according to rule 12 of the Rules of the Senate, at 6:00 p.m. I must leave the Chair and return at eight o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: When the clock struck six and the Honourable Speaker retired to refresh himself, I had the privilege of speaking to honourable senators concerning this question of privilege, whereby our regular Speaker, appointed by the Prime Minister, carried out his wishes against the opposition members of this house by locking the door before a vote, so that he could be assured that the Prime Minister's wish could be proceeded with. This has never happened in the British Parliament or the Commonwealth in past history.

I do not quite understand why the Speaker took that stand, unless he had an absence of thought, an absence of memory or an absence of consciousness at the time and did something without thinking because he was persuaded to do so by the people who have him on the payroll. He does receive extra pay for doing that, and he does have extra privileges, and he is here at the discretion and pleasure of the Prime Minister. I suspect for those reasons he thought he should protect his own interests rather than the interests of the Canadian people, the interests of the Senate and the interests of the minority group in the Senate.

Honourable senators, at six o'clock I was talking about some of the requests I have received from constituents, friends and acquaintances across Canada asking me to do what I could to stop the passage of the GST.

For example, I have a letter in my hand from the Motor Truck, Canada's largest and most influential truck fleet magazine, which states:

> Senator Bonnell, the ball is now or soon will be in your court.
> According to one recent poll some 70 per cent of adult Canadians are oppposed to the GST at the 7 per cent level. The percentage opposed is higher than it was previously when the Finance Minister introduced it at 9 per cent.
> As Executive Editor for the past 17 years, to my knowledge this the first time Motor Truck has ever published a front-page appeal to our readers asking them to respond to very bad legislation.
> You and I will perhaps agree that if the Senate permits the GST to be adopted by Parliament, it will be raised to 8 per cent, 9 per cent in the budget immediately following the next election. And where will it stop thereafter is anyone's guess.
> It may be a technocrat's dream, but for the trucking industry and the citizens of Canada it will turn out to be a citizen's nightmare which will relentlessly reduce individual and family incomes while discouraging successive federal government from exercising fiscal restraint.
> You see some of the reasons this edition cited for giving a GST well-deserved permanent holiday on page 18.
> When this publication is at the printers we read the front page of the March 1st edition of the Globe and Mail which said that the federal government could save $2.5 billion in administrative costs over the next five years by scrapping the GST and $900 million one-time grant to small businesses and transition costs to accommodate the GST.
> In addition, Canadian business would save an estimated $5 billion by not being arbitrarily appointed the federal government's front-line tax collectors for transactions numbering in the billions.

Neil Brooks, of the Osgoode Hall Law School, in a paper published by the Institute for Research and Public Policy states:

> Senator, with great respect, it's your call. If there ever was an issue that you have a right to stop right in its tracks it's the GST. Simply put, the vast majority of Canadians don't want the GST. Can they count on you to reject it? Whether you are in favour or opposed to the GST, we would love to hear from you.
> Yours sincerely,
> Barry M. Holmes, Executive Editor, Associate Publisher of the magazine.

Also, honourable senators, I have a letter from a barrister and solicitor by the name of Bruce Haynes, Q.C. from Toronto. He said:

> Dear Senator, In an overwhelming way Canadians have made known their opposition to the GST, yet the government of this country, which prides itself on elective office has spurned the outcry of Canadians as if its mandate, once given, can confer the privilege of absolute rule.
> If a majority government is now to be reduced to a series of five-year dictatorships then never before has there been greater justification for the Senate of Canada to exercise its traditional function of reviewing legislative enactments and requiring their reconsideration.
> Because of their opposition to the GST and refusal of the government to listen, the ordinary Canadian is looking to the Senate for help. It is ironic that this call comes at a time when many are pressing for the Senate role that is elected, effective and equal.
> I am enclosing a copy of my March 12th letter to Prime Minister Mulroney sent shortly after the Commons closure motion which stifled all debate on the GST.
> May I urge you to do what the government refused to do, that is, listen to Canadians and reject the bill. At no time has the government or its members of the House of Commons Finance Committee given consideration to the concerns of Canadians. My own may be summarized as follows.
> The foundation of the Canadian economy is "consumer fed and consumer led." The GST, layered as it will be on top of existing provincial sales tax, will kick the consumer in the gut.
> As if to suggest that Canadians should applaud the GST, Commons Finance Chairman Don Blenkarn requested that we consider New Zealand where the GST equivalent met with acceptance on its introduction.
> Admit to Canadians the real reason for the GST, namely your government's colossal mismanagement of the finances of this nation for which you arrogantly seek to blame the previous Liberal government. It is true that they brought the federal deficit to $150 billion. But in scarcely more than five years your administration has more than doubled that deficit and at the expiry of your present mandate that debt will stand at $450 billion.

Can you imagine, honourable senators, the whole debt of the nation since Confederation until 1984 was $150 billion and it has almost doubled since that time under the Conservative government and they blame it on the Liberals. The nation's debt from Confederation to 1984 was only half of what they have put on the debt since that time.

> During the same period the successive budgets of Finance Minister Wilson have seen an increase in personal income taxes by 46 per cent, corporate taxes by 21 per cent and excise levies by 67 per cent. In all, a boost in the total government revenue from $80 billion to $120 billion, and increase of about 60 per cent. Yet your government continues to layer the federal deficit with Mr. Wilson bluffing his way through with annual estimates that have little to do with the reality. He predicts 10 per cent average government borrowing rates when even now the public is dumping 10.5 per cent Canada Savings Bonds so that they can buy 13.5 per cent Canada Treasury Bills.
> Why should Canadians trust you with another dime? With your dismal track record how long will it take before interest payments on the national debt consume 50 per cent of all taxes collected? History shows that your government's policy of increased taxation has led to higher inflation and therefore greater interest rates. It all continues as a vicious circle.

● (2030)

> Yet you and your ministers refuse to listen to the citizens of this country who are angry and fed up with being saddled with one of the highest tax burdens of all developed countries. In response to these tax burdens Canadians' labour costs are much higher than those of our trading partners. How can we possibly hope to meet trade competitors on a level playing field even if free trade extends that opportunity?
> Those attacking the GST have not failed in suggesting other alternatives. Dennis Mills, MP for Broadview—Greenwood, has in his recent book The Single Tax admirably reviewed the current tax system which is visibly failing this country and comes up with a flat tax variant that if implemented would have every hope of succeeding. It would altogether avoid any GST. With hope and with enthusiasm, why don't you listen to the Canadian people and reconsider the GST?
> Yours very truly,
> Bruce Haines.

I have another letter written by Bruce Haines on March 12. He sent it to the Prime Minister. He states:

> Never before have Canadians been treated so shabbily by a government in a near unanimous outcry which has expressed a determination to saddle them with the biggest and most cynical tax grab in history, the GST. You have resorted to closure in the House of Commons to fend off the avalanche of criticism directed against the GST. You inundated newspapers with taxpayer paid propaganda about the tax as if it were the law of the land on the theory that a lie will gain acceptance if repeated often enough. You have urged Canadians to believe that the 7% GST is little more than a benign replacement of the 13.5% Federal Sales Tax, which was only 9% before you got elected, and then only imposed on certain goods at the factory or manufacturers' level.

Why have you not boasted to Canadians that the GST will not just levy 7% and as much as you can increase it after that on supply throughout Canada on most everything included in the sale and lease of all agricultural, commercial and industrial lands and buildings, everything from the office tower to the corner store, the farm and the new as well as the renovated home.

Be honest and boast to the public that your GST will push up by 7% all service fees paid to architects, engineers, consultants, lawyers, accountants, realtors, interior decorators, funeral directors and even trustees in bankruptcy when Canadian businesses go under. Be sure to tell our tourist providers and border retailers of the virtue of the GST as Canadians flock across the border to shop and buy gasoline in the United States where prices and taxes are much lower, and where there is no GST.

Go ahead and warn Canadians that 7% will be added to tickets for trains, planes and taxi rides as well as utility bills and restaurant meals. Tell them that the GST will not overlook lottery tickets, pay phones, postage stamps and even the two dollar bet at the race track.

Don't forget to tell Canadians that the GST police, the RCMP, will be waiting at Canadian Customs to welcome home our citizens and to grab the GST on any purchases abroad. Its introduction will result in a storm of protest when it was recently raised to 12.5%.

What Mr. Blenkarn did not mention is that New Zealand is a unitary state without provincial sales tax where maximum income tax rates are 33%. By comparison, Canadians already pay combined federal and provincial maximum income tax rates of about 50%, plus existing provincial sales taxes at the average of about 9%. Predictably, the public's response to the GST will be a severe contradiction in the consumption of goods and services that will in turn sow the seeds of rising unemployment.

Our current prosperity is tied to the service industry which has been the largest source of increased employment over the past generation. All taxes, particularly visible taxes, are inflationary, and the GST will push inflation beyond the current levels that have been used to justify existing high interest rates. Responsibility for the level of inflation being experienced in Canada today most variously in the succession of government budgets, essentially federal, but also provincial, have constantly through direct and indirect levies pushed the total of taxation to levels not seen since the Second World War. Canada's legacy is that its citizens are among the most heavily taxed of the developed industrialized countries of the world. As Canadians, we are already feeling the adverse effects on our tourist industry because of incessantly increasing levels of taxation. This industry which was ranked third in importance is already declining.

As well as the decrease flow in tourist dollars, Canadians are spending more abroad. Canada is just too expensive and the GST will dramatically widen the gap. It is pathetic to listen to the government's rhetoric that businesses can compete and file forms to get the tax back after they leave. Even without the GST, we have seen that the close proximity of most Canadians to the United States border has led to a shop USA attitude. The mass exodus of Canadians across the border for weekends has become something of a national joke, but there is no humour in the fact that our own merchants cannot easily compete and that Canada's border businesses are closing down. Our largest trading partner, the United States, with whom we have recently and perhaps irrevocably linked our future even more closely, does not have a GST. Indeed, the tax burdens upon American citizens are much lower than we now experience. As free trade inevitably makes trans-border migration easier, the imbalance of levels of taxation will eventually cause more and more Canadians to vote with their feet. The GST is not only a major step, but a step in the wrong direction.

Those who have studied demography realize that Canada, for most of its decades, has been a net loser in migration patterns. The theory of free trade is that of a trade-off to competition in Canada's small domestic market. Canadians prosper by selling to a much larger United States market. However, this presupposes a level playingfield. As a consequence of high taxes, Canadian labour costs are already much higher than those of Americans. With every justification Canadians will demand catch-up wages to the 7% GST.

How are we going to compete? How are we going to compete if we cannot match our trading partners and cost of production? During the past five years the successive budgets of Finance Minister Wilson have seen an increase in personal income taxes by 46%; corporate taxes by 21%; and excise levels by 67%; a boost in total government revenues from $80 billion to $120 billion. At the same time the national debt has more than kept up by increasing from $150 billion to $325 billion. The Financial Post projects our deficit will reach $440 billion by the end of the current mandate.

It seems we have developed a syndrome in which higher taxes fuel higher prices which fuel higher interest rates which fuel higher deficits. Canadians have grown to distrust the ability of the government to handle the taxpayers' resources. For most individuals the tax paid represents a parting with hard earned dollars. Higher taxes have only encouraged increased spending with swollen budgets and larger deficits. People resent the GST as they see it as an opportunity for governments to continue its proliferation.

One of the worst features of the GST is the burden of complexity which it introduces into the commercial life of this country. How many hundreds of thousands of businesses will be turned into tax collectors which will increase the administration costs of doing business? For those already collecting provincial sales tax, why must they be faced with a further entirely different system? No other country in the world has done this to its merchants. Why must Canadians hire thousands of civil servants to administer and police the collection of the tax? High levels of taxation in this country have already encouraged an underground economy. The GST will simply promote such business practices and, worse, reduce respect for the entire taxation system. The widespreading anger now being expressed by Canadians across the country will be translated into solemn resentment once the GST comes into force. Under the government's cry that the existing manufacturers sales tax, which has increased by 4.5%, is a silent killer of jobs, lurks the unspoken truth that the GST is already far broader and more lethal in this range of damage. The underlying repugnance of the GST is that for the first time in their history, Canadians are caught in the jaws of a dual vice, the taxation of income they earn and the taxation of their after tax income in the form of higher prices imposed upon every commercial transaction in their economic lives. The theory of free trade is that it is a trade-off for competition in Canada's small domestic market. Canadians will prosper by selling into a much higher market. However, this presupposes a level playing field.

Honourable Senators, I have many other letters here which I would like to read to you. I have one here dated October 2 addressed to the Prime Minister with a copy to me. It states:

In your battle with the Senate of Canada which you describe as being antidemocratic, it is time for you to stop hiding behind the will of the accountable House of Commons. If we look at your track record on the GST it is apparent you have little patience with real democracy or the House of Commons. You apply closure in the Commons, stifle any debate and you kicked out of caucus members of your own party. These members honestly represent their electors' overwhelming voice of opposition to the GST. Although you know 85% of Canadians want no part of the GST for so many reasons, all of which have received eloquent expression, you are not prepared to listen to them. To you, democracy means a five-year dictatorship with the view of Canadians being irrelevant except when the election writ is issued.

Supplementing this arrogance you have added cynicism by stacking the Senate with political cronies, some famous and some infamous, whose significant purpose will be to do your bidding. In the 1984 election akin to addressing yourself in the raiment of a virgin, you lectured to the then Prime Minister John Turner with the words, 'You could have said no'. Unfortunately, he didn't know, and neither did Canadians, that you were to become the biggest political pork purveyor in our history.

To arrogance and cynicism you have added incompetence. During this country's most delicate phase of constitutional debate, the Meech Lake Accord, you just had to boast about yourself as the dice roller, that somehow you alone with an unfailing sense of timing and persuasion had whipped all the other players into shape. When the whole thing fell apart your GST whiz, Don Blenkarn, publicly announced that Newfoundland should be towed out to the middle of the Atlantic Ocean and sunk—a great day for national unity, Mr. Prime Minister.

To arrogance, cynicism, and incompetence you have added a curious indifference by maintaining personal silence during the standoff, across the barricades, between armed Quebec police and armed warriors. Your Minister of Indian Affairs said he wouldn't negotiate 'at the end of a barrel of a gun.' Whose barrel? Whose gun? You continued to maintain your silence as the world was treated to the spectacle of watching Canadian soldiers armed with rifles stare down Indian mothers holding nothing more than their children. Why weren't you there on the first day instead of on the seventieth day? Suddenly Canada's outspoken criticism of the Republic of South Africa is drawing some catcalls.

The Canadian people have rallied around the Senate of Canada as the only chamber of Parliament that, until now, has expressed a willingness to listen to them as they cry out against the GST. In your railings against the Senate, not once did you show the slightest interest in the thoughtful report of the Standing Committee or in listening to their 'sober second thought', which report and thoughts are, after all, the Senate's constitutional function.

With tyrant-like fury you have attacked the Senate and, spurning practice, precedent and convention, you have loaded its ranks and avoided any consultation with either Parliament or the provinces. Surreptitiously you prevailed upon the Queen, herself, to resort to an unused and untested section of a statute when Canadians believe there no longer exists any such right of monarchial involvement.

Arrogance, cynicism, incompetence, indifference and tyranny. Is it any wonder that the party you lead has attained what was once regarded as an unthinkable political phenomenon; that is, a crossover between its percentage of popular support and the prime rate of interest!

Prime Minister, in 1988, you piously observed that four years of public office was really the actual mandate between federal elections. Now you speak of clinging to the last day of a five-year term. Please reconsider the matter once again. When a person in your office is as universally disliked as you are, anytime soon is the best time to go.

Yours very truly,

Bruce Haines, Q.C.

Honourable senators, I have briefcases of letters asking me to bring these thoughts to the attention of senators. I was going to save them until later, but because the Speaker made such a draconian decision last week against the rights of the minority, the rights of Parliament and the rights of the Senate, I thought I should tell you about the thoughts of other Canadians, not only what they think of our Speaker, but what they think of the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Conservative Party, at this particular time in history. Perhaps honourable senators opposite, who I feel have more consideration for the taxpayers and Canadian citizens, will realize what your government is doing to the poor, the underprivileged, and the lower-income Canadians by letting the big corporations off. They used to pay the MST. Now they will save billions of dollars. The widow with three or four children probably on welfare will be penalized by paying taxes on even the popcorn she may buy for her children or a haircut for her children. Even the war veterans who fought to make this country the free country it is now have to pay a tax on the wreath they are going to lay on the monument on November 11, as they remember their fallen brothers who gave their lives for this country.

Honourable senators, this is a sad day for Canada. What happened the other day with our Speaker is very sad. It is a sad day for the Leader of the Government, who allowed this to happen. It is a sad day for those who sat here and did not object to this catastrophe. My right to vote—a right which many people have fought for—was brutally attacked and taken away from me. The female senators on the other side must have thought about the battles over the years to obtain the right to vote in this country, only to find out that the Speaker of this house took it away from them in the Parliament of Canada. I am sure that every parliamentarian across this Commonwealth will be upset at what happened in this nation.

The honourable senator who is receiving extra pay for taking the job of sitting in that Chair has no power other than to call the items on the order paper—we recognize the chamber, not the Speaker. For him to take this action was beyond the call of duty and beyond his power. I would suggest that in order to save his soul when St. Peter meets him at the Gate, he resign his position, have a comfortable seat in the corner and perhaps stay there until he is 75.

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Bonnell: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell's home province is Prince Edward Island. The tourist industry is a major source of income in this province. I am sure you are aware that the impact on the tourist industry as a result of the GST is probably the most significant factor in the whole economic result of the application of the GST on tourism.

It is true that the government has given a minor rebate to American, not Canadian, tourists. I am led to believe that, because of transportation costs, goods in Prince Edward Island are more highly priced than goods in Toronto. Could you discuss the impact on Prince Edward Islanders of a 7 per cent tax on those higher prices? How will it affect your province? What would be the impact of a 7 per cent tax on tourism—on airplane fares not only for tourists but for people who have to go somewhere at high cost and pay a tax on their transportation in addition to the already high rates? As a representative of Prince Edward Island, I know you are aware of the importance of the subjects I have referred to. I would be interested in your comments.

Senator Murray: Are we into the debate on the GST? Did my motion pass?

Senator Hastings: No, we are on a question or privilege.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, tourism in P.E.I. is our second major industry. Our first major industry is agriculture, our second is tourism, and our third is fisheries. We do not have a manufacturing sector or mines in P.E.I., but we do have the Anne of Green Gables house.

Senator Simard: If you defeat the bill, you will not get the GST centre.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Simard, let me tell you that I did not say whether I was going to vote for or against the bill; but if you keep talking you can certainly persuade me.

Senator Lefebvre: What he is saying is blackmail.

Senator Bonnell: Prince Edward Island has the CNR ferry and the Northumberland Ferry to take our people back and forth. Now there will be a 7 per cent tax on that transportation and the goods coming across on those ferries.

Senator Murray: Are you in favour of the fixed link?

Senator Bonnell: Your government ruled out the fixed link by sending environmentalists there to try to stop the fixed link. They do not really understand the economy of Prince Edward Island.

Senator Murray: You are against environmentalists then.

Senator Bonnell: I am not against anyone. Right now I am against your Speaker, and I am against the way you allowed this to happen.

Senator Simard: He is pro-Liberal, that is it.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, Prince Edward Island will lose tourists because of the 7 per cent tax on accommodation, restaurants and transportation. When people write home to tell others about the beauty of P.E.I., a 7 per cent tax will be charged on the card and a 7 per cent tax will be charged on the postage. Now you are going to raise the price of the stamp from 39 cents to 40 cents, and you are going to charge them 43 cents for the 40-cent stamp.

Senator Simard: Run that by me again.

Senator Bonnell: Prince Edward Island is one of the most beautiful places in Canada and the world. It is the only place with the warmest salt water north of Florida.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: You should all come to Prince Edward Island, but be prepared to pay a 7 per cent tax every time you turn around. I hope you come to see the new offices in Summerside, which will only be big enough to look after the Prince Edward Island tax collectors, because, as I see it now, the federal government is backing out and the provinces are going to collect the tax on their behalf. There will then be no federal government offices in Summerside. They closed the air base, you know.

People of P.E.I. realized the Conservatives were attempting to destroy the economy of the province because they voted Liberal in the last election. The Conservatives destroyed the only National Defence base in the whole province. Drug traffikers come in off the shores because there are no airplanes to check them any more. Our sick cannot be flown out of the province because the planes that were used to rescue them and fly them to the hospitals on the mainland have been taken away.

Senator Murray: Don't drive the tourists away.

Senator Bonnell: The Conservatives have destroyed our economy and they are going to destroy it even more.

Senator Hastings: What about the fishing industry?

Senator Bonnell: The whole economy, from agriculture to fisheries to tourism, has been destroyed by this government. For God's sake, senators, think very hard when you go to vote on the GST.

Senator Simard: If they do not want to go to P.E.I., they can come to New Brunswick.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, perhaps the reason the federal government is introducing the GST is because Senator Simard wants the people to go to New Brunswick. So he is trying to charge everyone a 7 per cent extra tax to go to the beautiful province of Prince Edward Island, the Garden of Eden.

Senator Denis: May I ask a question of the honourable senator?

Senator Bonnell: Yes.

Senator Denis: You have been talking about the 7 per cent tax on tourism. In your province they used to compare the 7 per cent tax with the manufacturing price, which is about 3 or 4 times less expensive than the retail price.

• (2045)

Let us compare a coat that costs $200 retail. If the one who makes the coat charges $140, what is the difference? It is a big 13 per cent, but that is in the beginning, and the other input costs that drive the cost higher are not added on. Let us talk about fridges, washing machines and the expensive appliances that ordinary people need. They will all pay 7 per cent on January 1.

Senator Fairbairn: Maybe not.

Senator Frith: Maybe not, but the government wants them to.

Senator Lefebvre: Simard wants that.

Senator Denis: I want to know how expensive those things will be.

Senator Simard: Don't ask Senator Bonnell, ask the expert, Senator Buckwold, behind you.

Senator Denis: Senator Simard, you once quit your party to go independent; why don't you go independent again?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me tell you of the drastic effect that the GST will have on my province. We do not have a manufacturing industry. We do not have a General Motors or a Ford Motor Company. Let me relate an experience. Some years ago the Province of New Brunswick had a sales tax. The Liberal Government in power in Prince Edward Island in 1959 opposed sales taxes. However, the Conservative Government came to power and installed a sales tax. From 5 per cent it has gone to 10 per cent under different Conservative premiers. In 1959 the Province of New Brunswick had a sales tax. A gentleman from New Brunswick came to visit me and he wanted to buy a stove. He said to me, "I have a chance to buy a GE stove in New Brunswick for $525, but if I could buy it in Charlottetown I would save on the sales tax." I had bought the same stove from a wholesaler. I said to him, "If you like, I will sell you that stove for $300, because I only paid $225 for it." I wanted to make myself a few dollars. He said, "If I can cancel the stove at Halmon's Store, I will give you a call and have you ship the stove to me in Moncton." Later he phoned and said, "I am sorry, I do not want your stove." "Why?" I asked. He said, "After I saw you I went to dinner at the Charlottetown Hotel. The place was full and I had to sit with another gentleman. He happened to be the gentleman who was selling the stoves. He said he would sell me the stove from the same manufacturer for $125. Consequently I can't buy yours at your price."

So, Senator Denis, the manufacturers' sales tax on that stove was calculated on the $125. That stove is now $550, and if you add 7 per cent to that at each stage along the line, you will get more than the 13 per cent manufacturers' sales tax on $125. I remind you that when this government came to power they added 4.5 per cent to the manufacturer's sales tax.

Senator Lefebvre: A 50 per cent raise.

Senator Bonnell: That was done by this government since 1988.

Senator Lefebvre: Taxes and food banks!

Senator Bonnell: The manufacturers' sales tax was a lot better for P.E.I., particularly for the low income and the unemployed.

Unemployment in P.E.I. is up to 17 or 18 per cent, and this government wants to change things so that they no longer give out unemployment insurance. They refuse to accept our Senate bills that will give people unemployment in 10 weeks. These people can no longer meet the variable entry requirements that assist people who are out of work. I do not really know what will happen to our dear little province because of this government. The only thing we can do is to continue to elect Liberals in the hope that the rest of Canada will do the same thing.

Senator Buckwold: You have provoked another question.

Senator Stollery: It is a fascinating subject.

Senator Buckwold: It is.

Senator Murray: Then why don't we get on to the debate.

Senator Buckwold: Are they again trying to throttle discussion in this free chamber?

Senator Bonnell, I think you gave a very good illustration of the impact of the goods and services tax on the cost of a stove, but you did not comment on the fact that the electricity to the stove will be increased by 7 per cent.

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Lefebvre: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: And if you happen to have gas—I am talking about natural gas—it will be taxed at 7 per cent.

Senator Lefebvre: No kidding.

Senator Buckwold: No. So, over and above the extra cost you will pay, you will have to pay 7 per cent on the energy source that you use. Perhaps you have a comment on that point and particularly on the further impact it will have on Prince Edward Island.

Senator Simard: What if you burn your fingers on the stove? What happens then?

Senator Bonnell: If you burn your fingers on the stove you will have to pay the tax on the bandage. We do not have a tax on gas in Prince Edward Island because we do not have gas. We were promised by this government a pipe line from Quebec down through Atlantic Canada. We never got that pipe line.

Senator Buckwold: Bring in Simard; he will give you the natural gas!

Senator Bonnell: If we had Senator Simard, and he could suck as hard as he can blow, we could get our gas pretty cheaply.

Senator Simard: You would give medicare, I suppose.

Senator Bonnell: We are not going to tax medicare. However, even that is not fair for people in the medical profession, because they cannot charge 7 per cent sales tax because it would really amount to charging the government. However, they must pay the sales tax on the equipment they buy.

Senator Kenny: Excuse me, may I interrupt? It says in The Citizen concerning root canal therapy that of $230 you would pay $1.93 under the FST but $3.31 in GST. That is on root canal therapy. Can you believe it?

Senator Bonnell: There is no end to it. For example, in my little office in Prince Edward Island I have four secretaries. I hire and pay these four secretaries through "a holding company". Now I cannot do that any more because if my "holding company" pays the secretaries I will have to pay the 7 per cent sales tax. Now I have to pay them individually and hire them as my own employees rather than company employees. So no longer can members of the medical profession operate offices under "management companies".

Senator Buckwold: You will pay a tax on your rent though.

Senator Bonnell: You pay tax on your rent, your lights, heat, on everything.

Senator Lefebvre: How about your X-ray equipment?

Senator Bonnell: On all equipment.

Senator Murray: You get a rebate, do you not?

Senator Bonnell: There is no rebate.

Senator Murray: Then I won't ask you what kind of company it is.

Senator Denis: Do you have any idea of how many hundreds of goods and services will be taxed at 7 per cent that are now not being taxed at the manufacturers' level? For instance, if you have a shave you will have to pay 7 per cent on the cost.

Senator Murray: Where would you find anybody to give you a shave these days?

Senator Denis: At present if you buy clothing in Quebec you do not pay tax, but now we will have to pay 7 per cent on those purchases.

Senator Bonnell: As I understand it, the federal government does not at present charge sales tax on clothes, and nor do many of our provinces. They realize that the poor need clothing. They do not charge tax on food because they realize that they need to eat. However, the federal government would rather see you go bare foot, because it wants to charge you on your shoes, your coat, your tie, and even your underwear. The government is going to charge you on your toilet paper and even on the condoms that you use to prevent AIDS. It has reached the bottom of the barrel.

PAGES—ACADEMIC STUDIES—TEMPORARY REPLACEMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, among the members of our staff who have found the recent proceedings difficult are our pages. Many of them, as you know, are students. I have been told by Mr. Greene, the Clerk Assistant, that he would like our approval to allow these fine young people to turn their attention to their academic careers, because at this time they face exams and their years could be at risk. I have also spoken to Senator Murray on this matter. So, for our side, I not only approve of Mr. Greene's plan but I encourage him. I thank the pages for their work and their attention to duty. We hope to see them back and we wish them well in their academic careers. They are as follows: Joanne Wilkinson, Steve Tipman, Cathy Piccinin, Chris Walkinshaw, Vincent MacNeil, Janey Lee, Caroline Fisher and Isolde Dunphy.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for drawing this matter to our attention this evening. I agree completely with the arrangements that have been made respecting our pages and their substitutes for the next little while. I assure the pages that as they go off to burn the midnight oil yet again in another enterprise—

Senator Frith: We will still be here doing it too.

Senator Murray: —we will still be here, and our thoughts and best wishes go with them as they prepare for their exams.

THE SENATE

STOPPING OF DIVISION BELL—SPEAKER'S LETTER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE CONCLUDED

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we have been debating a question of privilege now for five days based on a fundamental denial of the rights and privileges of senators in this chamber. We must remind ourselves and Canadians of what has happened. What began as a battle against the GST on September 25 has now broadened because of the ominous action taken last Thursday on the part of Senator Charbonneau and the government. In a move unprecedented in our parliamentary history, the doors of this chamber were locked against the Opposition and we were deprived, not just of our right to vote, but also of an opportunity to plead our case with the Speaker to hold back, to rethink and reconsider, to use reason and commonsense and not take the irrevocable step that has plunged this house into a debate that damages all of us.

• (2100)

We are asked by senators opposite and by the Government Leader to get on with business as if nothing of consequence had happened. Well, an act of unparalleled consequence to the future of this Senate did occur last Thursday, and to ignore it, or to let it pass for consideration sometime in the future, is irresponsible conduct for each of us who is aggrieved by Senator Charbonneau's actions. We cannot conduct normal business, including the all-out battle on the GST, until this issue of rights and privileges is somehow resolved and the rules of operation in this House are restored.

One of the senators in this debate earlier questioned the cost of the last few days in dollars and cents, and I suppose that is easily calculated. Senator Frith and Senator Murray made reference to the pages who have done absolutely yeoman service here in the last few days, and I think all of them are to be warmly thanked and tendered our very best wishes in the studies and exams that are ahead of them.

I would also like to thank, for showing an incredible degree of professionalism and class, the Hansard reporters—

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: —who have been with us hour after weary hour, and who then have to go and transcribe and with their colleagues produce for Canadians a record of this debate, always turning out first-class copy.

I would also like to thank the protective staff, the commissionaires—

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: —who have been working under very difficult circumstances inside and outside this chamber.

Senator Simard: Let us go through all of them!

Senator Hastings: We thank you, too, Simard.

Senator Fairbairn: It goes back to last Thursday. What is incalculable is the cost to our system of the interference by the government, through a use and abuse of the position of the Speaker and the Chair, and the cost of that to the functioning of this house can be laid squarely at the feet of the Prime Minister of this country, and, through him, the Government leader in this place.

So, Honourable senators, we are making a powerful case affecting our privileges here in this house and I suggest there is another part of that case of privilege arising over the events of last Thursday. Senator Charbonneau's actions unleashed a course of events which also has prevented many of us on both sides of this house from fulfilling our responsibilities as senators back in the provinces which we represent. There is no question that events of recent days are so serious that we are compelled to remain here in Ottawa, and this has caused widespread cancellation of commitments to those whom we represent.

In Edmonton, Alberta, for example, this week there is an historic conference now in progress to focus attention on the serious issue of literacy in Canada. Hundreds of delegates, representing every level of the literacy constituency in this country, are setting directions to carry on the momentum which has developed during 1990, the International Year of Literacy. Those representatives cover all of the important areas of this serious issue, in particular the learners themselves. They cover administration for the policymakers and those involved with industry or business-based literacy training.

The conference covers the practitioners, the literacy coordinators, the tutors of adults. It covers the research people, so important in building help on this issue, and it covers special interests, such groups including natives, women, the poor, people in remote areas and those with various handicaps. The conference has been organized over a period of one year. In fact, it was last October 11, a year ago this week, that I was proud to be asked to be the Honourary Chair of this conference, to open it on Tuesday, to support it during this week, and to join with the Governor General in closing it tomorrow morning in Edmonton. With tremendous regret and sadness I have been unable to carry out what I consider to be a major responsibility as a senator in my province, on an issue that threatens every part of our society. Although the organizers of the Literacy Conference understood and supported the reasons for my absence, I should like honourable senators here to know what I did not have the privilege of conveying directly to Albertans in Edmonton this week.

I particularly wanted to note that the conference in Edmonton occurs at a critical time. Because of the focus of the International Year, our country has heard and seen more about the problems and the opportunities of literacy than at any time in our nation's history. Tremendous effort has been made to tell Canadians that this issue is hurting our country, our fellow citizens, our children and their future. That has been doubled and redoubled by literacy organizations, community projects, educators and the dedicated army of volunteers which continually keeps this battle alive on the ground in every community that we represent in this country.

Governments at every level have increased their commitments. Business has begun to accept the reality of the threat against its own productivity, and labour has been initiating innovative efforts to help and support Canadians in the workforce. An uncomfortable issue, a perplexing issue, a deeply debilitating issue, has been forced onto the national agenda, and as 1990 draws to a close we must forcefully and candidly begin to ask the questions and take the actions that will keep literacy on that agenda.

Where do we go from here? Are the commitments of a single year strong enough to last a decade and beyond into a new century? Although all of us have been motivated, I hope, by the activities of 1990, are Canadians truly aware of the literacy issue and ready to translate that awareness into political pressure, which is essential to maintaining and accelerating government activity and financing? How do we take all of the ideas and the surveys and the programs and the wisdom accumulated in the past three years and clearly articulate the priorities that will lower those horrendous statistics and bring in millions of Canadians from the sidelines of our national life so that they can be a productive part of the solution? After all, honourable senators, we are talking about more than one third—thirty-eight per cent—of our adult Canadians who can barely cope with every-day reading, writing and numeracy tasks which all of us take for granted. As these citizens expend their energies in trying to hide their problems, to survive, they remain in private isolation, frustrated and sad, often afraid and angry, in a world in which success and fulfilment depend so heavily on communication at every level of our society.

Senator Simard: Whose motion are we on?

Senator Robertson: What are you speaking on?

Senator Fairbairn: Some 60 per cent of Canadians with limited literacy skills are unemployed, and they are not looking for a job. They cannot find a job and they cannot hold a job. Others include mothers running dreadful risks in their homes because they cannot read the labels on dangerous substances or the instructions to deal with accidents to themselves or to their children—

Senator Simard: Order! Order!

Senator Fairbairn: There are farmers failing themselves and their families and their land because they cannot keep up with an increasingly complex and technical industry. There are also senior citizens who are in frightening isolation as their inability to communicate compounds the natural difficulties of the aging process and their support network of family and friends slowly disappears. Others with literacy problems are prisoners, an estimated 50 per cent of our present prison population in the federal system—and this can rise as high as 80 per cent where there is a large component of native inmates, such as is the case in western Canada. We know very well that education and literacy are major problems among the aboriginal peoples on and off reserves and in the Northern Territories. If we fail to focus on these problems with real commitment and generosity, all of us are diminished.

When we look at literacy problems, we must also include the related issue of learning disabilities, which affect some 20 per cent of Canadian children, and which, if undetected early, can brand them from the start as mentally retarded, slow, spoiled or just plain bad.

As you will realize, while new Canadians may be literate in their countries of origin, coping with another language or languages in a new country means that they will probably require extensive language training. In this contest, I want to smother a popular myth regarding who in Canada is illiterate. It is not an imported problem. It does not come in from someplace else. In fact, almost 80 per cent of functionally illiterate Canadians were born right here in this country, and 70 per cent of them live in our cities. More than half of them are between the ages of 18 and 55, which is the most productive period of a working lifetime.

So, honourable senators, Canadians in trouble with literacy are men and women of all ages across this country who learned to travel in a city by counting on their fingers the bus stops and the subway stops because they cannot read the signs, or who shop at a corner store and a supermarket by memorizing the colour, the shape, the sizes and the positions of goods on shelves. They cannot read the classified ads. They cannot read the telephone book. They cannot fill out an application, whether for health care, housing, social assistance or a job.

Senator Hastings: Or for a tax credit.

Senator Fairbairn: And often they pass on their problem as a tragic legacy to their children. I can tell you, Senator Hastings, they are the people who will be least able either to understand anything about the GST or to pay for it day by day as they purchase the basic goods to try to keep them and their families alive.

Senator Hastings: They will pay for it!

• (2115)

Senator Fairbairn: We now have Canadian statistics which help to tell the story.

For the past three years we have tried to come to grips with the first national literacy survey by the Southam News organization, which told us that an estimated one in four adult Canadians, some 5 million citizens, are directly affected by illiteracy. Of these an estimated 1.5 million are basically illiterate; they cannot read or write. Three million are functionally illiterate; they are unable to cope with the basic everyday tasks which we take for granted. Another 500,000, which were not covered by the survey, are estimated to be in our prison population, on native reservations, and in mental institutions.

Last year, as part of its contribution to International Literacy Year, the government published, through Statistics Canada, the result of a special survey. I am told it is the most extensive to date in any industrialized country and that it paints an even grimer picture. This study found that over one-third, some 38 per cent, of adult Canadians between the ages of 16 and 69 do not have the skills to perform beyond simple reading tasks within familiar contexts using materials that are clearly set out for them. Among these, 16 per cent of adult Canadians have skills so limited that they cannot deal with the majority of written material encountered in everyday life, and a worrisome 22 per cent have simple skills but tend to avoid situations involving reading. They are just opting out and are in grave danger of losing what limited skills they have. This federal study also notes the correlation between employment and income levels with reading ability and completion of high school.

But here is the real shocker. Both Southam and Statistics Canada agree that some 30 per cent of our functionally illiterate adults are high school graduates, and more than one-third of our teenagers, our future work force, drop out of school each year. Combine those two statistics and it is clear that we have a national problem of major proportions. It respects no boundaries or jurisdictions, and it seriously reduces our national capacity to compete globally.

If we recognize this, we realize that our solutions must be co-operative, national, and that they must transcend constitutional barriers. Yes, education is a provincial responsibility, but, yes, literacy is a national imperative. We must keep fighting for a national awareness program. We must systematically use the power of television and radio to demystify illiteracy. Through public knowledge we can build the acceptance needed both to offer significant help as well as to encourage those suffering from the problem to come forward to seek that help.

As a senator, in the last six years I have chosen this issue as one major focus of my activity, which is why I would much prefer to be in Edmonton tonight than here in Ottawa. I have had the privilege of hearing from and speaking to Canadians from all walks of life about the crippling effects of being functionally illiterate, not only on individuals and their families but on the health and the resilience of our economy and on our society in general.

For instance, a couple of years ago the Canadian Business Task Force on Literacy estimated that lost productivity and industrial accidents resulting from low literacy levels lead to an annual business loss of $4 billion in Canada, and an estimated cost of more than $10 billion a year to society generally. This is the equivalent of approximately one-third of our annual federal deficit.

In the workplace, where ultimately these problems build up beneath the surface, we join with other western nations in facing a severe problem of renewal. In the next 20 years, honourable senators, it is estimated that the population of North America will grow at a slower rate than in any period since the Depression of the 1930s. The age level of the workforce will rise and the number of young people entering the workforce will decline. By the year 2000, 85 per cent of the Canadian workforce will consist of adults who are presently in that workforce. If the literacy problems which affect an estimated one out of every six Canadian workers today are not addressed by a co-operative effort, they will be more deeply and desperately entrenched as we enter the new century. So business and labour are a critical part of this issue, but the education system is also critical.

I would like to share with you some of the insights that educators have shared with me. I am thinking of a teacher in Alberta in her mid-thirties who is seasoned and brilliant at what she does. She is wholly committed but despairing because the system does not allow her to hold back and help students who do not have requisite literacy skills to succeed at the next level. The so-called "social promotion" concept keeps the students moving with their peers regardless of their inability to cope with the grades.

I am thinking of an older teacher, one who has been out of the system for a number of years who has just returned to find that too many of her young students do not have sufficient oral language skills to easily begin to learn to read and write in the earliest grades.

I am thinking of a student teacher who has just graduated this summer, articulate, enthusiastic and certain that she can beat the system she has yet to enter, if only she can manage to work the basics of grammar into a curriculum she will be obligated under contract to teach.

Teachers are understandably among the most sensitive about literacy and the eduction system and they, more than anyone, must cope with its constraints. Many who have spoken to me feel that there are too many children they cannot lead to functional literacy within the current system. To leave children in this quandary whether for the rest of their lives or until years later when as adults they face the agony of trying to learn the basics, is incredibly more costly both to them and to us.

With that in mind, let us take a look at the youth of our country and the environment in which they are learning or not learning. Let me start with an education survey that I read about last February in the Montreal Gazette. It cited a teacher in the east end of that city who only tests her class during the first 15 days of the month before the social assistance and the food money runs out, because after that the children are too hungry and too tired to concentrate on learning. This, by no means, is isolated to the east end of Montreal.

We need to ask serious questions about the re-distribution of wealth and the erosion of the programs that would allow these children first to eat and then to learn. Over 1 million children in Canada live below the poverty line, despite the lavish consumption and accumulation of wealth surrounding us. I think all of us became more aware of their plight and the plight of other children around the world most recently when the Prime Minister of Canada chaired a special summit at the United Nations on the situation of children in the world.

Social patterns have changed and we have an enormous percentage of children growing up in single parent families, most often headed by a female with a low-paying job and few, if any, prospects. When you scratch the condition of illiteracy often you will find poverty, fear, hunger, homelessness, exhaustion, discrimination, mental, physical and sexual abuse, all of which effectively block or dull normal learning patterns.

Let us look further. The first and most prominent teachers a child can have are the parents. This role in 1990 is very different from my era when a comfortable two-parent family was a long-term goal. Today a greater number of women want careers and are competing for meaningful jobs in a workplace where they still often receive lower wages than men. However, a far, far greater number of Canadian women and Canadian mothers, either single or from two-parent families, are in the workforce because of absolute economic necessity. So often that first teacher is not at home in the early years. Financial circumstances may mean that they simply cannot afford books, or do not know where to find them, or that they are overwhelmed by fundamental priorities other than reading time and conversation with the children. Good organized daycare may be neither available nor affordable, and that can have a tremendous effect on learning in children. Therefore, the audio-visual world of radio and television, and the streets, are what teaches a child before grade school demands an interest and a capability to read.

In the education system itself, clearly there are paths that enable a child to move ahead grade by grade without mastering the basic skills, regardless of where they come from; homes which are rich, poor, or middle class.

I have had a number of discussions probing the difficulties and the changing nature of education and its context in our national society, particularly as we move through this final decade to the 21st century. The mushrooming of technology, the increasing complexity of things, the sheer number of institutions and bureaucracies and processes we all deal with daily mean there is simply a lot more to learn for all of us. The computer has given us an endless variety of options on how to learn; the electronic media ensures that we are bombarded with more information than we can handle from the earliest possible age. It never seems to stop. Rapid change means life-long learning no matter how old you are or where you sit in the system. No longer do we count on a single career. Flexibility and adaptability have taken over from consistency and predicability as the measure of how we conduct our lives.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Consequently, the education system is being asked to assume the teaching of an increasing amount of new social, cultural and practical knowledge, knowledge that used to be learned, in large measure, through the family and in the community. Additional curricular demands have forced teachers to make sacrifices in other academic areas to the extent that they are not able to devote the attention they would wish to ensure that students have a firm foundation in basic education. In short, honourable senators, we should ask whether we in Canada are making it too tough for teachers to teach and for students to learn effectively. I believe that governments and politicians, parents and communities, all across Canada have to ask that question seriously at a time when so many people place so much emphasis on the need to have these skills to stay ahead of the game in an increasingly complex world.

We must show a generosity of spirit among all levels of government in this country that would enable them to build bridges across constitutional jurisdictions instead of settling for second best or less in our attempt to promote a national solution. Earlier, I spoke of the need for a concerted national effort that transcends the usual jurisdictional divisions that plague our Canadian Confederation. Currently in Canada at the national level we are pushing against the edges of illiteracy through the instrument of a national secretariat set up by the current government, which acts as a coordinating and information disseminating body and which funnels relatively small amounts of money into projects that are jointly funded by the provinces. Without doubt there is a lot more going on across Canada in the literacy field than was the case three years ago. A much sharper focus has emerged in this international year. But, at this stage in Canada, literacy programs are largely curative and aimed at adults rather than also diagnostic and preventative and lodged within the education system itself. We seem to lack the courage and the necessary motivation to challenge seriously an entrenched system which is not responding adequately to a critical need in our current circumstances in this country.

During this International Year of Literacy we have put on our best faces. We have displayed our statistics. We have organized events and pilot projects and new programs and have had some excellent conferences such as the one which is taking place in Edmonton this week. However, from my perspective we still have barely scratched the surface in Canada in the fight against illiteracy.

In 1990 we are only at the beginning of the kind of concerted effort that I believe is necessary, and the only way to campaign effectively against illiteracy, be it prevention in children or assistance to adults, is through partnerships at every level of our society, between families and schools, between the various levels of the education system itself, between community institutions, libraries, churches, service clubs, cultural organizations, senior citizens' groups, between every level of government and between all of these groups and every level of business. At the same time, strong links must be consolidated with labour, with literacy organizations and with the volunteer sector, which, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, has kept this battle alive across Canada for decades, often with very little recognition and few resources.

In 1987, I initiated an inquiry, a debate, in this chamber into the question of literacy in Canada, and I was told at the time that it was the first time the issue had ever been debated in either house of the Canadian Parliament on its own. A number of excellent speeches were made during that debate, including ones, as I recall, by Senators Robertson and Doyle. But this subject is not one that you hear very much about on Parliament Hill. It is ironic, because every one of us is here in the Senate and in the House of Commons because of the facility we have in some way with the very basic and fundamental skills that we talk about with respect to this issue. For this reason I continually urge legislators, federal, provincial, municipal and territorial, to carry the message on in this Parliament, in the provincial legislatures and into the constituencies, to as many people as will hear. The fight against illiteracy will not succeed unless each of us makes it our own fight among the people we represent and unless we represent equally those who have yet to gain these skills along with those who have them. It is a matter of will, as are most social policies dealt with in this country—a matter of will both individually and politically. We simply cannot afford, as a nation or as human beings, to allow an under class to develop and solidify in Canada, something which will ultimately erode the capacity and the soul of this country to reach its economic, social and cultural potential. No country with our wealth and our creativity and compassion can ignore this challenge and this opportunity.

This year one of the many efforts that has been made in various sectors of our society to promote this issue was put together in a tremendous book entitled More Than Words Can Say: Perspectives on Literacy which contains literacy gems from many prominent Canadian writers who put their words and their support behind this project. The volume was edited by a name familiar to Canadians, Knowlton Nash of the CBC. I would like to read some of the words that are contained in this book.

In his forward to More Than Words Can Say Mr. Nash states the following:

> Books of stories; books of history; books of learning. They line the bookshelves of the nation with unimaginable riches for all our hungry minds. When I go to a bookstore, I'm filled with the anticipation of a kid in a candy store, tempted by so many choices. And it's true for most of us as our eyes range along the shelves of literacy delights. Sometimes, though, I pause in my scanning of book titles, as images come flashing into my mind of a one-room school shack in the Bogota slums or a thatched-roof shanty in Fiji's Yasawa Islands housing the village library.
> I was doing a TV documentary on the crises in Latin America and accidentally found myself in a tiny Bogota school call 'Parque du Canada' where 80 youngsters shared four school books. The school had been built thanks to the generosity of a group of Toronto business people, and a policeman, who acted as a teacher in his spare time, had found the four books which were the sum total of reading material for the youngsters. Those four books seemed something almost magical for the youngsters, and I can still see in my mind's eye one skinny little cherub fingering one of the books with reverential wonder and care.
> In the Fiji shanty they had more books—maybe 30 in all—but villagers were allowed only to read them at a spindly table by an open window in the makeshift library. As in Bogota, there was a reverence here, too, shown by the young mothers and old men whom I watched coming to finger the words as they slowly read line by line.
> When I snap back from my reveries to the cornucopia of reading material on our Canadian bookshelves, I realize how incomprehensibly lucky we are, and how empty life would be without the books, the magazines, and the newspapers that give us insight and delight, information and knowledge.
> It's hard to imagine a world without books and yet for so many millions, that is exactly their world. Thirty years ago, a request for a set of encyclopedias came to several Toronto teachers from an overseas school. From that simple beginning, the Canadian Organization for Development through Education, known as (CODE) was born. Today, thanks to contributions from concerned Canadians, the Canadian International Development Agency, Canadian publishers, paper companies, and others, CODE sends upwards of one million books a year to third world countries, and it also provides paper so they can produce hundreds of thousands of their own books.
> In Jamaica alone, for instance, CODE has provided over the years not only books, but paper for more than eight million textbooks. In Tanzania in 1989 CODE committed $278,000 to help produce 180,000 chemistry and biology textbooks and teachers' guides.
> CODE, with generous co-operation from McClelland and Stewart and the Canadian Booksellers' Association and many others, has produced this book of anecdotal stories and memories on the joys of reading, and learning to read, to mark the United Nations International Literacy Year 1990. This book is a salute to literacy by some of Canada's outstanding writers and cartoonists. We're grateful to them not only for their contributions to this book, but for the joy and enrichment they gave all of us through the years with their creative genius.
> The objective of the International Literacy Year is to begin to shrink the number of people who cannot read. There are nearly a billion adults around the world who can't read or write and hundreds of millions of youngsters who don't have the chance to learn. CODE's objective is to help the oldsters and the youngsters to learn by reading.

> Literacy is the cement out of which the fundamental building blocks of progress are made. A book is more than paper and ink when it can teach people how to save lives and build homes, teach job skills and enrich minds. A book can be the beginning of everything.

Honourable senators, many stories in this book are both interesting and poignant. I would like to refer to a few of them. June Callwood, a well-known social activist and writer, has written an essay entitled, "Why Canada Has to Beat Its Literacy Problem". The essay reads:

> Carole Boudrias shudders when she remembers the time she almost swallowed Drano because she thought it was Bromo. Even more painful to recall is the time she mistook adult pain-killers for the child-size dose and made her feverish child much sicker.
> "When you can't read," she explains, "it's like being in prison. You can't travel very far from where you live because you can't read street signs. You have to shop for food but you don't know what's in most of the packages. You stick to the ones in a glass jar or with a picture on the label. You can't look for bargains because you can't understand a sign that says 'Reduced.' I would ask the clerk where is something and the clerk would say, aisle five. Only I couldn't read aisle five. I'd pretend that I was confused so they'd lead me right to the shelf."
> Carole Boudrias is able to read now, at last. She's a 33-year-old single parent who lives with her five children in a handsome townhouse on Toronto's harbourfront and holds a steady job. But her struggle with illiteracy is all too vivid in her memory. "You can't get a job," she says earnestly. "You can't open a bank account. You have to depend on other people. You feel you don't belong. You can't help your children. You can't help yourself."
> Six years ago when her oldest child started school, the boy floundered. Because he had been raised in a household without books, print was strange to him. He would point to a word in his reader, that classic, endearingly silly Dick and Jane, and ask his mother what it was. She was as baffled as he, so he'd check with his teacher the next day and that evening would proudly read the new work to his mother. She began to absorb the shape of the words he identified. She found she could recognize them even days later.
> That was astonishing. As a child she had been labelled mentally retarded and confined to "opportunity classes" where reading wasn't taught. She grew up believing that she wasn't intelligent enough to learn. Nevertheless, she was learning. The vocabulary of words she could read in her son's reader was growing. She began to think maybe the experts were wrong. Then, one miraculous day, she realized she was learning to read even faster than her son was.
> "My son was my first teacher," she grins. She had never allowed herself to believe that it was possible that she could learn to read. She hadn't even tried: no one whose life is made up of poverty and failed relationships is ready to take on, voluntarily, the potential for another defeat, another kick in the self-esteem. She hesitated a long time but the evidence was persuasive—she was beginning to read. Her welfare worker had always been kind, so she summoned the nerve to ask her where she could find help.
> That lead her to Beat the Street, a program that helps people who are illiterate for all the reasons that befall sad children: unrecognized learning disabilities, emotional stress, too many schools, scorn and belittling, terror, bad teachers. She was linked with a volunteer tutor, and they came to admire each other deeply.
> "Now I can read, I can read books, anything. I can write. In English and French."
> Carole Boudrias has written a book, The Struggle for Survival, which tells of her tortured childhood lacerated with incest and violence, and her triumphant recovery from illiteracy. Last summer she was the poet laureate of the annual golf tournament hosted by Peter Gzowski, the beloved and respected heart of CBC Radio's Morningside. He has befriended the cause of literacy in Canada and over the past four years has raised a quarter of a million dollars for Frontier College, one of the first organizations in the country to tackle the problem of illiteracy.
> "Learning to read," Carole Boudrias says quietly, "was like a second birth, this time with my eyes open. Before I could read, I was a blind person."
> Canada has nearly five million adult citizens who are described as functionally illiterate, which means that they can recognize a few words, such as washroom signs and exits, but they can't read dense print at all. They can't decipher directions, for instance, or application forms, or warnings on labels. The world of newspapers, posters, advertising, books, menus, banking, recipes, and instructions-for-assembly that literate people take for granted is barred to them; they live a life of bluff, anxiety, embarrassment, and isolation.
> A good many Canadians are as profoundly illiterate as Carole Boudrias was. People who meet illiterate adults are struck by the similarity of their textural experience. All of them liken the inability to read and write with being disabled or chained in a prison. Edwin Newman, U.S. broadcaster who writes about language, calls illiteracy "death in life."
> The sense of being caged and blinded is not morbid fantasy. People who can't read may be able to walk freely but they can't go far. Subway stops rarely have pictures to guide them and the destinations bannered across the front of buses and streetcars are meaningless. If they ask for directions, well-intentioned people tell them, "Go along Main Street to Elm and turn left." Consequently, they must travel by tax or stay home, though they usually are the poorest of the poor.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Almost every job, even simple manual labour such as street-cleaning, requires an ability to read. Personnel managers don't take kindly to people who can't fill out an application, or when asked, can't spell their own addresses.

The divide between the literate and illiterate has never been wider. In this half of the century North America has become a world of forms and documents and instructions, written warnings, posted rules, leaflets, and vital information circulated in brochures. Two generations ago, illiteracy was prevalent but not such a great disadvantage. Some functionally illiterate could fake it through an entire lifetime and still held a good job. Employment skills were acquired by watching someone else; apprenticeship was the accepted teacher, not two years in a community college.

Today, inability to read is a ticket to social segregation and economic oblivion. A poignant example is the skilled house-painter who turned up one day in the crowded quarters of the East End Literacy Program in Toronto. He said he wanted to read. The counsellor asked him, as all applicants are asked, what he wanted to read. "Directions on paint cans"' he answered promptly. "I'm losing jobs. I can't read how to mix the colours."

Many who are illiterate can't read numbers. When they are paid, they don't know if they are being cheated. Because she couldn't fill out bank deposit slips, Carole Boudrias used to cash her welfare cheque in a storefront outlet which clips poor people sharply for no-frills service. To pay for goods, she would hold out a handful of money and let the cashier take what was needed—and perhaps more, she never knew. Once she would have been short-changed $50 she could ill afford if a stranger who witnessed the transaction hadn't protested.

The common emotional characteristic of people who can't read is depression and self-dislike. All feel at fault for their situation: with few exceptions, they went through school with bright little girls exactly their age who leaped to their feet to recite and smart little boys who did multiplication in their heads. Everyone else in the world, it seemed, could learn with ease; for them, even C-A-T looked a meaningless scribble. Teachers called them stupid; worse, so did other children.

"Stupid" may just be the cruellest word in the language. It consumes confidence, on which the ability to learn relies. Seven-year-olds having trouble with reading will frolic at recess with an edge of glee; 11-year-olds who can't read have bitter faces and scarred souls.

Loss of hope for oneself is a descent into desolation without end. It causes men to rage in fury and women to wound themselves. People who can't read come readily to view themselves as worthless junk, and many feel they must grab what they can out of life and run. Canada's prisons are full of young men who can't read. The Elizabeth Fry Society estimates that close to 90 per cent of the women in Kingston's infamous prison for women are illiterate.

Because Canada has five million people who can't read, the political shape of the country and the priorities of governments are not influenced greatly by the needs of the poor. Since illiterates are effectively disenfranchised, the political agenda is written by the more powerful. Candidates rarely find it advantageous to uphold the causes that matter most to Canada's illiterates—an end to homelessness and the need for food banks, welfare payments that meet the poverty line, and better educational and job-training opportunities. Few votes would follow any politician with such a crusade. The electorate that can't read won't be there to ruffle the complacent on election day.

Their silence costs this country severely. Education is free in Canada because it was recognized that democracy isn't healthy unless all citizens understand current events and issues. Five million Canadians can't do that. Voters, most of them literate, choose candidates who help their interests; those who don't vote, many of them illiterate, by default get a government that does not need to know they exist. The result is a kind of apartheid. The government has lopsided representation, which results in decisions which further alienate and discourage the unrepresented. The gap between the haves and the have-nots in Canada is already greater than at any time in this century, and widening. Urban apartment houses are the work places of crack dealers, the streets are increasingly unsafe, and households have installed electronic security systems. The poor, if asked, would have better answers than guard dogs. The best, most lasting responses to crime and addiction and violence are literacy programs, coupled with job training and full employment.

• (2200)

Schools are in disgrace, with a failure rate of fully one-third of all high school students. A soup company with such a record would be out of business in a day. The educational system has managed to exacerbate the class differences which are developing in this country. Canada's millions of illiterates went through school the required number of years, give or take time out for truancy, illness, running away from abuse, and confinement in detention homes. These human discards, identified promptly in the first years of elementary schools, will ever after drift around disconsolately. They are surplus people, spare parts for which society has no use. Unless there is a waré.

Carole Boudrias is working on a project, Moms in Motion, to help young mothers to get off welfare rolls. She says to them, "What do you want?" They reply, "To go back to school."

Another chance. Five million Canadians need another chance. Maybe they can become literate, maybe they can become healed and whole. What a lovely goal for the 1990s.

Another outstanding Canadian writer, one of our most outstanding, has also contributed to this book. I refer to Robertson Davies. His contribution takes the form of a chat about literacy between a writer, presumably himself, and a student. It goes like this:

> Writer: So we're going to talk about literacy, are we? What do you think the word means?
> Student: Being able to read and write; isn't that it?
> Writer: That's it, certainly. But literacy is one of those words that means different things to different people. For instance, if I say that somebody is illiterate, what do you think I mean?
> Student: That they can't read and write. Or not very much.
> Writer: There, you see? Already you have made a qualification when you say, "not very much."
> There are hundreds of thousands of people who would be very cross if you called them illiterate, but it is true that they can't read and write very much. People who can't read and write at all are not numerous in a country like Canada. Most people can write their names, and they know what signs that say STOP and GO mean, and perhaps even DANGER. But they can't read the directions on a bottle of medicine, for instance, or the handbook that comes with the car they are driving. Often they are clever at concealing the fact that the world of print is close to them. That is a very dangerous kind of illiteracy.
> Student: How many kinds of literacy do you suppose there are?
> Writer: Suppose we say three. There is the kind we have just been talking about—being shut off from everything that requires understanding of even quite simple things that are written down. Of course that really only applies in a country like ours, where the written word is so important. There were millions of people in the past, and there are millions now, who do not live in what we might call the Verbal World. A hundred and fifty years ago you could be an efficient farmer or blacksmith without being able to read or write. You were a valuable person and you knew your job thoroughly. You could get somebody else to do any reading or writing you needed. But now we live in a world where that is impossible. Though there are other parts of the world—Central Africa, for instance—where reading and writing count for very little—it would be wrong to say that people who do not belong to our Verbal World are stupid. Millions of those people want to join the Verbal World, and CODE helps them. But we are talking about our world, right here, which is very much part of the Verbal World.
> Student: But you said there were three kinds of literacy. What is Number Two?
> Writer: Number Two takes in all the people who can read and write, have no trouble with medicine bottles or books of directions, and may be skilled in technical work of some complexity. They read the newspapers; sometimes they read magazines. They don't pay much attention to books, unless the books are concerned with their work. Some of them are professional people who read and understand complicated books about law, and medicine, and insurance, and all kinds of business. They have fair-sized vocabularies and their grammar is pretty good, but not precise. No doubt about it, they are literate, in the Number Two sense of the word.
> Student: What's Number Three, then? It seems to me you have been talking about everybody that matters.
> Writer: The whole idea of literacy is filled with shady areas that overlap. The Number Two people can read anything that concerns them. But consider yourself, as an example. Do you want to join the adult world knowing your job and the daily news, and nothing else?
> Student: I'm not sure I understand. What else is there?
> Writer: What you have just asked me is the kind of question Socrates used to ask people when he wanted to make them think. I am sure you know what else there is that is involved in literacy. Do you now who Socrates was?
> Student: Vaguely. He was a Greek philosopher, wasn't he?
> Writer: Yes, and like you he pretended not to understand what people said in order to make them clarify their thinking. To a tremendous extent thinking is a matter of language.
> Student: Yes, but everybody has language. Even the Number One people you talk about have language.
> Writer: Not to the same degree that the Number Two people have language. And the Number Three people have language in a degree that the Number Ones and the Number Twos do not have it, because they can use it to extend their personal knowledge in a way that goes far beyond the others. They can use language to ask hard questions, and explore kinds of thinking that the Number Ones and the Number Twos never bother their heads about. They can define things accurately and they can discuss things intelligently about which strict accuracy is impossible. They are the people who enlarge human knowledge—perhaps only their own knowledge, or perhaps the knowledge of the whole world.
> Student: Give me an example.
> Writer: There you are, being Socratic again. Well—here's an example. Suppose you become a doctor, a healer. Are you going to be content with what you have learned in medical school, and never venture beyond it? I hope not. I hope you would be one of those who perpetually question what you have learned and look for new approaches to medicine. If nobody had ever done that we would still be treating tuberculosis by hanging bags of herbs around the necks of sick people, because that was what our teacher had told us.

Student: But that's thinking. What has that got to do with literacy? When I think of literacy I think about having to read books I am told to read in school—books that tell stories, or poems that don't even do that. I don't see how that teaches you to think.

Writer: Yes you do. Those books have taught you to think: What good is all this stuff? What does it tell me? That's thinking.

Student: In my class we have to read Huckleberry Finn. It's a pretty good book, but what does it teach me? What is there in Huckleberry Finn that is any good to me?

Writer: It teaches you a lot about the value of independent thought. Huck was a simple boy—a Number One, in fact, but an unusual Number One because he thought that slavery was wrong and that black people have rights just as much as white people. That wasn't the kind of thinking he met with among the people around him, and he supposed he was a very wicked boy because he thought differently. But do you think he was wicked?

Student: Oh no. He was right. Everybody knows that. I mean, anybody can see that slavery is wrong. Imagine owning somebody else, and buying and selling another person just as you pleased.

Writer: Not everybody knew that was wrong in Huck's time and a lot of people don't know it now. But you know it, and at least, in part, you have learned it from Huckleberry Finn. You are standing on Huck's shoulders, so you can see farther and clearer than he did. Now, about poetry-

Student: I don't see the use of poetry at all. Just a tangle of words.

Writer: Wait a minute. When I was about your age I had to memorize a poem that didn't mean much to me. It went like this:

It is not growing like a tree

In bulk, doth make Man better be;

Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,

To fall a log at last, dry, bald and sere:

A lily of a day

Is fairer far in May,

Although it fall and die that night

It was the plant and flower of light:

In small proportions we just beauty see;

And in short measure life may perfect be.

You see, I have remembered that for more than 60 years, and what it says—That it isn't how long you live but how well you live—is extremely important, and it has taken me a lifetime to understand all the poet meant.

Brian Doyle is also a Canadian writer. His great grandfather came to Ottawa on a famine ship in 1847, and the Doyle family has resided here in this city ever since. His contribution to this book is as follows:

School wasn't getting along with me very well lately. And I wasn't getting along very well with it.

It pretty well started back when I was in grade five and Miss Strong just laughed at me when I said I wanted to be a writer when I grew up.

She didn't really laugh, I guess, she just made a kind of sound with her mouth like you would if you were blowing a little feather or a hunk of fluff off your upper lip just under your nose.

Or maybe it was way back in grade four when we had the I.Q. test. They gave all the grade fours an I.Q. test and I was the only one who had to go back the next day and do it over again. I saw Miss Frack and Miss Eck discussing mine. They were standing facing each other talking about my test. I knew because they looked over at me a couple of times. They both had huge chests and they were standing kind of apart so their chests wouldn't bounce off each other.

They looked like huge robins discussing a worm.

• (2215)

There was a lot of signing and then they came and told me that I'd have to do the test again the next day. By the looks on their faces I figured they were saying that they knew I was stupid, sure, but could I possibly be that stupid? Could I be something subhuman? You'd have to be in a coma or something to score that low.

But Dad said that maybe I scored so high that the test couldn't record it—maybe I blew out all the tubes in the thing and they figured only a genius could score that high and they figured something went wrong with their test because even Albert Einstein couldn't score that high.

And they say he invented the atomic bomb.

That made me feel a bit better.

But I didn't really blame Miss Strong for laughing when I said I wanted to be a writer.

After all, I was the second worst writer in the class. Melody Bleach was the worst writer in the class. Her main problem was she never had a pencil and she couldn't write with a pen and a nib because she pressed too hard.

Dad said the reason was, she wasn't organized.

And she always put her tongue out when she tried to write after she borrowed a pencil or the teach gave her one.

She'd stick her tongue between her teeth when she was trying to think of what to write. Some of the kids would laugh at her and make fun of her.

I laughed at her too but I also felt sort of sorry for her.

Specially when she wet herself. That was in grade three, I think. Melody wet herself. She was too scared of Miss Frack or Miss Eck, or whoever it was, to ask if she could leave the room.

So she just sat there and the water ran down off the seat into a pool on the floor under her desk. And the water ran down her cheeks from her eyes. There was water running out of her from both ends.

I think Dad was right. Her main problem was that she wasn't organized. Dad always says, get organized and you can't go wrong.

Suddenly I heard Blue Cheeks saying my name. Everybody was looking over at me. And Blue Cheeks was getting bluer. He was asking me about a grammar sentence. He was writing on the blackboard but he was looking at me.

Blue Cheeks could turn his head right around without moving his body. His head would start turning slowly and it would keep turning and turning until it was facing the other way. Then it would start back until it was back almost to the same spot. He could turn his head left and right so far that he could cover the whole 360 degrees without moving his shoulders. His head must have been on a swivel or something.

He would write grammar sentences on the board so that we could copy them out and then tell him what was wrong with them.

All the sentences he ever wrote on the board were wrong.

Every day we wrote down hundreds of sentences that were wrong.

Some of them were quite funny but if he heard anybody laughing or snorting, old Blue Cheeks's head would start coming around, slowly, slowly. And we'd all sit there, hypnotized by how far his head could come round.

I used to think it would unscrew and tumble right off onto the floor.

But then, of course, if that happened he could catch it just before it hit because his hands hung down there near the floor anyway.

Somebody must have coughed or something and he looked around but couldn't catch anybody so he noticed I was in a trance and picked me as his victim. I must have been staring into the blackboard like I was hypnotized. Dad said after that I must have looked like a cow watching a train go by.

"you! What is wrong with this sentence?"

He was pointing at the sentence he had just written on the board.

"Read the sentence, please," he said.

I read it. "Ralph edged closer as the moose sniffed suspiciously and snapped the picture," the sentence said.

"Well?" said Blue Cheeks.

I looked at the sentence again.

"Tell us, Mr. Daydreams, what is wrong with this sentence."

"It's something to do with the camera," I said.

"It's something to do with the camera, is it?" His head was right around facing me full-on now and his shoulders were still facing the blackboard. It seemed impossible.

"And the moose," I said, "and something to do with the moose."

"The camera and the moose," said Blue Cheeks, sarcasm dripping off his lips like syrup.

"And Ralph," I said, just to make sure, there's something wrong with Ralph too."

"And what do you suppose it is that is wrong with Ralph?" said Blue Cheeks.

"He hasn't got the camera," I said.

"And who has the camera?"

"The moose seems to have the camera."

"And why has the moose got the camera instead of Ralph?"

"Why has the moose got the camera?"

"Maybe he took it from Ralph?"

"Why hasn't Ralph got his own camera?" Blue Cheeks's face was dark blue now.

"Maybe it isn't Ralph's camera!" I said, thinking I was on to something. "Maybe Ralph hasn't got a camera and the moose has a camera and Ralph's sneaking up on the moose to steal his camera!"

"Read the sentence again!"

"Ralph edged closer as the moose sniffed suspiciously and snapped the picture." I almost knew if off by heart now.

"What is wrong with that sentence?"

Behind me sat Geranium Mayburger, the dumbest girl in the school. Geranium loved to whisper answers to people. Specially people in trouble.

"Hooves," she whispered behind me. "A moose can't take a picture because his hooves are to big for the button."

"Five seconds," said Blue Cheeks, "or you stay and write lines!" He sounded like he was choking. I was desperate.

"A moose could never hold a camera properly or snap a picture because of its large and clumsy hooves," I said, trying to make the best sentence I could.

I knew I was doomed, so I sat down.

Blue Cheeks gurgled, "One hundred lines - 'I must learn my grammar'!"

A few minutes later the bell rang for recess and I was suddenly alone.

Peter Gzowski has become one of the most prominent figures in Canada working on the literacy issue, and he has developed, over the last few years, a tremendous fund-raising activity in the form of literacy golf tournaments throughout Canada. This year, they took him even to the Northwest Territories in the snow. More recently he had one in Fredericton, in Victoria, and just a week ago, for the first time, in Calgary, Alberta. Peter contributed this story to the literacy yearbook. It is called "Beyond Statistics":

[Senator Fairbairn.]

> The game of golf has had so much to do with my own involvement with literacy that, if I don't pause to think about it, the story I want to tell here, which involves a golf pro and how she got caught up too, seems almost inevitable, as if there could have been no other conclusion. I tell it, though, for what it shows about what both she and I now call simply "the cause," and with the hope that others will think about its point, and maybe even want to join in.
> My involvement, as I've written elsewhere, began casually and serendipitously. In the summer of 1985, I was feeling very lucky about things. A couple of years earlier, after a long and miserable time away, I had returned to CBC Radio. To my intense relief, I had found myself able to pick up where I had left off, and the program I was hosting, Morningside, was going better than I might have dared to hope. By 1985—Morningside affords its host a much-needed summer hiatus—I had found a cottage in the part of Ontario where my grandparents had summered when I was a child, and had taken up once again, and on the same course I had played with my grandfather, the game of my youth. Playing golf one day with the woman who shares both that cottage and my life (I can still remember where the idea was born, as I contemplated a challenging six-iron into the eighth green and revelled in the summer air and the sound of birds), I began to wonder about holding a tournament for my friends. If I did it right, I might even raise a little money. It would, I thought, give me both a chance to say thank you for my good fortune and, perhaps, an excuse to turn down some of the too-many other functions, all for good causes, I was constantly invited to attend.
> Only then—how strange it seems to write this now, when the literacy movement fills every spare corner of my life—did I begin to think about what to raise the money for.
> My mind went back to the previous radio season. I had interviewed a woman who had grown up in the Palestinian refugee camps and come to Canada as a teenager. She was smart enough to bluff her way around her inability to decipher letters. Among the jobs she'd held before she came out of the closet and took reading lessons (she has an MA now) was a spell in the McGill University library, a feat she brought off by memorizing the size and colour of the books on the shelves. Her story, which made a profound impression on me, had disabused me forever of the notion that illiteracy implied a lack of intelligence, and, inspired by her accomplishments, I had begun to sniff around the edges of the Canadian situation. Literacy, as a cause, was still not fashionable here; the figures Peter Calamai (who played in my first tournament) later turned up for the Southam newspaper chain were not yet available. But, as with many still-unfashionable concerns, there were a lot of dedicated people working out of the limelight.
> One of them, I remembered, had been nagging me by mail. He was John O'leary of Frontier College, who had heard my interview with the refugee and detected my own interest. In his letters, he had suggested I recruit what he called "The Morningside Army" to help the college in its then-pioneering work of teaching reading. since books and writing were (and are) a seminal part of my life (I'm a librarian's kid as well as a struggling author), he had struck a chord. But I was unwilling to use the public facilities of the CBC as a medium of advocacy for even so uncontroversial a cause. A game of golf on my own time, though, was different. I called John and asked him if he thought a tournament to raise both money and some public awareness would be an acceptable ideal, and by the next spring we were of and running.
> Now, not quite five years after the idea dawned, the informal tournament I wanted to hold for a few friends, has become almost a national chain: the Peter Gzowski Invitations. We've had four at the Briars, my grandfather's old course, two in Ottawa, one on Vancouver Island. As I write this—fresh from our debut in Victoria, where we made $18,000, and after which the mayor of Vancouver, who had flown across the Gulf of Georgia to join us, expressed an interest in holding one in his city—we have firm plans for Calgary (1990), and at least sketchy ones for Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island and . . . who knows?
> We've raised something over $300,000 so far, and the pledge I scribble recklessly on a cocktail napkin after our first heady even at the Briars—a napkin that might have been a little damp with Scotch whisky, I admit, on which I wrote that I would raise a million dollars before I was through—now seems possible to fulfil. As well—and I could not have known how important these other aspects would be when we began—our tournaments (now supported by national sponsors that range from Air Canada to Labatt's, and from the Post Office to Petro-Can, and featuring music, poetry, a mixture of golfers that has extended from George Knudson and Sandra Post to rank beginners, and in which we've managed to mix a lot of powerful people from business and the professions with a lot of workers for literacy) have helped recruit both attention and new people to the cause, not to mention having turned me, from my almost incidental initiation, into a fervent missionary. The more tournaments I've held, the more I've learned about the reason I hold them; the more I've learned, the more I've wanted to help.
> Which brings me, at last, to my golf pro.
> Her name is Danielle Nadon. She's in her early thirties, fluently bilingual (and, I hasten to add, comfortably literate not only in English and French but in the Spanish she's acquired on the international golf tour), the mother of a ten-year-old. A natural athlete, she picked up golf at university and turned professional shortly after graduation. She was a student of George Knudson's and shares not only George's fluid swing and ability to teach but his insouciance about putting. Like Knudson, she loves to hit the ball, she plays with joy. Once, on a friendly round with her, I watched her follow the missing of an eight-foot birdie putt with a booming, 240-yard drive.

● (2230)

I met her our first year in Ottawa, where she was the pro at our host club. She played a round with us, and enjoyed herself and the tournament so much that the next year she came—at her own expense—to the Briars, which is where, I think it's fair to say, she got hooked.

It was our poet who did it. Poets, as I've indicated, have been a part of all the Invitationals. From the beginning, we wanted to underline the literary aspects of why we were playing golf by commissioning a poet laureate for each tournament. He (or she) would simply spend the day with us, and, at the concluding ceremonies, offer the players a poem about what had occurred, just as the bards of old used to sing the occasions of their time. The idea had worked beyond our wildest imagining. In the first three years at the Briars, for example, Dennis Lee, Michael Ondaatje, and (bless her memory) Bronwen Wallace, all established stars, had given us spontaneous compositions that drew a standing ovation from the golfers whose achievements they celebrated—or, in passing, gently mocked.

For the fourth tournament the year Danielle came down from Ottawa, we wanted to ring a change. With the co-operation of people from Frontier College, I invited a writer not even the most studious of our golfers could have heard of, since she had never been published. Her name was Carole Boudrias. She's a single mother of five who, after a childhood and adolescence strewn with violence and poverty, had, with great courage, determined to learn to read and write. For the purposes of the tournament, the punchline of her story was that money we had raised by playing golf had made that possible for her, so, as you can imagine, the moment when she read her poem, seven deceptively simple stanzas that packed a wallop of both humour and grit, was one of high emotion—as well as being, I confess unabashedly, a handy inspiration to solicit even more financial support from our patrons.

What lingered in Danielle's mind, though, was an insight she had gained privately the evening before. At the pre-tournament barbecue, the golf pro and the learner, both mothers and sharing a first language, found themselves chatting quietly in a corner. Afterward—and I can still see Danielle shaking her head in wonder—she came up to me in another corner and said, simply, "You know, if you can't read, you can't cook.

That's true, you know. Oh, you can muddle through, imitating your mother or asking other people what they're doing—just as, for example, you can work in a library if you can memorize books by size and colour. But it's hard. You can't read receipes (just as you can't understand the menu in a restaurant), can't make out the directions on the packages, can't, if there are no pictures, even know what's in the cans. The woman who accepted a symbolic cheque for the money raised in Victoria, for example, another amazing single mother who had raised four children before she went back to school said, in a brief speech that brought the golfers to their feet even before Susan Musgrave read her poem, "I don't know how I did it."

And, hearing what not reading had meant to Carole Boudrias, Danielle Nadon, creature of enthusiasms, was moved as no statistic ever could have moved her.

Except for the friendly round we played at her new club—she's the general manager of historic Chaudière now, across the river from Ottawa—I didn't see Danielle after the 1989 Briars tournament until we went to Victoria in the fall. By then, she was as given over to the tournaments and their purpose as I was, a kind of pro in residence to the Gzowski Invitationals; she had joined the Ottawa committee and, by phone, was helping plan our now burgeoning expansion.

In Victoria, her golf was spectacular. I put her in a foursome with a local newspaperman, a serious golfer renowned for his public disdain for, in order, feminists and French-Canadians, and, her usually almost unaccented English growing more habitant with every hole, she took delight in beating him convincingly. The rest of the time, though, she spread the word about literacy, cornering the captains of local business and power with tales of what they could do, and how important the work was.

When the Victoria tournament was over, a group of us, Bill Ardell, the president of Coles bookstores (a supporter from the start), Kevin Peterson, publisher of the Calgary Herald and his wife Sheila O'Brien, head of public affairs for Petro-Can (Kevin and Sheila are the moving spirits for Calgary), Bob Duncan, a filmmaker from Montreal who has moved to Vancouver and wants to help take us there, and a few other veterans, gathered for a drink, exhilarated yet again by the good feelings of a day on the course. The talk ranged far and wide, and I'm not sure how we came around to it, but suddenly Danielle had the floor.

"I haven't told you about my brother-in-law, have I?" she was asking. "He's 58 I think, married to my husband's oldest sister. At one of our family gatherings over the summer, I was talking about the tournaments and what the money goes for . . . you know, just chatting, the way we all do. And afterward, he came up to me.

"'You were talking to me, weren't you?' he said.

"I said no, I hadn't been, but . . . Anyway, you know what? He's illiterate? I never realized that. When he told me, of course, I remembered all the clues I might have seen—the way when we went to a restaurant and the menus were passed around, he'd always say "Oh, I'll just have the same as you," or how, when you were reading a newspaper, he'd come up behind you and say, "Anything interesting today?" All the signs—except, of course, I couldn't see them. Fifty-eight years old, and I never realized . . ."

There was a silence for a while. And then, while Bill Ardell ordered another round of drinks, we began figuring out how, before we left Victoria, we could all get together for a round at the fabulous course at Royal Colwood. But before we could even arrange partners for that foursome—everyone wanted Danielle as a partner, I noticed—we started talking about a letter that had come across my desk the week before, from Saskatchewan. There was a literacy group in Prince Albert, working with the prisoners in the penitentiary there, and the author of the letter wondered if, if she could get us on the course at Waskesiu, we'd like to start a tournament there.

"I don't know about the rest of you," said Danielle Nadon. "But I'm in."

Michael Ondaatje was mentioned in that story by Peter Gzowski and he also contributed a short piece to this book from In the Skin of a Lion. Ondaatje wrote:

The event that will light the way for immigration in North America is the talking picture. The silent film brings nothing but entertainment—a pie in the face, a fop being dragged by a bear out of a department store—all events governed by fate and timing, not language and argument. The tramp never changes the opinion of the policeman. The truncheon swings, the tramp scuttles through a corner window and disturbs the fat lady's ablutions. These comedies are nightmares. The audience emits horrified laughter as Chaplin, blindfolded, roller-skates near the edge of the unbalconied mezzanine. No one shouts to warn him. He cannot talk or listen. North America is still without language, gestures and work and bloodlines are the only currency.

But it was a spell of language that brought Nicholas here, arriving in Canada without a passport in 1914, a great journey made in silence.

He took a train for Toronto where there were many from his village; he would not be among strangers. But there was not work. So he took a train north to Copper Cliff, near Sudbury, and worked there in a Macedonian bakery. He was paid seven dollars a month with food and sleeping quarters. After six months he went to Sault Ste. Marie. He still could hardly speak English and decided to go to school, working nights in another Macedonian bakery. If he did not learn the language he would be lost.

The school was free. The children in the class were ten years old and he was twenty-six. He used to get up at two in the morning and make dough and bake until 8:30. At nine he would go to school. The teachers were all young ladies and were very good people. During this time in the Sault he had translation dreams—because of his fast and obsessive studying of English. In the dreams trees changed not just their names but their looks and character. Men started answering in falsettos. Dogs spoke out fast to him as they passed him on the street.

When he returned to Toronto all he needed was a voice for all this language. Most immigrants learned their English from recorded songs or, until the talkies came, through mimicking actors on stage. It was a common habit to select one actor and follow him throughout his career, annoyed when he was given a small part, and seeing each of his plays as often as possible—sometimes as often as ten times during a run. Usually by the end of an east-end production at the Fox or Parrot Theatres the actors' speeches would be followed by growing chaos as Macedonians, Finns, and Greeks repeated the phrases after a half-second pause, trying to get the pronunciation right.

This infuriated the actors, especially when a line such as "Who put the stove in the living room, Kristin?"—which had originally brought the house down—was now spoken simultaneously by at least seventy people and so tended to lose it spontaneity. When the matinee idol Wayne Burnett dropped dead during a performance, a Sicilian butcher took over, knowing his lines and his blocking meticulously, and money did not have to be refunded.

Certain actors were popular because they spoke slowly. Lethargic ballads, and a kind of blues where the first line of a verse is repeated three times, were in great demand. Sojourners walked out of their accent into regional American voices. Nicholas Temelcoff, unfortunately, would later choose Fats Waller as his model and so his emphasis on usually unnoticed syllables and the throwaway lines made him seem high-strung or dangerously anti-social or too loving.

But during the time he worked on the bridge, he was seen as a recluse. He would begin sentences in his new language, mutter, and walk away. He became a vault of secrets and memories. Privacy was the only weight he carried. None of his cohorts really knew him. This man, awkward in groups, would walk off and leave strange clues about himself, like a dog's footprints on the snowed roof of a garage.

Another particularly poignant story in this book is by David Adams Richards who is from New Brunswick. He, too, is a writer and his story is Illiteracy: A Personal Perspective.

● (2245)

This is a true story about my godchild.

He is fairly ordinary. Bright, tough, and good-hearted. He has a good memory. For example, a lover of hockey and baseball, he can remember the number or name of a player after hearing it once. He remembers where and when a player was traded, who was traded for him, and why the deal was made.

In games he is clumsy—but a dedicated and fierce opponent. It goes against his nature to give in.

To him this story would not be significant. I suppose he wouldn't look at it the way I do at all—just as my great uncle, who never learned to read or write, might not understand how humbled I was when, forgetting myself, I asked him how long a canoe he helped build was. He looked at me sheepishly a moment, looked at the canoe, and then proudly said, 'She's long enough, I guess.'

My godchild was also determined to find ways around questions. At school he was average, or better. But he did disturb the class now and again by talking out loud and singing, getting up and scratching his bum, or, now and then, rolling down the aisle in a wrestling match; all those things we should all be allowed to do anyway. (And how can you disrupt kids who always love to be, and go out of their way to be, disrupted?)

Sometimes, when he was quite small, he had to be tied to his bed with a fishnet so he wouldn't get up in the middle of the night and climb up on the roof. To make this point a little clearer: some friends of mine were walking home from the bar at two in the morning and saw this little fellow, sitting on the highest eave of the house, waving at them in pyjamas and gumboots.

To him, it was clear. He wanted to do it—he never thought of falling.

So as I have said, he is a fairly ordinary boy of about four-foot something. And he started the fourth year of school without much fanfare. But unfortunately, things were not all that they seemed.

I guess there were just too many traps laid out for him. Nobody knew they were traps, except himself. He knew they were traps but he could tell no-one about them. So we could not help him. He had to dodge them, think of ways to get around them by himself. That he did it for so long is a measure of his ultimate triumph, the true measure of his intelligence.

Things started to close in after a while though, about October of that year. Too many pages piled up, too many words had to be kept in place. Finally one day at school he had to answer too many questions.

At first, he denied he couldn't read, surprised it had all ended at the principal's office one rainy autumn afternoon.

It was as if he knew those words of advice: "Don't complain—don't explain—and if worse comes to worse—sue."

Senator Simard: Would Senator Fairbairn allow me a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Simard: Senator Fairbairn, from what are you reading?

Senator Fairbairn: I am reading—

Senator Stollery: A very important document.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Simard: There are many good and important documents.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Simard, I am reading from a book of short pieces by Canadian writers which were put together in order to promote International Literacy Year. It is a book entitled, More Than Words Can Say. As with my earlier remarks, I have been trying to use this as an opportunity, seeing as I have been denied an opportunity to be out in western Canada to promote the biggest conference the Province of Alberta has ever had on illiteracy, to underline the importance of this issue to the house, and, I hope, to the country.

Senator Simard: Who exactly denied you the opportunity to attend the conference?

Senator Hastings: It was her duty.

Senator Simard: I would like the record to show that I did not ask Senator Hastings, but Senator Fairbairn.

Senator Fairbairn: I would be glad to repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks.

Senator Stollery: Would you please do that, Senator Fairbairn. I missed a few of your first sentences.

Senator Fairbairn: At the beginning of my remarks, I was pointing again, as a number of people have in the last few days, to the events of last Thursday when we began a situation in which through the abuse of the rules, or the tossing away of them, we were locked out of the chamber and refused the opportunity to vote. What that led to was this question of privilege, which I believe was started initially by our colleague, Senator John Stewart. The importance of the issue and the importance of parliamentary rights for each senator in the house has resulted in the continued sitting of the house. It is a fundamental issue for this chamber. As a consequence, we have found ourselves, and rightly so, here in Ottawa in the Senate at our desks trying, through discussion, to—

Senator Simard: You might want to address all of us. I am getting jealous.

Senator Fairbairn: I would be delighted to do that. We have found ourselves here in this chamber trying, and I hope successfully, to set a scene or a series of conditions which will enable us to go beyond what occurred last week. The purpose of my remarks tonight on illiteracy have to do not only with my feeling that my own rights and privileges have been affronted, but that there is a kind of double jeopardy in that by having to remain here I am unable to carry out the responsibilities I consider to be as much a part of the equation as being a senator in Ottawa, that is, to serve the area from which I come in Alberta on a national issue which I think is important for the country.

Tonight, since I could not go to Edmonton on Tuesday of this week, and since I cannot go tomorrow, what I wish to do is convey here my thoughts on some of the statistics, concerns and some of the efforts of other Canadians which are revealed in this book.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Thank you. I would like to offer a few comments, if I might.

Senator Hastings: If you have a question, then ask a question.

Senator Sparrow: Who are you, the Speaker?

Senator Simard: I appreciate Senator Fairbairn. On any subject I think she makes so much more sense than does Senator Gigantes, among others. I hate to make that comparison, and I am sure Senator Fairbairn would not want me to carry on with it.

You feel that you were denied rights last week, and you mentioned Senator Stewart's motion. You are referring to the battery motion. His watch ran out. His battery failed and he could not make it here. I realize which motion we are talking about.

You have now shared some information with us in order to educate us, and that is very good. It is much better than the history of the world football league, something to which we were subjected by Senator Davey. You have a knack for picking a subject much more interesting than he does.

I would ask you to keep in mind that you people are only three or four, five or six at the most at any one time, and sometimes you are down to two. That indicates to me that possibly you could have made it back to western Canada to attend the conference. You could have made a great contribution. I have a hard time following you with respect to your being denied the right to go to western Canada to participate at this conference. Perhaps you would want to—

Senator Hastings: You have a hard time following a lot of things. In fact, you have a hard time following anything.

Senator Simard: I am not finished yet. I am coming to my question. Do you really feel you're adding much to the battery motion by talking about this problem? Just out of courtesy, do you not think that the house has heard enough of—

Senator Stollery: Speaking for myself—

Senator Simard: Do you feel that you have made a case for your point of order? While I am on my feet I will ask the Chair to rule whether he feels—

Senator Hastings: He does not rule on anything.

Senator Simard: —whether he feels he has heard enough of this point of order, or question of privilege, and I will ask him to rule on it.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable Senators, I appreciate Senator Simard's intervention. However, I have not finished my remarks.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: No. I rise on a question of privilege myself now. The rulemaker is back. I am referring to Senator Frith. He told me last night that I could not rise on a question of privilege.

Senator Hastings: Then what are you up on?

Senator Simard: What I am doing tonight is addressing the point that people across the way have been addressing since two o'clock this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, I am saying that any fair-minded Canadian would think that after almost two and a half days of debate on this same point of order, this same battery motion of Senator Stewart's, that perhaps the Chair has heard enough. These people have failed to make their case in almost three days—twenty-four hours a day.

Senator Lefebvre: You are a slow learner.

Senator Simard: No, you are not very eloquent or convincing.

Senator Lefebvre: You are a very slow learner.

Senator Simard: I will get back to you later.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking because my rights are being denied, as are the rights and privileges of the people across the way—

Senator Stollery: No. My rights are not being denied.

Senator Simard: There comes a time when the Canadian people have to put the question and realize that if they, as Liberal senators have failed to make their point after almost three days, someone has to put his foot down. I am asking you to make a ruling. I do not have to be happy with your ruling. That is my question of privilege.

• (2300)

These people have been abusing my privileges. I am told that this filibustering has been causing taxpayers roughly $70,000 extra a day. The Liberals opposite, with Senator Frith heading the gang, have shed crocodile tears over the plight of the poor pages. I raised that very question this morning. The pages are not the only ones who are tired and need a rest, although many people are being paid overtime.

Canadians need to know what this circus is costing them. This circus started in May, not just in the last three days. Senator Buckwold confirmed that it was a circus when we were in Halifax. We know that the first part of this circus cost over $1 million. I am waiting for Mr. Wilson, the clerk of the committee, to give me some figures. He is waiting to find out the cost of the security—the RCMP, CSIS, and God knows who else. I have reason to believe those costs will go beyond $1 million.

This present exercise is costing $75,000 extra per day. I am talking about my question of privilege. I am talking about the cost to Canadians. In the Victoria Building, the East Block and the Centre Block we have security around the clock. There are many other people working behind the scenes. I mention $60,000 or $70,000. It could be more than that. I have written a letter to Senator LeBlanc requesting final figures. I do no need that tomorrow, because these things take time.

Senator Frith, it was not sufficient to try to placate the pages. There are many more people who are seriously affected here.

Senator Hastings: That speech gets better every night.

Senator Simard: After the Speaker has ruled, I would like to know from Senator Frith if he is working on other groups of employees, trying to find a quick fix for them. The Liberal irresponsibility has denied not only my rights, but has prevented Senator Fairbairn from attending a conference on the weekend, where she could have made a good contribution. There are other senators who would have liked to go back to their ridings.

There was an announcement affecting Atlantic Canada made by Marcel Masse, the Minister of Communications. I would have liked to have been there, but my first duty is to be here. I am here; I do not mind that.

Senator Fairbairn, you are not the only one whose rights have been denied. In your case, perhaps you could have arranged for other senators to take your place—those who have been here only in the last couple of years.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking you to rule en français, en anglais ou en grec; c'est la même chose.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should first like to deal with the question of privilege. The question of privilege that has been before us is still before us. A separate question of privilege cannot be raised during the course of that question of privilege. That came up last night when Senator Simard wanted to make some comments. We said that he should be given a chance to do so, but on this same question of privilege. In fact, Senator Kenny yielded to him and he made his contribution on this question of privilege. We then continued on with the question of privilege that has been before us for some time.

With regard to the pages, the Clerk Assistant came to me and said he would like a response to the plan that he had formulated.

Senator Simard: When was the first time he came to you?

Senator Frith: I did not make notes today. He came to me at 8 o'clock, when we came back in.

Senator Simard: Eight o'clock tonight?

Senator Frith: Tonight, yes.

Senator Simard: Is that the first time you heard of this problem?

Senator Frith: Of course not.

Senator Simard: When was the first time you heard about it from Mr. Greene?

Senator Frith: The first time I heard about it from Mr. Greene?

Senator Simard: Or anyone else from the Table?

Senator Frith: I do not understand what this is all about. This is what happened, honourable senators. I came into the chamber at 8 o'clock. Mr. Greene came to speak to me and said that many of the pages—and it turned out all of them—were concerned about their academic responsibilities. He was making some plans to have replacements. He asked me to discuss it with caucus. I said I did not think it was necessary to discuss it with caucus. I thought that was a good idea.

I spoke to Senator Murray about it, and he said that it was a good idea. I said to Mr. Greene, "Do you think it would be a good idea if I put something on the record about it?" He said "yes." I spoke to Senator Murray and said that I was going to put something on the record. That is the whole story from beginning to end.

Of course the pages are tired, and there are others on the staff, as Senator Simard said, who are tired. I hope it is clear that at any time if Senator Simard or anyone else wishes to move a motion for adjournment, we will support that motion.

Senator Kenny: Make a move, Maurice.

Senator Frith: The failure to adjourn is not on our side. For good reasons, the government does not want to adjourn the house. We should not get confused about the fact that we are prepared, if the government wants to adjourn, to support a motion at any time.

With regard to a ruling at this time, I am not clear whether or not Senator Simard is asking for a ruling.

Senator Simard: I want a ruling at this time, yes.

Senator Hastings: You are not going to get one.

Senator Stollery: We have not all spoken on this question of privilege. It may take us another week to deal with your question of privilege.

Senator Frith: I am not clear whether or not Senator Simard is asking for a ruling on the question of privilege that Senator Stewart raised. If he is asking for a ruling on that point, then we are in some difficulty. When I came back to the Senate today, I was told that an issue had arisen about a ruling by Senator Ottenheimer on the question of privilege that is before us. What developed was a submission, to put it mildly, that it would be strange indeed if the Chair made a ruling to stop the debate on a point of privilege that raised the partiality of the Chair as its question of privilege. It would be like the accused making the judgment.

The agreement or understanding that I was told was reached by both sides was that when this question of privilege had been sufficiently debated, it would be settled on a consensus basis. I pursued that with Senator Murray, and I thought that was where we stood at the moment. If I am wrong about that, then I have to make a number of changes about when I felt we could move off this particular question of privilege. I understood it was not going to be a matter of ruling, but a matter of consensus. I thought that was an understanding between Senator Murray and myself, but I may be wrong. If I am wrong, then that changes a number of things.

If, on the other hand, we are talking about a question of privilege raised by Senator Simard, then it cannot be dealt with now because we are in the midst of another question of privilege. However, if he should like to debate his own question of privilege in due course when this question of privilege is considered on a consensual basis to have been debated, then, of course, that can happen. I hope that where we are at at the moment is where we were before Senator Simard got up to speak.

Senator Fairbairn: I got so excited about that intervention that I lost my place.

Senator Simard: It was a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, You will decide when you want to rule on it. It is not that urgent. If there is some mythical agreement that sufficient time has elapsed, I will not do anything to obstruct that. I am quite flexible as opposed to the people on the other side.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The Senate and the Chair have allowed great latitude in this debate on privileges for the last several days and last week. Before the Chair makes a decision, it would like to hear more from other senators who might have opinions.

Senator Cogger: Senator Simard has asked me to convey apologies to you, Senator Fairbairn. He confessed to me that he is a young man in a hurry. He said, "Frankly, I think it's pushing it after 60 hours of debate to seek a decision." I said, "Maurice, you are entirely right. Let me apologize on your behalf to Senator Fairbairn." So please continue, senator.

Senator Frith: We accept that apology. Everyone knows about the impetuosity of Senator Simard. We understand that it is not always easy to hold it in check.

Senator Simard: Sixty hours is rather short.

Senator Cogger: He said to me, "We're good for another 60."

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, that is a relief. I enjoyed the impetuosity of his intervention. Senator Simard's province has been, for years, one of the leading provinces in this country on the question of dealing with literacy and learning disabilities. When this is over, Senator Simard is going to be back there using that energy and eloquent gift to support the people of his province.

• (2315)

Senator Simard: I might say that Senator Robertson had much to do with that situation.

Senator Fairbairn: I know. Senator Robertson and I travelled—

Senator Frith: This is certainly a nice change.

Senator Fairbairn: —together several years ago on a committee before which some of the most compelling testimony on the subject was heard in the province of New Brunswick.

To continue with the contribution that our Canadian writers have made to this issue in 1990, the International Literacy Year, I would like to read from a contribution by a writer who many of us know, Harry Bruce, who, although born in Toronto has lived for many years in Nova Scotia. His contribution is entitled "The Dark Hole of Illiteracy." It reads:

> Aware that more than two billion people can neither read nor write the simplest message in any language, the United nations has declared 1990 International Literacy Year. I've been reading for half a century, and it is as hard for me to imagine what its like to be illiterate as it is to imagine what it's like to be mute, blind, and deaf. Being illiterate must be life imprisonment in a dark hole.
> I recently read out loud to two dozen grade six children from a tough neighbourhood in north end Halifax, and though they were not illiterate, neither were they book lovers. My reading embarrassed them. They weren't sure why they were there, and as I droned on, they ceaselessly whispered and sniggered.
> But when I read to grade six children in the city's south end, where the cats were fat, the reaction was totally different. These kids were with me. They really listened. They got my jokes. They knew that books were important, and writers worth hearing.
> Since the rudeness of the poor kids annoyed me, I cut their reading short, and invited questions. One boy, who had the cockiness of a gang leader, asked how much money I earned, and I replied, "Well it varies, but I usually make a few hundred dollars a week." This amazed him and his friends. They found it incomprehensible that anyone could sell words on paper for hundreds of dollars.
> He wanted to know how I had become a writer. "My father was a writer," I said, "and maybe that had something to do with it. Our house was full of books, and by the time I was eight I was crazy about reading."
> Another murmur of astonishment rippled throughout the class. Eyes rolled in disbelief. A house full of books? A boy who was nuts about reading? Could this possibly be true?
> I now realized I'd been wrong to be annoyed. These youngsters lived in dwellings in which books were as rare as jacuzzis, or Alex Colville serigraphs. Some of their parents might have been illiterate. I felt these kids were doomed to become chambermaids, hookers, street fighters, and crack dealers.
> Their dismal future, I was sure, had something to do with the fact that they had never known houses in which people loved books, and never would. They were denizens of Halifax's own third world.
> All my life, I had been luckier than they. Before I could read, my mother read to me The Jungle Book and Just—So Stories by Rudyard Kipling, and I can still hear her drawling that magnificent description, "The great gray-green, greasy Limpopo River, all set about with fever tress." She also introduced me to Toad, Rat, Mole, and Badger of Kenneth Grahame's The Wind in the Willows.
> When I was seven, I paid my first visit to a small, warm lending library in central Toronto. I took out four books in the morning, read them at home, and went back in the afternoon for more. (They had big pictures, and big print.) That dusty little institution smelled of well-fingered bindings, and like the three neighbourhood movie theatres, it became a beloved hangout of mine. It loaned me books about wolves, sharks, bears, birds, trains, ocean liners, planes, bush pilots, explorers, soldiers, smugglers, cowboys and Indians.

I read Treasure Island, Robinson Crusoe, With Clive in India, Dale of the Mounted, Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea. The Call of the Wild, scores upon scores of lesser yarns, and as I grew older, the works of John Buchan, H.G. Wells, Ray Bradbury, Shirley Jackson, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, William Faulkner, John Steinbeck, the British poets of World War I, Robert Frost, E.E. Cummings, T.S. Eliot, Dylan Thomas . . .

Each writer gave me the dazzling richness of a world that he or she had created. I was still a boy when I learned to revel in the invented kingdoms of writers. Long after my mother told me to turn out my light and go to sleep, I'd pull my bedcovers over my head, and read by flashlight.

I did this for years, which may be why I've had to wear glasses for four decades. But it may also be why I can do something as miraculous as selling words on paper for hundreds of dollars.

Remembering the way sleepiness and the weak flashlight beam made my eyes burn under the covers, I know precisely what Halifax-raised broadcaster Robert MacNeil meant when, in his recent book Wordstruck, he talked of "the discovery that words make another place, a place to escape to with your spirit alone. Every child entranced by reading stumbles on that blissful experience sooner or later."

The tragedy is that hundreds of millions of children are not entranced by reading. They can't read, and never in their lives will they stumble on that blissful experience. They are in the hole.

Mr. Bruce is followed in this book by the late Morley Callaghan and his contribution is called "My Love for Miracles of the Imagination". It reads:

One night back in the 50's when television was making it's first big impact, my friend Ralph Allen, at that time editor of Maclean's, said to me: "We'd better all start learning to handle pictures and images. From now on there'll be less and less reading of stories or anything else. In fact, we should be worrying about whether reading is on the way out."

I simply couldn't believe this. We argued. I wasn't quite sure why I was so utterly positive I was right, and I remember that on the way home I tried to figure it out, and now I think I did.

I saw then that watching television and reading are two entirely different experiences. You can love one and hate the other. You can get so drugged by television that you can't take the time to read anything. Reading becomes an effort. Television is a spectator sport.

What you are watching is all outside you and goes on even if for long stretches you are falling asleep. I watch a lot of television; I get comfortable in the chair and half the time I'm daydreaming, I'm thinking of something else, half hypnotized, mentally inert, but comfortable, very comfortable.

But reading—this this vastly different experience—requires work from me. My inner eye comes to life. If it's a story I'm reading, the figures come to life on the screen of my own imagination.

Language, just words, is making the miracle. The greatest wonder of humankind is probably the development of language, and the second wonder, growing out of the first one, is learning to read; letting another man or woman who is maybe dead, or maybe 10,000 miles away, reach into one's imagination and create a vivid, moving world.

A man sits alone with a book, the whole world around him grows silent, a voice so secret it can't be heard, just felt, is whispering to him and leading him deep into the world of the greatest wonder and power—his his own imagination.

To this day I remember the first long story I ever read. It was called "The Fall of the House of Garth." I was nine years old. The book was a cheap pulp horror story. I forget who gave it to me. But I'll never forget my rapt attention or how the figures were dancing around so wildly in my imagination.

I had discovered reading and what it could do for the free, fresh imagination and how it could enlarge the whole world of wonders, and as time passed and I grew much older, and though I read and read a thousand works, I think I was always looking for some writer, some book that would give back to me the fresh imagination of a child.

Ripeness is all, freshness is all—how do you get this stuff? Where do you get it? And looking back, and looking around at others, I can see that the person who keeps stimulating his or her imagination, stretching it like a rubber band through the visions of others coming through lovely reading, never grows old in the heart.

I had a friend, a Russian Jew who had some serious optical problem. He wore glasses with very thick lenses. I asked him what had ruined his eyesight. He said that when he was a boy in Russia his parents had been very poor. He had to work hard. His mother always got him to bed very early and turned out the light. But he would have a flashlight in the bed, and pulling the covers over his head, he would read by the flashlight.

He read the stories of Chekhov, then book after book of Tolstoy before his eyes finally went on him. Looking back on it, he couldn't regret the damage to his eyes, he said. In his little tent under the covers his beam of light had opened up new worlds, worlds he would walk in the rest of his life; worlds that put him far beyond his poverty-stricken home and made him aware of lives far different than his own.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

As this man knows, now that he is middle-aged, you don't have to have money, or go to college, to find the magic of reading bringing new planets swinging into your ken. It happened in a big way for me, though, in my first year at college. Up to that time I had been reading for fun all the boys' books, then Dumas and the Three Musketeers, and so on.

And then one day, sitting in the Hart House library, I picked up a short novel by a Russian I had heard of, Dostoyevsky. The little book jarred me; I knew I was being forced to look at things in a new way. I had got my first taste of real writing. I was excited. I had to find other writers who had other upsetting visions. For me they became the great writers. I remember being curled up on a couch in that library, reading Flaubert's Madame Bovary. I should have been at a lecture. But I had to get to the end of the book. Yet I did not want the book to end.

● (2330)

Well, Flaubert, in one of his letters to the great Russian Turgenev, said that there was nothing new for a writer to say, but there had to be new ways of saying the old things. All my life I've had this in mind as I read and read, and when I find a writer who has his own way of saying things, I get excited; another angle of life; again the new planet.

I used to find that sometimes I was not in the mood for new things, and then I would read as I watched television—just relaxing. At one time I read all of Agatha Christie, and all of the tough mysteries of Raymond Chandler. I'll read any newspaper, too. The newspaper is in my blood. I have to know what's going on.

But back in my mind, always is the longing to read something that will not only stir me, but give back to me the unspoiled freshness of imagination that I had as a child when I read "The Fall of the House of Garth." The trouble is I'm a professional writer, and even when I'm reading a good book now, my critical intelligence is getting too often in the way of my imagination.

Another bad thing I have to guard against as I grow older is finding it easier to read nonfiction than fiction. A book like Barbara Tuchman's A Distant Mirror about the European fourteenth century can completely absorb me. I don't have to use my imagination at all. Ah, that worries me!

Then I look around eagerly for good new story writers. I now know I have one simple rule for knowing if they're good. They're good if they make me want to write. Or excite my imagination.

I know what it's like for a man who finally comes to realize that he has let his imagination wither and die and has grown old in the heart. He knows he is half dead. I saw it one night in a man I knew who was with me at a big party.

He was a very successful executive and only 55. He was having trouble with his wife. Sitting on the stairs he called, " Morley, sit with me. I want to tell you something." Holding my arm tight, he said desperately, "When I come home at night I'm tired. The rat race. I eat, I have a drink, I pick up Time magazine. I read three pages and fall asleep . . ."

He had started to cry. Tears were running down his cheeks. I know I'm a little drunk," he said, "but I used to read all the time. When I was at college I was crazy about Katherine Mansfield and Virginia Woolf. I read Sherwood Anderson, I read . . . oh, what happened to me?"

I often think of this man, particularly when I'm about to fall into a sweet little sleep, watching television.

One author from western Canada whom many of you may know, as he is acclaimed as one of Canada's foremost novelists and a great supporter of the literacy cause, is Rudy Wiebe. He was born back in the 1930's and grew up on a Mennonite homestead in Saskatchewan. He published his first novel in the early 1960's and won the Governor General's Award for Fiction in 1973 for a book called The Temptations of Big Bear. He now lives in Edmonton. I would not be surprised if he, too, were having some involvement in the literacy conference going on there this week. His contribution to this book is called "Speaking Saskatchewan":

In the summer the thick green poplar leaves clicked and flickered at him, in winter the stiff spruce rustled with voices. The boy, barefoot in the heat or trussed up like a lumpy package against the fierce, silver cold, went alone to the bush where everything spoke: the warm rocks, the flit of quick, small animals, a dart of birds, tree trunks, burning air, ground, the squeaky snow: everything as he breathed and became aware, its language clear as the water of his memory when he lay in the angle of the house rafters at night listening to the mosquitoes slowly find him under his blanket, though he had his eyes shut and only one ear uncovered. Everything spoke, and it spoke Low German.

Like his mother. She would call him long, long into the summer evening when it seemed the sun burned all night down into the north, call long and slow as if she were already weeping and when he appeared beside her she would bend her wide powerful hands about his head and kiss him so hard his eyes rang. "Why don't you answer, you?" she would speak against his hair. "Why don't you ever answer when I call, its so dark, why don't you ever say a word?" While he nuzzled his face into the damp apron at the fold of her thigh, and soon her words would be over and he heard her skin and warm apron smelling of saskatoon jam and dishes and supper buns love him back.

His sister laughed at his solitary silence. "In school are thirty kids," she would say, "you'll have to talk, and English at that. You can't say Low German there, and if you don't answer English when she asks, the teacher will make you stand in the corner."

"Right in front, of people?" he would ask fearfully.

"Yeah, in front of every one of them, your face against the wall. So you better start to talk, English too."

And she would try to teach him English names for things, but he did not listen to that. Rather, when he was alone he practised standing in the corners of walls. Their logs shifted and cracked, talking. Walls were very good, especially where they came together so warm in winter.

But outside was even better, and he followed a quiet trail of the muskrat that had dented the snow with its tail between bullrushes sticking out of the slough ice, or waited for the coyote to turn and see him, its paw lifted and about to touch a drift, its jaw opening on a red tongue laughing with him. In summer he heard a mother bear talk to her cubs among the willows of the horse pasture, though he did not see them, but he found their sluffing paw prints in the spring snow and his father said something would have to be done if they came that close to the pig fence again. The boy knew his father refused to own a gun, but their nearest neighbour west gladly hunted everywhere to shoot whatever he heard about and so he folded his hands over the huge, wet prints and whispered in Low German, "Don't visit here any more. It's dangerous."

The school sat on the corner, just below the hill where the road turned south along the creek to the church and the store. He never looked at the school, the tiny panes of its four huge windows staring at him, just staring. The day before he had to go there every day like his sister, the planes came for the first time.

Their horses were pulling the wagon up the hill as slowly, steadily as they always did and it happened very fast, almost before he looked around. There had been a rumble from somewhere like thunder, far away, though the sky was clear sunlight and his father had just said in a week they could start bindering the oats, it was ripening so well, and his mother sat beside him broad and straight as always her braided, waist-long hair coiled up for church under her hat when the roaring planes were there as he turned, four, yellow-and-black, louder than anything he had ever heard. West over the school and small grain fields and pastures and all the trees and hills to the far edge of the world. His father would not look around, holding the horses in carefully, muttering, "Now it comes here too, that war training," but the boy was looking at his mother. Perhaps his own face looked like that next morning when the yellow planes came over the school at recess, so low he saw huge glass eyes in a horrible leather head glare down at him before he screamed and ran inside to the desk where his sister had said he must sit. When he opened his eyes the face of the teacher was there, her gentle face very close, smiling almost up-side-down at him between the iron legs of the desk beneath which he crouched. Her gentle voice.

"Come," she said, "come," and after a moment he scrambled to his feel; he thought she was speaking Low German because he did not yet know that what that word meant was spoken the same in English. Not touching him, she led him between desks to a cupboard against the wall opposite the windows and opened its narrow door. Books. He has never imagined so many books. There may be a million.

She is, of course, speaking to him in English and later, when he remembers that moment again and again, he will never be able to explain how he can understand what she is saying. The open book in her hand show him countless words: words, she tells him, he can now only see the shape of, but he will be able to hear them when he learns to read, and that the word "READ" in English is the same as the word "SPEAK," raed, in Low German and through reading all the people of the world will speak to him from books, when he reads he will be able to hear them, and he will understand. He is staring at what he later know are a few worn books on a few shelves, and then staring back at the few visible but as yet unintelligible words revealed in her hand, and slowly he understands that there are shelves and shelves of books in great stack on many, many floors inside all the walls of the enormous libraries of the world where he will go and read; where the knowing she will now help him discover within himself will allow him to listen to human voices speaking from everywhere and every age, saying everything, things both dreadful and beautiful, and all that can be imagined between them: and that he will listen. He will listen to those voices speaking now for as long as he lives.

Gordon Korman, from Montreal, Québec, was twelve years old when he first wrote a book as a grade seven English assignment. At age fourteen, he was a best-selling author. The title of his piece in this book is "Don't Wait For The Movie":

> I remember a conversation with a producer who was working on turning one of my books into a feature film. The more I heard, the more I became convinced that I had better savour the moment when "Based on the Novel by . . ." flashed on the screen, because it was going to be the only thing in the movie even vaguely reminiscent of what I wrote.
> I think it finally sank in when the producer said, "Well, you know the scene where Steve—?"
> How ignorant of me to think that, as the guy who write the book , I should actually be able to recognize the hero. Especially after they plotted, replotted, unplotted, added, excised, and replaced personnel like Harold Ballard. Can't tell the players without a scorecard.
> Then I thought of the junior high school student who might someday be called upon to do a book report on my book. He would plow over to the video store to rent that movie, save time, and come up with a report destined to flunk with flying colours. (The character sketch of Steve would lay a particularly large egg.) Every one of us has beaten a deadline by condensing a lot of reading time into a 90-minute movie.

All this is hypothetical, of course, because the proposed movie never got made—which is why I am not dictating this piece over the cellular phone in my Maserati. But it did get me thinking about book versus movie, and what makes a book so special, since it obviously isn't time efficiency.

Lately, teachers have thrown us a curve. Now we have to read the book and see the movie, and compare the two. Teachers are very big on comparisons. Here it works. Almost invariably, the book gets the nod.

• (2345)

That's not to say that all the movies are bad. After the books, though, they're just somehow incomplete. The novel always seems to have something more—a greater depth, a different perspective, a more incisive insight and humour. There is something unique to the written word—to that relationship between author and reader—which cannot be reproduced any other way. It's more than just reporting or storytelling. It's different.

A reader participates in a novel. In a sense, it is almost a collaboration between him and the writer as, reading, he supplies his own interpretation—the reader's draft. No two are ever alike. You can read the same book as someone else without reading the same book. (For instance, everybody who read Lord Jim and liked it read a different book than I did. That may be because I'm a poor "collaborator" with Joseph Conrad). There is a feeling of accomplishment when you come to the end of a very good book—you have completed a successful collaboration. Don't expect royalties.

This is all coming from someone who was a staunch non-reader in elementary school. Once, in a book report, just to avoid actually reading anything, I went so far as to make up an entire novel, characters and all, using my friend's kid sister as the writer. There was even a section on "other books by the same author," and an excerpt from the Boston Globe review. It took ten times as much energy as doing the assignment properly, but to me, no amount of figuring the angles was unjustified. I didn't want to read, period. I got an A. Crime pays.

What finally hooked me in was humour. When I found books that made me laugh, my sense of the "work" of reading was replaced by something wonderful and totally unfamiliar—a desire to find out what happened next. It was a crucial connection. From then on, I equated reading with enjoying myself, and I was a reader for good.

This may sound like an oversimplification, but beware. Relating reading and enjoyment can't be taught; it has to happen. It's a click. Without that click, no amount of explanation, no pleading, no assurance that this is a "great story" will do any good. In my case, humour produced the desired click. But mystery, suspense, adventure, science-fiction, romance, and nonfiction can do the job too. I tend to stick with the funny stuff as the best bet. Tastes can be very specialized, but just about everybody loves to laugh.

My father used to summarize his reading history with the statement, "I read a book once," which was, unfortunately, not greatly exaggerated. Then, out of parental loyalty, he started reading my work. But when I didn't seem to be churning them out fast enough, he tried other authors, and found that you don't have to be a blood relative to appreciate good writing. Now it's not uncommon to find him with a good book in his hand. Reading helps you develop a facility for language, which in turn helps you to read. A neat circle.

Being literate, by definition, is being able to read and write and function in society with these acquired skills. After that, you're on your own, and your reading is what you yourself choose to make of it. Education and reading material are abundant in Canada, and sharing with the rest of the world is something we are fortunate to be able to do. But we, who have all the advantages, often lack something the disadvantaged have to a man—motivation. Too many of our kids don't want to read. They equate reading exclusively with work and school—something that is done only under duress, never voluntarily. I had one childhood friend whose parents actually used it as punishment; the greater the infraction, the more days he would have to spend reading. I've lost touch with him, but I'm pretty sure he reads nothing to this day. Would you?

We have to play up the entertainment side of reading as our kids take their first step towards books. If they latch onto a topic that grabs them, the books will do the rest. Then, in the all-important war for rapidly dwindling leisure time, reading will have a fighting chance with the big boys—hockey, MuchMusic, Friday the 13th: Part 173, and Super Mega-Deluxe Mario Brothers 40. We don't have to wipe out the competition (we haven't got a prayer, and we shouldn't want to) but it would be nice to be on the program.

I once got a letter from a ten-year-old boy who wrote: "I hate reading, but your books are different. I'm going to read them all." It was not only flattering and good business, but also encouraging. I know that kid will discover, as he develops the reading habit with my stuff, a lot of other authors who are "different," and that he'll go on to be a real reader.

Chalk one up for our side.

The next author is Janice Kulyk Keefer, born in Toronto, educated at the University of Toronto and Sussex University in England. Arks and Tunnels is her contribution:

I was saved by a book. Not a religious book, I hasten to add—I'm not talking about that kind of salvation. I can't remember the title, or the author's name, but in the end, that's not important. What matters is the book, the world hidden between its covers, and the doors it opened for me.

I was perhaps ten or twelve, growing up in a prosperous suburb of Toronto, and leading a life that was perfectly ordinary. That was the problem. I wanted more, I needed more than the Dick and Jane world which my schooling offered, a world in which everyone had blue eyes, a big backyard, and names like Smith or Campbell. My own last name was unpronounceable to most of my schoolmates and teachers; I might live in a split-level, yellow-brick house, but my mother had grown up in a thatched cottage with an earthen floor; my grandparents knew little English, and the stories they had to tell of their lives spoke of war, hunger, illness, exile. The knowledge that I had a foot in two worlds as unlike each other as possible bred in me an unsettling sense of difference from my peers, a difference which was a source both of vulnerability, even humiliation, and of enormous, ambitious pride. It also led to a split in my sense of who I was, and what I wanted my life to be, a split that no recourse to parents or guidance counsellors, records or television could remedy. Perhaps I didn't want to be cured of this sense of otherness, to be made "ordinary", but simply to discover ways of using difference, of exploring, understanding, and creating from it. What I did need, however, was some outside confirmation that difference, and the ambivalent feelings it produced, was a valuable part of my being; that it could empower as well as distress.

It was then, in that shaky and uncertain period of my life, that I found the book. A fortuitious find, brought about by the bookmobile that came round to our little cul-de-sac each week. There may have been the word "ark" in the title, for the book had to do with the struggles of a family to put their lives back together in a Germany that had been blown apart by World War II. It was not a happy story; there was no romance and little adventure in it, and the characters were neither heroic nor depraved. But neither were they ordinary. They were foreign—their world, their history, their society was utterly different from mine, or for that matter, from my parents—my mother's family had been lucky enough to leave Poland three years before the Nazis invaded.

The book, whatever it was called, became a passageway between my own sense of difficult difference, and a recognition of the difference of other people's lives. It also brought to me a sense of community—that I and the characters in the book, the author of the book, shared a common world much larger and more complicated than I had ever dreamed. And that I was being welcomed into another person's mind, relieved of the often unbearable lonliness of my own. What struck me most about the book, what kept me reading—and I read this book compulsively—was the honesty and acuity of the author's vision—how she saw things, what she singled out for observation, and how she let incidents and situations speak for themselves, so that I was neither bullied nor seduced by the narrative, but simply made to feel at home, to emphasize or to resist according to my own ideas, my own experience.

Later, at university, I underwent another sort of crisis. First came the avalanche of despair when I realized how many books there were to be read, and how little I knew, or would ever know. And then I went through that dark, or at least sombre night of the soul which most university students experience, encountering a world of ideas so vast, complex, and contradictory that it explodes the little set of views and values on which one's childhood and adolescence are structured. This time, as well, it was a book which saw me through—not by shoring up the ruins, but rather by completing the demolition of my previous assumptions. About this book I remember specifics: it was Herman Hesse's Steppenwolf. I stayed up all night reading it; I raced through each page as if it were a tunnel into a light that was dubious, and perhaps deceptive, but light, all the same. That book made me question everything I'd previously taken for granted. I wanted to throw out every possession, every bit of conceptual baggage I had acquired up till that moment, and yet I also wanted to pile those crutches high, and hide behind them. As the sun rose that morning, as the sun always does rise, even on Spadina Avenue, I felt that the floor of my life had fallen away, and that all I had to keep me from tumbling into the pit was a swaying line, no thicker than a thread. And that I had to walk it or else remain forever in a world of outgrown ideas and attitudes, of clichés and prejudices that were a worse kind of pit than anything into which reading might catapult me.

I never read anything else by Hesse—I didn't become an eastern mystic, or feel the need to slavishly adopt this writer's vision of reality. I've never reread Steppenwolf, partly from the fear that what I then found so extraordinarily powerful, I would now pick apart and dismiss. But the point is that I went on reading, and that for me, as for most of the people I know, not to read is to curl up and die, or at least to go into hibernation, a state all the more dangerous since there may well be no world left for us to wake up in, at all.

Literacy can be lost; those of us who, after graduation from high school or university never open any other book than the telephone directory, or even the latest Danielle Steel, are among the lost. To me, literacy means more than the ability to read manuals and signs, bank statements, or even income tax forms. It is, most important, the ability to read and to be moved by literature, which can take any form from fairy tales to the lyrics of songs. Real books—literature—rely on imagination rather than wish-fulfilment for their power, and bring us closer in some way to what is true. Truth of course, is almost always other than what we want it to be; and as writers as varied as Henry James and Alistair MacLeod have shown, one of the most important truths we can discover is the way in which we evade or suppress knowing what we do know.

October 12, 1990

That very abstract term, literacy, has the connotation of bringing light into darkness, of educating millions in the third world—and thousands in our own country—who live impoverished and oppressed lives, deprived of the skills that would allow them to find the work and to assert the rights that might give them the chance for a decent and dignified life—or for life at all. Literacy for these people, whom we must consider not as "them" but as part of us, our people, means the difference between dumb endurance of intolerable hardships and the experience of living, developing one's individuality, coming to fruition as a human being. But literacy in another sense, the sense in which it affects most Canadians, is not something acquired merely to advance oneself economically or socially. Literacy—the reading of literature—is something to be valued for the complex pleasure which knowledge brings: knowing about ourselves and about others, about the world we live in, and the worlds outside to which we're all connected—South Africa, Poland, China, or perhaps Newfoundland, the B.C. interior, or Toronto's drug-bound inner city. To be truly literate is not to demand the easy satisfactions that formula romance or thrillers provide, but rather to seek out books which initiate conversations on those subjects from which we most want to hide, but about which we most need to know.

To ensure literacy, to make it flourish, we must fight for certain principles. We must oppose any government that attempts to put a tax upon reading. We must oppose sales tax on books, and any withdrawal of support from Canadian publishers and printers. In what has been called a "post-literate" age, it is becoming increasingly difficult for the printed word to make an impact on our collective consciousness—Salman Salman Rushdie's The Satanic Verses notwithstanding. And that writer's tragic situation seems to me to put the case for literacy in the most pressing terms imaginable. For telling the truth as he sees it, for using the imagination to contest and satirize and also to explore a particular religion and the world views it fosters Rushdie has been made a universal scapegoat by vast numbers of people who have not even read his book. To condemn The Satanic Verses without having read it, and to attempt to prevent others from reading it is to deny or endanger our most precious human right—the right to know, to develop a critical understanding of whatever is presented to us as universal truth, eternal law, immutable right and wrong. The children who held up placards saying "Rushdy must Die" or "Kill the Blasfemer" are precisely the ones for whom Rushdie has written his book—the ones who, if they are to develop to their full potential as human beings, must read voraciously and omnivorously—must make up their own minds as to what is true and what false, what blasphemous and what revelatory. They must not be denied access to that process which, for example, Hermann Hesse's Steppenwolf began for me.

Literacy—reading—is a human right to be continuously cherished and fought for. It is not only in military dictatorships that the rights to read and to publish freely are under fire. Writers with political views considered subversive or undesirable by the powers-that-be-writers such as the distinguished linguist, Noam Chomsky, author of The Political Economy of Human Rights—have had enormous difficulties in getting their works published and distributed in what we like to think of as the "free world." And the increasing transformation of traditional publishing houses into offshoots of mega-corporations may well mean that fewer and fewer new, risky, alternative voices will be heard; that only what sells, and sells big, will be published. And though the Alice Munros and Margaret Atwoods are there to prove that the most accomplished literary art is compatible with the highest sales figures, one can't help anticipating that real books will be squeezed out of the publishers' lists, to be replaced by fast and phoney reads—the books which do just fine on the red-eye special from Toronto to Vancouver, but which have nothing to offer when one needs something to bring one closer to life.

For there is not real polarity between books and life. Literature is a form and a way of life; it allows us to live more fully, intelligently, and honestly. And, of course, more joyfully, too. True literacy has more to do with the delights than the mechanics of reading. It is not a skill to be acquired once in a lifetime, but an art to be practised and polished one's whole life long.

Senator Cogger: Senator Fairbairn, if I may, before you go on, might I ask you a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Cogger: First, on behalf of senators on this side I wish to thank you for your graceful and poetic reading. I think the words of Chief Morning Bird are appropriate. Thank you, Chief.

Chief, if I look at the calendar it still says October 9. I believe you have spoken before. It seems to me that Rule 28 states:

> A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except . . .

As best I know, we are still on the question of privilege concerning the defective watch battery of Senator Stewart. I believe that you had a graceful two hours last night and you are into your second graceful hour tonight, Chief Morning Bird. Might I ask you how that complies with Rule 28.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Cogger: I am sorry, senator, might I ask Chief Morning Bird to answer.

Senator Simard: We do not have a watchmaker, we have a rule maker.

Senator Frith: Senator Fairbairn just said her answer is that she would like to have a bit of a rest and perhaps I could try to answer the inquiry.

Rule 28, as read by Senator Cogger, states:

> A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of the senator's speech in which the senator may have been misunderstood, and then that senator shall not introduce new matter.

One has to find out what is meant by the word "question". In that regard we turn to the definitions section of the rule book and see that it states "question, except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege . . ." According to the rule book, there are three types of questions. First, there is the question in the sense of a matter, that is, the question before the house. Second, there is a question as the term is used in Question Period. Then there is question as it is used with respect to privilege. One of the reasons we tend to talk about a point of privilege is to make the distinction. Actually, the right term is question of privilege and it does not fall under Rule 28. That is illustrated by the fact that people on both sides, including Senator Murray, myself and others, over the course of the last few days have spoken two or three times on this matter.

Senator Cogger: If I might, please, Chief. I understand the intervention of Senator Frith, and with limited resources I would call on my best resources to speak for hours and, frankly, to call on Chief Morning Bird to address this august chamber at this late hour is a very smart move. However, it seems to me that—let me go at it in French. I think that I will be better at it.

[Translation]

And I quote:

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate, a question of privilege, or upon a point of order . . .

I am sorry I am not quoting from the right Rule. I will now come back to Rule 28.

> A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of the senator's speech . . .

If I remember correctly, when we sat on October 9th, Senator Stewart rose first saying: "on a question of privilege I see that according to Hansard there is mention of a vote having taken place prematurely.

We are now in our 60th hour of debate on this precise subject and if my memory serves we well, Senator Fairbairn is rising in the Senate for at least the second time on the same subject. What is going on?

Senator Frith: That includes all Senators, including Senators from your side. We have discussed this question of privilege more than once, and so has Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Cogger: I submit that though other senators have broken the rules, it is no excuse for continuing to do so. In my view, the wording of Rule 28 is broad and I quote:

> —to any question or other matter before the Senate—

The wording is very broad, and it covers just about everything.

> A Senator shall not speak more than once . . .

Therefore I respectfully submit to you that Senator Fairbairn, by rising in the Senate for the second time in the same sitting, is out of order. As a result, she must unfortunately sit down.

Senator Frith: I can repeat the same thing in French. As I said earlier, the word "question" means three things in our book.

Senator Cogger: In French, Rule 28 does not speak of a "question". It says un sujet ou une question.

Senator Frith: So it is a question. Which brings us to its definition in Rule 5, which says:

> 5. o) "question", except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege—

It is a very straightforward and simple explanation of a question of privilege. It is an exception to the rules which impose or confer the right to speak once only to a motion or to a question in the Chamber. The same applies to the word or to the use of the word "question", during question period. What I am saying is that there are three uses of the word "question". I mentioned that myself and other Senators, on a question of privilege, just as on a point of order, are not limited and can speak more than once.

Senator Cogger: In other words, according to your interpretation, Senator Frith, a question can deal with anything except a subject that is brought up during question period or as a question of privilege.

However, for the past 61 hours we have been hearing questions of privilege, which is exactly what Rule 28 does not allow. It says that we shall not speak more than once. Otherwise, the rule is meaningless.

> 28. A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate—et cetera. Now, what does "question" mean?

> o) "question", except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege, means a proposal—et cetera.

This is precisely a question of privilege. Are you suggesting, Senator Frith, that because Senator Stewart rose at 2 a.m. last Tuesday on a question of privilege, that Senators Fairbairn, Lefebvre, Stollery and any other Senator can rise eight, twelve or fourteen times until Easter on the same question?

I think that would be quite contrary to the interpretation of Rule 28. Why, Senator Frith, did Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough) when he rose last Tuesday take the trouble to say "You will note that I did not rise last week because I have a new question of privilege, the battery in my watch is dead. I have just realized that the vote took place at 5:25 p.m."

Senator Stewart, whose question of privilege we are discussing, was careful not to take part in the debate during all of last week. His slate is clean, so to speak! He is now "joining" the debate. I believe that there were some 50 speeches made. You all rose in the Senate. When we were finished, we all went home for Thanksgiving weekend etc.

Last Tuesday, Senator Stewart said: "I rise on the new question of privilege, not on the one that the others have debated".

So Rule 28 does not apply to Senator Stewart. He was confident of that. But since Senator Stewart made his speech, there have been some 40 others, and things have become quite repetitive.

I submit that this is contrary to Rule 28. Otherwise, why would Senator Stewart have taken the trouble to point out that he did not rise last week?

Senator Frith: He began by saying that he had not spoken last time on a question of privilege. He also said that the question of privilege is "his question of privilege".

These are separate questions of privilege. We are not rising to debate Senator Stewart's motion. We are rising on our own questions of privilege.

Senator Cogger: Once!

Senator Frith: No, because it is clear that Rule 28 does not apply in the case of a question of privilege or a point of order.

If you would like to change it . . . am I to understand that Senator Cogger wishes to rise on a point of order?

Senator Cogger: Look, unlike you I do not pretend to be a great strategist. We have been listening to questions of privilege for the past 60 hours.

I would like you to clarify this for me because you have such a keen sense of procedure.

• (0015)

[English]

You are the great strategist on the other side. Section 28, both in French and English, appears reasonable to me, but after 60-some hours I begin to wonder. Senator Stewart came into this chamber on Tuesday last at 2 p.m. He said, "I only just this minute found out that a vote had been called at 5.25. Before then I wasn't too sure because the battery in my watch was weak, and maybe I should change the battery. But now I am certain that my privilege was trampled upon." Therefore, he stood in his place and fought for his privileges.

Non-stop since last Tuesday we have heard each and every one of the senators on the other side—

Senator Hastings: Not me.

Senator Cogger: I am sorry, you have not addressed the matter of the battery?

Senator Hastings: No.

Senator Cogger: You will be given a chance, I am sure. How many times do we on this side have to listen to each and every one of you on the question of the battery?

Senator Hastings: Until you understand.

Senator Cogger: I know why they asked Senator Fairbairn to speak after midnight. That is why they call her "Chief Morningbird", I suppose. I hope they do not call on you again at 3 a.m. and 4 a.m. There are only so many resources. I read that you have an inflatable mattress in your office.

Does one read section 28 as meaning that on one given question of privilege you have the right to speak three, four, five or nine times each on the same question?

Senator Frith: No, on each one's individual question.

Senator Cogger: I will go to the Commissioner of Human Rights. This is just too much. If you will give me a moment, I will read to you the intervention put forth by Senator Stewart.

Senator Frith: I am off at 2 o'clock. You can keep going until then as far as I am concerned.

Senator Cogger: Do we have the time?

Senator Frith: Absolutely.

Senator Hastings: His watch works.

Senator Cogger: The intervention of Senator Stewart was at the beginning of the October 9 session. He reminded honourable senators that he had not addressed the other question of privilege.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is what he said. He wanted to address that question and another question, which he can do.

Senator Cogger: I should like to ask the Table Officers to get me the transcript of the beginning of the session on Tuesday. We have the time, do we not?

Senator Frith: Sure. We will wait for that.

Senator Robertson: While we are waiting, I should like to ask a question of Senator Fairbairn.

Senator Fairbairn, are your comments over the last two and a half hours in relation to the privilege identified by Senator Stewart? Are you speaking to his 50 to 60-hour privilege process?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Robertson: I regret that. I slept well this afternoon and I thought we had advanced to the Orders of the Day. I thought perhaps you were speaking to an item on Orders of the Day, because we have had speeches, discussions and debates on illiteracy in this chamber before.

Your comments are always commendable, but I am concerned that your comments tonight are tied in with this great marathon—this charade—of 60-some hours of the most severe critical debate. What we have endured for the last 60 hours is pure politics.

Senator Hastings: Politics?

Senator Stollery: Politics?

Senator Robertson: I find it most regrettable to have Senator Fairbairn's remarks tied in with someone reading the Parliamentary Guide, 1972 speeches, baseball, football or whatever I was listening to when I was half asleep this afternoon and all those other silly issues that were being repeated here. I find it discouraging.

I am sorry you missed your conference. Most of us in this chamber have missed a conference or two in the last few days and we will probably miss a few more. I am very serious about this. I regret that you chose this topic to mix with this other garbage that we have heard for the last 60 hours.

Senator Hastings: GST is garbage?

Senator Robertson: There are subjects that you cannot mix with political philosophy. You know what those issues are. They are bigger than politics. I would submit that illiteracy is one of those issues that is much bigger than politics, and I regret that you chose to use this forum for that speech this evening. It makes a mockery of the issue. I know you do not mean to make a mockery of the issue because I know you feel sincere about it. It makes a mockery of the issue to throw that serious topic in with these 60 hours of foolishness. It certainly makes a mockery of privilege. I would have expected more from the honourable senator. It is very deplorable. It is sad when you mix serious issues in with this foolishness that we have been listening to for the last 60 hours.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I do not wish to interrupt Senator Fairbairn, because she has been making a very interesting speech. I must protest the idea that this has been nonsense. I recall very well the question of privilege brought forward by Senator Stewart, and I recall equally well that he had not spoken last week when the original event that started all this took place. I protest the implication or the statement that this is a lot of nonsense. Anyone who heard Senator MacEachen on Tuesday, who put our position forward regarding the events raised by Senator Stewart and many others last week, can only say that he put our position clearly. We do not think that Senator Charbonneau's actions on Thursday were nonsense. We think they were done with deadly seriousness. Until that issue has been resolved, we on this side will continue to exercise our collective rights to protest what is, in our view, an unprecedented breach of parliamentary practice. So I would not want anyone to think that this is nonsense. It is certainly not nonsense.

• (0030)

None of us enjoy sitting here all night. None of us is looking forward to the weeks to come when we will be sitting here all night, all because there was a breach of parliamentary procedure. We are obliged to express our outrage, and we shall continue to do so. I do not think that it is justified to say that this exercise is nonsense, because it certainly is not nonsense. I thank Senator Fairbairn for giving me this moment to respond to the previous comments. I would like very much to hear what she has to say.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: It is a serious matter. The quality of the speeches we have heard for the last 40 some hours has been pure nonsense. I am sorry that Senator Fairbairn has mixed a serious topic in with that other trash that we have been listening to, and it is serious.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, first I would like to thank Senator Cogger for his gracious intervention and also for his reference to my new name "Morning Bird" that was given to me this summer by the Blood Tribe in South-Western Alberta. I am very proud to be a member of the Kaindi Chieftainship.

To Senator Robertson, I thank her also. Naturally, I do not share her point of view about the manner of my intervention in this debate. I know she too feels strongly about this issue. I believe that the issue of literacy or, perhaps more correctly, illiteracy, rises above politics.

Senator Robertson: Exactly.

Senator Fairbairn: I believe that any time I have an opportunity to speak and perhaps raise the interest of a single person in this issue I should take that opportunity, and I do so on all occasions in a completely non-partisan and non-political way. I wish to thank members on both sides of the chamber for listening and indulging me in that opportunity tonight.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-54, to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Murray, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we on this side have received a very large number of petitions on the subject of the goods and services tax. We intend to present them for the interest of honourable senators and as a relevant prelude to the debate, whenever it may take place, on the goods and services tax. Of course, the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee contains the recommendation that the bill proceed no further. The consequences of the adoption of that report would be that the bill would not be permitted on the order paper again in this session and would therefore die.

I would like to put something on the record about petitions, because we believe, particularly on this occasion, when there has been so much public interest in the goods and services tax, that the petitions that we mean to present have a special significance. Chapter 16 of Beauchesne—

Senator Murray: Beauchesne; my goodness gracious.

Senator Frith: What is the question?

Senator Murray: I thought that Beauchesne had been banished forever from this chamber. At least, that seems to be the case every time I try to make reference to it.

Senator Frith: I cannot imagine what would lead anyone to that conclusion, but it is late and one can get confused. I have always felt that Beauchesne is a great help whenever there is an absence of a specific rule on the question or the point of order in our own rule book or in our own customs. Certainly it is an excellent source on such subjects as petitions. Petitions are dealt with on page 209 of the fifth edition. Under the heading "Petitions" is a header that reads:

> Right to Petition—Form of Petitions—Remonstrances—Signatures—Substance of the Petition—Petitions from Aliens—Presentation of Petitions—Method of Presentation—Irregularity of Petitions—Procedure Following Presentation of the Petition—The Report of the Clerk of Petitions—Petitions of Urgency.

The fundamental principle with regard to petitions can be found in the first citation, 666, under the heading "Right to Petition", and it reads:

> The right to petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution and has been exercised without interruption since 1867.

Allow me to read the next two citations:

> 667. Although the House of Commons is a representative institution, it only considers questions submitted by its elected Members. Therefore the ordinary citizen has no right to appear personally before the House of Commons. If he has a grievance, he may present a written petition through a Member within the conditions laid down in the Standing Orders of the House.
> 668. The practice of addressing petitions to the House of Commons has decreased considerably, now mainly due to the development of Courts of Justice and administrative bodies.

The presentation of petitions to the Senate, on the other hand, has, if anything, increased in the time I have been here. We have already presented some petitions on the goods and services tax. A large number of petitions were presented on the drug patent legislation. So if there has been a diminution in the presentation of petitions to the House of Commons, I think we could all agree, at least those of us who have been here over the past couple of years, that the slack has certainly been taken up here in the Senate.

Citation 669 deals with the form of petitions. It reads:

> Every petition should commence with the superscription:

In our case, the form is well stated. The heading reads:

• (0045)

> On the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

So that is the form that applies here in the Senate and I can pass on from that heading, where the form in the House of Commons is dealt with.

I now move to Chapter XXXII, "Public Petitions" under "Course of Development of the Form of Petitioning":

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times, and has had a profound effect in determining the main forms of parliamentary procedure.

This is from Erskine May's "Treatise on the Law Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament". It is the eighteenth or 1971 edition. The editor is Sir Barnett Cocks K.P.B. O.B.E., Clerk of the House of Commons. Continuing:

> The historical and constitutional aspects of petitions to the Queen in Parliament, which were originally directed to judicial rather than legislative remedies, and from which in the medieval period the form of legislation both by public and private bill was only gradually derived, will not be considered in this work. This section is concerned with the modern form of petitions to one or other of the Houses of Parliament, principally to the Commons, which grew up in the seventeenth century, when parliament had come to be regarded as a political and legislative body rather than as the highest court of justice. Public petitions may pray for an alteration of the general low or the re-consideration of a general administrative decision, and they may also pray for redress of local or personal grievances.
> The rights of petitioners and the power of the House to deal with petitions were laid down by two resolutions of the Commons in 1669.

So that is how long that right to present petitions to parliament has subsisted. There are some interesting comments about the character and substance of petitions. This is on page 795:

> The language of a petition should be respectful and temperate and free from disrespectful language to the sovereign or offensive imputations upon the character or conduct of parliament.

Certainly, none of the petitions that we mean to present are worded in any but the most acceptable terms.

I want also to refer to Constitutional and Legal History of England by MM Knappen of Michigan State College. This is from 1942, and the part I wish to refer to is at page 151 dealing with the question of petitions and, as the subheading states, their influence over legislation:

> The second advance—

The first having been dealing with the documents with the official rank as a statute:

> —was the winning of the right to petition the king as a body for redress of grievances, a right from which later legislative powers sprang. Wherever the king went in the Middle Ages, he was besieged by suitors requesting justice or favours of one kind or another. On ceremonial occasions when the monarch, surrounded by churchmen, nobles and representative subjects, was supposed to be in especially good humour and in a mood for business, the number of these petitions increased so greatly that in the thirteenth century is became necessary to appoint special committees Great Council to receive and try them. Some of the petitions were referred to the ordinary courts, while others were turned over to the king with a recommendation of some particular body of redress.
> Conciliar meetings held to consider these petitions were thus very important and the special name of Parliament was given to those held for such purposes. Originally "colloquium" "Parliament" (talkfest, from the French parler, to speak), was considered merely another name for "council" and the technical significance of the term as applied to special sessions of this body developed but slowly. The Knights and Burgesses did not take part in the receiving of these petitions, but they developed the practice of presenting joint petitions and requesting favourable royal action upon them at this time, commonly in conjunction with the magnates who made up the council itself. Thus developed the idea of petition which was not that of a private individual, but one expressing the wishes of the members of parliament as a whole. If the King wished to act favourably upon it, he and his advisers would draw up a decree or a statute embodying the substance of the request, which the Great Council thereupon approved. In this way representative knights and burgesses might make some small contribution to the process of legislation. In this period, however, they seem rarely to have initiated any petitions of their own, but rather to have supported those already drawn up by the nobles. Indeed the presence of knights and burgesses was as yet not considered necessary, either at the session of Parliament that heard the complaints or in the meeting that approved the subsequent statutes. Parliament, as the term was then used, might and did often meet without either knights or burgesses when financial business was not to be taken up or when it had been disposed of and the representatives of the lessor orders dismissed.

Honourable Senators, there is one other reference in the work of Lord Campion and I make reference to "Procedure by Petition or Bill" on pages 10 and 11:

> The practice of petitioning the Crown goes back far beyond Parliament. Procedure on petitions was a large part of the business of Parliament from the beginning. They were submitted in writing and were dealt with systematically by being sorted by receivers and heard by committees of the council in Parliament called Triers. In the great Parliament of 1305, the records of which are unusually complete, nearly five hundred petitions were presented and they were heard by four bodies of Triers. Most of these petitions were from individuals, some from groups outside Parliament, and a few were parliamentary in the sense of being from groups from within Parliament. Two of these, presented by Les Pauvres Hommes de la Terre are supposed to have been from the Commons collectively. No distinction was made at this time in the treatment of petitions. Whether individual or collective. From the individual and group petitions Private Bills are descended; from the collective Commons' petitions, Public Bills.

Honourable Senators, I may present some petitions myself at a later time, but I want to lay down that foundation for the large number of petitions that we have from citizens dealing with, specifically, the goods and services tax, and I am going to ask one of my colleagues to start.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Excuse me, but, on a point of order, I listened very carefully to the Honourable Senator's remarks and the citations to which he referred with regard to petitions, the background of petitions, the right of citizens to petition their parliament, the form in which the petition should be presented, and so on. What I did not hear him discuss was the way in which these petitions are presented in this House. I simply want to confirm with him that in this House we do not read the texts of any petitions, and we most emphatically do not read each name on any petition. We came to that agreement in this place in the course of a discussion some time ago. In fact, I believe Senator Hastings, if I am not mistaken, was involved in one of the particular petitions that caused the discussion or the controversy at the time.

The practice in this house is not to read the texts of the petitions, and certainly not to read all the names of those who have signed them.

Never did I think I would be presenting Senator Hébert as a paragon of anything, but just to refresh your memory, what we have been doing typically in this place is illustrated by Senator Hébert in the Senate Debates at page 2258 on September 26 when he said:

> Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 250 residents of the Noelville region, Ontario, who object to the Goods and Services Tax bill.

He then went on in exactly the same words to table a number of other petitions. I simply want to confirm what the practice was and is in this house.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, the practice and the customs of this house with regard to petitions are indeed set out at page 57 of the Appendix under the heading "Presentation of Petitions". It reads:

> Documents are tabled by the Leader of the Government or by a senator on his behalf. No debate is allowed at this stage except with the consent of the Senate, but a brief explanation may be given of any document.

And Senator Murray has done that with respect to some documents. It continues:

> A senator may present any petition entrusted to him.

I think it is important to realize that these petitions are not like postcards or letters. They are the property of the Senate and are entrusted to a senator to present them to the Senate. Then it says:

> See Rules 5(m), 51, 52, 53, 87, 88, 89 and 94.
> A senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition. The petition itself is not read. The test of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto is not printed in the Debates of the Senate or Minutes of the Senate.

And he is right about that.

Hon Peter A. Stollery: It does not say anything about saying them; just not printing them.

Senator Frith: I think that has clearly been our practice, but I do not think there is anything—in fact, I know there is nothing—to prevent the senator referring to the petitioners and referring to them by name. However, they are not taken down. They are not put in the minutes and printed as such.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: May I ask a question of Senator Frith? First, I just want to understand exactly what your last two sentences mean. You say it has been the practice to have on the record the names, and so on; but if senators should start reading in a few minutes, am I to understand this is going to be another type of delaying tactic? Should the names of the petitioners be mentioned on the floor of the house? Is that your suggestion? Or is it your understanding that the record will delete those names?

Senator Stollery: You should read page 57.

Senator Simard: I am asking Senator Frith.

Senator Stollery: He just read you page 57.

Senator Simard: I may not agree with him, eventually, but at least we will all know what he means. If it is not the practice, but, for the purposes of your exercise today, names of petitioners, one or ten or a thousand, are mentioned, will the names be recorded?

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, the principle is that we have tried to avoid having to print in the Minutes the names of all the petitioners.

Senator Simard: That is the past.

Senator Frith: And the point is, as I have tried to establish, that this is a right that goes back very far indeed, and I think it is very important to understand that these are not like tabling or referring in debate to some postcards or letters that somebody has received. They are petitions addressed in accordance with very ancient and well-established parliamentary principle, and they are ready to be presented to the Senate. Each senator is presenting them as a trustee, in effect, of these petitions and on behalf of the petitioners, and each senator, therefore, has the privilege to decide how he is going to present the petition that has been entrusted to him for presentation to the Senate. If he or she decides that the way the petition will be presented is to read names or a selection of names, or refer to areas from which they come, then that, to the extent that it refers to individual names and addresses, will not be printed. They will be referred to but they will not be printed in the Minutes. However, each senator having a petition is entitled to present it, and I think it is clearly a matter of privilege. If there is any concept of preventing the senator from presenting the petition in the way that he or she thinks is most effective to have it come to the attention of the Senate, then, unless I misjudge my colleagues, that will certainly give rise to some questions of privilege. However, it is quite right that each name and address, and so on, is not printed, but the manner of presenting the petition is up to the senator in whose care that petition was entrusted. As far as I am aware, all of them will be extremely relevant, because they relate to a very important piece of legislation that is before the Senate. There is nothing abstract about this. It is people speaking out on the GST, exercising their right to petition Parliament and to have their views presented to the Senate by senators. So that is what we propose.

• (0100)

Senator Simard: In the name of clarity and understanding—

Senator Frith: I cannot make in any clearer than that. I consider this a matter of right and privilege that citizens have, and a question of privilege for senators to present these petitions. I am not going to stand here and tell other senators how they are going to do it.

Senator Simard: As the organizer of this exercise here, Senator Frith, obviously you have to assume some responsibility. Are you telling us that these petitions are precious documents and that they express the wishes of people? A number of your colleagues, or one of your colleagues, will decide to read the petition, and although they are very precious documents which have been entrusted to them, the senators will each decide what to read, what to extract, and what to have recorded in Hansard?

Senator Frith: You may have some on your side that you wish to present.

Senator Simard: I wonder if those documents are as precious as Senator Frith would have us believe. In other words, petitions have been signed in malls all over the place. All of us, and the people who have signed those petitions, would be entitled to see the whole document in the record or none of it. However, to leave to each Liberal senator the decision as to what should or should not be in the record is stretching it a bit. Perhaps Senator Frith has an explanation.

Senator Frith: Sure.

Senator Simard: You say you do not want to limit any of your members, although I suspect you have much to do with how some of your people have been operating.

Senator Frith: You are a very suspicious man.

Senator Simard: Some of your people have been reading and acting up. Maybe you can answer the question: Is it fair to have impartial, incomplete—

Senator Frith: It is not just a matter of fair; it is fair, right and proper that the senator presenting the petition decides what portion and how he or she wishes to present it. They do not decide what is printed. The appendix clearly states that the names are not printed in the Minutes. That does not mean that they are not to be referred to here in the chamber. I am not going to tell individual senators how to present the petitions. I will present the petitions that I have in the way I think they ought to be presented. The result of that presentation will be that the names will not be listed verbatim. However, I am not going to tell any other senator, nor would I tell Senator Simard, how he should do it. He may very well have some petitions for or against the GST.

We should rejoice in the fact that on a piece of legislation like this the people are sufficiently interested to say to the Senate, "Please present these petitions", to try and persuade the government, or whatever the petition states. It should be a treasured occasion, a very important part of the legislative process, and an important part of our legislative deliberations to know what the people want and also to know where they come from. That is exactly what is up to the individual senator, and it is the individual senator's right, privilege and duty to present it in whatever way he or she thinks is appropriate.

Senator Simard: So in this treasured moment, individual Liberal senators will decide?

Senator Frith: That is how I believe it should be done, and that is how I believe my colleagues mean to present them. Certainly I mean to present some petitions, and if you wish to know how I will be doing it, I will let you know and you can buy a ticket.

Senator Simard: Senator Frith, I have two questions. First, in the past year has Senator Hébert been the official Liberal mailman delivering petitions on the GST? He seems to be the professional, unless he was acting on your behalf all the time. Has he received his instructions, or is he giving you the instructions to prolong and probably use the better part of the weekend to read petitions? Senators, this is just the beginning of phase two of this filibustering.

Senator Stollery: No, it is 1a.

Senator Simard: I am inclined to agree with Senator Murray that up until now there had been an agreement. However, now this is another indication that Senator Frith has decided to throw out the rule book.

Senator Kenny: Charbonneau threw the rule book out.

Senator Simard: I thought we were back on the Order Paper and have the ability, among other things, to receive bills from the House of Commons and that gentlemen and ladies opposite had decided to make an attempt to come back to their senses and perhaps the rules as we know them would now apply. Now they want to reverse and fly in the face of convention and tradition.

Senator Frith, I think you will be disappointing many people. I want to urge you to reconsider and confirm whether Senator Hébert is giving you instructions or you are giving him instructions, or you are giving each individual senator new instructions depending on the province he or she comes from and the degree of support and non-support for the GST. Will the addresses be read or the phone numbers, because some of the petitions have phone numbers. I think we are treading on difficult ground here and inviting problems in the future.

Senator Frith, tell us what is behind this? Why don't you confirm it now so that we can make plans for the weekend. Why don't you tell us if you have made up your mind? Tell us if you are still waiting for orders from Mr. Chrétien, Senator MacEachen, or both of them, and whether they are complementary or contradictory. Tell us all that so we can make plans for the weekend, and maybe we can tell Canadians how much this exercise is going to cost.

Senator Frith: The official mailman is not an office in our party. It may be in yours. If it is, I would like to know who yours is. Neither Senator Hébert nor anyone else is the official mailman, to answer the question directly.

There is nothing more that can be added to what I said about the petitions. There is no question about throwing out any rule book. In fact, we mean to follow the rules, as I said, as far as printing is concerned, and we also mean to follow the very well established rights, privileges and duties that have related to petitions for hundreds of years, and consider it particularly important to do so on this important legislation that touches everyone. As we can see from the petitions, everyone feels very strongly about it.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition entrusted to me to the Honourable the Senate of Canada. It is the petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth, that whereas the new universal 7 per cent federal goods and services tax proposed by the Conservative government will create serious and unjust and inhuman difficulties—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, excuse me. We may have an argument at a later date about the business of reading the names out, because we did have quite a discussion on that a couple of years ago; but that is not the point I wish to raise now. The point I wish to raise now is that my honourable friend is reading the text. This is a point of order.

Senator Kenny: He is summarizing it.

Senator Murray: No, Senator Hastings is reading the text.

Senator Kenny: It is going to be a long night.

Senator Murray: I know it is going to be a long night, but let us try to conduct it within the rules, shall we? Senator Kenny does not know much about the rules. He is in charge of other matters around here feathering his nest.

Senator Hastings has been reading the text of the petition, "humbly sheweth", et cetera. I want to remind him again of what was read into the record by Senator Frith:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.

As I suggested a few minutes ago, the honourable senator might emulate the example of Senator Hébert, who simply indicated a week or two ago that the petitions he was tabling were in opposition to the proposed goods and services tax. But it is not open to him, I suggest, to read the text of the petition, or indeed to enter into any comment whatsoever about the petition, as I can demonstrate to him by reading from Beauchesne, if he wishes; but I am sure that in the case of Senator Hastings, as always, a word to the wise would be sufficient.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to make a brief statement with respect to the petition I am presenting in conformance with the rules which state that I may make a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition I am presenting. The petition I am presenting to the Honourable the Senate of Canada is showing that the signatories to this petition are not in favour of legislation presently under consideration by the Parliament of Canada, particulary the goods and services tax. In this petition the petitioners have offered a substitute proposal to the Parliament of Canada which they feel in their wisdom would be a better proposal than the goods and services tax which we have under consideration. The petitioners in this respect are the following:

(Names of signatories read.)

• (0115)

I have the honour to present a petition entrusted to me to lay before the Honourable the Senate of Canada. The petition is from residents of Canada who avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to petition the Parliament of Canada, with a certain assurance that honourable senators will provide the remedy. The petition of the petitioners pertains to the goods and services tax presently under consideration in this Parliament and particularly in the Senate of Canada. Your petitioners in this petition have graciously presented to your honourable House an alternative to the goods and services tax to which your petitioners have criticized.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Cogger: Would Senator Hastings permit a question? May I ask you one quick question?

Senator Hastings: You can ask me later when I am finished.

Senator Cogger: It relates to the petition.

Senator Hastings: You can ask me later.

Senator Cogger: I would ask you to read into the record where this petition comes from. I have a copy of the one you have just presented. It says here that it is a supplement to the Michael Journal in Rougemont, Quebec. Is that correct?

Senator Hastings: I do not know where it comes from.

Senator Cogger: Does it not say that on the petition?

Senator Hastings: I am reading a petition, honourable senators, which the petitioners entrusted to me—

Senator Cogger: It says here "Supplement to the Michael Journal".

Senator Hastings: What does that have to do with me?

Senator Cogger: I want you to know from where it comes. Do you know where the Michael Journal comes from? You should be ashamed to be reading that into the record.

Senator Hastings: A petition entrusted to me by the undersigned petitioners to the honourable Senate in which your petitioners avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a petition to your honourable House in certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy. The petition I have the honour to present to this House pertains to the Goods and Services Tax which is presently under consideration in this House and in this Parliament. Your petitioners in this petition also provide an alternative to the Goods and Services Tax which they have criticized.

(Names of signatories read.)

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable Senators, I rise on the point of order. I have discussed with my friend opposite, who has been the quarterback for the first portion of the sitting, the question of the names not appearing in the Debates of the Senate or in the Minutes of the Proceedings. I raised with Senator Frith the question of our Hansard reporters being required to take the names down. I noticed that the reporter has been taking them down. As is the tradition, the Hansard reporters take everything that is spoken, and record the words. Since our friends opposite are keen to carry this on, to keep mentioning all the names, and if it is their right to do that, I am wondering whether or not we can instruct the Hansard reporters that they are not required to write the names down. We need to be subjected to it, but they do not have to be.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable Senators, we have noticed the same thing on this side. I was, in fact, speaking to one of the stenographers. I think that probably the gentleman is not aware of the fact that the names are not actually recorded in Hansard, that they are being read out and that he can sit back and forget about them.

Senator Nurgitz: Then it is agreed. I notice that there is a new Hansard reporter sitting herself down. She should be advised of the same, as should the other Hansard reporters coming in.

• (0130)

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition entrusted to me.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: I would like to say one word on that point of order. You have the right to say that you have so many petitions, and you have the right to summarize them. However, if the names are not recorded, why are they mentioned and read? That is not clear under the rule on page 57. I would like to know more about that.

Senator Stollery: That was explained very clearly by Senator Frith. On page 57 it says:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.

Senator Frith made it clear that any senator can present the names in any way he or she may see fit. Whether or not that is clear to Senator Beaudoin is not relevant to the question.

I agree with Senator Nurgitz that the stenographer is clearly not required to list the names. As far as we are concerned, that is the end of the issue. The question raised by Senator Beaudoin has already been answered by Senator Frith, who has returned to the chamber. If you wish, he can answer it again, but I thought we had settled that question. If Senator Hastings would like to proceed with the names, I would be happy to hear them.

Senator Hastings: It is my responsibility to present this petition entrusted to me in accordance with the rules, as you have stated. It says in the rules that I make a brief statement and present it in a manner I believe the petitioners would wish me to present it. I appreciate the fact that the names will not be recorded, but I do have a responsibility to these petitioners to read their names.

Senator Stollery: Agreed.

THE SENATE

PAGES—ACADEMIC STUDIES—TEMPORARY REPLACEMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to interrupt for a moment. Some of you may or may not have been here when I put on the record that the pages—many of whom have academic careers that are at risk in this period—have been replaced in order that they may get back to their studies. We put that on the record earlier and read out their names. We wish them well in turning their attention to their academic careers. I thanked the pages at that time for their devotion.

I should like to add that two people have been working around the clock in the Debates branch. They are Katina Papulkas and Jennifer Wormald. Both of them have academic careers that could be at risk if they have to spend much more time away from their studies. Therefore the same arrangement is being made for them.

For those of you who were not here earlier, Mr. Greene asked if we would approve that. I said it was not necessary to take it to caucus. I said we would approve it and, in fact, encourage it. I spoke to Senator Murray and he agreed.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition that has been entrusted to me: To the Honourable Senate of Canada. The petition is from petitioners who avail themselves of their ancient rights to petition this house in the certain assurance that the Honourable Senate will provide a remedy.

The petition humbly shows to honourable senators that the petitioners do not agree with the Goods and Services Tax as proposed by the Government of Canada and the petitioners offer a reasonable and logical alternative to that tax.

(Names of signatories read.)

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have been entrusted with some petitions on the subject of the Goods and Services Tax.

Senator Cogger: Senator Kenny, does this petition also mention that this is a supplement to the "Michael" newspaper?

Senator Kenny: This is from irate citizens. That is what it says on the bottom of this one.

Senator Cogger: May I look at it?

Senator Kenny: If you do not trust me, you are welcome to.

Senator Cogger: I will. You told me I was welcome.

Senator Kenny: I said, "If you do not trust me." You are an offensive little person, aren't you?

Senator Cogger: Yes.

Senator Kenny: Now I will take your apology.

Senator Cogger: You do not have to trust me. The reason—

Senator Kenny: I do not need a reason. I will carry on with my petition.

Senator Cogger: I wanted you to avoid making the same mistake as your colleague.

Senator Kenny: I shall read the names of the petitioners.

(Names of signatories read.)

That concludes the names of the 26 people from Beaverton and the Peterborough area who are extremely unhappy with the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have a further petition of 27 names. The undersigned have entrusted me with this petition. They are very unhappy with the goods and services tax. They would appreciate it if the government did not introduce it. They would like the Senate of Canada to prevail upon the government to stop the introduction of the tax.

(Names of signatories read.)

• (0145)

The twenty-seven people on this petition are very unhappy with the GST.

Senator Cogger: May I ask the honourable senator whether those petitions are addressed to him. I had heard him say that the petitions had been entrusted to him.

Senator Kenny: They were entrusted to me.

Senator Cogger: Were they entrusted to you?

Senator Kenny: They are entrusted to me.

Senator Cogger: I ask because Senator Hastings was reading Senator Hébert's mail. The address on the back said, "To Honourable Senator Hébert." Are you in the process of reading someone else's mail into the record?

Senator Kenny: Are you going to sit down?

Senator Cogger: I'm asking you a question.

Senator Kenny: Sit down and I will answer the question.

Senator Grafstein: May I respond on behalf of Senator Kenny?

Senator Kenny: Certainly.

Senator Grafstein: As I understand the reading of petitions, the only prohibition with regard to any senator reading any petition relates to petitions of his own or of the Speaker. However, a petition to this House can be dealt with directly by any senator on this side or on the other side.

Senator Cogger: I was raising the question for the following reason only: This petition, addressed to Senator Hébert, happens to be a supplement of the "Michael" Journal of Rougemont, Québec, which is published by a well-known outfit in my province that goes by the name Les Bérets Blancs, and they are a quasi religious group that is well-known for, among other things, its violent anti-semitism. If Senator Hastings and Senator Hébert want to be spokesmen for such a group, that is fine by me. I just think that the blame should be attached to the right place.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, I am presenting my petition now. If you want to talk to other people, you can talk to them at another time. If the honourable senator cares to come over here, I can show him that these petitions are from irate citizens.

Senator Cogger: We on this side of the house are prepared to accept the petitions as read.

Senator Kenny: This group of citizens, and there are 28 of them, is very unhappy with the GST. They went to a lot of

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Senator Kenny: —come from—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Kenny, Senator Simard rises on a point of order.

Senator Simard: It relates to my earlier question to Senator Frith. He told us that each senator would decide whether to mention the names, postal codes, and so on. I am not sure I got what I wanted, but that is neither here nor there. I had understood that the names would be mentioned but not recorded in the Debates. It is unfair of the people of Hansard and the translation to leave out or censor the words and speeches of honourable senators. I think that is unfair and uncalled for. It is without precedent and it should be stopped immediately. In other words, when we eventually get the final product, it will be something that only partially reflects what was said in this House. This is without precedent and I appeal to Senator Frith and Senator Molgat.

[Translation]

. . . Senator Molgat, who is a highly experienced defender of the Senate Rules would not want to be associated with such a ploy and agree that names will be mentioned whether the people are from Rougemont or elsewhere, and so on. Whether these are irate citizens or not, the point is that we are in the process of establishing a whole new set of Rules.

[English]

—from the seats of pants.

Your Honour, I am asking you to rule. You are charged with the responsibility of the record, for decorum, respect of the rules, and order of this house. If we can leave out parts of what was said, we are heading into dangerous ground. It is better that we take five minutes to let Your Honour rule on this point.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: In the process of the past few weeks, we have all been compelled to examine the basic premises and principles that govern the procedures of this place. We have learned that privilege is substantive and goes to the very basis of the rights of senators to receive notices of proceedings, to speak, and to vote. We have spent many hours on how important that particular privilege is, and we have learned, even from Senator Murray, that privilege is sacred. We have what appears to be, according to Beauchesne, a breach of privilege. Notice was sent out by the Speaker without authority to certain members of this house and a vote was taken. That vote was not in accordance with the particular notice but occurred five minutes beforehand. His notice called for a vote to be taken at 5:30, and Hansard of October 4, 1990 records that the doors were locked at 5:25.

So, on the face of it, we have a grievous breach of privilege. According to Beauchesne it is a privilege that affects the rights of all senators.

Senator Simard: Are you speaking to my point of order now?

Senator Grafstein: I am coming to that.

Senator Simard: I am trying to make a connection.

Senator Grafstein: I am coming to it. In the course of examining the breach of that privilege, if Senator Simard would examine Erskine May, Beauchesne and our rules and, more importantly, the proceedings that took place upon which those claims for breach of privileges are based, he will come to the conclusion that of equal importance to privilege is the right of citizens to petition. The first petition that all of us know—certainly it is familiar to all of us who are schooled in common law—lays out the substance, style, and, in effect, the direction of the petition, and that is the Magna Carta of 1215. The very first chapter of that petition contains a recitation of names. It goes on to deal with the substance of the complaint at great length. So, for Senator Simard to suggest that this House should not listen to petitions—

Senator Simard: That is not my point.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps you can make your point a little more clearly. If I took it out of context, I apologize.

Senator Simard: I accept your apology. Earlier we had an exchange with Senator Frith. I had understood that the recording of the proceedings would be done in a certain way. One thing I had understood was that senators would decide how to present the petitions, whether to read everything that was in the petition, including names, postal codes, phone numbers, and so on, and, if they did so, Hansard would delete the names that they heard. That is what I am questioning and what I cannot accept. Anything that is spoken should be recorded, not left to the whim of Senator Frith or other people in this house who may think they will decide what will be put in the record. That is my point of order.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz has made the suggestion, and it is consistent with page 57.

Senator Simard: What is page 57?

Senator Kenny: Did you not hear what your colleague said?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I did not get into the propriety of reading the names. I appreciate what they are attempting to do and what they may have the right to do. I discussed the matter with Senator Frith in the hallway, that it was unnecessary for the Hansard stenographers to take down the names when, in fact, they would not be printed. My understanding of what we agreed was that they would take everything down except the names, but be ready at the conclusion of the reading of names to take whatever came after, whatever was the commentary was; but not the names.

• (0200)

Senator Frith: I understand the agreement is that because our rules provide that a brief statement may be made about a petition when it is introduced, reference will be made to the names and comments made about the petition—not arguments but comments, about where they come from, including comments about names—and that the procedure will be as follows: If, for example, a senator says, "and from this region is included the following names," from that point on the names will not be recorded—

Senator Simard: Who agreed to that?

Senator Frith: —but any comments about them will be taken down; so that, as Senator Beaudoin said, one does not end up with a Senate Debates that just looks blank. That is what I understood. Senator Nurgitz and I had agreed to. That is what I understood; I think it is workable, and I am going to bed.

Senator Cogger: On September 26, at page 2266, Senator Frith said:

> There is no rule against a filibuster. They can talk about almost anything as long as they like, but they should at least change the show. Change the bill of fare somewhat and let us have a filibuster on something else for a change.

I am just pleading for the same thing. I mean, please! Are we going to listen to names and addresses all night?

Senator Austin: I thought you wanted a change.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: On the point of order, Senator Beaudoin has been trying to speak.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to make my point of order in French as I wish to be clearly understood.

I think we all agree that the right to petition does indeed exist and that we all agree that this right has very ancient source in English and Canadian history.

Where we disagree (and I think Senator Frith would concur) is that one cannot simply recite a list of names in the Chamber for five hours on end, knowing full well that those names will not even be reported in the Debates of the Senate.

There is something that goes both against the spirit and the letter of the Rules of the Senate.

[English]

It is against the letter and the spirit of the rules. If it is not against the letter of the rules, it is at least against the spirit of the rules. I want to be clear-cut on this. We may follow what is stated at page 57 but we cannot systematically have names for hours, and hours, knowing that nothing will be recorded for five hours. That obviously is something that is illogical, wrong, and certainly against the letter, or at least the spirit, of the rules. That is all I want to say. But I want that to be on the record.

Senator Simard: What I want to know is, who entered into an agreement. You said an agreement was entered into or agreed to somewhere in the back of the Senate. What is the agreement? Who agreed to this agreement? What is it all about?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: No agreement was entered into. Please be clear. I only raised the absurdity of the stenographers taking the names down when they were not to be printed in either Debates or the journals. When I raised the matter, Senator Frith agreed with me that it was absurd. I then raised it as a point of order some time ago, when I was not in the Chair but sitting over there, and I thought that all sides agreed that the stenographers should not take the names down.

Now, on the point of order that was raised, I am in some difficulty. I would ask honourable senators if they can give me some authority, as I have none. Erskine May on the question of petitions says in the 21st Edition at page 761:

> . . . on the presentation of a petition, may make a statement as to the parties from whom it comes and the number of its signatures.

I am not sure what that means. Our own Rules Committee, in its Sixth Report tabled in the Senate on March 15 of 1988 said, as we all know:

> Your Committee therefore recommends that, in future, all public petitions and the names of the petitioners not be printed in the Debates of the Senate or in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

It then goes on to say:

> Your Committee further recommends the explanatory text under the heading "Presentation of Petitions" in Appendix I of the Rules of the Senate on page 57 thereof be amended to reflect the above recommendations by deleting the third paragraph thereof and substituting the following:

Which says:

> A senator presenting a public petition—which I believe these are:

> makes a brief statement—

And that is another question, I suppose, that could be raised, as to how brief these statements are:

> makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition and the petition itself is not read. The text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto are not printed.

Honourable senators, the next item in the report does not deal with the matters before us, so I will not read any further.

That is not helpful to me and I am not attempting to make a ruling. I am saying that none of this helps me to make a ruling.

Senator Grafstein: We have to be consistent.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Exactly. As a result I do not know what can be done to stop that. Senator Kelly?

Hon. William M. Kelly: This is not on the same point of order, honourable senators. If Senator Molgat has something to add to what is already being discussed, I give way to him, but I would like an opportunity to speak.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I will speak briefly on the point of order. I was not here when the discussion was held between Senators Frith and Nurgitz.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: No one else was.

Senator Molgat: But I understood that there was agreement in the house that that would be the case. If there is no agreement, then, if Senator Simard wishes to have all the names printed, I suppose that decision could be made. However, I understood that it was agreed that all the names would not be printed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I do not wish to make rulings, but I think one cannot even agree to that, because that contravenes the rule. It says "not printed"; so they cannot be printed.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, on that same point of order, I was here during the question that is now being discussed and Senator Nurgitz has just described exactly what took place. The agreement was that the names not be printed in the Hansard, and that was agreed to on this side. Senator Stollery's the one, in fact, who said that he had already been talking to one of the clerks and had pointed that out. The reason the names were being taken was because the stenographer who was taking them was not here during the earlier discussions; but as Senator Nurgitz has just said, it was his suggestion that the names not be printed. I do not think he went beyond that. It was his suggestion that the names not be printed, and it was agreed on this side. So if it is not agreed on that side, it was agreed on this side that the names not be printed; but it never went beyond that.

Senator Cogger: What is the point of reading them, then?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I just want to be clear. Following Senator Lucier's comment, I never asked that the names not be printed. That has never been a suggestion of mine. Someone in 1988 said we cannot do it. I asked because I noticed, as these proceedings started—and I appreciate that we may have many hours, if not days, of this—that the stenographers were taking the names down. That was the difficulty I had. I then attempted to meet Senator Frith, and the only place I could do that was in the hall. I reported on that in the chamber and I think everyone agreed that the stenographers should not take down the names.

Senator Kenny: That was clear, honourable senators. The rule book, page 57—

Senator Simard: Honourable senators—

Senator Kenny: I am speaking to this. I am entitled to speak to it, just like anyone else is. Hold your turn. I have listened to you.

Senator Simard: I just want to know what you are speaking to.

Senator Kenny: The rule book is clear that the names are not to be printed, and you are quite right, Senator Nurgitz. You were simply pointing out that, even though the names were not going to be printed, the stenographer was taking them down, and that seemed to everyone in the chamber at the time to be an unproductive exercise. There is no point in the stenographers taking down the information if, in fact, it is not going to be subsequently printed. So what Senator Nurgitz says is quite true. However, the agreement, or the understanding, or the situation, frankly, is that senators here are entitled to present the petitions the way they choose, and some may choose to do it in a more fulsome way than others, and that is their business. If you want to present your petitions in a more abbreviated form, feel free too, senator. I shall present my petitions in the way I wish to do so.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Might I point out to the honourable senator that when honourable senators present them they make a brief statement; and this question of being more fulsome, I think, does breach the rules. However, I merely point that out; I am not commenting on any that have already been presented.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, may I respond to that? I was not aware of this discussion or the rule that names not be printed, although I understand the question of public inconvenience to print countless names. However, surely, honourable senators, we must come to some different conclusion with respect to petitions. Senator Simard, I think, is correct in a certain sense. How can you have a petition that appears as a basic right of the Senate and right of the citizen to petition the Senate, and it becomes an invisible petition, other than being stacked in some file? I direct this to the Chair, or to honourable senators: How does a citizen know that his petition has been received and that his petition has been presented? How does he know that?

Senator Simard: It will have been presented orally and then deleted from the record. That is completely unproductive.

Senator Grafstein: I am suggesting that the rule appears to be inconsistent with the principle. The principle is that citizens have a right to have their petitions presented. Then we have a rule, on the other hand, which, I think, is inconsistent with the principle that Senator Simard raises. That rule says that petitions should not be printed. We understand the question of costs. We understand the question of public convenience. However, surely there can be another way of ensuring that the citizens' petitions are, first, received, if they are so received, and, secondly, that they are, in fact, presented. I think that what I would like to do, when I deal with my petitions which come from my province—and they are numerous—is at least to raise that as an issue at a future moment and reserve my right, as a senator, to come back and address this issue when there is a fuller opportunity to discuss this point. I agree with Senator Simard: it makes the principle unworkable.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if it is of any assistance to honourable senators, and since no one seems to want to take the lead—let me say that I appreciate that my honourable friends are attempting to do something—please allow me to make a suggestion. Senator Hébert, in presenting his petitions, followed, it seems to me, the spirit and the letter of our rules, and accomplished what Senator Grafstein and Senator Simard are saying. Again, this is not a ruling; but, from reading an example of this in Hansard, I think the procedure followed by Senator Hébert was appropriate. He presented two petitions "of residents of the Province of Quebec concerning . . . ." That is fairly standard. This was a rather long petition, because Bill C-62 amends several bills. Perhaps that is not a very good example. The next several exampled are good ones. There is one from Maidstone in the Province of Saskatchewan, which, I assume, is a small community. That petition would have been tabled, and therefore those people would at least have had a record of their petition. That procedure could serve the purposes of friends on this side, who are anxious to have a lengthier presentation for other purposes; and although some may wish to criticize Senator Hébert, it was done in accordance with our rules and was recorded; so that he achieved the result that everyone seems to want. However, that is for honourable senators to decide.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, a distinction is being made between the right to petition and the official report of the Senate. I agree with you that the right to petition is a sacred right. It goes back at least as far as the British Bill of Rights of 1689. I am in full agreement with that. That is quite clear.

The fact is that the names of the petitioners are not printed, and that is what the Rules of the Senate state on page 57, I do not see how it could be that, for hours on end, those names would be read in the Senate Chamber inasmuch as those names will not be reported in the Debates of the Senate.

• (0215)

[English]

There is something that is fundamentally illogical. If the names are not reported for hours and hours, they should not be read for hours and hours. The rules are clear on this and logic is part of the rules to a certain extent—at least, I hope they are.

Senator Grafstein: I think I have made my point with Senator Simard. However, Senator Beaudoin raises another interesting point. My remembrance of this particular portion of British tradition is not clear, but, as I recall it, the original petitions were to be made in court, the two Houses of Parliament being defined as the high court of the land.

Senator Beaudoin: The highest court of the land.

Senator Grafstein: The highest court of the land. If one historically traces the role of the court, at one juncture the court was politically and judicially influental as opposed to legislative. However, petitions were brought to the court in right of Her Majesty and presented in open court, not being a legal court, but in support of or in aid of Her Majesty's prerogatives, and it was done in open court.

Senator Beaudoin: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: The only way the practice now makes some sense—and I still do not agree that they should not print petitioners' names: but that is a second question—in order for the petition to be presented, they must be presented in open court, which we are doing here, and in order for us to facilitate that petition, the petition must designate on whose behalf the petition is made.

Senator Nurgitz pointed out that Senator Hébert brought some petitions forward from small communities. Perhaps it was so clear to those individuals that they were satisfied that they could be so designated. We would have no right to refuse a citizen who wanted a petition read in open court, which is now the Senate, and wanted the citizen's name designated and the opportunity of hearing the name being presented in open court, since physically the citizen cannot enter the precincts of the court. The only way that the rule makes some sense is that citizens are entitled to have their petitions read in court designated "as a petition from a certain married petitioner."

Senator Beaudoin: Even if it is not recorded?

Senator Grafstein: I agree that we are getting close to some practice that might be helpful. The recording is a designation in Hansard that a petition was indeed made, from a particular locale, by certain individuals. I agree with Senator Simard that is not totally satisfactory, but it allows a citizen to know three things: one, a petition from a citizen's region was heard; and, if the citizen is interested, he or she can come and listen to that petition being presented in open court so that the citizen hears his or her name and the substance of the petition. In our rules we cannot deal with other than a brief explanation of it, so it cannot be argumentative. Finally, there is a repository for such petitions with the Table Officers. They are not discarded and the Senate has a record. It is not a record in Hansard, but there is a Senate record.

To return to my point, I agree with Senator Simard that hopefully we can arrange some type of response to a proper complaint that a citizen is entitled to have his or her name noted when presenting a petition.

Senator Simard: As far as I am concerned, Your Honour, I detected from your statement that you were looking for direction. Are you still looking for direction? I appreciate Senator Grafstein's agreeing with some of my points, but I have two problems. If these petitions are so sacred, perhaps they should all be read and not left to the whim of senators to decide which part will be read into the record. If names, among other things, are read into the record, I object to the fact that they be left out of the record, because the spoken and written records would not match and would not reflect totally what was said. Surely we cannot have one set of rules for one senator and another set of rules for another senator. I do not know how we are going to get out of this box here. I do not know what is more important.

I would hope that the names would not be read, for the reasons Senator Grafstein has stated, because that has been the situation, the convention and the tradition for a long time. The petitions were kept, tabled and stored somewhere else and there was no need to put them in Hansard. If it has worked so far, I do not know why we want to change it. I may be wrong, but one would think that reading all those names is to waste time. I think we should refrain from that, but I am not going to raise any more points.

I would invite Your Honour to summarize and perhaps rule eventually.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, this is not in any way to frustrate the enthusiasm of senators opposite to proceed with business, but it does refer to the question we are discussing, which is the question of what constitutes a petition. I wonder if we could perhaps examine some of the documents that I have here. I realize that I am taking a great risk with Senator Molgat and Senator Austin, and they may catch me cold on this, but my reading of the issue starts with our own rules. Under Part I, Interpretation, it states:

> (m) "petition" means a written prayer presented to the Senate, and includes all petitions whether relating to public or private matters, matters of general policy, or to redress of local or personal grievances;

The operative section is "a written prayer." I noticed that when Senator Hastings presented his petitions he followed a certain preamble that was in the form of a prayer. I noted that the document he presented seemed to go in that direction on all the petitions he filed.

Again, to further the form of the petition, I refer to Bourinot, Fourth Edition, page 234, Section II which states:

> Every petition to the two houses should commence with the superscription:
>
> "To the Honourable the (Senate or House of Commons) in Parliament assembled:"

Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, page 209 has a similar reference. Citation 669 states:

> Every petition should commence with the superscription:
> "To the Honourable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled."

That is an echo of what I heard Senator Hastings do and what I saw on the petition documents he filed.

Erskine May, Twenty-First Edition, at page 754 refers again to the form of petitions and states:

> Petitions to the House of Lords should begin, 'To the right honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled'; and to the House of Commons . . .

In that case, he points out that without a prayer the document shall not be taken as a petition.

On the other hand, I note that the petitions that are presently being presented by Senator Kenny—who is a great friend of mine, so I would not want him to take this personally—would look as though they do not fit the description of an acceptable form of petition that are referred to in Bourinot, Beauchesne and Erskine May. I am not suggesting that this means that they are not valid. These petitions have obviously been collected. People have gone door to door and said, "Do you want to sign this document?" Were they clear on where the document was going and whom they were petitioning? It is not specific, admittedly, but it does say "on the proposed goods and services tax the undersigned petitioners humbly call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada," but that really is quite far off the form that is set out in the references to which I have referred.

I am really suggesting that perhaps this is another matter that needs to be clarified as time goes on, because there can be all sorts of documents that refer to grievances and so on, but there should be some framework within which a petition becomes receivable. We mentioned the history of petitioning, and Senator Frith went on at some length. There must have been a reason in early times for setting this framework, outside of which a petition would not be receivable.

Senator Grafstein: To correct Hansard, I believe in my earlier comments on the origins of petitions I was mistaken in the sense that I indicated a petition for general relief was given in open court as a legislative matter. As I understand a petition, it was the reverse of that. The petition was started as a form of judicial relief in a very narrow cast in court, the court being Her Majesty's court.

Dealing with Senator Kelly's point, if we start with Beauchesne and examine the first explanation of Beauchesne in terms of public petitions, and we are dealing with public petitions. As one of the Table Officers pointed out to me, when we deal with a private petition, which deals with a specific subject matter and a specific remedy, that person's name is, as a question of practice, printed. In terms of a public petition, while it is clear, based on what I have gathered, that names can and should be read, it is not required as a question of practice to have those names printed other than some designation that, in fact, they were treated in the Senate.

If I were to turn to two sources to give some support to this contention, I would start with Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, where he deals with petitions being a basic right and indicates how it started at the very earliest time. Initially it was a judicial remedy rather than a legislative remedy. Petitions were transformed into legislative relief when the Houses of Parliament came into being and grew up as a tradition. He goes on to state that: "Public petitions may pray for an alteration of the general law or for reconsideration of a general administrative decision", and that they also pray for redress of local or person grievances.

• (0230)

I would now like to turn to Webster's Third New International Dictionary. It is interesting to note that "petition" is defined in there after tracing the latin root which is petere, which means to go, to seek, to request, which is consistent with what we talked about earlier, namely, an individual seeking and requesting redress. It goes on to state that it is a supplication, a solemn prayer. It then states, "a bill in the form of a request by which Parliament formerly presented measures for the king's granting." It indicates that they must be in writing and embody a formal request. They must ask for some process to take place.

To my mind that seems to be very inconsistent with the argument that has been made that there has to be a petitioner, a name, a list, and that they have to address themselves to some type of grievance. Essentially, the petitions of Senator Kenny, and those that I have, which are quite numerous, all deal with a specific grievance.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, with respect, Senator Grafstein really has not addressed my point. I am talking about the form of the petition. For example, you mention in your reference formal petitioning. I believe you referred to the word prayer, as do our rules. In other words, you are saying that I cannot send a piece of paper that says, in Senator Buckwold's immortal words, "Axe the tax, Bill Kelly, 530 Laurier Avenue". That is not quite formal enough. There is a long space between that and what we describe here as acceptable forms of petitions in the references I made earlier in Bourinot, Beauchesne, and in Erskine May.

In response to Senator Grafstein, I am not talking about whether or not names should appear. Of course they should appear. I am not talking about whether or not the grievance should be described adequately. Of course it should. I am questioning the framework of the petition and asking: Is there any limit beyond which a perfectly legitimate grievance is not acceptable because it is not in the proper form? That is the point I am making.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, this has been discussed in the past in the Rules committee. As I believe Senator Nurgitz indicated, this matter came before the committee, and here I might again refer, as did Senator Kelly, to our own rules. Rule 5(m) states:

> "petition" means a written prayer presented to the Senate, and includes all petitions whether relating to private matters, matters of general policy, or to redress of local or personal grievances;

Essentially, there has to be a prayer. I agree with Senator Kelly that it cannot simply be a case of letters that we receive. I have stacks of letters in my office on the point. I do not think it is intended that we come in and read letters that we have received. In certain cases they could be considered prayers, but normally they are not. They are simply letters of objection. That is not the objection. My understanding is that the petitions from which Senator Kenny is reading at the moment specifically say, "On the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax." They identify what it is they talk about. They say, "The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax". I would say that indeed is a prayer. It identifies what the purpose is. It identifies to whom it is addressed—the Senate of Canada. It says, "humbly pray." I think even if the words "humbly pray" were not there, I would charge that they could still be a prayer.

I have been advised also that before these irate people, who have been signing these petitions, proceeded they took the text to an eminent authority on the matter of the Senate. That is to say none other than Senator Forsey. It was after consultation with him and on his advice that this particular text was settled upon. So it seems to me it meets the provisions of our own rules and the general purpose which was described by Senator Grafstein of the original prayer.

Senator Kelly: Thank you, honourable senators, that is very helpful. I understand.

Hon. Nancy E. Teed: Honourable senators, very briefly, the definition of a petition, as I read it, is very clear. On page 57 of the rule book it states that the petition itself is not read. That means that the preamble, the prayer, the written names and the words that carry on thereafter are simply an explanation of what the petition itself is. In that regard, I refer to the tabling of the report of the banking committee the other day. It was not read in this chamber. I was here and I do not believe I heard it read. However, it has been printed in Hansard. I must say that I come from another chamber where it was clear and simple. Names were not printed in Hansard; nor were they read into the record. But am I not correct in saying that the petition itself is not read, which that means that the preamble, the prayer and the written or printed names on the petition are not read?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, on that point, once again, there was a lengthy discussion in the Rules committee on this matter. I do not know how many of my colleagues here are members of the Rules committee. Our discussions are generally very lengthy.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: No one will fess up to being on the Rules committee now.

Senator Molgat: I suppose the events of the past week indicate that in future the discussions of those meetings may be even lengthier. One thing that has come out in the past week is that we need to have a review of the rules. There was a lengthy debate on the question of petitions. You will note in the report that nothing is said that the names should not be read. There was some concern about printing, which is something that at times we have trouble with here, because of budgets and because of the problem of receiving the copies of our Debates on time.

I am sure all honourable senators will agree when I say that we like to come in each day to have the Debates of the previous day on our desks. There was the concern that if we printed all of the names, that would delay the Debates, and that what we are looking for in the Debates are the statements made by honourable senators. If we wished to see the specific names on the petitions, we could go to the petitions and find them, since lists are kept. It was that reasoning which guided the Rules committee in saying that we will not insist that they be printed. It was felt that we had to leave it to individual senators, remembering that most of these petitions come from people in the regions that we represent and that we could not have a hard and fast rule that a senator could not proceed with names if a senator so felt because of his particular commitment.

To come to Senator Grafstein's comments, it is the historic right of the citizen to appear in person, if the citizen wishes; to do it by petition, if the citizen wishes; but that it ought to be the ability to recognize that the individual has indeed been heard. It was our view that if a senator wished to read the names, then it would be in open forum as we are here; that anyone can be in the gallery and hear what is going on; that there is a public way for that individual to be heard. That is why we did not put in the rule that the names cannot be read. It was our view that it would take away from the basic right of the citizen to be heard in the highest court of the land—Parliament. We did not put in the rule book that the names could not be read. That is the gist of the discussion, as I recall it, in the committee.

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to respond to these comments. There is no journalist here—there is but one person in the gallery. How do you relate your comments to the present factual situation? The fact is that, rightly or wrongly, it is stated in the rules that the text of the petition and the names of petitioners are not printed in the Debates nor in the Minutes of the Proceedings. We might have reached another conclusion, but the fact is that that was the decision. If it is the case, and it is clearly the case, and if you follow your logic to the extreme, then it would mean that you may read names for a full day and nothing will be recorded. The right to petition is an historic right, I agree; but what is said on page 57 of the rule book is an explanation of the internal bylaw of the Senate. That is what it is. I do not object; but, I would like to have an explanation that is more logical.

Senator Grafstein: I do not want to deal with the senator's latter argument, because I think we have responded to it. However, I would like to deal with the first part of his argument, which deals with having the name read in open court—the Senate. I came in to the Senate at one o'clock this morning, and a young couple came through the door virtually at the same time as I did. They talked to the officer and said, "Could we go into the Senate?" His response was, "Yes, you can. Just go up the stairs." We have not exercised a rule to clear the galleries, as we could. We are here to present these arguments in open court, as it were. It is obviously clear, not only here but in a court of law, that a court of law is not a court of law if the public is prevented from entering it to hear the court's business. That is the case, unless the court finds, as a specific ruling, that it is not in the interests of the individual, or of the public, that the public be present. Usually that is only the case in matters of espionage, treason or high crimes against the state, or respecting children, where the public interest should not be prejudiced or biased. Clearly, we are sitting here in a very strange way in open court.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In addressing the latter point of order raised by Senator Kelly, since no one has raised the question of approving petitions, I would like to deal with it. The second kind of petition that we have is one that is approved strictly as to form. In fact, Mr. O'Brien who is one of our table officers today has, in addition to other duties, the duty of Examiner of Petitions. For example, the form of a petition which ultimately becomes a bill, of which we have many in the Senate, is carefully examined. The report of the examination is made in this chamber. That later becomes a Private Member's Bill, or a bill. In any event, that is one kind of petition.

• (0245)

The authorities indicate that it must have various forms of prayer and other matters in order to be a petition, but does not require a strict examination. I do not know how you do it, because that also would get into the question, I suppose, of their reading the petitions, which the rules say we cannot read.

I believe we all agree that the printing or not printing violates the spirit of what we are attempting to do. Various senators on both sides would agree that it does violate the spirit. That is the rule. Whether we like it or not, it is the rule today.

I am troubled with the fact that the rule does say that the senator may not read the petition. Does that mean that he cannot read the petition or a portion thereof, because that is what we are doing. We are standing and reading a portion of it. It seems to me that it is more a breech of the rules than any other. That is the troublesome part.

Senator Molgat: The wording of the rule is "the petition itself is not read." It does not say that the names are not read. The petition, in our view, is the heading. We specifically did not say that the names will not be read. It was because we felt that this was really a senator's bringing before the other senators a request normally from his constituents. I have much sympathy for what Senator Simard says about the printing of the names. I believe you are right, but it was a question of getting the debates out in time and the question of printing costs.

It may be that there is a way out of this. We will not be able to change it now, and the rule is clear that the names are not printed. In the future, when we are again looking at the rules, we could consider having petitions printed in an appendix to the Debates that would not necessarily be produced on the same day as the Debates. There would be no delay in the production of the daily Debates, which would be accessible to all of us, but there would be a printed text where the names appear. That would not deal with the question of costs, but there would not be a need for the stenographers to take down all of the names as they were read. The printing costs would remain the same. That may solve our problem in the future, but at the moment the rule is clear that they are not printed. I have given you the reasons for it. This is something we should be looking at in the future.

In so far as reading the names, the committee was clear in that regard. That is a matter for each senator to determine, based on the source of the petition and what it dealt with. We deliberately did not put in there that the names not be read. That was a clear decision. There was a great deal of argument in the committee, but that was the final conclusion reached by the committee.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I should like to direct a comment to Senator Molgat, for whom I have a great deal of respect. You might also have put in the rules that the names could be read.

Senator Molgat: Yes, but I understand that if it was intended that it not be mentioned, then it is not excluded. That is the basic rule, but I have to depend on my legal friends such as yourself.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: As I have indicated, I am not making a ruling on it. Proceed and take your time.

Senator Kenny: Thank you, Senator Nurgitz. This has been an enlightening 45 minutes. It was an interesting discussion. I know more about petitions than I thought I would ever know.

You will recall that this petition is from a group of folks who did not much like the GST. They were principally from the Beaverton area. In fact, there were only four people left that I wanted to mention.

(Names of signatories read.)

These people are all part of the IRATE citizens group. I am told that "IRATE" stands for I'm Rebelling Against Tax Excesses.

Honourable senators, this concludes the petitions I have for this evening. I must inform the chamber that I have others that I will be presenting at a later time.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition to the Honourable Senate of Canada, on behalf of the citizens of Canada who asking that the Senate prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the goods and services tax. It seems that 85 percent of Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax. They know it is going to be a detrimental tax.

Some of the names on this petition include Betty Gordon from Buckhorn, Ontario, Donald McFaddle of Lakefield, Ontario. These are people who have had the opportunity over recent months to pay attention to what has happened in this country with the goods and services tax. They have seen the fact that this government is determined to inflict this tax on us at all costs. They object, and they object very strongly. They object in great numbers. Quite frankly, I believe they are bewildered as to why the government insists on committing suicide on this particular issue.

Maureen Webster from Peterborough, Ontario is another name on this petition, another person who is objecting to the goods and services tax; K. Cheesman from Richfield, Ontario also objects to the government proceeding with the goods and services tax and inflicting this tax on the people of Canada at a time when we are being told that there is a recession. It seems as ludicrous to them as it does to the rest of us that we should be inflicting such a tax of seven percent on Canadians when they are in the midst of trying to deal with a recession.

These petitioners are people who are having a difficult time trying to make ends meet, trying to pay mortgages, trying to survive and trying to figure out how they are going to do it with an extra seven percent tacked on top of the problems they are dealing with now.

Senator Cogger: Senator Lucier, would you allow me to ask you a question?

Senator Lucier: Absolutely. In fact you can take an hour if you wish. That is an hour in which I will not have to do anything.

Senator Cogger: I have just a simple question. The rule book says that a senator may present a petition entrusted to him. I realize that Whitehorse is a beautiful city. Have the good people of Peterborough, and various places, entrusted their petition to you? Are you suggesting that you personally received this petition, or was it entrusted to you by another senator or another means?

Senator Hébert is from my own province of Quebec. There have been many petitions entrusted to him. Not a single one comes from Quebec. They are all from Ontario. He is a very popular in Quebec.

Senator Lucier: Senator Cogger, I would be only too happy to answer that question. This petition has obviously been entrusted to me or I would not be standing here with the petition in my hand. It had to be entrusted to me or how would I have it in my hand? I do not want to go through the routing of how it got here. I do not know which mailman picked it up and delivered it to which clerk. I do not have the routing; but it has been entrusted to me. I have it.

I am pleased that you have mentioned the people of the Yukon. I appreciate your comments about the Yukon. It is an interesting place. I would like you to know that the people of the Yukon are in double jeopardy regarding the goods and services tax. They will pay more goods and services tax on exactly the same product than you and your people in this part of the country will pay. They are doubly offended by the tax. It is not a fair tax.

Senator Cogger: I did not want to offend you with my question. Put it down to my suspicious mind, if you like. It seems to me that if I were a resident of Ontario and I was very upset with something, and I wished to bring it to the attention of the Senate, popular as you may be, you would not be the first person who would come to my mind to bring it to the floor of the Senate. After all there are 24 senators from Ontario and a good proportion of them are Liberals and presumably opposed to the GST.

Having said that, please do not be offended. Your popularity obviously extends well beyond the Yukon, just as Senator Hébert is a very popular man in Ontario.

Senator Austin: He is a famous senator. Senator Hébert is famous for his protests.

Senator Cogger: Thank you. You have answered my question.

Senator Molgat: I believe that Senator Lucier has roots in Ontario.

Senator Lucier: I was born in Ontario and spent the first 19 years of my life there. Senator Austin will tell you who is the most popular senator in British Columbia, other than himself. If honourable senators go to the Okanagan Valley and mention the name of Paul Lucier, everyone there will know whom you are speaking about; and, if they have a problem they know whom to come to.

• (0300)

Senator Cogger: Out of friendship, I thought I would help you use up the time.

Senator Austin: May I add, honourable senators, that the people of the Okanagan Valley believe that Senator Lucier is their senator. I would like to ask Senator Lucier a question.

Senator Cogger: I am also informed that he is big in Toronto as well. We might as well go on about your popularity; we have time.

Senator Austin: Following on the point raised by Senator Cogger, I understand that in the Yukon this tax is much more regressive than it is in other parts of Canada.

Senator Lucier: That is correct. For example, the GST will not affect the price of food directly, but it will affect freight. The difference between the price of products in the Yukon and the other parts of Canada is essentially freight. I was talking to Senator Keon about this very point last week. A litre of milk at Hull Beach in the Northwest Territories costs $3.86. Theoretically the price of the milk itself in Hall Beach should be the same as the price of a litre of milk in Edmonton or Calgary, wherever the milk comes from. So the difference between the price of a litre of milk in Alberta at $1.00 and the price of a litre of milk in Hull Beach at $3.86 is obviously the cost of the freight to get the milk there. There are no roads, and it has to be flown in by aircraft. To fly a litre of milk from Calgary to Hall Beach costs a lot of money. So, by putting GST on freight, you are putting it on food, and it is the people who can afford it the least who must pay.

The same applies to a pair of shoes. They do not make shoes in Old Crow. They make the greatest moccasins in Canada, but they do not make shoes. If you want to buy a pair of shoes in Old Crow, they must be made in Toronto. If those shoes cost $50 in Toronto and $100 in Old Crow, included in that price will be the cost of freight.

I know that honourable senators opposite do not like to hear that kind of thing, but I think they should pay attention, particularly those senators who were brought in here specifically to vote for the GST. I particularly ask that of my new colleague, Senator Twinn, with whom I look forward to working, in the future. I can tell you, sir, that even though you have agreed to come here and support the GST, it is an unfair tax for the people of your province as well as for the people of my area. I have a lot of trouble accepting that the Prime Minister of Canada, who is at 9 per cent in the polls in your area, is really worth that much trouble to you.

Senator Austin, that is a brief explanation, and I hope that it will suffice for the time being. If you have other questions, feel free to bring them up.

Senator Austin: I am sorry I interrupted you.

Senator Lucier: I accept your apology. Another petitioner on this same petition is Mr. Bob Nelson of Buckhorn, Ontario. I have not had the privilege of visiting Buckhorn, Ontario, but I am sure that this gentleman is very honest and sincere and that he has taken the trouble to put his name on this petition to object to the goods and services tax that is being imposed on the people of Canada at the very time we are in a very difficult situation because of problems in the Gulf that are causing the price of fuel to rise. The price of everything is going up. We are in a recession, and inflicting a 7 per cent tax upon us at this time does not make a lot of sense.

Senator Comeau: What is your alternative? Do you prefer the manufacturers' sales tax?

Senator Lucier: Absolutely. I think that is a good question. The first alternative is that you do not have a GST. You already have a tax in place.

Senator Comeau: If you do not want the GST, is it because you prefer the manufacturers' sales tax?

Senator Lucier: Another good question. I prefer the manufacturers' sales tax to the GST, along with 85 per cent of the people of Canada. You happen to be of the 15 per cent, but, as I said the other day, it seems to me that 85 per cent of the people of Canada prefer the MST, as it presently exists, to the GST, even though they want the MST changed as well. So when 85 per cent of the people of Canada feel a certain way about a certain issue, they have the right to be wrong, they have the right to say, "In your wisdom, you may think that this is not proper for me, but I think it is." It is the same as if you were buying a car. That car may not be what your neighbour would like, but if it is the car you want, you have a right to buy it. Even if it is a bad deal, you have the right to buy it. That is the case with the people of Canada with regard to the GST.

No one has ever suggested that the MST should not be changed. Experts on the MST appeared before the committee in Vancouver and said that changes must be made to it. They also said that if we are going to replace it, then why replace it with one that is worse than the one we are replacing. So, if you want to change the MST, by all means do so. In the meantime, if you are suggesting that the GST is the answer, you are wrong, and Canadians have been telling you that you are wrong. You have not been paying much attention, but they have been telling you that you are wrong. They have a right to feel the way they do, and they have a right to express that opinion through these petitions.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, to assist the honourable senator opposite, today I received a statement—and I would be glad to send it across to the honourable senator—from Professor Robin Boadway of the Department of Economics, Queen's University. The last paragraph is a short one, and it deals directly with this point of an alternative to the GST. He said:

> The second alternative is to follow the advice of the Carter Commission of almost 25 years ago and have the federal government vacate the sales tax field altogether in favour of income tax revenues. This could be done without the explicit cooperation of the provinces, but at the cost of some short-run disruption to the tax system. However, in the long run, it would result in the federal government maintaining its dominant position in the income tax field (not unlike the United States), thereby contributing to a harmonized system of income taxes and consolidating the ability of the federal government to pursue its redistributive goals.

Essentially, he is saying that we should follow the advice of the Minister of Finance, who said that the first priority in this country should be to make fair our tax system and to harmonize it with that of the United States. But the GST does the reverse of harmonizing. It is counterproductive. The Canadian Tax Foundation, which is well known to many gentlemen opposite as being one of the most respected independent bodies of thought dealing with tax measures, has clearly come out against the GST.

• (0315)

Senator Lucier: Incidentally, the Canadian Association of Public Accountants has also come out with alternatives to the GST. There are many alternatives out there. I think the point still remains that you do not replace something that is supposedly not very good with something that is ten times worse. That is probably something most Canadians can understand, whether they are accountants or not. I have here a list of names of petitioners.

(Names of signatories read.)

Honourable senators, I would like to present another petition to the Senate on behalf of some people who are objecting strenuously to the goods and services tax and are prevailing upon the Senate of Canada to prevail upon the government to stop the introduction of this tax. These people are prepared to take a stand, to put their names on a petition, to present it to the Senate and to have their views known.

This tax does have alternatives. This tax will create very severe hardships for many people in this country.

(Names of signatories read.)

Again, these are people who really feel that this tax will be regressive. It will be very difficult for them to deal with in the years to come. I think they understand better than anyone else that the figure of 7 per cent that is bandied about is not the true figure. That is the starting figure. Everybody knows that the full intention of this government, or any government who replaces it, will be to impose a tax a lot higher than 7 per cent. It will be 9 or 11 per cent in a short period of time.

And this tax will be in addition to provincial taxes. It is a sort of double-barrelled tax on the people of these provinces.

(Names of signatories read.)

Honourable senators, the burden of taxation is being shifted on to the ordinary people of Canada. This is a tax that will increase the deficit. This tax is being imposed at the very time we are told that we are in a recession. This tax makes absolutely no sense to anyone other than to Conservatives, that I know of.

Honourable senators, I have other petitions that I will be presenting at a later time. I believe that other colleagues have petitions to present.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, I have no petitions to present. I have had a conversation with Senator Doody, and in the name of internal economy I think we should make one point. The staff is really being asked to serve unusual hours and repeated shifts. I think we should examine—and I am asking the Table Officers to take this on—wherever possible those things it is not necessary to keep in effect. I will provide an example: The constable outside the door, by administrative decision, has to stand. I do not see masses of people invading the foyer out there. I see no reason why, in cases like that, chairs should not be made available to these people. This point applies to a whole series of sectors. We are comfortable in this chamber—well, we are comfortable to a point. We can ask for glasses of water, and so on, but we should also keep in mind that some of our staff are getting tired. We have simply never prepared our administrative patterns to meet this sort of unusual circumstance.

Senator Cogger: Would Senator LeBlanc recommend to his colleagues the idea that there would be substantial savings by cutting short this filibuster? Why don't you propose a motion to adjourn?

Senator LeBlanc: Senator Cogger, I stood because I felt there was a humanitarian gesture to be made. I think that your present humour does you no great honour.

OFFICIAL REPORT

RECOGNITION OF CALENDAR DATES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, if I may, on the point raised by Senator LeBlanc, I sincerely hope that something can be done in this regard to make it as easy as possible for our staff. As long as we are dealing with these other matters, one in particular concerns me. I wonder if I may speak to the house on it. Do I have leave? This is a different subject.

Senator Austin: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: My point has to do with the Debates of the Senate. As senators know, under our rules we have no choice but to continue, technically, the same day. We are continuing the same sitting day. The calendar on the Table reads Tuesday, October 9. If senators look at the debates for Thursday, October 4, for example, they will see that a large part of those debates took place on another day altogether.

I do not know whether we can ask the staff to do this, but I wonder whether we could recognize, somewhere in the Debates, the calendar dates.

Senator Doody: Who can tell?

Senator Molgat: Well, it may be difficult at times to tell, but it seems to me that we could indicate in the text itself or, possibly, in the index that these proceedings took place on different calendar days. This would make it much easier for senators, when they are going through the Debates, to seek information. It would also facilitate any research that anyone might wish to do in future on the events of the past. I just pass this on as a suggestion.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, if we move in that direction, the next thing we know, people will want to maintain the $153 a day for doing nothing but wasting time, which would be something, I am sure, we would all oppose.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I rise to present petitions. In honour of what Senator Doyle has just said, I regret that he is so bored by this whole experience. I have something before me that I think might relieve Senator Doyle's boredom.

As I was going through these petitions, I observed that several of them originate in Orillia. As Senator Doyle knows, Orillia was the birth place of Stephen Leacock, a man who above all things had a terrific sense of humour. He not only had a sense of humour, but, as Senator Doyle would know very well, he had a great appreciation for the institutions of Parliament.

Honourable senators, I should like to present a petition signed by 675 concerned citizens. The concern is the matter of the tax on cultural, educational and written materials. That is interesting because, after all, Senator Doyle, you are yourself a man of letters.

As I perused the names, I perceived that some of the people who have signed this petition are from Lakefield. As we will remember, Lakefield is where a very famous school is situated. At that school one of Her Majesty's sons, Prince Andrew, attended for a few years.

Senator Cogger: Are you telling us that Prince Andrew signed the petition?

Senator Cools: No, I did not say that at all. I said that many people who did sign the petition were from Lakefield, where Prince Andrew attended school. Going through the areas of Ontario represented by the people signing this petition, I am struck by the number of small towns and hamlets of Ontario that are represented here. I observe names from Gravenhurst, and, as honourable senators know, Gravenhurst was the birth place of Doctor Norman Bethune, who made a significant contribution in China and who, as we all know, has had films made about him. I presume that Senator Cogger has heard of Doctor Bethune.

As honourable senators know, I live in Ontario. Ontario means quite a lot to me. When I was a member of the National Parole Board I had occasion to visit an institution in Ontario to deliberate on some difficult cases. That is interesting, because many of the "inmates" of that particular mental institution were placed there by what are called Lieutenant-Governor's warrants, and they are detained there at the pleasure of the Lieutenant-Governor. Many of them have been declared to be criminally insane. I throw this out because one of the terrific advantages I think these petitions have is that one begins to get a flavour and a feel of the areas they represent.

(Names of signatories read.)

I notice that some people who have signed this petition come from Kingston. As many honourable senators know, Kingston was the constituency of the first Prime Minister of Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald. It is a fascinating town, a very pretty little town. Again, it is an area with which I have some familiarity due to the time I served on the National Parole Board.

(Names of signatories read.)

I would like to put on the record, because some of us may misunderstand these petitions from the IRATE Citizens, that I happen to know what "IRATE" stands for by virtue of the fact that this organization appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in the city of Toronto. "IRATE" is the abbreviation for "I Am Rebelling Against Tax Excess." Perhaps the record could show that "IRATE" is the abbreviated name of that organization.

In addition, as I peruse these documents, I observe that not only do the petitions reflect the geography and the regional nature of Ontario, they also reflect the cultural mix of Ontario. This may be of interest to Senator Cogger. If I may, I will share with honourable senators the fact that the very first name on the first page of this petition is Ruby Pelletier—fascinating.

Senator Doody: Absolutely intriguing.

(Names of signatories read.)

• (0330)

Senator Cools: I should like to present another group of petitions. I prefer to do them in groups rather than individually. I understand that honourable senators on the other side may find the process somewhat boring. Nevertheless, honourable senators, I have the honour of presenting this batch of petitions, which was signed by 880 concerned citizens. These citizens are calling upon the senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

If we can get a sense of some of the people who signed these petitions and who are exercising their ancient right to pray before us, they include names such as Chris Frederick Marshall, from Delhi, Ontario; Albert Robinson, Port David, Port Perry. There is one from Mary Hamblin, Bracebridge, Ontario and another from Lakefield. I have already talked about Lakefield, but my colleague, Senator Lucier, said that he would like to know some of the names of the petitioners from Lakefield. Here is one. The name is Steven McGrath, RR 2 Lakefield. The postal code is here, but perhaps you do not want the postal code.

Senator Lucier: I could do without the postal code.

Senator Cools: All right. As I proceed, I note that the cultural mix of this country, and the names of the people, cities and streets are quite diverse. Here is one from Frank Cohen, 6062 Burmuda Avenue, Oshawa. I am certain that would at least ring a bell. Many of us here are probably wishing we were in Bermuda.

Senator Lucier: Could you tell us something about Bermuda, please?

Senator Cools: Bermuda is an interesting place. I have not spent any time there at all. Actually that is not true. I have never spent time there, but I recall that I once spent an hour at the airport. Bermuda is, I believe, a beautiful group of islands. It is still a colony, I think. Bermuda is important, just as was Barbados because up to about 40 or 50 years ago, before telecommunications and communication technology became so highly developed, Bermuda was a central communications channels for information moving from the continent through to North America. It used to be an important place. For many people it is still an important place.

It is interesting that you would ask about Bermuda, because Bermuda has no income tax. That is an interesting point.

Senator Lucier: I wonder if they will have a GST?

Senator Cools: Perhaps one day we will be able to find out.

Here is a name I cannot read, but the address is 101 Murray Drive, Aurora.

Senator Lucier: Perhaps that street was named after Senator Murray.

Senator Cools: Yes; it was named after him in advance.

We move along to Peterborough. I forgot all about Peterborough. There are many names from that city. Peterborough is a pretty city on the Trent River. There is Bill McLaughlin from Trent River and Fran Cooper of Peterborough. Fascinating. There is Steven Crap from 2436 Princess Street, Kingston. I believe that was the street where Sir John A. Macdonald had his office. I am not sure of that. My memory could be failing, as one of the senators was observing. Time is advancing and some of our memories are fading a bit here and there.

There is also Mary Maloney from Seaforth—again named after an interesting personality.

As I continue, I find this is fascinating. Here is Tom. I cannot read his last name, but he is from rural route 1 Lionshead, Ontario; and Diana Tetsky from Queenston Road, Cambridge. Cambridge, again is, another interesting place.

Senator Lucier: You do not have the exact location of Lionshead?

Senator Cools: No, I am not familiar with Lionshead. But since I am one of the senators from Ontario, I shall make it my business to visit there some time.

I shall continue with the names: Leonard Brown, Bowmanville, Ontario; Carol Oshkane, Kinmont, Ontario. I forgot about Haliburton. Here is one from Carol Anderson, Haliburton, Ontario.

Here is one from Penetang. It is Rita Charlebois. I had forgotten about it, but Penetang, in addition to being the location of a particular mental institution, is the home of many Ontarian francophones. I find it interesting to visit, because living in Ontario it is not often that we see bilingual signs; but when one drives up around that area one discovers bilingual signs. I find the francophone names interesting. Here is another one, Ginette, Lorette from Penetang, Ontario.

Senator Lucier: Could you read more of the French names.

Senator Cools: I am looking for some. Here is Rita Charlebois, of Penetang, Ontario. Next is an English name. It is Brenda Curry, from Penetang, Ontario. Here is an Eastern European name. I have difficulty with it. It is from Mrs. M. Koechne, from Penetanguishene. This is very interesting. Receiving these petitions is a reminder of where we come from and why we are doing it. For example, from the same part of the world, in Midland and Penetang, here is the name of Lee Rankin from 455 Russell Street. Russell Street may be named after Lord Russell, who knows.

As the French tradition in the Penatang-Midland area is maintained, here is the name of Julian Patineau of 27 Richelieu of Penatang. That is interesting because Ontario has quite a significant number of francophones and many of them are in that area.

Senator Lucier: Including Lucier.

Senator Cools: Absolutely. I had forgotten that. Yes, of course. Some people were questioning your ability to bring forth petitions from Ontario. But you must always affirm your roots. That is important.

Here is another name. This is from Olga Kararege from Lakefield. That is interesting. I hope I have demonstrated that I have carefully reviewed all these petitions and looked into them to see who these people were, where they came from, what organizations they were representing and whom they were representing. I carefully examined everything so as to be sure that these are authentic petitions. In other words, I looked at the handwriting and checked to see that the handwriting was different and that several pages were not written by the same person.

Senator Lucier: But you did not mention what they were objecting to.

Senator Cools: In this particular group of petitions they are calling on the Senate of Canada to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. They are quite forthright and direct about what they are petitioning us about.

I have a few more names. There is M. Miller from Barrie, Ontario. Barrie is another small Ontario town. There is one from R. Howard, Morrisburg, Ontario. Morrisburg is a tiny community. It used to be important a long time ago. There were many United Empire Loyalists there. It is a dying community in a lot of ways. I have another one from Thelma Bach of Williamsburg. I even have someone here from Slater Street in Ottawa. Unfortunately, I cannot read the name. I have one here from someone who does not give an address. His name is Arnold Gross. He did provide a telephone number, though.

I want to give honourable senators the assurance that these petitions have all been read, studied and analyzed to ensure that they are authentic. I should now like to table them.

Senator Lucier: You have more for later do you?

Senator Cools: I have many more, but I shall proceed with those later.

Senator Doody, I hope you have not fallen asleep.

Senator Doody: No, I heard them.

Senator Cools: Thank you.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, it is my honour to make a statement and presentation with respect to a large number of petitions that emanate from the Province of Ontario, which I so proudly represent in this chamber. This is the first time, honourable senators, that I have seen fit to present petitions to the Senate.

Before I deal with the substance of the petitions and the origins of the petitions and the nature of the petitions, I wish to bring honourable senators's attention something that has been troubling me as it relates to the definition of "sober second thought" and the responsibilities undertaken by senators when they are appointed to this place to follow their own conscience. Perhaps senators might forgive me if I take one moment or two to give them the benefit of my own experience about the importance of following one's own path and one's own drummer once appointed a senator, rather than slavishly follow the dictates of the government of the day.

I was appointed in 1964 by Pierre Trudeau. At that time, as the Leader of the Government of the day, Mr. Trudau had declared that he was not prepared to redress the prayer of a petition, a petition I believed was the most important petition that had been received by the government of that day, namely, the petition by Canadian citizens of Japanese descent who had over and over again petitioned this house and the other house to remonstrate against their grievances and seek compensation for the acts taken by the government during World War II and following.

Senator Doyle will recall that his newspaper, the newspaper of which he was the managing editor, The Globe and Mail, was one of the leading advocates in the country for compensating Canadian citizens of Japanese descent for the unheralded and improper acts taken by the Canadian government of the day during World War II and following.

This petition, this prayer for redress, was the subject matter of my maiden speech. I decided that I should advocate this issue even though this petition ran directly counter to the policy of the government of the day and directly counter to the Prime Minister himself, who had appointed me. At the time I decided to immediately take the matter up with him personally and indicate to him shortly after my appointment-virtually after the first caucus-that I felt his position and the government's position on this important matter and this important principle of rights was mistaken. I told him that I intended to use the platform of the senate to remonstrate against him and his rejection of this prayer for redress. I spoke to him privately. I then spoke up in caucus. I then spoke to him privately yet again and spoke up in caucus yet again. In each instance, Prime Minister Trudeau, the Prime Minister who appointed me, said that I was wrong and that redressing this grievance was not the proper course and not in the nation's interest. He further stated that such decision would be unfair, unusual, and unprecedented. It would provoke similar claims. The government, he argued, could not redress all the wrongs of the past. He gave me a series of important cases and precedents that should have convinced me and other Canadians that compensating only Canadian citizens of Japanese descent for those horrendous acts taken by the government during the World War II and following would open a bottomless Pandora's box of historic grievances that would divert the public agenda from pressing matters of the day.

I traced the history of each one of those precedents. I came to the conclusion, after careful study, that each case that the Prime Minister had presented in argumentation to the Canadian public and to the caucus was not fully applicable. I told him privately that a lawyer's first responsibility is to segregate cases and to deal with each case on the facts, based on facts.

I then prepared a speech. I presented that speech to him before I presented it here. He said, "If this is your choice, go forward," yet he still disagreed. I told him that I intended both publicly and privately, within the confines of the party and in this chamber, to pursue the government and his ministers to persuade them to change their minds.

I felt my duty was clear, that if I felt strongly about an issue that was contrary to my government's policy, the proper course to follow was to advise the Prime Minister privately and then in caucus. I then pursued this course publicly in this place. My maiden speech was given on that subject.

That speech was given in 1984, months before Prime Minister Trudeau resigned. Senator Austin is here and as a member of the cabinet he will recall this episode. Just before Mr. Trudeau resigned, the government did propose that partial apology and aggregate payment be made to a charitable institution for citizens of Japanese descent, which I felt no way shape or form dealt with the issue of the damage to the rights of those Canadian citizens of Japanese descent who had lost their freedom and their property without due or adequate compensation.

Senator Austin: Senator Grafstein, are you suggesting that, just because the Trudeau government listened to the petitions of the Japanese Canadian Community and began a process of redress, that the petitions you have that are relevant to the GST will be listened to by the government?

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate your question, Senator Austin. The point I am trying to make to senators opposite is that the petition I made to my own government was not heeded.

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Nurgitz: I think that is the point Senator Austin was trying to make, namely, that the petition you presented to your own government was not heeded.

Senator Grafstein: And I criticized my government and my party in this place when they were in government. I stood up in my place and all senators that were there at the time will recall that I criticized my government, the government that brough me here, and the Prime Minister who had appointed me to this place, on a particular issues where he had taken a careful and deliberate decision against redress.

The point that I am seeking to make in raising these petitions against the GST is that it is open to all honourable senators not to listen to the conventional wisdom of the day but to follow their own conscience based on their own analysis.

To conclude this preliminary comment, I wish to say it was not a Liberal government that brought in an appropriate redress, it was the government of Mr. Mulroney. It was the Conservative government that brought in that redress. Senator Doody will recall that I would periodically stand up in this place at least once a month to remind Prime Minister Mulroney of the promise he made in the 1984 campaign to provide redress. Month after month I stood up alone—there was no one else in this chamber who regularly reminded the government of their election pledge.

Senator Doody: Only one senator is allowed to stand at a time.

Senator Grafstein: I understand that, Senator Doody, but no one else chose to rise after I had spoken or before I had spoken to deal with this issue.

Finally, not as a result of my efforts alone but as a result of many, including efforts on the other side, the government of the day finally brought complete and fair justice to those Canadian citizens who were so unfairly treated at the hands of their Canadian government.

When I rise on these petitions—and this is the second substantive petition—I hope honourable senators opposite will take into account what I considered to be the role of each senator, and that is to look independently, carefully and fairly at public issues based on the merits and based on the facts. Clearly, the weight, the substance and the quality of the petitions with respect to the proposed tax on goods and service presented by the Canadian public, is overwhelming. Academics, the Canadian tax foundation, and other expert specialists, indeed wherever you turn, in addition to thousands of ordinary Canadians, have the same prayer to the government: "Withdraw the GST, withdraw the GST, withdraw the GST."

Honourable senators we have received a series of many lectures from the government about the cost changing direction. What would be the appropriate course and what has been the appropriate course by previous governments when ministers of finance, with good conscience, put forward tax measures that were found to be unworkable, unfair and unreasonable? It is not that the principles were incorrect, but that the implementation of the principles were so unfair, chaotic and costly that the government withdrew.

Let me give you some examples before I turn to these petitions, because experience should be helpful. The first example that I recall full well—and Senator Stanbury is here and he will recall this as well as I—concerns the infamous first budget by Walter Gordon. It involved the three whiz kids, two of whom were friends of mine, namely, the late Geoffrey Conway, and Martin O'Connell. I forget the third name, Senator Stanbury.

Senator Stanbury: I do, too.

Senator Grafstein: There was also another gentleman. The minister of the day, the late and great Walter Gordon, felt that he would not get proper or adequate advice from his advisors, so they prepared a budget. The principles were immaculate and sound. The principles were fair and reasonable, yet when it came to the mechanics and the implementation, they were disastrous and counter productive. What did Walter Gordon do? He withdrew the budget and then resigned.

There is also the experience of the Benson budget. Again the principles were correct. There had to be fairness and capital gains. When it came to the implementation, and when you looked at the budget documents and saw the havoc they were causing, and the lack of harmonization, what did the minister of the day do when he was remonstrated? There were petitions from the business sector and the general public. The public was outraged against the budget. Why did he withdraw it? It was not because the principles were not correct. Indeed, many years later these principles were adopted in some form or other. He withdrew them at the time because the public would not accept these measures and he understood, as Walter Gordon understood, that tax measures must be not only fair in principle but be perceived to be fair. After all, we have a voluntary system of providing tax revenues to this government. This is not a police state. People have to voluntarily make their returns. The acceptance and implementation of the principles are as important as the legislation itself.

That is not all. We have another lesson. The third lesson is to be found in the Allan MacEachen budget of 1980. Many of his principles were adopted by Mr. Wilson in his first and second budgets. They were correct in theory, but in practice and in implementation they were chaotic, unfair and counter productive. In effect, in some respects they did not achieve the objective they set out to achieve. Again the government retreated and withdrew certain measures.

The reason I bring this to honourable senators attention is that when I look at the names of the communities in these petitions from across Ontario, they are not just from metropolitan Toronto, the region that I so proudly represent here. This is a roll call of "small town" Ontario, the backbone of Ontario, which until recently was the heart of Toryism in the province. From Ottawa in the east to Sarnia and Grand Bend in the west, to Baysville and Orillia in the north, the whole heart of mid- and southwestern Ontario is included in these petitions. Town after town and citizen after citizen from every walk of life say over and over again to the government, "Withdraw the GST."

Senator Cogger: How many of them do you know?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger has asked me how many of these people I know. I would have to go through them all to tell you how many I know. But I can say this to you: I was born in southwestern Ontario. I spent my youth there and I went to high school and university there. I travelled to many of these towns during my university years. In the practice of law I practised in most of these communities as councel. In addition to that, as a member of the Liberal Party, through a number of provincial and federal campaigns, I had the opportunity to travel yet again aside from my business activities. I think I know southwestern Ontario, this part of Ontario very well. The addresses, the streets, are very familiar to me. We have people from Walmer Road in Toronto, from Morrisburg, from Williamsburg, from Ottawa, and from Russell, Ontario. These individuals represent the very heart of the engine that drives the economic growth of this country. These petitions are from hard working, decent, ordinary Canadians, the ordinary Canadian that John Deafenbaker appealed to. I see Senator Cogger listening intensely bemused, perhaps.

• (0345)

John Diefenbaker would never have brought forward such a tax measure. Why? Because he wouldk know, as the Conservatives in Ontario know—which is why Tories in Ontario object to this tax, as do the NDP and the former premier of this province—that this tax is regressive. That is why Canadians in all walks of life—many for the first time in their lives—decided they would sign a petition to this place. This is a petition to the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

As I said, I have in my hand at least 700 to 800 petitions. I will now take the liberty to read you a few of these names and try to give you a geographic spread to indicate that this is not just a City of Toronto petition; this is something that has spread willy-nilly into every nook and cranny of the province in a way that we find amazing. Senator Cogger asked if I know many of these people. No, I do not, but I am amazed, as he should be, that these petitions come from Canadians living in every part of Ontario.

I have names of petitioners here from Toronto, Ontario; Williamsburg, Ontario; Morrisburg, Ontario; Williamsburg, Ontario; Toronto, Ontario; Ottawa, Ontario; Russell, Ontario; Ottawa, Ontario; and Stittsville, Ontario—a town that was in the heart of old Toryism—remonstrating against this tax. I have others from Iroquois, Ontario; Williamsburg, Ontario, and a family from Ottawa, Ontario. We find that lower middle class families are not hit passively by this measure, but are ravaged by this measure. Evidence is emerging that this measure is regressive to that element of society that all of us have depended upon—the hard-working, lower middle-class Canadians who make our presence here viable with their tax dollars. They are the ones who go to work each day, pay their taxes and monthly bills, build their houses and repay their mortgages. They are not on welfare. We are talking about the very foundation, the very sources of the tax system remonstrating against this tax.

Senator Lucier: I wonder if Senator Grafstein would entertain a question. I think most of the petitions you are reading from, senator, were gathered before it was officially announced that we are into a recession. I wonder how the people who signed those petitions objecting to this tax before the recession will feel about it now that we are in a recession. Would you have any opinions about that?

Senator Nurgitz: Could we find out first if Senator Grafstein has ever met with them?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger would like to examine the list of Tory supporters who are petitioning against this devastating bill. Is that satisfactory?

Senator Cogger: Thank you.

Senator Grafstein: Almost every Sunday morning in Toronto I ride a bicycle to another part of Toronto to have breakfast at 7 or 8 o'clock. I go to Chinese restaurants, coffee shops, bagel bars and Ukrainian bakery shops. That is my way of keeping in touch on Sunday morning. Many people know I am a senator, but many people don't, because I don't wear my Senate pin. But, Senator Nurgitz and Senator Lucier, over and over again these people, joined by the barber at the Toronto Adelaide Centre, the doorman at the Four Seasons Hotel, and the waiters at Shopsy's—I can go through a whole list of individuals—tell me to stop this bad tax. I will give you yet another example of a government supporter of yours.

Senator Nurgitz: Senator Lucier asked about the people referred to in the petition. We know Senator Fairbairn distributed the petitions, and there is nothing wrong with that.

Senator Grafstein: These petitions were not distributed to me by Senator Fairbairn. This is a package I received from another source. Honourable senators opposite are smiling about this, but I didn't have room in my office for all the petitions that have been flooding all the senators' offices. In order to ensure that these petitions reached the floor of the Senate, it was decided by wiser heads than mine that they would be collected and organized by provinces because they are coming from all across the country.

Senator Nurgitz: But we don't know if your barman and all these other people you meet when you are on your bicycle are on your petition.

Senator Grafstein: I am trying to make the generic point—

Senator Nurgitz: All your points are generic, Senator Grafstein.

Senator Grafstein: The macro point, as opposed to the micro point. I will give Senator Nurgitz a specific example.

Senator Molgat: I wonder if Senator Nurgitz has received any petitions.

Senator Grafstein: Have you received any petitions, senator?

Senator Nurgitz: Not formal petitions. We did not send any out. Senator Forsey was out of them when I phoned.

Senator Grafstein: I was not sending them out or instigating them in any way, shape or form.

Senator Nurgitz: Not to be facetious, the point I was making is that Senator Lucier wanted to know if those same people you were referring to in the petitions would feel angrier or less angry or about the same. Since you have never met them, you would not know.

Senator Grafstein: You are asking for direct information and I want to give you a direct example, which should be of interest to members on the opposite side. I know a gentleman, who is also known to one or two of you opposite, who is a successful, middle-of-the-road businessman. He is under 40 and has created an empire for himself. He is in the hotel business. He is successful in this country and in other countries as well. He ran into me this past week—and we have not exchanged more than niceties over the years—and he was very interested in what we were doing in the Senate. I asked him, not in order to direct the conversation, what his reaction was. He told me to keep it up. When I asked him "Keep what up?" He told me just to keep it up. He wanted to tell me how he felt about this tax. He has already spent in excess of a quarter of a million dollars to convert his company, which provides valuable services, to the GST. He said he will probably have to spend many times more for the capital costs, the software, the calculators, the computers, and so on—aside from the costs of internal and external accounting.

Senator Lucier: He is becoming a collection agency.

Senator Grafstein: He told me to kill the tax. He said he can write off what he has spent so far. He said to kill the tax. He said it is a bad tax and doesn't harmonize our business activity with competition in the United States.

He is not a supporter of the Liberal Party. As best I know, he has never contributed to the Liberal Party. He is a successful businessman, and, as I say, I will get his consent to use his name which I will be glad to pass on to members opposite. He made a spontaneous request of me. I asked him how he felt about the Prime Minister's argument that the Senate does not have the democratic legitimacy to stop a money bill. That has something that has bothered me, Senator Nurgitz. I mentioned this to my colleagues. He said that, as best he understood it, the Senate is in the Constitution. Senate powers were there in 1982 and the powers are still there. I said that had been my argument. He said it is there, which means it is a legitimate chamber of sober second thought. I have absolutely no quarrel with that. This tax measure is devastating. He said he is going to have to lay off people at some time—to your point, Senator Lucier—when he thinks we are in a recession, on the edge of a depression. He says he now has to cut back and chop people. He told me how much, as a businessman, he hated doing this.

This spontaneous plea from a well known reputable businessman is not the only plea we on this side have heard, and I believe, senator—and please do not respond to this—that you on that side have received exactly the same pleas. He said that we should be able to deal with something that is not only unpopular but counter-productive. It is not going to accomplish the things that Mr. Wilson, who is trying to do a good job, is setting out to do, which is to make it tax neutral. He said it will not be tax neutral. He said that this tax will not facilitate a harmonization between Canada and the United States, that it will cost us jobs, people and services to the United States. He said this tax will intensify the acceleration of services to the south. "Stop this tax. Earn your money," he told me.

Honourable senators, that does not come from the average Canadian, it does not come from the people who have written these petitions, it comes from a successful businessman, and he is not alone. Last Sunday night I went to a wedding and I was surrounded by several of Senator Eyton's friends, who are my friends as well. They were absolutely outraged at what has happened to the economics of Canada. One specific person said that for the first time in his life—and Senator Eyton will get a letter from our mutual friend on this point—he was thinking about changing his domicile. This is a third generation Canadian. I went to school with him. He is a successful and outstanding businessman. Like his grandfather, and father before him, he has built up a magnificent business in this country. He told me that something is out of whack, and, if you can believe it, he said he is thinking of changing his domicile. The tax is not right. It is like the last straw. The system is cracking. The country is cracking.

Honourable senators, these are not petitions; these are cris de coeur; these are cries from the heart of ordinary, average Canadians, cries from the hearts of entrepreneurs who have made Canada grand. You see them flow from every town in Ontario: Morrisburg, Winchester, Iroquois, Westville, Winchester, and the list goes on and on. Even from Grand Bend, which is one of the great resort areas of the province, there are a dozen names. Here is one from Kitchener, Ontario. Here is one I do not understand. Perhaps it should be excepted. It is from East Detroit. I don't know what it is doing here. I have more from Unionville, Green Acres, Grand Bend and Clearwater. These were Tory towns at one time, Senator Cogger.

Senator Nurgitz: Not East Detroit.

Senator Grafstein: I accept that. I want Senator Cogger to know that I will delete that name because it is not appropriate, even though, under the rules, we are able to receive alien petitions.

Senator Molgat: You mean those were Tory towns.

Senator Grafstein: I will deal with that because I think it is an important issue. There is a grand tradition of Toryism in Ontario. My late father-in-law, may he rest in peace, was a Tory. He was a bagman for the Tories. Ten years after he passed away there was a newspaper article talking about him raising money, as though he were still alive. I came from a Liberal tradition. When I first came to Toronto and he introduced me to Toronto politics and told me how things worked in Ontario. He told me there wouldn't be a Liberal government in this province until hair grew on the palm of his hand. He passed away before the Liberals took power in Ontario, but I can tell you that I was witness—I am sorry that Senator Kelly is not here—to the grand tradition of Toryism in Ontario. Yes, I was a Liberal and fought against Conservatives in campaigns, but I always respected the fact that they represented—and still do represent—a fine, solid and responsive tradition in Ontario. There is nothing, in my view, for a Conservative to be ashamed of. I do not believe in many of the principles that motivate or energize the Conservative Party in Ontario, but I certainly respect their members and I respect the contributions they have made to the growth and development of Ontario.

Senators opposite are familiar with the political demography of Ontario. I was born in London, Ontario. The first campaign I participated in was when John Robarts ran as an alderman in London, Ontario. I must say that I passed out pamphlets against him, but he won by a few votes. So I have some history as a witness to the deep roots of Toryism in Ontario. John Robarts would be turning over in his grave today if he saw these petitions rolling in from his towns. There are petitions from Thamesford, Ontario; Cambridge, Ontario; and Sarnia, Ontario. Town after town, which were once the heart of Toryism, are now remonstrating against this tax. There must be some substance to these petitions if you are a Conservative.

Honourable senators, I held back my own view about this tax until several weeks ago. Senators will forgive me if I remind them that last June I indicated to our caucus I wanted to see the report before I made up my mind.

Senator Nurgitz: So did we.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I approached the proposition of dealing with this bill in a careful way. I sought advice on the substantive part of it as to whether or not we in the Senate, in fact, had the conventional and constitutional powers to deal with the tax measure. I have satisfied myself that we can. I then got into the substance of the bill by reading a number of the briefs that were presented to the Banking Committee. I read them as they came in—20 or 30 of the 400 that I collected—with some sort of random examination, and then I carefully read the report and went back to some of the briefs. I reluctantly came to the conclusion that this bill was unfixable.

I understand that the Canadian public, the supporters of the traditional parties in this country—and this is an important issue for Liberals and Conservatives—who voted for Tories on one occasion and Liberals on another, and who would never have thought of turning to a third party, are being driven from both our parties as a result of this tax measure. The metropolitan area of Toronto is an inch away from a tax revolt, and I fear something even greater, more dangerous. People are fed up. That is why area after area and town after town signed petitions in such profusion.

How many times have we had a petition stuck in front of us on a main street and brushed by them? These petitions not only include the towns and names, but these petitioners have carefully written down their addresses. Senator Cogger and Senator Nurgitz, these are not anonymous people. If I know a dozen of the 900 names I have in my hands, it may not be a great number, but these are legitimate people. They are not hiding. They are saying to me that if I have some concern about my position as a senator, or any doubts about whether I can turn down a money bill, that this is an extraordinary time—returning to Senator Lucier's comments—in economic terms. By the way, no one sees a light at the end of the tunnel. We are not going to get out of this recession, or worse, depression, in the next six months. This is not a six-month situation. We see that the NDP are up to their usual games in Ontario. They are exaggerating the deficit in Ontario to make their task easier. Why are they doing this? They are doing it because they recognize that times are tough. They want to be able to foreclose the voices within their own caucus, promises to their own supporters, and say that they don't have any money.

So, honourable senators, these heart-felt petitions, which I would like to continue to read, are not superficial. They are substantive because of the names, addresses, regions and towns they represent.

Despite my outbursts from time to time with Senator Beaudoin, I have great respect for men learned in the law. When I graduated from university I intended to go to Osgoode Hall, but the registrar of Western Ontario said to me, after I received sufficient credits for my BA in two years, that she was not going to let me graduate because I had not put in three years. I informed her that I had completed all my courses and I was in a hurry. I said I wanted to go to law school, Osgoode Hall, so that I could come quickly back to London, Ontario, to practice law. She told me I had all my credits, but I had to put in a third year. But she said she would give me my degree if I did two things: go to summer school and take one course and get a D or better, and go to Toronto to visit the greatest legal mind in the country. She wanted me to tell him that I wanted to go law school and seek an interview with him. I asked who this fellow was, and she said, Cecil "Caesar" Augustus Wright. He was then one of the great law reformers of his time. I didn't even know there was a University of Toronto law school. I was a small boy from a small town anxious to get back to London to practice law.

She told me that "Caesar" Wright was born in London, had gone to my high school, and had a warm spot for any London boy.

So I took my old jalopy and went to visit "Caesar" Wright in Toronto. When I entered his office, he reminded me of Franklin Roosevelt. The room was filled with smoke. Down the hall were Bora Laskin and Albert Abel, who were also great law teachers of my generation.

After the smoke cleared a bit he looked up and asked me what I wanted. I said I was there because the registrar had told me to come and have this interview. I said I wanted to get back to my home town of London, Ontario, get my degree and enter Osgoode Hall, because its course was four years as opposed to five years, and I was in a hurry. He told me to sit down and he proceeded to give me a course on what the law should be, not what the law is. From that time until the date of his death he was a mentor of mine. But those three great men, Bora Laskin, Albert Abel and "Caesar" Wright taught one thing over and over again: If you want to be a great lawyer, facts first. Don't listen to what people say. Examine the facts. What are the facts?

Senator Doody: Which petition is this now?

Senator Grafstein: I will come to that in a moment. So, honourable senators, I have tried to examine, as best I could, the facts as they relate to the GST. By the way, there are good arguments on both sides. Ultimately you have to examine the facts and the consequences of those facts. I believe every senator should take his dossier in the next month or so—because we don't know how long it is going to take to get out of this debate—and examine the tax in the way, Senator Beaudoin, that "Caesar" Wright taught that every lawyer—and this place is full of lawyers, perhaps too many—should! Examine the facts. The facts are so unequivocally clear that this is a devastating tax to the people who pay the bills, who pay our pensions and our salaries and who are the consumers who work and make the great engines of the corporations of Ontario operate.

They are petitioning us. Let me continue: Grand Band, Brantford, Morrisburg, Chesterville, Richmond, RR No. 1 Dashwood, Stratford, Windsor, St. Thomas. St. Thomas is the home of that great premier, onion farmer, and great spokesman for the little people, Mitch Hepburn. I am sure that Senator Stanbury will remember from his history books what an extraordinary event it was when Mitch Hepburn became Premier of Ontario. Down the way was Brantford. Who was in Brantford?—the father of Bob Nixon, the last Liberal Premier before David Petersen. Yes, this old Ontario. Each one of those areas is now petitioning, not the House of Commons but the Senate.

That brings me to a basic point that has been argued on the other side. Why is it honourable senators—and this goes to the fairness of the Banking Committee—that all of these petitions are directed to us? Did we instigate these petitions? No we did not. Why is it that all of a sudden the Senate is being petitioned? I talked to Angus Reid last week. I asked him whether he thought we were on a perilous course here. Will the Senate be able to withstand this perilous course that we are entering into, because some people believe that we are taking away, undermining the democratic house? Angus Reid, a respected pollster who has been following the Senate's popularity, said that we were on very safe ground because it is not so much that people have lost respect for the Senate in recent years but that the House of Commons is slipping in public opinion because it has not been representing their views. So they are turning to us as a measure of safety and security, as the chamber of "sober second thought."

Senator Buchanan, who is a new senator, should be interested in this because he will have to go back and justify to his constituents the position he has taken here. Personally I welcome him to the chamber because of the long experience he represents. I want to say to him that I do not in any way, shape or form count myself with that group of people who have made scurrilous, unfair attacks against them. Having said that, we find ourselves, as Angus Reid has pointed out, in a situation where the House of Commons has fallen into disrepute. People are watching every night on the tube and it has never received greater exposure. Why is it, despite able men on both sides, that this is happening? There are able, decent, hard-working men in the Conservative cabinet.

Senator Lucier: And ladies.

Senator Grafstein: I don't like it when people attack public servants. I know the sacrifices they have to make. I chose not to run for public office because I was not prepared to make the sacrifices that those in elected life have to make. So I took up this safer haven here in the Senate. Having said that, I have seen the personal and family sacrifices that public figures who go through the elected process have to pay. I know the ravaging effect it has, having watched from the vantage of a number of federal and provincial campaigns for over 20 years until recently in Ontario. I know the real cost. I can recall a number of senators here whose lives were unfairly ravaged because of the onslaught of the media, and I know the price they had to pay for a few moments of glory. When a man's public career is ripped away from him, it is hard to justify the 10, 20 or 30 years he has spent in political life and watch it disappear in a flash because he has made one or two mistakes. I am sympathetic to that situation.

We know the sacrifices that elected officials make. Senator Stanbury knows. He is one of the great presidents of the Liberal Party and one of the great reformers. Jack Austin knows it. Why is it, after all the sacrifices that have been made by the politicians in the House of Commons, the hours of work they have put in that that institution is held in such low repute? Why are they turning in desperation to the Senate?

I have a complaint. I am proud of the proposition, but it is incorrect, that is being made by Senator Murray and others in the Cabinet, that the country is still being dominated by the Trudeau Liberals. Personally I am proud of that designation because Pierre Trudeau served this country honourably and well. However, it is misdirected toward me because I did not come into the Liberal Party because of Pierre Trudeau. As Senator Cogger knows, I was a member of the Liberal Party before Pierre Trudeau. I consider myself to be a Liberal.

Senator Cogger: He used to get Heward Grafftey's mail.

Senator Grafstein: Exactly, and others as well. Senator Cogger and I came to politics about the same time, and we have been bumping into each other over the past three decades. I turn to honourable senators opposite and ask: Why is it that Parliament has fallen into disrepute? I don't have the answer. We know the facts, and they have been pointed out by Angus Reid. What does he conclude? He concludes that the reason we are on legitimate ground to receive these petitions, and to do as we will, is not because we are representing the democratic will of the public, but because people have no other place to turn to. What a shocking condemnation of the democratic process. There is a fabulous book entitled The March of Folly, a history written by Barbara W. Tuchman, a great historian who is well known to all of us. If you read her book, you may find why it is that the House of Commons has fallen into disrepute. By the way, I don't exempt Liberals from that criticism. I am not suggesting that that is the reason why the House of Commons is down in the public mind and the Senate is up.

According to Angus Reid, 10 to 20 per cent of the population would like to see the Senate stay the way it is, 10 to 20 per cent would like to see the Senate abolished and about 60 per cent would like to see the Senate continue its activities in a somewhat different form. So close to 80 per cent of the public want the Senate. They are not talking about an elected Senate. They are turning to this institution, which has sometimes been called a "moribund appendage", and saying "Boys and girls, do something." Why? Barbara Tuchman talks about misgovernment in her book. She lists some of the keys to misgovernment. For example, she refers to tyranny and oppression. I don't think that pertains here. She refers to excessive ambition. That might be the case. She refers to incompetence. That might be the case. However, the one I find most compelling is the one dealing with folly or perversity, which she describes as the pursuit of a policy contrary to the self-interest of the constituency or the state involved. Self-interest is whatever conduces to the welfare advantage of the body being governed. In these terms, folly is a policy that is counterproductive. People are turning to us through petitions because of the "march of folly" in the government.

Senator Nurgitz: What about the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois?

Senator Grafstein: Let us deal with the Reform Party.

Senator Nurgitz: No, no. Why don't you deal with the rise of the Liberal Party?

Senator Grafstein: I am coming to that. I will deal with it, if you like, but later.

Senator Nurgitz: We are not going anywhere.

Senator Grafstein: Right now I want to deal with the Reform Party. I saw something on television last Friday night that scared me. I am sure that if Senator Doyle had seen it, it would have scared him too.

Senator Doyle: "Street Legal"?

Senator Grafstein: It was not "Street Legal", but the news. Sometimes the news is more frightening than "Street Legal." I saw something I found reprehensible and it made me say, "My God, this country is in bad shape." A Conservative member of Parliament—and this relates directly to these petitions and to the Reform Party—got off a plane in Alberta. He was confronted by a group of petitioners who asked him, "Why didn't you vote against the GST?" They were not friendly. It was a miserable and frightening piece of television. I tried to shrug it off. One of the eight new senators is present, and I would like to know what kind of reception he is receiving in his native province. That Member of Parliament had to be escorted under guard of the RCMP to a safe haven in the airport. It was either in Calgary or Edmonton. This was his home town airport. Why? Because people are incensed about the GST, and they were doing their form of petitioning and asking him to explain himself. They said that he didn't represent them, and they described how they felt. For heaven's sake, this is not a matter of conscience; it is a tax measure.

Senator Doyle: Was this last Friday night?

Senator Grafstein: Yes.

Senator Doyle: There was some other frightening news on the television Friday night.

Senator Grafstein: Yes, and I must say that I was not proud of my conduct during those few days.

Senator Nurgitz: That is understandable.

Senator Doody: We accept your apology.

Senator Grafstein: It is not understandable. Honourable senators could have said that their privileges were affected by that conduct, and I would have had to apologize. Again, the circumstances were such that we were stretching the limits of comity. In my view, this country is built on a social contract, an expressible social contract. People do something because they think it is in their interest. They accept things. They go down the right-hand side of the street because they think it is in their interest. They get on the bus at the corner parking lot when no one is watching, but they pay their fare and take their ticket, all because they are law-abiding citizens. Tell honourable senators to go out and talk to people and listen to them. People are outraged over this tax.

The Reform Party's answers are no better. They are simplistic and they are taking cheap shots and demonstrating sanctimonious behaviour. The same goes for the NDP and its sanctimony about this place. For example, Mr. Kaplan is always putting down the Senate on television. Then there is Stephen Lewis with his grand voice; an appointee who likes to put down the Senate. Then we have Audrey McLaughlin promoting the Senate for the first time. That is the height of hypocrisy. So what is the game that the Reform Party and the NDP are playing? They are saying, "A pox on all their houses because they are sticking it to the people." By the way, we will be the beneficiaries of that tactic.

You know, I was not proud of what went on with regard to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee or of the complaints of the senators opposite when they said that the committee was not properly handled.

Senator Nurgitz: You are the master of the understatement.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Nurgitz, I can tell you—even though the hour is late; it is 5 a.m.—that it is important, and you can throw it back at me. I was not happy when I went to caucus and I heard about that report. We were not sitting there giggling and saying that this was terrific. We would have liked the report to come in in a proper fashion.

Senator Nurgitz: What did you say at your caucus?

Senator Grafstein: I can't tell you.

Senator Nurgitz: Did you stand up and say, "We won't do that because it is wrong, because it deprives members of their privileges." Is that what you said?

Senator Grafstein: You know that I cannot respond to that. I think we have to be candid. If comity is to be restored in this place, we do have to have a frank exchange.

However, getting back to my original point, when it comes to these petitions, all senators must understand that these are not ersatz, pseudo-instigated, artificial petitions. They are real, they are important, and they are saying to pull back. What happens if the government decides to pull back on this measure? The MST is being put up there as the great barrier to harmonization. If we pull back, there are other ways to go. The Canadian Tax Foundation has said there are other ways to go, and Boadway has said there are other ways to go. If the government wanted to improve its electoral chances—and I am the last guy on this side to give them any free advice, because you tend to pay for the advice you get—they would be on a better track. However, they are plunging ahead and sticking it to the people with a tax that is so regressive.

The poverty level in Toronto is at $23,000. If your income is below $23,000 in Metropolitan Toronto, you are living below the poverty line. That is devastating. It means you cannot make it from the first of the month to the end of the month. You run out of money about the second or third week and you are scrambling all the time to pay your bills. The average family earns $30,000. How far does $30,000 go with a husband, a wife and two kids? It is below the poverty line. This tax impacts negatively on 46 per cent of the people in that segment of the community. That is what all these petitions are about. These are not fancy, typewritten petitions done on Xerox machines or laser printers by corporations. These petitions are done by people who earn those levels of income, people of "small town" Ontario.

Senator Cogger: May I ask a question. I suggest that the honourable senator take a look at the first petitions that were introduced. You are trying to convince us that people get up in the morning and say, "What can I do to fight this? There is the great Senator Grafstein; I will write to him and maybe my neighbour will write to him." Do you think that we are that dumb? Some of them, particularly those addressed to Senator Hébert, were distributed by the craziest organization in my province. Senator Wood may know them. We call them Les Bérets Blancs. They are the people who go around with the white berets. They publish a paper called "Vers Demain." They are loonies who knock on doors and drive around in crazy cars with white flags with "Death to Taxes" written on them. I don't mind telling you that they are a bunch of loonies and, for starters, that they are a bunch of anti- semites. These people are using Senator Hébert as their spokesman, and you are standing on the floor of the Senate and telling us that you guys are the saviours of the population while we inflict nasty things on the people. Come on, Senator Grafstein! Level with us! Not a single one of those petitions was received by you in your office. The petitions that Senator LeBlanc will deliver in a few minutes were delivered by someone.

Were they not Senator Stanbury?

Senator Stanbury: They certainly were.

Senator Cogger: Senator Stanbury told Senator LeBlanc that the petitions were on his desk. Are we supposed to believe that the good people from the nice little towns of Ontario are getting up in the morning and saying, "Thank the Lord for Senator Grafstein. He will stand up for me in the Senate." Come on!

Senator Grafstein: Allow me to deal with Senator Cogger's point. As lawyers we both know that one can examine ex-parte evidence and determine whether or not on the face of it there appears to be some legitimacy to it or it appears to be illegitimate. When examining these petitions you must ask yourself some questions, such as: Is it all typed out? Are all the signatures the same? Are the names duplicated. Have people put in their names and addresses? In other words, there is a way of determining on the face, page after page, whether the petitions are legitimate. I don't deny that special interest groups sometimes abuse the system. We saw in the last election special interest groups using the system to great effect. However, there is always extraneous evidence. What was it that Cromwell said? I am not of his persuasion, but allow me to paraphrase a piece of advice he gave Parliament when he felt that it was going in the wrong direction and was heading for revolution, "Honourable members, I beseech you, from the bowels of Christ, to contemplate the possiblity that you may be mistaken."

I say to you, Senator Cogger, that maybe that extraneous evidence that we have received paints the right picture. Let me add it up for you. It is not just these petitions, although they are very cogent to me. I have been involved in many political campaigns, and when I see page after page with separate names and addresses and the names of every small town in Ontario, I have to say that there is something here. However, that is not enough. It would not satisfy me and it should not satisfy you. Let us just look at it as one level of proof.

Senator Cogger: Senator Grafstein, you have convinced me that people don't like taxes.

Senator Grafstein: It is more than that. It is not that people don't like taxes. Canadians pay their taxes regularly. I believe I once saw an analysis of countries in the Western World and the habits of their populations with regard to paying taxes. I believe that Canada was one of the top countries when it comes to a law-abiding population that pays its taxes. I don't think you can argue that people don't understand what is going on here. People do not like to pay taxes but they have paid taxes in abundance over the years. They pay taxes because they want to get service for their money. They want social insurance. They believe in medicare. I believe in medicare. I know what it is. Some of the older senators will recall the era before medicare. They will recall how family fortunes were crippled by family medical misfortunes.

• (0415)

I was a depression baby. I remember how a households had to be mortgaged to pay for medical services. People had to take their kids from areas around where I lived to Toronto for treatment. The other day I talked to Dr. Keon, for I had heard from friends of mine in Toronto what a great Canadian he is. I was appalled by the median treatment he received, appalled how some of the press had dealt him so unfairly.

Senator Doyle: Not just members of the press but members of this chamber.

Senator Grafstein: Not by me, senator.

Senator Doyle: No, but you mentioned the press. The press deserves a lot of blame, but not for the things that were said here last week.

Senator Grafstein: Doctor Keon and other doctors, great doctors, could march out of Canada and make treble the income they make here. I am sure Dr. Keon could make treble the income if he marched south. There are great doctors in Toronto. One of them, Dr. Bob Filer, is at the Sick Children's Hospital. He is an American and is a great friend of mine. He came to Canada because he likes the academics, he likes the atmosphere, he likes the people, and he likes the medical system. He has marched north because he understands that the public is prepared to pay taxes so that we can have a fair medicare system for all citizens.

Senator Cogger says that people don't like to pay taxes. None of us like to pay taxes, but we do and we do it regularly. Why? Because we believe that by paying taxes we are helping ourselves.

Honourable senators, we are all vertical pronouns. We all believe in "I" first, but we believe that by paying our taxes we are going to provide basic services for people who are less able to withstand the vicissitudes of modern society.

Honourable senators, these are the ordinary Canadians to whom John Diefenbaker directed his heart and his voice. Senator Forrestall is sitting there. He will remember those great days of Mr. Diefenbaker. I was privileged to be invited to sit behind him at his last Conservative convention in Ottawa. Despite all of his problems, he did stand up for the average Canadian. I respected that. I travelled with Mr. Diefenbaker to the Holy Land. It was my first visit there and I think it was his first as well. It was one of the great periods of my life.

Honourable senators, I respected John Diefenbaker. When I first came to Ottawa I read the Globe and Mail and the Star, and I remember what a hatchet job they had done on him. And yes, my hands were not clean, yet we must segregate the cut and thrust of politics from the essence of the man. He believed in the average Canadian. He believed in individual rights, and that is why I respected him. He believed in the Charter of Rights, and that is why I respected him.

Do senators remember his Bill of Rights? Pierre Trudeau would not have brought in the Charter of Rights without John Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights preceding it. I know that. Let the record be clear.

By the way, every—and I shouldn't use this expression, but I will—"smart-A" lawyer said, "Boy, oh boy, that bill of Rights is no good. We are common law lawyers. A charter of rights? Come on, you're in the wrong wicket, Grafstein." I said, "Wait a second. It is going to establish a new standard for the respect of individual liberties." And it was Diefenbaker who did that. He had to convince not just Liberals but Conservatives in his own caucus. The great, intelligent legal minds were saying, "Boy, of boy, you can't do this, John. It won't work. It will only effect federal jurisdiction. It won't have an impact."

Well, honourable senators, it did have an impact. What was that all about? It was all respect for individual rights, for the little guy.

All of us are jaded. We are jaded by success, we are jaded by age. We are jaded by the scars of experience. But sometimes, honourable senators, we have to listen. I listened to these petitions. I read those briefs. I say to Senator Cogger that he should go and talk to the people. Just talk to the average guy. Talk to the guy who is making $35,000 a year, who is living in a small house, trying to keep up his mortgage payments, trying to pay his food bills and telephone bills and trying to take his family to McDonald's.

That brings to mind another Canadian example. George Cohan, the President of McDonald's, one of the great fast food enterprises in the world, not only chose to work in Canada but gave up his American citizenship and became a Canadian. He was brought up in Chicago. I met him when he first came to Toronto. Last week I asked George, "What do you think about the GST?" He said, "I'll send you my brief." I said, "George, I have heard the special pleas from the food industry and from the fast food industry. I know you feel that there is discrimination between the packaged goods business and others." I use his name because he sent me his brief. I asked him whether I could quote from it, and he said, "Here it is. Quote from it."

Mr. Cohan said, "I employ 55,000 Canadians, most of them young people. If this goes through, I am going to have to cut back. Why? Because price points are sensitive. You know what the public is like. I am going to have to cut back. I don't want to cut back. I want to grow in Canada. I came here prepared to grow in Canada."

By the way, honourable senators, George Cohan is also one of the great business pioneers of this country. He launched, after 15 years of hard work, McDonald's restaurant in Russia. The Canadian company, not the American company, established McDonald's in Moscow. That establishment, per square foot, is the greatest revenue-producing restaurant in the world. He is not some bogus individual, Senator Cogger. He is a real Canadian by choice, not like you and me. We were born here. He chose to become a Canadian. He chose to grow a company. He grew it in a magnificent way. His charitable largesse is known not just to this side of the house but to the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister's wife.

I was at a banquet last year where he wrote out a cheque in the amount of $50,000 in aid of the Prime Minister's wife's charity. This is not an inconsiderable Canadian. He is a great Canadian. He is known around the world. He has brought glory to Canada because of his activities. And he said to me, "Stop the tax." That is what he said. Why? "Not that I am selfish," he said, "but I want to employ Canadians. This tax will be a disincentive. I will have to cut back."

Senator Cogger: Can I tell you a story of my own?

Senator Grafstein: Excuse me, Senator Cogger—

Senator Cogger: I just wanted to give you a break for a minute.

Senator Grafstein: Sure.

Senator Cogger: Senator, I would be more impressed if this were the first time. I am younger than you in the Senate, but a similar story is very vivid in my mind.

Back in 1987, when the government introduced Bill C-22, the so-called "drug bill", this was my first experience on a massive piece of legislation facing this side of the house. For months and months we listened to horror stories. We travelled the country under the chairmanship of Senator Bonnell. Petitions came out by the truckload.

And the Liberal Party, not unlike what it is doing today, sensed the public opinion polls. They could see a good thing. The story came out that if the government had the nerve or the gall to bring in Bill C-22, the world would come to an end—the price of drugs would go right through the roof and the pharmaceutical companies would never fulfil their promises in terms of research and development. It was exactly the same scenario. But the government took its responsibilities and passed Bill C-22, virtually over the dead bodies of Liberal senators.

A year or two later, the Drug Prices Review Board reported that the price of drugs had actually decreased slightly, and that the investments in terms of research and development were right on target. So, for all the horror stories we heard from the mouths of Liberal senators purporting to speak on behalf of the ordinary Canadian—

Senator Grafstein: Did I speak during all of that?

Senator Cogger: Did you speak during that?

Senator Grafstein: Did I?

Senator Cogger: I don't know, but if you didn't, you must have been the only one who didn't. Everyone else seems to have.

What I am saying is that what we are living through right now is exactly the same scenario—basically a bunch of Liberal senators purporting to speak on behalf of the ordinary Canadian, riding the wave of public opinion for political purposes, while the Conservative government is taking its responsibility, which is to straighten out years and years of Liberal mismanagement. That's all it is.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger, I will respond as best I can to what I think is an important point. Perhaps we should start again with my own admonition to myself, which is this: Let us refer that legislation to a committee of the Senate. Let us examine it on an objective basis in a committee chaired by a Conservative. Let us examine the cost push on drugs since the passage of that bill.

Let me tell you, senator, that I cannot respond to that issue other than by hearsay. Therefore, much of what I have to say should be discounted. But doctors tell me that it is a rip-off. I can name you one—

Senator Cogger: But, Senator Grafstein, I am talking to you about the first annual report of the Drug Price Review Board. I am not talking to you about hearsay or doctors telling you this or that. You can talk to Senator Haidasz and he will tell you that everything is a rip-off. What about the Drug Prices Review Board? It is chaired by a doctor appointed by the government. I can't remember his name, but he is famous. He is not a Tory. He is a medical authority. What is wrong with that? Does it hurt to admit that a government did the right thing and that the horrible consequences predicted by senators opposite never happened? Does that hurt?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger, I started this speech by indicating that the first and important issue to me as a senator when I first came here was the payment of compensation to Japanese Canadians. The government that appointed me, the Prime Minister who appointed me, and the party that supported me, would not support me in that proposition. I had to wait for four years, when a Conservative government fulfilled the pledge it made in the 1984 campaign.

I am not standing here suggesting that either side of the house is all wise, but let us carefully look at the evidence here and see whether the circumstances are comparable to the circumstances surrounding the drug bill.

By the way, senator, I am not at all suggesting that I agree with your conclusions. I have not examined or studied that report. But I will respond on that at the proper time. I am suggesting that if we are not satisfied with the competence or the quality of that material, there are other ways in which the Senate can deal with it. I think it is an important issue. Research and development in health care is a concern to all of us. The price of drugs is a concern to all of us; there is no question about that.

I must say, however, just to clarify motivations, that many senators on this side were not motivated solely because of the public appeal on that measure. I did not speak to that measure. But many senators on this side of the house believe with an almost religious fervour that medical costs, direct and indirect, should be contained. In support of that, they can give me a good example. If you examine the GNP of the United States you will find that somewhere between 11 and 12 per cent of their GNP is allocated to medical costs, direct and indirect. In Canada, it is 9 per cent. That 2 per cent difference is a large spread. Why is that? It is because of medicare and because we contain costs.

Many senators on this side—and I cannot speak for all of them—were motivated by the same impulse that motivated them with respect to the medical bill, to begin with. So, yes, there are partisan senators on this side. I would be surprised if there were none on your side. You have made your case and I will in my own way deal with it, but I can't answer it now because I have not read the report. I did not speak in that debate.

Honourable senators, we are not riding a wave here. We are not fools. We know full well that the radical position we have taken on this bill bodes ill for ourselves as senators. But the Senate will change as a result of our efforts here. This was not an unconscious act. I was surprised, frankly, when many senators around the table said, "Look, we know this means that the institution, that many revere, may change." Many senators—Senator Molgat and others—have served this chamber well. Senator Lang is a good example of this. Have you ever asked yourself, Senator Cogger, why it is that Dan Lang, as independent an individual as you are going to find in this chamber, found himself to be dead set against the GST? Where is the partisanship for him?

Senator Cogger: The last I heard, Senator Lang didn't indicate to anyone how he was going to vote. You are revealing secrets here.

Senator Grafstein: I hope I am not betraying a confidence, but he told me a day or two ago—I think he told me twice, as a matter of fact—

Senator Cogger: Why would Senator Molson, who enjoys the same qualities—

Senator Grafstein: We don't know how Senator Molson is going to vote.

Senator Cogger: —would appear to be voting in favour of the GST?

Senator Grafstein: We don't know how Senator Molson is going to vote. We don't know how Senator Pitfield is going to vote. The reason I say that is that I was at lunch with Senator Lang and Senator Molson and I can tell you that Senator Molson held his fire, but Senator Lang said, "I am against the GST for a lot of reasons."

Senator Lucier: Senator Lang said that to the press, as well.

Senator Grafstein: He said it to the press, and that is why, honourable senators, I think it is appropriate for me to comment on it. Doesn't that say something to you, Senator Cogger? Senator Lang is three years away from retirement.

Senator Cogger: It tells me that some smart, intelligent, well-intentioned people may well be on the other side of my position. I will buy that at any time. We do not own the truth. We do not have a monopoly.

I will tell you one thing, though. What I find hard to take, making a comparison with Bill C-22, is hearing most of you guys opposite saying, "Most people don't want it. Therefore, abdicate your leadership and drop the bill."

That was the position taken on Bill C-22. We travelled the country. The majority of the people didn't want it, so we were told to forget leadership and drop the thing. Well, that is not the way a Conservative government operates.

Senator Grafstein: I respect that position.

Senator Lucier: That is why you have hit 15 per cent in the polls.

Senator Cogger: Yes, but there was an election held between the passage of Bill C-22 and now, and the Conservative government is still in power.

Senator Lucier: Senator Cogger, for you to stand in your place and suggest for five seconds that the people of Canada think that Bill C-22 was good for them is an absolute misrepresentation of what the people of Canada think. They knew that Bill C-22 was a mistake and they still know it. They know that drug prices are higher because of it and they know that the Conservative government have sold Canadians out to foreign interests. They know it and they always knew it.

Senator Cogger: They know all that, yet they voted again for the Conservative government. You don't think much of the Canadian people, do you?

Senator Lucier: I think a lot of the Canadian people. I think if you check you will find that a lot fewer voted for you last time than the time before, and you are going right through the bottom of the floor the next time.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger raises a point and I want to differ, if I may, with Senator Lucier. I don't disagree with the thrust of his comments, but I want to question one of his underlying themes, and that is nationalism—mindless, knee-jerk nationalism: nationalism that corrodes, nationalism that corrupts and nationalism that destroys. I am not suggesting at all that Senator Lucier is of this school of thought, but there are knee-jerk nationalists in our party who say that if it is Yankee it is bad. And there are people on our side who say that if America leads the way, even if it is for the right purpose, it is bad. I don't find myself a member of that school of thought.

I will tell senators why I don't find myself taking that point of view. I don't believe that as Canadians we can promote this arid, narrow, parochial nationalism vis-à-vis the United States without letting loose serious and dangerous ideas. I said this to Walter Gordon, one of my great mentors in the early days. I was not and am not an economic nationalist. I am a cultural nationalist, there is no question about that. I think we have to defend our culture against that of the United States. I think we have to set up the appropriate protective barriers in the form of CBC, Telefilm, and so on, to preserve Canadian culture. While I think it is important to preserve a national culture, I am not an economic nationalist.

There is a reason that I am not an economic nationalist. As I said to myself and to Walter Gordon in the early sixties, how can you be an economic nationalist sitting in Toronto and at the same time deny that same impulse to Quebecers? You cannot. It is not consistent. If it is all right to promote narrow nationalism, the national idea in Toronto, it is not equally valid to do so in Quebec. I do not believe it is possible to build a nation on arid, narrow nationalism. I am not of that school.

Senator Lucier must forgive me, but I think that we have to examine the Canada-U.S. situation. I do not think we should needlessly throw money at the Americans, but there is a cost benefit involved in their investments. In defence of Senator Lucier, I can tell honourable senators that the greatest, fantastic, nationalists of the most exotic and perverse types happen to be Americans. If one wanted to do a very careful study on the barriers to Canadian investment in America, think about this—just think about this: We let the American banks come into the country and welcomed them, yet when we tried to go the other way, they said, "Wait a second. We want access to your entire countryside, but Congress won't allow Canadian banks access to our countryside."

Senator Lucier: The same is true with respect to energy.

Senator Stanbury: Yes, and coastal shipping.

Senator Grafstein: We could go through area after area and find that there are hidden barriers of access to the American marketplace. When they talk about a level playing field, God bless the Americans.

When I was a young lawyer I went to Washington to plead a case under a provision of the trade act. It dealt with a broadcasting issue. I will not get into the arguments presented, but I went to the Federal Trade Commission. I led the Canadian contingent and I felt I won that case. The facts were right. The law was right. I had the law. I had the facts. I walked into that tribunal and said, "My God, here I am in Washington, this kid from London." I took those big, fancy Washington lawyers on and I beat them. All of my clients were happy. They said, "You did a hell of a job. You beat them. You proved them wrong in law. You beat them on the facts. We just have to wait for the decision." The Washington lawyer on the other side phoned me several months later. The decision had not come out from the Trade Office. I wondered why. He said to me, "Grafstein, do you want to settle?" I said, "Settle? Hell, I beat you. You know I beat you. Your clients know I beat you." He said, "Look, do you want to settle? You are going to lose." I said, "Look, I believe in American justice. I believe in American trade law. I am going to win this case."

Two or three weeks later I got a call informing me that the decision had come out. The most important issue had been found against me. I said, "That's impossible." I was told there was a problem. When I asked what the problem was, I was told that the law had been changed a couple of weeks previously. I said, "Wait a second. You can't rig the law." I was told that I had better go down to talk to one of the southern senators, who was Chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce. I petitioned that senator. I told him that it was not fair, that we Canadians were big friends of the U.S. and that the law was clear. I told him that he had changed the definition on me and had changed the law after the fact. He said, "What are you getting upset about, Grafstein? You are a bright, young fellow. What are you getting upset about? That is the way we harmonize our laws." I said, "Harmonize? You have just destroyed my case." He said, "Look, when American interests are involved, we have got to harmonize the law to protect American interests."

So, Senator Lucier, I say to you that I am not a nationalist. I am not, but I can understand that if you deal with Americans—and I respect them and I respect the way they protect their home base—you have to be capable, you have to be tough and you have to be aware.

• (0430)

I am not of the narrow nationalist school, yet I am not innocent. If you want to make your way in the United States with Americans we must give tit for tat. However, the argument on nationalism can be deferred for another day.

Honourable senators, I will conclude this portion of the reading of the petitions with naming a few more Ontario towns that I have not mentioned before so that the record is clear that these towns and the people from these towns are petitioning us against the goods and services bill.

Senator Cogger, before I conclude I wish to say to you that you are a superb politician and political advisor. You have been involved in many grand battles for good causes. The one thing that you are known for is that you can read public opinion—good public opinion and bad public opinion. You can segregate between what is floss and dross and what is substantive. Do for yourself, as I did. The one thing that we have in this place is a lifetime appointment. We do not have to play the partisan game if we do not choose to do so. Some of the senators on this side choose not to be partisan. Some of them have become independent. All I can do is use reason and persuasion and say to you: do what I have done. Step back. Go through some of these petitions. Sift through the evidence. Test the water with people you respect in the business community and at the working levels of Quebec that you know so well. Put the proposition to them fairly. Go through the tax categories and ask them what they think.

Ask them if the bill is fair. Ask if there are other alternatives. By the way, we already know, experts have told us, that there are other alternatives to the GST. This is a bad tax at a bad time. It is counter productive to all your other policies. Turn back and listen to the voices of Thetford, Ontario; Dashwood, Ontario; Watford, Ontario; Kitchener, Ontario; Sarnia, Ontario; Mississauga, Ontario; Welland, Ontario; London, Ontario; Lambeth, Ontario—Lambeth just outside of St. Thomas, a great town and a great place to spend some time on a Saturday night whether you are sober or not; Stratford; Dundas; Mitchell, Ontario; Barrie; Hillhurst; Ascott; Burlington; Etobicoke; Waterloo; RR No. 3 Parkhill; Windsor; Stratford; Brantford, Brantford, and Brantford; Strathroy; Woodstock; Lambeth again; Mount Forest; Waterloo; St. Thomas; a large number of petitions from Grand Bend—someone was very active in Grand Bend; London—all parts of London, east and west and north and south. I know these addresses well. These petitioners live in all parts of London. The rich in the north, and the south end where I came from, the poor in the east end and west end-they are all here. Someone was doing a good job in London, my home town. I walked those streets. I also have some petitioners from Ailsa Craig, Ontario. Senator Stanbury, I have one from Ailsa Craig. What does that say to you?

Senator Stanbury: Exeter, Huntsville, Bruce, and so on.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Stanbury's father was a judge and his brother was a cabinet minister. They came from that part of the world as well. They are greatly respected and have deep roots there in south-western Ontario. Senator Stanbury is near the age where partisan politics is not as important to him as it once was. He has not been actively engaged in partisan politics, and I am only speaking of the past few years. He served the Liberal Party nobly and with great distinction. He was a superb National Party President. Why is he here tonight in the middle of the night? Is it just for partisan politics to catch the public wave so that the Liberals can glide back in? Why is Dick Stanbury so upset about this bill? Ask yourself that. I ask myself that. We came to the same conclusions, Dick, independently, did we not? We did not compare notes and say "By the way, let us ride the public wave here." We chatted about it over the spring and summer. Were you on the Banking committee, Dick?

Senator Stanbury: No.

Senator Grafstein: I wasn't on the Banking committee either. Yet we waited until the report of the committee and decided against the bill on the evidence.

I have a petition from Guelph, from Woodstock, from Knightshill, from Wonderland—what a great place—and from Lucan. Why Lucan? What does Lucan say about this issue? One who was born a Canadian and became one of the world's greatest economists in the United States came from Lucan. Do you remember his name?

Senator Austin: Galbraith.

Senator Grafstein: What do you think John Kenneth Galbraith would make of this tax at this time? Do you remember his seminal studies about the "Great Depression"? If I recall correctly, his initial benchmark work was based on the causes of the "Great Depression."

What were the causes of that "Depression"? You can read the Pierre Berton book if you choose. Berton's book includes poignant vignettes of the family tragedies across Canada that occured as a result of the "Depression," yet Galbraith came to his conclusions as an economist because of the impact that the "Depression" had on Lucan and that area of southwestern Ontario. That area was inhabited by Scottish stock and was a proud farming community. Gailbraith was transformed and his life and ideas were shaped by the impact of the "Depression" on his family and friends in that part of Ontario. Senator Stanbury, you have been there many times, as have I.

What were the lessons of the "Great Depression"? Wrong policies at the wrong time. Instead of pulling the ship of state out of its downward spiral, misguided national policies pushed the ship of state into the mud. One suggestion was to raise the taxes, remember? That was one suggestion that Hoover made. Do you know what happened to Hoover? Was it a similar time and similar circumstances.

God, does history not tell us anything? We are on the edge of a depression! Senator Lucier put this to me: we are on the edge of a bloody depression! Tell me what senator says that we are not. Tell me if this tax will help pull us out of the mud or stick us down further.

Senator Lucier: It will drive us in.

Senator Grafstein: It will drive us down, down, down. Is this not, as Barbara Tuchman said, the "March of Folly," a perverse counter-productive approach to public policy at a time when people are saying that such a tax is stupid? Interest rates are too high, the dollar is too strong, and the GST will increase inflation, keeping interest rates unconscionably high.

What did we read yesterday? We read that big business wanted lower rates. God bless them, they are terrific! I want to say something to Senator Cogger. I remember the support of the business community, the business council, the big brains, the pooh-bahs of this country. I like them; they are great guys. They are great to have a beer with when they drink beer, or to have a cocktail with when they drink a cocktail. But at times their collective wisdom is lacking. All of a sudden they tell the government, "By the way, boys, by the way, government, we are your supporters, we are your friends, and you, government, you are wrong, your policies are wrong."

Senator Stanbury: We put you there.

Senator Grafstein: "We put you there, but you are wrong. You were okay six months ago but now you are wrong. High interest rates are killing us," big business now tells the government.

I will make a prediction. You said to me, "Predict what happens afterward. You are causing a lot of fuss and bother. Predict what will happen." Using the drug case as an example, you tell me we will regret our opposition to the GST because the opposition is based on fiction. But you told Canada there would be no negative impact, that the tax would be neutral. I will predict this: If the GST goes through, the economy will take a deeper dive. Those same fairweather friends who support you now and say, "We want the GST. Get rid of this manufacturing tax so we can harmonize our tax regime with the United States so we can compete." But Canadians are not told, by the way, that the United States does not have a value added tax. You can harmonize income and capital taxes but not a consumption tax. GST touches every Canadian. The other taxes only a segment of the Canadian population. Is this consistent harmonization? Talk to your fairweather business friends and you will see that they will say, "By the way, hold off on the GST." Some of your fairweather businesses are telling you that now.

Let me give you a poignant example that you will remember. I may get splattered for bringing this example to your attention. Let us be candid with one another. Business, big business, will tell you one thing today and something else tomorrow. Many of us have acted for these fellows and we know the limitations of their thought processes. These businessmen are concerned, serious and legitimate, but they don't have time to think things through. We in the Senate are supposed to have time to think things through. That it is what we are getting paid for.

Senator Lucier: They are looking after their self interest.

Senator Grafstein: That is fair enough. Each Canadian should look after his or her self interest. That is a good Canadian way too, Senator Lucier. But when it affects the national interest, we have to pause and give it—what is it called?—the second sober thought. Those fancy business organizations are telling us, one after another, that we have to bring in this tax, but "Not for my industry, of course, because if you hit mine, it will hurt. You will kill me."

I remember in the last decade, I believe my memory is correct, that the president of every chartered bank in this country at the time—and Senator Cogger will remember this full well—said that "Wages and price controls should not be imposed." Do you remember what they said at that time? They said to bring in wages and price controls, every one of them. But after the election every one of them changed his mind after wages and price controls were introduced. They did a flip. We were hammered in that 1974 election campaign because we took on Stanfield and attacked him for that measure. Some months later Liberals adopted wages and price controls because there was total agreement from big business. Yet they suddenly changed their minds after the legislation was passed. Let us be candid. Senator Nurgitz wants me to be candid and I will be candid.

Senator Cogger: That is nothing to be proud of.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Grafstein, I did not say "candid" I said "candid for a change".

Senator Grafstein: But the government changed the policy and each one of those bankers reversed gears. They said, "You have to do it now." Every president of every chartered bank within 60 days or 90 days then did a flip flop, if you will recall.

Senator Cogger: What are you saying, that this was a dispute during the election?

Senator Grafstein: No. My point is evidence. You have asked about the quality of evidence. I tell you to look at the evidence and examine the source and see if you can agree with that source in your own heart and mind. I cannot agree with the evidence presented in support of the GST.

I am prepared to listen to argument. We will have many weeks of argument about the GST. In the course of that exchange I hope we will hear these cogent arguments, and those of us who feel differently will have to bring to this high court of Parliament for not just yourselves but others, the alternatives we believe are preferable.

I can tell you, honourable senators, that Canadians will not sit still. Canadians are not finished with us yet. We senators are being approached. If you can believe it, Senator Cogger, we are being approached by the national unions. The Liberal Party is now being approached by the national unions to remonstrate against this tax.

Senator Lucier: You mean the Liberal Senate.

Senator Grafstein: Yes the Liberal Senate. Imagine! Why are they doing this? Why would they come to us? For a narrow partisan game? The unions are just as self serving as big business is self serving. Yet it is compelling to me when they feel that the only instrument in this country that can represent their viewpoint is the Senate—not just us, but you on this side. They are coming this weekend to petition us yet again. Are they not, Senator Lucier and Senator Stanbury? Have we not heard that, Senator Romeo Leblanc? They are coming here this weekend. Did we invite them, or did they say, "May we come to Ottawa to meet with you?" Imagine, the CLC—Shirley Carr and whoever else is behind their network—are coming. Why would they be doing this? Over and over again they have, said, "Abolish the Senate." Ha, Ha! Life will be better without this Senate. Yet they now come cap in hand and say, "Come on, come help us on this. We are worried. We are losing jobs. Business people tell us that they will lose more jobs."

John Bulloch, a great supporter of the Conservative Party and a great Canadian, has become the voice of small business in this country all on his own. He hits us and he helps you. But on this one, where is he? Is he up there with Tom D'Aquino? I don't think so. What does he say? That is evidence. That is also a petition. He represents practically all the small businessmen in this country. What is labour and small business saying? They are saying the same things as the people from Zurich, Ontario; Seaford, Ontario; St. Claire, Ontario—that doesn't even look like a town.

Senator Lucier: Yes it is.

Senator Grafstein: And Plattsburg, Ontario. Senators, if Parliament is a court, if Parliament is the nation's great assize— Senator Nurgitz is looking at the ceiling and drifting off to another land because he might have heard this before, but maybe he will suspend his judgment because he is a great senator. We have joined common cause on at least one occasion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: That is right.

Senator Grafstein: If we senators have suspended judgment and if we have a scintella, an iota, a particle, a jot, a drop of sober second thought—not a full glass but half a glass—if we can look at all this evidence and draw back from out partisan positions, we will not be persuaded on the civil law test of the balance of probabilities. Senator Cogger and honourable senators on the other side, it would not have convinced me to be satisfied that I should bring these petitions and I should sit here all night to remonstrate against this bill if I were not convinced that it is not merely on the balance of probabilities that this tax is detrimental to the country.

It cannot be unwound once it is put in place. Once it is there you cannot unwind this mother and father of a tax! If we set up this tax it cannot be undone. The drug situation is a narrow issue, Senator Cogger. The GST touches every Canadian. Once we put this tax in place we will never be able to unwind ourselves from it. If we do, the costs of unwinding it will be horrendous. And who pays the shot coming and going? The poor Canadian taxpayer.

Senator Lucier: It isn't possible.

Senator Grafstein: It is improbable and difficult. We will then have to do a lot of other things. The system will be distorted yet again. We will have to start pump priming industry and put subsidies in place to preserve jobs. Rather than bringing down the cost of government, we will have to increase the cost of government to keep jobs here. This tax will be counter productive.

What about the independent economic evidence before that committee? Read it. Conservatives, Liberals and NDP are all equally concerned about the counter productive impact of this tax measure. What more do we need? The test for me on turning back a tax measure is not the balance of probabilities in this great high court of Parliament in which we all sit as judge and jury, the test should be that the evidence against the tax at this time must be beyond a reasonable doubt.

I say to honourable senators opposite that if I can't, and if they can't—particularly the new senators—come to a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt that this tax measure that is based on these petitions is incorrect, vote for this tax measure. Push it through. Put us to the wall. But, if in your heart of hearts, in that clear moment in the early morning—it is 6 o'clock in the morning now, but later on today when senators rest and wake up and confront their Maker for the first time at the beginning of a fresh day, these senators should ask themselves what about those fellows over on the other side? Why are they doing this? Is it for the good of their health? Do you think Senator Croll, who is 90 years old, came here to speak because of partisanship? Another senator, who shall remain nameless and who has a serious heart condition, said to me, and not jocularly either, "If something happens to me, make sure it happens to me in the chamber and hold up my right hand because I want to vote, living or dead, against this tax, because of the terrible consequences on ordinary Canadians."

An Hon. Senator: For heaven's sake!

Senator Grafstein: He was not saying that as a joke. This was not a partisan gesture. That was a heartfelt concern that this measure contributes a deteriorating, damaging tax policy that will affect senators on this side and senators on that side. But more than that, it will affect our children. We will not pay for the consequences of this measure. We will not pay the consequences to Canada. We are protected. Most of us here have a fairly good protective base for the foreseeable future, at least.

Senators opposite could say to themselves that perhaps they should give these petitions a second look and a second thought. They should say to themselves, "Maybe that guy Grafstein is not totally out of control. Maybe 5 per cent of what he says about these petitions has some merit." Perhaps these petitions containing these thousands of names of Canadian citizens mean something. Don't totally discount them. Do what a good judge does. Cut them in half. Discount half the petitions. Take half of them and say to yourselves, "If these petitions have half the weight one should give to these individual names of people from every small town in Ontario, then there must be something to their concerns." Certainly that should be somewhat persuasive—not totally, though—to cause some of you individual senators to look through the evidence, yet again.

Each of you should do this in your own way. If you come to the conclusion that we Liberal senators and those independent senators who are against it are wrong, so be it. We will all pay a fancy price, our party will pay a fancy price at the next election.

I humbly conclude by saying that these petitions should not only be received but they should also be listened to. Any government that stops listening to the people does not, in my view, justify the support of people who pay their wages.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present some petitions.

Senator Richard J. Doyle: Could I ask a question of Senator Grafstein?

Senator Austin: Yes, indeed.

Senator Doyle: Thank you very much. In the interest of candour in examining the petitions that you have submitted, could you tell us how many of them have come from the solicitation and organization of a single network headed by a former would-be Liberal candidate who resides in Ottawa, named Maude Barlow? I am not degrading or downgrading them because they came from that source, but it is a very high-powered organization that has been dealing in petitions.

Senator Grafstein: The petitions I have are divided into two parts. Many of them come from a group called the Irate Citizens of Peterborough, Ontario, if that is the organization that you were eluding to. Others, which I have not submitted, are equally numerous and documented. I have not submitted them here because they are not in a form that is fully proper. There is a prayer at the beginning of each of them but there is not a prayer on each page. I held back submitting a larger number of petitions because they just state at the top, "No To GST." There doesn't appear to be any pattern here because they are on note paper, loose leaf paper, and each signature appears to be different. There are petitions from Totenham, Woodbridge, Bondhead, Exeter, Bradford, Rockwood, and Aliston. It goes on for page, after page, after page. Every small town in Ontario is represented in these petitions.

Senator Doyle: But how did the pages get from Ailsa Craig to Beaton to wherever?

Senator Grafstein: I have no idea. I assumed that it was a group or individuals who felt so very upset about this and went out on the streets of these towns and collected these signatures. I assume that is how it happened.

Senator Doyle: But you have suggested to us that sometimes their names are on one sheet from town to town.

Senator Grafstein: No. My point is that on each sheet it says at the top, "No To GST." I don't believe these have a proper prayer, and therefore, I am not submitting them but the others are in proper form. The ones I have eluded to and submitted are in proper form. There is a petition, a prayer, and a signature and they are all signed in the proper form. I am satisfied that these are in proper form. However, I am not submitting the larger number which include many of these small towns.

Let us take your suggestion at its face value. Let us suggest that it is one or two individuals, for whatever reason.

Senator Doyle: It was not a suggestion, it was a question.

Senator Grafstein: I don't know the answer to the question. I am suggesting to you that these petitions do not appear in proper form. Therefore, I am not presenting them. The others do, however. All the addresses, and so on, that I have mentioned come from a group entitled, "Irate Citizens, Box 1473, Peterborough, Ontario." The telephone number is here. You can phone them if you like. The postal code is K9J 7A7 and the telephone number is 705-741-1565.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions entrusted to me by Canadian citizens who are resident in the province of British Columbia. These petitions address the question of the proposed goods and services tax, which is embodied in Bill C-62 that appears elsewhere on our order paper. The petitions are derived from many communities in British Columbia.

I have travelled extensively throughout my province and recognize many of these communities as now experiencing severe economic conditions. I am convinced that the pressures of the GST, along with the rising price of oil, high interest rates, increasing unemployment and a high Canadian dollar, which has a serious impact on the natural resource producers of my province of British Columbia, have created a substantial anxiety. A number of British Columbians have said to me over many months—and the message remains constant—that they fear that the introduction of a GST will add to their economic burdens; that the economy is slowing, and that, adding a further burden to consumers will depress consumer demand and result in an even worse economic status than they now have.

Honourable senators, I have petitions in hand from Naramata, Penticton, Vancouver, Fernie, Kelowna, Sparwood, Hosmer, Richmond, Nanaimo, Qualicum Beach, Beaver Creek, Ladysmith, Duncan, Nanoose, Langley, Prince Rupert, Shamanus—indeed from every part of the province of British Columbia, including some of the smallest communities such as Port Hardy, which is on the northern coast of Vancouver Island.

There are people on this petition whose addresses include trailer parks, general delivery and rural areas in British Columbia. These are people from all walks of life in the affairs of the province of British Columbia who have not only derived their concern about the GST from their experiences as consumers, employees and small business persons in the economy, but from listening to the views of the provincial government and the opposition party in the province of British Columbia.

Honourable senators will know that the legislature of British Columbia has sent a unanimous resolution to the Government of Canada—to this Parliament—asking that the GST not proceed. A unanimous resolution means that the Government of British Columbia, which is led by the Social Credit Party, and the opposition, which is the New Democratic Party, have agreed. There is widespread endorsement of the provincial government's position throughout British Columbia.

Labour unions endorse it. Leading business groups endorse it. Indeed, one of our business leaders, Hugh Fletcher, who is the chairman of Fletcher Challenge, a major pulp and paper company in the province of British Columbia, which is connected to a New Zealand parent, has advised us that the timing of the tax in British Columbia will create a serious cost to the forest industry, which makes up 50 per cent of the gross domestic product of the province of British Columbia taken directly and indirectly.

Honourable senators, the province of British Columbia is so concerned with a GST tax that it is proceeding with an action against that tax in the courts of British Columbia. The province is asking the courts to rule that this tax is unconstitutional.

Honourable senators, I am not addressing the question of whether or not the litigation that has been commenced by the province of British Columbia is well founded or likely to succeed. I am bringing to the attention of honourable senators, through these petitions and the underlying evidence that supports these petitions, the grave concern that exists in my province with respect to the governance of Canada by the Mulroney government and, in particular, the impact of the GST.

Honourable senators, it may not be important for the Conservative Party to know that its standing in British Columbia is fourth among the political parties represented in my province at 9 per cent. It may not be of concern for honourable senators opposite to know that many Conservative members of Parliament in British Columbia are quoted in the press as being personally opposed to the GST or acknowledging the widespread resistance to the GST that they are hearing from the residents of British Columbia. I will not read newspaper articles into the record which quote Conservative members of Parliament—I will spare you that—but I am prepared to show these articles to any honourable senator who wishes to see them. The petitions that I have in hand and will deliver also show, in my view, the recognition by a broad group in my province that this GST is regressive and will unduly injure the economic welfare of people in the lower half of the economy. In fact, substantial evidence has been produced which indicates this will be the result. I turn to an article in the Toronto Star of October 11. I apologize for the incongruity of the date, honourable senators, because, as everyone knows, the Senate is still considered to be sitting on October 9. I hope you will not be confused. I am sure you will not be.

The article refers to a study in the Canadian Tax Journal, which is one of the leading professional periodicals among tax professionals. The study, which is under the name of Pat Grady of Global Economics Ltd. of Ottawa, says that an astonishing 46 per cent of families that earn less than $30,000 will be worse off under the GST. The analysis shows a substantially larger negative impact for all family types and income levels than does the analysis reported by the Department of Finance in its technical paper on the GST. The article goes on to explain the difference in methodology, the arguments with respect to the work of the Department of Finance and its conclusions.

Honourable senators, our petitioners from British Columbia have more than enough reason today to be generally concerned and anxious. Apart from the evidence they see in their own communities, nationally they see evidence of the declining economy of Canada. In a further story of the Toronto Star for October 11, which we have not yet arrived at, you see a headline "CN to cut 1,500 white-collar jobs." On the same page there is the headline "Imperial Oil seeks 20 per cent job cutback." On the news yesterday, that also being of October 11, we learned that Air Canada will be reducing its workforce by 2,900 people.

The business press carry these stories because these are high profile companies and are always newsworthy. What we are not seeing are the rising totals of bankruptcies under the stewardship of this government, which have increased by 76 per cent in the second quarter of 1990. These bankruptcies are a label for the story of the destruction of the dreams and hopes of hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have invested their time and capital in enterprises in order to be productive Canadian citizens.

The policies of this government to induce a recession have led them to disaster. It is to weep, as the poets say, to see what is happening in the Canadian economy today. In my own province of British Columbia, individuals from all of these communities have written to me and are calling Ottawa to tell me what is happening in their particular lives. Friends of mine in various communities in British Columbia are also keeping me in touch with the feelings of British Columbians about this GST and Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, it is hard to understand why the government presses on in the face of overwhelming disapproval by Canadians—in the face of these business stories; in the face of the decline in the economy; in the face of a recession—if not a depression—well established in the Canadian business cycle—a made-in-Canada recession for which the government is avoiding taking responsibility.

In fact, honourable senators, I watched with some small admiration a "Canada AM" program on the morning of October 11—and, as honourable senators know, we are still in the sitting of October 9—in which Hugh Segal, who was described on that program as a Conservative strategist, took full and frank responsibility for the recession. He said he disagreed with the Minister of Finance when the minister denied that Canada was moving into or toward a recession. He said what we should be saying, as Conservatives, is that this is a necessary event to introduce into the Canadian economic cycle so that there can be a better recovery in the years ahead. I must give Mr. Segal credit for his candour—a word that was much used in this chamber earlier this morning—and wonder about the candour of the government and the Minister of Finance in seemingly wishing to evade any responsibility for the management of this recession. It seems it is everyone's responsibility but that of a government that has been in office for over six years. Isn't that amazing, honourable senators?

The issue with my petitioners, and with so many other Canadians who oppose the GST, is not whose responsibility it is—although we will come to that in a forthcoming federal election. The issue today is how to obtain mitigation from the economic cycle we have moved into. One of the most significant ways this government has of mitigating these consequences is to abandon its disastrous GST.

Honourable senators, again I will quote from the "Bennettisms" that were developed over 22 years by W.A.C. Bennett. I have quoted him twice during the course of this week. His most famous statement in British Columbia politics during the 22 years he was in office was that his government was a great second look government; that governments, like people, make mistakes and governments would do well to admit mistakes when they are made and not proceed on a march of folly, bravely whistling through the political graveyard while their citizens pay the price of that folly. Premier Bennett used a small story to illustrate his point. He said if he bit into something that was awful and would make him sick, he would spit it out immediately. It might be somewhat embarrassing, but that is a lot better than getting sick. That, honourable senators, is a piece of advice I offer to this government in all sincerity, but I know that the government is prepared to receive no good advice and wants to march on and damage the interests of a substantial number of Canadians.

Honourable senators, even the coalition that put this government into office in 1988—with its support for the free trade measures and by the substantial funding that was contributed to the government's coffers in the last ten days of the 1988 election by such groups as the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association—are advising the government to avoid recession. They are advising the government to reduce interest rates, to remove the drag on consumer demand in the economy, and to lower the level of the Canadian dollar in its exchange rate with the United States currency. This advice, given in public, is astonishing and must mean that the government was not willing to listen in private. These are friends of the government. One would think that if the government were willing to listen in private, such public admonitions would not be necessary. Now we see the evidence of the government's last friends being concerned with the fiscal management of this country and having to go public with their advice in order to be listened to.

Honourable senators, my petitioners from British Columbia watch all of these events. They are well-informed petitioners.

As honourable senators know, they have, over the last several years, returned a number of Conservative members to Parliament. Those Conservative members of Parliament, as I have said, have shown their concern with government management of the economy, particularly with respect to the GST. They are also aware that it is likely they will not be back in the other place after the next federal election.

The unwillingness of the government to listen to the citizens of Canada has had a remarkable effect on my province and others in western Canada. It has encouraged the rise of a protest party on the right called the Reform Party of Canada headed by Preston Manning, the son of former Senator Ernest Manning. That party is well grounded in the history of protest movements in western Canada and is repeating the course of Canadian history with respect to western Canadian protest. This Conservative party should have a better historic memory. One of its two names—I do not think it is appropriate—"progressive" comes from and is sourced in western protest. I am sure the tradition is long lost in the Progressive Conservative Party of today. You will pay a considerable price for that loss of memory.

In my province the Reform Party is now the third most supported federal party, with the Conservative Party last. I would doubt that any Conservative seat in British Columbia today is safe. Some of them have been automatic Conservative seats for decades. In Alberta the Reform Party is first in the federal polls. The press of the last few days shows how successful the Reform party has been in seeding itself in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

These are warnings to the government. I mean well, but I am confident they will not be listened to. These petitions are presented, honourable senators, because it is my duty to intercede with the government through the means of this chamber and the rules of this chamber on behalf of hundreds of British Columbians, whose names are in these petitions, who come from all parts of the province and from all walks of life. They are asking the government through these petitions not to close its ears to the message of the people. You may be a brave government to stand up to the people of Canada. You may be a brave government to pursue the policies you are pursuing. The future will have the answer; but, honourable senators, for a government to govern in such an insensitive way to the views, the wishes and the demonstrated needs of Canadians strikes me as foolhardy and appalling.

Honourable senators, I am sorry to fall so short in my pleadings and to be so unsuccessful in attracting the interest of Conservative senators opposite. It is perhaps my own failing in not being able to find the adequate words that are necessary, but the ultimate failing will be your own if you do not listen to these petitions and ignore the events occurring in Canada today. I can only say that I greatly admire the stamina, fortitude and conviction of Senator Grafstein, who spoke to us earlier this morning and whose brief remarks on the presentation of his petition were so caringly argued. I differ with him on some of his arguments, but we heard a sincere entreaty from him to the government to listen to petitions. Thank you, honourable senators, for listening to me.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I too have the honour to present these petitions on behalf of petitioners in my native province. These petitioners were concerned about the printed word. On their behalf I would like to list some of the names of the areas. I think Senator Cogger would be interested in hearing these names.

I have some here from Mont Royal, Roxboro, Verdun, St Hubert, Montreal, NDG, Saint-Viateur and Maisonneuve. I have another containing the signatures of 25 people who are concerned about the printed word again. I will submit this. I have another petition on the same subject. These people are concerned that the printed word will work against educational material and supplies. They feel it will erode on lower income families' education.

I have a petition from Saint-Lambert, Deep River—that somehow got in here from the Ontario list—St Hubert, St-Laurent, Montreal, Outremont, Jeanne Mance and Laval. I have another on the same subject from St Hubert, Beausejour, St Hubert, Cousineau, St Hubert, Laval, Lasalle, Scarborough, Ontario, Delson, Verdun and Dollard-des-Ormeaux.

I have another petition on the same subject. These are from Laval, Montreal, Clanranald, Sherbrooke, St Laurent, Montreal, Brossard, Westmount, Montreal, Outremont and Champagneur. I have another on the same subject. They come from Montreal, Anjou, NDG, Nuns Island, Montreal, Lasalle, Jeanne Mance, Mont Ste-Anne and St-Denis.

I have another petition containing signatures from people in Longueuil, Mont Royal, Montreal, Verdun, Maisonneuve, St-Urban, Pointe Claire, Mont Royal, Saint-Lambert, Pointe Claire, Anne, Montreal, Westmount, Outremont and Montreal. I have another coming from Sutton, Lachene, Verdun, Chateauguay, Longueuil, St Laurent and Montreal. I have yet another from Montreal, Brossard, Woodside, Sherbrooke, Montreal, Val d'Or, Montreal and Westmount. Those are the petitions I have for today. Thank you.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, earlier in the discussion on petitions there were questions raised by honourable senators opposite regarding the validity of petitions, whether they were in proper form, and whether, indeed, they could be presented in the form in which we had them.

I thought it might be useful if I put on the record the background of public petitions as contained in Erskine May, which sets out the historical background, as well as the forms used in the British Parliament, from which we take our parliamentary usages. This is Erskine May's Treatise on The Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament, edited by Sir Barnett Cocks, K.C.B. O.B.E., Clerk of the House of Commons. This is contained in the Eighteenth Edition, 1971. I point out that the one on the table is the Twenty-First Edition.

Under the heading "Public Petitions", and "Course of Development of the Form of Petitioning", the following appears:

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times, and has had a profound effect in determining the main forms of parliamentary procedure. The historical and constitutional aspects of petitions to the Queen in Parliament, which were originally directed to judicial rather than legislative remedies, and from which in the medieval period the form of legislation both by public and private bill was only gradually derived, will not be considered in this work. This section is concerned with the modern form of petitions to one or other of the Houses of Parliament, principally to the Commons, which grew up in the seventeenth century, when Parliament had come to be regarded as a political and legislative body rather than as the highest court of justice. Public petitions may pray for an alteration of the general law or the re-consideration of a general administrative decision, and they may also pray for redress of local or personal grievances; they are to be distinguished from petitions relating directly to private business (see Chapters XXXV-XL).
> The rights of petitioners and the power of the House to deal with petitions were laid down by two resolutions of the Commons in 1669.

Obviously, the base of petitions to Parliament has a long, long history in British parliamentary practice.

I quote the two resolutions of 1669. They state:

> "That it is the inherent right of every commoner in England to prepare and present petitions to the House of Commons in case of grievance, and the House of Commons to receive the same."
>
> "That it is an undoubted right and privilege of the Commons to judge and determine, touching the nature and matter of such petitions, how far they are fit and unfit to be received" (a).
> Until after the first Reform Act the procedure of the House of Commons imposed little restriction on the raising of debate on the presentation of petitions, which served as a method of introducing subjects from outside the House and could be used for obstructing other kinds of business. In view of a great increase of the number of petitions, a series of standing orders—now Nos. 99-103—was adopted in 1842, which, as subsequently amended, made the presentation of petitions a formal proceeding incapable, except in rare cases, of giving rise to debate. This development was in keeping with the change which simultaneously took place in the relations between Parliament and the people as a whole. As the House of Commons grew more representative of all kinds of popular opinion, the need of the channel between the public and the House of Commons, which petitions had supplied, grew less urgent, and the number of petitions declined.

[Senator Molgat.]

I. FORM OF PETITIONS

> Petitions to the House of Lords should be superscribed, "To the right honourable the lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled" (b); and to the House of Commons, "To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled." A general designation of the parties to the petition should follow, and if there be one petitioner only, his name after this manner: "the humble petition of [here insert the name or other designation] sheweth." The general allegations of the petition are concluded by what is called the "prayer", in which the particular object of the petitioner is expressed. To the whole petition are generally added the words of form, "And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.;" to which are appended the signatures or marks of the parties.

This gives what one might call the ancient tradition in the British House, not all of which is followed in canadian practice, I admit, but I think it is important, nevertheless, to show the historical basis for petitions. We have adapted this in Canada to our own needs.

Then Erskine May goes on:

> Remonstrances. —-

These are of particular interest to us because the root of our system comes from these particular remonstrances.

> Without a prayer, a document will not be taken as a petition (c);

That is the point that was made earlier in this discussion by senator Kelly, who wondered whether, indeed, there was a proper prayer in the petitions we were presenting. It is essential that there be a prayer. Without a prayer a document will not be taken as a petition.

Erskine May goes on to state:

> —and a paper, assuming the style of a declaration (d), an address of thanks (e), or a remonstrance only, without a proper form of prayer, will not be received. In other cases, remonstrances respectfully worded, and concluding with a proper form of prayer, have been received (f): but a document, distinctly headed as a remonstrance, though concluding with a prayer, has been refused (g). A so-called memorial, properly worded, and concluding with a prayer, has been received (h).
> Signature, etc.- In the Commons, a petition should be written upon parchment or paper; a printed (i), lithographed (k), or type-written (l) petition will not be received. In the Lords, however, a petition may be written, printed or typed on parchment or paper (m). It must be signed (n) and at least one signature should be upon the same sheet or skin upon which the petition is written (o). If petitions are presented without any signatures to the sheet on which they are written, they are not noticed in the votes. The petition must have original signatures or marks, and not copies from the original (p), nor signatures of agents on behalf of others, except in the case of incapacity by sickness (q). These signatures must be written upon the petition itself, and not pasted upon, or otherwise transferred to it (r). Every signature must be accompanied by the address of the signatory (s). Where a petition consists of more than one sheet, only those signatures will be considered valid which are written on sheets headed by the prayer of the petition or on the back of those sheets; but on every sheet after the first prayer may be reproduced in print or by other mechanical process (t).

Earlier we heard Senator Grafstein, in replying to a question from across the way, say that he had a number of other petitions which did not hit this regulation or rule because they, indeed, did not have a prayer, and simply said: "anti-GST" or "against the GST." He did not present those to the Senate because they did not fit our own rule, which states that there must be a prayer.

Erskine May goes on to state:

> Petitions of corporations aggregate should be under their common seal.

Again, this is referring to the United Kingdom practice. It goes on to state:

> A petition must be in the English language, or accompanied by a translation, which the Member who presents it states to be correct (u); it must be free from interlineations or erasures (a). No letters, affidavits or other documents may be annexed to a petition (b), and the sheets of the petition itself may not contain any extraneous matter such as appeals by the petitioners for subscriptions or financial support (c).

Erskine May continues with:

> Forgery or fraud.- Any forgery or fraud in the preparation of petitions, or in the signatures attached, or the being privy to, or cognizant of, such forgery or fraud, is liable to be punished as a breach of privilege (e). There have been frequent instances in which such irregularities have been discovered and punished by both Houses (f). In some cases the House has satisfied itself by the rejection of the petition (g), or by discharging the order for its lying on the table (h). A motion to that effect has been permitted without previous notice (i); though a claim to draw attention, as a matter of privilege, to expressions in a petition presented at a previous sitting, has not been conceded (k).

Then the following heading appears in the article: "2. Character and Substance of Petitions".

It states:

> The language of a petition should be respectful and temperate and free from disrespectful language to the sovereign (l) or offensive imputations upon the character or conduct of Parliament (m) or the courts of justice (n), or other tribunal (o), or constituted authority (p).
> Offensive expressions, not particularly affecting, though addressed to, the House itself will (or may) be regarded as disrespectful to the House (q).
> The language of a petition may be improper, not because of its being offensive in itself or indecorous in its terms, but because the statements of which it is the vehicle are not proper to be made by the petitioners, as, for example, where a petition refers to anything which may have been said by Members in debate in the House (r). The petition must set forth a case in which the House has jurisdiction to interfere (s).
> The petition must conclude with a prayer for such interference on the part of the House, or, in other words, for such relief, as is within the power of the House (t).
> Where a petition, besides a prayer for relief which is not within the power of the House, prays also for that which is within its power, the petition will be received (u).
> If the prayer of the petition is within the power of the House to grant, the absurdity of it is no objection to the reception of the petition (a).

Then they cite a number of instances. It states:

> On 2 March 1822, a petition from Newcastle, imputing notorious corruption to the House of Commons, was, on a division, not received (b); and a motion having been made that a petition alleging that members of Parliament had taken a bribe do lie upon the table, the motion was withdrawn. On 2 August 1832, a petition threatening to resist the law was not allowed to lie upon the table (c). In 1838, a petition containing disrespectful language towards the House of Parliament was withdrawn (d).

I am pleased to see some honourable ministers in the other place did not put their statements in the form of a petition, because they would certainly, from what I read in the newspaper, not fall under one that would be acceptable.

Senator Doody: Are you reading a petition now? Who signed the petition? Are there any signatures on it?

Senator Molgat: Because earlier some questions were raised about petitions and the propriety of petitions—in fact Senator Kelly raised the matter—I thought it would be useful to get on the record the historical background of petitions and why it is that they are such an integral part of the parliamentary system. So I am establishing the historical base for this.

Senator Doody: It has been widely acknowledged that petitions are an accepted form of parliamentary procedure. I do not think we need the historical data to demonstrate that. I think the rules under Presentation of Petitions are fairly clear and we certainly do not need the preamble the honourable senators is putting now.

Senator Molgat: I am responding to a question from Senator Kelly.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, on a point of order.

I do not know whether my honourable friend was here last night when Senator Frith, with the indulgence of the house, on Presentation of Petitions, put on the record much of the material my friend is putting on the record now.

We then had a discussion on the proper form, the practice of the House, what the rules are, and what Beauchesne says about presentation of petitions.

While there remains disagreement, there was no doubt, at the point of Presentation of Petitions, that a senator is called upon to describe briefly the contents of the petition and not more than that. The senator is absolutely forbidden by our rules to do more than that.

If my honourable friend wants me to rehearse the ground that we went over at 12:30 a.m. or 1:00 a.m., I can, of course, do so.

As a matter of fact,—Senator Molgat will be surprised to hear this—I read from Senate Debates a series of petitions put forward by Senator Hébert, which indicate exactly how this is supposed to be done. That is found at page 2258 of Senate Debates of September 26, 1990. It states:

> Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 250 residents of the Noelville region, Ontario, who object to the goods and services tax bill.

He then presented five petitions in just about the same language.

I do not think we need—and indeed the rules do not permit—a disputation by the honourable senator on the background of petitions in our system, and so forth.

A senator who brings in a petition must do so in very sparse and brief terms describing its contents. Then, it is said, he may not read the text of the petition. While honourable senators, in my judgment, have been abusing the rules by reading names, I will leave that for a later discussion.

But certainly the rules are clear that what my honourable friend is doing now is not permissible.

I understand what we have here is another filibuster, not on a question of privilege, but on the order paper.

I would appreciate honourable senators opposite, and particular the honourable senator who is now speaking, who is also the Speaker tempore of this place, and who professes such devotion to the rules, doing what he is doing within the rules.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I thank the honourable senator for his comments, but the fact is that I was asked a question by Senator Kelly. My understanding is that it is always in order in this house to reply to a question and that is exactly what I am doing. I am replying to senator Kelly's question.

Senator Murray: Let the record show that what the honourable senator is doing is completely contrary to the rules, for which he professes such devotion.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I will continue:

> In 1840, a petition from J.J. Stockdale was rejected, as containing an intentional and deliberate insult to the House (e). On 28 March 1848, a petition having been brought up and read, objection was taken to a paragraph praying for the abolition of the House of Lords, on the ground that it prayed for a fundamental alteration of the institutions of the country; but the objection, after debate, was not pressed, and the petition, being otherwise temperately, expressed was ordered to lie upon the table (f). On 3 May 1867, a petition in favour of certain Fenian prisoners, expressed in strong but guarded language, was allowed to lie upon the table; and a motion afterwards made for discharging that order was not supported by the House (g). On 8 June 1874, notice being taken that a petition contained offensive imputations upon the conduct of the Public Petitions Committee, it was ordered to be withdrawn (h). On 3 July 1874 notice being taken that a petition contained imputations upon the conduct of certain judges and statements affecting the social and legal position of individuals, it was ordered to be withdrawn, and the printed copies to be cancelled (i). On 12 April 1875, the Petitions Committee reported that a petition from Prittlewell contained offensive imputations upon the lord chief justice and two of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, and reflected in an unbecoming manner upon the Speaker and the proceedings of the House; and on 15 April the order for the petition to lie upon the table was, after discussion, read and discharged (k).
> A petition may not allude to debates in either House of Parliament (l) or to intended motions, if merely announced in debate (m): but when notices have been formally given and printed on the notice paper, petitions referring to them are received. The procedure on petitions praying for public money, etc., has already been described. By S. O. No. 103, the usage under which the House refused to entertain petitions against a resolution or bill imposing a tax or duty for the service of the year, was discontinued. In the Lords, a petition relating to a bill before the Commons, which has not yet reached their House, or which has already been thrown out, will not be received relating to bills which have already been read the third time in that House (n).
> Petition from person attainted.- A petition has been received from persons attainted of treason in circumstances, however, which were too exceptional to establish any principle (o).
> Petitions from abroad.- Petitions from British subjects resident abroad (p) as well as petitions from inhabitants of British colonies having local parliaments (q) have always been received; and also those of foreigners resident in this country (r). In 1876, when a position from inhabitants of Boulogne-sur-Mer, several of whom appeared to be British subjects, was offered, a select committee appointed to consider the matter did not advise its reception on the ground that it contained the signatures of French citizens as well as British subjects; and the petition was rejected (s).

We heard Senator Grafstein point out that one of the people named on the list was from some location in the United States; so that particular man was, of course, not acceptable.

It goes on to state:

> Receivability of petitions dependent upon the competence of Parliament.-Although such petitions had never been refused, the receivability of a petition from the inhabitants of a self-governing Dominion (t) has been considered by a joint committee of both Houses, who were of opinion that a question depended upon whether the remedy prayed for was within the constitutional competence of Parliament, taking into account not only the law but also the conventions observed in inter-imperial relations. Neither House took any action on the report of the committee.
> In 1935 petitions from the people of the State of Western Australia were presented to the House of Lords and the House of Commons, praying for legislation "to effectuate the withdrawal of the people of Western Australia from the Commonwealth of Australia to its former status as a separate and distinct self-governing colony in the British Empire." The question whether the petition was proper to be received was referred to a joint committee (u) which reported that as legislative action for which it prayed was beyond the competence of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, the petition was not proper to be received (a). The committee based their view on a distinction between the law and the conventions of the constitution, and found that the action prayed for was inconsistent with the latter on the following grounds. (1) It is an established convention that the Parliament of the United Kingdom should not interfere in the affairs of a Dominion or self-governing state or colony save at the request of the Government or Parliament of such Dominion, state or colony. (2) In the present instance the action prayed for was an alteration of the constitution of the Australian Commonwealth—a matter appertaining to the Commonwealth as a whole and not to any one of the component states. (3) But the request for such action came not from the Government or Legislature of the Commonwealth, but from the State of Western Australia, which had no locus standi in making the request.
> On 12 December 1967 the House of Commons received a petition from the Reform Club of Hong Kong praying that the House would advise the Queen to disallow an Ordinance passed by Legislative Council of the Crown Colony of Hong Kong (b).
> Petitions for attendance of witnesses or production of evidence in a court of law.- The presentation of a petition is the usual method of seeking the leave of the House for a Member to give evidence in a court of law touching proceedings in the House or in a committee (c), or for an Officer of the House to give evidence or produce documents relating to such proceedings (d). Following the presentation of such a petition an appropriate motion may be made, without notice, for the leave of the House to be granted.

This is my reply to Senator Kelly, Senator Cogger, and Senator Simard.

I now quote from the Constitutional and Legal History of England by M. M. Knappen, Michigan State College. This is published in New York by Hartcourt, Brace and Company, 1942. I quote from the chapter entitled "The Central Government" at page 151.

> Their Influence over Legislation. The second advance was the winning of the right to petition the king as a body for redress of grievances, a right from which later legislative powers sprang. Wherever the king went in the Middle Ages he was besieged by suitors requesting justice or favours of one kind or another. On ceremonial occasions, when the monarch, surrounded by churchmen, nobles, and representative subjects, was supposed to be in especially good humour and in a mood for business, the number of these petitions increased so greatly that in the thirteenth century it became necessary to appoint special committees of the Great Council to receive and try them. Some of the petitions were referred to the ordinary courts, while others were turned over to the king with a recommendation of some particular action. Conciliar meetings held to consider these petitions were thus very important, and the special name of Parliament was first given to those held for such purposes. Originally "colloquium," or "parliament" (talkfest, from the French parler, to speak), was considered merely another name for "council", and the technical significance of the term as applied to special sessions of this body developed but slowly. The knights and burgesses did not take part in the receiving and sifting of these petitions, but they did develop the practice of presenting joint petitions, and requesting favourable royal action upon them at this time, commonly in conjunction with the magnates who made up the council itself. There thus developed the idea of a petition which was not that of a private individual, but one expressing the wishes of the members of Parliament as a whole. If the king wished to act favourably upon it, he and his advisers would draw up a decree or a statue embodying the substance of the request, which the Great Council thereupon approved. In this way representative knights and burgesses might make some small contribution to the process of legislation. In this period, however, they seem rarely to have initiated any petitions of their own, but rather to have supported those already drawn up by the nobles. Indeed, the presence of knights and burgesses was as yet not considered necessary, either at the session of Parliament that heard the complaints or in the meeting that approved the subsequent statutes. Parliament, as the term was then used, might and did often meet without either knights or burgesses when financial business was not to be taken up or when it had been disposed of and the representatives of the lesser orders dismissed.

Now I want to read from, Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons by Lord Campion, GCB, on DCL (Oxon.) formerly Clerk of the House of Commons, with a forward by the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles McAndrew. this is the Third Edition. This was printed in London by MacMillan & Co. Ltd.

Under the heading "Procedure by Petition or Bill", the following appears:

> The other main line of advance was the increasing part played by the Commons in making statutes. This was effected by a development of the procedure relating to petitions. The practice of petitioning the Crown goes back far beyond Parliament. Procedure on petitions was a large part of the business of Parliament from the beginning. They were submitted in writing and were dealt with systematically by being sorted by Receivers and heard by committees of the council in Parliament called Triers. In the great Parliament of 1305, the records of which are unusually complete, nearly five hundred Petitions were presented and they were heard by four bodies of Triers.
> Most of these petitions were from individuals, some from groups outside Parliament, and a few were parliamentary in the sense of being from groups within Parliament. Two of these presented by les pauvres hommes de la terre are supposed to have been from the Commons collectively. No distinction was made at this time in the treatment of petitions, whether individuals or collective. From the individual and group petitions, Public Bills are descended; from the collective Commons' petitions, Public Bills.

Then the text continues on with the origin on public bills, but that is not particularly relevant to the question asked by Senator Kelly and Senator Simard.

So there is, indeed, a sound historical basis for petitions. As I read in the text, it was considered from the beginning a very important part of the work of parliament. So we should not now downgrade petitions in this place, not only from the historical sense but from the very important role that petitions played in being citizens' access to government. They are the private citizens' access to this house and to the House of Commons.

I have examined some of the petitions in detail to ensure that they meet the criteria. I am convinced that they fully meet the criteria in that they do contain a prayer and are worded in appropriate terms of respect. They use words such as "humbly sheweth", which certainly shows the proper respect for the Senate. They contain the words "as in duty bound your Petitioner pray." I think that in every respect they meet the proper criteria.

They are written on pages with the proper headings. The names are included as far as I can determine; they are all individuals. There are no duplicates. There are no erasures. The addresses are on the petition.

This particular group of petitions which I now table are somewhat different from the ones we had earlier in this discussion. The earlier petitions were of a more general nature. They spoke about the GST in general terms and indicated that the petitioners did not like the GST.

They simply petitioned "we humbly and pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax."

So this is a broad approach.

This particular set of petitions is different. They have a very precise point to make, and the Speaker who is now in the Chair will appreciate this point in particular, because of his background.

These petitioners are concerned about the tax on magazines, books and newspapers. They make the point that ever since Confederation there has been a zero rate of tax on magazines, books and newspapers, and now the government proposes to include these under the GST. They believe that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is "a cornerstone of democracy, culture, and education, and that a literate productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application."

Therefore, these people petition the government to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by proposing an amendment to Bill C-62 to include the retention of the zero rate on books, magazines and printed material.

I thought the senator occupying the Chair would have a particular interest in this, giving his background. I thought he would appreciate more fully than other senators the risks involved in this particular measure, and that he would be in a position to assist his colleagues who may not have the same involvement with newspapers he has so that they understand the effect this will have on Canadian culture and education.

I think of the speech made earlier this day by Senator Fairbairn when she spoke on the question of literacy. Senator Fairbairn, unfortunately, was unable, because of events here, to attend a major conference in Alberta, a conference of which she was chairing on literacy.

Being unable to particpate in that conference, I think she very sensibly gave information to this house that she was going to give to the literacy conference. Surely that is one of the problems that is gaining in importance in Canada. There is an increased recognition that literacy is a serious problem.

So, listening to Senator Fairbairn's comments—I regret I was unable to hear all of them—it struck me that this particular set of petitions have a cogency and a particular reason for being presented today. It is because—-

Senator Lucier: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Molgat: Certainly.

Senator Lucier: The honourable Senator Molgat has been involved in politics for a long time. He was involved in provincial politics in Manitoba. He has been involved with the Liberal party most of his adult life. Could the honourable senator tell me whether there has ever been a tax on books in this country?

Senator Molgat: I stand corrected—I am not aware of all the laws and tax measures—but to my knowledge there has not been.

At times there has been consideration of such taxes and violent objections were raised. To my knowledge, they were not proceeded with.

But I do have this statement directly from these petitioners, and this is precisely what they say:

> Whereas the Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation, and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers, and now proposes to include it in the GST—-

Their statement is categorical. There has not been a tax, and I accept their statement in that regard.

Possibly the senator now in the Chair can give us a further explanation on this when he returns to his place.

I assume that these people are concerned about this and know what they are talking about.

So, this is a very special petition.

These next petitions are from my home province and include a number of people whom I know, so I want to put some of the names on the record.

Manitoba is certainly the province with the most diverse culture. Manitoba was the only province with the greatest diversity of people, but that changed after the Second World War with immigration concentrated largely in the Toronto region. But prior to that, Manitoba was the province with the most representative group of people in Canada. We have people from virtually every country in the world resident in Manitoba. There are large communities of Ukrainians, Germans, Icelanders and Jewish people. There is a great mix.

When one goes through the names on this petition one will see that in all of these communities there are people against the GST. This is not a petition by a small single group of people. Admittedly most of the people are from the city of Winnipeg. I presume that is because of the difficulty of reaching people in the rural areas.

The petition is made up of a variety of people. I note that Senator Nurgitz is not present, but he would appreciate hearing these names.

Senator Doody: He will be back

Senator Molgat: I did find, somewhat to my surprise, that there are two names on the petition of the people who live outside of Manitoba. There is a gentleman, a Mr. Tom Waige, from 63 Hillsview Avenue, Toronto. I can only assume that Mr. Waige was visiting Manitoba. We are delighted to have had him, and the many other tourists that visit Manitoba.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): On a point of order, is it not one of the rules that we not read the names of people on petitions?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: In fact, we went through that earlier this day and it was agreed that the names could be read. The rule simply says—-

Senator Doody: I am familiar with what the rule says. I thought there was an understanding in the chamber.

Senator Molgat: The rule says nothing about names. Not saying anything about names, we are then permitted to read them. We went through this earlier when Senator Nurgitz was in the Chair. We agreed that the names could be read.

So on the petition I have these two names of people who are not from Manitoba. The second person is Lisa Stratton from Montreal. All of the others are from the province of Manitoba. The petitions are dated September 22, September 22, September 22, September 24, September 25, September 10 and September 11. They are all of recent date and are quite pertinent to our discussion.

Hon. Paul Lucier: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit another question.

I spent some time in Churchill, Manitoba. Since the GST is going to apply to freight, even books, even if they are zero rated, will be more expensive in Churchill. Those living in northern Manitoba will pay more GST on a book than the people in Toronto and Winnipeg.

No one has to tell Senator Molgat the cost of shipping something from Winnipeg or Toronto to Churchill. The further north one lives, the more unfair the tax is.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: There is absolutely no question that your statement is correct. You mentioned books, which is what this particular petition deals with. Books are extremely heavy items when boxed for shipment. In a large part of the northern part of Manitoba there is no competitive transportation system. You either ship by air, which is prohibitive, or by rail. There are no roads to Churchill.

There is no doubt that the further one gets from the populated centres, the more serious the effect of this tax will be. The effect of this tax will be greater throughout western Canada. The further one gets away from the centres of production in central Canada, the more severe the impact. Our colleagues from Atlantic Canada will face exactly the same problem.

Senator Lucier's area, because of the great distances and isolated communities, is being discriminated against in an unfair way.

(Petition presented.)

Senator Molgat: So there is a tremendous variety of people and areas represented by these petitions. They are all concerned about this specific issue of the tax on books, newspapers and magazines. They are concerned enough to get involved and are making sure their views are heard by the Parliament of Canada.

I submit that this procedure is one that we must, at all costs, maintain in our system. Citizens of this country already feel sufficiently removed from government. They feel that governments do not listen to them. They feel that they do not have access to governments. They feel that governments perceive to do things on their own and ignore public opinion. This is an opportunity for Canadians to be heard, to get their views before parliamentarians. I urge my colleagues across the way to listen to what Canadians are saying, to listen to these petitioners, to listen carefully. It is not too late to change. It is not too late to withdraw the GST. That can still be done. I submit these petitions in the hope that the government will listen to the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present a number of petitions, beginning with one from my home province signed by 27 persons.

I have decided to speak in the other official language, partly to give the English stenographers a break and partly to ensure that the French stenographers will not be too rusty when the debate continues in the weeks to come!

I would like to ask Senator Molgat if he could give me the exact date on which the petition by the citizens or alleged citizens of Boulogne-sur-Mer was presented?

If he can supply me with the date, then I will proceed to comment because the discussion we had earlier on petitions and the role they have played throughout history brings to mind an extraordinary incident. At the time of the deportation, Acadians used this instrument to launch an appeal and to present their demands to the monarchy to which, by the way, they had refused to pledge allegiance.

Senator Molgat: I can give you that information, Senator Leblanc. I was just about to give what I read to the stenographers to help them out.

The exact date is given on page 796 of Erskine May, 18th edition, 1971, Treaties on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament.

This is what Erskine May had to say on page 796 under the heading "Petitions from abroad".

● (0515)

[English]

> Petitions from British subjects resident abroad as well as petitions from inhabitants of British colonies having local parliaments have always been received; and also those of foreigners resident in this country. In 1876, when a petition from inhabitants from Boulogne-sur-Mer, several of whom appear to be British subjects, . . .

[Translation]

Does that provide you with enough information?

Senator LeBlanc: Thank you Senator Molgat. Unfortunately, the date goes against my argument. The Acadians had indeed used various forms of petitions which, at a certain time, were requests for repatriation to France. That was when they were blocked at Plymouth and no authority, either local or national, would pay for their basic needs while they were being shifted from one country or from one region to another.

[Senator Molgat.]

From an historical perspective, and I will not dwell on this, it is interesting that in some cases, when rereading these petitions (that had been preciously kept, probably because they were documents that had been sent to the monarchy of the time) we did discover that some families thought to be scattered in Virginia were in fact in Georgia or in the Carolinas. In other cases, they had even been repatriated to England. The Acadians, scattered throughout the world, were the victims of the whims and often very arbitrary decisions of the authorities of the time. It is interesting to see the same system of petitions used in documents which have become very important and valuable.

In any case, I do not intend to give a history lesson; I just thought that the discussions we had around midnight could perhaps be tied in with our concerns if we could indeed relate them to the province I represent and which is asking this Parliament or this House to accept a petition from residents of the St. Stephens and St. Andrews areas as well as numerous other petitions from other villages and towns in the province of New Brunswick.

Besides, if you think of towns like St. Stephens and St. Andrews which are near the Maine border, where there is already the temptation to go across the border to purchase various items at a lower price, and that if this bill is passed, that those residents will have to pay a 7% sales tax on top of the existing 11%, it is very easy to see why those people are very concerned.

In this first petition of 27 names, I also note that these towns are important tourist sites, especially St. Andrews and St. Stephens, which, as Senator Molgat indicated earlier, welcomes visitors from other parts of the country. Thus, I see the name of Terry McKenzie from Toronto.

I have another petition of 74 signatures which is more representative than those of St. Andrews and St. Stephens. I see the names of people residing in Quebec. I see the names of people living in my former riding of Scoudouc, Mrs. Biemish and Mr. Murray. I also find names of people from Halifax, Fredericton, Laval in Quebec, Matapedia, Pointe-Claire in Quebec, Grand Centre in Alberta and, finally, a whole list of New Brunswick residents who are amazed that we would contemplate legislation to increase taxes by 7% in a province where taxes are already very high.

Another petition of 28 names is basically from the same region, but there again there are names of residents from Amherst in Nova Scotia, residents of Moncton and from the province of Quebec. And, of course, a great number of residents from St. Stephens, New Brunswick.

Honourable Senators, when I look at these petitions, I realize how serious the residents were when they signed their names and gave their address, even their postal code and, in a few rare cases, their telephone number because they really wanted to protest against a bill which they find totally unacceptable.

In this fourth petition, I also see names of people from Corner Brook, Newfoundland, who, besides paying the current high provincial sales tax, will pay an additional 7% if we allow this tax to be implemented.

I also see names of people from Port Coquitlam in British Columbia. I see people from Toronto, probably vacationing in New Brunswick, discovering our beautiful landscape. Well, there are some of the petitions from the province of New Brunswick. I will have more later. I have been asked to table some from Toronto.

[English]

But I will not delay my colleague, Senator Watt, from presenting a number of petitions from his part of the country and also to express his views on the effect of this tax on Canadian citizens, the very ordinary citizens who bothered to sign their names and to make their views known to this chamber.

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I have before me a petition which is entrusted to me. These people are calling the attention of this chamber to the realization that consumers, who make this country alive, are at stake.

I would like to outline what is the reality in this house and what is the reality in the north in terms of the cost difference between the northern and the southern areas of this country. This cost difference existed before the goods and services tax was tabled by this government, and the tax entails a hard time for Nunavik consumers.

Let me clarify what this means. "Nunavik" is another word for Northern Quebec. Some time ago the postal corporation was affected by this government. The people in the north, the consumers, used to enjoy the benefits that were provided by the government in the form of a subsidy. The Canada Post Corporation has gone ahead with its plan to increase the commercial mail rate despite opposition from northern residents. In January, Canada Post rejected Parliament's recommendations to delay raising northern rates for at least nine months. More postal rate increases are scheduled for February 1991. There are fears that Nunavik consumers will be the biggest losers, again. I repeat that this cost difference already existed before the goods and services tax. Its implementation will make things even worse.

I will just point out to honourable senators the different rates for commodities. The southern price of five pounds of sugar is $1.59, while the northern price is $8.86. That represents a difference of 143 per cent. Honourable senators, this is unreal.

People living in the north rely heavily upon services provided from the south to the north. I am talking about airline transportation, steamship transportation and services related to education. In order to educate our people, the educators often have to be attracted to move to isolated communities in the north by some form of subsidy or higher salary. As senators must realize, if the goods and services tax comes through, the more anyone makes in the north, the more he will pay through the goods and services tax.

If this tax is allowed to go through in its present form, it will not only affect the north but it will affect the south tremendously. On this side of the house we are determined to dig our heels in, hoping that the other side will understand what we are talking about. I hope they will understand the point we are trying to make.

When the committee travelled across the country, certain sets of recommendations were made, including suggestions regarding areas in the north. Because of the increased cost of goods, the people living in the more remote regions of Canada will pay more of this tax than those living in central Canada, and again that is largely due to the added transportation costs involved in shipping commodities to those regions. It is also due to the lesser degree of competition and higher markup.

The FST is imposed at the trade level, with respect to transportation charges, and so on. The goods and services tax will be imposed on the real value of sales. As a consequence of stage two of tax reform, residents of the remote regions will pay more consumption tax than the residents of central Canada for the same goods and services. Citizens will also pay more tax under the GST than they did under the FST.

Numerous witnesses in Atlantic Canada and the Northwest Territories took this position in testimony before the Banking Committee. I hope the government will take this matter seriously. It practically means killing the north—killing every opportunity that might exist or might have existed in the past for people who do rely heavily on the services that are provided there. As I mentioned earlier, people have to be educated. Tremendous achievements have been made in terms of conquering illiteracy and we are slowly succeeding. But this will change.

Medical care in the north will also be heavily affected through the proposed tax. I wonder what will offset this.

The GST credits are part of the design of the tax and are intended to ensure that the families with income below $30,000 will benefit from tax reform. But take, for example, a family living in Yellowknife making $24,000 in income. Their standard of living will not be what they would enjoy in Edmonton or Ottawa.

Senator Lucier: Or Toronto.

Senator Watt: Or Toronto, for that matter. A family living in central Canada will be entitled to the full GST credit, but one living in the north at the same level of income will not receive the full benefit because incomes simply have to be higher to offset the higher cost of living. The 1986 census shows that 60.5 per cent of northern families have an income in excess of $30,000, while only 48.6 per cent of southern Canadian families enjoy that level of income.

The committee was informed by the government of the Northwest Territories that the cost of living in Yellowknife is 33 percent higher than that in southern Canada, and Yellowknife has a low cost of living compared to that of other northern communities. Similarly, the Yukon Government informed the committee that Whitehorse is the least expensive place to live in the Yukon. Other communities have a cost of living which is approximately 10 per cent higher and others have one as much as 60 per cent higher. The higher price means that more GST will be paid. In fact, the average Whitehorse family is expected to pay $400 more GST than the average Canadian family. The system of credits does not take this into account.

The government of the Northwest Territories therefore recommended to the committee that the credits in the north be increased by 50 per cent. We wonder whether that will actually take place.

I would like to return to the matter of the postal rates. Subsidies that were provided in the normal course before no longer exist. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development used to be a department providing subsidies to the north, and it did so in conjunction with the Department of National Health and Welfare. In their denial of whether subsidies should continue to be provided by the department, officials actually said that they would undertake to study the high cost of living and of transportation in the north. Before they had made any substantial movement towards undertaking to study this matter, the proposed GST came along. When is this ever going to end? There has never been any balance from the time I can remember between the north and the south in terms of the cost of living and the cost of transportation.

A number of times I have personally transported items from the south to the north by air and steamship. The rates are usually based on the cubic foot, cubic inch or on the value of the commodity. Perhaps the goods and services tax will finally nail down the rate in the transportation end of things and people will not juggle the rates. But if the goods and services tax does nail it down, the rate will be much higher.

I do not think that anyone in this country is prepared to accept the goods and services tax in its present form. I think we all realize that, as a nation, we have to do something about the high deficit. But is this the right time to do it? A lot of us are wondering whether it is. If it is not the right time to do it, is it so difficult to realize that? How much more are we going to encumber our people? On the one hand we want them to contribute to society and help eradicate the national deficit. On the other hand, we are taking away every bit of the resources available to them. I think we all have to come to grips with the fact that we cannot have it both ways. If we want to improve the economy of the country, we have to provide some incentive. We have to put some money into it in order that, in the long run, we can recover. I doubt very much whether the goods and services tax will help accomplish that.

Surely, for the people living in the north, the goods and services tax is no good. I cannot put it any other way. The goods and services tax is not acceptable to the people living in the north. We have heard across the country from citizens of all types that the goods and services tax should be killed before it is too late. I do not think the onus lies only on this side of the house. I think the other side of the house must come to realize that, before it is too late, we had better put a stop to this crazy legislation. If it is not crazy legislation, I think all of us know that it is bad legislation. The time is definitely not right for us to allow the goods and services tax to be railroaded through. The only way this form of tax is going to work is if people accept the whole concept of it. But we do not accept it. I do not know what else we can do to convince the government of this.

I received a phone call from one of my good friends in my home town. His name is Peter Adams. He is the nephew of Senator Adams. Honourable senators, the world is very small now compared to what it used to be ten or fifteen years ago. Even in the remote communities, people listen to and watch with deep interest what is going on today in our country. I was surprised that the person who called me fully understood that the Liberal senators were doing everything they could to educate the general public of Canada as to why this goods and services tax is bad for everyone. He heard that senators on this side—"old farts" that we are, according to the paper I was reading just a while ago—were making every effort to stop the passage of this bill. He said to me, "What can we do? We are just a small people compared to the rest of the country. Isn't there some way we could declare a tax free zone?" He told me that we ought to do everything we can to stop this tax because it is a real killer for the north.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Watt: The farther north you travel, the more you pay. This is not fair. I think it is time now for all of us to realize, before the introduction of any new scheme of taxation, that we need a recovery of our economy. Let us look at this not only from the simple Canadian point of view but in terms of geographical areas. I think we need to consider those areas that might be weaker than others. I think it is time to start looking at it from the standpoint of balance, not only from the geographical point of view but from the demographic point of view. I think we should look at big corporations versus small companies. We must understand that the goods and services tax will be a killer for small business.

● (0530)

I represent a large number of small businesses in the north and I have obligations and responsibilities. My administrative responsibilities include administration of my people's heritage funds. Arising from that, we have managed to create a small number of subsidiaries which are small businesses. They will be heavily affected.

Recently through the company I represent I bought an airline company which will provide services to the people in the north—that is, north of Quebec, Labrador and the Northwest Territories. At the same time, the recession is on. On top of that, there is also talk of open sky.

Senator Perrault: You mean open wide!

Senator Watt: When looking at all of the various components I have to deal with, I say to myself, "How will this airline survive?" On top of that, this airline is owned by individual Inuit; it is not a collective company. It is not a crown corporation or a government-subsidized corporation. It is owned by individuals. I will have to turn around and charge them above and beyond what the normal rate should be. Should I belly up, or should I take it out of the pockets of those individuals? That is a hard decision to make.

One of the reasons why we bought that airline is because we are already confronted with high costs for transportation. We felt that perhaps we might be able to bring those costs down to an acceptable level. Right now, to go from Montreal to Fort Chimo, where I come from, costs $1,000 return. If I wanted to go overseas with that same money, how far would that take me? Those are the examples we are confronted with.

Honourable senators, I want you to realize that you are certainly not doing us any favours by supporting this goods and services tax. We also have the right to live. If you take that away, the only thing we have left is the right to leave. What else will you do?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have a series of petitions that I should like to present to the Senate. They fall into two groups. The first group that I will deal with are petitions whereby the petitioners pray that the Senate of Canada do stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I should like to spend a few minutes going through these petitions. They are petitions signed, in the case of the petition that I hold now, by people from the province of Alberta and are representative of northern and central Alberta. The first set that I will deal with comprises 270 petitioners all petitioning the same thing; that is, a prayer to the Government of Canada not to proceed with the proposed goods and services tax.

By way of explanation, I should like to dwell for a minute on those from my own city of Calgary. Last weekend I took the opportunity to visit a site of show homes. These are homes that are for sale, and this is an area where we have quite a lot of concern about the GST. It is not well understood. there are mixed feelings about it. In my questioning, I found people who were for and those who were against it. They were predominately against it. However, the issue with them was whether they should buy a home now or after January 1. What is the consequence of that decision? The market is already soft and overbuilt because of the recession we are now in. Perhaps we can talk about that at another time.

In terms of the uncertainty of the GST, it is clear in most people's minds that there is a four-month period beginning January 1 in which the GST will be phased in, presumably to account for the new content of goods and services in the houses. However, by April 1 the goods and services tax will be exactly 7 per cent. The net tax is held out to be approximately 3 per cent or 4 per cent.

I questioned people about whether or not they thought that would be the case, namely, that it would be a net of 3 per cent to 4 per cent. The first concern—and this reflects the strong views of those who are against the tax, as expressed in the petition here today, who ask us to do what we can to see the Government of Canada change its mind—is that the pricing structure for housing will not indicate that there is a saving. The gross price of the house to which the 7 per cent will be added after April 1—a lesser amount prior to that will be phased in in four tranches—will be a gross amount, and there will be no way for them to satisfy themselves that savings on the manufacturers' sales tax and federal sales tax will have been passed through. They find that this not in keeping with what the Government of Canada has said about the visibility of the tax. So it is a major flaw. This is a complaint of everyone I spoke to.

The other complaint was why the 7 per cent tax on housing, in particular those houses that may be used as rental property. Rents will be higher and will have to be factored into the 7 per cent cost to return the capital and the cost of acquiring that capital. This is just one example of why people are against the tax, although I see from this explanatory note that some favour the tax.

I shall now refer to those who favour it. I asked them why? The answer I received was, "We need this to pay off the debt." This was an assumption they made. When questioned about the government's position of the tax being revenue-neutral or near revenue-neutral, they did not believe it. They said, "No, it will not be revenue-neutral. This tax will generate substantial additional revenues, and we have to do something about the debt."

The fact of the matter is that it is not the government's position that the tax will do anything about debt. It cannot be revenue-neutral. It cannot simply replace one tax system for another. Accordingly, the tax must go up. That was fairly well understood by the people. The tax was originally proposed at 9 per cent. It was backed off to 7 per cent, and that is revenue-neutral. The history in other countries—and honourable senators are familiar with the speeches made during the course of the debate—is that the tax will go up, as it has in other countries.

The question then becomes: What will the additional money be used for? Will it be used to reduce debt in an orderly way and address the revenue needs of the government, or will it be used towards the end of the government's term to increase spending and not address debt, because of the popularity of increasing spending and the programs that would result from that increased spending? That reflects to a large degree the cynicism of people with whom I spoke—even those in favour of the tax. I confirm, again, that most were opposed. That is also reflected in the letters and calls that I received.

I have presented these petitions in bundles of 10.

Senator Olson: Will you entertain a question, please?

Senator Hays: I certainly will.

Senator Olson: This morning we heard that the province of Alberta is doing mostly the same thing as is stated in the petition; that is, they are going to take the matter to court on a constitutional basis. Can you tell us if you have heard what Alberta's main concern is with respect to this? They pretend to represent 2.5 million people—which they do to some extent. If this is brought into Alberta on that basis, it must mean that they are questioning the legality of it.

Senator Hays: Yes, Senator Olson. I noticed that also this morning. There is some uncertainty about what the Government of Alberta's position would be. It has now become clear that they are joining other provinces with legal actions.

From the beginning, Alberta opposed the GST. The interesting thing about Alberta is the vehemence with which it has opposed it, which probably is rooted in the fact that we in Alberta currently have no sales tax on products or services. Accordingly, this new tax is highly visible in Alberta and is very unpopular. The Alberta government picked up on that politically. As a practical matter, the thrust of their action is to try to preserve that means of taxation as provincial grounds for tax. It is a combination of things, but that is probably the thing that put them over the edge and prompted them to take action as strong as they have.

In the Alberta legislature this matter has been discussed at length in the context of the Senate. I am not sure whether this has come out in debate so far, but the opposition attempted, as was done in British Columbia, to convince the legislators to pass a unanimous resolution in support of the Senate's attempt to stop the goods and services tax. It was not too clear because the Premier of the province stopped short of that—something to do with Senate reform and Meech Lake. Nevertheless, that reservation has been safely put aside. With the commencement of this action, the Government of Alberta's position is clear.

The government is on good ground. The other actions will also proceed and will move forward. Before anything happens with the goods and services tax, I feel that time must pass so that those actions can be resolved. That will probably call for a delay of one year before the government should attempt to proceed with this. The other alternative—and a better alternative, with which those of us on this side would agree—is to abandon that and go ahead with a new tax reform, one that draws upon a proper base and does not concentrate on the tax base that the GST does, and which spreads among income groups and all Canadians the burden of our debt service requirement, as well as the need for operating revenue within our country.

One of those petitions comprise 270 names. I will also present another series of petitions which comprise approximately 300 names of people petitioning us with respect to the right the Senate has to stop the goods and services tax.

I have a second set of petitions which fall short of asking for the goods and services tax to be stopped. By way of explanation, this petition is from a group of people who are concerned about the application of the goods and services tax on printed materials. They are concerned that a tax on printed materials will inhibit the dissemination of the printed word and will have an adverse effect on culture, education and literacy within Canada.

I have petitions here with 250 names. These are all people from Calgary.

Senator Steuart: Read them in. We want to hear the list!

Senator Hays: I will describe where these people are from, Senator Steuart; but before I do, by way of further explanation, I wish to say that we do face a crisis in this sector—that is, the sector of education and the increasing numbers of our children who leave school and are semi-literate or not literate and enter the work force at a tremendous disadvantage. Any tax that prevents them from taking full advantage of opportunities they have to become literate—which, in its most basic sense is the ability to read and acquire materials—either on their own or through the direction of teachers, is absolutely fundamental. This particular group of 250 petitioners are most concerned, because this will have an adverse effect on the progress that we hope to make—and I know that all senators and parties have this as an objective, namely, a more literate group of Canadians. The effect of literacy cannot be overemphasized. When they start out in their work careers so disadvantaged, the likelihood of their overcoming that disadvantage is not great. Some of them will. But if they do address their illiteracy or lack of literacy—if they are not completely illiterate—they do so at much greater cost than if the problem were addressed when they were in school and starting their studies.

In answer to Senator Steuart's question, these people are from Calgary, although I should check to make sure of that. The various districts of Calgary are representative among these 250 petitioners. There are literally millions of people who might petition the Senate and, for all I know, have. In terms of what I am saying here, by way of explanatory note on these petitions, as I look through the names they are clearly representative of all the city of Calgary; and I submit that Calgary is representative of the country on this issue.

I may have more petitions later. However, with that I will rest my case and deliver these petitions to the appropriate person. But I do have more.

Senator Lucier: Are you going to read the names?

Senator Hays: Do you want me to read the names?

Senator Lucier: I think we should.

Senator Perrault: Please read them.

Senator Hays: I will read this latter group of names into the record.

Senator Lucier: You can get them back.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Hays: Theresa McCarr is from Clairsol. I misled you; we do have some signatories from outside of Calgary. Clarisville is a small community south of Calgary.

(Names of signatories read.)

Some of these names require time for me to ensure that I was pronouncing them correctly, Senator Steuart. I hope that gives you some idea of the representative group of people who have taken the trouble to find the place where this petition can be signed, to sign the petition and to express in the traditional way their opposition to this aspect of the goods and services tax. I am pleased to file this petition now.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: I realize that you have a lot of names. I think we should look them over. Would you mind holding on to those petitions so that you and I could put those names onto the record? It might be helpful if you could hang on to the list, if that is agreeable.

Senator Hays: That is fine. I will hold these at this time.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I have petitions here that I should like to read into the record. This petition reads as follows:

TO THE HONOURABLE THE SENATE OF CANADA

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy,

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS, the Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation, and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers, and now proposes to include them in GST, and

WHEREAS unhibited defamation of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education in a literate and productive society, will be negatively affected by GST application, and

WHEREAS we, the undersigned, your Petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to reaffirm the historic principle embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by proposing amendments to Bill C-62 to include the retention of the zero rate.

And as in duty bound your Petitioners will every pray.

Date: September 24, 1990.

They ask that the tax abolished or not proceeded with, and if it is imposed, then it should be amended to reduce the rate on the printed word to zero.

You may be sitting there wondering where some of these people come from.

Senator Bonnell: I am wondering where they come from?

Senator Steuart: I can see by the look on your faces that you are wondering where they come from. Most of the names on this page are from Saskatchewan; but they are not all from Saskatchewan. Many of them are from rural Saskatchewan. I do not have to tell honourable senators that all of Saskatchewan, but especially rural Saskatchewan, is going through some of the most difficult times in its history. The price of grain, for example, relative to inflation and the input costs is lower than it was at the worst of the "dirty thirties". We are looking at extremely bleak times. They could not have chosen a more deplorable time in the history of this country to place an added tax burden on the people of Saskatchewan. Not only that, recently the Government of Saskatchewan has announced that it is leaning towards melding their sales tax with the GST.

The sales tax in Saskatchewan is 7 per cent, but it is not on books and materials for education. Among many other things, it will apply to children's clothing. But it will be. The Government of Canada has said to them, "You can lower your sales tax from 7 per cent to save 5 per cent and meld it on top of this 7 per cent federal tax, and we will do the collecting. We will take the abuse, but you will get more money." So that, if the GST goes through and the provincial government melds theirs, the burden on the people of Saskatchewan will be even higher.

I remember when the sales tax first was first introduced in Saskatchewan. I was working in a little grocery store in northern Saskatchewan. At that time the tax was 2 per cent. The fellow who owned the store was a rough-and-ready lumberman, but he had a sideline, which was a grocery store. I was running it. I remember when we received a paper announcing that there would be a 2 per cent sales tax. It shocked the people of Saskatchewan. That occurred in 1938. I must admit that it was a Liberal government at that time. As soon as the people got at them in 1944, they dismissed them from office and they did not get back in for 20 years. I always remember that we received this letter stating that the government was to collect 2 per cent sales tax on almost everything in those days. The owner said, "How do you like those idiots? In the paper it said they would pay the merchants 5 per cent for collecting it. They are going to collect 2 per cent and pay us 5 per cent—the idiots will go into the hole by 3 per cent." I had some trouble convincing him that we got the 5 per cent on what we collected, not the whole thing. But he was right, it was a terrible move. Since then it has gone up from 2 per cent to 3 per cent to 4 per cent to 5 per cent to 6 per cent to 7 per cent, as this GST will go up, and as it has gone up in every other country.

It is no wonder that these people are petitioning us to stop it, or at least amend it if we cannot stop it. Hopefully, we will stop the whole thing. There has a been a great drive on literacy. Terrible facts have come out on the number of people who cannot read or write sufficiently to apply for a job, to hold a job or to do some of the simple things that many of us take for granted.

Senator Bonnell: It is difficult for some of those people to read these forms.

Senator Steuart: That is right; they could not read this, and they cannot even make their feelings felt in a letter or read what is going on in a newspaper to see what this government is attempting to do.

Senator Bonnell: But most of them watch television. They get a pretty good view of the news there.

Senator Steuart: I hope they can watch television, because they will be as shocked as we are.

Senator Lewis: Before they are repossessed!

Senator Steuart: That is a fact. But if they watch the news this morning, they would have seen an unbelievable sight. They say that this government is being torn by their friends—that is, the manufacturers' association, the Business Council of Canada and the great Chamber of Commerce. I say "great." I was a member of the Chamber of Commerce for years. When they appeared before us in Saskatchewan on the GST they listed five criteria by which they said they would measure what they called a fair tax. They ten proceeded, for three or four pages, to indicate how the present GST does not measure up to one of those criteria.

● (0545)

Then they finished off by urging the Senators to go back and pass the tax. But I asked them how the body of their petition to us to go back to Ottawa and pass the tax jibes with what they said about the tax? The young fellow, who was an accountant, said that they think the government will amend it to take care of the problems we foresee. I then asked him if he could give me any example of this government or any other government amending a bill to reduce the tax, and he could not give me one. He was not very old, only about 45, and I told him to talk to people who are 65 and 70 years old and they would not be able to give him an example either.

I asked him how many people he represented in the Chamber of Commerce who are against the tax. He could not tell me. The fact is that over 80 per cent of the business people in Saskatchewan, as in most parts of Canada, are against this tax. They do not want it. When they are in a bad economy, business is tough. The construction industry has almost disappeared and we are putting in a new tax on a tax.

Senator Hays: Would Senator Steuart permit a question?

Senator Steuart: Yes.

Senator Hays: I do not mean to be disrespectful in any way. You earlier compared today's conditions in agriculture in Saskatchewan to those of the 1930s. Could you elaborate on that with respect to the hardships that the GST might impose on people and whether or not the situation would be similar to the 1930s?

Senator Steuart: I would be delighted to, Senator. I remember the 1930s. I was born in 1916, and I was 14 when the 1930s hit. My dad went into the automobile business in 1929—just in time to go broke in 1932. At the time my brothers were going to a catholic boys college in Regina. Of course that was over. In less than a year my mother was running a boarding house in Regina and my father was clerking in a grocery store for $15 a week. We were not even considered to be among the people who were having the toughest time. At least we had something to eat on the table.

The people of rural Saskatchewan were in desperate straits. I remember the people of the Maritimes sent us carloads of dried cod. The only problem was they never sent out the instructions on how to use it. Because most people did not know how to cook the dried cod, they found that they best thing they could do with it was to shingle the roof. It was an interesting situation when the rain came. Still they were grateful to the people of the Maritimes for that gesture. Those are the conditions that existed in Saskatchewan.

Right now the tragedy of what is happening in Saskatchewan is hard to believe. At least in those days everyone was in the same boat, but today some people who have regular pay cheques are doing well, while other people are going through the most difficult times of their lives. We had soup kitchens in the 1930s. We have the same thing today, except they are called food banks now, and they are growing in number. In the 1930s the bright spot in western Canada was that if you could get to the coast, you might be able to get a job.

[Senator Steuart.]

We are in those conditions now, and, on top of that, the government is going to put the burden of a GST on top of those people. I am sure that if this tax goes in—and I hope and pray to God that it does not—every province except Alberta will meld their tax. That will be a double rate on the people. A taxi driver told me that he is going to have to collect the GST. I said that if the Government of Saskatchewan decides to add the GST to its tax, you will not be collecting 7 per cent, you will be collecting 12 per cent. He almost went off the road he was so outraged.

I have a name from Kelliher, Saskatchewan, which is a typical town in northwestern Saskatchewan that is having a terrible time. They have a crop this year, but they would have been better off if they had not had a crop because they could have collected crop insurance. They have a crop they cannot sell because the price is the lowest it has been for years; and, relative to the depression, the actual return is lower than it was in the 1930s. Farmers' credit limits are extended beyond anything any bank would ever give them.

This government has been generous to the farmers of Canada in some ways, but it cannot afford to do that any more. The Government of Saskatchewan never had a deficit in the 1920s or in the 1930s. Even the so-called Conservative Government from 1929 to 1934 never had a deficit. When the CCF came in they were considered to be the wild-eyed socialists of North America. I considered them to be that, but as I got older I did not think they were so wild-eyed, although I did not agree with them.

In all the years they were in power under Tommy Douglas they never had a deficit. They put the first hospitalization plan in in 1948 and never had a deficit. I was the first Minister of Health after medicare, which, strangely enough, they were defeated on. When I became the Minister of Health, we had 30 some hospitals close due to the fight we had with the doctors who came from Great Britain to make medicare work. As Minister of Health, I had to get those hospitals open and to solve the fight between the local doctors and some of the important doctors.

When you see people from Kelliher petitioning not to put this tax on, you have to put it in human terms. We listened to the economists as we travelled across Canada. They built these cute models showing how this would drop 3 per cent and that would go up 2 per cent, but the prices would go down. They do not live in the real world. A drug wholesaler told me he is going to lose $300,000 on his stock because the government is not going to reimburse him for all the tax he paid on it. He said if anyone thinks we are going to lower our prices if we get our $300,000 back, they are dreaming. That is going to happen all across Canada. By the time they get their $300,000 back, do you think they are going to lower their prices? They might, but I seriously doubt it. By that time the people will have become used to the prices and will carry on.

When these thousands and thousands of people—this is just in Saskatchewan—say not to do this, we ask you people opposite to think of it in human terms—not in cold-blooded economic terms. Michael Wilson says we have to have the money to reduce the deficit. Of course he has to reduce the deficit, but he does not need to put that burden on the backs of ordinary people. He could do it many other ways. I have the name of a person from Lethbridge. I do not know how he comes to be on this list. Perhaps he was in Saskatchewan.

We also have a person from Lang, Saskatchewan. I said Kelliher is in trouble, but Lang is in trouble. It used to be one of the most prosperous places in Saskatchewan. It had five or six big elevators and a good general store. It was one of the towns that survived and is a pleasant place to visit. They are in deep trouble. If this tax comes in and if Saskatchewan puts its tax on top of that, they are going to be in a great deal more trouble.

We have another name here from Regina, Saskatchewan. Our next name is from Prince Albert, Saskatchewan. We are back to my home town of Prince Albert. Someone said John Diefenbaker would be turning over in his grave if he saw what the government was doing to the public today. Prince Albert recently lost a packing plant, which was one of the biggest wage producers in the city. The Burns packing plant closed up and then the stockyard moved out. Then the brewery closed down. It was started in the 1920s. The only thing left is the pulp mill, which was put in by a good Liberal government under a great man named Ross Thatcher, who was assisted by a young man named D. Steuart. If it were not for the pulp mill, that town would have blown away. It is in real trouble.

In the first four months of this year, one new house was built in Prince Albert, which is a city of 35,000 people. Construction is in great difficulty. I am sure we are going to hear from Senator Sparrow, who happens to be in the construction business, who will tell us what this tax will do to it, especially if Saskatchewan adds its tax on to it.

Senator Hays: Senator Steuart, would you permit another question?

Senator Steuart: Certainly.

Senator Hays: In your explanatory comments you are talking about the plight of small, rural communities in Saskatchewan. We have heard what the effect of the tax will be on communities like Whitehorse and Yellowknife. Will the situation be the same for small communities outside a centre like Regina or Saskatoon in terms of a higher transportation costs? Do you think that will be one of the reasons the people of Saskatchewan will be upset with the GST because a small town, which has a store, will now be even less competitive with the major centres than they were before.

Senator Steuart: That is an excellent question. To deal with your question, I have another name on the petition from La Ronge, Saskatchewan. The full name of that place is Lac La Ronge. It is a town about 200 miles north of Prince Albert which depends on mining, fishing and trapping. Ninety per cent of the people there are native. They are in trouble because mining has slowed down, and, with all of the people who are now against wearing fur, the trapping industry is in trouble. On top of that, as Senator Hays suggested, they are going to have to pay a tax on freight.

When you get into northern Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Alberta and into the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, freight becomes a major cost. People cannot believe the difference in price on an item that you would buy in a city like Toronto or Regina and what you would pay for the same item up north. That is due to the freight costs. If you know anything about the retail and wholesale business, you add your profit onto your cost. If you have an article with a 50-cent built-in cost for freight, you are now going to be looking at 7 per cent GST federally and 5 per cent provincial sales tax. As a result, you are going to be adding 12 per cent onto that 50-cent article, which means another 6 cents. That is a tremendous charge when you consider purchasing articles such as a refrigerator or an automobile. Those commodities will now be out of reach for most people.

It is a thoughtless time to put a tax like this on the people of Canada because it is so unfair. If this was a fair tax, it would be bad enough, but it is an unfair tax. The people of Toronto will not pay as high a percentage of this tax as the people in the outer parts of Canada and in northern Canada—places where the people can at least afford it. Yes, Senator Hays, the tragedy will be what this tax will do to the people in the outlying parts of Canada who are away from major centres in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The situation will be even worse when you get into the Maritimes and Atlantic Canada. One wonders why the outrage is so strong. The farther you go from a major centre, the greater the outrage.

The people from Ontario are just as outraged, but they are not going to be hit as hard. But they are seeing jobs lost and now they are faced with this vicious and inequitable tax. I would hope that some of the senators on the other side would stop and examine their conscience. I am sure the new senators came into the Senate deciding that they wanted to do something good. The Senate gets attacked by the press day in and day out, and I would say some of the finest people in Canada come into the Senate, and they all come in with one idea—as do most people who go into public life —they want to make a difference. Sometimes I do not think we can make a difference, but every now and then we can. If ten senators over there decided that you would look inside yourselves and listen to the people, you could make an unbelievable difference.

You may ask me what my alternative is, and it would be easy to say that an easy alternative would be to cut costs. The Chamber of Commerce said that we should freeze all spending for the next two years. Michael Wilson said that is not practical, and I am not sure it is practical either. What has happened over the years is that the federal government has given away so much of its budget to the provinces, it has only a small portion of the budget left to pay the things they have to pay or to lessen the effect of a recession, which we are in now and unfortunately will be for awhile. That is difficult, but there are some things that can be cut.

The government could also look at our tax structure, which is unfair. I have heard the old song that corporations do not pay taxes. That is garbage. I have been in business—a small business I admit—and corporations pay tax. If they do not pay their fair share of taxes, what do they do with their money? Do they cut their costs? If you believe that, I have a bridge to sell you. They do not pay their costs; they pay higher dividends. But then you hear people say that those who receive dividends should pay tax. Are you kidding? You do not get that rich without being smart, and if you have smart accountants you will figure out some way to beat the tax. The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. That may sound like an old song, but unfortunately it is true. This tax is going to make the situation worse. The government could do a great many things to slow down spending. It could raise taxes in a more equitable and fair manner.

I noticed when that fellow who was so active in free trade—I just forget his name—was speaking, the perspiration was pouring off his face. I do not think it was because of the hot lights, because I have been under television lights many times, as I am sure many of you have, and I was never drenched with sweat. His conscience was bothering him. He was the man who was preaching free trade. Free trade was going to be the salvation of Canada. It is like talking to someone who has religion. If you believe you will be cured but you are dying, you will be told you did not believe enough. You have to believe even harder—and send in more money at the same time. These people are saying that we would be worse off without free trade. If we add this tax and have a little more free trade, we could not be much worse off. However, there are some things the government could do to relieve this tax, and I think it is taking the easy way out.

It may take me until December to get through all of these petitions. I have another name from Regina, and I happen to know that that person is a teacher who is concerned about the tax that is being added onto books. Teachers know that a great many children who come to their schools are in difficult situations. At this time of the year, families have to buy clothes, shoes and books for their kids, but at least they are tax-free. They are not going to be tax-free any more. I would like you people over there to put yourselves into the shoes of the average low income family that has two or three kids who are going to school. It is tough enough now, and this tax is going to make it even tougher. That is why the teacher wants this tax stopped, and if it is not stopped, at least amended. Remove the tax from school books and the printed word.

I have the name of a chap from Brooks, Alberta. So this is not only happening in Saskatchewan. Alberta pays the lowest taxes in all of Canada. It does not have a sales tax. The people of Alberta are more outraged than the people of Saskatchewan. The people of Saskatchewan have had a provincial tax for years and it has steadily increased. I am sure the people of Alberta know if they let the thin end of the wedge get in, the tax will get larger and larger. I think they are absolutely right to fight now and not give in.

When I look at these names I see that they come from every cultural and ethnic background. When you finish hearing these petitions, you will know they are from every part of Canada—from north to south and from the Atlantic provinces to British Columbia. No one wants to pay taxes. Someone said God must like the poor people because he made so many of them. The tax collector likes the poor people because that is who pays the taxes. So when you see where these names come from, you will know it is not just a natural feeling that no one likes to pay taxes.

There is a genuine fear that this country may not hold together, and that the country is in a recession—which, for some reason, Michael Wilson will not acknowledge. There is no use going to a person who has lost his job and is facing higher prices and asking him if we are in a recession or in a slight downturn. Michael Wilson says he planned this all along; that we are on track. The ordinary people of Canada do not think he is on track, they think he is clean off the rails and the government right along with him.

I have another name from Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. I have another name, which sounds like it might be Conservative, from Regina. I have petitions coming in by the thousands. The press says we do not have much support—and we do not have much support from the press—but we have the support of the people who count, the millions and millions of ordinary Canadians. You people over there know it and the government knows it. That is why they are so outraged. With any luck Harvey Andre will have a fit. I watched him the other day, along with that skater, Otto Jelinek. I have a letter here that says that the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. I have another name from South Fork, Saskatchewan. I have made a speech in almost every town in Saskatchewan, and I sometimes wonder if that is why we are not in the government any more. This person does not want the tax amended, he wants the tax wiped out. He does not want it to continue. I have another name from St. Front, Saskatchewan, which is a rural town that is having a difficult time.

• (0600)

The next name is that of Jerry Harrion, R.R. 1, Rose Valley, Saskatchewan. Rose Valley is a pleasant town, but like most small towns in Saskatchewan, the people are desperate. They do not need this tax. They cannot stand what you people are doing to them. That is why they have taken the trouble to sign these petitions.

The next name is Claudette Sutherland. She is from St. Front, Saskatchewan. I think everyone from St. Front signed this petition. The entire village is up in arms about this.

People from Macoun, Saskatchewan, have also signed the petition. Macoun, Saskatchewan, is another pleasant village. It is on the road between Regina and Prince Albert. I have been through that village many times. That was settled by people of Norwegian and Swedish descent. You can always tell when you are coming to Macoun, because there is a large statue of a Viking. These people are up in arms about this tax. If this is forced down the throats of people, there will be a revolt. There will be civil disobedience. They are angry.

That is what is happening all across Canada. The ground seems to be shifting under them. The country Canadians love, the one their fathers found before them, is not what they want it to be. They want a stable country. Although they do not always agree with the people they elect, they are convinced their elected representatives care about them, but now this is happening to them. Their whole world is collapsing. They do not want this tax.

I have a petition from the citizens of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. If you haven't visited Moose Jaw, you haven't lived. I lived in Moose Jaw for the first sixteen years of my life. That is where my father had his garage. He sold whippets and Willis knives.

Senator Olson: I had one of them.

Senator Steuart: I knew my father had sold one to somebody here. He did not sell many, but he did his best. He also sold a lot of Ford cars. My father had a great touch. He was a great man, but he always seemed to pick the wrong time to do something. Outside of that, he was a splendid fellow.

When I decided to get involved in politics, my father said "I have four kids and so far only one has gone wrong".

Anyway, he got over that before he died. We were close friends.

The next name on this petition is that of Robert Daniels of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. This town is having tremendous difficulty. The spirit of the people of Moose Jaw is unbelievable. They are fighting back. That used to be a great railroad sub-division. River street in Moose Jaw was one of the most famous places in all of Canada. It was stopping off place for the bootleggers. Al Capone's right hand man was in Moose Jaw, or at least we were convinced his right hand man was there.

In those days the best road in Saskatchewan was Highway No. 2. It went straight south. That was paved. The bootleggers used to go up and down that road. In fact, I used to steal beer bottles from them.

Senator Lewis: Empty ones, I hope.

Senator Steuart: Of course. We would never take the full ones, but I don't not think they really cared.

The bootleggers had Packard cars. They would fill them up in Moose Jaw and head straight down No. 2 Highway to the United States, then they would ship the booze on the Soo Line down to Chicago.

River Street was famous for other things, too. Even during prohibition the beer parlours went full blast. Moose Jaw was a lively place then. It was a divisional stopover for the CPR, but that has changed; I think the CPR station has closed now.

But Moose Jaw has lost a lot. The Air Force Base kept them going for some time, but now they depend on farmers, as everyone else in Saskatchewan does. The farmers are in real trouble, so Moose Jaw is in real trouble.

They are fighting back and trying to save their community, their way of life, and you people are going to hit them with this? Where is your conscience? Where is your feeling? How can you do this?

Most of you live in nice homes. I am sure most of you do not know how the poor live, though Senator Hatfield knows because New Brunswick has had some tough times. He would not have lasted as Premier all of those years if he did not have feeling for his people. Let that feeling come out again and let him stand up and refuse to vote for the tax. He has a no-cut contract. They cannot touch him. The only way they can get rid of the Senate is to blow it up, and this government cannot even do that right.

Senator Sparrow: I wonder if these petitioners know that Senator Murray said this morning that the tax will go through January 1, regardless of this place.

Talking about bootlegging, if the GST does go through, it will be at 7 per cent initially, but then the provinces will add their provincial sales taxes on top of that. Do you think there will be a lot of bootlegging going on within the service sector? Will the underground economy be increased because of the GST? Do you see a great underground economy growing in Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan?

Senator Steuart: I thought you would never ask that question. The committee that studied this bill heard from many economists. A wise man once said that a lot of these economists think they can see into the future, but the last man that could see into the future was crucified. Sometimes I think we should do the same to the economists. They can tell us where we are and how we got there, but then they should be dismissed.

There is an underground economy. People out there do business and do not report income. They do not pay income tax, they do not pay unemployment insurance or workers compensation, but they will have to come to the surface now because if they want to claim the taxes they pay they will have to register. They do not live in the real world. Those people do not believe in taxes.

Instead of disappearing, the underground economy will grow.

If the government knew the slightest thing about ordinary people they would realize that the underground economy grows every time taxes are raised.

I do not know how large the underground economy is, but it is growing.

When I was Chairman of Sask Power, we tried to get them to farm out their work. That was a socialist enterprise. I believe that when there is a monopoly corporation it is better for the government to run it.

I was discussing this in the past with the management of that corporation. I told them that I wanted some of the contracts let out for competitive bids. This chap, who had degrees as long as my arm, decided to give me a lecture. He said that that would be bad and that it would cost more money. I said it would be cheaper. He asked if I would agree that we all pay the same price for goods. I said that I would go further and admit that, with bulk buying, we could buy those goods for less. He said that the price would stay the same.

He then started talking about overhead, and other costs. Then he said that the contractors would want to make a profit. I told him that I had been down in the basement one day and saw high priced electricians sitting around winding motors. And one in the electrical contracting business knows that is something that electricians do when they have nothing else to do. You should not pay anyone more than $4 or $5 an hour for that.

Anyway, those electricians were earning $10 or $12 an hour back then, and they were sitting around winding motors. That was during the winter and there was little construction taking place, but they did not lay them off, they kept them on winding motors.

I told that fellow that 90 per cent of those electrical contractors are what are called jackknife contractors. They work out of their hip pockets. They do the work and sit at the kitchen table with their wives and work out the bills and pay their employees in cash. They pay the workers' compensation, income tax, and that is all. They might have a local bookkeeper do their other work. That means they do not have any overhead. When winter comes and the jobs are finished, they lay their people off. They don't have the people sitting around winding motors.

As a result of that, we cut the staff of Sask Power by over two thousand. Most of the people we cut went into the private sector, and they did just as well but worked harder.

The people proposing this tax live in another world. They live in a dreamworld. They are not down with the ordinary people, so they do not understand.

If I have not answered your question, tell me and I will take another run at it.

Senator Sparrow: Your answer was sufficient.

Senator Steuart: They used to say that I had answers longer than speeches.

I know that Senator Kirby wants to bring us some news from another part of Canada, so I yield to him.

Hon. Michael Kirby: I rise to present a number of petitions from Nova Scotia. I am delighted to see that there are on this side two Nova Scotian senators. I also see two Nova Scotian senators sitting opposite. I think it is instructive for us to understand the kinds of petitions we are getting from all across Nova Scotia.

Knowing both senators opposite from Nova Scotia were in elected legislatures for some time, I think it appropriate that I single out petitions from citizens who lived in their former constituencies.

All of the petitions I have here—and I have simply picked out half a dozen of the sixty or seventy I have recently received—differ somewhat in the opening comments, although they essentially try to make two key points, the first that the GST will have a greater impact on the Nova Scotia economy than it will have on the Ontario economy, where the manufacturing base, according to the government, will be significantly helped by the elimination of the manufacturers sales' tax. The manufacturing base throughout the Atlantic provinces is sufficiently small that there will not be much economic impetus, if any, added to the region as a result of the GST. Therefore, there is a clear regional bias under the GST.

The second point the petitioners make—and I know this because I have spoken with some of them and asked them to elaborate on why they signed the petition—is the low average family income levels, the low earning levels in Nova Scotia and throughout the Atlantic Region, add another significant burden on people already struggling to get by. There are two messages which come through, despite the fact that the petitions are written with fancy words.

Basically, there are two messages the petitioners want to give us. Since they have sent us these petitions I thought it might be appropriate if I were to give honourable senators a little flavour and background about the economic circumstances of some of these people.

The first two names on the top of this particular petition are Joanne and George Tanner. They live in Beaverbank Villa. That is one of the largest so-called homes for the aged in Nova Scotia. On talking to people who live in such homes, whether they be the Tanners or others, what you hear is real concern about their present economic difficulties. They are having a tough time making ends meet. They say that the addition of this tax, not only on every item they purchase but on every service they purchase, will make life much more difficult. The broad base of the GST is such that these people are extremely concerned that their living standards will be reduced significantly. This tax is of particular concern to senior citizens who live in these homes, which essentially are institutions. Many of the services they require—because they live in these homes—will be subject to the GST. Indeed, the goods purchased by the nursing homes and the services purchased by these nursing homes will be subject to this tax. That, in turn, will cause accommodation rates to rise.

The Tanners have lived in Lunenberg County all of their lives. They originally worked in the fishery, and then took on other occasional jobs. They worked all their lives and never had a rich life in income terms, but had a rich life in terms of lifestyle, and so forth, and now they find themselves in their final years worrying about whether they can meet financial obligations placed on them as a result of this tax.

Not only will they have to pay the 7 per cent while they are alive, but this government also plans to tax their funerals. Senior citizens find this an absolutely intolerable situation.

An Hon. Senator: Big deal!

Senator Kirby: The Senator opposite says "Big deal". I can understand that a tax on a funeral for someone with his income does not matter too much, but these people in these communities are quite concerned about that. This is a significant factor to them. They are concerned about whether they or their heirs will be able to pay the tax. They think it is unbelievable that they will have to pay this tax on their funerals. One of the classic lines we have heard is that everything is uncertain in life except death and taxes. This is the first time we have had death and taxes linked together.

In any event, I say this to give honourable senators opposite an example of the kinds of problems senior citizens all across Canada are experiencing.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question?

Senator Doody: Only if you are in your seat.

Senator Hays: Senator Doody is quite right. I will take my own seat to ask the question.

Can the honourable Senator Kirby tell us if there is any connection between the GST and the loss of our population to the United States?

The honourable senator opposite indicates that we may have an influx of people into the Maritime provinces because of the GST. Perhaps he could explain that.

My initial thought is that we will loose people to the United States because of the more favourable tax climate in that country, with the GST being the straw that breaks the camel's back.

Senator Kirby: I must say, Senator Hays, that senators opposite will understand that question was not asked by a Nova Scotian, because if a Senator from Nova Scotia had asked the question he would not have referred to the "United States". He would have said the "Boston States". We all know that to the average Nova Scotian, Quebec and Ontario constitute Upper Canada, and that the United States is normally referred to as the "Boston States". So I will respond to the honourable senators' question in the context of the Boston States.

I am not sure this will lead to a significant number of Nova Scotians emmigrating to the United States, partly because the United States immigration laws make it increasingly difficult to emmigrate to that country.

Back in my father's generation—and he is now eighty years old—people constantly moved to the United States.I have a number of relatives who moved to the Boston States. They moved to Gloucester. They live in Waltham, Massachusett, just outside Boston.

In those days immigration for people in the fishing industry was relatively easy. What has happened since then is that immigration laws have made that much more difficult.

If there has been a loss of population in the Atlantic Provinces, it is inevitably not only the result of the GST but the result of the other economic policies of the government, including the free trade agreement. Upper Canada, as we call it, specifically Ontario, has benefited from this migration. The Conference Board of Canada is reported to have said that the rest of the country's economy is sliding to the level of the Atlantic provinces.

People are not leaving the Maritimes in the numbers they used to. They used to go to southern Ontario and to Calgary. Senator Hays and I know many Maritimers who live in Calgary. They went out there in the boom times of 15 years ago. But given the way this government is systematically ruining the economy of the country as a whole, it may well be that that migration will become significantly less than it used to be.

I should like to mention, another name on this petition. Marilyn McNeil is from Antigonish. I point out this name specifically because Antigonish, since 1984, has become a famous community in Canada. Some honourable senators may not realize this, but Antigonish is the home of St. Francis Xavier University, a very good university, I might add, and one that has been given significant publicity since 1984 because that is where the Prime Minister and most of his cronies went to university.

It is certainly an interesting comment that it appears, from reading newspapers and books that have been written on the Prime Minister's relationships, that friendships built during his time at that university have become lasting friendships. I say this parenthetically, but the only thing that surprised me is that it turns out that the use of cronies is not unique to Antigonish, since it is clear from last weeks' ruling that the Speaker is another crony of the Prime Minister's yet he did not go to St. Francis Xavier University. I only raise this to indicate that people—

• (0615)

Senator Kelly: Could I raise a question? Will Senator Kirby be going on for a while? I have a question to ask him but I have to leave the chamber briefly. Can I count on his still talking when I come back so that I may put my question?

Senator Kirby: I would certainly be delighted to hold the floor until Senator Kelly returns. I am prepared to do that.

Senator Barootes: Be sure you are back before noon!

Senator Kirby: Perhaps I could also comment on one other name on this petition. Unfortunately, I do not see any Newfoundlanders in the house. I am sorry. I did not see Senator Lewis. Senator Doody is also here, as is Senator Cochrane.

Senator Lewis: Just because Newfoundland was not one of the divisions under the Constitution in 1949 doesn't mean to say that we should not be recognized. I do not mean to say that we were not one of the divisions; we were one of the divisions for the purpose of appointing the so-called divisional senators. I just wanted to point that out. I want to draw attention to that fact because we feel very strongly about this. We have been treated differently from the rest of the country under the Constitution.

Senator Kirby: I have very close connections, as Senator Lewis knows, with Newfoundland, since both of my parents come from Newfoundland. Indeed, all of my aunts, uncles and cousins, with the exception of one, continue to live in Newfoundland. I say, "live in Newfoundland" as opposed to, for example, saying "live in Canada" since some of my relatives voted against Confederation in 1949. At least one of them has failed, I think, to accept fully the fact that it occurred.

As Senator Petten and Senator Lewis have pointed out, it might have saved the government an enormous amount of grief had Newfoundland been included in one of the divisions of Canada. As senators know, there are at the present moment several members of Parliament from Newfoundland and only six senators. Therefore, the entire legal argument taking place across the country over the appointment of one of the British senators, Senator Ross, might have been avoided had Newfoundland been included in another division. In fact, the argument of Section 51A would never have occurred had that extra Senate seat been open to Newfoundland.

(Names of signatories read.)

Mount Pearl, as many Senators know, is located very close to St. Johns. Indeed, it is the place where former Premier Peckford lived for many years. He had a lovely house built at Mount Pearl. He may still live there, although I am not 100 per cent sure of that. Nevertheless, Mount Pearl is a lovely part of St. John's. It is an interesting observation simply that, on this petition, there are a number of Newfoundland names.

On another petition there are some names of people from Topsail. Topsail, as some Senators may know, is a community about 45 minutes' drive outside St. John's. It is a community I happen to know well because my uncle and aunt have lived there for many years. I have a number of cousins and other relatives living in the area. In talking to them about the GST—and, indeed, in talking to some of the other people whose names appear on these petitions—it becomes fairly clear, on the matter of what the Liberal senators ought to do about the GST, that Newfoundlanders and Nova Scotians are strongly opposed to the tax. They believe that we ought to do something about it.

The opposition to the tax, I might point out, is not just in the one or two isolated communities I have pointed out. There are, of course, dozen of names here from Halifax and Dartmouth. When Senator Forrestall returns, I will have a few things to say about Dartmouth. When he was a member of the other place, that was the area he represented. I think I will save those comments until he comes back.

However, since Senator Buchanan is still here, I ought to make the observation, for example, that there are several names here from Hacketts Cove.

(Names of signatories read.)

Hacketts Cove is a small community. It used to be, and still is, as a matter of fact, in the provincial riding of Halifax. Senators might not realize this, but Senator Buchanan actually represented Peggy's Cove at one point, very early on, I believe, before redistribution.

Hacketts Cove is one of the communities that you go through if you are driving from Halifax to Peggy's Cove. The next time any senators go to Peggy's Cove, I recommend that they stop in at the gift store there. I don't remember the name, but Senator Buchanan may. It is the most marvellous gift store in Hacketts Cove, with all kinds of Nova Scotian artifacts and handcrafts, for the most part examples of the cottage industry.

I raise the matter of the gift store not primarily as a sales pitch for the store, but because in fact I was in that store about six weeks ago. I had a long conversation with the owners of it.

[Senator Kirby.]

It was an interesting example of a small retail operation in Nova Scotia and, indeed, the same thing would be true for small retail operations across the country.

In talking to the owners of that store about the impact the GST will have on them and on the nature of their business, it became clear that from their point of view the administrative costs of handling that tax will be significant. It was one of the few times I have had an opportunity to spend some time talking in depth to people about the practical problems associated with the GST for small businesses.

In travelling across the country this summer, the GST committee heard many presentations. A number were from organizations like the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which attacked in macro terms the problems of the small retail operations, particularly those that sell goods that are tax exempt. Some goods are zero rated and some goods are tax exempt. These people will have enormous difficulty in keeping track of the books, making sure that the correct provincial sales tax and federal sales tax is paid on different items. There will be increased costs for these types of businesses.

The problems these people who operate the handicraft stores will have, over and above those encountered by the ordinary retailer, arise because they are buying their goods largely from individuals who work out of their homes, who are potters and other artisans. Those individual artisans will also have to deal with the GST. So I have found when talking to people who operate handicraft shops that they are extremely concerned about the way this tax will impact on their businesses.

Another name on the list is that of Don Johnson. Their is also the name of Gordon Chang from Ketch Harbour. Ketch Harbour is in Senator Buchanan's former provincial riding.

More than twenty years ago, when Senator Buchanan was first running, I had the honour of having the Premier of Nova Scotia as my member of the provincial legislature—as I lived there back then. The Don Johnson on this petition who lived in that riding had an interesting history.

Senator Kinsella: Is that the same Don Johnson who is the president of the Liberal party of Canada?

Senator Kirby: I am glad you raised that question. The Don Johnson who is the president of the Liberal party of Canada lives in Montreal, but does have connections to Nova Scotia. The Don Johnson who is the president of the Liberal party of Canada is married to a Nova Scotian. Indeed, he spends a considerable part of his summer down in Nova Scotia on the south shore. Like many Canadians, he not only has learned of the wonders of marrying into a Nova Scotian family and acquiring that tradition, but also what a wonderful place Nova Scotia can be in the summertime.

I was referring to a different Don Johnson. I am not referring to the Don Johnson that is on Miami Vice, just in case the honourable senator thinks that. Unfortunately, I do not know that Don Johnson, although I must say that my teenage children certainly wish I did. They would regard that as being significantly better than knowing either of the other two Don Johnsons I do know.

The Don Johnson I am referring to was, in fact, the lighthouse keeper on Sable Island during the Second World War. There have been many photographs taken of that lighthouse.

During the Second World War, that lighthouse was manned by Don Johnson. There was a fear among the Allies for sometime that if the Germans were going to invade North America, one of the ways they would do it was to first use Sable Island as a staging area.

Senator Buchanan and I have been out to Sable Island a few times. We can testify that trying to use the sandbars as a landing base would be an extremely difficult challenge, if not an impossible one.

I raise this and the Ketch Harbour connection by Don Johnson only because the map many tourists are given when they go to Nova Scotia—the one showing all of the shipwrecks scattered around Sable Island—was drawn by Don Johnson during the Second World War. So if you ever ask yourself what a lighthouse keeper does to avoid boredom on his long tours of duty you know the answer. Mr. Johnson spent a lot of time out there in those days because the only way to get back and forth was by boat. There were not the small aircraft that we now have that are capable of landing on that Island. These days if you want to go to Sable Island, you charter a small aircraft or a helicopter. The oil industry has developed all sorts of ways to move men and equipment around. They now use helicopters.

But in the days Don Johnson was there, those aircraft were not available. At one time I think he spent over a year there. He, as I said, drew the map detailing all of the shipwrecks that had occurred off Sable Island over a two hundred year period. I am sure that if he were still around today—unfortunately he passed away several years ago—I have no doubt, speaking on his behalf, Don Johnson would have been more than delighted to have signed this petition. I think one ought to make that observation.

I also think I ought to make the observation that there are a number of signatures on this petition which come from Yarmouth County, Southwest Nova, as the area is called for federal electoral purposes.

I was down in that part of the province not too long ago. On talking to the people down there, you find that they are very concerned about this tax, even though some people down there are prosperous as a result of their work in the fishing industry. It might surprise some honourable senators to know that there are prosperous fishing communities. In fact, for many years in Yarmouth County in southwestern Nova Scotia, generally speaking, many of the average fishermen have done very well economically. They have done well because they are the epitome of the individual entrepreneur, willing to go out and work hard under very arduous circumstances. In fact, they behave in a very entrepreneurial fashion in the way that they go out and catch the fish but also in the way that they launch businesses. For example,they commenced the trucking of fresh fish to the United States and moved in on the very lucrative fresh fish market in Boston.

• (0630)

Honourable senators, at the present moment, of course, most of those fishing areas are having a hard time because of the current state of the fishery. However, they have not, in fact, suffered the severe ups and downs experienced by many other parts of the industry, particularly in the outports of Newfoundland.

However, when you talk to individuals such as those entrepreneurs on the east coast, they know that they will find themselves having to deal with a tax not only on goods they buy but on goods they sell.

These are people who do not necessarily have a great deal of education but who basically believe that their lives consist of getting up early in the morning and going out and doing a day's fishing. Therefore they do not really want to be bothered with all of this government stuff. They find this business of having to deal with Revenue Canada and tax people in general under any circumstances not something that they particularly like doing. More importantly, they find that the complication this tax will add to their lives is something that they absolutely do not want to deal with and, in fact, they really do not know how to deal with it.

What I find when I talk to these kinds of people is that they say: "Are there not any alternatives?" I would hope that, at some stage in the game, we in this chamber can, in fact, begin to talk about other alternatives.

Just as a passing illustration, some honourable senators may also have received a brochure that come into my home the other day. This brochure talks about one alternative to the GST called the "single tax", I believe. This brochure is very clear, so it was probably not written by anyone in the Government, or by anyone in the Department of Finance, nor by my Michael Wilson. This "single tax" seems to me to be an idea which needs to be very seriously considered as an alternative to the GST.

There was an argument made a few moments ago, when Senator Stewart was speaking, that there is no alternative to the GST. That argument is, of course, not true and as proof of that statement, I point to this brochure which I believe may have been mailed to every home in Canada. It seems to me—

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Is this a debate, Senator?

Senator Kirby: No, I am not debating, honourable senators, I am speaking about the petitions in the sense that one of the points that the petitions make if that the petitioners are opposed to the tax, but because that they believe among other things that there ought to be other alternatives. I was merely making the observation without wanting to get into a detailed discussion of the GST. I would be quite happy to do that at some length on another occasion.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: So would we!

Senator Kirby: I am merely pointing out that there are, in fact, other alternatives. It was in that context that I was speaking to the petition which talks about the fact that they are opposed to the GST and that they are interested in other alternatives and I raised that as an option.

I should also point out, honourable senators, that there are number of signatories on these petitions from communities along Nova Scotia's south shore, stretching all the way down through Lunenberg County through Queens County to Shelburne County. In particular, a number of the signatories, from the Bridgewater area, both from Bridgewater itself and other communities such as New Germany, and Pleasantville, which is a lovely community just outside Bridgewater. There are others from such places as Barss Corner. There is even one from First South. Believe it or not, "First South" is the name of that community it was the first community south of Lunenberg.

There is also a signatory form Back Centre. In case some honourable senators do not understand, Back Centre is actually the name of a community because there is also a community called Centre. If you lived down in Lunenberg county with a perfect with a perfect Lunenberg accent, you would pronounce it "sentry" and not "centre".

However, honourable senators, as one reads through these petitions what we find is that there is a whole series of names and a whole series of communities which cover almost all of the south shore of Nova Scotia. As I said, in several cases I have spoken with these names on this petition, having received it in the last little while. My experience has been that when you phone these people and say to them, in effect, "Why did you sign this petition?" What they usually say in response is that they signed it because essentially they are at the point where they believe that they simply can no longer afford to pay increased taxes.

When you live in a place such as Barss' Corner or First South, or even in a bigger community such as Bridgewater, what you find is that essentially people are saying, "Enough is enough. We simply cannot afford to shoulder this additional tax." Therefore they have petitioned the senators on this side of the house and ask us, in effect, to try to ensure that the tax does not come into effect.

Senator Hays: Senator Kirby, I would like to ask you a question. You have some special expertise as I recall, in the fishery and its structure. Some speak kindly of you, and some unkindly—and you may wish to comment on that.

However, because of the time you have spent studying the fishery, I would like to ask if, during the course of your conversations with these petitioners many of whom are from fishing communities—they have indicated to you what motivates their opposition to the tax as it relates to the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax or the federal sales tax in terms of capital equipment that might be required in the fishery as it relates to the fish processing end, and the replacement of that sales tax with the Goods and Services Tax. I think it would be a great shame to take advantage of your expertise, since you are on your feet, and ask for some comment on that aspect.

[Senator Kirby.]

Senator Kirby: Thank you, Senator Hays, I will comment on that. Perhaps I ought to point out that there is somewhat frequently misconception of the nature of the fishing industry. In terms of the actual number of people employed in the fishing industry, there are far more people, as Senator Comeau will know, in small, individual boat operations than there are in large processing plants, and therefore, in fact, the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax is not of much help if your entire asset are base is a boat, essentially, which you use to go out and fish over night.

Even if you are so-called inshore fisherman, going out in the morning and coming back at night, the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax will not help you very much since you are not buying enough goods. That contrasts with the situation with respect to the big fish processing plants, as Senator Hays has mentioned in his question, where, in fact, there may be some modest benefit.

The fact of the matter is that the dilemma I find in talking to, in particular, the inshore fishermen who usually are out on the water by 4:30 a.m. and come back in the early afternoon, is that the complication the GST will add to their lives is so horrific from their point of view that two things are bound to happen. First of all, it is horrific from their point of view because it gets them increasingly involved in a complicated paperwork world that they do not understand and do not want to understand and do not really want to act on. It is a paperwork world in which adding on seven percent here and there is something they simply do not know how to deal with and do not particularly want to learn how to deal with. Therefore the situation for people such as the ones I have been talking about, is that there is a paperwork problem.

However, honourable senators, there is a far more serious problem. Historically, in rural Canada, a significant portion of the economy has been what economists would call "the underground economy". What that really meant people provided services for one another for which cash was not exchanged. Alternatively, transactions were done in which were paid for in cash, and not by cheque, on the understanding that, in that fashion, the transaction was not easily traceable by the tax department. Therefore the net effect, particularly in rural Canada, is that there has always been a thriving underground economy.

From the point of view of the people I have talked to, and contrary to the arguments made on behalf of the Government, one of the impacts of the GST will be to increase the size of the underground economy. The reason for that is no one will want to pay the tax and therefore they will be quite willing to work out arrangements under which functions performed, goods are sold, services are sold and the sales are done in such a way that all transactions are by cash, as opposed to being transactions handled in some other way, thus having the tax paid on them.

Therefore, Senator Hays, it seems to me that one of the big impacts of the GST, certainly in rural Nova Scotia and rural Newfoundland, will be to significantly increase the size of the underground economy. The net effect of that, of course, will be to reduce the Government revenues rather than, in fact, to increase them. While that is basically that is an economic problem, it seems to me that it is a bigger problem in another way, and that is, the extent that we instill in people—and in subsequently in their children—the principle, the feeling, the attitude, the values—

Senator Buchanan: None of my constituents were involved in that kind of underground economy.

Senator Kirby: Senator Buchanan is pointing out that none of his former constituents were involved in that underground economy. Senator Buchanan, since you are now leaving the Chamber, I will wait until you return before I make some further remarks about several of your former constituents who, in fact, signed these petitions. I am sure you know some of them personally and I am also sure that in the past, they have been misguided enough to vote for you. Nevertheless, they were willing to sign this petition. As I say, on some future occasion, I will gladly give you their names. I can tell that, at the moment, your term of duty is over at 10 o'clock which is why you are leaving the Chamber at this point.

Senator Graham: Perhaps they signed when he was the Premier of Nova Scotia.

Senator Kirby: Yes, that could be. Certainly, as I pointed out, at one time I lived in Senator Buchanan's former riding for some time and there is no doubt that important public policy issues such as the quality of the road system and other things were substantially enhanced by virtue of the fact that they were in the riding represented by the Premier. While I would not like to see the correlation, it certainly would appear that perhaps there might have been some correlation. Certainly, as someone who lived in the riding for some time, I was delighted with the results in areas such as roads and so on, because of the Premier's influence.

In any event, before I got marginally side-tracked by Senator Buchanan's interjection, I wanted to finish the point I was making about the underground economy. One of the real problems, it seems to me, with encouraging the growth of the underground economy is in terms of the values that it ultimately teaches the next generation. What happens is that the next generation, the generation of our children, begins to believe that it is acceptable, that it is all right, that it is appropriate, that it is a routine way of doing business, essentially, perform transactions in a way that hides tax revenue from the Government and it seems to me that we are teaching the next generation of Canadians and, in particular, the next generation of Nova Scotians a set of values which are inappropriate.

It is often said that Government action frequently produces unintended side effects. In that context, there was a very good study done several years ago by a professor at the Kennedy School of Policy at Harvard. The book resulting from that study was subtitled: "The Unintended Effects of Government Policy". In that book, the professor went into a whole series of public policy issues, including housing programs, tax programs. What he pointed out, essentially, was that what happens very frequently if that the Government introduces a policy which is intended to have a particular consequence; to get the population to do certain things. What happens is that there is a side effect that turns out to be far more difficult, or complicated, or creates more problems than the original problems the policy was intended to solve.

It seems to me that when we talk about the underground economy, what we are seeing is a situation in which a tax revenue grab by the Government will, in fact, have a significant impact on the morality that the populace at large will have and, consequently, by their children and grandchildren will have when they look at the overall issue of paying taxes. In my opinion, any public policy which ultimately encourages Canadians to behave in a way which is, in some sense, immoral or wrong or against the law, or designed to evade the law, that that is a very poor way for people to proceed.

Therefore, honourable senators, I worry about that aspect of this situation, because as I see, and I go down to Nova Scotia to talk to people in the fishing villages around the east coast, I find that this is clearly one of the lessons that they are learning out of this entire proposal. In other words, there must be some way of avoiding the tax, and they needed to find a way of doing just that.

In closing my comments on the first couple of petitions, I would like to make one last observation, and that is—Senator Kelly you will be pleased to know that I waited for your return as I said I would—I would like to note that one of the other things which struck me on reading these petitions, and indeed on talking to the people whose signatures appear on these petitions, is that there is an incredible cross-section of ages. As I began my remarks by referring to some people who live in Beaverbank Villa. However, I would like to point out at this stage that the ages of the people who signed these petitions range from 19 all the way through to a couple in their 80s.

No matter what their age, when you talk to them, you find out very quickly that they are strongly opposed to the GST. The young people are particularly concerned that the impact which the GST will have on educational costs, including the cost of books training programs and fees for other than for formal training educational institutions such as training and upgrading programs of all kinds. A number of people on this list have currently in the midst of undertaking such a program and when you talk to such people about their concerns, what you find out is that they are concerned because they realize that if the tax goes into effect the impact on their ability to ultimately afford more educational programs will be profound.

Honourable senators, that concludes the comments I wish to make on the first two petitions. As I say, I have another 25 or 30 petitions on which I would be delighted to comment later. There are also a couple of names of people I spoke with before my remarks today. However, they were not available and in one case I told the daughter who answered the phone that I would call back today, and I intend to do so.

However, I hope I have given honourable senators some small inkling of the kinds of people who are petitioning those of us on this side of the chamber to defeat the tax. What, in my opinion, we all need to be aware of and conscious of is the fact that there are Canadians all across this country—and not necessarily those Canadians that you read about in the Business Section of the Globe and Mail, which I mention in view of the fact that many of the senators opposite heavily involved in the business community—as I say, many ordinary, average, everyday, working Canadians who are seriously troubled by this tax; who are troubled by what this tax will do to them in economic terms and who are troubled by the kinds of messages that is being conveyed to them with respect to government waste and government extravagance and who are troubled by the messages they think they will ultimately be passing on to their children. Such messages will be how to beat the taxman and how, essentially, not to cooperate with government.

It seems to me that if it is true that Government can survive only so long as it does so with the support of the governed then when one has a tax such as this tax that is being attacked in these petitions, and if it is also true that the average Canadians out there across this land, and in particular the average Nova Scotians, are so strongly and viscerally emotionally concerned about this tax that they will sign these petitions in such numbers, then it is important for us to recognize that laws which have that degree of public opposition are, in fact, not only poor public policy but help, in the long run, to denigrate the entire business of government and of governing. It seems to me that that is something that all of us on both sides of the chamber, ought to be concerned about.

That is why it seems to me that a number of members opposite ought to rethink the position they will ultimately take when we come to deal with this issue, particularly in light of the fact that a number of them have made comments about the problems and the reasons for disliking the GST prior to their being appointed to this place. I would hope that, as they listen to these petitions and to the comments that many of us are making with respect to the views of the average Canadian, that the members opposite will take those into account when, some time down the road, we get to the point where we are dealing directly with the Senate Committee's report.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I will be brief. As Senator Kirby mentioned, we are dealing with the report. Some of the matters that Senator Kirby has raised, that perhaps should have been taken into account in the drafting of the legislation, I must say I find persuasive. Senators who are members of the committee will know that I am not able to be present at all of the hearings, but I have had an opportunity to examine the report in detail.

However, there is something that bothers me a little—and this is really a question for Senator Kirby: given the fact that this report does contain some pretty valid criticisms, do you really believe that the committee fully carried out its responsibilities when it came up with a concluding recommendation that simply said that the Senate should not deal further with that legislation.

[Senator Kirby.]

Honourable senators have often heard me on the subject of caucuses. I still have a hard time recognizing two caucuses in this Chamber. To me, the Chamber as a whole a caucus, and the job of this caucus is to improve legislation. That has been part of our whole history. However, I wonder if we met that historical obligation by simply saying: "There is a lot of things wrong with this legislation. Let us not go any further." Is there not a possibility that perhaps we fell short.

Senator Kirby: I would be delighted to respond to Senator Kelly's question because he has raised a valid point. As Senator Kelly knows, on many public issues, and on perhaps the vast majority of public issues that have come before this Chamber, he and I are in agreement. I also might say that, on behalf of the Liberal members of the Committee—and I say this with real conviction and sincerity—the Committee would have been a lot better off and a lot wiser had Senator Kelly been able to be with us this summer since I realize that you were ill and were unable to be with us, but your contribution on the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, over the years that both you and I have served on it has been extraordinary since I will certainly tell you that there were many times when those of us on our side of the committee regretted very much that you were not able to be there since we thought the hearings might have been disrupted much less by some members on your side, and have been much less unruly than they, in fact, turned out to be.

However, with respect to your particular question, it is a very interesting question. During the summer, several of us on this side of the chamber said, privately as well as publicly, that one of the issues the Committee was whether or not we propose amendments, as we have historically done, which would deal with many of the criticisms of the bill. Indeed, many of us, through the first two and one-half to three weeks of the hearings had started to compile lists of the potential amendments. However, as time went on it became apparent what the problem was. Senator Kelly, if you had sat with us there, day after day, twelve and sixteen hours a day, what you would have seen in the end was that, to meet even a handful of criticisms and comments and suggested changes that were put forward to us by organizations across the country would have demanded and enormous number of amendments.

When I talk about these criticisms I do not mean only criticisms from individual citizens. In fact, what individual citizens were saying to us was: "We do not mind paying taxes if we think the money would go to a government that would not waste it. We do not mind paying taxes specifically."

In fact, honourable senators, the majority of the witnesses mentioned one other of the three things for which they were always willing to pay taxes and those three things were: Taxes that would help improve the environment; taxes that would go towards the health care system and taxes that would go to improve the educational system. Therefore the blanket statement that Canadians are always against tax increases, as has been made by some senators opposite, is simply, to me, blatantly unfair. The fact of the matter is that Canadians have shown, and continue to show, all across this country, a willingness to occasionally pay higher taxes for things where they feel they are getting some return. The problem with a number of the individuals who said they did not want to pay the GST was that they believed that, in fact, they would wind up paying a significant amount of money for which they would not get anything in return. That, honourable senators, they regarded inherently as a bad trait.

However, honourable senators, it became clear that the reason we should not merely amend the bill was that if you listened to the briefs, including briefs from a large number business organizations and individual companies and industries, such as the insurance industry, the brokerage industry, the customs brokers, the funeral directors—if you read the list of witnesses from whom the Committee hears, you will see that we heard from some 400 witnesses across the country. Virtually every single witness including industry groups and organizations and so on, proceeded to some amendments that would clearly be needed if, in fact, the bill were to be workable. Forget about the fact of whether or not they wanted to pay taxes. These were just practical problems that had to be dealt with.

Indeed, as you listened to the comments of witnesses—not prompted, I might say, by anything that Senators on our side said—it ultimately became clear that to amend the bill would require such a massive number of amendments—and when I say "a massive number", I do not mean two or three or four or five; I mean dozens and dozens and dozens—just to deal with the practical problems. In fact, it became clear that the GST would not only be an administrative nightmare, by which I mean partly regular Tory and partly legislative, but would also have enormous negative economic impact on an unlimited range of companies.

● (0645)

People like myself ultimately came down to deciding whether one attempts to massively rewrite the bill from scratch or recommends to the House that the bill be defeated, in effect letting the government rather than this House try to start from scratch and redesign a bill. Frankly, that is how someone like myself got to this point.

I have said publicly, and privately, that that was not my position at the beginning of the summer. I ultimately came to the conclusion that rejecting the bill was the only logical alternative because of the massive rewrite that was necessary. It could not be done, in practical terms, by a committee of the Senate. It was too complex and required a massive number of amendments. That is why I came to that conclusion.

Senator Kelly: I do not mean to be provocative, and I believe Senator Kirby did enter into this exercise with the idea of honestly trying to improve the legislation because he has had too much experience to do otherwise. However, I still have the feeling, from reading the reports of the committee examination in the very early stages and seeing some quotes from members of the committee, that it is fairly clear that the decision in advance was not to accept a value-added tax but simply to kill the bill. That was my impression.

I am not alleging that that was the case throughout the committee's deliberations.

Your second argument is that you would have to totally rewrite the bill. Historically, the procedure of the Banking committee has been to advise the government that it believes the bill needs substantial rewriting and then give some of the reasons. The responsibility lies with the government in promulgating the legislation. I believe the committee did say ultimately that this was too much work and "Let's just drop it".

While there are some marginal problems, there are a few serious central issues that might have been better handled. That is my point.

Senator Kirby: I appreciate that point of view. I found myself wrestling with that point of view versus a view of changing the bill. I also understand that as a result of reading some of the committee's transcripts, Senator Kelly may have come to the conclusion that the committee had set out, perhaps, to kill it. Equally, I think he will agree, if he reads the committee's transcripts, that it was clear that a number of senators opposite saw nothing wrong with the bill and believed nothing should be changed.

It is fairly clear that perhaps both extremes were represented on the committee, although in a minority. That is why I say I wish someone of your normal tone of moderation could have been on the committee.

Let me use the analogy of a bill that was before my time. I had some familiarity with it when I was in the public service in Ottawa. It was a bill in the early 1980s to create the Canadian Security Intelligence Agency. I believe Senator Kelly was on that committee.

I raise this as an example only because of the press comments about the Senate never recommending that a bill be killed or recommending massive changes. You will recall what happened to the original CSIS bill. It had passed the House of Commons and come over to the Senate. The Senate held a considerable number of hearings in approximately 1983 or 1984. It became abundantly clear that had the government proceeded with that bill it would not have passed the Senate. It was very clear that it was so flawed that it needed massive rewriting, and rather than proceeding with the bill the Liberal government of the day simply withdrew it. It was agreed that a new committee of the Senate would be struck, chaired, I believe, by Senator Pitfield. I believe Senator Kelly was a member of that committee, if not the vice-chair. That committee proceeded to hold hearings for some eight months on the nature of what a civilian security intelligence agency should be, then effectively outlined to the government a whole series of policies on how it should operate in this regard.

The government proceeded to draft a bill, basically adopting every change that had been recommended by the Senate committee, and introduced a totally new bill. I point that out as an example in this decade of when, rather than recommending dozens of amendments, the government withdrew the bill and proceeded to draft a new one.

Many of us hoped that might well be the outcome of this summer's hearings as they wore on, except it became abundantly clear from Conservative members of the committee that they were not prepared to change one word of the entire process.

I share your concern, Senator Kelly, that it was that breakdown or rigidity that caused the breakdown in the process which you so aptly described, and reflects the way in which this place works.

Hon. Herbert Sparrow: Senator Kirby, there probably could have been amendments or extensive changes made to make the bill more palatable for the Canadian people. The precedent that has been established recently by the government is that the Prime Minister is really not prepared to accept any amendments to legislation.

I refer to the Meech Lake discussion when the Prime Minister stated that there would not be a comma changed; that no changes would be made. There is the unemployment insurance bill and the pension bill, which has gone back, and about which the Prime Minister stated there would be no amendments or changes. He will not even have a conference with senators to discuss this. If that is the case and that is the precedent, would there have been any sense at all in trying to make any amendments to improve the bill, or would the precedents have established simply that the government will have no truck nor trade with those old farts in the Senate, as Minister Mr. Jelinek said yesterday? I just want him to know that we are not all old.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Sparrow: Would you answer that question?

Senator Kirby: It is a difficult question to deal with under the circumstances, but a very important point has been raised. It follows very much on the drift of Senator Kelly's question.

This place has historically worked as a result of both sides getting together and agreeing, making suggestions, recommending changes and amendments. The dilemma we have faced in the last six years has been as a result of the view of the government in the other place. I really believe it is the government in the other place, as opposed to government members here, who believe no changes ought to be made and that everything that comes forth from the government, every bill that is tabled in the other place, is essentially perfect and we should never be required to make any changes. The attitude that troubles me is that they have a sense of having their own way, and that they know best.

Most people know that I do not normally use strong language on political issues. I may be involved in politics but I do not use strong language. However, I use very strong words when I talk about a system in which a majority government in the other place can use whips to get their legislation through, and simultaneously take the view that public opinion is not a constraint on government behaviour and that recommended changes from this place are not a constraint on government behaviour. That means there is effectively no constraint whatever on government, with no checks or balances. That situation is effectively a dictatorship by the Prime Minister and Cabinet. In my view, in a parliamentary democratic process, that is not how we have operated historically in this chamber.

I believe this has been brought about not by members opposite, because I do not believe that is their point of view individually, but by the Prime Minister whose view is that under no circumstances should any changes or should any rules interfere with what he wants to do.

I have a very interesting illustration of that. I will not reopen the issue of the Speaker's decision, except to make one observation. When Elijah Harper lodged his one-man crusade against the Meech Lake Accord in the Manitoba legislature there were two members of the cabinet, Senator Murray and the Prime Minister, who repeatedly stated in the days leading up to the death of the Meech Lake Accord that the Manitoba legislature ought to ignore its own rules and prevent Elijah Harper from speaking. They repeatedly said on television and to the press that the legislature should forget about the fact that his one-man filibuster was possible because of the rules, and the rules simply ought to be ignored; that they ought to ride roughshod over the rights of Elijah Harper, the rights of all Canadians who opposed the Meech Lake Accord.

What we saw with the Speaker's ruling the other day was another illustration of that, except it was in this chamber as opposed to the Elijah Harper case, when Senator Murray and the Prime Minister said no one else has any rights and that "We know what we want to do. If it is not within the rules, it does not matter. Change the rules". I think Senator Sparrow's comments were right.

If one can get away from that attitude, which I believe is very localized and does not apply to many, if any, of the senators opposite, the Senate may well get back to operating as it has historically. I know many senators opposite wish it would happen, but it seems to me that as long as we have this sense of infallibility on the part of the Government Leader in the Senate and of the Prime Minister, we cannot do that.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order so I can make this point. I did not mean to provide a background against which Senator Kirby could make a political statement as he just did. I would say to Senator Kirby that my father told me a long time ago that the important thing is not to worry about what the other fellow is doing in getting his job done, but to do your job properly.

My question really dealt with whether we did our job properly as a committee. I do not believe we did.

All the allegations, whether it is the intransigence of the Prime Minister, the political tricks that may or may not have occurred in the Senate, really have nothing to do with the extent to which we did our job well as a committee. That is the point I am trying to make. I think it is a cop-out when we try to reach out and find an excuse.

Hon. Michael Kirby: I appreciate the context of the question and that you did not intend to provide me with the backdrop of which I took advantage. Nevertheless, I very much appreciate the fact that you did.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. H.A. Olson: I have a number of petitions I would like to present to the Senate. As honourable senators know, most of these petitions are prefaced with the words: "People having an ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance to the Senate."

Of course, that is what I intend to do. I have never received so many petitions in the time I have been here, since 1957.

I have a petition with 250 names which I will present. I have another pile, including petitions that are slightly different. I will not put them all in, but the rules say that one can make a brief explanation about a petition.

Why are we getting so many petitions? Why is it particularly appropriate today? The Alberta government is going to court today to challenge the federal government on the GST. Other court cases will be heard today about some of the actionns taken by the Prime Minister to swamp the Senate in order to get this bill passed.

It seems to me that honourable senators opposite should understand that it is an act of desperation. The people of Canada do not know what else to do. I worry about the way Canada is being governed, if we have a government that does not give a damn about pubic opinion.

● (1030)

It is clear that at least 85 or 87 per cent, or around 90 per cent, of the people of Canada are opposed to the GST and yet the government carries on as if that does not matter. I think a government that is completely immune, if that's what they are, or callous, or whatever the right word is, to public opinion, creates a very dangerous situation for the country, and that seems to be where we are at the moment.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: You do have a right—

Senator Olson: Well, I am not only a microcosm; I come from a certain part of Canada, which was well explained by Senator Davey Steuart from Saskatchewan a few minutes ago, and that is why it is appropriate to be talking about the petitions and the tremendous desperation people are going through to try to get the message to the government. There is a piece of Alberta, not a very large part of it, but a piece in south-central Alberta bordering on Saskatchewan that, as I have said in this chamber many times, is as much like Saskatchewan as any part of Saskatchewan. It is dry prairie and they have had a seven-year drought and all kinds of problems.

We are not dealing with a recession out there any more; it is a depression. It is the worst depression, as Senator Steuart pointed out very well, that we have had since the 30s, and in some cases it is even worse because the absolute need for at least some money is far higher today than it was during the Great Depression.

I know that in my family we just got along without money. My father did not go into debt; we were farmers; he was a farmer and a small merchant. In those days what you couldn't buy you did without; but now that option is not open to people as it was then because the things you did to scratch out a living in those days are no longer available. But I am not going to go into that today because that is another story I want to tell over and over in this chamber and at least get the attention of the government.

What I want to talk about today, if I may, is the reason behind these petitions, which come from everybody—individuals, organizations, provincial governments. I read in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning that British Columbia is going to join with Ontario in the challenge to the federal government with respect to this matter. Are they challenging on the basis that it is traditionally a provincial tax? Well, I guess that's true, simply because the Federal Government hasn't been there. Alberta tried it for a few weeks in about 1936, but backed off having even a provincial sales tax. But the rest of the provinces have had one for a large number of years. Whether by tradition or through the Constitution the Federal Government, I guess, can levy taxes. There is no limitation on the Federal Government to levy taxes, so the provinces might have some problems there but they might be able to convince a court that by tradition it has been a provincial field for so long that maybe the Federal Government does not have the right to go there any more

The second point is—

Senator MacDonald: Senator Olson, I'm going to have a cup of coffee now. May I have your undertaking not to present your petitions until I come back?

Senator Olson: I don't know whether I'm going to give you that undertaking or not; it depends on how long it takes for you to have a cup of coffee.

I will tell you this: I am not here to kill time. I have a message for the members who are supporting the government. I want them to understand what these petitions are and that what I am doing, is trying to get that message to the government. So that is what I am going to do and I am going to raise a few points I think honourable senators opposite should listen to, because the people are out there pleading to be heard in this situation.

To get back to the first point, the Province of Alberta is arguing that the GST infringes on the traditional provincial powers. Secondly, it argues that the GST is unconstitutional because it will apply a tax to provincial crown property. The provincial government says the tax is absolutely contrary to section 125 of the Constitution, because one government does not tax another government. Thirdly, they are arguing that section 125 also means it is unconstitutional for Ottawa to apply GST against a wide range of services that are provided by the provinces, which is what will happen in the health and educational services and so on.

We have heard a great deal about how terrible it is to tax things that are helping—that are used to improve the literacy of this nation, and I agree with that. But we are getting down to some pretty fundamental matters when one level of government starts to tax another level of government, but that is what is going to happen. We are going to be involved in courts and appeals, and all that sort of thing, for years if the Government insists on going ahead with this tax in its present form.

One of the things the Minister of Finance started off saying was that they were going to have an agreement with the provinces, that they were not going to have two administrations—collect the tax at exactly the same point of sale. Well, you didn't get that. You might have one or two provinces now suggesting that they might get into it but there is no general agreement across this country at all by the provinces.

I see Senator Kelly is holding up—I don't know whether it is four fingers or five fingers, but apparently that many provinces have now agreed. What have you done? Have you beat them into submission?

I tell you, Alberta does not have tax; it does not have an administration in place to collect the sales tax, so it is no wonder they are a little more intensely opposed to this proposition than in other parts of the country.

Senator Carney: We note your point, Senator Olson, that Alberta does not have the bureaucracy to collect a sales tax, but are you disputing that Albertans pay the present sales tax that is being replaced by the GST? Do you dispute the fact that Albertans, in fact, do pay a hidden sales tax now?

Senator Olson: I think what Albertans pay along with every other Canadian is the manufacturers' sales tax. That is a tax that is collected on the manufacturer's price, on the invoice when it is the first price that any item has on it as it leaves the manufacturing plant. That is true.

But I know, and you know, that most of the manufacturing plants are in central Canada. You can take any item you like—I don't care whether it is household appliances, automobiles, furniture or all those other things; after this tax goes in they will put taxes on the transportation of these items to get them from here to Alberta.

Senator Perrault: Not fair!

Senator Olson: That isn't fair. The worst example we heard about, of course, was Old Crow in the Yukon. They are going to pay 158 per cent more tax on the same package of items as you do in southern Ontario. Is that fair? That is not the way it is now.

The way it is now, you can add the freight and you can add all the markups and so on which there will be when this comes into effect, and the amount of money accruing to the federal treasury for those items just leaving the factory door will be exactly the same for every Canadian, no matter where they live. But that's going to change. So Alberta has a—

Senator Carney: Are you speaking in favour of the present federal manufacturers' tax?

Senator Olson: Well, the problem we have with this is that the government, or the Minister of Finance, came out and said that this was a substitute tax. It is no substitute tax at all. It is a massive transfer of the tax burden from one group of Canadians to another.

People in western Canada, people in eastern Canada, people along the Atlantic Coast and in the Atlantic provinces and people in northern Canada are going to be paying a disproportionately higher share of the federal tax simply because of the way it is structured.

And there are other reasons why people are sending thousands of petitions. The people ought to know that the Senate Committee now has on record the names, in petitions, on cards or in letters or whatever, of two and one-half million Canadians who have protested this tax. There are unheard of numbers. I can not understand how the members opposite can just simply ignore that.

I mentioned three reasons why Alberta is going to take the matter to court. According to the Globe and Mail this morning, the Government of British Columbia has also said it will join in a similar action as Alberta, once they know the rest of the details of Alberta's proposal. I understand that action was filed yesterday. It is a six-page complex "challenge" to the Federal Government.

So we plead with you; we need some time; people need time to sort out the legalities of these matters, because I can promise you, the same as Senator Davey Steuart did, that on the first of January, if you try to impose this tax, there is going to be non-compliance. He used a little heavier wording. I think he said "civil disobedience"; but they are just not going to comply with it. What are you going to do then? Send out the inspectors to every little store and every little person who has been involved in a transaction of some goods or services?

So what is the next step? Send in the police, I guess. That's what you will have to do; that's the road we are heading down because of the intense resentment toward this tax. It is not only the amount of dollars, it is the method that is being set up to collect the tax and administer it.

I was a small-town shopkeeper for about nine years. I used to resent then all the forms that I got from the government—big government. The store business was not big enough to hire a full-time bookkeeper or accountant, so I sat there way on into the night day after day, filling out forms for both provincial and federal governments.

An Hon. Senator: Is this a speech on the GST?

Senator Olson: No. I am telling you why you got so many petition—

An Hon. Senator: Petitions?

Senator Olson: Yes, I have some petitions. I have hundreds of names on petitions here and I am supposed to give you an explanation.

An Hon. Senator: Read them. Read them to us.

Senator Olson: Listen, according to the rules I am supposed to give you a brief explanation of why we have so many petitions, and that is what I am trying to do.

I know there are in fact hundreds of thousands of people who resent doing all that book work for the government. In any event, if you can go back into the history of any particular good or service and find that a tax has been paid before, you have the right to apply for the rebate; but the dollars are so big you have to do it; you cannot ignore it. I cannot understand how you can't understand that this is a problem.

Senator Carney: Would Senator Olson permit another question?

Senator Olson: I certainly will. I do have to get my train of thought going here sometimes.

Senator Carney: Well, these points you bring up on the problems with the GST, of course, are points that we could address in the Senate when we review the bill. Since you bring up these excellent points which are worth considering, are you ready to move to debate the bill so that you can discuss these points and maybe we could see how we could improve the bill, as Senator Kelly has suggested?

Senator Olson: The problem there is that we have this ancient and undoubted right of Canadians to carry forward a petition about their grievances, and I can tell you this, the more that people know about this tax the more they dislike it.

The Minister of Finance, and I think Mr. D'Aquino, the head of the Business Council on National Issues, said that those who criticize this tax just do not understand what they are talking about, they are misinformed.

Well, my explanation is to phone any of the information numbers they give, those 800 numbers, and you can get information. We had one witness after the other come before the committee and tell us that if you can phone those numbers you will get a different answer to the same question.

So it is clear—and Senator Kelly was present when it happened—that the government is not ready to administer this tax fairly. They do not have the regulations ready as to how they are going to handle it either. That is also clear.

You know, Canadians are essentially honest people—

An Hon. Senator: Hear, Hear!

Senator Carney: Those are very useful points that the Senate could bring forward during the debate. My concern is that we will spend so much time on petitions and questions of privilege that we will fail to have the opportunity to discuss the points you raise and present them to the government as issues that could be addressed.

If you want to debate and bring forward these excellent suggestions so they can be addressed, I think we should move to actually debate the bill.

Senator Olson: You have the solution; it's easy. Talk your colleague, the Minister of Finance, into saying "Look, we know we aren't ready to bring this in." The people in the country resent it because they don't understand it. You know, a lot of taxation problems exist because people don't understand the rules and they worry if they are unable to comply with them. You can say, "Well, I guess we won't make it operational, we won't proclaim it for a year and all this trouble will just disappear. "You need a year at least to sort it out, even in the minds of the bureaucrats who are going to try to administer it after it is in effect. There is no doubt in my mind about that. If you keep bulldozing ahead that you are going to get it in by January 1st, 1991, you will have a state of chaos in Canada for a while. You are going to change one very large complicated taxation system under the manufacturers' sales tax for this one, and people aren't going to comply with it. As I said, most Canadians are good, honest citizens. They maybe don't like some laws, but they try to comply with them. It was clear that day after day, they weren't getting the right information to know how to comply with this tax.

Senator Carney: Senator Olson, would you permit me another question? Why you are so unwilling to move to debate this bill so that you can bring forward your very pertinent points? Why can't we move to debate this bill so that we can assess some of the suggestions you are making and find out what is possible and what is not possible?

Senator Olson: We have an obligation to honour the ancient and undoubted rights of the people of this country to present grievances to this place.

Senator Carney: We also have the right—

Senator Olson: And that's what I am doing.

Senator Carney: We also have an historic right to do our job as senators, which is to review and improve legislation. Why is the opposition blocking us in carrying out our historic rights to review the legislation and make the very suggestions you are bringing forward?

Senator Steuart: Ask them why they did the same thing for the first ten days?

Senator Olson: Well, you know, there's no explanation for that. We know all that. There's no good explanation. You have now swamped the Senate and prior to doing that you were holding it back so there would be no vote.

We do not have any problem in understanding that Canadians, ordinary Canadians, have rights. I have hundreds of names right here—

Senator Carney: Senator Olson, if you say you have no reason to hold up debate on the Bill—

Senator Olson: No, I didn't say that.

Senator Carney: Oh yes, I think you did. You said there is no answer to the question. My question is, why don't we move to debate the bill and deal with the issues that trouble us, if we read our mail? Why cannot we move to debate the bill and deal with some of these and find out—

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators—

Senator Steuart: What's the rush?

Senator Olson: Yes, you are in a rush now.

Senator Steuart: Strangle them that much quicker.

Senator Olson: Because, you know, there are a few things that trouble us, and one of them is that we are going to court today to find out whether or not this swamping of the Senate was legal under constitutional traditions.

That's only one. I have a couple of others too.

I said a few minutes ago that you could solve all this by announcing that there would be a delay in the administration or the proclamation of this act so that even the government knows what it is doing; but you haven't done that yet.

Senator Carney: Senator Olson, is that specified in the petition that you are dealing with at this point in time?

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Carney: Why don't you confine yourself to petitions or move to debate the Bill?

Senator Olson: The petition I am dealing with right now.

Senator Steuart: Can I ask you a question?

Senator Olson: Well, I don't know; sometimes I thought it should be part of my speech.

Senator Steuart: I would like to ask a question. Very clearly, is it the purpose of this side of the house to defeat this bill? Is that not our purpose, that we are going to defeat it if we can.

Senator Olson: Well, that's sure. Let me read what it says at the top of the petition where there are thousands of names. According to our rule book, it says that we are not supposed to read the petition; but the petition says,

> We the undersigned, the petitioners humbly pray—

Senator Steuart: Humbly.

Senator Olson:

> . . . and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop—

Now listen to this carefully.

> . . . to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

That is the basis of all these petitions; that is the grievance. The rule book says that we do not need to read the petition, that we can file it; but it says that we have to give a brief explanation as to why so many petitions are here.

But there are some other things that happened earlier this morning which indicated why there is such an intense feeling in the country about this legislation and why we are getting so many petitions. We are in a mess in this country, with governments suing other governments and taking them to court over constitutional matters. I have never seen so many petitions in all the years I have been here. Why is that happening? Desperation, in an attempt to get their view through to the government; and it doesn't seem to be getting through.

I want to make one other point, which is that yesterday a challenge to the government to change its monetary policy came from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Conference Board and the Business Council on National Issues; and there have been others before. Some of the most astounding things happened. I saw the Minister of Finance on "Canada AM" this morning commenting on the economic slowdown. He refuses to call it a recession. Frankly, honourable senators, I don't care whether you call it a recession, a slow-down or a depression. Where Senator Steuart and I come from it is a depression. It isn't a recession, and it isn't a slowdown; it is the most severe depression we have had in at least 50 years. Maybe it's even worse than that.

Senator Carney: What about the Liberal depression of 1982?

Senator Olson: This one is far worse and affects a larger part of Canada than anything that happened at that time. But I am glad you asked that question, because you know what the Minister of Finance said this morning? He created a "made-in-Canada" slowdown.

Senator Perrault: He said it was necessary.

Senator Olson: He said it was necessary. In 1981, at least, they had it all over the Western World.

Senator Perrault: It was a world depression.

Senator Olson: That's what he said; he said "we deliberately created this".

Senator Perrault: That's right, that's exactly what he said.

Senator Olson: He doesn't call it a recession. "We had to slow down the Canadian economy."

Senator Perrault: A technical adjustment.

Senator Olson: And to prove how close he was and how well he maintained this slowdown, he said "we were only off three-tenths of one per cent in our projections."

All the national organizations were asking for him to put a freeze on expenditures. He said, "You can't do that." Well, I agree you can't do that—I shouldn't say "you can't;" you ought not to do that.

Senator Carney: More spending?

Senator Olson: I am not willing to say that we should put a freeze on government programs that help a whole lot of people who are absolutely unable to help themselves. Do you know what we have across this country? We used to call them soup kitchens; now we call them food banks, and the government is progressively pulling back so that there isn't any financial assistance to those kinds of activities. Do we want people to starve? That's what happens. There are thousands of people in this country now who just simply have no alternative—

Senator Steuart: Recovery program.

Senator Olson: . . . but to go to the food bank and get enough nutrition to carry on.

Senator Steuart: Shame!

Senator Olson: Because they pulled back already. I don't agree with that.

I also don't agree with following a monetary policy that has led to this situation. We now have 39 billion dollars in debt service charges alone. That is twice as much, just for debt service charges, as the entire Federal budget when I came here in 1968.

The Minister of Finance said he admits that he created it and that it is almost right on target.

Senator Perrault: For goodness' sakes. Unbelievable!

Senator Olson: There's no apology for it. You know what his excuse was? We've got to get inflation under control, that's all. He and John Crow apparently had decided all this and the Government supports it. Both of those people should not be in office any longer and this government should take its responsibility to see that they are not in office.

Senator Kelly, I know, agrees with me, because I raised this months ago, that this monetary policy would lead to the kind of situation that we find yourselves in today, only now they can't get it stopped.

Finance Minister Wilson says we have already brought interest rates down one and one-half per cent since the first part of July. Now they are talking about it, because some of their erstwhile friends, the Canadian Bank of Commerce and Business Council on National Issues and others, tell them they have gone too far. So they listen, or they think they are listening a little, but he still makes the excuse, and is there any repentance? Not a sign. He wanted the people of Canada to know: "I deliberately set out on a course to cause this depression, and I want you to know that I have been a little bit off in the numbers"; but, he said, "I don't think that three-tenths of one per cent off target insofar as government expenditures is concerned is all bad." I agree, if that's the only argument he is going to make, that he projected it, that he is delivering all this misery to Canadians, and that he did it deliberately and is right on target.

Honourable senators opposite have a responsibility to try to do something about that, because that is where we are at. Well, the petitions are all here. I can give several of them—

An Hon. Senator: We want the names.

Senator Olson: All I want to do is to point out that people in this country are disturbed. That's why we have all these petitions. While the petitions are here, I can give you several of them. All I wanted to do—

• (1100)

Senator Perrault: You want the names.

Senator Olson: All I wanted to do was to point out that the people of this country are disturbed. That is why we received all these petitions. They think that the goods and services tax is going to exacerbate this situation. It is the whole government policy, the whole government administration, and particularly the monetary policy, that is disturbing Canadians. We now have this "made in Canada" depression, and the Minister of Finance admits that. The petitions are about a number of things dealing with government policy, mostly the GST. They are not happy with other things that this government has been doing, or at least they are not happy with the consequences, period. You know, most people do not spend much time thinking about what are the complexities of taxation or monetary policy, but they are concerned about the results.

Honourable senators, it is clear what this government is going to do and what can be expected, because the Minister of Finance did not say, "Well, I am sorry, there was a problem. We were trying to deal with inflation and we did this and we did that on monetary policy, and forced interest rates up." He did not apologise that he had visited a great deal of difficulty . . .

Senator Perrault: He is proud of it.

Senator Murray: With great respect, I am getting the impression that Senator Olson is getting quite far off the subject. I thought we were discussing petitions having to do with the GST.

Senator Olson: These are petitions.

Senator Murray: We are not discussing petitions, Senator. We are presenting petitions and there is a form in which that is supposed to be done—and it is an outrageous offence against the rules. It gives the lie utterly to his profession of respect for the rules.

Senator Perrault: Debatable.

Senator Murray: It makes him a complete hypocrite on those matters, a complete and utter hypocrite.

Senator Kelly: I think Senator Murray supports my position.

Senator Olson: I get that impression, too. I have to say this: I think I would rather hear the words of Senator Kelly, because he has a way of conveying with a certain amount of genteelness and moderation the same thing as any harsh words from Senator Murray. I am a little callous, so that does not bother me that much. But, anyway, we have these petitions. I am going to present one with 250 names on it. The basis for its opposition to the GST is that it is going to have some detrimental effect on a number of things including education material and that sort of thing. I will present two other petitions with some 23 and 27 names on them. They are opposed to the GST but they don't give a lot of reasons. They just want the Senate to halt the progress of the GST. That is all. And don't argue that they do not know about it, like Mr.Blenkarn, the Chairman of the other committee, did. He came to Edmonton and said, "Albertans, you don't understand anything about this tax, and you act like a bunch of third graders" or something like that. I suggest a few people in Alberta can see past that and that kind of comment. He made a similar comment about Newfoundland: "The best thing you could do with Newfoundland is pull it out in the Atlantic and sink it."

Senator Perrault: Isn't that a great thing to say?

Senator Olson: A great thing to say. That kind of attitude about Albertans and Newfoundland—

Senator Perrault: A disgraceful thing to say.

Senator Olson: —or Saskatchewan, is not very helpful. I have to say that; but the point—and you want to get this straight—is not that they do not understand it. The more they understand about the GST, the less they like it. I have said that before, and I will keep on saying it, because you do not get any information from those telephone information numbers, or any comfort that they know what is going on.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: On a point of order, honourable senators, we have already had about a week in which the Liberals professed respect for the rules. They have thrown out the rule book. Of course, it never did apply under Liberal administration and—

Senator Perrault: That is unfair.

Senator Phillips: It is not unfair.

Senator Perrault: It is unfair.

Senator Phillips: It is quite true. We have seen Senator Frith sit there with that supercilious smirk of his and say "The rules, if they do not suit us, we will change them, we have got the numbers." Now you have not got the numbers, and you want to throw the rule book out. We are on reading petitions. There is a form laid down for it, and I think we should follow that; and if we do not get back to it I am going to ask the Chair to make a ruling on it.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Well, Honourable Senator, Senator Phillips may ask to make a ruling whenever he likes, but if he wants to challenge the people of Canada's ancient and undoubted right—it is in our rule book—to bring their grievances before this chamber—

Senator Perrault: Muzzle the people.

Senator Olson: —he may do that, and he can take the responsibility for killing that, too, like they did some of the other things; but, anyway, I think what has happened is that honourable senators opposite don't like what I am saying, so maybe I had better terminate what I am saying. That is pretty clear.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): On the point of order, honourable senators, since 1:00 a.m. this morning we have been on the order paper, and we are at the point of Presentation of Petitions. There are rules, which have been cited here on several occasions in the last few hours, governing the presentation of petitions to Parliament and how that shall be done. The Honourable Senator who presents the petition is entitled to give a brief description of the contents of the petition. He is not permitted to read the text of the petition. There is also a rule that, in my judgment, precludes the reading of the names of those who have signed the petition.

Senator Perrault: For Heaven's sake!

Senator Phillips: My honourable friend can consult the rule and we will see if he reads it as I do.

Senator Perrault: Are you afraid that democracy might break out?

Senator Murray: Reading one by one the names of thousands or hundreds of thousands of Canadians is an absurdity and, of course, an abuse of the rules, and an abuse of Parliament's time; but, in any case, there is a form for the reading and presentation of the petitions, and what is absolutely precluded under the rules—and I could again cite the rules; they are on the record. We discussed them several times in the early hours of the morning, at 1:00, 1:30 this morning—is the idea of a senator coming in and making a speech. My honourable friend has been doing that for how long?

Senator Olson: Briefly.

Senator Murray: I first heard him fifteen or twenty minutes ago. We were discussing the monetary policy of Canada and so forth. Now, once again, as I said last night, I never thought I would be presenting Senator Hébert as a paragon of anything, but he does know how to present petitions. At least, on September 26th, 1990, at page 2258 of Hansard he presented a petition in the following way.

> Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present the petition signed by 250 residents of the Noelville region of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax bill.

That, it seems to me, is the proper way. Certainly it is the proper way under our rules and under the precedents that are cited in Beauchesne and elsewhere for presenting a petition to Parliament. Making a speech about monetary policy or about the economic policy of the government, or the fiscal policy of the government, is absolutely out of order at this stage, and the honourable senator knows it. This has been going on now since 1:00 this morning. I have known, and I know, that they have thousands of petitions that they want to present. I understand that. I would have hoped, if we can at all maintain this improved atmosphere which Leader of the Opposition perceives in the Senate, that if we are going to maintain this improved atmosphere honourable senators would at least conduct their filibuster within the rules. That is all I am asking at this point. If that is not done, the atmosphere is going to degenerate as time goes on, and time is going to march on. The atmosphere is going to degenerate and it is going to become much more difficult and tense and nasty than it is at this moment.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. H.A. Olson: I want to contribute to an improvement in relations and the atmosphere in this House. I started out very innocently and properly to make a brief explanation of the petitions and why there were so many of them that came in. I was then interrupted by Senator Carney and other senators who wanted to ask questions as to what was the validity of the reasons I gave; and, of course, I will admit that we probably got carried away a little in the course of my explaining why people are so disturbed. So I will now conclude by handing in three petitions—one with 250 names, another with 23 names, and another with 27 names—which primarily object to the tax and ask us to stop the progress of the GST.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable Senator, before you pass them in, can you read the headings?

Senator Olson: Senator Murray has just pointed out that our rule book says that we are not supposed to read the petition; so I will summarize it by saying, "Stop the introduction of the GST." That is what the petitioners say. Another petition says: "We humbly show that on certain items you should insist that Bill C-62 include a retention of a zero rate for certain—"

Senator Bonnell: Where is that from?

Senator Olson: These are all from Alberta. I will do that, and I hope that I have not offended anyone by giving them rather full and complete replies to the questions that they asked me when I was making a brief explanation of why we received so many petitions. My desk is still full of petitions, because I really believe that people have a right to petition the Senate to do certain things. That is all I am trying to do.

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable Senators, I, too, have been inundated with petitions from all across the country, not just Alberta. I have an advantage over other honourable senators in that a year ago I fought an election campaign and one of the major issues was the GST; so that, in effect, I myself was the subject of a petition from the voters of Alberta. But this particular petition—

Senator Carney: Were you not appointed to the Senate by the Prime Minister of Canada?

Senator Olson: But he won an election first.

Senator Carney: The point is, he may have won an election, but the Prime Minister appointed him to the Senate, did he not?

Senator Waters: Honourable Senator, you know that is exactly the procedure that was followed. The important distinction was that I was elected by 270,000 voters, which you never were.

Senator Carney: I was elected by many more voters than that when I sat in the House of Commons and I, like you, Senator, was appointed to this chamber by the Prime Minister; and I do not see why, since he did appoint you, you are unable to acknowledge that fact with some grace.

Senator Waters: I did acknowledge the fact that the Prime Minister appointed me after a nine month wait—an unusual gestation period, I would have thought, for a senator. Let me return, if I may, to the petitions.

Senator Bonnell: I was appointed by the Governor General. It was not the Prime Minister who appointed me. In your case, was it the Prime Minister who recommended you to the Governor General?

Senator Waters: The Prime Minister appointed me in consultation with the Governor General, as I understand the process; but I am not sure if that is germane to the discussion that I am trying to introduce today, which is a petition against the GST.

It is interesting to me, as an Albertan, that I am not just getting these petitions from Alberta. I have a page here of about 60 names from places like Ponoka, Wetaskiwin, Rimbey, and so on, places that I know very well and campaigned in; but I am also getting them from Quebec and Ontario, and, in fact, the writer of one of these petitions, a very articulate man, suggests that Ontario would like to have an opportunity to send in as many as a million names in the petitions that he is distributing throughout the province of Ontario. I am getting them from Iberville, Laval, De Moyne, Sept Iles, places from which you would not normally expect a senator from Alberta to be getting petitions. The preamble of the petition I found very touching, because it says, and I quote,

> Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

In one of the letters attached to the petition there is a paragraph—and I hope I am not breaking the rules by just quoting this paragraph, because it is kind of symptomatic of the concern that Canadians are having over the potential imposition of the GST. It says:

> These are indeed troubled times and the fate of Canada as we know it today lies in your hands. I am appealing to you as one Canadian to another to do your duty to this nation and to democracy by saying no to the dictatorship of Brian Mulroney and this hideous tax. Then all of us can stand together as one nation and say, 'O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.'

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Waters: That is from a petitioner in Peterborough, Ontario.

There is another quote which I might leave for the Honourable Senators. This one is anonymous, and says:

> Governments sometimes do the right thing but only after they have exhausted all the alternatives.

Getting back to the GST, I do not know how many of you have read all of the literature coming out on the GST, and in particular the Guidance to Drug Store Operators, which is about a half an inch thick and is in both official languages.

Senator Perrault: Ridiculous.

Senator Waters: A friend of mine running a drug store in Calgary, who has been in the business for nearly fifty years, read it through and said, "That is the end of my business career. My store is for sale." The regulations are complex. They are intrusive. They demand a lot of work on the part of small business. They will complicate the lives of all Canadians, and the impact on inflation, which the government measures at about 1.4 per cent, in my opinion will be much higher.

There is another illustration of the fatality of the GST by a rabbit farmer, which I thought you might enjoy. He wrote to me enclosing a copy of a letter he had received saying—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I raise a point of order, please? It is a point of order that has been raised repeatedly here. We are dealing with Presentation of Petitions. It seems to me the honourable senator is debating the bill itself.

Senator Perrault: He has every right to do that.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, Oh.

Senator Perrault: Have you studied the British precedents? Read your rule book.

Senator Kelly: I agree totally that he has a perfect right to do that, but not at this time. We are dealing with Presentation of Petitions. Nobody argues about the right of honourable senators to do all these things, but at appropriate times. That is the point I am making.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Further to the point made by Senator Kelly, I am always amazed by the honourable senators who have for years been advocating an elected Senate, but yet refuse to live by the rule book of an elected group; and I am surprised that Senator Waters, who reminds us that he has been elected, has never studied Beauchesne. If he had, he would find that a member presenting a petition may not make a speech or present argument in support of the petition.

Senator Perrault: He is just reading out the letters, for Heaven's sake.

Senator Phillips: I have no objection to the honourable senator presenting his petitions, or any other senator presenting his petitions, but I wish they would present them so that we can get on to a discussion of the GST report. That is all we are asking. Save your discussion for the GST report, and let us get to it. We are now on the order paper, after a week in which the Liberals deliberately broke the agreement, and I would ask the Honourable Senator Waters—

Senator Perrault: That is not true, and you know it is not true; not true at all.

Senator Phillips: —not to join those juvenile delinquents over there in their tactics. If he learns to respect and follow the rules, he will receive a great deal more respect in the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Let them be heard.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I rise on the point of order. Senator Phillips has loosely said that there was a rule. Would he quote which rule he is referring to so that we know where we stand?

Senator Phillips: I am referring to Beauchesne.

An Hon. Senator: What page?

Senator Corbin: We are governed by rules of this House. We do not live or die by Beauchesne in this place. We have our own rules approved by the whole house following recommendation by the Rules committee. On page 57 of the Rules of the Senate it says:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition;

Senator Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt the Honourable Senator but I missed the reference. Would you give it again, please?

Senator Corbin: I am referring to page 57, my dear friend.

Senator Phillips: Page 57?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Corbin: Half-way down the page. Under "Order of Business", it says "(See Rule 19.)" There is a chapter on the presentation of petitions, and the process for the presentation of petitions is outlined.

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition;

An Hon. Senator: Give him a chance to be heard.

Senator Corbin: So what is wrong with that? That is what the honourable senator was doing.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable Senators, I am nearly finished. The important thing about the statement associated with all of these petitions is the uniform abhorrence to the imposition of the GST. As the legislation is getting better known, and I think as we all get to know it better, it will become increasingly obvious that this is bad legislation and a bad tax.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Waters: I would like to conclude with my story of the rabbit farmer, as an indication of the complexity of the GST. He raises rabbits on a large scale in southern Manitoba, and applied for a ruling on what tax would be applied to the sale of his rabbits. He sells about half of them for food and half of them for pets. The ruling came back that the rabbits he sold as food would be untaxed and the rabbits he sold as pets would be taxed at 7 percent. He took it upon himself to say that "I am now selling all my rabbits as food, and the buyers can do with them what they want."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Waters: I now present this petition, and if I have violated any of the rules because of my freshman status, I apologize to honourable senators.

Senator Perrault: You do not have to apologize for anything.

Senator Sparrow: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I suppose they do not start taxing everything the rabbits do, but that may be the next. Before you pass those in, can you give us an example of some of the names of the people, and where they are from in Alberta? You mentioned that some came from other parts of the country; but were there a number from Alberta, and what would be some of those names? That would give us an indication of how serious the petition is and how concerned those citizens of Alberta actually are.

Senator Waters: There were three parts to that petition, with about a hundred names on it. The Alberta petitioners were in the Ponoka, Rimbey, Wetaskiwin area, which, as you all know, is an area to the south of Edmonton. I no longer have the names in front of me, but they were farmers and small businessmen. Some were families with two signatures from a single family, and, apart from the faxes and telephone calls, are a measure of the many signatures we are getting which will be presented in this chamber.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I rise to present some petitions on behalf of people from various parts of Nova Scotia. In doing so, may I be permitted to put the record straight in terms of a reference that was made earlier this morning by Senator Kirby to St. Francis Xavier University and some of its more illustrious alumni, because Senator Kirby fell short in terms of his referral when he confined himself to the Prime Minister. I think it is important to note that there are several other Canadians, most particularly in this chamber, who did their studies at St. Francis Xavier, among them being the Leader of the Government in this the Senate Chamber, Senator Murray; Senator Finlay MacDonald; Senator John M. MacDonald; Senator Allan MacEachen and Senator John Stewart, both of whom were professors at that great university; and Senator Norbert Theriault, who, I was reminded this morning by Senator Finlay MacDonald, pursued studies through the excellent courses offered by the St. Francis Xavier extension department. Two other honourable senators, Senator John Buchanan and Senator Richard Doyle, hold honorary degrees from St. Francis Xavier University, as indeed do Senator MacEachen and Senator John M. MacDonald.

POINT OF ORDER

An Hon. Senator: Point of order.

Senator Perrault: Let him be heard. Give him a chance, for Heaven's sake.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: He has had a chance since 1:00 this afternoon. I would like the Honourable Senator Graham to follow the rules, which were previously referred to by my good friend, Senator Corbin, and which state quite clearly that the names are not read. I would ask the honourable senator to follow the admonition of Senator Corbin and not read the names.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Since my name is invoked here, I believe I have a right, Senator Graham. I apologize for interrupting. I was talking with Senator Marchand when Senator Phillips rose. I missed his comment. Would my friend mind repeating what he said?

Senator Phillips: I drew the attention of the Honourable Senator Graham to the rule that you quoted.

• (1130)

Senator Corbin: Senator Graham, the rule—

Senator Phillips: Page 57, I believe.

Senator Corbin: Yes. I said that a senator presenting a petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition. The petition itself is not read. The text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto are not printed. Nothing says you cannot read the names. It says it is not printed in the Debates of the Senate or the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. Nothing, absolutely nothing, prevents the honourable senator from reading the names. It's another matter for the editors to conduct themselves according to the admonition that the names should not be printed. That's an entirely different matter.

We, as senators, set that rule down, and I'm sure the editors of the Debates of the Senate, and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate will respect our wish. But who are we to prevent a senator from telling us who the petitioners are? I would not do anything to breach that sacred parliamentary right that is so basic and so fundamental, which reaches to the very Bill of Rights.

Senator Perrault: You bet your life it does.

Senator Phillips: Would the Honourable Senator Corbin explain, if the rule says the names will not be printed, why in the name of common sense would anyone assume that the names are not to be read and then not printed?

Senator Perrault: What's wrong with that?

Senator Phillips: What's wrong with it? It is preventing us from getting to the function of the Senate, and that is dealing with the legislation. We would love to move on to the legislation. It's fine to have three or four Liberal senators in here saying they are conducting a filibuster to oppose legislation, but if you are serious about opposing it, why don't you bring all your senators in here and debate the matter? Why have your leader absent? Why have your deputy leader absent? The whip is absent. There is no one in here except a few stragglers. Why don't you bring in your members and debate the legislation?

Senator Corbin: Honourable Senator Phillips, and my dear friend, I believe that you have missed some basic connection in terms of the democratic process here. You suggest we move on to the legislation. These petitions deal with the legislation. Your government claims that it has the right, from the last election to the next election—whenever that may happen, and the sooner the better—to govern unilaterally without respect for the opinions and voices raised in the country against the very legislation that you would like us to proceed with in the Senate. It seems to me that that is totally unacceptable. What means are in the hands of the people, the citizens of Canada, between elections if it is not their right, their very ancient and fundamental right, to petition Parliament? This is what the people are doing, and they are signifying that they are mad with the government, they are mad with the process used by the government, and they pray the Senate to put a stop to this government nonsense. That is the reason for petitions. It is a very old custom. It goes back before the institution of the very Mother of Parliaments at Westminster. I quoted the other day, and I can read it again; I have the reference here on my desk. This is such an ancient and fundamental right that existed in the time of the Vikings, the forefathers of the Normans who conquered England, who crossed the Channel and established many of the rules now in place in the British Parliamentary system. The Vikings and Normans did that. Are we to brush that aside? I don't think so. I apologize, Senator Graham.

Senator Carney: Will the honourable senator permit a question on this issue of petitions?

Senator Phillips: I appreciate the ancient right of presenting petitions. I would point out to the honourable Senator Corbin that he is missing a very important part, which is that they presented them to parliament, not to a bunch of vacant benches like we have over there. If those petitions are so important, we should have a few Liberals in here, including the leadership of the Liberal Party, which has been absent from the day last week when the bells rang. The Liberal leadership has been absent. We've had a rump in here that is now over-cooked, over done, and I think it's time the Liberals came in here and heard all these important petitions. If the petitions are important, as I am sure they are, the Liberals should be in here to hear them. Why not bring in your membership and listen to those petitions?

Senator Corbin: You barely have a quorum in this house. You shouldn't lecture the Liberals. You shouldn't lecture Her Majesty's Official Opposition, and the members who sit on her behalf, because you barely have a quorum in this house. By the way, these petitions are not addressed to the Parliament of Canada. I will quote from one, and they're all identical:

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate . . .

and this is the Senate.

Senator Graham, I apologize once again.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, some years ago I had the privilege of bringing in some petitions from Prince Edward Island concerning the increased cost of drugs under the old Bill C-21 or C-22, and as I read those petitions, name after name, and their addresses, they were printed in the Journals and in the Proceedings. So the Leader of the government at that time, who was Senator Murray, said "You know, this is a bit of an expense to print all those names on these petitions." In each petition I had read, as printed, word for word, the names and addresses. I realized that it was an expense for the government of the day to bring out those *Hansard*s. They had to bring in extra clerks to get them out on time for the next day. That is the reason why this rule was made, on agreement by me, that they need not print in the Journals, or in the records, or in the Proceedings the names of every petitioner. But that did not mean you could not give the names of some of your petitioners in your own area who wrote to you personally to ask you to present a petition.

Senator Corbin: What is the purpose in signing them in the first place?

Senator Bonnell: The purpose of this rule was because I had handed in the petition. I did not read all the names. I handed in the petitions and asked that they be printed, and they were printed name for name. I then sent a copy of Hansard to each one of those petitioners to show them that their names were presented to the Parliament of Canada and the Senate of Canada. Realizing the cost of printing the names of the petitioners, we agreed, as a Senate, both government and opposition, not to print the whole petition. So the petitions were tabled. It was a matter of economy, of saving the government of the day from printing the petitions not only once in Hansard but also in the Proceedings.

My good friend Senator Phillips, whom I respect very highly, talked about empty seats on this side. I would like to say, honourable senators, that this side realizes the badness of the GST, as do the petitioners; but it's the other side where the empty seats are. There is no leadership, no leadership at all. The Leader of the Government is not ever here to hear.

Senator Phillips: He left two minutes ago.

Senator Bonnell: He left two minutes ago.

Senator Phillips: He knew you were going to speak.

Senator Bonnell: Well, if that's the case, Senator Phillips, if he knew I was going to speak, he never did listen to what I had to say for Prince Edward Island; they don't treat the province very well. I think the government members should be there, because it's the government members who have control of this chamber, who have the votes of this chamber, who act on behalf of these petitioners, and they should be ready to listen.

Take a look at the thing. My friend, Senator Rossiter, is here from Prince Edward Island, Senator Phillips is from here Prince Edward Island, I'm here from Prince Edward Island. We have only four senators and we're well represented here to listen to every argument put forth, pro and con, against the GST, and Prince Edward Island has always done that; but the Leader of the Government is not here and many of those who have influence with the government are not here. Consequently we do not need too many on this side when we have the people behind us asking us to pray for them that the government leadership in the Senate will do something on their behalf.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: Senator Bonnell, will you permit a question?

Senator Bonnell: Certainly.

Senator Corbin: Our mutual good friend, Senator Phillips, rather discarded the argument that ancient right has no relevancy in this day and age. I wonder if he holds the same opinion with respect to the perhaps not so ancient right, but the right of the adhesion of the province of Prince Edward Island to Confederation. There were conditions, one of them being a link with the mainland. Is that an ancient right that should be discarded, the same way that petitions should be discarded? How do you define ancient, old, and what's valid and what isn't? Are petitions included in our rules in much the same way that the link is mentioned in the agreement with Prince Edward Island? It seems to me they are very much contemporary, very much alive. I would like to hear your views on this matter. Are we to abolish everything because the government of the day no longer recognizes rules, or constitutions, or practices and procedures, and precedents? Is it your view that this institution does not rest on the rock of ages, but on a skimpy film of water and we could sink any day?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in answer—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is this on the point of order, or are we still on the point of filibuster?

Senator Bonnell: It would be a point or order.

Senator Doody: You spoke, honourable senator, on a point of order. Now you have a question on the point or order; and you are now going to speak again on the point of order.

Senator Bonnell: Not on the point of order, on the question.

Senator Doody: Let the record show—

Senator Bonnell: Let the record show that I'm answering the question on the point of order from the senator from New Brunswick about my colleague, the senator from Prince Edward Island, and I am sure that, as an islander, he believes in all ancient rights. I know that he believes in the rights of Prince Edward Islanders. He has fought for them; he has been fighting for them for years and has continued to fight for them. I am quite sure that he will be looking forward to, and trying to support, more government projects of Summerside in the future. I have great respect for him, and he is still a friend of mine. I am quite sure that he will protect and fight for the connecting link for Prince Edward Island, he feels that it is best for the Island. If he finds it's not for the best, then he won't work against it; until he is sure of what he knows and is told about the rights and benefits of Prince Edward Island, he will always be on the side of the Islanders.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, may I be permitted a to complete this part of my petition. There is something that is evident in this part of the debate, which is that the government's side does not want to listen to the people. They have not listened to the people, because had they done so, we would not have this legislation before us at the present time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Graham: I have received thousands of petitions. I could take up hours in this chamber, which I do not intend to do, to read the names of people who have written to us as the last bastion to stop this terrible legislation. The ordinary people of Canada are telling us that. The Banking committee went across the country to listen to what they had to say. We have four options before us: To approve it, to defeat it, to amend it or delay it. Well, the people are telling us to defeat it.

Honourable senators, I want to read three or four more names, if I may, from people whom I represent it this chamber.

(Names of signatories read.)

Honourable senators, it is quite apparent that the government members cannot stand the heat in the kitchen. If they can't stand the heat in the kitchen, they should get out of the kitchen.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable Senators, I too have some petitions which have come from all over the province that I represent, of citizens of this country who are protesting and calling on the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have a petition here of 27 names of people from Simcoe, Windham Centre, Waterford, Port Dover, Port Rowan, and Townsend; from Harrow, Ontario, a very small town, wonderful place where many Canadians have visited; from Haliburton and Fisherville; and from a great many citizens in this area.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Marsden: There are many others who are calling on us to stop this tax. This petition has been put out by the IRATE Citizens from Peterborough, Ontario. The honourable senators will recall that the IRATE Citizens appeared as one of the witnesses when hearings of the Banking Trade and Commerce committee were held in Toronto. Noone knew who the IRATE Citizens were. Senators on both sides asked them who they were, and they turned out to be a group of people who were not social activists but were hardworking people. They are people running small businesses, they are teaching, they are at home raising children. They were absolutely furious about the possibility that this tax is going to ruin their businesses and their lives. So, on the basis of that mutual interest, they got together to form a group called the IRATE Citizens. This is no professional group of social activists; they are, as one might say, hard-core citizens. That is one petition.

There is another with 29 names on it, again from places like Simcoe. There are quite a few people from Argyle Avenue in Simcoe. A large number of people who clearly are older people, who are living in a building together and who realize what this petition will do to their standard of living, how it will ruin the quality of their lives, are also petitioning the Senate to stop the introduction of this tax.

Here is another petition with 27 names on it from, again, Simcoe, Langton, Delhi, and London; from the agricultural centre of Leamington, and again from Simcoe and Waterford; also Bancroft. There are more from Delhi and Simcoe. Again, these people are from all walks of life, who are worried about what the goods and services tax will do to those who live in small towns and agricultural areas. All these people have signed individually this petition asking us to stop the goods and services tax.

I have another petition with 27 names on it, again from those same parts of the province.

(Names of signatories read.)

Many of these have rural route numbers. They are people who have come into town, or have gone to some length to ensure that their name appeared before this chamber as a petitioner against this tax. There are people from Port Dover, and many names from Simcoe. I don't know who is the representative for Simcoe in the other place, but I think he had better be aware of the extent to which the citizens of that town strongly oppose the introduction of the goods and services tax.

Here is another petition with 27 names on it, many of them from Simcoe, but some from Waterloo. There are people from Port Rowan, Simcoe, Langton, more from Port Rowan, Waterford, and Hamilton. We know who represents Hamilton and how concerned the people are about this proposed tax.

(Names of signatories read.)

Again there are names from rural routes from around Simcoe, Ontario, those who were prepared to join the IRATE Citizens of Peterborough to call on the members opposite to do something about this tax.

I have another petition filled with names, individual signatures calling on the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. They are people from Port Dover, Simcoe, Langton, Brantford and Streetsville. There are more names from rural routes around Simcoe and others from around Brantford. All are people from towns that are really going to be hit. Honourable senators, who watched the National News last night will have seen the report on what is happening in Brantford as a result of the current recession we are in and how much they dread the imposition of a further tax which will have a worsening effect on an already bad economy in a town where 25 per cent of its workers are on unemployment.

Then I have another petition, which has a great many names from a suburb on Toronto, Willowdale. I refer to people at 121 More Park Avenue in Willowdale, which is a very important part of the citizenry of Toronto, to people from Mayberry Street, from Steeles Avenue. Steeles is a very long avenue and there are many people there. From looking at this petition, it would seem that just about everyone on Steeles Avenue will have written to the Senate to petition it not to impose this tax. There are people from 549 Steeles Avenue, 547 Steeles Avenue, 541 Steeles Avenue, 545 Steeles Avenue, and 551 Steeles Avenue. They oppose the imposition of this tax. They are voters, consumers, workers and taxpayers. They are people who will voluntarily file their tax forms accurately and, we hope, not retreat into the underground economy that will burgeon if this tax is imposed on them. These people are asking us to do something so that they will not have to resort to extreme measures.

I have another petition of 27 names. Many of the people are from Toronto: from Raglan Road, Coronation Blvd., Smith Road in Westbrook, Downs Avenue in Picton, Glengarry Road, and someone from R.R. 3 Odessa, Ontario. These are people from Layton Avenue in Westbrook. There are several different post office boxes in Westbrook, Ontario. There are people from Berliner Street in Westbrook; others from Odessa, Ontario, from Woodfield Road, from Woodfield Crescent. There are more people from Westbrook, people from R.R. 3 in Harrowsmith. There are a great many others from those towns in Ontario.

I have another one, containing names of 27 people—because there are 27 lines on this petition—who are calling on us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax because of what it will do to their lives. There are people from R.R. 3 in Kingston, people again from rural routes around Westbrooke. This particular list has a great many people from totally different addresses in Kingston, from Bayswater, from Waverley Crescent, from R.R. 3 in Kingston, from Westbrook Road, from Avondale Crescent. Here again are a great many names from Westbrook, from small towns around Kingston, names from Odessa, from Montreal Street in Kingston. There are more rural route numbers around that part of the province which will feel very strenuously the impact of this tax should it be imposed—and we certainly hope it won't. These citizens are calling on the government to listen to their plea, to do something before their lives are very badly affected by this tax, as their lives would be, particularly at a time of severe recession, as the government heard yesterday from three of the leading large business groups in this country.

I have another petition, again with 27 names, from people from small Ontario towns who have the right to be heard by government. They are from Napanee, from Odessa, from Glenburnie. There are several more names from Odessa. Again, there are several names from Westbrook, Kingston, and Hartington. Here are 27 more citizens who are concerned about the impact of the goods and services tax on their lives.

Here is another petition with 27 names of people who also come from that part of the province. Considering how many millions of people live in Metro Toronto out of the nine million residents of Ontario, and the number of people outside Toronto who have written to protest, one feels that everyone has signed a petition. These petitioners include George Hunter of R.R. 1, Westbrook; petitioners from R.R. 3 in Kingston; from Bank Street in Kingston; and Brian Motbraithe from Godfrey. There are more names of people from Westbrook, Yarker, Napanee, and Burwick Avenue in Kingston. All of these citizens are asking the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have another petition of 27 names, again from people in that same eastern part of the province. All of them are sufficiently concerned to put their names, addresses and postal codes on these petitions calling on the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. They include people from Kingston and Amherstville. Some of these residents live on Princess Avenue in Kingston and Division Avenue, which is another main street in Kingston. They come from Odessa, Godfrey and Westbrook. They have written to ask us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have a petition which contains 28 names, with an extra line drawn at the bottom of the petition that was provided. These people come from North Bay, Ontario, including such streets as Seeley Avenue, McLeod, Worthington Street East, MacPhail Street East and Glenwood Road. They come from South Porcupine, Ontario, and there is a petitioner from Baycrest Drive in Ottawa. These petitioners come from various rural routes around the North Bay area. One petitioner is Susan Dill of 288 Francis Street, North Bay. Some petitioners who signed must have been visiting from Toronto. The petition also includes people from Mattawa and Lake Heights in North Bay. They have given their names and addresses on petitions for us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. These 28 petitioners are from an important part of Ontario, a main transportation centre.

I have another petition of 24 names from different parts of Ontario, including Mabel Kelly from Redbridge, George Close of 1425 High Street, Apt. 205, North Bay. There is Florence Blondeau from Iroquois Falls, Ontario, and Marie Savage from Sturgeon Falls, Ontario. There is A. Bowes from Mississauga who has signed this petition from residents in North Bay. They are calling on us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. These people have responded to the call from the IRATE Citizens of Peterborough to try to do anything to get the government to listen to them and their views.

I have another petition of 14 names from people from Thunder Bay, Ontario, including D. McKenzie of R.R. 14. Another petitioner is Janet Owen of 199 Academy Drive in Thunder Bay. All these people are calling on us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have another petition from 27 Canadians who are calling on the Senate not to introduce the tax. They come from all over Ontario, but particularly from Milton, Ontario, an area outside Hamilton. There is David Agnew from Child Drive in Milton, Ontario. There are other petitioners from Milton, Ontario, as well as from Acton, Ontario, such as Doug Peddie. All of these 27 people are calling on the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have a petition from another group of citizens who want us to do exactly the same thing, and stop the tax. They, too, are Canadian taxpayers who are protesting the tax. These people come from Hamilton and live on such streets as Sutherland Street West and Canon Street. One petitioner is Janet McDowell from 194 Memorial Avenue in the small town of Stoney Creek, outside Hamilton. These petitioners include Ann McKinnon from Box 5069, Caledonia, Ontario. There are people from Bryant Court in Hamilton, Sundown Drive and Darlington Crescent. There is Maureen Rogers from Nanticoke. Another petitioner is Nellie McSwain from Mount Hope. Another is June Dipietro from Golf Club Road in Hannon, Ontario. All of these citizens have called upon the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have another petition of 27 names calling upon us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. Many of these petitioners are from Toronto, including Bathurst Street and Yonge Street. The number will be enormous by the time everyone on Yonge Street signs a petition.

The petitioners include residents of Fish Avenue West, Dovercourt Road, and Kehoe Avenue in Downsview. As well, someone visiting from Manitoba signed the petition. There are petitioners from Mississauga, Streetsville, Richmond Hill and Woodbridge. All of these people are calling on the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Other senators would like to present petitions, but before I sit down let me draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that students at the Administrative Council at the University of Toronto, which represents 32,000 full-time undergraduates, also call on the Senate to stop the proposed goods and services tax.

They explain why. They are very pleased that the Senate Banking committee crossed the country and listened to ordinary Canadians voice their opinions on the GST. They believe that the consensus is overwhelming that this tax should be stopped. They say that as students they are particularly affected because a wide variety of essential and previously untaxed items will now cost them 7 per cent more. This includes textbooks, residents' fees, transit fares and locker rentals. They tell us that they are on limited, inelastic incomes. Those who have children in university know what that means. They cannot afford what they describe as the nightmare GST.

They urge us to keep on fighting and, as the member for Toronto-Taddle Creek, they elicit support. If nothing is done, 32,000 undergraduates of the University of Toronto will want their names and addresses written into this record.

I urge the government to listen carefully to the citizens of this country in their protest against this unfair tax reform.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I feel deeply privileged and honoured to bring to this chamber a number of names of those who have signed petitions urging us to defeat the GST. The names are predominantly from the province where I was born and raised, the province which I love dearly, the province of British Columbia, Canada's third largest province; La belle province bilingue de l'ouest, anglais et chinois.

We now have a wonderful racial mixture in British Columbia. The first settlers came from Great Britain. They came in sailing ships—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Pat Carney: A point of order. Would you permit me a question? I, of course, agree completely with your remarks, being a British Columbian, but I wonder if it is pertinent to the issue we are discussing, which I believe is petitions, is it not? I believe we would all be interested in knowing about the petition you will be presenting.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Senator Carney, if you will permit me the opportunity to do so, I will be able to table those names and provide a brief explanation, as called for in the rules. Frankly, I was rather amazed at the Conservative opposition to the idea of tabling these names.

I have here the rules and forms of the House of Commons of Canada. This right has been enshrined in the very substance and fibre of the Canadian political system since 1887.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We have already heard that four times this morning. That statement has already been read into the record today, at least on one occasion and probably more.

We are all aware of the rights of parliamentarians and the place for petitions in the parliamentary system. Noone is quarrelling with that. We are quarrelling with the blatant abuse of the rules governing presentation of petitions.

The honourable gentleman asked me earlier if I had any reference to support the fact that we felt the system was being abused. Beauchesne's sixth edition states that when a member presents a petition he may not make a speech nor present argument in support of the petition.

The honourable gentleman who is presenting the petition may not make a speech nor present argument when presenting the petition. You are out of order, senator.

Senator Perrault: I find it disturbing that the Leader of the Government in the Senate would take such an obdurate position with respect to the desire of Canadians in all of the provinces to have their concerns brought to the attention of this chamber. It is quite appalling that he would take that position. One would assume the only time suitable to him to table these petitions would be at midnight, with stealth—

Senator Doody: It started at midnight.

Senator Perrault: There really is a fear of having these names tabled in the Senate.

Senator Doody: We welcome the names.

Senator Perrault: The government is so insecure in its position that it really does not want these names to appear anywhere.

Senator Doody: Wrong.

Senator Perrault: Witness the statement made a few moments ago that it would be wrong to print them. If we had our way on this side, we would print the name of every petitioner.

Senator Murray: You wrote the rule preventing it.

Senator Perrault: I read in the Rules of the Senate of Canada that we have a high degree of flexibility. The senators, in their wisdom, long ago decided that we do not need draconian, formal provisions in the Rules of the Senate. Rather, there is an understanding among senators that certain things are proper and right, and it is proper and right that these names be brought to the attention of Parliament.

I look at page 57 of our rules where it states:

[Senator Carney.]

1. Presentation of Petitions

> Documents are tabled by the Leader of the Government or by a senator on his behalf. No debate is allowed at this stage except with the consent of the Senate, but a brief explanation may be given of any document.

We will give a brief explanation of the documents we bring here. It is not seemly that you would attempt to resist this democratic process.

I look at the Mother of Parliament. I talked about the gallant people who came from Great Britain in sailing ships to settle in British Columbia. They happened to bring with them some idea of the British parliamentary system.

Senator Doody: On the point of order, would the honourable gentleman realize what he has just said? Let me read it again—

Senator Perrault: I have already read it.

Senator Doody: It says:

> Documents are tabled by the Leader of the Government or by a senator on his behalf.

Are you suggesting that you are tabling this on behalf of the Leader of the Government? Make the record clear.

Senator Perrault: There is a concerted attempt being made to prevent me from exercising my right to speak on behalf of hundreds of people who sent me petitions. I will not sit down until those names have been registered here in the Senate. I am not yielding the floor to you. You can sit down, senator.

Senator Doody: I probably will.

Senator Perrault: You are on a one-man wrecking mission.

Senator Doody: I certainly won't try to outshout you.

Senator Perrault: You certainly will not.

Senator Doody: I certainly could not challenge the great wind from the west.

Senator Perrault: This is a document quoting law proceedings of Parliament, from Butterworth Publishing.

Senator Doody: We have heard it all already.

Senator Perrault: It says that the right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances—and there are plenty of grievances with the GST—is a fundamental principle of the Constitution. Those are principles we have inherited. This right has been exercised uninterrupted from very early times and has had a profound effect—

Senator Murray: And never abused as much as it has been these past eight hours.

Senator Perrault: The fact is, you don't want these petitions tabled.

Senator Doody: Table them.

Senator Perrault: The fact is that you must know that the GST will harm your province perhaps more than any other. Stand up and fight for your people. Don't be a toady for the Tories any longer.

Senator Doody: You told me to sit down.

Senator Perrault: Stand up and fight.

Senator Doody: Do you want me to stand up or sit down? The honourable gentleman just asked me to sit down. Now he wants me to stand up. I am standing up.

Senator Perrault: Why don't you try lateral?

Senator Doody: A member, when presenting a petition, may not make a speech to present argument in support of the petition.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: We have heard that four times. To get back to Dr. Cocks, the historical and constitutional aspects of petitions to the Queen and Parliament, which were originally directed to judicial rather than legislative assemblies, and from which in the medieval period the form of legislation, both public and private bill, was only gradually derived, is not considered in its entirety in this work. The rights of petitioners and the power of the house to deal with petitions were laid down by two resolutions of the House of Commons in the year 1669. The government would like to destroy it right now in 1990.

This is what this great British document states:

> It is the inherent right of every commoner in England to prepare and present petitions to the House of Commons in case of grievance and the House of Commons to receive the same.

That is the tradition of Parliament, not the bully boy efforts in which you are engaged.

Senator Cogger: Do you have a British petition now?

Senator Perrault: It is an undoubted right and privilege of the Commons to judge and determine, touching the nature and matter of such petitions.

I have some petitions from my province of British Columbia. There are 200 signatures affixed to this first petition, but I will not go through all the names. I know that other senators want the opportunity to speak and table petitions of their own. These petitioners come primarily from the Courtenay area on Vancouver Island, from people who have made an exceptional contribution to the province of British Columbia. There are a number of industries there, and they have a wonderful summer musical festival. Some of the petitioners include Natalie Munn from North Courtenay. Petitioners come from other places in the Cowichan Valley, from the City of Victoria, Campbell River—

Senator Bonnell: Is that on Vancouver Island?

Senator Perrault: Some of the best fishing in the world is to be found at Campbell River. I invite all of you to catch the big fish that regularly establish world records.

Senator Bonnell: Is that salmon?

Senator Perrault: That is salmon.

Senator Bonnell: Do they barbecue them up there?

Senator Perrault: They barbecue them. I have some names from Black Creek, Bowser, Courtenay and Comox. There are petitioners from Union Bay. There is a letter here from Fanny Bay, which is the source of some of the best oysters in Canada. They are not the kind they have in P.E.I.; they are the west coast oyster.

Senator Bonnell: Not the same. Sisters and brothers, but not the same.

Senator Perrault: They are cousins. Why are people in the Courtenay area concerned about the GST? Some of them are having a very difficult economic time these days.

The forest industry in British Columbia is in dreadful shape, as Senator Carney is aware.

Senator Carney: Is this a petition?

Senator Perrault: This is the reason a number of people were inspired to sign this petition.

Hon. Pat Carney: Will the honourable senator take a question? Is not the present federal manufacturing tax applied to all the equipment used in the forest industry? Would that industry not be among one of the beneficiaries from the GST, because they will no longer pay a 13 per cent tax?

Senator Perrault: There will be some benefits for certain industries if this proposal goes through. I am not arguing that. However, the reason why many of these people associated with the forest industry in Courtenay have signed the petition is that the profit outlook for British Columbia forest companies is the worst since the first half of the 1980s, according to Dick Ryan, Chairman of the Council of Forest Industries in British Columbia. This tax will have a measurable and detrimental effect on certain sectors of the industry.

The main villain for forestry is the free trade deal that you helped engineer, the 15 per cent impost carried by the forest industries of British Columbia.

Senator Carney: Senator, you should know that the tax does not apply in British Columbia. It is being replaced and is not applied at all. I am surprised that you would not know that.

Senator Perrault: What you do not say is that it is reflected in the higher stumpage fees charged the forest industry. You know that this was done deliberately to achieve the same result of that iniquitous 15 per cent tax that you helped engineer through the house.

Senator Carney: Senator, then you would like to hear my explanation. It is that the people of British Columbia own the forests. They are entitled to higher royalties for their forests. It should go to the people of British Columbia who own the forests and not to Americans and international companies who do not necessarily spend it here.

Senator Perrault: Explain why Simon Reisman, in his last visit to Vancouver, said that in retrospect we should have taken a tougher position on the forest deal, but Canada had to give up something. Why did we have to give up our forest advantage to the Americans when they were unable to prove any injury from Canadian competition?

Senator Carney: I would be glad to answer your question.

Senator Perrault: Could you do it later, because I want to finish these petitions.

Senator Carney: You asked for an answer. I am ready.

Senator Perrault: I am not yielding the floor.

Senator Carney: Be consistent. You asked me, and you should have the courtesy to let me answer. Since you asked the question, would you take your seat please, Senator Perrault, so I can answer?

Senator Perrault: I am not going to get into the detail. You can make your own speech.

• (1230)

Senator Carney: You raised the question. You specifically said that Simon Reisman said we should have taken a tougher stand on the forest industry. I am not aware, Senator, of that remark. I would be pleased to see some evidence of it.

Simon Reisman counselled me throughout that period and he fully supported the efforts that we made to return the money from the province's people-owned resource to the people, to get rid of the export tax through higher stumpage.

Senator Perrault: I don't care what Simon Reisman agreed to. He sold out British Columbia, and he certainly landed on his feet in the process. Simon Reisman was acting for the Government of Canada and he said the other day, "On second thought we had to give away something. Perhaps we shouldn't have given way on the agreement", and you can check your quotation book. I am not going to sit down again.

Earnings for the first six months of 1990 have already dropped 40 per cent to 50 per cent from the previous year in the forests of British Columbia. Projected earnings for the B.C. industry for the remainder of 1990 added to the 1991 are likely to deteriorate further. Now, why did the people of Courtenay sign this petition? They were worried about their jobs. What about the 160,000 industrial jobs that have been lost as a result of that great free trade deal you helped to organize—you Conservatives.

This is what he goes on to say—no wonder they signed the petition in Courtenay:

> The industry can't help but be affected by wide-spread slowing economic growth. We are now in a down-turn in our industry cycle.

He said

> "the Canadian dollar has reduced revenues of B.C. producers while high interest rates have contributed to diminished demand, particularly in North America. In addition, the profitability of B.C. companies has been severely affected by high government charges on stumpage, which reflects the 15% sell out the Conservatives inflicted on the forest industry in B.C. and which, by-and-large, is no longer sensitive to changing market conditions.

He said the high stumpage rates were imposed—now listen to this, Senator Carney. This is the forest industry, not a Liberal document. He said that the high stumpage rates were imposed on the industry by the B.C. government in 1987 following the signing of the Canada-United States Memorandum of Understanding negotiated by Simon Reisman, acting on behalf of Brian Mulroney, with your collusion and cooperation.

At the time the industry stated that—I want to finish my statement.

Senator Carney: You asked me to listen. You asked me specifically in this house to listen—

Senator Perrault: Listen.

Senator Carney: And I listened, and I wish to respond.

Senator Perrault: I will sit down; then you can reply.

Senator Carney: You asked me to listen—

Senator Perrault: At the time the industry stated these—

An Hon. Senator: Let's listen to the question. The question won't make any sense.

Senator Perrault: Do you have a question? I thought you were going to make a statement. At the time the industry stated that these greatly increased costs were greater than could be borne. Those considerations were ignored by Simon Reisman and Brian Mulroney. This is what they said:

> —particularly once the inevitable downturn began in the traditional forest industry.

That prediction has now come to pass. No wonder they signed the petition in Courtenay.

The U.S. housing starts, which are a major indicator of industry health, are continuing to slide to about 1.13 million currently, down from 1.37 million starts in 1989 and 1.48 in 1988.

The Canadian housing construction market may only reach about 175,000 in 1990, down from 215,000 last year and 220,000 in 1988.

Companies are striving to cope with these severe difficulties in a variety of ways, according to their particular circumstances. Do you know that the number one way is to put men off the payroll, to put them on the unemployment rolls?

You will remember that yesterday you mentioned the statement made by the Minister. He said that some sawmills have had to permanently lay off workers, while others have eliminated shifts or have implemented temporary shutdowns.

It is estimated that to date some 4,500 employees have been affected, and some of them have signed this petition. They are fed up with your economic policies which are leading this country to disaster. It is truly unbelievable why more people aren't signing petitions in addition to the millions that are coming in. The conference that was held yesterday, which included the manufacturers of Canada, said that we are in a recession, and the Minister of Finance, like a blind person, wanders around saying "No, we can't see a recession at all, it is just a technical adjustment." Can you tell me when a technical adjustment becomes a recession? Can somebody, please, in the Conservative Party tell us when that event occurs?

It is estimated that to date some 4,500 employees have been affected on the pulp and paper side. Some companies have scheduled longer-than-normal periods of down time this Fall of four to six weeks, and longer in some cases.

Traditionally, pulp and paper mills discontinue their operations for only a couple of days each year for maintenance purposes.

B.C. market pulp shipments for the first half of 1990 were 22% below the same period last year.

Michael Wilson said the other day, "My heart goes out to every unemployed man and woman in this country. I feel for them." Those unemployed want more than just lip service from Mr. Wilson; they want some action.

Imagine, earlier today the senior senator from Alberta read into the record of the house Mr. Wilson's proclamation that he deliberately created this recession. You expect the Canadian people to support a government which would do that, and you attack us for what you term a "filibuster"?

The B.C. rail strike is having a serious impact and is forcing companies to use more expensive means to transport their products, and so on. So I bring a petition here signed by many people associated with the forest industry on Vancouver Island, and they say that with the industry being in such a dreadful condition at the present time, it will simply add another disastrous element to the unemployment picture of Vancouver Island and in the Province of British Columbia if it is introduced on schedule January 1st. Now, if you don't want this petition to be tabled—

An Hon. Senator: I just heard the—Senator Perrault: Listen to that, the people—

An Hon. Senator: Black Creek—

Senator Perrault: Many of these petitioners derive their income from the forest industry of the province of British Columbia.

I have here another petition. It is from the Okanagan. I don't want to take an undue amount of time, because others wish to speak. but why would a person in the Okanagan sign a petition? You have so many elected—

Senator Cogger: Because one of your organizers went to see him.

Senator Perrault: You have so many elected members up in the Interior. They have given you their confidence, and you have betrayed them.

Senator Carney: Would you like to hear my response now, because you have moved off the subject?

Senator Perrault: Can you speak later—

Senator Carney: You asked—

Senator Perrault: You aren't supposed to debate on the tabling of petitions.

Senator Carney: You asked me to listen. With respect, would you tell me when you want to hear my answer? Thank you.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I will listen.

An Hon. Senator: A brief statement.

Senator Perrault: Why would anyone in the Okanagan of British Columbia sign a petition? Why are there so many names here? Why are they so upset? I'll tell you why they are so upset. It is because under this free trade deal you have practically wiped out the wine industry and the grape industry in the province of British Columbia, and I suppose you Conservatives are now going to say, "Well, we had to give up something." Why did you have to give up so much in the province of British Columbia for this deal?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on a point of order, and being aware of the great respect that Senator Perrault has for the rule book, I would ask him to read page 57 of our rule book, on "Presentation of Petitions".

Senator Perrault: I quoted that a moment ago.

Senator Phillips: I know.

Senator Perrault: You have gone over this.

Senator Phillips: I know, but it is so seldom you are here on a Friday that you have forgotten that the rules apply also on Friday. I wish you would remember that, honourable senator. The point we are at on the order paper is Orders of the Day. It is Friday, and we are presenting petitions, and not discussing GST.

Senator Perrault: I have listened with great respect to you. My attendance record is better than yours in the Senate and I am here on a Friday any time there is a sitting on Friday.

Senator Phillips: I will challenge you on that.

Senator Perrault: So don't further distort the record in the old Tory spin-doctor style.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: So why would they sign a petition in the Okanagan? Because the economy is now in a serious condition. Wines are flooding across the border from California and from other countries, making it almost impossible for our wine industry to survive in the Okanagan. Those who grow peaches, soft fruit, apples, pears and the rest, are in serious trouble because of a free trade deal in which I fear that we were badly out-manoeuvred. It isn't appropriate at this time to get into a debate on free trade, so let us leave that to a later time.

I just wanted to give a brief explanation, as called for at page 57 of our rule book, of the reason why a number of people from the Okanagan signed this petition.

Senator Carney: I am waiting.

Senator Perrault: I have received petitions from the East Kootenay, from the Nakusp, Box 281 Nakusp, Box 1006 Vernon, British Columbia, Edgewater, Fauquier, all sorts of communities in the interior of British Columbia.

This is Canada, and these are the people who go to war to fight for this country when they are required to do so. They are the people who are only asking for an opportunity to make a living and raise families and have a decent life without being caught in economic downturns and losing their jobs—and, yes, losing their unemployment insurance benefits, if you get your way in this so-called "income recovery" program you have under way.

These are the real people in this country, and they deserve to have their names brought to this Senate chamber. There are names from Nakusp; there is Mr. Lockheart of Burton and Mr. Gregory of Nakusp. Some of the handwriting I am not able to read. There is Michelle Dietermann of Nakusp, British Columbia. That is an area which not only looks to its basic industries for its economic survival but is very concerned about the effect of the GST on tourism.

The tourist industry is very concerned about its ability to compete after the GST is introduced.

An Hon. Senator: We have a—

Senator Perrault: Now, be fair in any of your rulings, senator. These people are seriously concerned about the effect on tourism. We have, for example, a phenomenon in the lower mainland of British Columbia. As the Honourable Senator Carney is aware, we are only 28 or 30 miles from the border. Already american travel companies are advertising in Vancouver newspapers saying "Buy your tickets down here in northern Washington state and save yourself a lot of money as a result of the GST".

From coast to coast in Canada the people associated with tourism are dreadfully concerned about the effect of the GST on their ability to compete for major tourist business and big tour packages. Yet we are told by the government that the GST is, in effect, a seamless word, that we can't make any major or minor changes. Why can't we at least hear something positive from the government that it recognizes that there are certain deficiencies in this measure that could or can be corrected? There are some wonderful hot springs in Nakusp and the Kootenay Valley. Some of you have visited them. Understandably, they are concerned about their ability to attract tourists, and that is why many of them have signed this petition.

I have another petition, containing 27 names, ranging from Nakusp to Burton, British Columbia, and Edgewood. I have you some of the other names a moment ago. There are 27 names in this petition. Some of them come from Surrey and White Rock, two of the most rapidly expanding communities in the province of British Columbia. Some of the best farmland, of course, is in Surrey and the Fraser Valley. Again, the people are very concerned about government policies and the effect those policies are having on their ability to compete in the agricultural sector.

[Senator Carney.]

The Americans have a policy of providing very large quantities of irrigation water at cheap prices, based on the economy of scale, which make it very difficult for British Columbia farmers to compete. A recent report, difficult to believe, is that now fully 20% of the milk consumed in the lower Okanagan of British Columbia is purchased in the State of Washington instead of British Columbia; we are that close to the border.

Now, that is a concern; that is why some of these people signed the petition—people in Surrey, Delta, and Langley. The names include Brad Harris of Surrey and Joy Richardson of Langley, Mr. McFarland and Mr. Allan Jackson of White Rock. The people who live in White Rock and those who live in the retirement community, are very concerned about government action in the field of "clawing back" some of their benefits. We discussed that yesterday, and some speeches were made on that subject.

They are very concerned about the outlook. Yet Mr. Blenkharn makes it all sound so simple. He said "we are going to make it simple." Just listen to this quotation—oh, if it were only so simple. He said, "If you owe Mikey, the federal Minister of Finance, Michael Wilson, send him a cheque, but if Mikey owes you, then you send him a bill. That's how simple it is." If it were that simple there wouldn't be as many problems as there are at the present time.

The reason why many senior citizens of White Rock signed this petition is that every social agency tells us that even with your rebate system—read the evidence in the committee report; it isn't slanted or unbalanced—

Senator David: Scare tactics.

Senator Perrault: —senior citizens will not be able to recover the amounts of extra money which they will have to pay as a result of the GST. It's there in black and white.

Every agency, confirmed by the principle churches of Canada, say the same thing. Do we realize that many senior citizens, because of incapacity, are unable to fill in even the simplest document? The churches say that the rebate plan theoretically may have some merit, and those in the social program field say "We are old hands at delivering social services, and we tell you that it simply isn't going to work." How can we possibly move to impose on those people most vulnerable in our society a tax package that will make the rich richer and the poor poorer? That is the reason they signed the petition. This is a brief explanation of why the seniors have taken the position they have.

Senator Cogger: You are using the same scare tactics with which you tried to scare everyone off the free trade agreement. We heard that.

Senator Perrault: Senator Cogger, you are being unduly suspicious of motives. You are being—

Senator Cogger: Are you going to tell me you aren't partisan?

Senator Perrault: Senator, you know what we are willing to do?

Senator Cogger: Tell me.

Senator Perrault: I am willing to sit down after this speech and hear your defence of all of the sections of the GST, and I will not call any procedural points on you.

Senator Cogger: After your speech I would like to raise a question.

Senator Perrault: We will give you full opportunity to tell us why you are clawing back benefits from the senior citizens in Canada, why you are clawing back benefits from the unemployed.

Senator Cogger: Certainly, we will gladly discuss all these points the minute you move off petitions and get to the order paper, where we should be.

Senator Perrault: You can tell us why you have imposed 33 tax increases on the Canadian people since 1984, and we will sit and listen to your defence.

Senator Cogger: Fine, we'll get to the debate.

Senator Perrault: And then we will listen to the spin doctor sheet you have. You know what they said in that sheet? They said that the Liberals are trying to keep Canada from having a more progressive tax system after your leading spokesmen admit that the whole idea is regressive and that you are really introducing a package where the poor are going to have to pay more and the rich pay less. Isn't that a great statement? Incidentally, have you talked to Dalton Camp recently?

Senator Cogger: I don't talk to Dalton Camp.

Senator Perrault: You don't talk to him now because he has just finished telling the Canadian people that your tax package was regressive and it was harmful to the low income groups and the seniors.

Senator Cogger: Scare tactics.

Senator Perrault: You say these are scare tactics?

Senator Cogger: Of course they are.

Senator Perrault: Are you accusing the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce of scare tactics?

Senator Cogger: I am accusing you.

Senator Perrault: The people who signed this petition are from the lower mainland. Some of them are in small business, and this is what the Winnipeg Chamber said to us in their brief:

> We are deeply concerned with the administrative burden placed on business arising from the multi stage aspect of the GST, thus a rational for a tax at the retail level only. Although this position has been advanced on several occasions over the past year, it has not been favourably received by the federal government which views the multi stage approach as the means of maximizing compliance.

You say there are no alternatives? Chamber of commerce after chamber of commerce say there are alternatives.

Senator Cogger: An alternative to the GST? The world wants to know.

Senator Perrault: Why did you boost the manufacturing tax 3 times since 1984 if you thought it was such a bad tax? Why did it go from 9.5% to 13.5%?

Senator Cogger: To try to pay for your debts.

Senator Perrault: You are still blaming the Liberals for things that happened in 1910. You are the government now—

Senator Cogger: Came from that.

Senator Perrault: The buck passes right over there now. Don't try to shift it. The tax should be integrated with the existing provincial sales tax.

Senator Cogger: Is that the petition?

Senator Perrault: The tax should be visible. No, these are the arguments why some of them signed the petition. This is the brief explanation. The tax should be broadly based, with a minimum number of exemptions. So here is a chamber of commerce—and I quoted that chamber because it is typical of many submissions by chambers of commerce—suggesting there is an alternative. But you say in your propaganda that there are no alternatives, and I say you are not correct.

Senator Gigantès: I was assuming this was a description of the petition—

Senator Perrault: Some Chamber of Commerce members signed the petition; so that is the reason I introduced it. It is totally relevant.

Senator David: So it is the petition of the Chamber of Commerce you are reading at the present time, is it?

Senator Perrault: These are the explanatory notes explaining why a number of people in small business have signed the petition. Is that unfair to do that? Does it bother you?

An Hon. Senator: Don't confuse him.

Senator David: Yes, but that isn't a petition of the Chamber of Commerce.

Senator Perrault: It is a valid point of view offering an alternative, which you say doesn't exist.

Senator Cogger: And it is brief.

Senator Perrault: Three business men in the past month where I live in North Vancouver stated they are going out of business because they simply can't cope with all of the regulations that will come into force if the GST becomes law. They have given up.

An Hon. Senator: Thank God it isn't coming into law.

Senator Perrault: Do we want a situation where small business is harassed to such an extent that they simply give up and say, "I can make more money by going home and buying Canada Savings Bonds instead of risking my money in a business."

An Hon. Senator: That's right.

Senator Perrault: Is that the kind of society you want to create? We are well on the road to destroying the economy if we don't get things in hand. There isn't a Canadian, I think, of the list of people who signed these petitions—the one I hold in my hand, the one headed by Mr. Buchanan of White Rock—who wouldn't be prepared to pay a special tax specifically designated to reduce the national deficit and debt if it was felt that he or she was getting a fair shake and wasn't being asked to pay more money than he or she was able to do.

There isn't a single Canadian who wouldn't rise to that patriotic challenge, including all the members of this chamber.

Senator David: Is that the new Liberal platform; is that the new Liberal, the alternative?

Senator Perrault: Don't harass me.

Senator David: I'm not harassing you, I was asking a question.

Senator Perrault: Would that be because you want to join the party? Would you come over; would you undergo an agonizing reappraisal? We would love to have you over here.

Senator Olson: Hold it, whom you invited was part of the collapse we are in now.

Senator Perrault: That's right, yes. We would have a caucus meeting about whether we invited you in.

Why don't we keep it simple; why don't we say "Look, we are spending too much money. Why don't we cut back on some of the major projects we have been funding including some in my own province. Why do we hand out big grants for new construction for all sorts of facilities, those in B.C. and those across the country, if we are borrowing the money to make the grants? What are we doing it for?"

Why don't we challenge the Canadian people to say "Look, here's the problem. There's a five year program. If we each put X amount of dollars in a special fund, we will be in this position in five years, instead of establishing this complicated apparatus." It is going to cost two hundred and fifty million a year to collect the tax, 4,000 civil servants and a legion of gumshoes to enforce it. Isn't there a simpler way to collect this money? Is there a question?

Senator Balfour: The question is this, senator. What projects in British Columbia are you prepared to have cut back or eliminated?

Senator Perrault: The natural gas pipeline to Vancouver Island was not necessary. Do you have one in your province? No, no, none in your province.

There are projects in every province in Canada which should be cancelled, in my view, or slowed down, for the sake of the taxpayers of this country.

We announced an $88 million grant the other day for a ballet rehearsal hall in Ontario. My Ontario friends may disagree with me if I cut back on my natural gas pipeline to Vancouver, but do we really need an $88 million ballet rehearsal hall in the province of Ontario?

Senator Cogger: Order—

Senator Perrault: And a comedy centre in Montreal. Do we really need these things, when we have to borrow the money to pay for them?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator David: When you are in the Senate, we don't need a comedy centre in Montreal.

Senator Perrault: That's another brilliant sally on your part, isn't it.

Senator Carney: I was in the ante room and I heard you asking for a question. In your speech you asked for a question. I have been trying to ask you a question, and you have refused to acknowledge it.

Senator Perrault: Ask your question.

Senator Carney: Much earlier this morning you were talking about the increase in stumpage in British Columbia and you were pointing out how terrible this was. So I basically want to ask you two questions, maybe three.

Are you aware that after the imposition of that tax, the B.C. forest industry reported record profit levels for years after that; and are you aware that the biggest union in British Columbia, the IWA, fully supported that measure and did a report and analysis of that, and said that, contrary to what you have told the Senate, not one single job was lost, because there were, in fact, 620 created by that measure?

Were you aware of that fact when you told this chamber that those impacts were adverse?

Senator Perrault: I am delighted you asked the question, and I appreciate the question, because at the time that agreement was signed—

Senator Carney: Will you answer the question?

Senator Perrault: Let me answer the question. At the time, the agreement was signed—

An Hon. Senator: Hold it.

Senator Perrault: Don't panic, senator. I know it's tough to take a little heat, but just hang in there.

An Hon. Senator: Go for the kitchen

Senator Perrault: Are you going to give me the opportunity to answer or not?

Senator Carney: Senator Perrault, I didn't ask for insults. You asked me to listen to your remarks. Be courteous here.

Senator Perrault: I'm trying to talk to your friend, who was trying to cut in on your time.

Senator Carney: I asked some questions. I would like a simple answer.

Senator Perrault: I am answering.

Senator Carney: I would like a simple answer.

Senator Perrault: The answer is this: The time that you and Simon Reisman, and the others, put together this profligate and unwise, short-ranged program, the forest industry said, "We bitterly resent this measure. We have relative prosperity in the lumber industry now but when the recession comes along, as it inevitably will, we are not going to be in a competitive position;" and all those predictions are turning out to be absolutely accurate.

• (1300)

You were warned, Mr. Reisman was warned, and the Conservative Government was warned at that time that as soon as the economy turned down we could not be competitive with American lumber supplies, either in British Columbia or in any other part of the country; and that is exactly what is happening. There is your answer.

Senator Carney: Give me an answer, Senator Perrault. You are not answering my question. Are you aware that they made record profits? Are you aware the IWA Union supported it and are you aware that the Union itself said that that measure created jobs? Are you aware that there is a business cycle in housing which has been part of that industry for the last 100 years, and that a decline in housing starts are part of that business cycle? Don't you know that as a British Columbian, Senator Perrault?

Senator Perrault: I am aware of the fact that we have had temporary prosperity in the industry, but I am also aware of the fact that the industry predicted in the long term that it would be a very bad deal for the forestry industry in British Columbia, I am also aware of the fact the American lumber producers, who placed us in this difficult situation, were unable to prove at any point that we were injuring them in their production process, and we should never have accepted that kind of injustice.

Senator Carney: Senator Perrault, let me ask you another question. Are you aware of the same doom and gloomers in the forestry industry, who said this would be adverse yet have record profits, are the same ones who now say they cannot afford to pay for environmental pollution controls?

Senator Perrault: That is another subject and we will get into that later.

Senator Carney: No, no, it is the same pattern as saying they can never afford anything at all that is in the public interest, because higher stumpage is in the public interest.

Senator Perrault: That is another question and I would be delighted to debate it. I do know that many of the forestry workers signed these petitions and there are even some executives of those companies now in breadlines. That's the situation that exists.

Honourable Senators, I know there are others who want to speak, so I will shortly sit down.

I have this petition with names from White Rock, Langley, Surrey, and Richmond. These are areas well-known to Senator Carney? I think she will agree with me there is real concern out there, not only in the farming sector. We have had a good yield of fish this year as a result of conservation measures begun by the Liberal Government, and the return has been excellent; but there is a concern about the ability of Canada to compete.

Surrey and White Rock represent a border community. They are right next to the border, as Senator Hays and Senator Fairbairn know, and also the other Senators who visit Vancouver frequently. What the merchants there are seeing is an almost impossible competitive situation. People are travelling across the border and shopping in the United States. They bring back the goods, and with seven per cent being added in January 1991, they believe there will be a record number of bankruptcies in the lower mainland of British Columbia, in Surrey, White Rock, Langley, Hope, Chilliwack, and all those border communities. That is the concern being felt there.

The same situation exists, I understand, in some of the western provinces, in the border towns of southern Saskatchewan and southern Manitoba, where people are also going across the border to shop. Those are the small businesses that you are looking forward to turning in tax receipts to provide revenue for this government. Is there such a thing, really, as killing the goose that laid the golden egg? Is it possible that this bill, which would impose a seven per cent tax in so many new areas, might be the last straw that breaks the camel's back; that it is going to drive some businesses out and more Canadians across the border to purchase all sorts of commodities down there? That is the reason why so many signatures have been coming in from Surrey and White Rock.

Then we have these 26 signatures:

(Names of signatories read.)

Chetwynd is one of our newer communities in northeastern British Columbia. It came into being as a result of the great mining development in that part of the country. There are some serious economic problems there because of the plummeting price of coal throughout the world, and the recent negotiation—

POINTS OF ORDER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: On a point of order—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Senator, I know what your point of order is. This is a brief explanation of why these people signed this petition.

Senator Phillips: Honourable Senators, our rules clearly state that there will be a brief explanation in presenting the petition. I feel that the honourable senator has transgressed the rule long enough, and I would ask the Chair to give us a ruling as to whether the honourable senator is perfectly in order or out of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: This is an entirely new petition from the people of Nakusp. You are telling the people of Nakusp that their concerns cannot be brought to this Senate chamber, and I insist on my right to give a brief explanation of those signatures.

Senator Phillips: The Honourable Senator is free to present the petition. I ask him to do it within the rules, and I ask the Chair to rule on whether the honourable senator is presenting the petition within the rules.

Senator Perrault: This is within the rules. This is a brief explanation to explain the reason why so many people in Chetwynd, Nakusp and the surrounding area signed this petition. It is a brief explanation. Is that unfair? They are in a very serious economic crisis out there. The lumber industry, because of this ridiculous trade deal that we made with Americans on lumber, is in serious shape. They cannot sell sufficient quantities of coal to maintain a viable economy, and they are worried that the seven per cent—

An Hon. Senator: Sit, sit.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, order. I will hear other opinions on the point of order.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: On a point of order—

An Hon. Senator: On the same point of order? His Honour has to rule on a point of order before getting to your point of order.

Senator Bonnell: He didn't ask me if it was the same. I was asked if it was a point of order, and I say yes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I am sorry. I said I would be pleased to hear discussion on the point of order raised by Senator Cogger, but not a new point of order.

Senator Bonnell: You mean to tell me that I do not have the privilege of raising a point of order at this time? A point of order is always in order.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I will handle the first point of order, that of Senator Phillips. Does the honourable senator wish to comment on Senator Phillips's point of order.

Senator Bonnell: If I can also raise a point of order myself at any time. I don't want Your Honour to get the impression that you are going to rule on a point of order from the opposite side, because that would be even worse than ringing the bells without the opposition here.

An Hon. Senator: Let him rule on that point of order; then he can have your point of order.

Senator Bonnell: Do you mean you want him to rule on a point of order by hearing one side of it, like the former speaker did, and not hear the opposition at all or give them the chance to vote? Certainly they want both sides, and they want the Speaker to hear both sides of view and then decide on the point of order.

An Hon. Senator: On that point of order.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please. I will take one point of order and comment on it, but not all points of order at the same time. Do you wish to comment on the point of order raised by Senator Phillips?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, we are going to get into the same problem that we had before. If the person who is sitting in the Chair thinks that he is the presiding officer, he had better look at what has happened in the last few days. That is the kind of problem we got into, because the Speaker attempted to take unto himself authority that he does not have.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I am taking my advice from the Table Officers.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Olson: We are no longer going to have this kind of atrocity in this chamber. You can read the rules if you want to, but you will always come back to the same one. The Senate is in charge of its own procedure. We are not going to have the Speaker or alleged Speaker, get up here and start to bulldoze the Senate. Haven't we seen enough of that? I think the Leader of the Government in this place has at least learned one thing, that if this bulldozing tactic, that has been going on since the Speaker arbitrarily decided he was going to overrule the rules about how long the bells should ring and the function of the whips, and you are now going to interrupt senators while they are discussing what we are going to do with a point of order, we will have a continuation of the same debate. That is exactly what will happen. You must understand that bulldozing does not pay, does not get you anywhere.

Senator Murray entered the chamber a few hours ago and said there was a new atmosphere. There will be a new atmosphere, but only so long as you understand what is going on in here. If you don't understand what a filibuster is, then some of your senior colleagues should take you some place and explain it to you. You know very well what is going on in here. Don't try to bulldoze, because you will lose.

An Hon. Senator: Filibuster by the rules.

Senator Olson: We have more ways of carrying on the filibuster, if that is the way you want it; so just be careful. Senator Phillips raised a point of order, and he will read from page 57 again. We not going to put up with this. If you think you are going to bulldoze us with this or any other point of order, you had better contemplate seriously the consequences, because I will guarantee you that they will be worse.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I want briefly to explain the attitude of the people in Nakusp and Vernon, British Columbia. Some of them are concerned, honourable senators. We are told by the Conservative Party that this is going to be a simpler method of taxation. If it is simpler, why do we have to hire 3900 additional bureaucrats to administer it, why is it going to cost $250 million to finance it, and why are we hiring some retired gumshoes in order to make sure the poor little corner grocer gets his money in on time? How does making more than 1.6 million businesses deal with the federal sales tax rather than 75 thousand to make the tax simpler? That is why some of the people who signed this petition are coming to me and saying, "For heaven's sake, can't you convince the Conservatives to make it simpler than it is?" Initially you recognized that the GST would be a significant burden to small businesses and you promised to pay every small business up to $600 a year to collect the GST. I have a question for the government whip. In December the government changed its mind and is now promising only a one time payment to small businesses of up to $1,000 in the first year. Small businesses say they are facing enormously higher costs, in addition to their business volume, than larger businesses.

Senator Phillips: I will be happy to explain that when we get to the GST.

Senator Perrault: Will you explain this to us, because this is why some of the business people signed the petition. They have told me that it does not seem fair to them. How can we ask up to 1.4 million small businesses to cope with this complex tax without providing some compensation on an ongoing basis for dealing with all of the GST paperwork? It just doesn't seem fair. I'm not defending the old manufacturing sales tax, and neither are these people. Some of these business people want to know why British Columbians have to be saddled with seven per cent on the transportation costs. This point was covered very eloquently by Senator Olson earlier. Why are we penalized just because we live 3600 miles from Toronto? Is Toronto the mecca of Canada? Is everything going to be priced from there? Why should the people be particularly heavily penalized in Alberta, Northern Alberta, Yellowknife and the Yukon Territory? These are the questions being asked by people who signed this petition. They say, "Why is it fair and just to do that? Why don't you eliminate that? It's so basically wrong." And yet we get no explanation from the government. Is that being unreasonable?

People in Newfoundland are saying the same thing. Is it going to affect your revenue to that extent that you cannot at least say that Canadians are equal wherever they live in this country? Is that such a wrong concept? How are these small businessmen who signed this petition, going to remain competitive if we keep loading them with taxes, some of which are not paid in other parts of Canada?

I will go through these quickly. They are from Burton, Edgewater, Nakusp, and Chetwynd. There is one from Calgary, Alberta. The honourable senator made an eloquent statement about the Alberta position. Why is it that all of the Conservative Premiers are opposing this measure? Are they all stupid, that the brilliant economists live only in Ottawa?

Why is Don Getty going to challenge this thing in the courts? I thought you liked Don Getty. You gave him a standing ovation at the last Conservative convention. What happened in recent months? Has Don Getty no credibility any more? Is he an economic nerd that should not be listened to, or does he have a little more common sense and understands what the measure is going to mean to Alberta?

Is Bill Vander Zalm totally out to lunch when it comes to economics? What about the new premier of Ontario, Bob Rae? I suppose he is wrong, too, when he says it is going to hurt the economy, that it is going to devastate Ontario. You plough ahead like a First World War tank, and you are going to land in the ditch upside down with this plan. That is what will happen to you. That's why people are signing this petition, but you don't like to hear it. What has Mr. Getty said to you recently? You are frightened of the facts. You could never have been elected as a Conservative senator if this had been an elected Senate. You know that.

Listen to the people who signed this petition. There are a number of small business men on it, and they are trying to send a message. They don't want any more hijinks and fun and games. They want a decent and fair taxation system. That's why they signed it. These petitioners come from Delta, White Rock, and Langley, British Columbia.

Honourable senators, I will not continue any longer. At times, you know—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: —you may feel there has been some repetition in this debate.

An Hon. Senator: No, No.

Senator Perrault: But, it is the drip, drip, drip of factual information on the hard, hard rock of ignorance represented by some of you on the other side. You have a lemming instinct. You are going over the cliff, and you simply will not admit that you have a plan that is far from being perfect.

The two hundred names here represent small businessmen and farmers, senior citizens and the churches. Does the United Church of Canada not know anything about social problems? It happens to be one of the most active denominations in our community helping people. There is the Catholic Church and other churches. Ignore them too? They do not know anything either. Only the bureaucrats, some of whom have spent too much time in Ottawa, are out of touch with the people who signed this petition.

Honourable senators, I have found some more petitions. However, I think I will save them till later. Thank you.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a petition from the people in Brooks, Alberta, close to where I live and another from Bow Island. I have already given a brief explanation of these petitions, so I will not repeat it. Senators have the right to give an explanation.

An Hon. Senator: Explain to Senator Phillips that Senator Olson was clearly very brief a moment ago.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable Senators, I just wanted to bring forward to you a number of petitions, and ,in so doing, to speak before Senator Perrault became too excited, too loud and spoke too long—although I know he would never do that, and I appreciated very much his comments.

These petitions say "To prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax", and I guess from Senator Phillips originally talking, that these petitions could not appear in the proceedings of the Senate chamber or the Minutes of the Proceedings. I wonder do we then tell the people who are on the lists that these lists are destined for the garbage? These are important petitions brought by Canadians to the Senate for serious consideration of the problem as they see it, and I see no reason why their names should not appear, if we have the time to read them into the record and to answer these people if we can find the time. There is some problem, of course. The number of Canadians signing these petitions are now not in the thousands but are close to the millions.

Hon. Michael Kirby: I wonder if I might ask Senator Sparrow a question, in light of his comments and in view of the thousands, approaching millions, of names he has received, because, as we know, there are 24 new senators opposite who are new to this place and therefore not familiar with part of the history, the tradition, and the extent to which petitions have normally been introduced into the Senate. Since Senator Sparrow has been in the chamber far longer than I have, would he comment, in the light of his experience in this chamber, whether or not the number of petitions of this magnitude that we have received on the subject of the GST is unusual or even very typical—in other words, using petitions as the gauge of public opinion. For example, I see that Senator Graham has amassed a number of petitions, and I noticed that Senator Perrault and Senator Olson, in their comments, appeared to have a number of petitions. Since almost half of the members opposite are new to this chamber and do not understand whether getting hundreds of petitions is an unusual or typical event, I wonder if, as part of their education processes—I realize they were sent here merely to rubber stamp this bill, but at least we might as well educate them before they act as robots—the honourable senator might try to put the number of petitions and names he has received in some historical context, given the length of time he has been in the chamber.

Senator Sparrow: Thank you very much. I think it is an important question, and certainly, in the period of time that I have been a member of this chamber, and in Parliament, I have never come close to seeing as many petitions as we are now receiving on this particular issue. They are coming by the hundreds and thousands, and perhaps close to the millions., So no, indeed, it was a good question. Never before have I known such initiative to catch the imagination, and the fear and the disgust and the distrust, of Canadians throughout the country. Senator Phillips has left the chamber, but he mentioned—

Senator Phillips: No comment; he is right here.

Senator Sparrow: Hi, there. Excuse me. He mentioned some time ago that there were not many members on this side of the house because he was saying, in the mood of criticism, "If you were that concerned about this issue, why aren't there more people here?" Let me tell you, Senator Phillips, that the Liberals, although few in number here, are fighting this issue 24 hours a day, seven days a week. That is what we are doing, and we cannot expect 50 members of the Liberal Party to be here. So we are, and you are, taking shifts, because we feel, on behalf of the Canadian people, that this the most crucial issue facing us, and we are prepared to spend 24 hours a day, seven days a week, until such time as this problem comes before the Canadian people.

Senator Murray stated on television this morning that the bill will be passed. He has just made that statement to the Canadian people. Well, I tell him, and I will tell the Canadian people, that there is still some doubt about that; and I would hope that the Canadian people will now have some optimism that, in fact, this bill will not be passed—and Canadians should know that we will spend those 24 hours a day defending that purpose.

Senator Graham made a great presentation of petitions. I was going to say "speech", but he was presenting petitions. He said there were a great many ordinary Canadians out there who were appending their names to these petitions. Well, let me tell you they are not ordinary Canadians. They are extraordinary Canadians, from every community in this nation, who are taking the time and effort to put their name and address and their postal code on these petitions to the Senate, saying—not as ordinary Canadians, but as extraordinary Canadians—"Look, I'll spend my time and my effort to bring the message to the Senate." Surely we have the right to recognize these people, to let their names go into the record. I am sorry that I cannot take the time to read all of the names; but they deserve permanent recognition in the records of the Senate.

Who are these people who are signing these petitions? They are extraordinary Canadians who are independent and free thinking, who are saying to us, "There is something drastically wrong with what this government is doing to us." That is what they are telling us, and they are doing so in the best and simplest way they know how.

I will not necessarily quote the names, but I will tell you some of the communities. I do not know all of these people. Some of the names I recognize; but I can guess, since they come from Odessa, Saskatchewan, from Kendal, from Regina, and similar communities, that there are probably people on that list who are welfare recipients, who are far below the poverty level in this country, who have taken the time to get the message across. I am sure there will be unemployed people in this list from Claybank and Curtifred, Saskatchewan, from all of those communities, unemployed people who say, "This will devastate us even further. It will drag us down further into that poverty level." That is why they are signing this paper.

I see here the names of farmers who have taken the time to sign this petition, to say that "It's going to hurt or it's hurting now, and we're going to hurt much more as time goes on, and we are faced with that." Yesterday I talked to a small businessman in the construction business, gravel, sand and excavation, who said, almost in tears, that as of January 1st, if this goes through, he was faced with raising the prices on his services 23 per cent. I said, "Where do you get that figure?" He said, "Well, I have to compensate for the existing inflation, which is 4 per cent." That was the figure he used. He said, "I've got to compensate for the 7 per cent that is going to go with the GST tax. I have to calculate today that if the price of fuel goes up, as its purported to do, to $0.70 a litre, I have to raise my prices by 12.5 percent." He has to do that just to break even. Either that or he closes his shop, because the volume will decrease, because the people will not have the money in which to expand and develop. So he is in a diminishing market with a terrible price increase.

And you know what, the Saskatchewan Government puts a tax on top of that of 5 per cent. We are talking an increase of 28 per cent. Let us look at that. On the list are small contractors and farmers; there are single parent families who are working at the minimum wage or are on social welfare, who cannot support their families and who are going to get a rebate as we talk about this. They know they will get a rebate of $190 a year, but the estimate of what they will spend on this tax is anywhere from three to five hundred dollars a year. Can we say to them "You will be rebated that?" How can we say to the farmer from Kendal, Saskatchewan, that, "It doesn't affect you, sir. There is no sense in your giving us a petition. Don't sign it, because we won't even recognize it in this chamber. We don't think it is worth anything. We won't even accept your petition and your name in this chamber." He is going to be faced with this problem of that 7 per cent, less the fuel tax, the fuel increase that we are going through now, and he's pleading with us, pleading with us, by his name and address and other methods. There are lots of letters, and so on, from farmers and the small business people, those whom we talked about in this house a few days ago, who are the backbone of the Canadian economic climate. In Saskatchewan, and I am sure throughout the country, we are faced with losing, without question, a further 30 per cent of our small business people.

● (0130)

There are names on this list from North Battleford, Battleford, Wilkie, Unity and Meadow Lake. In our community of North Battleford alone, do you know what we lost in actual business enterprises last year? We lost 30 per cent of our businesses. Who are they? They are the small businesses that employ the people of this nation. Let me name them: We have lost three plumbers, three electrician companies, several restaurants, three automobile dealers, at least four of our implement dealers—and the list goes on and on.

If we burden them now with a 7 per cent, and with the problem of fuel and inflation, how can we survive with a 20 or 30 per cent increase? It is just ludicrous to tell this petitioner from Regina, "Oh, it will only cause inflation of 1.8 per cent." We cannot survive and live with it. It is not 1.8 per cent. The unions are going to ask for a compensating factor for the 7 per cent, for the great increase in fuel. If there wasn't an argument before to do away with this 7 per cent, with this terrible price increase for fuel, then that alone is enough reason to drop the legislation or delay it until July 1 next year. Just delay it so that we can have a chance to recoup and survive. We are talking about survival.

These are the thousands of people who are talking about survival. They are not talking about, "Sure, we will have a slowdown in the economy, but we won't admit that we are in a recession. We don't even use that word "recession". Oh, no, it's not really a recession. It's a Canada-made high interest rate policy." These people believe we are going into a recession. What do they do when they lose their jobs? You don't talk about 2,700 people from Air Canada losing their jobs or 4,000 from somewhere else. You talk about one man and one woman loses their job. It is not just statistics of 5,000 or 10,000. It is that one person whom perhaps we know, that one person whom we have to protect.

I am not here to somehow protect thousands of people. I have to bring here the concern of one person, and if I can protect that one person, then all Canadians will be protected. That is how it starts. It is not some broad thing where we say, "Oh well, we'll have to suffer through this." I have looked through these lists. Not one banking institution has signed them. Not one bank manager that I am aware of has signed these petitions—although they may have done—because they are benefitting from the people in this country who are downtrodden—not the ordinary people, but the extraordinary people. That is who those Canadians are. They built this great country, and then we have the audacity to say, "We don't want these petitions. Throw them in the garbage. They are worth nothing."

Well, I tell you, they are worth something to me, and they are worth something to those Canadians who have signed them, otherwise they would not have gone to the trouble. These are not forms cut out of newspapers that said, "Sign this and send it to the Prime Minister." People had to go out of their way to do this; and I am going to go out of my way 24 hours a day to see that they get recognition in this Senate. You asked the question, "Have we ever had this before?" Not to any extent like this, never. What does it tells us? It tells us that there is great fear, concern and worry out there about what is happening to our country, about what is happening to that one single parent family who is desperate, who is desperately worried about what will happen tomorrow. Can you just imagine the devastating effect of someone getting a layoff notice, with house payments, car payments and families going to school or university? What a devastating thing to have happen. If we increase this by 7 per cent, it will mean at least 7 per cent to the people who are affected. Of course, it balloons and builds up with the high rates of gasoline tax, and so on.

I will not get into reading all of the names, but I want to read some from Qu'Appelle and Weyburn, Saskatchewan. Basically, I would suppose there are very few communities missed on these lists, and I have many more. Senator Stewart went through a number of lists from Saskatchewan. I have no idea how many thousands of names are from Saskatchewan, but I am sure that honourable senators opposite agree that it is crucial that we represent not just the large industries, not just the oil cartels who will make millions and billions of dollars from the high price of oil and petroleum in this country. The same oil that was coming out of the ground three and four weeks, or months, ago, the same petroleum product selling at 45 cents a litre, will now be 70 cents—the same stuff. Where is that money coming from? "Well", you say, "you have to cope with the world price."

Hon. Michael Kirby: I wonder if Senator Sparrow would permit a question?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Senator Kirby: I think you have just raised an extremely valuable point, because it is a point which has not been discussed here today during the presentation of petitions. My question deals with your point on what is happening to petroleum prices and the fact that people in the western provinces, and people in my part of the country, the Atlantic provinces, pay significantly higher transportation costs as a component of every item they buy; that, in fact, they are being hurt, not only by the GST being applied to all goods, but because it is being applied disproportionately in the western and Atlantic provinces, because of the fact that the transportation component of the cost of goods is greater in your part of the country and mine. That would have been true had we not had a situation, as you correctly pointed out, whereby events in the Middle East are causing the cost of oil and gas and transportation costs to rise appreciably.

I would like the honourable senator to comment on two things: that if transportation costs are going up so disproportionately, is it not true that, in applying a 7 per cent GST to the transportation component of every good, and, indeed, the transportation of fuels, when we go to buy gas at the pump, and a variety of other things, the government would, in fact, have a windfall gain if the GST were to come into effect? The net effect would be that the government would be getting a significant windfall gain, by virtue of the fact that it is charging that 7 per cent on what clearly are not market set but artificially inflated prices? You might want to comment on that.

Also, do you think that, in fact, this government is attempting to further gouge Canadians by getting a windfall gain on the basis of applying the 7 per cent?

If, in fact, the transportation component is greater in your region of the country and in mine, and if it is true that the manufacturing sector in Saskatchewan is a relatively small percentage of the economy, as it is in Nova Scotia, does it also follow that in Saskatchewan, as in Nova Scotia, the job benefits, which senators opposite constantly apply to the GST, are essentially going to central Canada, and that the costs, in terms of what we pay in your region of the country and mine for every good we buy will be applied disproportionately because we have such high transportation costs? Do you think, therefore, that the government's economic and tax policy is designed precisely to help Ontario and Quebec and to hurt your region of the country and mine?

Senator Carney: Are you against Ontario and Quebec?

Senator Kirby: No. I am in favour of equity, which is a concept senators opposite frequently have great difficulty understanding.

Senator Sparrow: That is a question which I think the people on this list would be asking. You have put the words in their mouth, because they are unable to be here. I am sure those are questions that would be asked by people from Stouffville, Ontario. In fact, there is one petitioner on my list who must have been visiting in Saskatchewan. You were asking if this might be a bonanza for the government. Let us hope that maybe it is a bonanza for the government, but, let me tell you, if that fuel tax keeps going up to 70 cents or one dollar per gallon, and the 7 per cent goes on, the income for the federal government will be less, because we will not be able to drive cars, we will not be able to drive those farm trucks, we will not be able to use those garbage trucks that pick up the stuff. We will not be able to afford it. Unemployment will be so high that Saskatchewan may not be able to send as much money down here this year as it usually does. If prices continue to rise, and unemployment continues, and we have 30 per cent further businesses going broke, and the farmers going broke, who will be left to pay those taxes? Who will be left to pay the high taxes or the high prices on petroleum products? Will the head offices of the petroleum companies and the banks be well off? Of course they will. Every time the rate of inflation goes up, bank profits are higher. As soon as the price of fuel goes up to $1.00 a gallon, who will benefit? Will it be those people who signed the petition? No. They are the ones who will be unemployed. The small business people will lose their businesses and also the two or three people they hired. That is what happens.

I mentioned the other day, that the number of people using food banks, and those in school feeding programs, this year had increased by 20 per cent. The people who are employed are not keeping up with today's costs. What can we expect for next year if the price of fuel goes up a dollar a gallon? Perhaps there will be another 30 per cent increase in those foodbanks and feeding programs, and a devastating effect on people who are unemployed.

I will hand in a couple of petitions in a moment, and I have others. There are many from Saskatchewan—where the people are not only hurting now, but are petitioning us to say, "Don't hurt us any more. Let us try to build this country as we all want to do, but don't grind us into the ground any further."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: May I put a question?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Senator Bonnell: In the great province of Saskatchewan, if this 7 per cent sales tax goes into effect, would your province habitually add the 5 per cent on top of the 7 per cent and make it 12 per cent across the board, or would they get tax upon tax?

Senator Sparrow: I cannot answer that question. I am sorry that Senator Berntson is not here. He might be able to help us with that question. I don't know what the plans are. Rumour has it that, in fact, they will be adding that tax on and piggybacking onto the federal tax; but I don't know that. I would like to be able to answer your question, because people all over the province are asking the same question; but there are indications that it will be added on. The consumer tax in Saskatchewan has been there for a long time, and it affects certain items. We have that and we are used to that. We consider it basically a fair tax, because it is paid only by the ultimate user. It is not paid seven steps along the road. Now we will find that the provincial tax, which is 7 per cent. even if they drop it to 5 per cent, will now go on all services, including haircuts and garbage pickups, and all of those necessary services that we have. Of course, it will be a bonanza for the treasurer of the Province of Saskatchewan, if that happens, if we have enough taxpayers left to pay any tax.

Senator Bonnell: Will you permit one further question? Will the province of Saskatchewan, start to charge taxes on children's clothing, on federal government postage stamps, and even the popcorn that the children use at the theatre? Will the provincial government add its tax on top of the federal tax? Will the government add its tax on all these things, such as wreaths for veterans who fought to save this country? Will the province now put a tax on those too, on top of the federal government's tax?

Senator Sparrow: I hope not, but it might very well happen. That is the route they appear to be following. It would be very sad, but that is the route they are rumoured to be going, which will affect what you are talking about, such as children's clothing and those other aspects.

Senator Bonnell: I have one further question: Is the Government of Saskatchewan a sister or brother government to the Tory government in Ottawa, and, if so, can we expect a similar type of leadership from that province?

Senator Sparrow: I don't know whether they are brothers or sisters or adopted, or even part of the family. I don't know. I don't know whether they are just adopted, or may drop them at any time. I don't know that.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from the citizens of Newfoundland, containing 27 names. The subject of the petition is the proposed national goods and services tax. They humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Briefly, I would like to give some background before getting into the details of where this petition comes from. I might say that this petition was not solicited by me. It is apparently a voluntary petition, which has been sent in. It is interesting that it was sent in to a Liberal senator from Newfoundland. I don't know if the senators from Newfoundland who sits on the other side of the house, have been receiving any of these petitions. If so, we certainly haven't heard from them. I hope that if they have, they haven't been throwing them away, because this is a very serious subject.

Honourable senators are aware that conditions in Newfoundland are particularly bad. We have a depressed economy and very high unemployment. I believe it is up to something like 18 percent. We have approximately 30,000 people employed in the fisheries industry. The fisheries are particularly depressed, mainly because of the lack of fishery products, for which the people put the blame on the federal government, because they say the federal government has mismanaged the fishery stocks, and they are suffering from that. Apparently the federal government miscalculated the actual stocks, and has forbidden fish producers from taking their usual amount of product, but have allowed the foreigners—

An Hon. Senator: The European Community?

Senator Lewis: The European Community.

An Hon. Senator: France?

Senator Lewis: France.

An Hon. Senator: The United States?

Senator Lewis: the United States, yes. To come in and gut the fishery. So, the industry is in a terrible state. As I say, there are 30,000 people affected by this. Of course, we find that we are going into a recession. I can tell you, the people of Newfoundland know that we are into a recession, and it is really cold comfort to them. I assume the reference I saw on television this morning was correct. I understood it to say that the Prime Minister had said there was no recession, but that there was a planned downturn in the economy. Planned downturn? Absolutely fantastic.

It reminds me of what happened in Newfoundland a few years ago. This was during the term of the Tory government. A minister was asked the question whether the negotiations with respect to Hibernia should be pushed a bit more to get Hibernia on the way. Of course, the provincial government at that time was being dilatory and they were not doing that. The ministry said, "Oh, we don't want to go too far, because we don't want to overheat the economy." Overheat the economy! Just imagine. This seems to be the Tory policy everywhere.

The people who have signed this petition are all consumers. There appears to be no reference to business in any of these. As we understand the goods and services tax, it is the ultimate user who will pay the tax. No doubt the businesses have no worries. They will pay tax on what they buy, sure, but when they sell it they will recover the tax. The tax is passed on down the line until the poor old consumer pays the shot. That is what these petitioners are concerned about. They also know, as far as business is concerned, that the businessman, in his normal operation, will look at his costs, at the price of his goods, and the cost of freight, upon which there will be a tax paid. He will look at the handling charges, and he will add on the actual tax that he pays on the purchase. Of course, he will then calculate his writeup, so that will go on top. Then the poor consumer will pay the shot for the whole thing. So businesses, of course, are not going to be too concerned. They will have a little more paperwork to do, but that is all.

This petition represents many different places in Newfoundland. I am familiar with the places, but not with a lot of the names. I see here a signature from a gentleman in Spaniard's Bay, which is on the east coast of Newfoundland. There are two names from Grand Falls. Grand Falls is in central Newfoundland, and is the site of an Abitibi Price pulp mill where they are having trouble. One of their machines is being closed down. I see a name from Bay Roberts on the east coast. There is the name of a person from Placentia. That is the Anglicised name of what formerly was the French capital of Newfoundland.

Some honourable senators may not have realized that there were two capitals in Newfoundland at one time. There was the French capital, and the Anglo capital St. John's. Then there is a name from Lewisporte. I don't claim any relationship to the name. There is another Bay Roberts' man, and two more from Conception Bay. Here is an interesting name from Stephenville, the present home of our Senator Cochrane.

I spoke to her a little while ago and I was telling her about the hundreds of letters I have received from people all over Canada—I know others have too—objecting to the tax and asking us to do what we can to stop it. She told me she hadn't received any of these letters. But here we have a name from Stephenville, from Senator Cochrane's present home, where she resides.

There is another name from Manuels in eastern Newfoundland; others from Windsor, and Grand Falls, central Newfoundland. There is one from Harbour Breton, which is a small community on the south coast of Newfoundland. As a matter of fact, I think that is the birthplace of Senator Cochrane. There are six names from St. John's. I am sure that Senator Doody would be very interested to know that. I would like to know what kind of correspondence he has been receiving from his home town. Here is another name from Portugal Cove. Portugal Cove gets its name, apparently, from that great Portuguese explorer Corte-Real.

Senator Petten: Excuse me; would the Honourable Senator permit a question?

Senator Lewis: I would be delighted.

Senator Petten: Now, which Portugal Cove is that? There are two Portugal Coves. Perhaps you would just explain that.

Senator Lewis: I will be glad to explain. This Portugal Cove is about nine miles from St. John's, and is in Conception Bay, in the eastern part of the Avalon Peninsula. It is the terminal port for the ferry which runs to Bell Island, a large island in Conception Bay.

An Hon. Senator: May I ask you a question?

Senator Lewis: Would you mind if I finish answering this question? I am referring to Bell Island, for which Portugal Cove is the ferry terminal port. Belle Isle is up in the Strait of Belle Isle, which is between Newfoundland and Labrador.

There is another Portugal Cove called Portugal Cove South, which is south of St. John's, just to clarify that point.

Senator Simard: I read, at page 57 of the rules, that a senator may present any petition entrusted to him. I take it that this is what you have just been doing, right? May I know from you who entrusted you with that particular petition or those petitions?

Senator Frith: What difference does it make?

Senator Simard: I would like to know whether the good people of St. John's, Newfoundland woke up one fine morning and said, "Oh, isn't that nice, that nice Senator Lewis will protect me from an unjust act if I only bother to write to him." Or did you collect your petitions from the Deputy Leader, Senator Frith, who has been busy distributing them around to all of you guys?

Senator Frith: Why doesn't the honourable senator get his pencil out and listen. We will give him the name and address, and he can write to these people. Who is distributing them has nothing to do with it. The question is: Who presents them? They are presented and addressed to the Senate, and the Senators present them to the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: If you want to find out, why don't you write to them?

Senator Simard: It says, "Any senator may present any petition entrusted to him." I want to know who entrusted the senator with the petitions. That is a simple question.

Senator Frith: They are coming from the people of Canada; that is where they are coming from.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: The very same people that this government refused to listen to when we went around the country on the committee, and is refusing to listen to now; and senators opposite are sitting there uncomfortable about the fact that they have had to listen for a while to what the people of Canada feel. Let's carry on.

• (0200)

Senator Cogger: Senator Frith, may I ask another question?

Senator Frith: No. This is not question period.

Senator Cogger: It is a question that has been on my mind since last night.

Senator Frith: Make it good.

Senator Cogger: Petitions addressed to Senator Hébert were presented last night during the night. Senator Hébert was not here. I see him now in the chamber. I would like to ask him the question.

Senator Frith: He is not on his feet. This is not Question Period. It is up to him. Senator Lewis is on his feet. If Senator Lewis wants to answer questions, he may.

Senator Cogger: Senator Hébert—

Senator Frith: Why don't you listen? You are trying to find some way to stop up your ears and not listen to what the people of Canada feel.

Senator Cogger: I can assure you the question is very relevant.

Senator Frith: Relevant to what?

Senator Cogger: Let me ask Senator Hébert; he will understand.

Senator Frith: We don't mind your using up time. We are interested in the Senate's listening to what the people have to say. What is being suggested here is that while a senator is standing up during the presentation of petitions another senator can rise and ask still another senator a question, as if we were in Question Period.

Senator Cogger: During the night somebody on your side became the spokesman of a quasi-religious group based in Quebec which is well known for its anti-Semitic views. I want to know how you feel about that.

Senator Steuart: That is the kind of routine trick you pull. These are real names from real places that hate what you are doing, so sit down.

Senator Cogger: Let's find out from Senator Hébert.

An Hon. Senator: Shame on you.

Senator Frith: There is an allegation being made by senators. Now there is relevance for you—making anti-Semitic allegations.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is there a question for Senator Lewis?

Senator Lewis: I will be glad to give you a copy of this so you can write all the people you wish. You can ask them directly. All I know is that these petitions come to us to be presented and we are glad to present them.

Senator Bonnell: Senator, will you answer a question? Since Senator Cogger is going to have the privilege of having a copy of this petition, would you ensure that all Senators have it by having it printed in Hansard with the names so we can write to them? Newfoundlanders are having trouble with the fisheries, unemployment, and Hibernia, with all the promises they get from the federal government. We should all have the privilege of writing to them.

Senator Lewis: I think that would be a good idea and I agree with it. I would caution Senator Bonnell, however, that this will take some time. Do you think we should adjourn so we can get all these copies made?

Senator Bonnell: I do not think we should adjourn. We can carry on with the business, but I would ask you to get permission of the Senate to have these tabled in the proceedings of the day so we might have a copy without interfering with further presentations or with the business of the Senate.

Senator Lewis: I would be glad to ask. I hope the Table will be able to do that. I forgot to mention some of the places included in this petition.

Senator Carney: Senator Lewis, is there a proposal before you to actually print the name of every petitioner on there? That would be extremely wasteful, environmentally.

Senator Bonnell: It is printed in the Minutes of Proceedings.

Senator Carney: My question to which I would like an answer is that it is breaking the rules or changing the rules to show the names of petitioners in the record. Moreover, it would be very environmentally wasteful.

Senator Gigantès: Are the names of Canadian petitioners pollution, in your view? You should apologize to the people of Canada for considering their names to be a pollutant.

Senator Carney: Senator, I do not have to apologize, you have to apologize to the people of Canada. Is the suggestion before us to print all the thousands of names that have been presented in petitions today?

Senator Gigantès: It is a real privilege to present the petitions of Canadians, and not bump people off airplanes.

Senator Carney: I have a legitimate question.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Carney does have a legitimate question. I have consulted with Senator Bonnell. I suggest that for the moment we stick with the reading of the names in the way we are doing, with selected names being read. Senators are entitled to select what names they want to read. However, I suggest that not all the names be read into Hansard; but they can certainly be tabled.

Senator Carney: In concurrence with the rules of the Senate.

Senator Bonnell: I do not want to disagree with my house leader, but I wish to ask Senator Lewis a question. My request was to table the list of names on this one petition, not all of the thousands of names on all petitions. There are 27 names on this particular petition. Senator Cogger wants the names so he can write to those people.

Senator Cogger: That was not my point. I do not need to see the petition. I have my answer.

Senator Bonnell: If Senator Cogger withdraws his request then I do not think we have to ask to have them printed. I only asked that the 27 names on this petition be printed so that Senator Cogger, as one senator, would not alone be privileged but that all senators would have the privilege of seeing those names to make sure they could have the same answer from those people. However, if Senator Cogger withdraws his request, the names can simply be tabled for all to see.

Senator Cogger: I have my answer. I do not need the petition.

Senator Lewis: It is just a matter of tabling this petition then.

Honourable senators, we are down to Portugal Cove. Then we move across to the other side of the island, what we in Newfoundland call the west coast. I come to Cornerbrook, where there is another large paper mill. There is a petitioner back on the east coast again, from the town of Bay Roberts. There is a final one here from Fortune, which is a town on the south coast of Newfoundland. It is about 20 miles off the French islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon. Perhaps Fortune gets its name because it is close enough to the French islands to do a lot of smuggling. But that is by the way.

The name written there looks like Olds, which is not a familiar name to me from Fortune. The only name of Olds with which I am familiar is from the town of Twillingate on the northeast coast. It was a Doctor Olds who lived there and worked at the hospital from the 1920s until his recent death. He was a member of the Olds family from Michigan, I believe, who were the automobile family. He was a doctor who went to Twillingate. It gives me very much pleasure to present this petition.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I know it was always a great ordeal for the Conservatives whenever I got up to present petitions these past months. I could always count on an outcry from the Conservatives. Senator Simard, in particular, seemed to be very perturbed at the idea of a senator getting up to voice the concerns of ordinary Canadian citizens. That was the case for Bill C-21, a bill I still consider abominable. It is the beginning of the end of our employment system, one that is admired throughout the world, although I grant it was in need of reform but certainly not the type of sabotage undertaken in Bill C-21.

So over the past several months I presented a great many petitions requesting the Senate to block Bill C-21 on unemployment insurance. Afterwards, as the GST became the focus of concern, I received petitions not only from Quebec but from throughout Canada asking the Senate to use whatever powers within its means to stop the GST.

I have never really understood why the Conservatives took offense, and Senator Simard was not the only one, I was also booed in fine style by Senator Flynn whenever I rose to present petitions. Now what explains this reluctance on their part? Why are they unwilling to listen to the voice of the common people who have no other recourse but to sign petitions and send them to Members of Parliament and senators? What is it that is bothering those on the other side? I have never understood and I understand even less today.

Whatever the explanation, I consider it to be a fundamental, almost sacred privilege, for citizens in a British parliamentary democracy such as ours to be able to make their voice heard in the House of Commons and in the Senate through petitions. I hope that for once my colleagues opposite will have the decency to listen, without grumbling, to the voice of ordinary Canadian citizens who do not at all agree with the GST bill.

I have here a petition signed by 24,612 Candian citizens residing in the Halifax-Dartmouth area and in Sackville, Nova Scotia, requesting the Senate to turn down the GST bill.

I think it is a good idea my colleagues decided to read out the names of these persons; after all there are only 24,612 of them, so that we realize that they are real people. We are talking about flesh and blood, not some vague nebulous associations but citizens of the Province of Nova Scotia.

I note here a Mr. Kindy who lives at 30 Richville Road, Halifax, Nova Scotia; Meldy Shaw, 8 Willie Perry Drive, Nova Scotia; Albert E. Boudreau, I suppose he is an Acadian judging from the name . . .

Senator Corbin: An Acadian from Cape Breton.

Senator Hébert: From Cape Breton? Well, to be more exact, he is from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia.

Senator Corbin: Yes, but the Boudreaus come originally from Nova Scotia.

Senator Hébert: I suppose you are the authority in Acadian matters, especially if . . .

Senator Corbin: No, I am not an authority but I happen to know.

Senator Gigantès: What part of France did they originally come from, Senator Corbin?

Senator Bosa: There are also Boudreaus in Toronto.

[Senator H.]

Senator Hébert: Well, the Acadians have spread throughout North America, Senator.

Senator Corbin: The Acadians originally came from the west coast of France, from the province of Perche and the region of La Rochelle, for example.

Senator Gigantès: From the Vendée or Brittany?

Senator Corbin: I see someone standing up trying to speak. I do not think the Speaker has anything to say unless the honourable senator invites him to say something. No one asked this person to speak.

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable Senators, the reason for my rising is that when a question is asked, if the person who receives the question does not take his seat, then the question cannot be asked.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone asked you anything. The practice of this Chamber is for senators to impose self-discipline. You do not have the powers of the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons or the House of Commons in Westminster. You are to intervene only if an honourable senator or senators ask you to do so. That is a fundamental rule of this Chamber. Please keept it in mind. What was the question?

[English]

Senator MacDonald: I do not know which bill Senator Hébert was referring to. He started by referring to Bill C-21, but you are now talking about C-62. Would you give the preamble to the petitions and move on from there?

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I would be delighted to, Senator MacDonald. As a matter of fact, it is written in English . . .

[English]

I have the honour to present a petition signed by 24,612 residents of Halifax-Dartmouth and Sackville in Nova Scotia who ask to Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill. It is a petition on the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax. It says: "The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax."

[Translation]

Then comes a list of signatures. I will keep on reading them and you can check to find out whether these people from your area did indeed sign the petition. For example, you can ask Mr. F. Johnson from Halifax or Mr. W. Baker from 26 Virginia Avenue in Halifax, Mr. Mack Mathe, 245 Portland Street in Dartmouth.

[English]

> To the House of Canada in Parliament assembled, your petitions, the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right, thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth:

Since 1984 the Conservative Federal Government has imposed on Canadian Taxpayers at least 31 new taxes or tax increases; whereas since September 1984, the present Manufacturers' Sales tax has already been increased by the federal government from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent; whereas the Conservative federal government wants to impose on Canadians a new general 9 per cent tax on goods and services.

[Translation]

. . . James Winter, 2359 Lawrencetown, Dartmouth; Elizabeth Farrell, of Spikenard Street in Dartmouth; Mr. Ed Simpson from Halifax; Fred Maybe, 77 Moxy Avenue, Bridgewater, Nova Scotia; Sheila Moffatt, 6321 Yale Street, Halifax; Cora Cortum, 339 Donaldson Avenue, Halifax; Iva King, 5415 Victoria, Halifax; Margaret Manon, 45 Oaklectaneg Street, Dartmouth; N. Kennedy, 28 Charlois, County Dartmouth; Florrie Shea, 159 Albro, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, and so on. I have some here and there are others as well. Senators can take a look at the names to make sure that the list is authentic. There are more details in this one, it should interest you.

[English]

Whereas this new tax which will be hidden from Canadians will be applied to virtually everything they buy; whereas the imposition of this new general goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians; whereas the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small businesses; whereas on behalf of Canadians we strongly oppose this new goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment; wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

[Translation]

—That is what it used to be, it must be a misprint, I imagine it was meant to be 7%.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable Senator Hébert, may I ask a question?

Senator Gigantès: Not right now, we would like to hear all the names.

Senator Hébert: I would have to take my seat.

Senator Tremblay: I wanted to make sure I had heard you correctly when you mentioned the date of the petition. Judging from what you have read, it would appear to have been at the time when the GST was supposed to be at 9% when in actual fact the level has been brought down to 7%.

I would be interested in hearing your comments about the consequences of this differential level on the effects set out in a petition.

Senator Gigantès: May I answer for you?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Tremblay: I put the question to Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: I am yielding to my colleague.

Senator Tremblay: Let us agree at the outset that if I am not satisfied with the answer, I can return to Senator Hébert.

Senator Gigantès: Most certainly, in about six hours time. As far as the GST is concerned, people are not so much opposed because of the taxation level but because of the concept itself.

They are opposed to the timing and the type of measure. Any economist, even the most monetarist, will tell you that a recession is not the right time to impose a new tax.

Groups like the Conference Board, even the Economic Council of Canada, say that the inflationary push of this tax will be greater than the government foresees.

The first objection everyone has is the following: here we are in a recession, they are going to be taxing us. Common sense tells us that everything will be more expensive, people will buy less, businesses are going to sell less, so they are going to buy less from their wholesalers, the wholesalers are going to buy less from manufacturers, less will be manufactured, therefore more people will be laid off and those people will have less money to buy stuff at the corner store, who will be buying less from the wholesaler, who will buy less from the manufacturer, who is going to sell less and therefore have to lay more people off and the economy, in a vicious circle, is going to plummet. People understand that.

So people are opposed to the timing of this tax; that is number one. Number two, they are opposed to the folly of this tax. A tax, or any legislation, has to have some logical cohesion. So when a tax says that hot popcorn is taxable but the minute it is cold it is not, that one kilo of caviar for Mr. Wilson's rich friends from stock market country is not taxable but four ounces of Canadian caviar—but caviar is usually Russian or Iranian, so let us say four ounces of Canadian yoghurt—is taxed. That is foolish.

Then you also have the administration of this tax. It could have been as simple as it is in New Zealand where, to get your tax credit, the businessman presents the total of his sales and his purchases. His 7% is calculated on the basis of those two figures, two figures that he is going to calculate anyway, as anyone in any kind of trade does all year long on every occasion. But no, they had to set up the worst of models, closely based on the British setup, which requires a morass of paperwork for each little corner store, for each little tradesman, for each small- or medium-sized business. It is just mind-boggling.

Experts have told us that the administration costs of this tax could be forty times higher than the administration of provincial sales taxes. People are not crazy, they do not want that. It is going to decrease their profits, which are already being threatened by recession. Not only are they going to have fewer sales, but their administration costs are going to be just awful, and all because of this tax that is really off the wall, to say the least.

The Mulroney government does not even have the courage of its own convictions. If you want to impose that kind of tax, Senators, they could have said as the New Zealanders did—

[English]

Senator MacDonald: May I ask what your are doing?

Senator Gigantès: I am answering a question.

Senator MacDonald: I think we are all a little confused. Senator Tremblay was asking a question of Senator Hébert which you are attempting to answer.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, he delegated to me, and Senator Tremblay accepted on the condition that if he is not satisfied with my answer—

Senator Murray: How can that be within the rules?

Senator Gigantès: Pardon?

Senator Murray: How can that be within the rules?

Senator Gigantès: Which rules? You have abolished the rules.

Senator Murray: Don't make a mockery.

Senator Gigantès: You carried out a procedural crush on October 4. Until then the bells were a signal that a vote would take place but the timing of that vote until that infamous occasion was the assent of the two whips. Not only that, you gave us a false time. You said the vote would take place at 5:25 p.m., and there were independent senators at the gate and they could not come in to vote when they wanted to vote on your side.

• (1430)

You destroyed the rules, you brought in a precedent which you want to apply which would allow you at any time unilaterally to move the meeting of this Senate, if you wanted to, to 24 Sussex Drive, meet in secret, do anything you want and then come up and present us with a fait accompli. So don't talk to us about the rules. You are the rapist of the rules.

Senator MacDonald: Have you such sufficient faith in your colleague that he can't answer a question directly?

Senator Gigantès: My colleague delegated to me and if he regrets the delegation to me, I am prepared to throw the ball back to him. Would you like me to stop talking?

Senator MacDonald: Let him answer his own question.

Senator Hébert: No, senator, I am happy, you have been doing a fine job up to now. Please go on. I appreciate it.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Senator Gigantès, I have listened attentively to the kind of answer you have been giving to the question I put to Senator Hébert. I have been listening to you for three or four minutes hoping that from one sentence to the next you would finally address the sense of the question that I had put.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: It takes time.

Senator Gigantès: I get the impression that the more you talk, the further you are getting from the sense of my question. So I would like to put my question to Senator Hébert once again, which will give you the time to think about how to answer it without getting away from the subject at hand.

My question was addressed to Senator Hébert and had to do very specifically with the meaning of the petition he described in general terms, keeping to the spirit of our Rules in go doing, for when a petition is submitted, the person who submits it simply gives us its meaning.

Now, in the text that was read and which was the petition itself, it was clear that what was being referred to was a time when the rate of the GST was supposed to be 9 per cent. I asked him whether that changed anything in the meaning of the petition, since the rate of the tax is not 9 per cent anymore but 7 per cent; taking more particularly into account the fact that the petition addresses the inflationary effects of the tax being addressed in the petition, which is a 9 per cent tax. A 7 per cent tax, it would seem to me, will at least have inflationary effects the severity of which will be different from those of a 9 per cent tax. I simply wanted to know what Senator Hébert's own conclusion was as to the difference between the situation at the time the petition was signed and the present situation of a 7 per cent tax rather than 9 per cent?

Senator Hébert: I would have preferred someone more competent than I to answer you. I can at least tell you this: I got this 24,000-name petition yesterday, and if you want to know who sent it to me, it is the Tax Payers' Council on National Issues, 192 Joseph Zasethsman Drive, suite 14, Burnside Industrial Park, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, telephone: 468-3006.

So I got it yesterday. In brief, what the petitioners are asking for, at the top of the petition, is to get rid of the GST. There is a typographical error someone made when they started circulating the petition a long time ago and did not check the typography. I do not think that changes anything, because I got it yesterday.

As for the date, it was of no importance. In our rules, there is no mention made of any date, there is no timeframe, there is nothing about that. It may have been signed 10 years ago and it will still be valid and can be presented as long as it has not yet been tabled in the Senate.

Senator Tremblay: It is because they are talking about a 9 per cent tax in the text of the petition.

Senator Hébert: It appears to me that it was a 9 per cent tax originally and they decided it was not worth revamping their form. That is all I can see to it.

Senator Tremblay: Would you personally have preferred that they revamp the text as it was not 9 per cent anymore but 7 per cent?

Senator Hébert: Yes, Senator Tremblay, it would have been better because we could have avoided this whole discussion, which I do not find useful at all.

Senator Tremblay: I would point out that it would have been better in and of itself.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, could I ask you to read the prayer of the petition? Would you read the prayer of the petition because, in fine, that is all that is important under our rules. There is no mention of debate, there is no mention of the rate, what do those people want? Do they want the tax to be abolished? Yes or no? That is what I want to know.

Senator Hébert: So I shall read what we have at the top of the petition, in other words, what the people read before signing it.

[English]

On the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax. The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

That is the text of what the people signed.

Senator Tremblay: You said something else before.

Senator Hébert: Yes, but that is on the back, those are the explanations on another petition. It is not really important as these are annexes or appendices. In any case, I would say to Senator Tremblay that if he really wants to check the authenticity of this petition or if he wants to know if people prefer the tax to be 9% or 7%, he can always consult them, for example:

Janet Zeller, 179 Lake Harwood Drive, Halifax, Nova Scotia. Or he could always phone up Darlene Humbikin, 18 Herace Avenue, Halifax, or Lisa Golden, 96 Mayflower, Sackville, Nova Scotia.

[English]

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, we can dispense with that. We will take the word of the honourable senator.

Senator Gigantès: You may take my word, but some of you are not convinced.

Senator MacDonald: We will take your word. You can dispense with that. We will accept that as an honest, legitimate petition. There is no need to go through that.

Senator Gigantès: Well, I don't agree because there is another question?

Senator MacDonald: Is there another question?

Senator Bosa: Yes, there is another question. I have never heard those names. I never heard the petition. I would like to hear it. I would beg the honourable gentleman to go ahead and read the names. But there is a point I want to make. I understand that the rules of the Senate provide that when a petition has been read by an honourable senator, it should be handed to messenger to be delivered to the Table, and it seemed to me that the first petition was placed beside you.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, that's right.

Senator Bosa: So, I hope I am not offending you by asking you to comply with the rules. Would you call a messenger and send it to the Table?

Senator Gigantès: Yes. We never know if we have any rules in this place. That's why I forgot. If there is a Senate page available I would gladly start the process of handing them over.

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: May I ask a question, please?

Senator Hébert: About the petitions I am reading?

Senator Cogger: A question about the petitions that were presented on your behalf last night.

Senator Hébert: I have no objection.

Senator Cogger: Senator Hébert, last night, petitions, addressed to you, were presented. They were presented, if memory serves, by Senator Hastings. They were written in English and at the bottom of the petition there was a note—you can check this because it was tabled—a note to the effect that the petition had been given widespread circulation in a publication entitled Michael.

My question is as follows: are you familiar with the publication Michael or its French-language version Vers demain? Are you familiar with the organization which publishes this magazine? Are you familiar with the sometimes racist and often anti-Semitic positions of this organization? And if so, how can you agree to being these people's spokesman?

Senator Hébert: Senator Cogger, I am truly astonished that an honourable senator could ask me such a question. When I get properly signed petitions from Canadian citizens whose signature I have no reason to doubt, am I to ask that they go to confession before having their petition tabled in the Senate? How am I to know whether or not they have made anti-Semitic statements at some time or other in their lives? I know nothing about them? Have they committed adultery? I do not know. Are they right wing or left wing? I do not know.

It is true and I acknowledge the fact—if you will allow me to finish my question—it is true I have noticed that from time to time some of the petitions I receive are not petitions that I have solicited; I want to make that quite clear. I have had no contact with the organization Vers demain/Michael. I receive petitions as do all senators and I automatically put them in my in-basket. I have never read this particular petition; it holds absolutely no interest for me. I have no sympathy for the groups it represents.

But that is not the point. What these people are doing is quite legitimate. It is a group which is recognized in Canada. When I see a petition signed by 24,000 people, I am not convinced that all 24,000 of them are Social Creditists. These forms are passed out by citizens who stand at street corners or at shopping centres and who ask people to sign. These people have the right to be heard.

Senator Cogger: Senator Hébert, are you telling us that you want to be the spokesman of the pilgrims of St-Michael, a racists and often anti-Semitic group? Does that not bother you.

Senator Hébert: I have just told you, Senator Cogger, this is a group for which I have no particular sympathy, a group I know nothing about and have nothing to do with; but, I am aware of its existence and I know that its existence is absolutely legal in Quebec and Canada.

Furthermore, I cannot understand how the fact that these people who have a magazine got together and sent out absolutely proper forms to their subscribers, and the fact that these petition forms were passed out in shopping centres and signed by people who for the most part were not members of this organization, should have any bearing on the petitions legitimacy or justify the discussion we just had. I think it is quite ridiculous. As I said, I do not deny the fact that some of the people who signed this petition belong to this organization. I am no more familiar with it than I am with the Taxpayers Council on National Issues. I do not know whether or not it is a bona fide organization or whether or not it is racist or anti-racits. I have no idea. That is not what counts. What counts is the fact that these people are Canadian citizen and that they have signed a petition. I know you do not like to hear this sort of thing, but that is the way things are.

Pearl Nicholson—and you can check this by getting in touch with her—1606 Frankie Drive, Sackville, Nova Scotia. You can write to ask her about the circumstances in which she signed this petition. You can also ask here whether she likes the GST any better now that it is at 7 per cent than when it was at 9 per cent, etc.

Dan Manhouse, 178 Cavalier Drive, Sackville, Nova Scotia; C.M. Kelly, 21 Noria Grass, Saskville; M.A. Johnson, 3601 Lynch Street, Halifax; M. York, 682 Windsor Road, Sackville, Halifax; Lindsay James, Box 1, Site 1, R.R. 1, Windsor Junction, Nova Scotia; Ken William, R.R. 1, Art's County, Nova Scotia; Margo Fraser, Site 852, R.R. 1, Bedford; M.J. Macmaster, General Delivery, Waverly, Halifax; Debbie Reid, 8 Sammy Road, Sackville; Ross Parkhouse—Mr. Parkhouse would not be overjoyed to know that you have interruped me while I am in the middle of reading this petition.

Senator Tremblay: Senator Hébert, you are reading the list of those people who have signed the petition. I would like to draw your attention to the rule on page 57 of the Rules of the Senates.

Senator Hébert: Have you had this book a long time, Senator Tremblay?

Senator Tremblay: If I remember correctly, I got it in Septembre 1979, a few years before you got yours.

Senator Hébert: That was not obvious last week; it was as if you had abolished it.

Senator Tremblay: I do not see the connection between your first question and the comment you have just made.

Senator Hébert: You make a point of order on a mere trifle and you ignore the Rules when fundamental principles are concerned.

Senator Tremblay: The point of order is not on a mere trifle, it is on what is happening here. Have you read this section, Senator Hébert?

[Senator Cogger.]

Senator Hébert: Yes, I have read it.

Senator Tremblay: So, you are quite consciously infringing the Rules.

Senator Hébert: I am not infringing the Rules. I now give the floor to Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: I would like to ask Senator Tremblay to read the Rule in question.

Senator Tremblay:

> A senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.
> I believe that the content of the petition ends when the list of petitioners begins.
> The text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto is not printed in the Debates of the Senate or the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

That seems clear enough. It is indeed a public petition and not a petition concerning a private bill; it concerns a public bill. That seems fairly clear, do you not think, Senator Hébert?

Senator Gigantès: It is not at all clear.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to say something because some of your colleagues, Senator Tremblay, raised the same point this morning. I would like to point out that the reading of petitioners' names and addresses is not forbidden. All that the Rules say is—please allow me to quote the text:

> The names of the petitioners attached thereto are not printed in the Debates of the Senate or the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Nowhere in the Rules or in this book on the Rules of the Senate is a senator presenting a petition forbidden from giving the names and addresses of the petitioners. I will go one step further and quote Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice; page 233 of his edition and not the one that was rewritten by academics and scholars but by the procedural expert himself, Bourinot. What does he have to say:

> What is Senator Hébert doing? He is making a brief reference to the source. And what is the source? It is the people who have signed. What he is doing is completely in keeping with the rules.

Senator Hébert: I knew that I was within the rules; especially as I am not reading the text itself—

Senator Tremblay: Unless you agree to stop reading the names.

Senator Hébert: I am trying to answer you and you keep interrupting me.

Senator Tremblay: If you want to answer the question I have raised, I will not object.

Senator Hébert: I am indeed answering your question about not reading the entire petition. Unfortunately, I have to skip a name from time to time because such signatures are hard to make out. So, I am not reading the entire petition.

Senator Tremblay: With your indulgence; Senator Corbin has just indirectly confirmed the point that I am raising. The Rule reads:

> A senator . . . makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.

This would allow a senator to summarize the content of a petition in order to give an idea of its thrust, which is what you did earlier.

I simply cannot see how this paragraph deals with the reading of names. Moreover, Senator Corbin was very careful to say that it was not forbidden to read them but the Rules read: "The petition itself is not read". This had to do with content; and common sense would have it that the list of names is not part of the petition's content, of a petition's thrust. I think it is quite clear that our Rules do not provide for the reading of names; far from it.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I believe that if Senator Tremblay knew how this section came into being, he would change his mind. This paragraph was introduced following the tabling of petitions in this House by the Hon. Senator Bonnell when we were studying the bill on drug patents. I am sure that you remember this episode.

Senator Bonnell rose in the Senate on two or three occasions and began to read the names. Someone suggested that it would cost a great deal of money to have the names printed—and I stress this point, as did my colleague at that time—in the transcript and in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. At no time did anyone intend to prevent the reading of names here in the Senate. Quite the contrary.

The Rules simply do not deal with it; they deal with the printing, and not the reading, of names. Let us be clear on this. When one remembers the incident that led to the introduction of this Rule, all this is absolutely clear—crystal clear, as Senator Beaudoin would say.

Senator Hébert: Thank you, Senator Corbin. Once again you have managed to have the last word and I congratulate you for that.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senator, I would like you to clarify your answer. You have implicitly admitted that the reading of the list of names is covered by our Rules. You have told us that you skip a name here and there. So, why do you not skip several at a time?

Senator Hébert: I do not skip any of the names that I can read. The problem is that sometimes signatures are hard to read. I have no trouble, however, in reading the signature of Ms Betty; Cooksune, Box 2277, Windsor, Nova Scotia; Mr. Wilf Vigneault—now there is another fine name from my part of the country and it might just be an Acadian name.

Senator Corbin: He comes from the North Shore.

Senator Hébert: Windsor John Chin, Nova Scotia; R. R. Holland, Bedford, Nova Scotia; M. J. Kingston from Auniak, Nova Scotia; M. Don Rickenport, 156 Stockin Drive, Stackville, Nouvelle Écosse. Whenever a page is available, this petition is ready. I have another signed petition, and I will spare you by not rereading the actual text of the petition; on it you have the names of Gail Archard, 74 Hillside Avenue in Sackville; Rick and Karen Hoffman, 22 Sunnyview, Sackville; Robert Babard, 12 Belmont Avenue in Bedford; Ray Coldwell, 423 Old Sackville Road, Sackville; Clarke Squeel, 5415 Victoria Road, Sackville; Bill Squires, 18 2nd Avenue, Sackville; followed by Scott Squire; it looks sa though the whole family signed, 18 2nd Avenue, Sackville; Mitch Gillin, 14 Woodbury Drive, halifax; Peter Hill, 24 Colburn, Waverley, Nouvelle-Écosse; Sharon Barry, Site 2, Box B, Rural Route No. 1, Ansley, Nouvelle-Écosse; D. P. Petitpas, 63 Glendaw Avenue, Halifax; S. Hinds, Estey, Nouvelle-Écosse; Barry Reed, Bridgewater, Nova Scotia; Karen Bayers, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Todd Perry, Sackville, Nova Scotia; Catherine Watson, Endfield, Nova Scotia; Eddy MacAuslin, Endfield, Nova Scotia. Whenever a page is available this sheet is ready; John Turner, 171 Kay Street, Sackville; Wilhem Hawes, 3481 Windsor Street, apartment 4, Sackville; John Archer, 74 Hillside Avenue, Sackville.

Senator David: I have a question for you, may I ask it?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator David: I am a little surprised to hear you reading the names and addresses of the persons who signed the many petitions you have introduced, and I understand you intend to continue introducing, whereas you presented petitions concerning Bill C-21 one after the other almost every day for weeks and at that time you felt more appropriate to give us simply the city of origin, the number of signatories, and the reason for the petition. What has changed your attitude in the interval between those previous weeks and today?

I think it needs to be said that since 1 a.m. this morning or thereabouts, we have been listening to the names and addresses of petitioners. I feel that this is an exraordinary waste of time for a parliamentary assembly such as our own. I subscribed wholeheatedly to your actions when you were presenting petitions, but I have reservations about your reading lists of names and addresses . . . why not give us postal codes and phone numbers while you are at it?

Senator Hébert: I will begin by replying to the last of your questions. I do not have the phone numbers, and so I cannot give them to you.

Senator David: I do not want them.

Senator Hébert: As others have said before me, I am sure, the GST has become a very serious issue in our society at this time. We do not know exactly what the economic consequences will be but it may mean catastrophe to a large number of Canadians. Even from the political perspective, we do now know what this tax holds in store for us in the future. And so it is because this seems so important to me that I am doing things which I have not done in the normal course of events in the past few months. Now that this has taken on—and I think that you would agree with me on this—crisis proportions, that the issue is in the news every day, Canadians are becoming more and more aware of the importance of what we are doing here in the Senate, i.e. preventing the tax bill from passing. In this way we are buying time for the Canadian population.

As you know, 85% of the population has spoken out against the GST. There is still work to be done to convince the remaining 15%. When we have reached 100%, I wonder whether Mr. Mulroney, your esteemed leader, will continue to want to impose his tax against everyone's will.

Because, then, of these unusual circumstances and of the importance of the situation, I think that it is normal for us to give the names of the citizens who took the trouble to sign this petition and send it to us. It is that simple, and I do not see where the problem lies.

And so the next ones are Lewis Keeney from Dartmouth; Margie MacGuire from Fall River, Nova Scotia, and I will spare you the postal codes, Lauren Kennedy from Halifax, Nova Scotia; Doreen Smith from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Linda Smith from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Charamine Hickey, from Halifax, Nova Scotia; Ruth Henderson from Beford, Nova Scotia; Judy Hopaw from Eastern Passage, Nova Scotia; Rose Mary MacLeeway from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; John Thompson from Halifax, Nova Scotia.

If the page would like to come over, I am ready to give him this sheet. I shall continue. Sonia Sutherland from Halifax; Susan MacKay from Halfiax, Nova Scoita—

Senator David: How many hours do you intend to spend reading that whole pile in front of you?

Senator Hébert: I do apologize; had I known that you were going to put that question to me I would have practised in my office, I would have timed myself, but I did not know that you were going to ask me that question. Honestly, I cannot answer you.

Perhaps you could take on the task of computing how long it takes to read each name. I admitted quite simply at the outset that I had 24,612 names. As I am not reading all of them—

Senator Corbin: If you would like a moment's respite, Senator Hébert, I have petitions that I would like to present on behalf of my fellow citizens from New Brunswick. It is up to you.

Senator Hébert: Give me a few minutes.

Senator Corbin: There is no one speaking on behalf of New Brunswick on that side of the House, and I am eager to step up to the mike.

Senator Hébert: Are you trying to tell me they have not received any petitions?

Senator Corbin: Not only is that the case—

Senator Hébert: Do not tell me we are the only ones to receive petitions?

Senator Corbin: It is quite normal in Parliament to receive petitions asking for the imposition of taxes. Have they received petitions asking for the imposition of this goldarn tax?

[Senator Hébert.]

Senator Hébert: We can hardly suppose that they have not received any. They must be reserving them as ammunition to crush us later. Later, they will say: we also have petitions, petitions demanding the GST. So, we will be expecting them.

Senator David: Honourable senators, if all of you had simply added up the number of petitions you have received, you could have said to us: we have received 125,000 petitions and you could have reduced this exercise to an hour or 30 minutes, whereas now we are going to be here for two or three days listening to your reading peitions to us. If you do not think that is a waste of time, I suppose it is a free country.

Senator Corbin: I have a comment for Senator David. If you would like to resolve one or two problems that were caused by your side, we will speed up the reading of petitions. I dare you to do so.

Senator Gigantès: I would like to make another comment. I am surprised to hear such remarks from a man of the calibre of Senator David, a man who is so well respected by Canadians throughout the land, a man who enjoys an international reputation as a humanist, a man we all love and respect. I am surprised to hear him suggest that it is not worthy of one of the Houses of Parliament to be reading the names of citizens who signed petitions, when this is one of the oldest traditions available to citizens, one which antedates even democracy; even villeins, even serfs, even slaves, could petition their masters.

I would like to read something from Beauchesne, which you so love to quote—

Senator David: Which I so love to quote? Certainly not!

• (1500)

[English]

Senator Gigantès: The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the Constitution and has been exercised without interruption since 1867.

[Translation]

I am translating the text. It is not an official translation but it will be good enough:

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the Constitution and has been exercised without interruption since 1867.

That is a sacred right. It is not a casual exercise. These are the names of two million people, their addresses and phone numbers. Those people have sent in petitions because they want to be heard. They have sent them to us because they are anxious, because they have had enough, because they are frightened by some of the things your government is doing. You like to quote the Winnipeg Free Press. In today's Quorum, on page 26, there is an article by one of their editorialists, Francis Russell, on this very topic which says that people are afraid of your free trade: they are afraid of free trade with Mexico where workers take a week to earn what a Canadian worker earns in an hour. They are afraid of losing their airline because you want to deregulate; and so they resort to this fundamental right, that of petitioning the government. I urge you, Senator David, and I know that you did not do this on purpose, not to show contempt for the Canadian citizens who send us petitions for the redress of grievances brought about by the actions of your government.

Senator David: Honourable Senator Gigantès, allow me first of all to thank you for your compliments. I am very touched by compliments coming from a person as erudite and cultivated as yourself. You went far beyond the very simple question I had put to Senator Hébert.

Let me say firstly that I do not despise the Canadian people. Secondly, I simply asked why, when he received thousands of petitions concerning Bill C-21, he respected this Chamber's collegiality by saying, rather than reading every name and address on his list, that he had received a petition from such and such a place containing 26 names, and another from another place, with 35 names, and after at the most 10 minutes he had presented all of his petitions. I simply asked him why he had changed his tactic for today's petitions, and why he was not handling them as he had handled the previous ones. His former method was much more expeditious and did not lead to the waste of time we have experienced since one o'clock this morning.

Far be it for me to suggest that petitions not be presented; I do however suggest that it be done in a gracious, expeditious manner, one which respects senators' time.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable Senator, is a senator's time worth more in your eyes than the wishes of the people? Is that time more precious than the voice of the people who want to make themselves heard? Really, Senator David, you surprise me.

They have a right to be heard, they have a right to make themselves known. If they did not want to be identified, they would not give their names, addresses, and phone numbers, is that not so?

If you want us to read the names and addresses of the people who sent in petitions on Bill C-21, just wait until the bill comes up for debate in the Senate; we have hundreds of thousands left and you will be hearing them one after the other. Members of the general public do not want this treated lightly. They want their individual voices to be heard here in this Chamber in order that they may personally take part in defending their freedom and their interests, which their government no longer defends.

Senator Corbin: Honourable Senators, I just heard our esteemed colleague Senator David refer to collegiality. I would like to ask Senator David how this respect for the collegial spirit was honoured with regard to the Standing Order referred to on page 70? Where was your spirit of solidarity then? And I quote:

> The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker would say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked".

Where was your precious collegial spirit on that day? Today, you have the nerve to lecture us on the collegial spirit when we are simply expressing the wishes of Canadian citizens. I have had enough of that. Stop lecturing us!

Senator Hébert: Now, where was I when you interrupted us, Senator David?

Senator Gigantès: Would you like a pencil to mark the spot?

Senator Hébert: No, the worst that can happen is that I will repeat one twice, and no one will be the worse for that. Louise Brenton from Halifax Drive; Harold Morgan from Bedford, Nova Scotia; C. Royal from Bedford, Nova Scotia; M. Power, Halifax, Nova Scotia; Michael Duffy, Sackville Drive, Nova Scotia.

Senator Gigantès: I wonder if he is related to Mike Duffy?

[English]

Senator Hébert: Mr. Michael—Michelle—Duffy, Sackville Drive, Nouvelle Ecosse.

Senator Fairbairn: Related to Mike Duffy?

Senator Hébert: I don't know. We should ask her. Do you want her address?

Senator Gigantès: Do you think that this Michael Duffy is a cousin of Michael Duffy of the CBC? Could we find out?

Senator Hébert: I don't know. Maybe we can take care of that. She is Michelle Duffy.

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I have a point of order, Honourables Senators. I have just listened to the exchange between Senator Gigantès and Senator David about reading the names that are generally to be found on a petition.

I will not claim to be perfectly informed about the customs and traditions of this House, but in the Standing Orders, in Section 1, it states that:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or it any committee. Thereof.

Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, there is no parliament where practice dictates that when a petition is tabled, the names of those who signed that petition are read out one by one. I wonder if in so doing we are respecting the spirit of the Standing Orders. Secondly, it has been argued that the people who signed the petitions have confidence in Parliament and want to be heard and indentified. I think that if we really want to help the people who signed those petitions, it would be much more appropriate to go on to the discussion of the famous bill and, by so doing, to really defend the interests of all the citizens of Canada instead of reading lists of names. This is unheard of in any Canadian Parliament.

Senator Gigantès: I am pleased that the Senator, and the word is in quotes for the time being—

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I want to raise a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleague Senator Meighen made this point before. We have as much claim to be here as the Honourable Senators opposite. Our appointments were approved by the Prime Minister, by the Queen of the Realm and by the government of Canada. We were sworn in. I will not countenance being treated as a second-class senator here in this Chamber, as long as the Supreme Court, to whom this may eventually be submitted, I imagine, has not invalidated our appointments. For the moment, we are here on exactly the same footing as Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable Senator, I did not say that you did not have the same claim to be here. I simply said in quotes. This does not mean second-class. I simply wanted to highlight the word. Be that as it may, you were referring to Standing Orders, but you did say that you are not yet quite up on them yet.

Senator Corbin was reading the Standing Orders earlier and he said that a senator presenting a public petition makes a brief declaration in which he informs the Senate of the content of the petition without reading the whole text verbatim.

I have a petition here before me and I will illustrate the difference between reading the whole text verbatim and not doing so. If I say that this is a petition against the GST, that is not reading the whole text verbatim. If I were to read the whole text I would do so as follows:

[English]

> The undersigned, your petitioners, call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: If I read all of those words, I am reading the whole text. If I say that it is simply a petition against the GST, I am not reading the whole text.

Nowhere does it say that I am not to read the names. Perhaps the rules you proposed were standard practice in Quebec's National Assembly, but nowhere here does it say that we are not to read the names. In our Standing Order, on page 57, it is said that > the list of names included in petitions "is not printed or in the Debates of the Senate or in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate." That is something else. We are not asking that they be printed. If we did print them, we would be fueling Senator Carney's—in quotes also—fears, for she did express the concern that we were going to be destroying Canadian forests by having all of this printed. No, we are not asking that these two million names, addresses and phone numbers be printed, but we will read them to you. When we go on to Bill C-21, we will also be reading other petitions on that bill and on Bill C-28 because there are a lot of people who believe that their pensions are threatened and who also have written to me. We have those petitions on hand and you will be hearing them with their names and addresses. We will not, however, be reading the whole text of the petition.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Hébert: I of course respect Senator David's and Senator Lavoie-Roux's irritation, and I would go so far as to say their indignation, at what they felt was disrespect for the Rules of this Chambers.

What surprises me is that these same Senators were not annoyed or indignant when something that is of great concern to all of us took place in this Chamber. It is one thing to take some time to read the names of good Canadian citizens who have asked us to present a petition to the Senate. This may seem to some to go on at length, it may seem boring, especially if it goes against one's political persuasion, of course! But I want to ask those same people, whose indignation comes so easily in the faces of such simple things, where their indignation was when the Rules of this House were being trampled before their very eyes? Why were they not indignant when half of their colleagues opposite were deprived of their vote? They did not get very indignant then, but now they are becoming irate because we are taking a few minutes of their precious time. We on this side have the time to listen to the petitions of Canadians and to read their names in this Chamber. So , when I was interrupted, I had reached the name of Michelle Duffy, you will remember, from Sackville; Gerry Mackinnison, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Marie Morrison, Lower Sackville, Nova Scotia . . . Ken Duffy, Sackville, Nova Scotia; Dan Taylor, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Linda Duffy (what a large family!), Sackville, Nova Scotia; Olivia Lumgrasse, Sackville, Nova Scoita; Sarah Gilbert, Sackville, Nova Scotia; Stephen Wilson, Halifax, Nova Scotia; Lyle Simpson, Beford, Nova Scotia; Ray Rhinehard, Cold Harbour, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Robert Warnt, Sackville, Nova Scotia; Jo White, Halifax, Nova Scoita; Jay Thompson, Beford, Nova Scotia; Bay Staples, Beford, Nova Scotia; Vaughn Price, Lower Sackville, Nova Scoita;—

An Hon. Senator: You are delaying the process.

Senator Frith: I would be the last to want to do that.

Senator Hébert: I'm sure. Nora Wilson.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have petitions which come to me from New Brunswick. The petitioners ask the government of Canada to withdraw its Goods and Services Tax Bill.

[English]

This particular petition contains 27 signatures. I will skip the first name. I can't make it out, but it is quite an elegant signature. I think it is Tricarter or something to that effect, but the address is from Upper Woodstock.

(Names of signatories read.)

By the way, I should remark that these are hardworking people from a relatively poor area of New Brunswick. I know the communities, I have been there. I drive through some of those communities quite regularly, and these are poor, hardworking people. Many of them don't have work during the winter. Some of them work in the woods in the summertime, enduring flies, sweat and spruce gum, but in some areas they can't find work in the woods in the winter because of a slowdown. In other areas they prefer to work in the winter. The companies decide that. So there you have it, a cross-section of New Brunswick from Newcastle on the Northumberland Strait right up to the Maine-New Brunswick border. That is one petition.

I have another petition which proposes the same remedy, that the government should do away with the goods and services tax. Most of these names are from the Woodstock, Canterbury, Harvey Station, Forest City again, Pemberton Ridge, Canterbury, Canterbury, Fredricton, Canterbury, and Newcastle. I will dispense with the reading of the names. There are 27 signatures on that petition.

Let's look at the source of some of these signatures. Some are from St. Stephen, Lawrence Station, St. Andrews. Many from St. Stephen. Rolling Dam.

Rolling Dam, by the way, if you want to know more about the origin of that name, is 16 miles northeast of St. Andrews. There was a post office at Rolling Dam from 1856 to 1915. It was called Rolling Dam Post Office. Then it became Rolling Dam Station around 1889, and since 1970 it is simply Rolling Dam. I'm referring to the edition of Toponylmy Study No. 2, Geographical Names of New Brunswick, by A. Rayburn. This was published in 1975 by the Government of Canada. It is quite possible that Post Canada has totally removed the post office in that small locality of which I am speaking. But the name itself is for a dam with both upward and downward slopes to keep from jamming, designed to prevent undermining. The locality was settled in 1830. So there you have it. That's the origin of the name "Rolling Dam".

Petitioners from St. George signed this petition. St. George is a community just inland from the Bay of Fundy. It is near the sardine capital of the world, if that means anything to you.

Oak Bay, New Brunswick, in the St. Andrews, St. Stephen area. There is a nice beach there, in case tourists are interested in wanting to know that. A petitioner from Saint John signed this. We have a signature from the great island of Grand Manan; great people. Fishing is the chief economic activity on Grand Manan. It is an unusual fishery, and it certainly is worth a visit. Many American tourists visit Grand Manan. They are not isolated from mainland New Brunswick. They have an excellent ferry service, and I encourage all senators who have never been to Grand Manan to make the trip there next summer. Of course they will encounter a little fog, but there is nothing wrong with that. On Grand Manan, you will meet some of the kindest people in the world.

● (1530)

There are also many, many signatures on this petition from St. Stephen, Riverview, New Brunswick, and Bocabec. Would honourable senators care to know the origin of the name "Bocabec"?

> Flows southeast into Passamaquoddy Bay, a name derived from Passamaqoddy, that is the name of an Indian group, or Pokabesk, meaning "unknown".

But I say to the people of Bocabec, you are no longer unknown. The Senate of Canada knows you exist and we hear your voices loud and clear. So, that is Bocabec.

Then I have another petition. The signatures are all on the face of it. There are 27 signatures. Again, honourable senators, the vast majority of them are from St. Stephen, with some from Pennfield, St. John, and Fredericton, which is the capital of New Brunswick, as everyone knows. Every one of the petitioners listed their postal codes, so that senators can get in touch with them if they so please. From that part of New Brunswick you see names from various linguistic or ethnic stock.

(Names of signatories read.)

There is a name here from Harvey Station. Harvey Station is a great dairy area.

An Hon. Senator: A great what area?

Senator Corbin: Dairy: Milk, ice-cream, cream.

An Hon. Senator: I thought you said daring.

Senator Corbin: They are daring people. They are courageous people. It is a difficult country to farm, with rolling hills, but good land. They used to hold a very lively summer festival in that area. In fact, the Minister of Agriculture of New Brunswick would make it his duty to attend the Harvey Fair to encourage those great people.

Senator Gigantès: I regret that you do not intend to read them. I really think you should. Go more slowly and put in all these names.

Senator Corbin: Well, I heard some senators complaining.

Senator Gigantès: They are always complaining, because these petitioners are against their nefarious policies. I beg you to read the names.

Senator Corbin: Perhaps if I did go halfway to meet their earnest wishes and desires, then maybe they would take 50 steps and meet mine.

Senator Gigantès: They would have to have at least a million names drummed into their ears before they would begin to see some sense.

An Hon. Senator: Don't bet any money on it, senator.

Senator Corbin: Senators, I have another petition on the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax and these people are opposed to it, to put it mildly. Twenty-eight people have signed the petition.

(Names of signatories read.)

There is a petitioner from McAdam. McAdam was one locality that was very hard hit during the last decade. There was much unemployment, and many people went out of business. They had a very hard time. This is a workers' town on the border near Vanceborough, Maine. There is a border crossing there, a customs house and immigration. Many of the people from mid-southern New Brunswick who want to do their shopping at Freeport, Maine, or who want to see a baseball game at Boston or New York, cross at the McAdam-Vanceborough border point. The road is not very good, but it is a shorter route to where they want to go.

(Names of signatories read.)

There is a petitioner here from Sussex. Sussex is a another great dairy centre in New Brunswick. It is also being industrialized at quite a pace and there is a very important potash mine near Sussex. It is, in fact, one of the biggest potash mines in Canada outside of Saskatchewan.

(Names of signatories read.)

Someone from Edmonton, Alberta, signed this petition. He must have been visiting New Brunswick, because he signed in St. Stephen.

Senator Hastings: I could verify that Don Kennedy who signed that petition is a native of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, but he is presently a lawyer practising in Edmonton. He was probably home for some occasion when the petition was circulated.

Senator Corbin: Then this is a person who is known to you. That is good. That is the sort of exchange we must have in Canada, the west visiting the east and not staying locked into their home provinces. Go out and see what is happening in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Go and see what the fishery situation is, the problems that the sardine fishermen are having. Go and see the problems the potato growers are having in Prince Edward Island. Go and see the sweat, the grime and the dirt that forest workers have to go through to earn a decent living to put bread on their table. They are not white-collar people, you know, taking the commuter service into the inner city core and getting out at night over cocktails and reading their papers. These are hard-working people who feel they will be unjustly treated by the imposition of this goods and services tax, and they are crying out loud and asking the senators to put a stop to this nonsense, and I am glad to do this for them.

(Names of signatories read.)

There is a petitioner here from a locality known as Ledge. To tell you frankly, I had never heard of that locality until today. However, it is in the Geographical Names of New Brunswick Toponymy Study.

Ledge Post Office from 1854-1915 at The Ledge, four miles east of St. Stephen. We should not confuse that with Ledges, which is a former railway station in Saint-François-de-Madawaska, established in 1891. The post office name was Winding Ledges. It is now known as Saint-François-de-Madawaska, a thriving community where a strong majority of the people voted for me in the five elections in which I ran to get a seat in the House of Commons.

They are brave people, hard-working people; people whom I would describe as commoners; your run-of-the-mill Canadian; good-hearted and hospitable, you would not believe it. There is no better place to visit. It is also a very picturesque place, right on the Upper Saint John River. Across from Saint-François, or the old Ledges, are the beautiful hills of Maine. I would like to be there right now to see those colourful hills. How I miss them, honourable senators.

Senator Gigantès, perhaps you would relieve me.

Senator Gigantès: I have a petition, which I will not read integrally. It is against the GST, and it comes from Alberta. I have received a lot of letters from Alberta, because unbeknownst to most of you, I was there for a while. I was Dean of Lethbridge University. It is a most interesting and wonderful place.

I was driven out of Lethbridge by Cleo Miles, a great Liberal who was the editor of the Lethbridge Herald, and who was a member of the Board of Governors of the University of Lethbridge. He was also an aficionado of amateur wine-making. He would make it out of the most fantastic substances; dead snakes, and all kinds of peculiar weeds that grew in the foothills. He would invite you to his house and he was so proud of that wine. He would insist on you drinking it. I knew that it was more than my life was worth, and certainly my palate, if I had stayed in that position.

So eventually I left, but while I was there I met some wonderful people; the kind of people who are writing their names and addresses on this petition. I have names of people who were students of mine from the university.

(Names of signatories read.)

I had all kinds of strange students. One of them was sent to me for neglecting his studies, and he had been brilliant in high school. In his first term he had been the best student in the university with the best marks, and in his second term his marks collapsed. So he was sent to the Dean. I said, "What is the matter? Do you have any problems you would like to discuss? Is there any way we can help you?" He said, "Mr. Dean, I am married." I said, "Well, you are only 19. I remember when I was 19, I would have had enough energy to be both married and to study." He said, "Mr. Dean, you don't understand. I am married. I have a mistress. My wife does not like it, and she keeps me awake all night." I said, "You have one more month to complete your work."

Lethbridge is a great university. It has a fantastic Department of Botany, and by going on various excursions with the professors of botany around the foothills in Jeeps, I came to appreciate the beauty of that particular part of Alberta, and in particular the foothills. It is really marvellous country. They also took me further east to the plains, and further south to the plains. That is where you really understand the song, "Oh give me land, lots of land, under starry skies above." It is God's own country.

The people of that area have a great sense of independence and freedom. They are ordinary, and they will throw out the Tories in the next election, because they put their trust in someone for a while and they are very loyal, and they stand for a certain amount of being pushed around, but as soon as they detect trickery, it is over.

(Names of signatories read.)

Duchess is a great little town. You don't expect it. You drive along the road and you are through it before you know where you are. Sometimes there is snow on the ground and a perfectly blue sky, cobalt-tinged towards the evening, just after the sun has set. That is a marvellous sight to see.

(Names of signatories read.)

Brooks, Alberta is worth visiting. It is one of those towns where you understand the alienation of the west. They have been passed by. The railroads have been closed down. One of the revolutions that I saw in Alberta when I was there was the overthrow of the Social Credit, the party of Mr. Manning, our former colleague here. Incidentally, Mr. Trudeau was the first Prime Minister of Canada to appoint senators from the opposition party. We have some very distinguished senators opposite who were appointed by him. He appointed them knowing full well that they were true Tories and that they would sit in the Tory seats. On the other hand, there are some senators, allegedly Liberal or whatever, who have been appointed to the Tory seats.

An Hon. Senator: Why don't you name all those senators? That would be interesting for history.

Senator Gigantès: No, no. No turn coats. Mr. Trudeau did not like turncoats so he appointed true-blue Tories to the Tory seats; an act of equity which has not been equalled in Canadian history.

An Hon. Senator: Did he appoint any NDP senator, for example?

Senator Gigantès: He appointed someone who had been a member of the NDP and had converted to Liberalism. He saw the light when the NDP lost its way and declared for a policy of two nations. That was the Honourable Eugene Forsey, member of the CCF Party and one of the greatest senators we have ever had.

Senator Hébert: I am sorry to say, but you forget a very important Canadian, Madame Thérèse Casgrain, who was one of the most prominent NDP members in Quebec, and in Canada for that matter. Mr. Trudeau appointed her to the Senate, as he appointed Mr. Manning from the Social Credit Party, and some Conservatives and some independents. So I think it is quite a score for a Prime Minister to appoint people from the three opposition parties, and some independents on top of that. We haven't seen that in recent months, by the way.

Senator Gigantès: Both Madame Casgrain and Senator Forsey had a conversation with Mr. Trudeau, which they both reported, saying that they were wondering on which side they were going to sit, and Mr. Trudeau said, "That is your decision." There is a man. He did not extract any promises that they would vote this way or that, and Senator Forsey in many ways was an intellectual thorn in the side of the Liberal government on many occasions. Mr. Trudeau still holds him in high esteem because he could recognize quality, even in opponents.

(Names of signatories read.)

We had a professor in Lethbridge. He had been with Simon Fraser University and he moved to the University of Lethbridge after a sort of belated Berkeley type of rebellion in Simon Fraser. He brought with him, as his assistant, a graduate student who was the prototypical Nordic goddess. At the University of Lethbridge there was an enormous corridor with two great straightaways at the top, and all the professors' offices opened on to this corridor. This splendid young lady would jog there when the weather was inclement. Of course, all the professors' doors would be open, and the male professors would be gawking. I think scholarly research suffered at the time, but I didn't see any way of saying to this young woman that she should not run around the corridor of the professors' office. Unfortunately, my office was on another floor.

Senator Bosa: Are you keeping in touch with that professor?

Senator Gigantès: That particular professor had the young woman living with him and his wife, and after a little while the wife left the professor to marry another professor, and this first professor married his Nordic goddess. So everything was well that ends well.

Senator Bosa: You have a theme for a movie there.

Senator Gigantès: It was somewhat like "The Last Picture Show"—there was one cinema in Lethbridge, and every now and then it would get close to bankruptcy. When it was getting close to bankruptcy, the owner of the cinema would bring a "skin" flick—a porno movie—and all the leaders of the religious sects and churches would go to see whether it should be condemned, and they would go over and over and over again, sitting there condemning it and making sure that nobody else could get in.

Senator Bosa: It sounds like a movie out of Peyton Place.

Senator Gigantès: A little, yes.

Senator Corbin: Are you still on petitions, senator?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, I am on this petition. I haven't counted the names.

Senator Corbin: I was wondering what you were talking about.

Senator Gigantès: I am talking about all the wonderful places from which these people were writing.

The standard of scholarship was very high, let me tell you. There was a young professor of philosophy who was doing his doctorate, and felt he had to go back to Plato, but he did not trust the various translations, quite properly, because they do not concord. Since I am a classicist, he asked me whether I would give him private lessons in ancient Greek, and I agreed. Then a young woman called Sandy—I won't reveal her name—came and asked if she could participate in that class, too. I ended up having six students to whom I was teaching the ancient Greek language—Platonic Greek, because Greek differs, depending on the age. Ancient Greek goes from Homer to the modern Greek churches. It is quite difficult to understand or to go from one language to the other. It is not as far as from Beowulf to modern English, but would compare with Chaucer to modern English. However, the similarities between Homer and modern Greek are much greater than the similarities between Latin and any of Latin's descendant languages.

So this young woman came to the class and she wiped the professor and the class. She was better by far than anyone else. She was studying phys-ed; and some idiot counsellor had convinced her that she was not bright. Well, she was excessively bright. She is now a professor at one of the Ivy League universities. In any event, she suffered two great tragedies. One tragedy was that this young professor would not pay any attention to her, and she had attributed that to the fact that she had a gallstone operation. Lethbridge, Alberta, incidentally, is the gallstone capital of the world. There are more gallstone cases per capita in Lethbridge, Alberta, than anywhere else, and they can't explain it. Apparently, it does not have anything to do with the water. Maybe it is the fantastic Charolais steaks they eat and the very rich cream and milk that they have. It is dairy country.

Senator Corbin: What do they do with the stones?

Senator Gigantès: They have them removed, generally. Sandy had her gallstones removed, but there was a complication, so she had a drain attached to her for some weeks. She told me, weeping, that one reason she felt she couldn't seduce this young professor, whom she wanted to marry, was that she felt embarrassed about showing herself nude in front of him with this drain hanging out her.

Senator MacDonald: Excuse me, senator, I can't stand the sight of blood.

Senator Gigantès: Let us go back to the names.

(Names of signatories read.)

By the way, the Vice-President of the University of Lethbridge at the time became President of the University of Carleton. Mr. Beckwell was a man with a great sense of justice and equity, but also had a tendency to drive at insane speeds. He was driving from Lethbridge to Calgary, a distance he used to cover in half the time that anybody else took, and a young RCMP pulled him over and gave him a ticket for a huge fine, because the fines in Alberta are really stiff. Mr. Beckwell recognized this young RCMP officer as one of our students. I am proud to say that Mr. Becker didn't hold this against him. This student graduated with high honours without any harassment from Mr. Becwell, which is the right kind of academic behaviour and shows the sort of character that is so lacking in this present government.

Senator Fairbairn: May I ask you a question, senator?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Fairbairn: I was given the information by Senator MacDonald that you had referred to my hometown as the gallstone capital of the world? I thought after all these years that I had missed something somewhere. I wonder whether you could bring me up to date?

● (1600)

Senator Gigantès: There is a clinic where the doctors do group practice. I used to go there. The doctors told me that, statistically, Lethbridge in 1971 was the gallstone capital of the world. I am delighted I was able to enlighten you.

I was also talking about how Clio Mower drove me out of town with his concoctions. As you know, he used to brew wine out of snakes and Lord knows what else. It was more than I could bear. It was that and—may the producers of this product forgive me—Canadian Sherry. The snake wine and Canadian sherry at the university was too much.

Senator Fairbairn: He also grows prize-winning delphiniums.

Senator Gigantès: His delphiniums were a joy to behold. Have you had his delphinium wine?

Senator Fairbairn: No, I have not.

Senator Gigantès: Don't try it.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, if you would allow me, your story about a professor being pulled over by a police officer made me think about an incident that is more directly linked to our business at hand.

It happened last Saturday. I was shopping in Montreal, on Jean Talon Street, and I was caught in heavy traffic. At one point, I saw—

Senator Gigantès: I am sorry to interrupt. I only hope that Senator Lavoix-Roux was not anywhere near you at that point in time because it would be very dangerous.

Senator Hébert: So I was on Jean Talon Street doing some shopping when suddenly I saw a police car from the Montreal urban community police edging its way through the traffic and coming to a halt beside me. So I thought: this is it, I must have crossed on the red light without realizing it, too bad. And the police officer told me: well done, Senator! Do not give up! We support your fight against the GST. That was from the good old Montreal police.

Senator Gigantès: Whoever has said that this is not a distinguished police force. I have always found these gentlemen to be most courteous when I was living in Montreal.

[English]

Senator Gigantès: There is Ross Hampton from Hudson, Quebec. How he finds himself in Brooks, Alberta, I don't know, but it reinforces Senator Corbin's earlier statement that it is good for people to travel from one end of the country to the other. It helps them to realize there is no country as beautiful and wonderful as this. That is how I remember Alberta.

I remember the kindness and hospitality. They really wore their hearts on their sleeves. They were prepared to give anything. The rich ranchers thought nothing of taking one to Vancouver for a Chinese meal.

There was a Chinese restaurant in Lethbridge and people used to say that people from Vancouver ate there. Of course, there was another Chinese restaurant in Lethibridge, a wonderfully hospitable and generous place.

I was saying earlier that Sandy had another tragedy. I was in Mower's living room, watching the famous 1971 Grey Cup. If you remember, an Alberta team was playing against the hated Alouettes. The game was played in a snowstorm such as you have never seen. The Alouettes won by a field goal in the last 10 seconds of the game. Sandy's father dropped dead right there. They take their loyalties very seriously.

I have another petition which I will spare reading but simply say that it is against the GST.

(Names of signatories read.)

These petitioners include a petitioner named Hicks. The Hicks reside not only in Nova Scotia, where a distinguished former colleague made such a name for himself, but also in Alberta. There is a petitioner here from Chinook, Alberta. A Chinook is that wonderful wind that comes along all of a sudden, when you are at 40 below, and the temperature climbs to 20 degrees above. As a greenhorn, I was told that the trees, after feeling this heat, would start producing sap that would run into the small branches. When the cold returned immediately after the wind died, one could hear the branches cracking in the middle of the night. I stayed awake at night, waiting for those loud cracks but never heard them. Is that a true story, or were they kidding me? When they said they did not collect the garbage because they waited for the wind to take it all the way to Toronto, were they kidding me?

Senator Waters: They were kidding.

Senator Gigantès: It is a tradition that tenderfeet get kidded in the great west.

I have wonderful memories of that wind. The parking lot at the University of Lethbridge was a long way from the university. It was on one of the banks of the river and in order to get from the parking lot to the university, one had to go through an enormous plastic tunnel. It was full of holes and one would nearly die from the cold. I happened to own a Volkswagen because Volkswagens were much more resistant to cold with their air-cooled engines. It also had a gas heater that would work immediately. I felt I would die in any other car. The Chinook was a great relief.

Before I went to Calgary for the first time, central Canadians told me with some contempt that I was going to uncivilized parts and would not be able to eat anything decent other than steak. Of course, steak in Alberta is ambrosia. It is food for the Gods. One can get a filet mignon as big as a football, and the ranchers are prepared to give it to you any time. One only has to stop and the hospitality pours out.

However, I was told that Calgary would be a cow town. I stayed at the Palliser Hotel where the chef, who has since left, had made one of the most elaborate meals in the history of french cuisine. Their cellar was exquisite. They had a 1967 St. Estephe wine. My father was a general and very fond of those wines, so I am sure you probably are, general. It was just the right time to taste that wine because any later and it becomes granular at the bottom and one has to be careful with the decanting.

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator accept a question? Where did that wine come from.

Senator Gigantès: It came from the Bordeaux region. If one wants to understand the root of the French-English problem in Europe, one of the oldest enmities started when the English first took away those magnificent wine-producing regions from the French. Naturally, the French never forgave them and took the vineyards back. The British never forgave the French for taking back all this magnificent wine. To this day, the British have such an appetite for this sort of wine that at the auctions in France, they buy the best. They will pay any price to buy the best there is. The Belgians buy the next best, and I regret to say that the French in France get the third chance at their own wines. I am very happy to say that there was great wine in Calgary.

I have another petition with 35 names, all from Alberta. I am presenting these petitions because I was in Alberta and met many people. When there was a dance at the university, the good fathers of the town made sure nothing wrong happened and packed the place with more RCMP plain clothes policemen than there were students.

(Names of signatories read.)

Erickson, the great archict who designed our embassy in Washington, also designed Lethbridge University. Despite all my entreaties, he committed what we came to call Erickson's folly. He ordered a special carpet in a design he called "wheat field", which was laid in the cafeteria. The first thing to be spilled on that carpet was grape juice, which can only be removed with acid or dynamite. It is a killer stain and that carpet was utterly destroyed a few days later.

The cafeteria itself was great because the nearby ranches donated haunches of their wonderful beef. One could eat a slice of that great beef for pennies.

Other petitioners are from near the Rockies. The Himalayas are much taller and more barren, whereas the Rockies are relatively young and contain fantastic vegetation at a much higher level. The colour changes in these rich forests as the sun passes through each day. Those are some of my favourite pictures. I can understand why Mr. Chrétien says that he does not want to give up the Rockies.

The Conservatives may joke, but anything that does not suit them is either a joke or beneath their dignity, like the names of petitioners that they do not want to hear in the Senate.

Other petitioners are from Red Deer. I attended a meeting in Red Deer where the principal hotel is the Capri. Again, one notices the hospitality and the multi-ethnicity. You meet Italians, Japanese, Chinese and Franco-Albertans. There is a freedom and camaraderie in Alberta that one finds practically nowhere else in Canada. Maybe it is because I spent a considerable amount of time there, at least until I could no longer stand snake wine.

Senator Corbin: What about the First People?

Senator Gigantès: That was one of my great shocks. I suppose Canadian propaganda was very successful, or Canadians I had met did not know the facts. I had never been on an Indian reservation until I went to one near Lethbridge. It is a shock to see it for the first time. Like it or not, it is one of the sad things in this great country that, at least until recent years when we have begun to care somewhat about the fate of our aboriginal people, we did not give them what they wanted. They themselves cannot always express what they want but, above all, we have to give them something that will allow them to feel the dignity of control over their own affairs to some extent.

Senator Cogger: Would you allow me a question? Were the good people of Alberta who signed those petitions aware that their names would be put on the record through you?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable Senator, if you do not want your name to appear or to be used, normally you would say that you do not want it. You do not give your name but use a pseudonym like "logger" or "jogger". If you send me a petition with your name and address, I will read it.

Senator Cogger: Perhaps you do not understand my question. My point is that if I want to oppose or support something through a petition and I did not want it put on the record as part of a bunch of nonsense and irrelevant statements, could I still have it straight as I would send it? That is my question.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Cogger, are you suggesting that the good people of Alberta might have reached the point where they should be afraid of reprisals by the Tory government if they reveal their names as opposing the GST? Even the Mulroney government cannot have reached that point yet. That is the next stage. You started with the Senate to show a total lack of any respect for precedent and law. I am on my feet. I will let you talk to me in a moment.

Senator Cogger: I am only suggesting that the good people of Alberta risk seeing their good wishes and their petitions to the Senate drowned in a bunch of nonsense that is so irrelevant that we may miss the point. Why not give it to us straight?

Senator Gigantès: If praising the magnificent scenery and hospitality of Alberta—

Senator Cogger: And the parties in Lethbridge.

Senator Gigantès: —which shows their joie-de-vivre and the fact that they are lively people who have come from survivors. If that is irrelevant in your eyes, it is not irrelevant in mine, and I do not think it is irrelevant in the eyes of Alberta.

Senator Cogger: When I want to hear about the beauties of Alberta, I would sooner listen to Chief Morning Bird.

Senator Gigantès: You would lose the experience of someone who did not live there long enough to become blasé.

Senator Fairbairn: Are you saying I am blasé?

Senator Gigantès: If we live there all our lives and watch the magnificent movement of the prairie in the summer, with the wheat near its peak, it is like a golden sea. It is breathtaking the first time it is seen. I am still haunted by this wonderful sight, but after 10 or 15 years of looking at it, one might not be haunted by it.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Gigantès, I would suggest you are quite wrong on that. The more years one spends looking at those wheat fields as they drift into the foothills of the Rockies, the more moved one becomes. One never becomes blasé.
